The question here, then, is whether the IFF, in being based on a percentage of "the fee income of the lawyer making the payment," constitutes impermissible fee sharing.[2] We conclude that IFF does not constitute impermissible fee sharing, for a number of reasons. First, FSS is an established, organizational referral service rather than an individual third-party intermediary. Comment [6] to D.C. Rule 7.1 distinguishes between a "recognized or established agency or organization" offering a "lawyer referral program," to which a lawyer may "pay the usual fees charged by such programs," on the one hand, and "payments to intermediaries to recommend the lawyer's services," with respect to which "special considerations arise," on the other. This comment suggests that the drafters of the D.C. Rules were not particularly concerned about the manner in which non-profit lawyer referral services structured their fee arrangements; their principal focus was on preventing non-lawyer intermediaries from using their power over lawyers who rely on them for business referrals to influence those lawyers' "professional independence of judgment." D.C. Rule 5.4, Comment [1]. Indeed, we see the development of referral schemes that do not compromise lawyers' independence as a positive development, though we recognize that our Rules are less clear than they could be on this issue.

Lacking the benefit of complete clarity in our own rules, we turn for additional insight to the opinions of other jurisdictions. A great many opinions from other jurisdictions support the conclusion that lawyers' payment of a fee linked to the legal bills generated through their participation in a non-profit, government-approved referral service is permissible, provided that the fee arrangement appears to be a reasonable means of funding the costs of running the referral service. The ABA Committee on Professional Ethics and Grievances reached this conclusion as early as 1956, in response to a query from the ABA Standing Committee on Lawyer Referral Services as to whether a bar association could operate a lawyer referral service financed "either by a flat fee or a sliding scale charge based on the fees derived [by participating lawyers] from the cases referred to them." In an opinion authored by Henry Drinker, the Committee held that such an arrangement would not violate Canon 34, the then-existing fee splitting prohibition, concluding that "[r]egistrants may be required to contribute to the expense of operating [the referral plan] . . . by a reasonable percentage of fees collected by them." ABA Formal Op. 291 (1956).

The ABA Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility reiterated this conclusion in 1968, when it gave approval to several proposed schemes for financing a lawyer referral service including remittance of "a reasonable percentage of the fees earned" through use of the service and assessment of "a forwarding fee, ranging from 10% to 25%, of the fee collected by the attorney." See ABA Informal Op. 1076 (1968).

Following these ABA opinions, many state legal ethics committees reached similar conclusions. The Michigan State Bar Committee on Professional Ethics, for example, approved a lawyer's participation in a not-for-profit referral service registered with the state bar that charged a percentage of the fee collected by the lawyer, reasoning that, so long as participating lawyers in a bar association referral service are not subject to "undue influence, the professional judgment of the lawyer is not interfered with and the rule against fee-splitting with nonlawyers is not violated." Michigan State Bar Comm. on Prof. and Judicial Ethics, Op. RI-75 (1991).[3]

[2] We assume for purposes of this opinion that attorneys participating in the FSS program meet all other qualifications and conditions for providing legal services to the clients at issue and we consider the FSS program only with regard to the IFF funding mechanism, as described above, and not with regard to any other of its requirements.

[3] See also California State Bar Ethics Op. 1983-70 (1983) (attorney may pay approved lawyer referral service a fee based on percentage of fees collected but may not raise fee charged to client to cover referral charge); Chicago Bar Ass'n Prof. Resp. Comm., Op. 87-1 (1987) (lawyer may pay a percentage of the fee collected to bar association-

Another comprehensive opinion is Pennsylvania Bar Ass'n Ethics Op. 93-162 (1993), which collects many other ethics committee opinions approving bar associations' use of referral fees based on a percentage of lawyers' fees obtained through the service. The Pennsylvania opinion also examines statistics from the ABA Standing Committee on Lawyer Referral and Information Services, which indicate that, in 1989, twenty-two states and localities used "earned fee" financing to support bar association referral services. The Committee reasoned that such widespread implementation of earned fee financing shows that this funding mechanism falls within the "acceptable 'usual charges of a not-for-profit lawyer referral service' under Pennsylvania Rule of Professional Conduct 7.2(c)." It further reasoned that this specific quoted language took precedence over the more general fee splitting prohibition of Pa. Rule of Professional Conduct 5.4(a). A similar interpretation of the language of D.C. Rules 7.1 and 5.4 can be made here, as already noted above. See D.C. Rule 7.1, Comment [6].

Both the Michigan and Pennsylvania Committees found persuasive on public policy grounds Emmons v. State Bar of California, 6 Cal. App. 3d 565, 86 Cal. Rptr. 367 (Ct. App. 3d Dist., 1970), in which the court concluded that the evils created by lawyer fee splitting with nonlawyers are not present in the case of lawyer referral services. As the Emmons court explained:

> There are wide differences—in motivation, technique and social impact—between the lawyer reference service of the bar association and the discreditable fee-splitting features in the disciplinary decisions. Prohibited fee-splitting between lawyer and layman carries with it the danger of competitive solicitation; poses the possibility of control by the lay person, interested in his own profit rather than the client's fate; facilitates the lay intermediary's tendency to select the most generous, not the most competent, attorney.

6 Cal.App.3d at 573-74; 86 Cal. Rptr. at 372 (internal citations omitted). The court held that none of these dangers is present where a referral service > seeks not individual profit but the fulfillment of public and professional objectives. It has a legitimate, nonprofit interest in making legal services more readily available to the public. When conducted within the framework conceived for such facilities, its reference service presents no risks of collision with the objectives on the canons of fee splitting and lay interposition.

6 Cal.App.3d at 574; 86 Cal. Rptr. at 372-73.

We are likewise persuaded by this reasoning. FSS is a nonprofit service aimed at achieving important public policy objectives, including holding down the cost to taxpayers of legal services provided to government agencies. It presents no risks of interfering with participating lawyers' independent professional judgment. To be sure, all the opinions we have cited deal with referral plans operated by bar associations, rather than by a government agency. Nevertheless, we find their underlying rationale equally compelling here.[4] The IFF, established under congressional direction, is a reasonable means of funding a non-profit service to assist government agencies in obtaining lower cost legal services, just as the bar associations' referral services provide less costly legal services to the general public. Given the nonprofit, public interest motivation underlying both arrangements, we see no more potential for the kinds of abuses at which D.C. Rule 5.4 is aimed in one context than in the other.

The reasonableness of the one percent IFF charge further supports our conclusion. This percentage appears small when compared to the percentages found reasonable in other legal ethics committee opinions we examined.[5] The fact that government agencies can choose whether or not to use the FSS schedule in contracting for legal services provides still further indication that the IFF is reasonable. If the agency can negotiate a lower fee for legal services by approaching a law firm that is not on the FSS schedule, the agency is free to do so. It thus seems safe to assume that to the extent that agencies opt to use FSS schedules to obtain legal services, FSS offers a reasonable, cost-effective means for government agencies to contract for legal services.[6]

Of course, as we noted at the outset, under Rule 7.1(b)(5) lawyers participating in a referral service, including the FSS scheme we are examining here, must comply with the requirement to take reasonable steps "to ensure that the client is informed of (a) the consideration, if any, paid by the lawyer to the intermediary, and (b) the effect, if any, of the payment to the intermediary on the total fee to be charged." Thus, under Rule 7.1(b)(5), lawyers must disclose to their government agency client their payment of the one percent IFF and the effect of doing so, if any, on their legal fee.

Inquiry No. 01-1-1
Adopted: May 15, 2001
Published: December 2001

sponsored lawyer referral service in order to cover the expense of operating the service, provided fee is limited to one that is reasonable); Arkansas Bar Association Op. 95-01 (1995) (bar association referral service may require participating attorney to pay a percentage of fees produced by clients where increase in revenue produced for bar association will help maintain this public service).

[4] Contra Ohio Sup. Ct. Bd. Of Comm'rs on Grievances and Discipl., Op. 95-6 (1995) (disapproving payment of fee based on a percentage of legal fee earned from client referred by a non-profit service that was not affiliated with a bar association). This opinion is distinguishable, however, because Ohio Rule Code of Professional Responsibility DR 2-103 differs from D.C. Rule 7.1 in specifically prohibiting lawyers from paying any type of fee to a referral service other than a bar association.

[5] See, e.g., Emmons v. State Bar of California, 6 Cal. App. 3d at 568, 86 Cal. Rptr. at 368 (referral fee of one third of fee received); Vermont Advisory Ethics Op. 87-12 (1987) (lawyer expected to pay 10% of any fee received); Calif. St. Bar Ethics Op. 1983-70 (1983) (10% of all fees collected over a $300 minimum); ABA Informal Op. 1076 (10% to 25% of the fee collected by the attorney).

[6] We thus need not reach the issue of whether lawyers may "pass through" a referral service fee to clients in the form of increased charges for legal services. Many bar associations have been adamant in disallowing this practice. See, e.g., California Opinion 1983-70, supra; Michigan Op. RI-75, supra; Pa. Ethics Op. 93-162, supra. In light of the voluntary and competitive nature of the FSS contracting scheme, there appears to be little danger that the IFF fee results in higher legal bills to government clients. Indeed, the very purpose of FSS is to provide agencies with contract options through which they may be able to obtain lower prices for legal services. Lawyers must, of course, take into account their obligation to pay the IFF in negotiating a rate for legal services with FSS, but will have incentives not to pass through this cost in their billing rate in order to present a competitive proposal.

We also note, relatedly, that this case, in which lawyers are responsible for submitting referral service fees, differs from the situation presented in our recent Opinion 302, where we decided that Rule 5.4 was not implicated where a client directly pays a fee to use a legal services bidding system. Where it is the lawyer's responsibility to submit a referral service fee based on a percentage of the legal fees earned, D.C. Rules 5.4 and 7.1 apply. The lawyer cannot claim to be merely remitting the fee on behalf of the client.

Opinion No. 308

Ethical Constraints on Lawyers Who Leave Private Employment for Government Service

- Lawyers who leave private practice to enter government service must be vigilant to protect the interests of former clients while representing their new clients with diligence and zeal. A government lawyer owes continuing obligations to her former clients to protect client confidences and secrets both from disclosure to others and from use by the lawyer to the disadvantage of the former clients. A government lawyer may not undertake work that is the same as or substantially related to work done for a former client without the consent of the former client. While disqualification of a government lawyer from a matter due to work done for a prior client is not imputed to other lawyers in the government agency or entity, screening measures should be considered in appropriate cases.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification)

Discussion

Rule 1.11 of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, Successive Government and Private Employment, details specific ethical prohibitions applicable to lawyers who leave public service (e.g., legal counsel to a government agency, judicial officer, or law clerk) and enter private practice. Although there is no parallel rule addressing lawyer movement from private practice to government employment, the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct address this subject more generally and provide guidance on the ethical constraints that apply when a lawyer leaves private practice to enter public service.[1] This opinion summarizes the ethical considerations that a lawyer entering government service should bear in mind in discharging her duties to both her former clients and her new government employer.[2]

Duties to Former Clients

A lawyer who leaves private practice to enter government service owes important and continuing ethical obligations to her former clients.[3]

1. Confidentiality

First and foremost among a lawyer's duties to former clients is the duty of confidentiality. Rule 1. 6 (a) prohibits a lawyer from revealing a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client or from using a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client to the disadvantage of the client. These two distinct duties continue after the client-lawyer relationship has terminated, see Rule 1.6, Comment [28], and are fully applicable to a lawyer who has moved from private to government employment.

First, Rule 1.6 mandates that a lawyer who has obtained confidences and secrets about a former client in the course of a former representation must be vigilant not to reveal any protected information obtained from the former client no matter how relevant to the work of his new client. Second, Rule 1.6 imposes an additional and perhaps more subtle prohibition relating to client confidences and secrets; namely that the lawyer not knowingly "use" protected information "to the disadvantage of the client." This prohibition requires that the government lawyer who is presented with an assignment in which she could use former client confidences (without necessarily revealing them to others) to achieve a better result for the government must not do so if there is any reasonably foreseeable disadvantage to the former client. Thus, for example, a lawyer who in private practice represented automobile manufacturers extensively in product liability litigation and learned information in the course of that representation about the client's future plans for design changes could not, as a government employee, use that information to shape an environmental regulation that could be viewed as unfavorable to the former client. While such a government assignment might not be prohibited as a conflict of interest under Rule 1.9 in that it would not involve the same or a substantially related matter, the use of client confidences or secrets even in an unrelated matter to the disadvantage of the former client is prohibited, absent client consent or one of the specific exceptions in Rule 1.6 (c) and (d).[4]

2. Conflicts of Interest

Rule 1.9 provides that a lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client consents after consultation.

Rule 1.9 requires that a government lawyer contemplating representation in a matter directly adverse to the interests of a former client determine whether the matter is the same as or substantially related to representation that the lawyer previously provided to the former client.[5]

---

[1] In addition to the D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct, there are criminal and civil statutory and regulatory prohibitions and obligations applicable to government employees, including lawyers. These statutes and regulations, which address subjects such as conflicts of interest, financial disclosure, restrictions on payments and post-employment activities, include (1) the criminal conflict of interest laws in chapter 11 of title 18, United States Code; (2) the restrictions on gifts in 5 U.S.C. §§ 7351 and 7353; (3) the financial disclosure requirements of 5 U.S.C. app. § 101, et seq.; (4) Executive Order 12731; and (5) the Standards of Ethical Conduct for Employees of the Executive Branch set forth in 5 C.F.R. part 2635. This opinion will not address these requirements, which also must be complied with by the government attorney.

[2] Similarly, this Opinion does not address the ethical issues that are presented when a private lawyer temporarily provides legal services to a government agency or entity. See D.C. Bar opinion 268 (1996) (Conflict of Interest Issues Where Private Lawyers Provide Volunteer Legal Assistance to the D.C. Corporation Counsel).

[3] A lawyer in private practice contemplating a move to government service also must be sensitive to ethical obligations that may arise during the transition process. To the extent that the lawyer's move to government service involves termination of ongoing client representations, the lawyer must do so in a manner that minimizes possible adverse impact on the client and that complies with the requirements of D.C. Rule 1.16. Even in the case of concluded client representations, there may be continuing client obligations, including the need to provide for the proper transfer or disposition of client files. these obligations have been addressed in other Committee Opinions and will not be revisited here. See, e.g., D.C. Bar Opinion 283 (1998) (Disposition of Closed Client Files); D.C. Bar Opinion 294 (1999) (Sale of Law Practice by Retiring Lawyer). In addition, a lawyer in private practice contemplating a move to the government also must be sensitive to any potential conflicts of interest that may be presented during the course of seeking government employment. See, e.g., D.C. Bar Opinion 210 (1990) (Representation of Criminal Defendants by Attorney Seeking Position as Assistant U.S. Attorney).

[4] Because Rule 1.6 is limited to client confidences and secrets, its restriction does not extend, of course, to general information about an industry, area of practice, legal interpretations, economic sectors, and the like that a lawyer learns in the course of her professional career.

[5] To the extent that determination of what constitutes "the same or a substantially related matter" presents difficult questions of interpretation under

The existence and scope of a "matter" for purposes of Rule 1.9 depend on the facts of a particular representation and the nature and extent of the individual lawyer's involvement. When a lawyer has been directly involved in a lawsuit or transaction on behalf of a client, the Rule plainly prohibits subsequent representation of another client whose interests are materially adverse. "The underlying question is whether the lawyer was so involved in the matter that the subsequent representation can be justly regarded as a changing of sides in the matter in question." D.C. Rule 1.9, Comment [2]; see Brown v. District of Columbia Board of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37, 42 (D.C. 1984). If a matter is the same as or substantially related to the work done for the former client, the lawyer may not proceed without written consent of both clients, including the former client.[6] In the absence of such consent, the government lawyer may not undertake the representation.

For lawyers in private practice, disqualification due to former client conflicts of interest under Rule 1.9 is imputed to all other lawyers associated in a "firm" with the disqualified lawyer, thereby effectively barring the lawyer's firm from the new representation (in the absence of client consent). See D.C. Rule 1.10. Due to the draconian effects of imputed disqualification on the ability of the government to obtain legal services, however, the principles of imputed disqualification do not apply to disqualify government lawyers who practice in a government agency with a lawyer who is disqualified because of prior client representation. Rule 1.10, Comment [1] ("For purposes of the Rules of Professional Conduct, the term 'firm' . . . does not include a government agency or other government entity."). Thus, unlike the situation in private practice where all lawyers associated in a law firm with a lawyer disqualified under Rule 1.9 also are disqualified through imputation under Rule 1.10, in the government context, the lawyers in a government office, agency, or department who work with a personally disqualified lawyer are not barred from representation adverse to the lawyer's former client.

D.C. Rule 1.11, which deals with the lawyer who moves from government to private practice, similarly does not extend the imputed disqualification of a former government lawyer to other lawyers in the private firm, but does require the implementation of specified screening mechanisms in order to avoid imputed disqualification. See Rule 1.11(c)-(e). While our Rules do not expressly require such screening in the government context for a lawyer who is disqualified by a prior client relationship under Rule 1.9, consideration and implementation by the government agency of voluntary screening measures that effectively insulate the lawyer from ongoing contact with the matter from which she is disqualified should be considered.[7] Such measures provide important assurances to the lawyer's former clients that the lawyer's ethical obligations under Rules 1.6 and 1.9 are being met and signal an appropriate recognition by the government agency of the importance of these obligations.

Duties to New Client

In highlighting the duties owed to former clients, this Opinion does not intend to ignore the new government attorney's ethical obligations to her new government client. Like all attorneys subject to these rules, the attorney must represent her government client competently (D.C. Rule 1.1), "zealously and diligently within the bounds of the law" (D.C. Rule 1.3), and in a manner that avoids conflicts of interest or impairment of the lawyer's professional judgment (D.C. Rule 1.7). Like all government lawyers, a lawyer joining the government from private practice also must be sensitive to those provisions of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct that specifically address the ethical obligations of government lawyers. See, e.g., D.C. Rule 3.8 (Special Obligations of a Prosecutor). Finally, government lawyers must be sensitive to the reality that the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct are just one element of the larger body of authority governing the conduct of government attorneys;[8] discussion of the specific elements of those statutes and regulations, however, is beyond the scope of this opinion.

Inquiry No. 00-8-35
Adopted: June 26, 2001
Published: December 2001

Opinion No. 309

Advance Waivers of Conflicts of Interest

- Advance waivers of conflicts of interest are not prohibited by the Rules of Professional Conduct. Such waivers, however, must comply with the overarching requirement of informed consent. This means that the less specific the circumstances considered by the client and the less sophisticated the client, the less likely that an advance waiver will be valid. An advance waiver given by a client having independent counsel (in-house or outside) available to review such actions presumptively is valid, however, even if general in character. Regardless of whether reviewed by independent counsel, an advance waiver of conflicts will not be valid where the two matters are substantially related to one another.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification: General Rule)
- Rule 2.2 (Intermediary)

Inquiry

The Ethics Committee has been asked whether advance waivers of conflicts of interest[1] are permissible and, if so, whether there are requirements for such waivers additional to, or different from, those prescribed by Rules 1.7 and 1.9 for waivers generally.[2] For purposes of this opinion, the term "advance waiver" the applicable ethical rules, the government attorney should utilize the significant resources represented by the U.S. Office of Government Ethics and the agency ethics officer designated for her particular agency.

[6] Rule 1.11, which governs lawyers who leave government service for private practice, contains no provisions for waiver of the lawyer's disqualification. This is not the case for the "reverse revolving door" i.e., private practice to government, which is governed by Rule 1.9. Comment [3] to Rule 1.9, while noting that Rule 1.11 governs the transition from government to private practice, expressly states that "disqualification from subsequent representation is for the protection of clients and can be waived by them."

[7] The screening measures identified in Opinion 279 (Availability of Screening as Cure for Imputed Disqualification) provide guidance on important factors that should be considered in establishing an ethical screen.

[8] See, e.g., statutes and regulations cited in Note 1 supra.

[1] Waivers of conflicts of interest, which are the principal subject of this opinion, are different from waivers of confidentiality. See infra note 10.

[2] D.C. Rule 1.8 addresses conflicts of interest arising from certain types of transactions. This opinion does not address waivers of such conflicts.

means one that is granted before the conflict arises and generally before its precise parameters (e.g., specific adverse client, specific matter) are known.[3]

Discussion

The practice of law in this country has changed markedly in the century since the ABA Canons of Professional Ethics were promulgated. As was the case then, many lawyers practice in relatively small firms, or as solo practitioners, in a single geographic location. Increasingly, though, law firms have hundreds or even thousands of lawyers, with multiple offices across the country and around the globe. In such firms, individual partners or associates may not even know one another, let alone the identities of the clients their colleagues represent or the details of the matters their colleagues are pursuing for such clients.

Moreover, the manner in which clients—particularly commercial clients—use lawyers is quite different than in the past. The days when a large corporation would send most or all its legal business to a single firm are gone. Today, > when corporate clients with multiple operating divisions hire tens if not hundreds of law firms, the idea that, for example, a corporation in Miami retaining the Florida office of a national law firm to negotiate a lease should preclude that firm's New York office from taking an adverse position in a totally unrelated commercial dispute against another division of the same corporation strikes some as placing unreasonable limitations on the opportunities of both clients and lawyers.

ABA Formal Op. 93-372 (1993) ("ABA Opinion"), in American Bar Association, Formal and Informal Ethics Opinions, 1983-1998, at 167-68. This means, for example, that if the law firm hypothesized in the ABA Opinion is looking out for its own interests, it might decline the Miami representation. This in turn would deny the client's choice of a lawyer and would reduce its potential choice of lawyers generally.

One alternative is to let clients waive such conflicts if they view such waivers as being in their interest. This approach has been recognized as proper at least since the promulgation of the ABA Canons of Ethics in 1908. See American Bar Association, Opinions on Professional Ethics 22 (1967) (text of Canon 6); D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility, Disciplinary R. 5-101(A) (1991 ed.).[4] The District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules") prescribe the conflicts of interest that prevent a lawyer from accepting and, in some instances, continuing, a representation. D.C. Rules 1.7, 1.9. Where the conflict involves two current clients, a lawyer[5] may not advance adverse positions on behalf of those clients in the same matter. D.C. Rule 1.7(a). That conflict is not waivable. See id., comments [2]-[4], [6].

Rule 1.7(b) sets out four types of current-client conflicts that may be overcome by a waiver. These are conflicts in which—

(1) in a matter involving a specific party or parties, the position to be taken by the lawyer's client is adverse to the position taken by another client of the lawyer in that matter, even though the other client is represented by a different lawyer;

(2) the representation "will be or is likely to be adversely affected by [the lawyer's] representation of another client;"

(3) "representation of another client [of the lawyer] will be or is likely to be adversely affected by such representation"; or

(4) "the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests."

Conflicts under subparagraphs (2), (3), and (4) of Rule 1.7(b) sometimes are referred to as "punch-pulling" conflicts because they address situations where a lawyer's commitment to the adverse client, or to some personal situation related to the representation, arguably might tempt her to "pull her punches" on behalf of her client.

"The difference between Rule 1.7(a) and Rule 1.7(b) is that in the former, the lawyer is representing multiple interests in the same matter, while in the latter the lawyer is representing a single interest, but a [current] client of the lawyer who is represented by different counsel has an interest adverse to that advanced by the lawyer." D.C. Rule 1.7, comment [1] (emphasis added).

Where a former client is involved, a conflict exists only if the adversity arises in a matter that is the same as, or substantially related to, the matter in which the lawyer formerly represented that client. D.C. Rule 1.9; see Brown v. D.C. Bd. of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37 (D.C. 1984) (en banc); In re Sofaer, 728 A.2d 625 (D.C. 1999) (decided under Rule 1.11).

As noted above, a conflict under Rule 1.7(a) may not be waived. See D.C. Rule 1.7, comments [2]-[4], [6]. A conflict under Rule 1.7(b) may be waived, however, "if each potentially affected client consents to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation." D.C. Rule 1.7(c). "Consent is "a client's uncoerced assent to a proposed course of action, following consultation with the lawyer regarding the matter in question." D.C. Rules, Terminology, ¶ [2]. In turn, "consultation" means "communication of information reasonably sufficient to permit the client to appreciate the significance of the matter in question." Id. ¶ [3]. A waiver must be predicated upon disclosure sufficient to allow the client to make "a fully informed decision" and to make the client "aware of the possible extra expense, inconvenience, and other disadvantages that may arise if an actual conflict of position should later arise and the lawyer be required to terminate the representation." D.C. Rule 1.7, comment [19]; see In re James, 452 A.2d 163, 167 (D.C. 1982) (requiring "a detailed explanation of the risks and disadvantages to the client").

A conflict of interest under Rule 1.9 (former client) also may be waived. D.C. Rule 1.9, comment [3]. Such a waiver is valid "only if there is disclosure of the circumstances, including the lawyer's intended role in behalf of the new client."

[3] We accordingly view a conflict waiver given as part of an agreement for representation by a single lawyer of multiple clients, see D.C. Rules 1.7(c), 2.2, as more in the nature of a current than an advance waiver.

[4] "Giving effect to a client's consent to a conflicting representation might rest either on the ground of contract freedom or on the related ground of personal autonomy of a client to choose whatever champion the client feels is best suited to vindicate the the client's legal entitlements." Charles Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics § 7.2.2, at 339 (1986).

[5] Because a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7 or 1.9 is imputed to a lawyer's entire firm, D.C. Rule 1.10(a); D.C. Ethics Op. 279 (1998), "lawyer" in this discussion comprehends not only the individual lawyer but her entire firm. Thus, if one lawyer in a law firm is disqualified by reason of Rule 1.7 or Rule 1.9, the entire firm is disqualified. D.C. Rule 1.10(a); see D.C. Rule 1.7, comment [23]; D.C. Rule 1.9, comment [3]; D.C. Ethics Op. 279 (1998).

Id.[6] That is, the Rules require that a client who is asked to waive an actual or potential conflict have an adequate appreciation of what protection she is giving up. This requirement is subjective, meaning that more explanation may be required to satisfy the Rules' consent and consultation criteria where a less sophisticated client is involved than where a more sophisticated client is being asked to waive its rights. See D.C. Rule 1.7, comment [20]; ABA Opinion at 170.

We know of no District of Columbia Court of Appeals decision that expressly permits or prohibits advance waivers of conflicts of interest.[7] The D.C. Rules are silent on whether a client may give an advance waiver as to itself, though a comment to Rule 1.7 permits an organization client to "give consent to the lawyer in advance to engage in representations adverse to an affiliate, owner or other constituent of the client . . . so long as the requirements of Rule 1.7(c) can be met." D.C. Rule 1.7, comment [17]. Similarly, this committee has not addressed the issue directly, though we have expressed doubt about the enforceability of advance waivers, "especially where the client is not a sophisticated consumer of legal services," D.C. Ethics Op. 265 (1996), and doubt whether advance waiver of a client's right to accept a confidential settlement could have been the product of informed consent, D.C. Ethics Op. 289 (1999). Nevertheless, we do not write on a clean slate: The American Bar Association's Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility, the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, the ABA's Ethics 2000 Commission,[8] various courts, bar associations in other United States jurisdictions, and at least one respected academic figure have said that while advance waivers are not per se improper, they will be sustained only where the client can be said to have given informed consent.

The ABA Opinion, for example, observes that " '[u]nlike the client issuing a specific waiver, the client issuing a prospective waiver cannot know what confidences he will in the future disclose or in what adverse representations the attorney may engage.' " ABA Opinion at 171 (quoting Note, Prospective Waiver of the Right to Disqualify Counsel for Conflicts of Interest, 79 Mich. L. Rev. 1074, 1082 (1981)). Accordingly, that opinion states that a prospective waiver probably will not stand unless it identifies the opposing party or at least a class of potential opponents, as well as giving the client sufficient information to appreciate "the nature of the likely matter and its potential effect on the client." Id. at 171. The ABA Opinion also cautions that a waiver of conflicts does not constitute a waiver of confidentiality, see infra n. 10, and suggests strongly that any advance waiver be in writing, ABA Opinion at 172-73.

The ABA Opinion also requires that when a conflict arises, the lawyer revisit the judgment(s) she made originally about the propriety of the waiver. Id. at 171. This does not apply literally in the District of Columbia because the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct ("Model Rules") require that the lawyer "reasonably believe[] the representation will not adversely affect the relationship with the other client" in addition to requiring that the clients consent after consultation. Model Rule 1.7(a). The D.C. Rules, on the other hand, permit a lawyer to seek a waiver even though the representation reasonably may be expected to affect adversely the relationship with the other client. D.C. Rule 1.7(b)(2)-(3), 1.7(c). We nevertheless believe that a prudent lawyer in this jurisdiction should revisit the issue when a conflict actually arises, so as to ensure that adequate disclosure will be made to the new client from whom a contemporaneous waiver of conflicts is being sought, see ABA Formal Op. 99-415, and that the lawyer is satisfied that she will be able to represent both clients adequately.

The Restatement does not rule out advance conflict waivers but says that they are > subject to special scrutiny, particularly if the consent is general. A client's open-ended agreement to consent to all conflicts normally should be ineffective unless the client possesses sophistication in the matter in question and has had the opportunity to receive independent legal advice about the consent.

>
> On the other hand, particularly in a continuing client-lawyer relationship in which the lawyer is expected to act on behalf of the client without a new engagement for each matter, the gains to both lawyer and client from a system of advance consent to defined future conflicts might be substantial. A client might, for example, give informed consent in advance to types of conflicts that are familiar to the client. Such an agreement could effectively protect the client's interest while assuring that the lawyer did not undertake a potentially disqualifying representation.

Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, § 122, comment d (2000).

The Restatement adds that if, between the time a prospective waiver is given and the time a conflict arises, "a material change occurs in the reasonable expectations that formed the basis of a client's informed consent, the new conditions must be brought to the attention of the client and new informed consent obtained." Id. Presumably, by "material change" the comment means something short of the change that itself creates the conflict, else there could be no advance waivers.

The changes in the Model Rules recommended by the ABA Ethics 2000 Commission include a comment on the subject of advance conflict waivers. Commission on Evaluation of the Rules of Professional Conduct, Report to House of Delegates (May 2001 rev.) ("Ethics 2000 Report"), prop. Model Rule 1.7, comment [22], available at www.abanet.org/cpr/e2k-report_home.html.[9] The general test of such a waiver is "the extent to which the client reasonably understands the material risks that the waiver entails." Id. This in turn depends on the completeness of the explanation of possible conflicts and the "actual and reasonably foreseeable adverse consequences" of such conflicts. Id. Therefore, consent to a type of conflict with which the client is familiar is more likely to be effective than a general or open-ended consent. Id. Thus,

[6] Where the former client is the government, issues of disqualification, imputation, and waiver are governed by Rule 1.11 rather than Rule 1.9. D.C. Rule 1.9, comment [3].

[7] A 1994 decision expressly declined to rule that an advance waiver by an individual member of a business partnership of a lawyer's representation of the partnership as well as the individual partners is binding as a matter of law. Griva v. Davison, 637 A.2d 830, 846 (1994). The statement was dictum, however, and in any event is consistent with this opinion.

[8] The Ethics 2000 Commission formally is known as the Commission on Evaluation of the Rules of Professional Conduct.

[9] The Commission's recommendations will not become part of the Model Rules until and unless they are adopted by the ABA House of Delegates. The House of Delegates began consideration of the proposals at its August 2001 meeting but did not complete the effort and is scheduled to resume consideration of the report at its February 2002 meeting. ABA Stands Firm on Client Confidentiality, Rejects "Screening" for Conflicts of Interest, 70 U.S.L.W. 2093, 2095 (Aug. 14, 2001). Comment [22] was considered expressly at the August 2001 meeting but a proposed amendment that would have altered or deleted it was not adopted. Id. at 2094.

> if the client is an experienced user of the legal services involved and is reasonably informed regarding the risk that a conflict may arise, such consent is more likely to be effective, particularly if, e.g., the client is independently represented by other counsel in giving consent and the consent is limited to future conflicts unrelated to the subject of the representation.

Id. The Commission's comment on "informed consent" echoes this theme:

> In determining whether the information and explanation provided are reasonably adequate, relevant factors include whether the client or other person is experienced in legal matters generally and in making decisions of the type involved, and whether the client or other person is independently represented by other counsel in giving the consent. Normally such persons need less information and explanation than others, and generally a client or other person who is independently represented by other counsel in giving the consent should be assumed to have given informed consent.

Id., Rule 1.0, comment [6] (emphasis added).

Most courts that have considered this issue have ruled along the lines set out by the ABA Opinion, the Restatement, and the proposal of the Ethics 2000 Commission. Advance conflict waivers have been sustained where the potential adverse party was known and identified, the client giving the waiver was sophisticated, and the waiver had been reviewed by the client's in-house counsel. E.g., United Sewerage Agency v. Jelco Inc., 646 F.2d 1339 (9th Cir. 1981); Fisons Corp. v. Atochem North Amer., Inc., 1990 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15284, 1990 WL 180551 (S.D.N.Y. 1990); Interstate Properties v. Pyramid Co. of Utica, 547 F. Supp. 178 (S.D.N.Y. 1982). The Fisons court stated that where the waiving client is sophisticated, notification of the potential conflict itself is sufficient to satisfy the requirement. Fisons Corp., 1990 WL 180551, at *5. Moreover, at least one court has held that an advance waiver may be implied where the objecting client, including its in-house counsel, had extensive knowledge of the law firm's longtime representation of the other client. City of Cleveland v. Cleveland Elec. Illuminating Co., 440 F. Supp. 193 (N.D. Ohio 1976), aff'd mem., 573 F.2d 1310 (6th Cir. 1977).

On the other hand, advance waivers have been struck down where they are unduly general and unsophisticated clients are involved. Correspondence with the objecting client's nonlawyer employees (claims adjusters), for example, was held insufficient to constitute "consultation" or "full disclosure." Florida Ins. Guaranty Ass'n, Inc. v. Carey Canada, Inc., 749 F. Supp. 255 (S.D. Fla. 1990); see Marketti v. Fitzsimmons, 373 F. Supp. 637 (W.D. Wisc. 1974) (where client a labor union local, mere knowledge of second representation insufficient to constitute waiver). Similarly, an open-ended release of the lawyer from "all rights, burdens, obligations, and privileges which appertain to his [former] employment," coupled with consent for the lawyer to "engage his services pro and con, as he may see fit," was held (notwithstanding the relative sophistication of the client) grossly insufficient to justify the lawyer's subsequent activity—including disclosure of confidential information—adverse to the former client. In re Boone, 83 F. 944 (N.D. Calif. 1897). Instead, said the court, the release would be effective only if it were "positive, unequivocal, and inconsistent with any other interpretation." Id. at 956. A more recent decision held that a general advance consent covering all unrelated matters is insufficient to waive adversity in litigation unless it expressly refers to "litigation." Worldspan, L.P. v. Sabre Group Holdings, Inc., 5 F. Supp. 2d 1356 (N.D. Ga. 1998).

> [F]uture directly adverse litigation against one's present client is a matter of such an entirely different quality and exponentially greater magnitude, and so unusual given the position of trust existing between lawyer and client, that any document intended to grant standing consent for the lawyer to litigate against his own client must identify that possibility, if not in plain language, at least by irresistible inference including reference to specific parties, the circumstances under which such adverse representation would be undertaken, and all relevant like information.

Id. at 1360; see Hasco, Inc. v. Roche, 700 N.E.2d 768 (Ill. App. 1998) (narrow construction of advance waivers). But see Zador Corp. N.V. v. Kwan, 31 Cal. App. 4th 1285, 1300-01, 37 Cal. Rptr. 2d 754, 763 (Cal. App. 1995) (construing general waiver, given in joint representation context, to include litigation).

At least two major local bar associations have opined that advance waivers of conflicts are permissible, particularly where the waiving client is sophisticated. N.Y. County Lawyers' Ass'n Ethics Op. 724 (1998); Los Angeles County Bar Ass'n Formal Op. 471 (1994). The New York County opinion adopts the ABA Opinion's recommendations regarding disclosure of potential adverse clients (or types of clients) and types of adverse representations, adding that the lawyer also should disclose the steps to protect the client (e.g., erection of an ethical wall) that will be taken should a conflict arise. The ultimate issue, the opinion states, is whether "the subsequent conflict should have been reasonably anticipated by the original client based on the disclosures made and the scope of the consent sought." Taking cognizance of the subjective nature of informed consent, the New York County opinion observes that for > a sophisticated client, such as a large corporation with in-house counsel, the adequacy of disclosure will be put to a less stringent test than if the client were a small business, an individual unsophisticated with respect to legal matters, a child or an incapacitated person.

>
> * * *
>
> Indeed, a "blanket" waiver of future conflicts involving adverse parties may be informed and enforceable depending on the client's sophistication, its familiarity with the law firm's practice, and the reasonable expectations of the parties at the time consent is obtained. For example, a subsequent representation may be said to have been reasonably contemplated by a sophisticated client, advised by in-house counsel, who is familiar with a law firm's multi-disciplinary practice and wide variety of clients.

Finally, a prominent academic recently has suggested a "bright line" standard under which even a broad advance conflict waiver generally should be enforced "if it is unambiguous and the client is independently represented by another lawyer, including in-house counsel, at the time the waiver is given." Richard W. Painter, Advance Waiver of Conflicts, 13 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 289, 312 (2000) ("Painter"); accord Brian J. Redding, Suing a Current Client: A Response to Professor Morgan, 10 Geo. J. L. Ethics 487, 497-99 (1997). Professor Painter suggests using solely the "independent representation" criterion rather than coupling it to the "sophisticated client" criterion suggested by the Restatement. Painter, at 327. His approach avoids the uncertainty inherent in making the validity of the waiver depend on a subjective judgment of whether a client is "sophisticated." Id.

Professor Painter also suggests that the "substantially related" criterion that applies where a former client is involved, see D.C. Rule 1.9; Brown, 437 A.2d 37, should be part of the test of which conflicts can be waived in advance. Painter, at 321.

> Although loyalty and confidentiality concerns are heightened when a lawyer is concurrently representing clients with adverse interests, the sweeping prohibition of concurrent conflicts rules can sometimes be intolerable. Many lawyers respond by not taking on a new client who might in the future have interests adverse to current clients, knowing that once they begin representing a client, they will not be permitted to represent other clients in matters where the first client's interests are adverse.
>
> * * *
>
> Although the risk of adverse use of confidential information is increased by a waiver that imposes the substantial relationship test on concurrent conflicts, information learned in an unrelated representation is generally of limited value and the client is furthermore still protected by separate prohibitions on disclosure or adverse use of client information (Model Rules 1.6 and 1.8(b)).

Id.

Conclusions

Thus the modern view—held by the courts, the American Bar Association, local bar associations and the American Law Institute—is that advance waivers of conflicts of interest are permissible, within certain limits and subject to certain client protections. We conclude that the D.C. Rules are consistent with that view and that they permit advance waivers under Rules 1.7 and 1.9. See United Sewerage Agency, 646 F.2d at 1349-50. "Clients who are fully advised should be able to make choices of this kind if they wish to do so." Id. at 1350.

Such waivers, however, are permissible only if the prerequisites of the D.C. Rules—namely "full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation"—are satisfied. See D.C. Rule 1.7(c). As noted above, the client must have "information reasonably sufficient to permit the client to appreciate the significance of the matter in question," D.C. Rules, Terminology, ¶ [3], and to allow the client to make "a fully informed decision" with awareness "of the possible extra expense, inconvenience, and other disadvantages that may arise if an actual conflict of position should later arise and the lawyer be required to terminate the representation." D.C. Rule 1.7, comment [19]; see In re James, 452 A.2d at 167 (requiring "detailed explanation of the risks and disadvantages to the client"). Ordinarily this will require that either (1) the consent is specific as to types of potentially adverse representations and types of adverse clients (e.g., a bank client for whom the lawyer performs corporate work waives the lawyer's representation of borrowers in mortgage loan transactions with that bank) or (2) the waiving client has available in-house or other current counsel independent of the lawyer soliciting the waiver.

Further, the lawyer must make full disclosure of facts of which she is aware, and hence cannot seek a general waiver where she knows of a specific impending adversity unless that specific instance also is disclosed. See D.C. Rule 1.7, comment [19]; City of El Paso v. Salas-Porras, 6 F. Supp. 2d 616, 625-26 (W.D. Tex. 1998). A corollary of this rule is that if the lawyer cannot disclose the adversity to one client because of her duty to maintain the confidentiality of another party's information, the lawyer cannot seek a waiver and hence may not accept the second representation. D.C. Rule 1.7, comment [19] ("If a lawyer's obligation to one or another client or to others or some other consideration precludes making . . . full disclosure to all affected parties, that fact alone precludes undertaking the representation at issue").

A conflict arising from the lawyer's appearance on both sides of the same matter is, as noted above, nonwaivable. D.C. Rule 1.7(a) & comment [1]. Because of the greatly increased potential for misuse of client confidences—inadvertently or otherwise—advance waivers should exclude from their coverage not only the same matter but also any substantially related matter. See Painter, at 321. For this reason, advance waivers ordinarily will not come into play in former-client situations under Rule 1.9 because disqualification under that rule extends only to matters that are the same as, or substantially related to, the initial matter.

Further, although the D.C. Rules do not require that waivers be in writing, D.C. Rule 1.7, comment [20], we join the ABA Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility in recommending that—for the protection of lawyers as well as clients—advance waivers be written. See ABA Opinion at 173. We note in this connection that the ABA Ethics 2000 Commission has proposed that the Model Rules require all waivers to be written. Ethics 2000 Report, prop. Model Rule 1.7(b)(4) & prop. comment [20].

Finally, any decision to act on the basis of an advance waiver should be informed by the lawyer's reasoned judgment. For example, a prudent lawyer ordinarily will not rely upon an advance waiver where the adversity will involve allegations of fraud against the other client or is a litigation in which the existence or fundamental health of the other client is at stake.

In accordance with the foregoing, a client not independently represented by counsel (including in-house counsel) generally may waive conflicts of interest only where specific types of potentially adverse representations or specific types of adverse clients are identified in the waiver correspondence. A client that is independently represented by counsel generally may agree to waive such conflicts even where the specificity requirements set out in the preceding sentence are not satisfied.[10]

Appendix

Sample Advance Waiver of Conflicts of Interest

Below is a sample of text for an advance waiver of conflicts of interest. The committee does not view this text as authoritative or exclusive:

"As we have discussed, the firm represents many other companies and individ-

[10] Waivers permitting the adverse use or disclosure of confidential information, see D.C. Rule 1.6(c)-(d), may not be implied from waivers of conflicts of interest. Because of their considerable potential for mischief, waivers of confidentiality require particular scrutiny and may be invalid even when granted by sophisticated clients with counsel (in-house or outside) independent of the lawyer seeking the waiver. See Westinghouse Elec. Corp. v. Gulf Oil Corp., 588 F.2d 221, 229 (7th Cir. 1978) (expressing doubt as to the efficacy of "a vague, general" advance waiver of confidentiality); In re Boone, 83 F. 944 (prohibiting waiver of confidentiality requirement). But see ABA Formal Op. 99-415 (1999) (suggesting that a more flexible standard may apply where the waiving client is sophisticated or has in-house counsel); Brian J. Redding, The "Confidential Information" Conflict—Is it Time for the ABA to Rethink its Position on Waiver?, Prof. Law., Winter 1999, at 10 (same). As with conflicts of interest, see supra note 3, we view the waivers of condidentiality that commonly are found in joint and "intermediary" representation situations, see D.C. Rules 1.7, 2.2, as constituting current, rather than advance, waivers.

uals. It is possible that during the time we are representing you, some of our current or future clients will have disputes or transactions with you. [For example, although we are representing you on _____, we have or may have clients whom we represent in connection with _____.] You agree that we may continue to represent, or undertake in the future to represent, existing or new clients in any matter, including litigation, even if the interests of such other clients in such other matters are directly adverse to yours, so long as those matters are not substantially related to our work for you."

Inquiry No. 00-4-13
Adopted: September 20, 2001
Published: December 2001

Opinion No. 310

Propriety of Lawyer Charging Interest When the Client Fails to Pay Fees

- Opinion No. 11 re-examined and broadened; when a client fails without justification to make payments to a lawyer that are called for by their fee agreement, and that agreement does not provide for payment of interest on such amounts, the lawyer may, assuming there is no overreaching on the lawyer's part, request the client to alter the fee arrangement prospectively to include charges for interest on the unpaid balance and condition further representation to the client on agreement to that condition.

Applicable Rule

- Rule 1.5 (Fees)

Discussion

Fee arrangements between lawyers and clients are of course a matter of constant interest to both. There has been recent interest in fee arrangements that include not simply the designation of a fee for service but also conditions that give the lawyer rights vis-a-vis the client to assist the lawyer in inducing the client to pay—most particularly in the question of whether a lawyer may charge interest on an unpaid client balance, although other issues also arise—as lawyers and clients attempt to craft agreements that provide both for fair fee amounts and assurances of payment. Generally speaking there is wide agreement that a lawyer can charge a client interest on unpaid bills, although jurisdictions differ on whether such a charge can be imposed by the lawyer if not agreed to by the client at the outset of the representation. In Opinion No. 11 (1975), we decided that the former Code of Professional Responsibility allowed a lawyer to charge interest on an unpaid legal fee, but "only if clearly agreed to by the client, in advance of the representation or in advance of a new stage of the representation."

Because of current interest in the issue and because we have not examined it pursuant to the current Rules of Professional Conduct, we reconsider the issue.

1. Adversity in Fee Arrangements

Finding the appropriate standpoint from which to assess fee arrangements can be difficult. There is some tendency to discuss the issue in terms of the adversity between the lawyer and the client when the lawyer includes provisions in a fee agreement intended to induce the client to pay. See, e.g., Lustig v. Horn, 732 N.E. 2d 613 (Ill. App. 2000)(provision in fee agreement allowing lawyer to seek attorney's fees for any lawsuit against the client to recover fees rejected as "potentially violative of the Rules of Professional Conduct barring an attorney from representing a client if such representation may be limited by the attorney's own interests"). Indeed, this Committee appears to have considered a similar problem from that point of view in Opinion No. 211, one of a series on the subject of the appropriateness of provisions in fee agreements requiring arbitration of fee disputes.[1]

But at least some adversity must exist between client and lawyer in the creation of virtually any fee arrangement. At the most basic level, the client's natural interest is to prefer the fee to be smaller and the lawyer's, larger. Moreover, in carrying out a representation, a lawyer is often faced with the need to resolve at least technically conflicting interests—if the fee basis is payment by the hour, the lawyer (who has a financial incentive to do more work) will face the question of whether to perform work that appears to be at the margin of utility; if the fee is fixed (and in Opinion No. 238 we have recognized that fixed fees can serve to make legal services available to those who might not otherwise be able to afford them), there is a built-in incentive for the lawyer to pass up performing work that would take time but which promises to have relatively little benefit for the client. Therefore, it is not only not possible to erase all instances of adversity between client and lawyer in the fee process, but it must be recognized that the lawyer and client inescapably have adverse interests to at least some degree throughout the relationship.

In Rule 1.8 (particularly Rule 1.8(a)), the Rules do provide a framework for regulation of business relations between client and lawyer. However, to treat the relationship between client and lawyer in arriving at a fee arrangement as a legally adverse business relationship under Rule 1.8 would lead to results that the Rules do not seem designed to bring about. Under that Rule a client could not be asked to negotiate a fee arrangement with a lawyer unless the client could consult a different lawyer (Rule 1.8(a)(2)). Not only would such a result be radically unusual and disruptive, but, as the Association of the Bar of the City of New York has observed (ABCNY Formal Opinion 2000-3) this would also mean, logically, that a client could never retain a lawyer, because to arrive at a fee arrangement with one lawyer the client would have to retain another lawyer, which the client could not do without retaining a third lawyer, and so on. For these reasons, analysis of particular aspects of a fee arrangement to determine whether or not they raise issues of conflict of interest does not seem to be a fruitful approach.

Nor does it seem possible to draw a bright-line distinction by saying that wherever a fee arrangement contemplates the possibility that the lawyer will find it necessary to institute adversary proceedings against the client to seek to compel payment that a sufficient level of adversity had been reached where a conflict must be deemed to exist. Our Opinion 218, for example, approves a fee arrangement between lawyer and client providing for mandatory arbitration of fee disputes under the rules of the Attorney Client Arbitration Board. While such a proceeding can be hoped to be less antagonistic than litigation, it is distinctly adversarial nonetheless. Thus we have approved fee arrangements that contemplate adversary proceedings between lawyers and clients. Indeed, fee arrangements are in general intended to create legally enforceable obligations to pay (see §§ 17-18, Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers (2000)), and thus necessarily contemplate at least the possibility of a legal action to enforce them. It is difficult to see how there could be effective lawyer-client relationships without this.

[1] See Opinion Nos. 190, 211, and 218. It is not our purpose here to revisit or re-examine those issues in any degree.

2. Considerations Involved in Attorney-Client Fee Agreements

It cannot be forgotten, however, that a fee arrangement between a lawyer and client is not like a standard business arrangement. Clients tend to require lawyers at times of difficulty, and the client must feel free to impose a high level of trust in the lawyer and to have confidence in the relationship. In dealing with the client the lawyer should not take advantage of either the lawyer's superior knowledge and experience or the lawyer's freedom from the concern and distress that disturb the client. Moreover, the fact that it is unusual for a client to obtain independent legal advice when concluding a fee arrangement with a lawyer means that lawyers owe a particular duty to avoid overreaching in the fee-setting process.

At the same time, there are benefits to provision of assurances of payment of fees or compensation for late payment. First of all, as just suggested, it is binding contracts that make the provision of legal services possible in the first place. Second, it is the client's duty to pay fees to the lawyer that the lawyer appropriately earns under their fee arrangement. Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, § 17(1) (2000). The payment of fees the lawyer has earned is not a voluntary act on the part of the client, and the lawyer is entitled to insist on being paid in accord with the terms of the fee arrangement and to pursue reasonable steps to enforce payment from a recalcitrant client. Not just individual lawyers but the profession as a whole and the availability of legal services would suffer if that were not the case.

Third, the availability of fee arrangements with incentives for timely payment may well have a positive impact on the formation of lawyer-client relationships. Since a lawyer must somehow account for the additional cost—in time as well as money—of clients who do not pay or who delay payment in violation of the fee agreement, if the lawyer can focus the lawyer's additional costs of dealing with clients who do not pay or pay timely on those clients themselves, that allows the lawyer to avoid attempting to spread those additional costs among all of the lawyer's clients. This may help to avoid upward fee pressure on clients who do pay their fees, caused by clients who do not pay on time. Such an assurance may even make a lawyer willing to take on representation of a particular client who presents an unusual risk of delayed payment or non-payment where the lawyer would be unwilling otherwise.

3. Provisions of Rule 1.5

The District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct deal with fees in a fashion that allows taking full account of these considerations in individual cases. Rule 1.5 deals with the fee relationship between lawyer and client by requiring a lawyer's fee to be "reasonable." While it provides a list of factors that may be considered in that determination (including the time and labor, difficulty and skill required, the likelihood that acceptance of the assignment will preclude the lawyer from accepting other work, customary fees for such work, the amount at issue and the result obtained, time limits, nature and length of the client relationship, experience and reputation of the lawyer, and fixed or contingent nature of the fee) that list is non-exclusive.[2] As the comments indicate, the Rule covers not just the amount of a fee but fee arrangements generally, including method of payment and the impact of the agreement on the provision of the lawyer's services. See Comment [4] (discusses advance payment of fees and the "special scrutiny" necessary when fees are paid in property rather than money) and Comment [5] (cautions that "an agreement may not be made whose terms might induce the lawyer improperly to curtail services for the client or perform them in a way contrary to the client's interest").[3]

The reasonableness requirement is an objective standard. Because the term "reasonable" is well understood to be a broad one, the lawyer must consider not just the non-exclusive list of factors provided in Rule 1.5 (a)(1)-(8), but every possible issue that may bear upon the fairness and reasonableness of a fee arrangement. This balance is more wide-ranging than application of something like a standard that simply looks for adverse interests.[4] The lawyer must be aware that when the reasonableness of a fee is reviewed, such factors as the lawyer's experience and superiority of legal knowledge over the client will be taken into account, as well as the client's sophistication or lack thereof, need for legal services, and mental state of distraction or worse caused by the situation that has caused the client to seek legal advice. The wise lawyer will explain all aspects of a proposed fee relationship in detail in advance of obtaining the client's agreement. As we stated in Opinion No. 267, it is the lawyer's responsibility to make sure that the client understands the fee arrangement. It is also the lawyer who, if challenged, will have the burden of establishing the reasonableness of the [2] Subsection (b) requires the basis or rate of the fee to be in writing when the lawyer has not regularly represented the client; subsection (c) contains special requirements for contingent fees; subsection (d) bars the use of contingent fees in criminal cases; subsection (e) governs division of fees between lawyers in different firms; and subsection (f) provides that any fee prohibited "by law" or by subsection (d) is per se unreasonable.

[3] While there are provisions specifically regulating fee arrangements in other Rules, notably in Rules 1.8 and 1.15, these tend to be specific provisions dealing with particular and well-defined issues rather than the general requirements that are located only in Rule 1.5. A lawyer's treatment of fee advances is covered in Rule 1.15(d); whether a lawyer may take literary or media rights as part of a fee is covered by Rule 1.8(c); Rule 1.8(e) restricts the conditions under which a lawyer may accept fees from someone other than a client; and Rule 1.8(i) governs liens to secure payment of fees. We do not express an opinion on whether a fee arrangement as part of which the lawyer arguably "acquire[d] an ownership, possessory, security, or other pecuniary interest adverse to a client" within the meaning of Rule 1.8(a) would trigger that Rule's applicability as well. See Renouf v. Multicultural Broadcasting, 1994 WL 499060 (DDC 1994) (Oberdorfer, J.) at *2-3.

[4] This conclusion is consistent with Scope Comment [5] of the Rules, a rule of construction that cautions against importing additional general considerations into the operation of Rule provisions that deal with specific issues, as Rule 1.5 does with fee arrangements. Scope Comment [5] provides:

> [5] In interpreting these Rules, the specific shall control the general in the sense that any rule that specifically addresses conduct shall control the disposition of matters and the outcome of such matters shall not turn upon the application of a more general rule that arguably also applies to the conduct in question. In a number of instances, there are specific rules that address specific types of conduct. The rule of interpretation expressed here is meant to make it clear that the general rule does not supplant, amend, enlarge, or extend the specific rule. So, for instance, the general terms of Rule 1.3 are not intended to govern conflicts of interest, which are particularly discussed in Rules 1.7, 1.8, and 1.9. Thus, conduct that is proper under the specific conflicts rules is not improper under the more general rule of Rule 1.3. Except where the principle of priority state here is applicable, however, compliance with one rule does not generally excuse compliance with other rules. Accordingly, once a lawyer has analyzed the ethical considerations under a given rule, the lawyer must generally extend the analysis to ensure compliance with all other applicable rules.

fee agreement. In this connection, the importance of having a written arrangement cannot be overstressed. Of course Rule 1.5(b) requires that the lawyer provide to a client whom the lawyer has not regularly represented a written statement of the basis or rate of the fee at or shortly after the representation begins. A writing would also be highly advisable, if not compelled by Rule 1.5 (see the final sentence of Comment [1] to Rule 1.5), whenever an existing fee arrangement with a client is altered during a representation.

The decision in Lustig v. Horn, supra, well illustrates the difference between application of a reasonableness standard versus a standard that simply looks for elements of adversity. The court there held that a fee arrangement was improper that provided that in a lawsuit to collect the attorney's legal fees the lawyer could obtain attorney's fees and costs attributable to the collection action from the client. It found that the retainer agreement "anticipates suit against and recovery of additional fees from a client should that client fail to pay the bill within the time required" and that this gave rise "to substantial fees for vigorous prosecution of the attorney's own client", raising the concern on the client's part of "his attorney's retaliation for nonpayment of even unreasonable fees." The court concluded that the fee provision was "potentially violative of the Rules of Professional Conduct barring an attorney from representing a client if such representation may be limited by the attorney's own interests." Concluding that a lawyer "should not place himself in a position where he may be required to choose between conflicting duties or where he must reconcile conflicting interests rather than protect fully the rights of his client," the court held that the award of attorney's fees for the collection action under the agreement should be set aside.

While the court is correct that the fee arrangement there contemplated adverse action by the lawyer against the client to collect fees, it omitted to note that, as discussed above, any fee arrangement, given that it is a binding contract, contemplates such an action in the event of nonpayment. The proper question, we think, is whether these provisions were reasonable in the circumstances. It appears that they were, despite the adversity. First, a collection action by a lawyer against a client is a relatively remote contingency. In such an action the lawyer's entitlement to collect attorney's fees for the collection action itself would become an issue only if the lawyer had already prevailed on the merits against the client—i.e., if the lawyer first established that the client had violated the obligation to pay the lawyer. The lawyer could not prevail on that point without establishing that the fees had been reasonable. Since the client had known from the beginning that in the event the client was held liable to the lawyer for unpaid fees the cost of collection would be a part of the damages, it would not appear that there is anything per se unreasonable about such a condition in a fee agreement.

4. Assessing Provisions Aimed at Compensating the Attorney for the Client's Lateness in Paying or Failure to Pay

The most commonly discussed question in this general topic is the charging of interest on a client's unpaid bills. The result in our Opinion No. 11—that under the Code of Professional Responsibility a lawyer could charge interest on a client's unpaid bills as long as that possibility had been agreed to by the client "in advance of representation or in advance of a new stage of representation"—is consistent with the rule in many jurisdictions. See, e.g., ABA Formal Opinion 338 (1974); New York Opinion No 399 (1975); Connecticut Opinion No. 99-26; Missouri No. 960017; Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics § 9.2.2 at 506 (1986).

A logical question is whether it may be reasonable to go further and hold, as a number of jurisdictions do,[5] that the lawyer can in appropriate cases ethically seek interest on amounts owed even if there is no such provision in the fee agreement. This issue may be examined in the context of a hypothetical case in which a lawyer and a client agree upon a fee arrangement requiring the client to make payments to the lawyer as the lawyer's work progresses; assume that the arrangement does not mention any requirement that interest is due where the client fails to make payments otherwise required. Then the client simply fails to pay the lawyer in a timely fashion. If we assume that the lawyer is performing appropriately, this puts the client in breach of the agreement. Why, if the client has breached the agreement, should it be ethically inappropriate for the lawyer to charge for the time value of the money that the client has wrongfully failed to pay on time? When the question is put that starkly it is difficult to come up with a satisfactory answer.

However, we conclude that going from that abstraction to a practical standard that sufficiently protects the client is very difficult. There are too many possible compelling reasons that might drive a client to decline to pay fees for us to attempt to set out a guideline—and it would have been a relatively simple matter for the lawyer to have brought up the issue of interest for untimely payment before the representation has begun. The latter point is reinforced by the policy underlying the requirement for a written explanation of fees in Rule 1.5(b).[6] While that rule does not require the lawyer to anticipate every contingency that may arise, it does clearly express a preference for having the client be presented in writing, before incurring the obligation to pay a fee, a description of what will occur with respect to fees as far as reasonably possible.

Therefore, we conclude that we adhere to the view expressed in Opinion No. 11 that a client's unexcused failure to meet a fee obligation does not allow a lawyer to seek to collect interest on the unpaid portion of the debt unless that is specifically provided for in the existing fee arrangement. However, we also conclude that a client's unexcused failure to meet fee obligations to the lawyer can be a basis for the lawyer to re-examine the fee arrangement and, as a condition of performing further work, request the client to agree to an interest charge, prospectively only, for unpaid amounts that may be owing for work done by the lawyer in the future, after this change in the fee arrangement becomes effective (that is to say, we do not approve imposing interest charges on unpaid amounts for work done before the interest charge was agreed to). The lawyer can do this only if the severe standard for changing the fee arrangement during the representation can be met. A change in a fee arrangement in an ongoing representation is subject to strict scrutiny for overreaching by the lawyer, who, as we recognized in Opinion No. 11, may have "acquired [since the beginning of the representation] an unfair advantage in negotiations—as where the client's cause would be significantly impaired by the lawyer's withdrawal." See Chase v. Gilbert, 499 A. 2d 1203, 1209 (D.C. 1985) ("District of Columbia courts will scrutinize closely an attorney-client contract which is beneficial to the attorney and executed long after the attorney-client relationship has commenced"). What may constitute overreaching in particular circumstances is of course dependent on such factors as the resources and sophistication of the client, the presence or absence of such external factors as a favorable litigation schedule that would be lost if the client had to change counsel, and so on. But where the occasion for the change is the client's failure to comply with an obligation that the fee agreement reasonably placed on the client, the lawyer's request for a change in the fee arrangement is limited to imposition of an interest charge to be applicable prospectively should that situation occur in the future, and there are no other factors suggesting overreaching by the lawyer or advantage being taken of the client, we see no reason why the lawyer should not be able to seek such a change in the fee arrangement during the representation.[7]

[5] Such a view is consistent with that taken by the New York City Bar Association (Formal Opinion No. 2000-2), Georgia Opinion 45 (1985), Massachusetts Opinion 83-1 (1983), Rhode Island Opinion 98-06 (1998), and North Carolina 98-3 (1998). In Massachusetts and Georgia, while interest can be imposed even though that is not provided for in the original fee arrangement, the client must first be given an opportunity to pay without interest.

[6] Rule 1.5(b) requires a lawyer who has not regularly represented a client to provide the client, in writing, a statement of the basis or rate of the fee.

We find this course superior to the lawyer's simply seeking to impose an interest charge where none had been provided for because it provides the client unequivocal notice and an opportunity to fully ventilate whatever concerns the client may have had about the representation. An additional advantage is that at a point where the fee arrangement itself is being changed, such important matters as the rate of interest and when it becomes applicable may, and indeed must, be fixed with specificity. This result is consistent with, and arguably does not even work a change in, the rationale of Opinion No. 11, in which we noted:

> An agreement for the imposition of interest or a finance charge that is entered into during the course of representation, where there was no such agreement at the outset, would be improper if, by reason of his representation the lawyer had acquired an unfair advantage in negotiations—as where the client's cause would be significantly impaired by the lawyer's withdrawal.

(emphasis added) As we interpret the Rules of Professional Conduct, the taking advantage of the client that Opinion No. 11 cautions the lawyer against would in our view bar a lawyer from seeking to change the fee arrangement even if the client had failed to pay under the existing arrangement.[8]

Opinion No. 311

Choice-of-Law Rules for Professional Conduct in Non-Judicial Proceedings

- When a District of Columbia attorney acts in a non-judicial proceeding outside of the District of Columbia, the rules of professional conduct governing the attorney's actions are determined by reference to D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(2). If the attorney is licensed only in the District of Columbia, the rules of professional conduct of this jurisdiction will apply. If the attorney is licensed both in the District of Columbia and in another jurisdiction, the rules of the jurisdiction where the attorney has his principal place of practice will apply unless factors relevant to the conduct in question clearly establish that the attorney's conduct has a predominant effect in the other jurisdiction—in which case the rules of that jurisdiction will apply. When a District of Columbia attorney serves as co-counsel on a matter with an attorney licensed in another jurisdiction, the District of Columbia attorney need only conform his conduct to the rules applicable under the choice-of-law provisions of Rule 8.5(b)(2) and the restrictions of Rule 8.4(a).

Applicable Rules

- Rule 8.5(b) (Choice-of-law)
- Rule 8.4(a) (Misconduct)

Inquiry

The Committee has been asked which rules of professional conduct apply to a member of the District of Columbia Bar participating in a non-judicial proceeding outside the District of Columbia. Consider, for example, an attorney who represents a party to a mediation occurring in State X where the State X version of ABA Model Rule 4.2—the rule relating to contacts with a represented party—varies substantially from the District of Columbia version of Rule 4.2. In such a situation—where the mediation is not in connection with a proceeding pending before a court in State X—will the attorney be subject to discipline in the District of Columbia for failing to comply with the requirements of State X's rules if they are more limiting than the District of Columbia's rules? Conversely, will the attorney be subject to discipline for actions that comply with the more lenient requirements of a State X rule but violate a more restrictive District of Columbia rule? Finally, what are the obligations of a District of Columbia attorney who acts as co-counsel in a non-judicial proceeding with an attorney licensed only in State X if a situation arises in which the two attorneys are subject to differing professional conduct requirements?

Discussion

District of Columbia Rule of Professional Conduct 8.5(b) [hereinafter "D.C. Rule"] addresses choice-of-law questions involving the application of the rules of professional conduct to the actions of an attorney both when the conduct relates to a matter that is pending before a court and "for any other conduct."

As a general matter, D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(1) provides that for conduct in connection with a proceeding before a court in which the attorney has been admitted to practice, the District of Columbia will apply the rules of professional conduct of that apply in that court (typically, those of the jurisdiction where the court sits), unless those rules provide otherwise. Thus, whenever an attorney's conduct relates to a proceeding before the courts of a jurisdiction outside the District of Columbia (a jurisdiction which, for convenience, we will call State X), the District will apply the rules of professional conduct adopted by State X to District of Columbia lawyers who appear in connection with the proceeding. E.g. In re: Gonzalez, 773 A.2d 1026 (D.C. 2001) (subjecting District of Columbia attorney to discipline and applying Virginia rules to his conduct with respect to matter before Virginia court); cf. Md. State Bar Ass'n, Comm. on Ethics Op. 86-28 (1986) (Maryland lawyer appearing in litigation in District of Columbia may follow District's less restrictive rule in responding to client fraud on the court). This choice-of-law provision is applicable whether an attorney is admitted to practice in State X's jurisdiction generally or has been specially admitted for the purpose of appearing in a single proceeding. When an attorney appears before a federal court the applicable rules of professional conduct will be those governing the bar of that court.

[7] West Virginia (Opinion No. 93-02) refuses to allow a lawyer to charge interest on an unpaid balance where there was no provision for such a charge in the original fee agreement, finding that such a charge might "confuse" the client and "carry with it the threat that the attorney might withdraw." We think that the client is unlikely to be confused where the occasion for the lawyer's request to change the fee arrangement is the client's failure to pay.

[8] Cf. Rule 1.16(b)(3), which authorizes a lawyer to withdraw from a representation upon the failure of the client "substantially to fulfill an obligation to the lawyer [if the client] has been given reasonable warning that the lawyer will withdraw unless the obligation is fulfilled...."

When the conduct in question does not involve a judicial proceeding in State X—as in, for example, an arbitration, a mediation, an administrative proceeding, a governmental investigation, or a commercial negotiation[1]—the choice-of-law rules of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct provide:

> (i) If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this jurisdiction, and
>
> (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(2)[2]

Rule 8.5(b)(2)(i)—Choice-of-Law for Lawyers Licensed Only in the District of Columbia

D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(2)(i) provides that, in the context of non-judicial proceedings, if an attorney is licensed to practice only in the District of Columbia, the District of Columbia rules of professional conduct, not the rules of the jurisdiction where the non-judicial proceeding occurred will govern that attorney's conduct. This choice-of-law provision stems from the recognition that the authority to discipline a lawyer arises from his admission to practice in a territorial jurisdiction —either generally, or for a particular matter. E.g., In re: Wade, 526 A.2d 936 (D.C. 1987) (lawyer subject to discipline in District of Columbia for conduct outside of the jurisdiction because he maintains active membership in District of Columbia bar); Rule 6 Commentary, Model Rules for Lawyer Disciplinary Enforcement (ABA 1996) ("Admission to practice triggers the jurisdiction of the disciplinary authority."). Hence, an attorney licensed only in the District of Columbia will not be subject to discipline here for conduct relating to non-judicial proceedings elsewhere, so long as his conduct conforms to the District's rules of professional conduct.[3]

Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii)—Choice-of-Law for Lawyers Licensed Both in the District of Columbia and Elsewhere

A more analytically difficult question arises under D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) when the attorney is authorized to practice both in the District of Columbia and in State X where the non-judicial proceeding is occurring (or, indeed, in yet a third jurisdiction, State A). In such a situation the District of Columbia choice-of-law provisions first require that the disciplinary authority determine the jurisdiction where the attorney is licensed and principally practices. The rules adopted by the jurisdiction of that "principal place of practice" will generally govern an attorney's conduct. Our choice-of-law provisions recognize, however, one exception to this general rule—the "predominant effects" exception. This exception is invoked when an attorney's conduct "clearly has its predominant effect" in State X (if State X is also a jurisdiction where the attorney is licensed to practice), even if State X is not the jurisdiction in which the attorney principally practices. When such a "predominant effect" is clearly established, the professional conduct rules of State X will apply.

Resolving individual fact scenarios in which these choice-of-law questions arise requires balancing two competing principles. On one hand, regulation of the bar historically has been, and remains, a function of the judiciary of each state. See Middlesex County Ethics Comm. v. Garden State Bar Ass'n, 457 U.S. 423, 432-35 (1982). Each jurisdiction's regulation of the conduct of attorneys licensed by the state involves, therefore, a matter of significant governmental concern. See ABA Formal Op. 91-360 (July 11, 1991), reprinted in ABA Formal and Informal Ethics Opinions, 1983-1998, at 72, 75 (2000). Because each state has an "extremely important interest in maintaining and assuring the professional conduct of the attorneys it licenses," Middlesex County, 457 U.S. at 424, resolution of choice-of-law questions must be undertaken with due regard for the differing values expressed in conflicting rules of professional conduct adopted by two (or more) separate judicial bodies.

On the other hand, we must be mindful of the intent of those who drafted Rule 8.5(b).[4] The choice-of-law provisions were drafted to "minimiz[e] conflicts between rules, as well as uncertainty about which rules are applicable." D.C. Rule 8.5, comment [3]; see also A Legislative History: The Development of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, 1982-1998, at 345 (ABA 1999) (Rule 8.5(b) was added to "bring some measure of certainty and clarity" to choice-of-law issues). Rule 8.5(b) is, therefore, intended to ensure that "any particular conduct of an attorney [is] subject to only one set of rules of professional conduct," and that the "determination of which set of rules applies to particular conduct is as straightforward as possible." D.C. Rule 8.5, comment [3] (emphasis supplied).

This need for clarity and certainty is particularly acute "in the District of Columbia, whose Bar members frequent-

[1] When an arbitration or mediation occurs in connection with ongoing litigation or at the order of a court, then the choice-of-law rules applicable to "conduct in connection with a proceeding in court" under D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(1) may control. The choice-of-law rules addressed in this opinion are limited, therefore, those to be applied to non-judicial proceedings that do not occur in connection with a proceeding in a court.

[2] The choice-of-law questions addressed in this opinion also apply to government attorneys who are members of the District of Columbia Bar, yet frequently appear on behalf of the United States in non-judicial proceedings outside of the District. The choice-of-law principles enunciated in this opinion apply equally to government attorneys. Those who are members only of the District of Columbia Bar will, in reference to their conduct in non-judicial matters outside of the District, be subject only to the District's rules of professional conduct. Those who are members of both this Bar and another will have their conduct evaluated based upon the rules of the jurisdiction that is their principal place of practice (which may often be the District of Columbia) unless the conduct in question has a predominant effect in another jurisdiction where they are also licensed to practice law.

[3] The attorney should, nonetheless, exercise caution when acting in, or in respect of, another jurisdiction where differing rules exist, even though not licensed to practice there. Some activity in State X may be deemed by State X to be the unauthorized practice of law. In addition, the Committee offers no opinion as to the possibility that another jurisdiction may seek to apply its own rules to the attorney's conduct based upon its own choice-of-law and disciplinary authority rules. Some states assert disciplinary authority over lawyers acting within the state even though neither licensed in that jurisdiction nor appearing before courts of that jurisdiction. E.g. Md. R. Prof. Conduct Rule 8.5(b); see also D.C. Ethics Op. 167 (1986) (cautioning that extra-territorial representation may subject attorney to jurisdiction of foreign locale). Many states have choice-of-law provisions different from those of the District of Columbia, and application of those rules may produce results inconsistent with those arising from the District's choice-of-law rules.

[4] D.C. Rule 8.5, adopted in November 1996, is identical to ABA Model Rule 8.5, which was adopted by the ABA in August 1993.

ly practice in other jurisdictions and are admitted in more than one jurisdiction." Report to the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia Bar: Proposed Amendments to the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, at 65 (F. Whitten Peters, Chair) (1993) [hereinafter "Peters Committee Report"]. In short, "for any choice of law system to be effective in guiding members of the Bar, it is essential that [it] be as uniform as possible." Id.; see also ABA, Report of the Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility (1993) ("The basic thesis of the proposal [to revise Rule 8.5] is that what it achieves in certainty and simplicity is worth much more than whatever regulatory interest it sacrifices."), reprinted in Peters Committee Report at 69.[5]

Given the intent of D.C. Rule 8.5(b) to foster both clarity and regularity in the choice of conflicting rules, the proper interpretation of that Rule should rely, to the maximum extent practical, on bright line determinations that will bring certainty to the interpretation of Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) and provide guidance to the members of the Bar. Cf. Ross v. Creighton Univ., 740 F. Supp. 1319, 1330 (N.D. Ill. 1990) ("Rules serve little purpose if they are not reasonably predictable and if they do not apply across the board, for one cannot conform behavior to the unknowable."); Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 5, comment h (2000) (characterizing Model Rule 8.5(b) as intended to "provide [for] more rigid, per se rules" relating to choice-of-law issues and distinguishing it from the more contextual "significant effects" test adopted by the Restatement). Put another way, "[r]ule 8.5(b) attempts to set out choice-of-law rules conforming in some respects to those in [the Restatement], but as per se and unexcepted rules rather than presumptions." Restatement (Third) § 5, Reporter's Note to Comment h (citing Roach, "The Virtues of Clarity: The ABA's New Choice-of-Law Rule for Legal Ethics," 36 So. Tex. L. Rev. 907 (1995)).

To be sure, bright line rules cannot identify the appropriate resolution of choice-of-law questions for each and every situation, which must, in the end, be resolved on a case-by-case basis. Nonetheless, the following factors should, to the maximum extent possible, be used to determine the ultimate resolution of the choice-of-law question.

Principal Place of Practice—Under D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) the initial inquiry is the identification of the principal place of practice of a lawyer. We are aware of no commentary or case law that addresses the question of how this identification may be accomplished. We believe that the rule envisions a common-sense understanding of the phrase "principal place of practice" that encompasses the following components:

First, the phrase "principal place of practice" refers to the place of practice of the individual attorney whose conduct is at issue, not to the principal place of practice of his or her law firm. Typically, it is the individual lawyer's conduct that is at issue; any sanctions to be considered by the disciplinary authority generally will run against an individual attorney, not the firm. Moreover, it would be administratively unworkable (and in some cases virtually impossible, given the multi-jurisdictional nature of many major firms and the difficulty in some instances of identifying a firm's "principal" office[6]) to oblige individual attorneys to conform their conduct to the ethical rules of the jurisdiction where the principal office of the firm exists. This is especially true given that lawyers affiliated with a firm often will not be licensed to practice law in the jurisdiction of the firm's principal office. Hence, we do not believe that Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) requires attorneys to look to the rules of professional conduct of a jurisdiction where they do not practice simply because they have affiliated with the branch office of a law firm whose principal office is outside the District of Columbia.

Rather, an individual attorney's principal place of practice is presumptively to be determined by identifying the physical location of the office from or at which the attorney conducts the largest portion of his practice. Cf. Pa. Bar Ass'n Comm. on Legal Ethics and Professional Responsibility, Op. 96-147 (1997) (South Carolina Rules of Professional Conduct govern conduct, in South Carolina, of Pennsylvania lawyer also admitted in South Carolina, "where he currently resides and practices").[7] In those rare instances where the initial inquiry yields ambiguous results—as where an attorney splits his time almost equally between an office in the District of Columbia and an office in State X—then the disciplinary authority should look, secondarily, to the jurisdiction where the attorney resides (if the attorney resides in a jurisdiction where he is licensed) to determine his principal place of practice.[8]

Once the principal place of practice of an attorney is determined, the rules of that jurisdiction should be applied to evaluate the attorney's conduct in non-judicial settings, unless the "predominant effect" exception requires application of the rules of a different jurisdiction.[9]

The Predominant Effect Exception—On rare occasions the "predominant effect" exception may lead the disciplinary authority to apply the rules of professional conduct of State X, where the conduct occurred and where the attorney is also licensed, even though the attorney whose conduct is under examination has a principal place of practice in the District of Columbia (or another jurisdiction, State A). We anticipate, however, that this exception will be invoked only in those infrequent situations where the [5] Consequently, though different jurisdictions may retain independent disciplinary authority over the conduct of an individual attorney licensed in more than one jurisdiction, the District of Columbia rules seek to "take all appropriate steps to [ensure] that [differing jurisdictions] apply the same rule to the same conduct, and in all events [to] avoid proceeding against a lawyer on the basis of two inconsistent rules." D.C. Rule 8.5, comment [5].

---

[6] For example, is a firm founded in Texas, and practicing as a Texas limited liability corporation, yet with its single largest office in the District of Columbia, a Texas or a District of Columbia firm?

[7] In this era of multi-jurisdictional practice, multiple offices, and attorneys who telecommute to their offices from distant locations or their homes, even the relatively straightforward question of where an attorney's office is located may, in some instances, be difficult to determine. We anticipate, however, that the disciplinary authority will look to extrinsic indicia of an attorney's principal physical location: Where is his mail received? What address is listed on his letterhead, professional listing, and business cards? Which office is registered with the relevant federal, state, and local regulatory (e.g. license and taxation) authorities as his business location? While assuredly the resolution of these factual questions will not always be free from doubt, the Committee anticipates that uncertain cases will be exceedingly infrequent.

[8] It is theoretically possible that an attorney splits his time exactly equally between two principal offices in different jurisdictions and that he resides in neither jurisdiction. There may, therefore, be rare instances in which it may be impossible to unambiguously determine a "principal place of practice." In that event the predominant effects test will guide the choice of the applicable rules of professional conduct.

[9] As should be evident, this analysis also applies if the attorney's principal place of practice is in State A, a state that is neither the District of Columbia (where the attorney is licensed), nor State X (where the conduct occurred), and the attorney is a member of the Bar of State A. If the attorney whose conduct in State X is in question has a principal place of practice in a third jurisdiction, State A, where he is also licensed, the District of Columbia will apply the rules of professional conduct of State A unless the predominant effects exception requires otherwise.

interests of the other jurisdiction are manifestly greater than those of the District of Columbia or State A where the principal place of practice is located. Cf. Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 5, comment h (2000) (predominant effects test is a "rigid" and "per se" test); id. § 5, Reporter's Note to comment h (predominant effects test involves "per se" rules more restrictive than "presumptions").[10]

Thus, the Commentary to Rule 8.5 advises that the predominant effect exception to Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii) is "a narrow one." D.C. Rule 8.5, comment [4]. And the Rule's requirement that a lawyer's conduct "clearly" have a predominant effect in another jurisdiction strongly suggests that the facts establishing such a predominant effect must be more than speculative or uncertain; rather they must be concrete and clearly established.

It is beyond the ability of the Committee to offer a comprehensive list of factors that will or will not suffice to invoke the "predominant effects" exception. Indeed, as the exception is intended to provide for the treatment of unusual and unique cases that ought not to be resolved by the application of the "principal place of practice" test, it is inconsistent with the purpose of the exception to suggest a rigid definition of what constitutes a "predominant effect." Rather, invocation of the exception will be guided by the Rule's intent to apply the exception narrowly, yet render it useful in those rare circumstances where it is appropriate. Thus, for example, the exception > would be appropriately applied . . . to a situation in which a lawyer admitted in and principally practicing in, State A, but also admitted in State B, handled an acquisition by a company whose headquarters and operations were in State B of another, similar such company. The exception would not appropriately be applied, on the other hand, if the lawyer handled an acquisition by a company whose headquarters and operations were in State A of a company whose headquarters and main operations were in State A, but which also had some operations in State B.

D.C. Rule 8.5, comment [4].[11] In short, the predominant effect exception properly will be invoked in the narrow set of cases where the factors relevant to the particular conduct in question clearly establish that State X manifestly has a substantially greater interest in the resolution of the question to that of the principal place of practice.[12]

Action by Attorneys Involved in Joint Representation—One additional issue needs to be addressed—the situation in which an attorney who is a member of the District of Columbia bar and whose conduct would, under the foregoing analysis, be subject to District of Columbia rules, is jointly representing a client with another attorney who is subject to a different jurisdiction's authority. A District of Columbia attorney acting in State X will often act in coordination with an attorney licensed to practice only in State X—either a lawyer who is local co-counsel from a different law firm or a lawyer who is associated in a single firm with the District of Columbia lawyer but has a principal place of practice in State X.[13]

What, if any, are the obligations and responsibility of the District of Columbia lawyer faced with this "dual jurisdiction/dual professional obligation" situation? Put another way, we assume that for at least one of the attorneys certain conduct may comply with the rules of professional conduct that govern his actions, while for the other the same conduct does not. May the restricted attorney engage in a representation of a client with an unrestricted attorney who may act in a situation where the restricted attorney's own actions would be impermissible?[14]

In our judgment D.C. Rule 8.5 is best interpreted to require that the District of Columbia attorney faced with a dual jurisdiction/dual professional obligation situation act so that his own personal conduct is consistent with the rules of professional conduct applicable to him under the choice-of-law principles outlined above. In other words, a District of Columbia attorney does not violate the rules of professional conduct if his co-counsel engages in conduct that is permissible for that co-counsel under the rules of professional conduct applicable to that co-counsel, even if the District of Columbia attorney could not undertake the conduct in question. And, conversely, if the District of Columbia attorney acts in a manner permitted him under our choice-of-law principles, that act is not rendered impermissible simply because his co-counsel would not be permitted to engage in the conduct by virtue of the rules of professional conduct applicable to the co-counsel.[15]

---

[10] The analysis reflected in this section will also apply in the converse situation, involving an attorney subject to discipline in the District of Columbia by virtue of his license from this jurisdiction whose principal place of practice is in State X. The ethical rules of State X will apply to the attorney's conduct in non-judicial proceedings unless the District of Columbia disciplinary authority determines that the predominant effect of the attorney's conduct lies in another jurisdiction where the attorney is also licensed (whether the District of Columbia or State A).

[11] D.C. Ethics Op. 264 identified a number of variables that might factor into a choice-of-law decision. Opinion 264 was issued, however, prior to the District's adoption of the current version of Rule 8.5.

[12] Without addressing any concerns that these situations may raise relating to the unauthorized practice of law, for completeness sake, we note three unlikely scenarios: 1) In the unusual case that an attorney's principal place of practice is in a state, State A, that is not a jurisdiction where the attorney is licensed, the District of Columbia disciplinary authority will apply the professional conduct rules of the jurisdiction, State X, where the conduct in question occurred, if the attorney is licensed in State X; 2) In the even more unlikely circumstance that the attorney has a principal place of practice in State A (where he is not licensed), engages in conduct in State X (where he is also not licensed), and the disciplinary authority must choose between the rules of either the District of Columbia or the attorney's second state of licensure, State M, the disciplinary authority should apply the rules of the jurisdiction of licensure that has the predominant contact with the conduct in question (by virtue, for example, of the residence of one of the clients); and 3) If neither jurisdiction of licensure has any contact with the conduct in question and if both the conduct and the principal place of practice lie in jurisdictions where the attorney is not licensed—the disciplinary authority should presumptively apply the more limiting of the competing rules of the two states of licensure (the District of Columbia and State M), as the case may be.

[13] The analysis in this section is equally applicable if co-counsel is licensed to practice in a third jurisdiction, State A.

[14] D.C. Rules 5.1(c) (1) and 8.4(a) do not cover this situation, as they address only the issue of an attorney's responsibility for the unethical acts of another attorney. Here the underlying action by the unrestricted attorney is, for that attorney, conduct in compliance with his jurisdiction's rules. The question here is the more nuanced one of when (if ever) the attorney with greater restrictions on his professional conduct may continue to participate in a matter when the unrestricted attorney has acted in a manner permissible for him, yet in a manner that the restricted attorney could not have.

[15] We recognize that this interpretation raises the specter that a District of Columbia attorney may be chosen to perform acts in State X in order to evade the ethical restrictions that might apply to his State X colleague who is subject to that jurisdiction's rules. Conversely, the State X attorney may be called upon to perform acts that would be prohibited to the District of Columbia attorney under the choice-of-law analysis set forth above. We doubt that such deliberate evasion of professional conduct limitations is commonplace and note that the District attorney is expressly prohibited from such willful action. See D.C. Rule 8.4(a) ("It is professional misconduct for a lawyer to . . . violate or attempt to violate the rules of professional conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so,

The structure and language of the rules of professional conduct support this interpretation of Rule 8.5(b). A contrary interpretation (one, for example, holding that an attorney licensed only in the District of Columbia could not act in a manner that was permissible for him because the action was impermissible for his co-counsel) would, in many circumstances, create a result directly contrary to the mandatory language of D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(2)(i): "If the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of this jurisdiction." Id. (emphasis supplied). An interpretation that imputed to a District of Columbia attorney, licensed only in this jurisdiction, the rules of professional conduct of another jurisdiction applicable to his co-counsel would contravene the express directive of Rule 8.5 that the District of Columbia attorney be governed only by the rules of this jurisdiction.

This construction of Rule 8.5 is also more generally consistent with the structure of the rules of professional conduct. Where the drafters wished to require an individual attorney to act on the basis of or in respect of the professional obligations of another attorney they made that requirement express. Thus, for example, the rules provide that a disqualifying conflict of interest for one attorney is imputed to all members of his law firm. See D.C. Rule 1.10(a). And they provide special rules governing conflicts arising from prior government service of an attorney and their effect on members of his law firm. See D.C. Rule 1.11. By contrast, there is no general mandate requiring every attorney to comport his conduct with the professional conduct rules applicable to all of his colleagues within a law firm, much less with the rules applicable to unaffiliated co-counsel in a particular matter. It would be unwarranted to read such an obligation into the rules based on the choice-of-law provisions of D.C. Rule 8.5(b).

Finally, our understanding of Rule 8.5(b) is consistent with the assumptions that, at least implicitly, underlie the resolution of other professional conduct issues. For example, the ABA Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility recently considered whether American lawyers may form partnerships with foreign lawyers. See ABA Formal Op. 01-423 (Sept. 22, 2001); see also D.C. Ethics Op. 278 (1998) (approving partnerships with foreign lawyers). In approving such partnerships the ABA Committee noted that the "law and ethical standards applicable to the legal profession in foreign countries will differ from some of the law and ethical standards that apply to U.S. lawyers." Formal Op. 01-423 at 8; see also D.C. Ethics. Op. 278 (same). Rather than concluding that the U.S. lawyers might be bound by the variant professional conduct standards applicable to their foreign partners, the ABA Committee counseled that the resolution to the problem posed by the differing standards lies in an explanation of the differing standards to any client potentially affected by them so that the client can make an informed decision on the matter. See Formal Op. 01-423 at 8; cf. D.C. Ethics Op. 278 (D.C. attorney "must ensure that the proposed association [with foreign attorney] does not in any way impair or frustrate his ability to meet his ethical obligations"). Thus, the ABA Committee recognized, without deciding (see Formal Op. 01-423 at 9 n.21), that the choice-of-law provisions of the rules do not necessarily require U.S. lawyers to adhere to the professional conduct standards of their foreign colleagues.

In light of these considerations, we believe that under D.C. Rule 8.5(b) the rules of professional conduct applicable to a District of Columbia attorney are not imputed to his co-counsel who may be subject to differing rules. The converse also holds—subject to the strictures of D.C. Rule 8.4(a), a District of Columbia attorney is not by virtue of the relationship made subject to the rules of professional conduct applying to his State X co-counsel and need follow only the rules of professional conduct dictated by the principal place of practice and predominant effects choice-of-law considerations outlined above.

Inquiry No. 01-09-20
Adopted: January 15, 2002
Published: May 2002

or do so through the acts of another.") (emphasis supplied).

The Committee is also cognizant of the possibility that a client may attempt to secure advantage and evade the applicable ethical restrictions by retaining counsel unencumbered by certain locally applicable ethical rules. In the absence of empirical evidence that large numbers of clients are making such strategic choices we discount that possibility, believing that far more salient factors (such as quality of representation, price, experience, and reputation) will much more significantly influence the choice of counsel. In our view the choice-of-law questions posed in this opinion are far more likely to be disclosed by the course of events well after the choice of counsel has been made than to be the motivating force for that choice.

Opinion No. 312

Information That May Be Appropriately Provided to Check Conflicts When a Lawyer Seeks to Join a New Firm

- When a lawyer contemplates moving to a new firm, it is necessary to determine whether prior work done by the lawyer on client matters may create a conflict of interest for the new firm. To check whether such conflicts exist, only information that does not constitute "confidences" or "secrets" may be revealed without client consent. However in most cases sufficient information can be disclosed to permit a conflicts check.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification)

Background

In Opinion No. 273, we discussed a number of issues raised by the movement of lawyers from one firm to another. One such issue was the need to check for possible conflicts of interest between current and former clients of the lawyer's existing firm and those of the new firm. This opinion expands on Opinion No. 273 by seeking to address possible confusion or uncertainty among lawyers who are proposing to move to a new firm about the extent to which they can reveal information to their prospective new firms for the purpose of undertaking such conflict checks.[1]

Discussion

To understand what information a lawyer may appropriately reveal in checking conflicts with a new firm, a brief review of the standards that apply in those circumstances should be helpful. D.C. Rule 1.10(b) provides specific guidance on what creates a conflict of interest with respect to client relationships on which the moving lawyer is no longer participating when the lawyer joins the new firm.[2] That Rule provides that

[1] Where a lawyer joining a firm is concerned about conflicts that may have been caused by work done before becoming a lawyer, as a law clerk, summer associate, paralegal assistant, or other non-lawyer assistant, Rule 1.10(b) does not require disqualification of the firm which the lawyer is joining in any event, but other considerations apply. See Opinion No. 227.

[2] Rule 1.10(b), extending to situations where a

where a lawyer joins a firm, that firm may not represent a client in any matter that is the same as or substantially related to a matter on which the lawyer formerly worked for a client adverse to the present firm's client, but only where the moving lawyer "has in fact acquired information protected by Rule 1.6 that is material to the matter."

In several ways, this is a narrower test than the former-client substantial relationship test as imposed by the combination of Rule 1.9 and Rule 1.10(a) in the case of a lawyer who is not changing firms. First, under Rule 1.9, the receipt of confidential information in the earlier representation is presumed if the later matter for a different client is "substantially related." Where such a presumption is made, a lawyer will generally not be heard to assert that the lawyer did not actually receive such information.[3] By contrast, Rule 1.10(b) turns on whether a lawyer actually received confidential information in the earlier representation that is material to the current matter.

Second, under Rule 1.10(b) a moving lawyer's former clients for conflict-checking purposes do not include every client in the former firm but only those clients on whose matters the lawyer actually worked. Comment [19] states in part: "Thus, not all of the clients of the [lawyer's] former firm . . . are necessarily deemed former clients of [the moving lawyer]. Only those clients with whom the [moving lawyer] in fact personally had a lawyer-client relationship are former clients within the terms of [Rule 1.10(b)]."[4] Therefore, when a lawyer is in firm A the provisions of Rule 1.10(a) impute to that lawyer any disqualification of any lawyer in the firm under the conflict of interest rules (specifically 1.7, 1.8(b), 1.9, or 2.2), whether or not the lawyer is involved with the conflict-causing representation. But when that lawyer moves to firm B the only conflicts that the lawyer carries along from firm A are those caused by client representations in which the lawyer actually participated. Conflicts that applied to the lawyer while in firm A only because of the imputation required by Rule 1.10(a) do not apply when the lawyer is moving to another firm.

Third, as noted in Opinion 273, in order to trigger disqualification of the new firm under Rule 1.10(b), it is not sufficient for the moving lawyer simply to have participated in the representation of the client at the former firm. Rather, disqualification is appropriate only where that lawyer has "acquired information protected by Rule 1.6 that is material to the matter." Therefore, as Opinion No. 273 says, this provision "leaves open the possibility that a lawyer, such as an associate who had only a peripheral involvement in a matter (as by preparing a research memorandum on a point of law), would not subject his new firm to disqualification under Rule 1.10(b) because that lawyer did not learn any client confidences in the course of the representation."[5]

This narrower scope of Rule 1.10(b) reflects the policy favoring attorney mobility; the concern was that the broader test of Rules 1.9 and 1.10(a), if applied in the context of lawyers changing firms, would result in a "radical curtailment of the opportunity of lawyers to move from one practice setting to another and of the opportunity of clients to change counsel." Comment [10] to Rule 1.10.

Typically, when a lawyer contemplates joining a new firm, the lawyer provides information to that firm indicating the clients, adversaries, and an indication of the subject matter on which the lawyer has worked at the lawyer's existing firm so that the potential new firm may check to see whether the lawyer's joining it would create a conflict of interest with any of that firm's clients.[6] What can a lawyer contemplating such a move firm reveal to that firm in providing that information? Rule 1.6 governs the answer to this question. Subsections (a) and (f) require lawyers not to reveal "confidences" and "secrets" of a client or former client. (Of course under Rule 1.6(d)(1) a client may consent to disclosure of a confidence or secret, but we will assume here that no such consent has been obtained.) Rule 1.6(b) defines "confidence" as "information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law"—a reminder that the scope of the privilege is a matter of substantive law and not an appropriate subject for an opinion of this Committee. We will assume that the privilege covers communications made in confidence by the client to the lawyer for the purpose of obtaining legal advice and communications from the lawyer to the client that might reflect the substance of those client-lawyer confidential communications. See Evans v. Atwood, 177 F.R.D. 1 (D.D.C. 1997).

Rule 1.6(b) then defines "secret" as "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would likely be detrimental, to the client." A "secret" may be information gained from another source than the client and may be shared by others without losing its status as a secret. Comment [6] to Rule 1.6; see our Opinions No. 83 and 246. As Comment [6] to Rule 1.6 states, the requirement to protect secrets "reflects not only the principles underlying the attorney-client privilege, but the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the client."

Thus the critical point in identifying secrets is not whether the information came from the client or who else knows it, but whether it was "gained from the professional relationship" and (1) the client has asked that it be held inviolate or (2) revelation of it would be embarrassing or likely detrimental to the client.[7] An illustration of the limitation lawyer "had previously represented a client," covers both instances where the client matter has ended at the lawyer's former firm (or other employment) and where the matter may be continuing but the moving lawyer is no longer working on that matter.

[3] See T.C. Theatre Corp. v. Warner Brothers Pictures, 113 F. Supp. 265 (S.D.N.Y. 1953). T.C. Theatre is cited in comment [2] to Rule 1.9. Cf. Brown v. District of Columbia Board of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37 (DC 1984)(en banc) (applying the "substantially related" test under the former Code of Professional Responsibility in the context of determining disqualification of a former government employee).

[4] The phrase "personally had a lawyer-client relationship" covers any situation in which the lawyer actually worked on a client matter, regardless of whether the lawyer had a "personal" relationship with the client.

[5] Actually, this portion of Opinion No. 273 may be subject to misinterpretation if it is read to suggest that the only information protected under Rule 1.6 is client "confidences"—information protected by the attorney-client privilege. Rule 1.6 also requires the lawyer to keep "secrets" confidential, secrets being defined as "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would likely be detrimental, to the client." It is, of course, extremely important for lawyers to be scrupulous in determining whether they may have such information.

[6] It is not possible to generalize about how this process does or should occur. Typically, by comparison to the moving lawyer, the firm has more clients and a system, often computerized, for checking conflicts (cf. the final sentence of Comment [11], Rule 1.7) so it makes sense for the moving lawyer to supply this information to the firm, to be checked against the firm's system. But there may often be circumstances (for example, where the moving lawyer or the firm have specialized practices) where the moving lawyer should make particular inquiry as to whether the firm represents particular clients, is adverse to particular entities, or is involved in specific issues or controversies.

[7] Subsections (a) and (b) of Rule 1.6 are substantially identical to DR 4-101(B) and (A) of the former Code of Professional Responsibility. The D.C. Bar recommended that that language be retained in Rule 1.6 over the then-new ABA Model on the scope of "secrets" is contained in Comment [8] to the D.C. version of Rule 1.6, which observes that with respect to a former representation at least, "secrets" do not include information that has become "generally known." We believe that in the context of a lawyer who has moved, or is contemplating a move, to another firm and is determining what information may be revealed for checking conflicts with that firm, the bar on revealing "secrets," in addition to not applying to information that is harmless or unexceptionable, would also not prevent the lawyer from discussing information that would otherwise be a secret but has become generally known.[8]

We stress that we are here referring to information that is truly generally known so that the lawyer in question is certain that the information is not new to the person whom the lawyer is discussing it with. For example, if the press has widely reported that a particular corporation was one of several that had been sued by a federal agency, then it could hardly be argued that a moving lawyer had revealed a "secret" by mentioning that he or she had worked on that litigation at the existing firm. The lawyer must make the judgment of whether particular information is a secret or not (see our Opinion No. 128). We caution that because such decisions are made in the almost entirely private context of a lawyer seeking employment in another firm, the lawyer must err on the side of protecting information where any doubt exists.

Without the former client's consent, therefore, a lawyer may, in checking conflicts at a new firm, reveal information about representations that is not privileged and is not a secret because it has not been requested by that client to be held inviolate and the revelation of which would not be harmful or embarrassing to that client or has become generally known. In the great majority of cases, we believe, this leaves lawyers free to reveal sufficient information to carry out a reliable conflict check. Information about many representations would not harm or embarrass the client where the basic facts of the representation are unexceptionable or already known to opponents or others who are not the client, including, for example, regulatory agencies or other government bodies.

Moreover, it is typically necessary to reveal only the most general information about a representation in order to determine, positively or negatively, whether a representation may cause a conflict. This is clear from the holding in T.C. Theatre Corp. v. Warner Brothers Pictures mentioned above. See also, Brown, supra, 486 A. 2d at 49-50. In T.C. Theatre, a lawyer's former client was the opponent in litigation of the lawyer's current client, and the former client moved to disqualify that lawyer and the lawyer's firm, claiming that in the former representation the lawyer learned confidential information from the then-client that would presently be useful in opposing that former client. The lawyer denied that he had received such information in the former representation. Judge Weinfeld ruled that to inquire into the truth of the assertions about what information had been confided in the earlier representation would require the revelation of the very confidential information sought to be protected. To avoid that, he held, the appropriate inquiry would be whether the current representation was "substantially related" to the former. If it was, then it would be presumed that confidences were given in the former representation that would be of use against the former client in the latter. To effectuate this test, the subject matter of former representation is described in general terms and compared to the current representation. As noted above, this standard is codified in Rule 1.9 of the D.C. Rules as the primary determinant of whether a lawyer may oppose the interests of a former client on particular issues. As we have described, to avoid discouraging lawyer mobility Rule 1.10(b) imports a narrower version of the substantially related test (under which the subject matter is compared but there must be actual possession by the lawyer of protected information rather than simply presuming possession); but the basic process of comparing representations to determine whether they involve similar subject matter is the same under Rule 1.10(b) as it is under Rule 1.9. It could hardly have been intended that Rule 1.10(b) impose a standard for checking conflicts that cannot be applied without revealing secrets protected by Rule 1.6.

There are, of course, many instances in which the facts surrounding a representation (such as that client X is contemplating a takeover of another business or has consulted a divorce lawyer or a criminal defense lawyer) may be extremely sensitive and so fraught with the possibility of injury or embarrassment to that client that absent a waiver that information is not subject to disclosure even for the purpose of checking conflicts.[9] See D.C. Rule 1.7, comment [19]. There is no specific exemption to the confidentiality rules in Rule 1.6 or elsewhere that permits a lawyer to reveal confidential information for the purpose of checking or seeking waiver of a conflict. This does not, mean, however, that there are no techniques that may in many cases allow conflicts to be adequately checked while at the same time assuring confidentiality to the full measure required by the Rules. A helpful discussion of possible approaches is provided in New York State Bar Opinion No. 720 (1999). Some rough guidelines or suggestions follow. However, the appropriateness and usefulness of such shortcut techniques as these suggested here can really only be judged on a case by case basis.

- As noted above, as a general rule it is merely necessary to compare the client name and the general subject matter of the representation. This information is often, though not always, neither privileged nor a secret.
- In some cases, identifying a particular issue or subject matter without identifying the client name may be sufficient to determine the lack of any conflict (see Opinion No. 265 on positional conflicts).
- If the subject matter but not the client name is sensitive, it will often be possible to avoid the sensitive areas if the moving lawyer mentions only the Rule of Professional Conduct because the ABA model Rule 1.6 language was "broader than warranted." Report of the D.C. Bar Model Rules of Professional Conduct Committee (the so-called Jordan Committee) and the Board of Governors, November 19, 1986, at 52. The Jordan Committee noted that the ABA version of the rule barred lawyers from revealing any information "relating to the representation." As an example of the overbreadth of this formulation, the Committee noted that information would be protected by it if that information came to the lawyer via a newspaper after the representation had ended. Id. While the Jordan Committee did not mention this, the ABA version would also bar the lawyer from mentioning any such information even if it could not possibly cause injury, or even were favorable, to the client. We think it plain that this is another example of overbreadth of the ABA version when compared to the DC Rule, which protects as "secrets" only information that the client has requested be held inviolate or the revelation of which would embarrass or be deleterious to the client.

[8] We doubt that the word "reveal" (Rule 1.6(a)(1)) even properly applies to the act of stating a fact to a hearer who already knows that fact. Further, it is questionable whether the act of disclosing a fact to a person can embarrass or be detrimental to someone within the meaning of the definition of "secret" in Rule 1.6(b) if the person to whom it was disclosed already knows it.

[9] This is a familiar difficulty in the context of seeking a waiver of a conflict. Even where a lawyer believes that a waiver would be given, it cannot be sought if in order to inform the would-be waiving client sufficiently it is necessary to reveal confidential information about the other client the revelation of which would not be consented to.

client name and asks the firm if that causes a problem. If it does not there may not be any need to determine whether the subject matter of that representation presents any problem.[10]

- If the identity of the client creates a problem (for example because the moving lawyer's practice specialty—for example, criminal law—would in combination with the client name reveal too much), it may be possible for the moving lawyer to name, instead of the client, those persons or entities to whom or which that client is adverse. If the firm does not represent them, there may well be no problem.
- At least as a first stage in an inquiry, it may be possible to avoid revealing confidences and secrets by providing a list of names to the firm without revealing which are clients and which adverse parties, perhaps also presenting the names in alphabetical or other order so as not to suggest associations. Depending on the substance of the firm's reaction or lack thereof to the names on the list, it may well be possible to discern that there is no problem without revealing additional information.

Adopted: April 2002
Published: May 2002

Opinion No. 313

Whether a Lawyer May Continue to Represent a Client When That Lawyer Represented the Same Client in the Same Matter While Serving as a Public Officer or Employee

- A former defense lawyer with the Navy Judge Advocate General's Corps may continue, in private practice, to represent in post-conviction proceedings the same criminal defendant whom he had represented as appointed counsel during the court martial. Even though his subsequent representation of the client is for the same matter in which he had participated personally and substantially while a public employee, he has not accepted "other employment" within the meaning of Rule 1.11 when he continues to represent the same client in the same matter after leaving military service.

[10] This is likely to be a successful technique much of the time. It cannot be presented as effective as a rule, however, because the issue may be one that affects persons not actually designated as adverse. Again, see Opinion No. 265 (positional conflicts).

Applicable Rule

- Rule 1.11 (Successive Government and Private Employment)

Inquiry

For over a year, a partner in the inquiring law firm had served as co-counsel in representing a lance corporal in the United States Marine Corps throughout the pre-trial and trial phases of his court-martial proceeding. The defendant was also represented by a criminal defense attorney appointed from the Navy Judge Advocate General's Corps ("JAG"). After the defendant was convicted and sentenced, his JAG criminal defense attorney was released from active duty and became an associate with the law firm that presents this inquiry. The partner who had served as co-counsel during the court martial has left the firm, and the defendant expressed an interest in having his former JAG lawyer, now a civilian, continue to represent him during various post-trial proceedings, which could include an appeal, a petition to the Board for Correction of Naval Records, and a petition for clemency. The former JAG lawyer, who is a member of the Bar of the District of Columbia, requested an opinion from the Navy concerning whether his continued representation of the defendant was prohibited by 18 U.S.C. § 207, and the Navy concluded that it was. According to the opinion, because he had participated "personally and substantially" as an officer throughout a "particular matter" in which the United States was a party, he could not communicate with or appear before the military authorities on behalf of the same specific party in connection with the same matter.

The law firm requested an opinion from this Committee regarding whether Rule 1.11 of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct prohibited the firm (as well as the JAG lawyer himself) from representing the defendant. While this request was pending, the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces reversed the position originally articulated by the Navy with respect to the applicability of section 207. Relying on long-standing precedent from the United States Court of Military Appeals interpreting the scope of section 207 in this context, the court concluded that the defendant's civilian counsel could continue to represent him during further review of the court-martial proceeding.

Discussion

The Ethics in Government Act, 18 U.S.C. § 207, and Rule 1.11 apply in similar ways to restrict post-Government employment.[1] Under Rule 1.11, a lawyer may not "accept other employment in connection with a matter which is the same as, or substantially related to, a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee." The Ethics in Government Act uses similar terms in prohibiting any person, after leaving federal employment, from making any communication to or appearance before any officer or employee of any department, agency, etc. on behalf of any other person in connection with "a particular matter" (1) in which the United States is a party or has a direct and substantial interest, (2) in which the person "participated personally and substantially as such officer or employee" and (3) "which involved a specific party or specific parties at the time of such participation." 18 U.S.C. § 207(a)(1)(A)-(C) (emphasis added).[2]

There are, of course, differences between the two requirements: Section 207 is a criminal statute that applies to any former officer or employee of the executive branch of the United States or of the District of Columbia. Rule 1.11, by contrast, is a rule of professional con-

[1] Comment [2] to Rule 1.11 expressly recognizes that "[i]n the District of Columbia, where there are so many lawyers for the federal and D.C. governments and their agencies, a number of whom are constantly leaving government and accepting other employment, particular heed must be paid to the federal conflict-of-interest statutes. See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. Chapter 11 [§§ 201-225] and regulations and opinions thereunder." See also D.C. Bar Op. No. 297 (discussing "as a threshold matter" the applicability of section 207 before considering the applicability of Rule 1.11).

[2] In 1986, this Committee acknowledged that it had proposed certain modifications to Rule 1.11—modifications that the Court of Appeals accepted—"with the purpose of conforming the language of the disciplinary rule to that used in 18 U.S.C. 207(a), the Ethics in Government Act. The Committee did not intend the change in language to have a significant, practical effect. Thus, what the Committee stated in interpreting 'substantial responsibility' still is relevant in determining whether the inquirer here 'participated personally and substantially' in the cases described by her inquiry." D.C. Bar Op. No. 177, at 294 (1986). Since then, both the Court of Appeals and this Committee have sought guidance on the meaning of Rule 1.11 by reference to regulations and opinions construing section 207. See, e.g., In re Sofaer, 728 A.2d 625, 643 (D.C. 1999) (interpreting the meaning of the condition under Rule 1.11(a) that the former government lawyer had participated "personally and substantially" in the government matter by seeking guidance from federal regulations interpreting the same phrase in 18 U.S.C. § 207); D.C. Bar Op. No. 297, at 177 n.3 (recognizing that "personal and substantial participation" has been defined by the Office of Government Ethics when interpreting section 207 in 5 C.F.R. § 2637.201(d)(1)).

duct that applies only to members of the D.C. Bar. Moreover, section 207 prohibits covered persons only from knowingly making "any communication to or appearance before" any department or agency of the federal or D.C. governments.[3] Rule 1.11's prohibition extends beyond communicating or making an appearance: it forbids anyone covered by the rule to "accept other employment" in connection with the same or substantially related matter. As Comment [5] explains, Rule 1.11(a) incorporates an "absolute disqualification of a lawyer from matters in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially."[4]

This is not a typical Rule 1.11 case. Even though the former JAG lawyer was a "public officer or employee" while serving as a lawyer in the military, his "client" in the "matter" was never the United States government. As an appointed defense counsel, his client was, throughout all relevant periods, the defendant. Rule 1.6(j) provides that, "[t]he client of the government lawyer is the agency that employs the lawyer unless expressly provided to the contrary by appropriate law, regulation, or order." "The Rules of Professional Conduct governing attorneys in the Navy expressly provide that "[a] covered [United States Government] attorney who has been duly assigned to represent an individual who is subject to disciplinary action or administrative proceedings, or to provide legal assistance to an individual, has, for those purposes, an attorney-client relationship with that individual." 32 C.F.R. § 776.32(a)(6). Moreover, "[n]otwithstanding a judge advocate's status as a commissioned officer subject, generally, to the authority of superiors, a judge advocate detailed or assigned to represent an individual member or employee of the [Department of the Navy] is expected to exercise unfettered loyalty and professional independence during the representation consistent with these Rules and remains ultimately responsible for acting in the best interest of the individual client." Id. § 776.56(a)(1).

The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has described the analogous relationship between a Navy JAG lawyer and the individual "clients" to whom he provides legal advice through the Navy's formal legal-assistance program:

> A legal assistance officer's function . . . is significantly different from that of other government lawyers. Rather than being charged with public matters in which the government is the client, a legal assistance attorney owes a preeminent duty to the private individual who, in effect, retains him. Under section 1906(c) of the Navy Judge Advocate General's Manual, for example, [the JAG lawyer] was required "to exercise his independent professional judgment on behalf of his client within the standards promulgated in the Code of Professional Responsibility . . . ." 32 C.F.R. § 726.6(c) (1975).[5]

The District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct recognize the unusual situation where a government lawyer's client is not the government itself but an individual person. Comment [38] to Rule 1.6 recognizes that this relationship presents a special set of confidentiality issues:

> Government lawyers may also be assigned to provide an individual with counsel or representation in circumstances that make clear that an obligation of confidentiality runs directly to that individual and that subparagraph (d)(2)(A), not (d)(2)(B), applies.[6] . . . . Examples of such representation include representation by a public defender, a government lawyer representing a defendant sued for damages arising out of the performance of the defendant's government employment, and a military lawyer representing a court-martial defendant.

D.C. Rule 1.6, Comment [38] (emphasis added). The Navy's regulations recognize, for example, that "a judge advocate is a military officer required by law to obey the lawful orders of superior officers," 32 C.F.R. § 776.56(b)(1), and that "[n]ot all direction given to a subordinate covered attorney is an attempt to influence improperly the covered attorney's professional judgment," id. § 776.56(b)(2). Yet, when a JAG lawyer "is assigned to represent an individual client, neither the attorney's personal interests, the interests of other clients, nor the interests of third persons should affect loyalty to the individual client," id. § 776.56(b)(1).

In the case that triggered this inquiry, the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces concluded that the former JAG lawyer could continue to represent the defendant during further review of the court-martial, citing United States v. Andrews, 21 C.M.A. 165 (1972). In Andrews, the United States Court of Military Appeals considered a factual situation nearly identical to that presented by the inquirer. Mr. Andrews, who had been represented by a JAG lawyer during a general court-martial proceeding, sought to retain the same lawyer after he had been released from active duty. The Chief of the Military Affairs Division in the Judge Advocate General's office had concluded that the former JAG lawyer was barred from further representation by section 207, and Mr. Andrews appealed this decision on the grounds that he had been denied the civilian counsel of his choice, as guaranteed by the Uniform Code of Military Justice. The Court of Military Appeals agreed, concluding that "a Judge Advocate General Corps officer released from active duty may continue to act for an accused as a civilian immediately after his release." 21 C.M.A. at 168. The court reasoned that this "opinion conforms with our view of the applicable law" and that the former JAG lawyer's "continued participation harbored no conflict of interest, since the parties to that relationship remained the same." Id.[7]

Of course, the rule governing successive government and private employment is not limited to instances where the former government employee "switches sides."[8] The American Law Institute has described three justifications for the pro-

---

[3] See 5 C.F.R. § 2637.201(b)(3) ("An appearance occurs when an individual is physically present before the United States in either a formal or informal setting or conveys material to the United States in connection with a formal proceeding or application. A communication is broader than an appearance and includes for example, correspondence, or telephone calls."); In re Sofaer, 728 A.2d at 641 (recognizing that the Office of Government Ethics "concluded that because Respondent had not yet contacted any government officials with the intent to influence them in connection with his Libyan representation, he had not violated [18 U.S.C. § 207]").

[4] In contrast to the ABA's Model Rule 1.11, D.C. Rule 1.11 has no provision for waiver.

[5] Woods v. Covington Cty. Bank, 537 F.2d 804, 815 (5th Cir. 1976).

[6] Subparagraph (d)(2) provides that, "A lawyer may use or reveal client confidences or secrets . . . (A) when permitted by these rules or required by law or court order; and (B) [i]f a government lawyer, when permitted or authorized by law." D.C. Rule 1.6(d)(2).

[7] For the most recent expression of the court's position on this issue, see United States v. Nguyen, 56 M.J. 252, 252 (C.A.A.F. 2001).

[8] See, e.g., General Motors Corp. v. City of New York, 501 F.2d 639 (2d Cir. 1974) (in suit by city against bus manufacturer alleging nationwide conspiracy, city's private lawyer who had substantial responsibility for investigating same conspiracy while at the Justice Department was disqualified); Allied Realty, Inc. v. Exchange Nat'l Bank, 283 F. Supp. 464 (D. Minn. 1968), aff'd, 408 F.2d 1099

hibition contained in Rule 1.11, even where there has been no side switching:

> First, prohibiting representation in a matter, even where consistent with the government's interests, diminishes the risk of subsequent misuse of information obtained by the government. If a former government lawyer could make use of confidential reports to an agency, for example, even in a cause that was consistent with the government position, it would go beyond the original purpose for making the reports and make it more difficult for the government to obtain voluntary disclosures from members of the public. Second, the rule removes an incentive to gain later advantages through methods of gathering information that are available only to the government, such as a grand-jury investigation. Third, the rule removes an incentive to begin proceedings as a government agent with a view to obtaining a subsequent advantage in private practice, such as by filing a complementary action for a subsequent private client.

Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 132 cmt. d (2000). Each of these justifications for the prohibition contained in Rule 1.11 assumes that the former government lawyer was acting as a lawyer whose client was the government itself. See id. (describing the prohibition as applying even though "the subsequent representation is not adverse to the interests of the former government client").

It is not immediately obvious, however, that it should make any difference whom the former government lawyer had as a client. The fact that the former JAG lawyer's client was an individual defendant and not the government does not change the fact that the former JAG lawyer was, at the time he represented the defendant, a "public employee or officer." This Committee recognized over twenty years ago, when interpreting DR 9-101(B)—the predecessor to Rule 1.11 under the D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility—that the prohibition on successive government and private employment does not turn on whether the former government employee was acting as a lawyer at the time of his or her government employment:

> The fact pattern presented [is] unusual in one sense: the inquiring attorney was not a lawyer and was not serving as a lawyer when he was employed by the government. [The inquiring attorney was an economist while working for the government; after graduating from law school, he resigned from government service and joined a law firm.] Nevertheless, DR 9-101(B) covers situations of this type, if its other tests are met, since it refers to service as a "public employee" rather than a "public lawyer." We regard the choice of terms as a deliberate and proper one, since a more typical case may involve a lawyer who serves in an administrative capacity in the government and then leaves to resume the practice of law. We have little doubt that the Code bars a lawyer from undertaking a representation in a matter in which he exercised substantial responsibility while a public official, even if that responsibility was not that of a lawyer.

D.C. Bar Op. No. 84, at 150 (1980). If it does not matter that the former government employee was acting as a lawyer at all, why might it matter that he was acting as a lawyer for an individual defendant rather than for the government?

The answer, we believe, is found in the term "other employment" under Rule 1.11(a). To trigger the prohibition under Rule 1.11, it is not enough that a former government employee work on a matter which is the same as or substantially related to a matter in which he or she participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee; the former government employee must first have accepted "other employment in connection with" the same or substantially related matter.[9] In our view, under circumstances in which the former government lawyer continues to represent in private practice the same client with whom the lawyer had established an attorney-client relationship while serving as a public officer or employee and in the same or substantially related matter, the former government lawyer has not accepted "other employment" within the meaning of Rule 1.11(a).

The comment to Rule 1.11 makes clear that the identity of the client is a critical question when determining when the former government lawyer has accepted "other employment":

> "Other employment," as used in paragraph (a) of this Rule, includes the representation of a governmental body other than the agency of the government by which the lawyer was employed as a public officer or employee, but in the case of a move from one government agency to another the prohibition provided in paragraph (a) may be waived by the government agency with which the lawyer was previously employed. As used in paragraph (a), it would not be "other employment" for a lawyer who has left the employment of a particular government agency and taken employment with another government agency (e.g., the Department of Justice) or with a private law firm to continue to accept representation of the same government agency with which the lawyer was previously employed.

D.C. Rule 1.11 Comment [10]. If it would not be "other employment" for the former government lawyer to continue to represent in private practice the same government agency with which he or she had been previously employed, it would not constitute "other employment" for the former government lawyer to continue to represent in private practice the same individual client whom he or she represented while employed by the government.

This Committee concluded over twenty-five years ago that there are two primary purposes underlying the prohibition reflected in DR 9-101(B):

> One is to prevent the appearance that a lawyer in public employment may have been influenced in his actions as a lawyer by the hope of later personal gain in private employment rather than by the best interests of his public client. The second purpose is to prevent the appearance that a lawyer may be utilizing for the benefit of a private client confidential information obtained in a prior attorney-client relationship with a public agency having interests in conflict with those of his private client.

(8th Cir. 1969) (former special assistant U.S. Attorney in criminal cases involving mortgage transactions was disqualified from representing plaintiff in civil suit to set aside the transactions).

[9] We note that Rule 1.11 of the ABA's Model Rules of Professional Conduct does not use the same formulation. Under the Model Rule, "a lawyer shall not represent a private client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee . . . ." This is just one of several significant ways in which D.C. Rule 1.11 differs from the ABA's Model Rule. See generally Grant Dawson, Conflict of Interest: Working Guidelines for Successive Conflicts of Interest Involving Government and Private Employment, 11 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 329, 338-39 (1998) (detailing the many differences between the D.C. Rule and the Model Rule); id. at 338 ("The District of Columbia's version of Model Rule 1.11 is important because it differs significantly from its ABA counterpart and because it probably governs more lawyers than any other non-federal rule").

D.C. Bar Op. No. 16, at 82 (1976).[10] We conclude that none of the purposes underlying Rule 1.11 would be served by interpreting the term "other employment" to prohibit the former JAG lawyer in this inquiry from continuing to represent his client in subsequent court-martial and other related proceedings. We see no danger that the former JAG lawyer's conduct as a JAG defense lawyer would appear to be improperly influenced by the prospect that he might one day continue to represent the same defendant in the same matter once he were to become a civilian. The best interests of the former JAG lawyer's employer—the Department of the Navy's JAG Corps—are served by his having provided "competent, diligent, and prompt representation to [his] client" (32 C.F.R. § 776.20(a)). And it is just such service that would make it likely that his client would seek to retain him after he leaves military service. Furthermore, we perceive no risk that the former JAG lawyer would use confidential information obtained through his public employment for the benefit of a private client. With respect to the same matter in which he represented the individual defendant, he did not have an attorney-client relationship with the United States government. Therefore, any information that he obtained with respect to this matter was information that he would have used for the benefit of his client, regardless of whether he was employed by the Navy or by a private law firm.

Moreover, both this Committee and its ABA counterpart have recognized that there are substantial countervailing considerations that counsel against a broader prohibition under Rule 1.11 than necessary:

> "Some of [these] underlying considerations . . . are the following: the ability of government to recruit young professionals and competent lawyers should not be interfered with by imposition of harsh restraints upon future practice nor should too great a sacrifice be demanded of the lawyers willing to enter government service . . . ; and the rule should not be permitted to interfere needlessly with the right of litigants to obtain competent counsel of their choosing, particularly in specialized areas requiring special, technical training and expertise."

D.C. Bar Op. No. 111, at 191 (emphasis added) (quoting ABA Formal Opinion No. 342 (1975)). We believe that these considerations are particularly significant where, as here, applying the rule would disrupt an ongoing attorney-client relationship.

In sum, we conclude that, where a government lawyer has, as part of his or her government employment, lawfully established an attorney-client relationship with an individual client, it does not constitute "other employment" for that lawyer to continue to represent the individual client in the same or in a substantially related matter once that lawyer is no longer a government employee.[11] Under these unusual circumstances, Rule 1.11 would not prohibit the former government employee from representing the client in the same matter in which that employee participated personally and substantially while working for the government.

Inquiry No. 01-10-22
Adopted: June 2002
Published: June 2002

Opinion No. 314

Whether a Nonlawyer Union Employee May Supervise a Union Attorney

• A nonlawyer union employee may supervise an attorney who is representing the union itself. In these circumstances the union is the client and, as an organization, acts through its duly authorized agents. However, the union employee may not supervise a union attorney who is representing a member of the union. The attorney would violate Rule 5.4(c) if she allowed the union employee to direct or regulate her professional judgment in rendering legal services to another.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
• Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
• Rule 1.8 (Conflict of Interest: Prohibited Transactions)
• Rule 1.13 (Organization as Client)
• Rule 4.3 (Dealing with Unrepresented Person)
• Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)

Inquiry

Rule 5.4(c) of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct provides that "[a] lawyer shall not permit a person who recommends, employs, or pays the lawyer to render legal services for another to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services." A labor union inquires whether the rule is violated "if a nonlawyer union employee supervises a union attorney who (1) represents the union in any matter or (2) represents one of the union's members in a matter that is within the collective bargaining process." The union also inquires whether the result would be different if a union attorney represents a member in a statutory proceeding rather than a proceeding arising out of the collective bargaining process. Although this particular inquiry is submitted by a labor union, similar issues may arise for lawyers employed by a corporation, a trade association, or another type of organization.[1]

Discussion

A nonlawyer union employee may supervise a union attorney who is representing the union itself. Rule 5.4(c) does not preclude such an arrangement because it deals with the situation where a person (including an entity) "recommends, employs, or pays the lawyer to render legal services for another . . . ." Here the employing organization is the client. "Plainly, a nonlawyer may direct the activities of lawyers when the nonlawyer is a client or an agent of a client in the matter . . . , such as a nonlawyer officer of a corporation who directs the activities of a lawyer in the office of inside legal counsel of the organization . . . ." Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers § 10, comment c (2000).[2]

[10] The ABA's Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility described these same two purposes as follows: "Rule 1.11 is thus concerned 1) to limit the possibility that a lawyer might be tempted to use the power of public office to secure for herself lucrative private employment after leaving government service, and be distracted from her current public duties by the prospect of eventually going to work for the other side; and 2) to ensure against the possibility that 'substantial unfair advantage could accrue to the private client by reason of access to information about the client's adversary obtainable only through the use of public resources available during the lawyer's government service.'" ABA Formal Opinion No. 409 (1997) (citations omitted; quoting from Model Rule 1.11, Legal Background at 76 (Proposed Final Draft, May 30, 1981)).

[11] This conclusion applies not only to former JAG lawyers, but also to former public defenders and to former federal officers and employees who were authorized, while working for the government, to represent particular individuals or groups of individuals, see 18 U.S.C. § 205.

[1] We do not address in this opinion potential issues relating to the unauthorized practice of law.

[2] As we previously have recognized, "there plainly is no prohibition on an in-house lawyer performing legal work for the corporation that

Indeed, most lawyers represent, and take direction from, clients who are lay persons. The only difference here is that the client is an organization. Rule 1.13(a) of our Rules of Professional Conduct provides that "[a] lawyer employed or retained by an organization represents the organization acting through its duly authorized constituents." Those "constituents" may well be lay persons, and a corporation or a labor union may decide as a matter of its own governance that it will assign someone who is not a lawyer to supervise its legal staff. "Persons authorized to act for the organization. . . . determine the scope of the representation [and] direct the activities of the lawyer during the course of the representation. . . [T]he lawyer must follow instructions and implement decisions of those persons, as the lawyer would follow instructions and decisions of an individual client." Restatement Third, § 96, comment d.

Of course this does not mean that a lawyer must, or even may, surrender his professional judgment when representing a client that happens to be an entity. Rule 1.2 generally defines the scope of representation, and comment [1] makes it clear that "a lawyer is not required to pursue objectives or employ means simply because a client may wish that the lawyer do so." Indeed, a lawyer is obliged to withdraw from a representation if she concludes that carrying out the client's wishes will violate the Rules of Professional Conduct. Rule 1.16(a)(1). Lawyer employees of unions or corporations have the same professional duties, but adhering to them may cause more onerous personal consequences because the employer is the only client. "The power a client employer possesses over a lawyer-employee is substantial, compared to that of a client over an independent lawyer." Restatement Third, § 32, comment b.

The inquirer also asks how Rule 5.4(c) applies when the union lawyer represents one of the union's members and not simply the union itself. The answer depends on the context in which the representation occurs, and on whether there is an attorney-client relationship between the union lawyer and the union member.[3]

As we recently discussed in Opinion No. 316, the existence of an attorney-client relationship is determined by the substantive law of the relevant jurisdiction, not by applying the Rules of Professional Conduct. See generally In re Lieber, 442 A.2d 153, 156 (D.C. 1982)(discussing factors which determine whether an attorney-client relationship has been formed). Moreover, "[t]he existence of an attorney-client relationship is an issue to be resolved by the trier of fact and is predicated on the circumstances of each case." Id.

Substantive labor law also affects the analysis when the union is representing one of its members in connection with a grievance under the collective bargaining agreement. It is generally recognized that the grievance belongs to the union, not its member, but that the union owes a duty of fair representation to its member. See generally Air Line Pilots Ass'n v. O'Neill, 499 U.S. 51, 76 (1991)(describing doctrine of fair representation); Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 177 (1967)(same). Accordingly, many cases have held that the lawyer represents the union and not its individual member. See, e.g., Peterson v. Kennedy, 771 F.2d 1244, 1258 (9th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1122 (1986). The United States District Court for our jurisdiction has deemed it "well established, as a matter of law, that an attorney handling a labor grievance on behalf of a union does not enter into an 'attorney-client' relationship with the union member asserting the grievance." Gwin v. National Marine Engineers Beneficial Ass'n, 966 F. Supp. 4, 7 (D.D.C. 1997)(citing Peterson), aff'd, 159 F.3d 636 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (Table). If it is true that the union is the only client, then the union lawyer is not rendering legal services "for another," and Rule 5.4(c) does not come into play.

This topic has generated a great deal of debate. See, e.g., Russell G. Pearce, The Union Lawyer's Obligations to Bargaining Unit Members: A Case Study of the Interdependence of Legal Ethics and Substantive Law, 37 S. Tex. L. Rev. 1095 (1996); James G. Pope, Two Faces, Two Ethics: Labor Union Lawyers and the Emerging Doctrine of Entity Ethics, 68 Or. L. Rev. 1 (1989). In many ways the situation is similar to the "eternal triangle" formed by a lawyer, an insurance company that has retained the lawyer, and the insured. Does the lawyer represent only the insurer, only the insured, or both? See generally ABA Formal Op. 01-421 (2001)(noting disagreement among various jurisdictions, but taking "no position as to whom the lawyer represents absent an express agreement as to the identity of the client").

This Committee, of course, does not opine on questions of substantive law. However, the obligations of the union attorney under the Rules of Professional Conduct will vary depending on whether an attorney-client relationship exists. If the lawyer does not have an attorney-client relationship with the union member, then he likely will have an obligation to clarify the nature of their relationship. This is true even if there is no apparent conflict between the interests of the union and those of its member. "In dealing on behalf of a client with a person who is not represented by counsel, a lawyer shall not . . . [s]tate or imply to unrepresented persons whose interests are not in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client that the lawyer is disinterested." Rule 4.3(b). Moreover, "[w]hen the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to correct the misunderstanding." Id.

The need for clarification increases as the risk of conflict grows. A lawyer shall not "[g]ive advice to the unrepresented person other than the advice to secure counsel, if the interests of such person are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client." Rule 4.3(a). Furthermore, "[i]n dealing with an organization's directors, officers, employees, members, shareholders, or other constituents, a lawyer [representing the organization] shall explain the identity of the client when it is apparent that the organization's interests may be adverse to those of the constituents with whom the lawyer is dealing." Rule 1.13(b). See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion No. 269 (1997)(discussing obligation of counsel for a corporation (whether in-house or outside counsel) to clarify role in internal corporate investigation). Such clarification will often be necessary when grievances are being presented under a collective bargaining agreement. As one court has explained, "[t]he interests of individual employees sometimes may be compromised for the sake of the larger bargaining collective." Garcia v. Zenith Electronics Corp., 58 F.3d 1171, 1176 (7th Cir. 1995).

If the lawyer represents both the union and its member, then conflicts of interest employs him." D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion No. 135 (1984)(addressing, among other issues, the practice of law with a corporation whose directors or officers are non-lawyers). This opinion construed DR 5-107(B) of the Code of Professional Responsibility, but the language of Rule 5.4(c) is functionally identical. Our conclusion is equally valid when the employing organization is a labor union.

[3] For purposes of this opinion, we do not distinguish between a union member and a member of the bargaining unit who does not belong to the union.

may arise. See generally Rule 1.7(b). Sometimes these conflicts will require the lawyer to withdraw from both representations. In other circumstances, the conflict may be waived by the consent of the union and the union member after full disclosure. Rule 1.7(c).

If the lawyer represents the union member (as part of a dual representation[4]), Rule 5.4(c) would come into play and would forbid the lawyer to allow a union official (whether an attorney or not) "to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services."[5] Thus, the application of Rule 5.4(c) will depend upon whether there is an attorney-client relationship between the union lawyer and the union member. That question will be answered through the application of substantive law.[6]

The third part of the inquiry focuses on the situation where a union attorney represents a member in a matter that does not arise out of the collective bargaining process. This might occur, for example, through a legal services program where an attorney paid by the union drafts a will, handles a divorce, or litigates a personal injury suit. These situations would not be impacted by federal labor law, and one would generally expect that an attorney-client relationship will be established between the union lawyer and the union member. In any event, the union would be employing or paying the union lawyer to render legal services to another. Under Rule 5.4(c) the lawyer may not permit a union official "to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services." See ABA Formal Op. 87-355 (1987)(for-profit prepaid legal services plan must allow lawyer to exercise independent professional judgment on behalf of the client); Alaska Bar Ass'n Ethics Committee Opinion No. 99-3 (1999)(in-house staff counsel for an insurance company may represent an insured, but must be allowed to exercise independent professional judgment).

Conclusion

A nonlawyer union employee may supervise a union attorney who is representing the union itself because the employee is acting as an agent of the client. However, the union employee may not direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering legal services to a member of the union.

Inquiry No. 01-4-8
Adopted: June 2002
Published: June 2002

Opinion No. 315

Whether a Lawyer May Represent a Client in Private Practice in the Same Matter on Which That Lawyer Worked While a Government Employee and Whether This Committee Can Resolve Factual Questions Regarding a Lawyer's Prior Participation

- (1) A former lawyer with the Environmental Protection Agency ("EPA") may represent a private client in challenging the EPA's final rules, notwithstanding the fact that he was involved in substantially related litigation by drafting status reports and participating in discussions regarding the timing of the ongoing rulemaking proceedings. Because his participation in the prior matter did not involve him in the merits of the litigation and consisted of no more than official responsibility or participation on administrative and peripheral issues, he did not participate "substantially" in the prior litigation within the meaning of Rule 1.11.
(2) Because this Committee cannot determine whether a former Justice Department official in the Civil Rights Division participated "personally and substantially" in litigation concerning a school board when he worked twenty years earlier in the Division's front office, the prudent course to follow would be for the former Justice Department official not to represent the same school board in the same matter today. This Committee does not have the institutional capacity to resolve the factual question presented by inconsistent recollections from witnesses regarding the degree of the inquirer's personal participation in the same matter while a government employee.

Applicable Rule

- Rule 1.11 (Successive Government and Private Employment)

The Committee has received two separate inquiries relating to the same issue under Rule 1.11 of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct—whether, under specific factual circumstances, a lawyer "participated personally and substantially" while a government employee in the same matter on which the lawyer would now like to participate in private practice. Rule 1.11 provides that a lawyer may not "accept other employment in connection with a matter which is the same as, or substantially related to, a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee." Because the two inquiries present unique facts, we shall discuss each inquiry separately.

I. Former Attorney with the Environmental Protection Agency

Inquiry

The first inquiry comes from a former attorney in the Environmental Protection Agency's ("EPA") Office of General

---

[4] In D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion No. 94 (1980), we considered the propriety of in-house counsel for a trade association performing legal services for a related organization. We concluded that "[b]ecause the attorneys here are employees of the Association, in every instance in which they would render services to the [related organization], they would be, for analytical purposes, engaging in a multiple representation—even if no services relating to the matter in question are actually provided to the Association and even if the Association's interests are not involved in the representation."

[5] In Opinion No. 135, we addressed the question of whether a lawyer employed by a corporation whose directors and officers are non-lawyers may perform legal work for the corporation's clients. Construing the predecessor to Rule 5.4(c), we cautioned that "the non-lawyers involved in the corporation must not exercise any control or influence over the exercise of the [in-house counsel's] professional judgment in performing legal services for the corporation's clients." More recently, in D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion No. 289 (1999), we recognized that the prohibitions of Rule 5.4(c) apply to lawyers as well as lay persons: "We have no doubt that the barriers applicable to lay persons in this setting are equally applicable to lawyers. Indeed, the proposition that lawyers acting on behalf of lay individuals [in our case, a union] may seek to exercise such control over litigation brought by parties to whom they do not owe the lawyer's obligations of undivided loyalty raises even more significant questions than having lay individuals exercise such control or influence."

[6] If there is an attorney-client relationship with the union member, the lawyer will also have to comply with Rule 1.8(e). That rule provides that:

> A lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless:
>
> (1) The client consents after consultation;
> (2) There is no interference with the lawyer's independence of professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and
> (3) Information relating to representation of a client is protected as required by Rule 1.6.

Here, too, it is crucial to determine as a matter of substantive law whether the union lawyer has an attorney-client relationship with the union member. See Opinion 269 (discussing application of Rule 1.8(e) to lawyer retained by a corporation to represent one of its constituents); D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion No. 225 (1992)(discussing application of Rule 1.8(e) in context of prepaid legal services program).

Counsel. While he was at the EPA (between October 1997 and April 2001), the inquirer was involved in drafting a set of regulations to implement the Clean Air Act Amendments of 1977. The first set of regulations to implement this Act were promulgated in 1980, and they were challenged in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. After the case had been fully briefed, the parties reached a partial settlement agreement according to which the EPA agreed to make certain specific changes to a particular rule. Although the case was effectively remanded to the EPA for further rulemaking, it remained in abeyance on the court's docket. Meanwhile, as the remand proceedings were pending, the EPA issued a related set of regulations in 1992, and the challenge to those regulations was ultimately consolidated with the original challenge to the 1980 regulations. Beginning in January 1995, the D.C. Circuit ordered the consolidated cases held in abeyance pending the EPA's further rulemaking proceedings.[1] In 1996, the EPA issued a Notice of Proposed Rulemaking ("NPRM") regarding a wide range of regulations and including the specific issue that had been remanded through the partial settlement of the 1980 litigation. The EPA indicated in its NPRM that it intended to issue final rules consistent with the settlement terms. Those final rules have not yet been issued.

As mentioned above, during his time at the EPA, the inquirer worked on various aspects of the final rulemaking that had been proposed in 1996. In addition to his work on the new regulations, however, the inquirer was also responsible for helping the Department of Justice attorneys (who represented the EPA on appeal) draft status reports for the court on the progress of the further rulemaking. These reports were filed regularly with the D.C. Circuit every three to four months between 1995 and 1999. Although he was never counsel of record in the cases, the inquirer also participated as one of several EPA attorneys in discussions with opposing counsel regarding the timing of the EPA's final rulemaking. These negotiations never addressed the underlying merits of the litigation.

The inquirer has now left the EPA and begun working as counsel to one of the entities that had challenged the 1992 regulations. The inquirer has asked this Committee whether he may represent his current client in any future litigation challenging the final rules that the EPA will eventually issue in response to the 1996 NPRM. Specifically, the inquirer has asked whether, while employed by the EPA, he "personally and substantially" participated in the prior, consolidated litigations within the meaning of Rule 1.11 such that he may not now participate in a "substantially related" matter on behalf of a private client.

Discussion

Rule 1.11 does not generally apply to prohibit a former government lawyer from representing a private client in a matter when the lawyer's only relationship to that matter as a government employee was to work on administrative rulemakings of general applicability. See D.C. Rule 1.11(g) (limiting the definition of "matter" as "involving a specific party or parties"); Id., Comment [3] ("[t]he making of rules of general applicability and the establishment of general policy will ordinarily not be a 'matter' within the meaning of Rule 1.11"). This Committee recently reaffirmed its longstanding view that the making of rules of general applicability does not constitute a "matter" within the meaning of Rule 1.11.[2] Therefore, as the inquirer himself has recognized, the fact that he worked on drafting and developing the final regulations would not preclude him from representing a private party in any subsequent litigation challenging those regulations.[3]

But the inquirer was involved in more than the drafting of the final regulations; he also participated in the prior, consolidated litigation by helping to draft status reports for the D.C. Circuit and by participating as one among several EPA employees in discussions relating to the timing of the EPA's final regulations. Put simply, the question is whether a government lawyer has "participated personally and substantially" in a matter when he or she helped to prepare reports on the status of subsequent agency rulemaking for filing in court and participated in discussions with opposing counsel over the timing of that rulemaking?[4]

Although this is a very close question, we conclude that the answer is "No." This question requires an inquiry into what the inquirer actually did or knew rather than into the scope of his prior legal representation. As we explained over twenty years ago, the question whether a former government employee's participation was "substantial" turns not on formal questions of the "authority to make major decisions" but rather on a

[1] Ultimately, the court "administratively terminated" the cases in December 1999.

[2] See D.C. Bar Op. No. 297 (2000) (a former government attorney is not prohibited under Rule 1.11 from representing a private client in a "negotiated rulemaking" in which he participated while employed by the government); see also D.C. Bar Op. 187 (1987) (former government employee was not prohibited under DR 9-101(B) from representing a private client in challenging an agency's regulations for which he had been responsible while employed by the government); D.C. Bar Op. 106, at 184 (1981) ("'work as a government employee in drafting, enforcing, or interpreting government or agency procedures, regulations, or laws, or in briefing abstract principles of law, does not disqualify the lawyer under DR 9-101(B) from subsequent private employment involving the same regulations, procedures, or points of law; the same 'matter' is not involved because there is lacking the discrete, identifiable transactions or conduct involving a particular situation or specific parties'" (quoting ABA Formal Op. No. 342 (1975)). This view is consistent with the position of the American Law Institute, see Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 133 cmt. e (2000) (defining "matter" as a "judicial or other proceeding, application, request for a ruling or other determination, contract, claim, controversy, investigation, charge, accusation, arrest, or other particular matter involving a specific party or parties. Drafting of a statute or regulation of general applicability is not included under that definition . . . .").

[3] We note, as we have recognized in prior opinions on this issue, that the fact that Rule 1.11 does not prohibit the subsequent private representation does not mean that the former government lawyer is free from any obligations with respect to his former government service. Under Rules 1.6(f), for example, he continues to have the obligation to preserve any government confidences or secrets that he obtained; under Rule 1.7(b)(4), the former government lawyer has an obligation to ensure that his professional judgment on behalf of his new, private client is not adversely affected by his prior involvement in the government rulemaking proceedings. See D.C. Bar Op. No. 297, at 178-79 (noting the concerns identified in Opinion No. 106).

[4] Based on our review of the rulemaking history, we believe that any challenge to the final rules that the EPA ultimately adopts would be "substantially related" to the consolidated litigations on which the inquirer worked while employed at the EPA. The critical question in determining whether two matters are the same or substantially related to one another is whether "the factual contexts of the two . . . transactions overlap in such a way that a reasonable person could infer that the former government attorney may have had access to information legally relevant to, or otherwise useful in, the subsequent representation." Brown v. District of Columbia Bd. of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37, 49-50 (D.C. 1984) (en banc). The inquirer worked at the EPA between October 1997 and April 2001, during which time he was the staff attorney assigned to the consolidated litigation over the 1980 and 1992 Regulations. Under the facts presented by the inquirer, it is reasonable to infer that, as the staff attorney assigned to this appeal, the inquirer had access to information in the prior litigation that would be "legally relevant to, or otherwise useful in, the subsequent representation" in challenging the EPA's final rules relating to the same issue.

factual inquiry into whether the "involvement was direct, extensive, and substantive, not peripheral, clerical, or formal." D.C. Bar Op. No. 84, at 150 (1980).[5]

In Opinion No. 111, we concluded that an Assistant United States Attorney did not have "substantial responsibility" (DR 9-101(B)) over a matter when all he did was to read the complaint and maintain a file of all publicly filed documents in the case. He did not render any advice, take any action, or consult with anyone else with respect to the litigation. See D.C. Bar Op. No. 111, at 191 (1982). Here, by contrast, the inquirer had to consult to some extent with the lawyers at the Department of Justice who filed the status reports that he drafted, but the substance of those consultations was confined to the progress of the ongoing rulemaking proceedings, not to the course of the litigation. Moreover, like the Assistant United States Attorney in Opinion No. 111, the inquirer was never counsel of record, so "public appearances should not be offended because as a government attorney he did not participate in the matter in a public way." Id. at 192.

As we noted in Opinion No. 177, the critical question is whether the inquirer's "activities involved [him] in the merits of the case," thereby making "substantial" his personal participation in the matter. See D.C. Bar Op. No. 177, at 295 (1986). Although the inquirer participated in discussions with opposing counsel, his role in these negotiations was as a junior member of the team, and the discussions focused not on resolving the merits of the litigation but on the timing of the final rules following the agency's NPRM.[6]

Moreover, the inquirer's role in the prior litigation was clearly not substantive. Throughout his period of employment with the EPA, the 1980 and 1992 consolidated litigations were inactive; the parties were simply waiting (indeed, they are still waiting) for the EPA to issue its final rules. If the scope of the inquirer's participation in the prior litigation were sufficient to constitute "personal and substantial" involvement, it is difficult to imagine how any involvement in a case would fail to satisfy such a standard. Simply participating as a lawyer on behalf of the EPA cannot be sufficient without some evidence that the participation was "more than official responsibility, knowledge, perfunctory involvement, or involvement on an administrative or peripheral issue." 5 C.F.R. § 2637.201(d)(1). Accepting (as we must) the inquirer's own description of his involvement in the prior litigation as limited to drafting status reports on the ongoing administrative rulemaking and participating in discussions concerning the timing of that same rulemaking, we conclude that his involvement amounted to no more than "official responsibility . . . or involvement on an administrative or peripheral issue."

Finally, we concluded twenty years ago that an Assistant United States Attorney had not been substantially involved in a matter where he had "been privy to no government confidences relating to the matter" and where there could be "no suggestion that the degree of his involvement in the matter while in government service could reasonably be expected to or did encourage his subsequent private employment or the prospective assignment in private practice to the same litigation." D.C. Bar Op. No. 111, at 192. While it is certainly possible that the inquirer's current employer may have hired him (at least in part) because of his past involvement in the EPA's general rulemaking proceedings in this area, we find no reason to believe that the inquirer's limited and peripheral involvement in the litigations over the 1980 and 1992 rulemakings encouraged his subsequent private employment. And encouraging subsequent private employment is, after all, one of the goals that Rule 1.11 is designed to protect, for it could undermine the ability of government to recruit young professionals and competent lawyers to impose harsher restraints than necessary upon future practice. See D.C. Bar Op. No. 111, at 191; ABA Formal Opinion No. 342.

In sum, we conclude on this record that the inquirer did not "participate[ ] personally and substantially as a public officer or employee" in the prior consolidated litigation. Rule 1.11 would not, therefore, prohibit his participation in any subsequent litigation arising out of a challenge to the EPA's final rules.[7]

II. Former Official in the United States Department of Justice

Inquiry

The second inquiry comes from a former Department of Justice lawyer, who asked whether he could represent a school board in the latest phase of a desegregation case that had been in active litigation in the early 1980s, when the inquirer had been a senior official in the Civil Rights Division.[8] The inquirer had taken the position with his former employer that he had not "participated personally and substantially" in the case while a public official. His own recollection was that he attended a single meeting relating to the case—a meeting that involved a number of other lawyers, including the Assistant Attorney General and the Government's expert witness in the case—and that he had no official responsibility for the matter. In response to his request for guidance, the Deputy Designated Agency Ethics Official in the Civil Rights Division recommended that he not appear before a federal agency or court on behalf of the school board in the current phase of the case "in order to avoid a possible violation of 18 U.S.C. [§] 207(a)."[9]

[5] See also D.C. Bar Op. No. 16, at 83 (1976) (concluding that, in order to determine whether a former government lawyer's responsibility with regard to a government contract was "substantial" within the meaning of DR 9-101(B), we must have "before us the full facts as to a particular contract and the role which the inquiring attorney played in the drafting, negotiation, execution or administration of that contract")

[6] We do not mean to suggest that participation in negotiations over the timing of administrative rulemaking could never be sufficiently substantial to trigger Rule 1.11. On the contrary, we would expect that participating in discussions over the timing of agency action in the context of litigation challenging such action would typically constitute substantial participation in the litigation itself. But under the specific circumstances at issue here, we believe that the inquirer's discussions with opposing counsel over the timing of the rulemaking were too far removed from the underlying merits of the challenge to the rules to constitute substantial participation in the litigation. To be sure, the inquirer participated personally and substantially in the substantive work on the final regulations. But, as we have already noted, participation in this general rulemaking does not constitute participation in a "matter" under Rule 1.11(a). Because the inquirer's participation in the relevant "matter" was limited to reporting on the progress and discussing timing of the general rulemaking proceeding, we are convinced, under the circumstances presented here, that his participation in the prior litigation was more "peripheral, clerical, or formal" than "direct, extensive, and substantive." D.C. Bar Op. No. 84 at 150.

[7] The fact that Rule 1.11 does not apply under the particular facts presented here does not mean that the inquirer is free from any obligations imposed by other Rules of Professional Conduct, see supra note 3, or by other legal requirements, see 18 U.S.C. § 207. Our opinion here does not purport to address the applicability of any of these other obligations.

[8] According to the inquirer, his firm now represents the school board. However, he has been screened off from all participation or involvement in the matter.

[9] Letter from Linda F. Thome, Deputy Designated Agency Ethics Official, U.S. Dep't of Justice, Civil Rights Division, at 3 (Sept. 11, 2001) ("Civil Rights Division Letter").

Having interviewed seven current and former Civil Rights Division attorneys, all of whom had varying recollections of the inquirer's involvement in this litigation, the official responded to the inquirer as follows: "In my view, the line attorneys and the reviewer responsible for the case in the Section, who were most intensively involved in the case to the exclusion of other matters, are most likely to have the best memories about it. Among this group, all but one recall that you were personally and substantially involved. Even your own recollection indicates that you attended at least one meeting at which the case was substantively discussed." Civil Rights Division Letter at 2. The inquirer has asked this Committee whether his involvement in this litigation in the early 1980s constituted personal and substantial participation in that matter under Rule 1.11(a).

Discussion

The government ethics official in the Department of Justice has concluded that the available evidence supports the conclusion that the inquirer participated in the earlier matter "personally and substantially" as a public officer or employee within the meaning of section 207(a)(1). That conclusion was based on interviews with other attorneys involved in the matter and on the judgment of the reviewing official that the recollections of those who were most closely involved in the case should be considered most reliable. Because, "[a]mong this group, all but one recall that the [inquirer was] personally and substantially involved," the official recommended that the inquirer not represent the school board before a federal court or agency to ensure that he not violate section 207.

One fact distinguishes this inquiry from others that the Committee has considered under Rule 1.11: there is a serious (if not surprising) disagreement over what role the inquirer actually played with respect to the school desegregation case approximately eighteen years ago. In all previous inquiries involving the meaning of the phrases "substantial responsibility" and "participated personally and substantially," the actions, duties, and responsibilities of the former government lawyer while in the government were undisputed and accepted as fact. Here, by contrast, there is no consensus. On one hand, the inquirer himself recalls attending a single meeting about the case in early 1983, when he was a Special Assistant to the Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division. He recalls attending this meeting with the Assistant Attorney General and with the government's expert witness in the litigation and characterizes his own participation as "peripheral." Other than this one meeting, he does not recall having had any other involvement with the case. The former Assistant Attorney General recalls that the inquirer was busy with another matter at this time and that he was not involved with this particular litigation. The former Chief of the Educational Section also recalls that the inquirer was not involved, although the former Chief had only limited involvement with the case himself.

On the other hand, a number of attorneys recall that the inquirer was far more involved. In particular, the lawyer who was primarily responsible for handling the matter for the Civil Rights Division remembers that the inquirer was present at more than one meeting about the case and that he had participated in discussions on various questions of strategy. The former Deputy Chief of the General Litigation Section recalls that the inquirer not only participated in more than one meeting about the case but that he participated in a substantial way, particularly on policy issues that arose during the course of the litigation. And the attorneys who handled the case in early 1983 recall that the inquirer participated in "conceptual discussions" about the case and that, at the particular meeting with the government's expert witness, the inquirer asked a series of specific questions about school-desegregation policy.[10]

We are not, of course, a fact-finding body, so we are in no position to resolve this factual question. If it turned out that the inquirer attended several meetings on the case, that he participated in "conceptual discussions" regarding policy issues that arose during the litigation, or that he raised specific questions about school-desegregation policy during a specific meeting relating to the case, we would probably conclude that the inquirer participated "personally and substantially" in the matter. As we noted in Opinion No. 177, where a former government attorney consulted with others in her office and reviewed their recommended decisions, "these activities involved her in the merits of the case," thereby making substantial her personal participation. See D.C. Bar Op. No. 177, at 295. To the extent that the inquirer's participation "involved [him] in the merits of the [school-desegregation] case," we believe that it would be reasonable to conclude that he participated "personally and substantially" in the matter.

It is a harder question whether the inquirer's participation would qualify as "personal" and "substantial" if the extent of his involvement were limited to what he now recalls. If all he did was attend a single meeting in the company of a number of more senior attorneys in the Civil Rights Division, and if he did not actively participate in the meeting by asking questions about the case but rather listened generally to the conversation of others, we would most likely conclude that he did not participate "personally and substantially" in the matter. To paraphrase our Opinion No. 84, his involvement in the matter would have been peripheral and formal, not direct, extensive, or substantive.

Because our conclusion with respect to the applicability of Rule 1.11 depends entirely on a factual determination, we cannot now provide the definitive answer that the inquirer is seeking. We simply have no basis to second-guess the conclusion reached by the government ethics official in the Civil Rights Division that the attorneys who were most intensively involved in the matter are most likely to have the best memories about it and that, among this group, all but one characterized the inquirer as having been personally and substantially involved in the matter. Because the passage of time has probably made it impossible conclusively to determine the relevant facts—at least in the absence of a formal hearing convened for that purpose—we believe that the only prudent course for the inquirer to follow would be to decline other employment in connection with this matter, lest he risk violating Rule 1.11.[11]

Inquiry Nos. 01-10-23, 01-12-26
Adopted: June 2002
Published: June 2002

Opinion No. 316

Lawyers' Participation in Chat Room Communications With Internet Users Seeking Legal Information

[10] These descriptions of the attorneys' recollections are taken from the Civil Rights Division Letter recommending that he not represent the school board before a federal court or agency, "in order to avoid a possible violation of 18 U.S.C. [§] 207(a)."

[11] It is possible, of course, that the particular phase of the litigation pending in the early 1980s would not properly be considered "the same as, or substantially related to," the matter on which the inquirer would now like to work. If this were so, Rule 1.11 would not apply. That question, however, was not presented to the Committee, and we have no basis to consider it.

• It is permissible for lawyers to take part in on-line chat rooms and similar arrangements through which attorneys engage in back-and-forth communications, in "real time" or nearly real time, with Internet users seeking legal information, provided they comply with all applicable rules of professional conduct. To avoid formation of attorney-client relationships through such chat room conversations, lawyers should avoid giving specific legal advice. If a lawyer subject to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct engages in chat room communications of sufficient particularity and specificity to give rise to an attorney-client relationship under the substantive law of a state with jurisdiction to regulate the communication, that lawyer must comply with the full array of D.C. Rules governing attorney-client relationships.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.1 (Competence)
- Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.4 (Communication)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality)
- Rules 1.7, 1.9 (Rules on Conflict of Interest)
- Rule 7.1 (Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services)

Inquiry

We have recently addressed a number of issues related to attorneys' participation in the cyberspace communications revolution.[1] We write here to consider an issue left unaddressed by these earlier opinions—namely, the permissibility of lawyers' participation in on-line "chat rooms," "list servs," and similar arrangements through which lawyers engage in interactive communications, in "real time" or nearly real time, with Internet users seeking legal information.[2]

Prior to drafting this opinion, one committee member undertook an informal survey of web sites offering chat rooms on law-related topics. A sampling of such sites revealed a wide array of services offering "one-on-one" communications with "licensed attorneys," many with catchy names such as "Free Advice" and "Dads' Divorce." These communications were sometimes free, but some services charged users a fee.[3] Many provided a multitude of law-related services, including not only live attorney chat rooms, but also attorney directories, treatises and legal reports, and links to other law-related information sources. Our analysis here solely concerns lawyers' participation in the features of these sites that offer visitors interactive communications with licensed attorneys on legal topics.[4]

Every chat room we visited displayed prominent disclaimers, often as a "click through" page to which visitors must indicate consent before proceeding, along the following lines:

> Please note . . . this chat room is for informational purposes only and is not intended to be used as specific legal advice in any way, shape or form. Participating in this chat room does not establish an attorney client relationship—for personal legal advice consult your attorney.

Such notices also typically disclaimed all warranties as to the quality and accuracy of the legal information provided and purported to disavow the service provider's liability for all harm arising from use of the service. Most chat room services we visited further disclaimed any duty to keep information provided by participants confidential, though one, devoted to immigration law, promised to make its best efforts to protect from third parties information transmitted by participants. All the sites we visited emphasized that their purpose was to provide "legal information," but not "legal advice."

Whether and how participating attorneys are permitted to follow up with Internet users with whom they engage in such communications appeared to vary. One site stated that the lawyer "does NOT receive any portion of your fee, and will NOT serve as your legal counsel, during LiveChat or thereafter, so you can get a completely candid evaluation." At other sites, however, the attorneys answering questions in chat rooms prominently provided their full contact information at the opening of the chat session and invited chat room participants to contact them directly after the chat session ended.[5]

We did not systematically monitor the communications that were taking place in chat rooms we located, nor did we "test" any site by submitting an inquiry from an individual. Nevertheless, we did read various conversations taking place in chat rooms that were open to the public without charge. Here is one randomly selected exchange that took place in one public chat room:

> Q: I am in the US on a visa waiver from UK [that] expires on 8th Sept. I have been told by an abusive husband not to return. I am therefore homeless—he has told immigration officials about me—they told him that I won't be allowed to re enter the States. This is the only place I have a home!!!!!! Please help? . . .
>
> A. Based upon the statements you made, it appears that you are in-status and your visa expires on September 8, 2001. It is difficult to change status from the visa waiver. Additionally you might want to apply for a nonimmigrant visa, such as a student ("F") visa. You will probably be required to leave the United States to obtain it. If you have no interest in education you might want to apply for a nonimmigrant work visa. Without

[1] In Opinion 281, we concluded that lawyers may send confidential client information through unencrypted electronic mail, except where special circumstances warrant a higher level of care about preserving a communication's confidentiality. In Opinion 302, we decided that lawyers may use web sites to advertise for plaintiffs for class action lawsuits, provided that they comply with all of our ethical requirements as to truthfulness and other matters, and offered some tentative "best practices" guidance as to how lawyers might want to structure e-mail communications with potential clients. Id. We also concluded in Opinion 302 that lawyers may use web sites that offer opportunities to bid competitively on legal projects posted by prospective clients, again provided the lawyers comply with all applicable rules of professional conduct. Id.

[2] In chat rooms, individuals' typed communications appear in "real time"—i.e., as they are being typed—on the computer screens of other participants. On list servs, individuals' communications are sent to a central e-mail address, which then redistributes the communications to all subscribers' e-mail addresses.

[3] One multi-purpose site, for example, offered "real time, one-on-one chats with" a member of its "staff of licensed attorneys," for either $15 for a "single chat of up to 30 minutes," or an annual subscription rate of $30. Another charged $10 for a one-week subscription "that enables you to ask the lawyer a question, one-on-one, and to receive back an immediate response."

[4] One site, for example, displayed a "chat calendar" listing the dates and times of scheduled chat sessions with particular attorneys, who were further identified through links to their law firm web pages which contained further biographical information.

[5] We could find information about the financial terms governing attorneys' participation in such chat rooms at only a few of the web sites we visited. One devoted to immigration law issues explained that attorneys may purchase, for $200 per year, a "Basic Membership," consisting of a listing in an Internet attorney yellow pages, a direct web link from this directory to the attorney's web site, and "eligibil[ity] to join our team of attorneys who conduct live chats"; or, alternatively, for $1,200 per year, a "Premium Membership," providing all the benefits of basic membership plus access to certain case tracking software. Another stated that the lawyers responding to questions in its chat rooms were employees on its staff.

knowing more about your background, I do not know if you are eligible for any work visas. . . . If you know of a specific visa for which you want to apply. Or if you would like to discuss this with me. I offer a 10 minute free telephone consultation. XXX-XXX-XXXX is my direct line.

Analysis

I.

Legal ethics committees in several jurisdictions have turned their attention to lawyers' participation in chat rooms providing legal information, especially as such participation may involve attorney solicitation of clients.[6] As we recently observed in Opinion 302, however, the D.C. rules on client solicitation differ from those of many other jurisdictions in that D.C. Rule 7.1 does not contain a blanket prohibition against in-person solicitation. Instead, we noted, the "touchstone of Rule 7.1 is whether lawyers' communications about themselves or their services are 'false or misleading.' 7.1(a)" Opinion 302 (2000). Essentially the same prescriptions as those we outlined in Opinion 302 apply to attorney communications in chat rooms or similar services, including that the communications must be accurate, lawyers may not imply that they are disinterested in particular matters when they are not, lawyers must disclose any fees they pay in order to participate, and such fees may not be linked to or contingent on the amount of legal fees the lawyer may obtain from clients obtained through online services. See Opinion 302.

Because our rules do not draw a sharp distinction between in-person and written solicitations,[7] we need not decide a question that has been central to many legal ethics committees' opinions—namely, whether chat room communications should be analogized to the types of "in person" solicitation prohibited in their states.[8] Instead, under our Rules we think it best to regard chat room communications as having some qualities that are similar to in-person communications and some that are different. The potentially greater immediacy of "real time" communications in chat rooms, as opposed to other forms of written communications, may give rise to concerns similar to those about "in person solicitation in circumstances or through means that are not conducive to intelligent, rational decisions," D.C. Rule 7.1, comment [5]. Lawyers communicating about their services in chat rooms therefore must take care not to run afoul of D.C. Rule 7.1(b) (2), which prohibits solicitations that involve the "use of undue influence," and D.C. Rule 7.1(b) (3), which prohibits lawyers from seeking employment by a potential client whose "physical or mental condition" makes rational judgment "about the selection of an attorney unlikely."[9] On the other hand, attorney communications with potential clients in chat rooms are probably less potentially coercive than face-to-face communications. As one state bar ethics committee observed, a potential client solicited through a cyberspace communication, even in real time, has the option of simply "not responding."[10]

We reiterate, furthermore, as we emphasized in Opinion 302, that one of the most distinctive characteristics of cyberspace communications—their reach far beyond the bounds of any particular jurisdiction—raises significant issues for practitioners about the applicability of the laws of multiple jurisdictions. Consistent with our mandate, we here consider the applicability of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct only, but we caution readers that other jurisdictions' rules may apply as well.

II.

To our minds, the most difficult questions presented by lawyers' participation in on-line chat rooms in which they answer visitors' legal questions involve the possibility of inadvertent formation of attorney-client relationships and the consequences thereof. We previously provided tentative "best practices" guidance on attorney communications over the Internet to avoid such problems, including the use of prominent "click through" disclaimers. See D.C. Ethics Op. 302. We caution, however, that even the use of a disclaimer may not prevent the formation of attorney-client relationships if the parties' subsequent conduct is inconsistent with the disclaimer.[11] Indeed, a lengthy scholarly examination of various jurisdictions' law on the topic reached the same conclusion.[12] Professor Catherine Lanctot argues that the broad "click through" disclaimers typically used by web sites offering live attorney chat rooms, though helpful in avoiding inadvertent formation of attorney-client relationships, may not prevent the formation of such relationships in cases in which subsequent on-line communications involve a consumer asking for and an attorney providing specific legal advice tailored to the facts of the consumer's particular situation.[13] It thus seems appropriate to expand on our earlier best practices discussion for attorney communications over the Internet to address lawyers' participation in chat rooms.

---

[6] See, e.g., Florida Bar Standing Comm. on Advertising Op. A-00-1 (2000); Mich. State Bar Comm. on Prof. and Judicial Ethics, Op. RI-276 (1996); Utah State Bar Ass'n Ethics Op. 97-10 (1997); West Virginia Ethics Op. 98-03 (1998).

[7] D.C. Rule 7.1 covers all communications concerning a lawyer's services; the D.C. Rules do not include provisions patterned after ABA Model Rules 7.2 and 7.3, which regulate advertising and solicitation, respectively.

[8] See, e.g., Florida Bar Standing Comm. on Advertising Op. A-00-1 (Florida lawyers may not solicit prospective clients through real-time conversations in Internet chat rooms under state's restrictions on in-person solicitation); Mich. State Bar Comm. on Prof. and Judicial Ethics, Op. RI-276 (solicitation of clients through "'real time communications'" in Internet chat rooms violates state's restrictions on in-person and telephone solicitation)

[9] See, e.g., Utah Ethics Op. 97-10 (analogizing chat room communication to in-person communication due to its "direct and confrontational nature"); Michigan State Bar Standing Comm. on Prof. and Judicial Ethics Op. RI-276 (noting "immediacy" of interactive electronic communication).

[10] Arizona State Bar Ass'n Ethics Op. 97-04 (1997) (communications with potential clients in chat rooms should not be deemed a prohibited in-person contact because there is not the same degree of "confrontation and immediacy").

[11] See, e.g., New York City Ethics Op. 1998-2 (1998) (use of a "disclaimer may not necessarily serve to shield Law Firm from a claim that an attorney-client relationship was in fact established by reason of specific on-line communications"); Utah State Bar Ethics Op. 96-12 (1997) ("if legal advice is sought from an attorney, if the advice sought is pertinent to the attorney's profession, and if the attorney gives the advice for which fees will be charged, an attorney-client relationship is created that cannot be disclaimed by the attorney giving the advice.") (footnote and citations omitted). Indeed, a chat room visitor who is misled by a disclaimer purporting to disavow liability for legal advice might even have an argument that the disclaimer was "false and misleading" within the meaning of D.C. Rule 7.1 (a).

[12] See Catherine J. Lanctot, "Attorney-Client Relationships in Cyberspace: The Peril and the Promise," 49 Duke L. J. 147, 149-97 (1999); see also Joan C. Rogers, "Cyberlawyers Must Chart Uncertain Course in World of Online Advice," 16 ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Conduct Special Report 96 (2000) (quoting other legal commentators' similar conclusions that broad disclaimers may not prevent the formation of attorney-client relationships through cyberspace communications).

[13] Lanctot, supra note 12, at 248. In support of this conclusion, Lanctot cites opinions considering lawyers' use of disclaimers in a variety of contexts, including Kansas Bar Ass'n Comm. on Ethics/Advisory Servs., Op. 93-8 (1993) ("A law-

Lawyers' participation in chat rooms may implicate competing ethical values. On the one hand, lawyers' duties to inform the public about the law are well recognized. ABA Model Code EC 2-2 provided that the "legal profession should assist lay persons to recognize legal problems" and that lawyers should therefore "encourage and participate in educational and public relation programs concerning our legal system," and states whose ethics rules are based on the Model Code continue to have such provisions in their ethics codes. See, e.g., N.Y. Code of Prof. Resp. EC 2-2. Although the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct do not contain a provision equivalent to EC 2-2, there is every reason to believe, consistent with the traditions of the profession, that these ethical duties to contribute to making legal information available to the public continue to hold strong here. Cf. D.C. Rule 6.1 comments [1] & [2] (noting that D.C. Rule 6.1 was intended to carry forward long-standing ethical principles in the Code, especially Canon 2).

On the other hand, the ethical impetus that motivates lawyers to help the public become aware of legal problems cannot insulate lawyers from the consequences arising from formation of an attorney-client relationship as the result of providing legal advice. The question of precisely what conduct gives rise to an attorney-client relationship is one of substantive law in the relevant jurisdiction(s). Because the issue under discussion turns on that question, a review of the basic principles concerning the formation of attorney-client relationships is in order here. Most courts agree, for example, that neither a retainer nor a formal agreement is required to establish an attorney-client relationship. See, e.g., Kurtenbach v. TeKippe, 260 N.W.2d 53, 56 (Iowa 1977); see also In re Lieber, 442 A.2d 153 (D.C. 1982) (attorney-client relationship formed where attorney failed to indicate lack of consent to accept court-appointed client after receiving notification of appointment by mail). In Kurtenbach, the court looked to (1) whether the putative client had sought advice from the lawyer, (2) whether the advice sought was within the lawyer's field of competence, and (3) whether the lawyer, either directly or implicitly, agreed to give the requested advice. Kurtenbach, 260 N.W.2d at 56. Many courts look to the reasonable expectations and reliance of the putative client. See, e.g., In re Lieber, 442 A.2d at 156. Under this approach, even casually rendered advice may be found to give rise to an attorney-client relationship where the putative client relies on it. See, e.g., Togstad v. Vesely, Otto, Miller & Keffe, 291 N.W. 2d 686 (Minn. 1980) (attorney-client relationship created where attorney stated that he did not think a prospective client had a cause of action but would discuss it with his partner, did not call client back, and client relied on attorney's assessment and did not continue to seek legal representation).

In light of these general principles, lawyers seeking to avoid formation of attorney-client relationships through chat room conversations would be well advised to avoid providing legal advice in such communications.[14] The relevant distinction is that between legal advice and legal information. Providing legal information involves discussion of legal principles, trends, and considerations—the kind of information one might give in a speech or newspaper article, for example. Providing legal advice, on the other hand, involves offering recommendations tailored to the unique facts of a particular person's circumstances. Thus, in discussing legal information, lawyers should be careful to emphasize that it is intended as general information only, which may or may not be applicable to an individual's specific situation. Legal ethics committees in jurisdictions where EC 2-2 is still in effect have advised precisely this approach. In New York City Ethics Op. 1998-2 (1998), for example, the committee suggested that:

> A lawyer who writes or speaks for the purpose of educating members of the public to recognize their legal problems should carefully refrain from giving or appearing to give a general solution applicable to all apparently similar individual problems since slight changes in fact situations may require a material variance in the applicable advice; otherwise, the public may be misled and misadvised. Talks and writing by lawyers for non-lawyers should caution them not to attempt to solve individual problems upon the basis of the information contained therein.

Likewise, in Ohio Sup. Ct. Bd. of Comm'rs on Grievances and Discipl., Op. 94-13 (1994), the committee concluded that in giving legal seminars, "it would be prudent for the lawyer to advise the attendees that the lawyer's discussion in regard to questions will be general and not intended as individual advice for specific problems," and that "it may be helpful for the attorney to remind the attendees not to divulge confidential information." The committee further warned that, in taking part in radio talk shows, "particular caution is warranted," because the format often invites listeners to ask questions. The lawyer "must be extremely careful not to impart individual advice." (Citations omitted). The fact that lawyers may now be providing the public with legal information through Internet communications rather than more traditional fora such as public lectures or talk shows does not alter this fundamental analysis.

Consistent with that analysis, lawyers wishing to avoid formation of attorney-client relationships through chat room or similar Internet communications should limit themselves to providing legal information, and should not seek to elicit or respond to the specifics of particular individuals' situations. Lawyers could, for example, explain general principles or trends in the law, or lay out the majority and minority viewpoints and/or the range of variation on particular legal issues across jurisdictions, or even describe a particular jurisdiction's law. But lawyers should advise information seekers to obtain legal counsel to determine what law would be applicable to their unique circumstances. Likewise, lawyers participating in chat room exchanges could explain the approaches to certain legal problems lawyers typically consider, but should not purport to advise inquirers as to what to do in their specific situations. Where a communication is lengthy or otherwise might leave room for misunderstanding, lawyers should remind inquirers that the chat room communication is not a substitute for specific legal advice, and that the lawyer is providing general legal information only.

To illustrate, we will use the example we gave above of one chat room conversation we encountered. The lawyer in that case might have been better advised to yer operating a '900' pay-for-information telephone number by which callers are given legal information . . . enters into a lawyer-client relationship with the caller and may not avoid it by disclaimer."); N.J. Sup. Ct. Comm. on Unauthorized Prac., Op. 17 (1994) (attorney cannot avoid malpractice liability in rendering legal advice to client or prospective client through "900-number" service by disclaiming attorney-client relationship). See Lanctot, supra note 12, at 192-93 n. 146.

[14] This is especially true for Internet communications, where giving legal advice might create an attorney-client relationship and thus subject an attorney to malpractice liability in a far distant jurisdiction. See New York City Ethics Op. 1998-2 (1998) (emphasizing need for caution given Internet's multi-jurisdictional reach).

respond to the inquirer's query along the following lines:

> Generally, persons who are in the U.S. on non-expired visa waivers are in status. Such persons, however, may often find it difficult to change status from a visa waiver. They might try to apply for a non-immigrant visa, such as a student visa, but they would probably be required to leave the United States to obtain such a visa. Another possibility some persons in this situation explore is to apply for a non-immigrant work visa. I cannot give you legal advice on your particular situation, but if you would like to discuss your specific case with me, you may call me for a consultation . . .

Such wording makes it more clear that the lawyer is not purporting to give legal advice than did the repeated "you should . . ." statements contained in the attorney's response quoted earlier in this opinion.

III.

The last question we address concerns the consequences under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct of formation of an attorney-client relationship through an attorney's participation in a chat room or similar Internet legal information service. In our view, if an attorney-client relationship is formed through cyberspace communications in which an inquirer seeks, and a lawyer provides, specific legal advice, that relationship brings to bear all of the responsibilities and benefits defined under the D.C. Rules governing attorney-client relationships, even though the lawyer has not "met" the client in the conventional sense and may not even know the client's identity.[15] Although D.C. Rule 1.2(c) permits a lawyer to limit "the objectives of the representation if the client consents after consultation," this rule further provides that any such agreement concerning the scope of representation "must accord with the Rules of Professional Conduct and other law." D.C. Rule 1.2 (c) & comment [5]. Comment [5] continues, "the client may not be asked to agree to representations so limited in scope as to violate Rule 1.1." In other words, while it is permissible for an attorney and client to agree to a representation that is limited in scope (such as in being of short duration or for the purpose of giving legal advice on one discrete legal problem), it is not permissible to further limit the scope of such a representation to avoid the application of rules requiring competence and the like. Nor may the lawyer restrict his or her obligations with respect to such matters as conflicts or confidentiality.[16]

Thus, before undertaking the kind of communication that would give rise to an attorney-client relationship as determined by applicable substantive law, the attorney must, in our view, ensure that the formation of that relationship does not give rise to impermissible conflicts under D.C. Rules 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, and 1.11. The attorney must also safeguard the secrets and confidences of that client under Rule 1.6.[17] This may be true even if an attorney-client relationship has not formed but the lawyer is in a situation in which he or she properly should regard an advice seeker as a prospective client, as might be especially likely to arise in settings in which lawyers are permitted to solicit or follow up with chat room visitors. See D.C. Rule 1.10(a) comments [7]-[12]; see generally Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 15(1)(a) (2000) (lawyer owes duties to prospective clients to protect confidential information). Accordingly, even if a communication begins as a public communication in a chat room or similar exchange service, the attorney may be required at some point to reserve his or her communications for the eyes of a particular advice seeker only. And the attorney must always take care in cyberspace, as in face-to-face communications, that information he or she receives through on-line communications does not end up creating conflict of interest problems with respect to existing clients.[18] Likewise, the attorney must ensure that such requirements as that of competence under D.C. Rule 1.1, diligence and zeal under Rule 1.3, and adequate communication under Rule 1.4 are met.

Advocates of the provision of low-cost legal advice through on-line chat rooms and similar innovative services make the important point that these services offer great potential for providing low-cost legal services to low and moderate income persons. See generally "Conference on the Delivery of Legal Services to Low-Income Persons: Professional and Ethical Issues," 67 Fordham L. Rev. 1751 (1999); "Symposium: Lawyering for the Middle Class," 70 Fordham L. Rev. 623 (2001) (discussing need for innovation in legal services delivery mechanisms for both low and middle income clients). We do not dispute this observation or the spirit of concern and experimentation with which it is made. Indeed, many believe that devising better, lower cost ways of providing quality legal services to low and moderate income populations is one of the legal profession's most pressing problems. A number of proposals are being considered along these lines, including the possibility of allowing limited-purpose attorney-client relationships that might "unbundle" or disaggregate some of the responsibilities and duties traditionally required of lawyers. In its proposed Model Rule of Professional Conduct 1.2, for example, the ABA Ethics 2000 Commission stated that "a lawyer may limit the scope of the representation if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances,"[19] a change

[15] This conclusion is consistent with that of another state bar ethics committee that has considered the issue. See Ill. State Bar Ass'n Comm. on Prof. Conduct 96-10 (1997) ("lawyers participating in chat groups or other on-line services that could involve offering personalized legal advice to anyone who happens to be connected to the service should be mindful that the recipients of such advi[c]e are the lawyer's clients, with the benefits and burdens of that relationship."); see also Ohio Sup. Ct. Bd. of Comm'r on Grievances and Discipl., Op. 99-9 (1999) (attorneys who answer legal questions for a fee posed by visitors to firm's web site subject to same constraints that govern other methods of delivering legal services, including requirements of conflicts checks, competence, and confidentiality).

[16] See Ill. State Bar Ass'n Comm. on Prof. Conduct 96-10 (following its prior opinion cautioning that attorneys who gave legal advice through a telephone service could easily run afoul of the conflict of interest provisions of Rules 1.7 and 1.9, to conclude that "lawyers participating in similar activity over the Internet would be subject to the same concerns"); see also Arizona State Bar Ethics Ass'n Op. 97-04 (concluding that lawyers should not answer specific questions or give fact-specific advice in chat rooms because they would be unable to screen for potential conflicts and would risk confidentiality problems).

[17] A client may waive confidentiality under D.C. Rule 1.6, but only after "full disclosure" and "consent." D.C. Rule 1.6(d)(1). "[C]onsent" requires uncoerced assent following "consultation with the lawyer regarding the matter in question," and "consultation" requires "communication of information reasonably sufficient to permit the client to appreciate the significance of the matter in question" (D.C. Rules "Terminology" [2] & [3])—requirements that may not be met in the context of assent through a "click through" disclaimer. As we noted in Opinion 309, waivers of confidentiality may be especially problematic and thus "require particular scrutiny and may be invalid even when granted by sophisticated clients" with independent counsel. Op. 309 n. 10.

[18] The best way of avoiding conflict problems, of course, would be to refrain from creation of an attorney-client relationship in the first place. Lawyers might also ask that chat room participants abstain from providing confidential information, as already discussed. These steps would not necessarily eliminate all conflicts problems, however, which again points to the need to eschew the formation of attorney-client relationships.

[19] Proposed comment [7] explains that "reasonable under the circumstances" means that "[i]f, the Commission's reporter explains is intended in part "to provide a framework within which lawyers may expand access to legal services by providing limited but nonetheless valuable legal service to low or moderate-income persons who otherwise would be unable to obtain counsel."

Reforms that would alter the traditional duties and obligations lawyers owe clients, however, are not encompassed within the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct currently in effect. Such reforms will have to await the attention of the D.C. Court of Appeals. As our rules currently stand, the full panoply of ethical considerations, including conflict avoidance, confidentiality, competence and the like, attach to all attorney-client relationships, including those that may be formed inadvertently through attorney communications with persons seeking legal information over the Internet.

Adopted: July 2002
Published: September 2002

Opinion No. 317

Repudiation of Conflict of Interest Waivers

• If a client's waiver of his lawyer's conflict of interest has been relied upon by another client or the lawyer, the client's subsequent change of heart will not restore those involved to the status quo ante. Preferably, the consequences of any change of heart should be addressed when the waiver is granted. Absent such agreement, the consequences largely depend on whether another party (i.e., another client or the lawyer) has relied detrimentally upon the waiver. The limited exception for certain conflicts arising in the midst of a matter may be available to permit continuing representation of both clients. If not, and if there has been detrimental reliance by another client or the lawyer, the lawyer ordinarily should continue representing the other client. Absent such reliance, the parties normally will be restored to the status quo and the lawyer should conduct the conflicts analysis that would have been required when the waiver was secured.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
- Rule 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation)

Inquiry

The committee has been asked whether a client who waives a conflict of interest[1] on the part of his lawyer may later repudiate that waiver and, if so, the consequences of such an action.[2] The inquiring law firm, believing that with appropriate waivers, it could represent two bidders in a federal agency's licensing auction,[3] sought such waivers. Initially, Client A consented but Client B did not. "After considering this over the weekend," however, Client B's co-owner, who was a lawyer with experience practicing before the agency, agreed to "waive the conflict and if [the inquiring law firm] wants to represent [Client A] in the auction, it can do so without our objection." The law firm thereupon commenced the representations. More than two months later, Client B purported to withdraw its consent, stating that its waiver had been "sent in the heat of the moment and does not represent [Client B's] best interests."

Discussion

Permitting clients to waive conflicts of interest on the part of their lawyers is an alternative to automatic disqualification that has been recognized for a century. See American Bar Association, Opinions on Professional Ethics 22 (1967) (text of Canon 6 of the Canons of Ethics, adopted in 1908). The District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules" or "Rules") prohibit a waiver that would let a lawyer[4] take adverse positions (i.e., represent differing interests) in the same matter.[5] D.C. Rule 1.7(a) & comments [1]-[6]. The Rules do permit, however, waivers of such other conflicts of interest as those in which a lawyer opposes her own client in a matter where that client is represented by a different law firm, see D.C. Rule 1.7(b)(1), and those in which a lawyer's personal interests, or her responsibilities to another client, might affect adversely the representation, see D.C. Rule 1.7(b)(2)-(4).[6] In some circumstances a waiver may be granted even before a conflict arises. D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 309 (2001). Finally, a conflict involving a former client, which arises only if the new matter is the same as or substantially related to the earlier one, also may be waived. D.C. Rule 1.9 & comment [3].

A waiver is sufficient if there has been "full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible consequences of [the] representation." D.C. Rule 1.7(c). The client's consent must be uncoerced and must follow "consultation"—which is "communication of information reasonably for example, a client's objective is limited to securing general information about the law the client needs in order to handle a common and typically uncomplicated legal problem, the lawyer and client may agree that the lawyer's services will be limited to a brief telephone consultation. Such a limitation, however, would not be reasonable if the time allotted was not sufficient to yield advice upon which the client could rely. Although an agreement for a limited representation does not exempt a lawyer from the duty to provide competent representation, the limitation is a factor to be considered when determining the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation. See Rule 1.1."

The Ethics 2000 Commission's proposed approach resembles Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 19 (2000), which likewise permits lawyers to limit the duties they would owe a client under terms "reasonable under the circumstances." But, the Restatement, too, would set a "floor" for the competence required, using the following illustration that might be apropos to some chat room exchanges:

> 3. Lawyer offers to provide tax-law advice for an hourly fee lower than most tax lawyers charge. Lawyer has little knowledge of tax law and asks Lawyer's occasional tax clients to agree to waive the requirement of reasonable competence. Such a waiver is invalid, even if clients benefit to some extent from the low price and consent freely and on the basis of adequate information.

[1] This opinion does not address waivers of confidentiality, other than to note that they cannot be implied from waivers of conflicts of interest. See D.C. Ethics Op. 309, at n. 10 (2001).

[2] This inquiry initially was addressed by an informal letter to the inquirer from the Acting Chair of the committee. This opinion is consistent with that letter.

[3] We have accepted for purposes of this opinion the inquiring firm's assertion that the conflict was one under Rule 1.7(b) of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct and hence waiveable. Were the situation one in which the same firm was representing the adverse interests of two clients in the same matter, the conflict would be one under Rule 1.7(a) and hence not waiveable.

[4] The disqualification of a single lawyer under Rule 1.7 is imputed to all the lawyers in that individual's firm. D.C. Rule 1.10(a); D.C. Ethics Op. 279 (1998). "Firm" includes a private firm, "lawyers employed in the legal department of a corporation or other organization, and lawyers employed in a legal services organization." D.C. Rules, Terminology, ¶ [4].

[5] The Rules define "matter" broadly as "any . . . representation." D.C. Rules, Terminology, ¶ [8].

[6] Paragraphs (2) through (4) of Rule 1.7(b) sometimes are referred to as "punch-pulling" rules because they address the concern that a lawyer might "pull her punches" (i.e., be less assertive, zealous or diligent) on behalf of one client out of concern for the interests of some other client or of the lawyer herself.

sufficient to permit the client to appreciate the significance of the matter in question." See D.C. Rules, Terminology, ¶¶ [2] (defining "consent"), [3] (defining "consultation"). Moreover, "'full disclosure' includes a clear explanation of the differing interests involved . . . and the advantages of seeking independent legal advice. It also requires a detailed explanation of the risks and disadvantages . . . entailed in the [waiver]." In re James, 452 A.2d 163, 167 (D.C. 1982) (interpreting former D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility). In sum, "the Rules require that a client who is asked to waive an actual or potential conflict have an adequate appreciation of what protection she is giving up," and more explanation may be required where the client is unsophisticated than otherwise. D.C. Ethics Op. 309 (2001).[7]

Given these restrictions and preconditions for conflict waivers, what happens when a client who has granted a waiver changes his mind? The problem, of course, is that the other clients involved, not to mention the lawyer, may have acted in good faith reliance upon the waiver. This is particularly likely if some time has elapsed between the grant of the waiver and its revocation. The short answer is that while nothing can prevent a waiving client from later changing its mind, such an action might not compel the lawyer to withdraw from representing the other affected client.

The issue is not addressed expressly by the D.C. Rules. Our Court of Appeals has said that a consent to dual representation, given when there were no actual or foreseen conflicts among the parties, may be subject to revocation when a conflict arises, Griva v. Davison, 637 A.2d 830, 846 (D.C. 1994), but has gone no farther than that. As outlined below, however, the issue has been addressed elsewhere—in the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, the recent revision of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct ("Model Rules") and, at least obliquely, in reported decisions from several other jurisdictions.

Although a waiver can be viewed as a contract between lawyer and client, the fiduciary nature of their relationship counsels against treating the question merely as one of contract law. See Barr v. Day, 879 P.2d 912, 917-18 (Wash. 1994) (noting "special nature of the attorney-client relationship"); Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers ("Restatement"), at p. 244 (2000) ("special relationship between lawyers and clients"). After all, a client can discharge his lawyer at any time, with or without cause, D.C. Rule 1.16(a)(3) & comment [4]; Tinney v. Duckett, 141 A.2d 192, 193 (D.C. 1958); Barr, 879 P. 2d at 917-18, and regardless of any contrary contract between them, Restatement (Second) of Agency, § 118 & comment b (1958); ABA Informal Op. 1397 (1977); Warren A. Seavey, Law of Agency 87 (1964) (citing Francis v. Bartlett, 121 So. 2d 18 (La. App. 1960)). The Restatement and the Model Rules would accord the client the same rights where revocation of waivers is concerned, at least absent special circumstances. Restatement § 122, comment f (positing an absolute right to revoke a waiver at any time); Model Rule 1.7, comment [21] (adopted Feb. 2002) (same); see Tinney, 141 A.2d at 193.

But while a client can discharge his lawyer at any time, he cannot thereby escape his existing obligations to her (e.g., payment for services rendered prior to discharge). See, e.g., D.C. Rule 1.16, comment [4].[8] By the same token, a change of heart about a conflict waiver also may lead to adverse consequences for the repudiating client. See Crabtree v. Academy Life Ins. Co., 878 F. Supp. 727, 731 (E.D. Pa. 1995) (applying Pa. law); Restatement (Second) of Agency, § 118, comments b and c (1958).

The possibility of a change of heart, like other contingencies, typically can be addressed best by providing for it in advance. This can be done in the engagement letter, the communication in which the waiver is granted, or some other communication (preferably written[9]) between lawyer and client. Such an agreement can address whether a client that changes its mind will have a right to continued representation by the lawyer and, if the lawyer is permitted to withdraw from representation of that client, whether the lawyer may continue representing the other clients who are involved.

Absent advance arrangements, however, what consequences (if any) should ensue when a client changes its mind about a previously granted conflict waiver? Typically, neither the grant nor the effect of a conflict waiver is unilateral. Other clients and the lawyer may have been affected by the waiver and often will have acted in reliance upon it.

We disagree to some extent with the position of the Restatement. As noted above, the Restatement says that a waiver can be revoked at any time but that adverse consequences to the revoking client may ensue. Restatement § 122, comment f. The Restatement posits a two-step inquiry: First, is the revocation "justified," for example by a material change in expectations between the time the waiver is granted and the time of revocation, disloyalty of the lawyer to the revoking client, or violation by the other client of a joint representation arrangement. Id. If revocation is justified, the lawyer must withdraw from representing the other client, in which case the second issue need not be addressed. Id. Second, if the revocation is unjustified, would "material detriment to the [non-revoking] client or lawyer . . . result" from the lawyer's withdrawal? Id. (citing "reasonable expectations" of lawyer and non-revoking client). The Restatement's examples of material detriment are situations where substantial time, money, and effort have been invested in the representation, where confidential information has been disclosed to the lawyer by the non-revoking client and a trusting relationship has developed between the two, and where the lawyer or non-revoking client has elected to forgo other opportunities in reliance upon the consent. Id.

We also disagree somewhat with the Model Rules, whose view is that (1) waivers always are revocable and (2) whether the lawyer can withdraw from representing the revoking client and continue representing the other client "depends on the circumstances, including the nature of the conflict, whether the client revoked consent because of a material change in circumstances, the reasonable expectations of the other client and whether material detriment to the other clients or the lawyer would result." Model Rule 1.7, comment [21] (adopted Feb. 2002).

Relevant judicial decisions from other jurisdictions typically have arisen in the context of disqualification motions. In [7] Where the waiving client has other counsel (in-house or outside) available, there is a strong presumption that its conflicts waiver is informed and sufficient. See ABA Model Rule 1.0, comment [6] (adopted Feb. 2002). In some situations, this may counsel a lawyer requesting a waiver to suggest or recommend that her client engage in such consultation.

[8] This is not to suggest, of course, that client cannot dispute the nature and extent, if any, of such obligations.

[9] We recommend that conflict waivers, the consequences of a change of heart about such a waiver, and indeed, all the substantive elements of a lawyer's engagement be in writing. See, e.g., D.C. Rule 1.7, comment [20] (recommending that conflict disclosures be written); D.C. Ethics Op. 248 n. 7 (1995) (encouraging that conflict waivers be in writing). Reducing the parties' understandings to writing avoids the uncertainty inherent in relying upon individuals' recollections—sometimes years after the fact—of what transpired in an oral exchange or whether such an exchange even occurred.

effect, a motion to disqualify a firm to whom the movant previously has granted a conflict waiver constitutes a client's attempt to revoke the waiver. See Tinney, 141 A.2d at 193 (principal's action inconsistent with agent's authority revokes that authority). A 1995 California decision examined whether a firm that had jointly represented an individual and his employer in a matter, but had withdrawn from representing the employee when his dishonesty in the matter came to light, could pursue the employer's ensuing fraud claim against the employee. Zador Corp., N.V. v. Kwan, 37 Cal. Rptr. 2d 754 (App. 1995). The Court of Appeals permitted the law firm to continue representing the employer because the former employee/client had stated, while a client and again at the time the firm withdrew from representing him, that he understood and agreed to the detailed waiver presented to him. Id. at 763-64. The court—in effect holding that the waiver bound the individual—let the representation of the employer continue because of the detailed nature of the waiver and the fact that it had been discussed repeatedly with the waiving employee. Id. at 763. The court also noted that more than three years had passed between the time the employee/client and the law firm parted company and the time he sought, in effect, to revoke his waiver by seeking the firm's disqualification. Id. at 763-64. Prejudice due to delay not only is relevant but may justify denial of disqualification. Id. at 764; see Elliott v. McFarland Unified School Dist., 165 Cal. App. 3d 562 (App. 1985) (noting delay in bringing disqualification motion as partial grounds for its denial).[10]

A leading Ninth Circuit decision states expressly that revocation of consent does not preclude continuing representation of the other client where the law firm and other client had relied upon the waiver. Unified Sewerage Agency v. Jelco, Inc., 646 F.2d 1339, 1346 n. 6 (9th Cir. 1981); accord Fisons Corp. v. Atochem N. Am., Inc., 1990 WL 180551, *6 n. 6 (S.D.N.Y. 1990). Another decision, while not expressly mentioning reliance, rests heavily, in denying the disqualification motion, on the law firm's long and continuous relationship with the non-revoking client and the revoking client's knowledge of that relationship before engaging the law firm. Interstate Properties v. Pyramid Co. of Utica, 547 F. Supp. 178 (S.D.N.Y. 1982). Several decisions permitting continued representation of the other client have relied in part upon the fact that independent counsel for the waiving client reviewed the waiver when it was granted. Jelco, 646 F.2d at 1342-43; Fisons, 1990 WL 180551, at *1-*2.

As noted above, our Court of Appeals has hinted in dictum that a waiver may be revocable where circumstances have changed beyond the contemplation of the waiving client at the time the waiver was granted. Griva, 637 A.2d at 846. In that case, however, the client arguably had not waived a current or even a potential conflict. Rather, she was one of a three-person family partnership who had permitted the lawyer for the partnership also to represent the two other partners as individuals. Id. at 833-34. A conflict, indicated the court, was not within the contemplation of that waiver. Id. at 846. Moreover, even were the permission in that case deemed to be an advance conflict waiver, it's unclear whether the court viewed the waiver as satisfying the disclosure, consultation and consent requirements of Rule 1.7(c).

We do not decide the somewhat metaphysical question of whether a conflict waiver is irrevocable or is revocable but with possible adverse consequences for the revoking client. What does require resolution here is this: When the waiving client's change of heart is manifested to the lawyer, what rules govern whether the lawyer may (or, for that matter, must) withdraw from representing one or both of the clients whose adversity was the reason for the waiver?

Several provisions of D.C. Rule 1.16 appear potentially relevant. First, the change of heart properly might be construed, at least in some circumstances, as a discharge of the lawyer by the revoking client. See, e.g., Artromick Int'l, Inc. v. Drustar, Inc., 134 F.R.D. 226 (S.D. Ohio 1991) (client conduct inconsistent with attorney-client relationship constitutes discharge); Belli v. Shaw, 657 P.2d 315, 319 (Wash. 1983) (client's action inconsistent with contract with lawyer constituted discharge of lawyer); see also Tinney, 141 A.2d at 193 (principal's action inconsistent with agent's authority revokes that authority); Maddox v. Burlingame, 517 N.W.2d 816, 818 (Mich. App. 1994) (engagement of replacement counsel "effectively terminates the attorney-client relationship"); Costello v. Bruskin, 395 N.Y.S.2d 116 (App. 1977) (commencement of malpractice action against lawyer constitutes notice of termination). A lawyer discharged by a client not only may, but must, withdraw. D.C. Rule 1.16(a)(3).

Even if the client's action doesn't constitute discharge of the lawyer by the revoking client, withdrawal is required where continuing the representation will result in a violation of the Rules. D.C. Rule 1.16(a)(1); Restatement § 32(2)(a) & comment f. Acting in an unwaived conflict situation will violate Rule 1.7 and hence requires withdrawal from at least one of the conflicting representations. Further, withdrawal is permissible if it will not have a "material adverse effect on the interests of the client." D.C. Rule 1.16(b). Where, for example, the lawyer has no current projects for a client, there is a strong presumption that this criterion is satisfied, even if the client reasonably believes that it has a continuing attorney-client relationship with the lawyer. D.C. Ethics Op. 272 (1997).[11]

Third, withdrawal is permitted, even where prejudice to the client might result, where after reasonable warning, a "client fails substantially to fulfill an obligation to the lawyer regarding the lawyer's services." D.C. Rule 1.16(b)(3). Fourth, the lawyer may withdraw where "obdurate or vexatious conduct on the part of the client has rendered the representation unreasonably difficult." D.C. Rule 1.16(b)(4); see Sobol v. District Court of Arapahoe County, 619 P.2d 765, 767-68 (Colo. 1980) (finding that "mutual antagonism . . . between lawyers and client was so intense that it rendered it unreasonably difficult for [lawyers] to carry out their employment effectively"); McGuire v. Wilson, 735 F. Supp. 83 (S.D.N.Y. 1990) (same). Finally, if the matter is before a tribunal, the tribunal might conclude that the lawyer has "other good cause" for withdrawal.[12] D.C. Rule. 1.16(b)(5); see In re Admonition Issued in Panel File No. 94-24, 533 N.W.2d 852 (Minn. 1995) (lawyer reasonably believed that client lacked confidence in lawyer's representation); In re Anonymous Member of the Bar, 379 S.E.2d 723 (S.C. 1989) (serious deterioration of attorney-client relationship, evidenced by client's filing of grievance against lawyer); Kolomick v. Kolomick, 518 N.Y.S.2d 413 (App. 1987) (breakdown of attorney-client relationship).

What process should be followed, then, when a current client changes its mind about a previously granted waiver of his lawyer's conflict of interest? First, the Rule on "thrust-upon" conflicts may permit the lawyer to continue both representations, but only if the revival of the conflict (1) was not reasonably foreseeable (which likely will be so where a waiver was granted)[13] and (2) doesn't involve a "punch pulling"[14] situation. See D.C. Rule 1.7(d); D.C. Ethics Op. 292 (1999). If this option is unavailable, we see the applicable standard as one that blends the approaches of the Restatement, the Model Rules, and the Jelco decision, and that takes into account the permissibility, see D.C. Ethics Op. 309 (2001), of advance waivers of conflicts.

[10] Zador properly is viewed as a case involving the waiver of a current, rather than a prospective, conflict. See D.C. Ethics Op. 309 n. 3 (2001).

[11] Opinion 272 thus accords a narrow construction to the so-called hot potato doctrine. See D.C. Ethics Op. 272 (1997).

[12] "If the matter is not pending in court, a lawyer will not have 'other good cause for withdrawal' unless the lawyer is acting in good faith and the circumstances are exceptional enough to outweigh the material adverse effect on the interests of the client that withdrawal will cause." D.C. Rule 1.16, comment [9].

In the situation that occasioned this inquiry, the client who repudiated his waiver was a lawyer with experience practicing before the agency where the representations were pending. Hence we assume that the waiver satisfied the requirements of Rule 1.7(c).

The principal issue, then, is reliance. Some examples are offered by the Restatement—the investment of substantial time, money and effort in the representation of the other affected client, the disclosure of confidential information to the lawyer by the other client, the development of a relationship of trust between the lawyer and the other client, and the election of the lawyer or the other client to forgo other opportunities in reliance upon the consent. Restatement § 122, comment f. We note in respect of the last example that the lawyer's acceptance of the client who later reconsiders its waiver effectively may have precluded the lawyer from accepting future representations of clients, or categories of clients, normally adverse to that client. This is because the waiver may permit such other representations in circumstances subject to Rule 1.7(b) but it won't allow them in circumstances subject to Rule 1.7(a). In the case of an advance waiver, the lawyer's acceptance of the waiving client and commencement of that representation ordinarily will be sufficient to constitute reliance. Similarly, the lawyer's service to a waiving former client, see D.C. Rule 1.9 & comment [3], normally should constitute reliance sufficient to estop that party from changing its mind about its waiver.

If there has been detrimental reliance by the other client or the lawyer, the lawyer ordinarily should continue representing the other client. Whether the lawyer then may, or must, withdraw from representing the client that has changed its mind is governed by Rules 1.7, 1.9 and 1.16.[15] As discussed above, possible bases for such a withdrawal may be that the repudiation of the waiver effectively has discharged the lawyer, see D.C. Rule 1.16(a)(3) (mandatory withdrawal), continuing both representations will cause the lawyer to violate the conflict of interests prohibition of the Rules, see D.C. Rules 1.7, 1.9; D.C. Rule 1.16(a)(1) (mandatory withdrawal), withdrawal can be accomplished without prejudice to the repudiating client (if that indeed is the case), see D.C. Rule 1.16(b) (permissive withdrawal); D.C. Ethics Op. 272 (1997) (same), the repudiation constitutes failure "to fulfill an obligation to the lawyer regarding the lawyer's services," D.C. Rule 1.16(b)(3) (same), "obdurate or vexatious conduct on the part of the client has rendered the representation unreasonably difficult," D.C. Rule 1.16(b)(4) (same), and a tribunal has found "other good cause" for withdrawal, D.C. Rule 1.16(b)(5) (same). See generally Restatement § 132, comment j (permitting withdrawal where conflict arises due to action of client, rather than of lawyer). Of course, if the matter is a proceeding before a tribunal, consent of the tribunal may be a prerequisite for withdrawal. See D.C. Rule 1.16(c).[16]

If there has been no detrimental reliance by the other client or the lawyer, the lawyer and both clients in effect are restored to their positions immediately prior to the grant of the waiver. Given that the lawyer's acceptance of, and beginning work for, the other client (and in many cases, the repudiating client as well) typically will constitute reliance, cases in this category presumably will be rare, particularly where more than a brief period has elapsed since the waiver was granted. Should such a situation nevertheless arise, the lawyer must perform the same analysis that would have been required had the waiver been refused initially. Assuming that withdrawal from representation of one client (or both, for that matter) is required, the most likely basis will be that continuing the representation will result in a violation of the Rules' prohibition on conflicts of interest. See D.C. Rule 1.16(a)(1).

As in all matters involving client relationships, the lawyer should apply a measure of prudence to her actions. For example, that the Rules may permit a lawyer to continue the representation of both parties does not mean that the lawyer should do so if the interests of the parties or common sense dictate otherwise. If the lawyer does withdraw from one or both representations, she must protect her former clients' interests, see D.C. Rule 1.16(d) & comment [10], and may not disclose or use the former clients' secrets or confidences other than as prescribed by applicable law, see D.C. Rule 1.6.

Finally, we reiterate that an advance agreement can avoid many, if not most, uncertainties surrounding repudiation of a conflict waiver. Such an agreement could specify, for example, the effect of repudiation upon such aspects of the matter as the lawyer's right to continue representing the other clients.[17]

Inquiry No. 01-6-14
Adopted: November 19, 2002
Published: November 2002

Opinion No. 318

Disclosure of Privileged Material by Third Party

• When counsel in an adversary proceeding receives a privileged document from a client or other person that may have been stolen or taken without authorization from an opposing party, Rule 1.15(b) requires the receiving counsel to [13] We do not believe that providing in advance for the consequences of the client's change of heart means that such an action was reasonably foreseeable, particularly where the lawyer routinely makes such provision in her engagement letters or otherwise.

[14] See supra note 6.

[15] This assumes that the safe harbor provision of Rule 1.7(d) is unavailable. If Rule 1.7(d) is available, the lawyer may continue representing both clients in their respective matters. As noted in footnote 13 above, the fact that the lawyer has made advance provision for the consequences of a change of heart does not mean that change was "reasonably foreseeable" within the meaning of Rule 1.7(d).

[16] If the tribunal orders that representation of the repudiating client continue, the lawyer may be able to continue representing both clients, see D.C. Rule 1.16(c); In re Lathen, 654 P.2d 1110 (Ore. 1982) (finding violation of lawyer-witness rule but declining to impose discipline where trial judge ordered respondent to continue as defense counsel), but otherwise may be required to withdraw from representing the other affected client.

[17] For example, an agreement could state as follows: "You have the right to repudiate this waiver should you later decide that it is no longer in your interest. Should the conflict addressed by the waiver be in existence or contemplated at that time, however, and should we or the other client(s) involved have acted in reliance on the waiver, we will have the right—and possibly the duty, under the applicable rules of professional conduct—to withdraw from representing you and (if permitted by such rules) to continue representing the other involved client(s) even though the other representation may be adverse to you."

refrain from reviewing and using the document if: 1) its privileged status is readily apparent on its face; 2) receiving counsel knows that the document came from someone who was not authorized to disclose it; and 3) receiving counsel does not have a reasonable basis to conclude that the opposing party waived the attorney-client privilege with respect to such document. Receiving counsel may violate the provisions of Rule 8.4(c) by reviewing and using the document in an adversary proceeding under such circumstances and should either return the document to opposing counsel or make inquiry of opposing counsel about its status prior to determining what course of action to take.

Receiving counsel would not violate Rules 1.15(b) and 8.4(c) by reviewing and using the document whose source is unknown if: 1) its privileged status is not readily apparent on its face, or if privileged, receiving counsel has a reasonable basis to conclude that the privilege has been waived; and 2) receiving counsel did not know that the document came from someone who was not authorized to disclose it. Rule 1.3(a)'s emphasis on zealous representation may provide support for receiving counsel to review and use the document in such a situation. The Committee takes no position with reference to the question whether review and use of documents that are confidential but non-privileged would violate Rules 1.15(b) and 8.4(c) because it is outside the scope of the inquiry.

Counsel who created the opportunity for the disclosure or was otherwise responsible for maintaining the confidentiality of the document may violate Rules 1.1(a) and (b) and 1.6(a) and (e) by failing to exercise reasonable care to prevent the unauthorized disclosure of the client's confidences and secrets.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.1(a) and (b) (Competence)
- Rule 1.3(a) (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.6(a) and (e) (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.15(b) (Safekeeping Property)
- Rule 8.4(c) (Dishonesty, Fraud, Deceit, or Misrepresentation)

Inquiry

The inquirer, inside corporate counsel for an entity involved in a contested administrative proceeding, states that a temporary employee of the entity obtained a copy of an attorney-client privileged document containing client confidences and secrets either by theft or without authorization and disclosed it to the opposing party in the proceeding. The actual manner in which the temporary employee gained access to the document is not known. The document was not marked "attorney-client privileged," "attorney work product" or "confidential," but the information contained at the top of the first page of the six page document makes it clear that the document was from the entity's inside counsel, was sent to members of its management team, and addressed a number of legal questions and concerns. Some of the legal analysis in the document was pertinent to the dispute that was the subject of the administrative proceeding.

After receiving the document, the opposing party gave it to its litigation counsel, who reviewed the document and then used it as part of a filing with the administrative tribunal without first contacting opposing counsel. It is not known whether the receiving counsel knew the source of the document or the manner in which his client received it. When the inquirer learned of the pleading, he challenged the admissibility of the document on grounds that it was privileged and that the privilege was not waived. Receiving counsel filed an opposition, asserting that the document was admissible because it was relevant to an issue in the proceedings, had not been marked "confidential," and had been "leaked" by a temporary employee to his client. The dispute over the admissibility of the document was never resolved in the administrative proceeding because the matter was settled, but the inquirer has asked for our opinion regarding the ethical implications of its submission to the tribunal.

Discussion

In 1995, this Committee adopted Opinion No. 256, which determined that a receiving lawyer did not violate the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct by reviewing privileged documents inadvertently delivered by opposing counsel during discovery so long as receiving counsel was unaware of the inadvertent disclosure prior to the time the documents were examined. The Committee has now been asked to review a related issue: Does receiving counsel violate the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct by reviewing and using what may be a privileged document in an adversary proceeding that receiving counsel's client or other person obtained from a third party who may have stolen the document or taken it without authorization?

This is a matter of some importance because, as Judge Royce Lamberth noted in Wichita Land & Cattle vs. American Federal Bank, 148 F.R.D. 456, 458-59 (D.D.C. 1992), efforts are more commonly being used to "surreptitiously gain access to confidential communications." Despite some obvious differences from, situations involving inadvertent disclosures, the Committee finds that the conclusions reached in Opinion No. 256, with some modifications, apply to this inquiry as well.

The ethics rules are silent on the review and use of privileged materials which may have been stolen or otherwise acquired without permission from their rightful owners by third parties. In the absence of precise direction from the rules, the Committee must begin its analysis by looking for guiding principles that will help shape the ways in which the ethics rules are interpreted. The guiding principles most pertinent to our problem relate to the primacy given in the ethics rules to confidentiality, zeal, and fair dealing with opposing counsel.

To begin with, the need to protect the confidentiality of the attorney-client relationship permeates the ethics rules. As noted in Comment [4] to Rule 1.6: "A fundamental principle in the client-lawyer relationship is that the lawyer holds inviolate the client's secrets and confidences." Comment [4] further reflects that knowing that this confidential relationship exists encourages a client "to communicate fully and frankly with the lawyer even as to embarrassing or legally damaging subject matter." Maintaining confidentiality is so essential that a lawyer is required to exercise reasonable care to prevent others with whom the lawyer works from disclosing or using a client's confidences or secrets. Rule 1.6(e). A lawyer is arguably also obliged to protect client confidentiality under his or her broader mandate to "serve a client with skill and care." See Rule 1.1(b). There clearly is a tension between these ethical and evidentiary principles and the notion that in their efforts to seek the truth, tribunals should, for the most part, have unfettered access to relevant evidence. See Wichita Land & Cattle, 148 F.R.D. at 462.

While fidelity to the principle of protecting client confidentiality is a basic tenet of the rules, so is the notion that in the exercise of professional judgment, a lawyer should act in a manner consistent with the best interests of the client. Rule 1.3(a), Comment [5]. The rules require that a lawyer represent a client zealously within the bounds of the law. Rule

1.3(a). This may have implications for a lawyer who gains access to a document that can beneficially be used on a client's behalf in an adversary proceeding without first being aware that it is privileged. But such an attorney is also constrained by ethical principles of fair dealing. Rule 1.15(b), for example, requires a lawyer who receives property in which third persons have an interest to notify these persons and promptly deliver the property to them. This is consistent with commentary to Rule 1.3 that the duty of a lawyer to represent a client wall zeal "does not militate against the concurrent obligation to treat with consideration all persons involved in the legal process and to avoid the infliction of needless harm." Rule 1.3, Comment (6). A lawyer who reviews and uses material that he knows is privileged may be engaging in a dishonest act in violation of Rule 8.4(c). See D.C. Ethics Opinion 256 n.8.

In its assessment of the inadvertent disclosure of privileged material to opposing counsel, the Committee previously concluded that receiving lawyers engage in no ethical violation by retaining and using those materials if they review them in good faith before the inadvertence of the disclosure is brought to their attention. D.C. Ethics Op. 256. Under that Opinion, however, receiving lawyers must return privileged documents without reviewing them if they learn about their privileged nature before reviewing the documents. Opinion 256 further reflects that lawyers who make the inadvertent disclosures may violate Rule 1.1 if they do so by failing to exercise diligence and care during a representation. The conclusions reached in Opinion 256 were largely consistent with earlier ABA Formal Opinions, Formal Opinions 92-368[1] and 94-382 and with case precedents in this circuit. See In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C. Cir. 1989), and Wichita Land & Cattle v. American Federal-Bank, 148 F.R.D. 456 (D.D.C. 1992) (inadvertent disclosure of privileged documents waives the attorney-client privilege).

The question of what ethical obligations exist when privileged material may have been stolen or taken without authority is not addressed in either Opinion 256 or in ABA Formal Opinion 92-368. ABA Formal Opinion 94-382, however, did address the issue of the unsolicited receipt of privileged or confidential materials. It concluded that a lawyer who receives such materials of an adverse party should refrain from using them if she knows that they are privileged. The District of Columbia Circuit specifically reserved decision on the issue of the unsolicited receipt of privileged documents in In re Sealed Case when it stated that "[w]e do not face here any claim that the information was acquired by a third party despite all possible precautions, in which case there might be no waiver at all." 877 F.2d at 980, n. 5.

This issue was addressed, however, in In re Grand Jury Proceedings Involving Berkeley & Co., 466 F. Supp. 863 (D. Minn. 1979). In Berkeley, a former employee allegedly stole corporate documents and turned them over to the government. The company argued that the documents should be returned because they were privileged. The court noted initially that it had long been assumed that the privilege was deemed waived for all involuntary disclosures of privileged documents, even those that were stolen. This had been the position taken in Dean Wigmore's highly respected treatise on evidence. See 8 Wigmore on Evidence §§ 2325-26 (McNaughton rev. 1961).

But Berkeley concluded that the privileged status of document should not be lost in such circumstance if "the attorney and client take reasonable precautions to ensure confidentiality." The approach taken in Berkeley has been largely adopted by the American Law Institute in the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers. Under § 129 of the Restatement, the attorney-client privilege is waived only if "the client, the client's lawyer, or another authorized agent of the client voluntarily discloses the communication in a non-privileged communication." Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 129 (2000). See comment g. And, in one of the illustrations interpreting § 129, the Reporter states that the privilege is not waived if a burglar steals privileged files.

The Restatement comment also adopts the same basic approach taken in our Opinion 256 and ABA Formal Opinion 92-368 with reference to inadvertent disclosures of privileged materials. The Restatement concludes that waiver does not result from inadvertent disclosures as long as the client or any other disclosing person "took precautions reasonable in the circumstances to guard against such disclosure." Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 129, comment h.

These sources provide us with a basis for responding to this Inquiry. First, a lawyer cannot, consistent with the Rules of Professional Conduct, solicit or otherwise encourage a client or other person to obtain privileged or documentary evidence in an unlawful or unauthorized manner. If a lawyer receives materials that are privileged on their face, having a reasonable basis to conclude that the privilege has not been waived and that they have been obtained without authorization, he may violate Rules 1.15(b) and 8.4(c) by reviewing the material or by using it in an adversary hearing.[2] This is consistent with the position taken in ABA Formal Opinion 94-382. But the ethics rules are not violated unless the receiving lawyer acts knowingly.[3]

Other state ethics opinions have reached contrary results. See, e.g., Maryland Bar Ass'n Op. 89-53 (1989), Virginia Bar Ass'n Op. 1076 (1988); and Michigan Bar Ass'n Op. CI-970 (1983). These opinions conclude that lawyers who receive privileged materials unsolicited have no obligation to make disclosure to a tribunal or an adverse party and may review and use such materials. But such a result is inconsistent with the conclusion reached by this Committee in Opinion 256.

The more difficult questions relate to situations in which a receiving lawyer does not have such knowledge of the document's origin prior to conducting a review, or if the status of a document is unclear. A lawyer may still violate the ethics rules if the source and status of documents can be inferred from circumstances at the time he received them because "knowingly" is so defined in the Terminology Section of the Rules, Definition 6. Whether knowledge can be inferred from circumstances is fact specific. But if a lawyer receives what appears to be a privileged document under highly suspicious circumstances, such as from a client or other person who says with a wink, "don't ask me how I got this," the prudent receiving lawyer, would make further inquiry prior to reviewing or using the document.[4]

[1] Opinion 256, however, rejected the position taken in ABA Formal Opinion 92-368 that a document must be returned even if the receiving lawyer learns about the inadvertent disclosure after the document had been reviewed.

[2] This Opinion does not address the question of whether all or just a portion of a particular document is privileged.

[3] This requires actual knowledge of the fact in question. See definition of "knowingly" in Terminology Section of the Rules, Definition [6]. As the Definition of "knowingly" indicates, however, knowledge can be inferred from circumstances.

[4] This is consistent with the admonition in Opinion 256 of what an ambivalent lawyer should do when receiving documents from another lawyer when there are conflicting indications as to whether the disclosure of privileged documents was inadvertent or not. D.C. Opin. 256 at n.13.

If, prior to his review, receiving counsel determines that a privileged document was obtained surreptitiously and without the knowledge or approval of the opposing party and its counsel, and has a reasonable basis to conclude that the privilege was not waived as to this document, receiving counsel should either return the document to opposing counsel, or make inquiry about its source and status prior to determining what course of action to take. This is consistent with the approach taken in ABA Formal Opinion 94-382.[5]

A receiving lawyer would not violate Rules 1.15(b) and 8.4(c) by reviewing and using the document whose source is unknown if: 1) its privileged status is not readily apparent on its face; and 2) receiving counsel did not know that the document came from someone who was not authorized to disclose it. If the privileged status of the document does not become apparent to receiving counsel until after the document has been reviewed, as reflected in D.C. Opinion 256, it is too late for receiving counsel to take corrective action because the information cannot be purged from his mind and his obligation of zealous representation under Rule 1.3 at that point trumps confidentiality concerns. The Committee takes no position with reference to the question whether review and use of documents that are confidential, but non-privileged would violate Rules 1.15(b) and 8.4(c) because it is outside the scope of the inquiry.

In the matter that is the subject of this Inquiry, there is no indication what the receiving lawyer's client said about the document or its source at the time it was given to him. Receiving counsel asserted in a pleading that the document was not marked "confidential" and that it was leaked to his client by a temporary employee of the opposing entity. Even though the document was not marked "attorney-client privilege," "attorney work product," or "confidential," the information at the top of the first page of the document made it clear that it was from the opposing entity's inside counsel and that counsel was analyzing legal questions and concerns for members of the management team.

The Committee concluded in Opinion 256 that a receiving attorney could reasonably presume that documents were intended for him when they are disclosed to him by opposing counsel. This may not be the case when documents are disclosed to a lawyer by a third party. In such a situation, a receiving counsel may violate the ethics rules if he knowingly received privileged documents, had no basis to conclude that the privilege had been waived, and reviews and uses them anyway.

But again this responsibility only exists if the privileged nature of the document is apparent on its face. There is no indication in this Inquiry whether the receiving counsel knew about the nature of the document, other than that it was not marked "confidential," at the time he received it. In the absence of additional facts, we can only reiterate the general guidance provided in Opinion 256: it would be unethical to read a document if the lawyer knew before reading it that it was privileged and that it had been sent inadvertently. The same would be true if receiving counsel reads a document that he knows is privileged and was either stolen by a third party or taken without authorization, unless he has a reasonable basis to conclude that the privilege was waived as to that document. See also ABA Formal Opinion 94-382.

On the other hand, Opinion 256 states that a receiving lawyer commits no breach of ethics if he reads a document that "has no facial or contextual indication of privilege and the receiving lawyer has not learned of its inadvertent disclosure." Again, the Committee reaches the same conclusion for documents improperly taken by third parties.

The determination of what a receiving lawyer knows about the source of a document and about its privileged status, as noted above, is fact specific. A document is not necessarily privileged on its face even when it is marked "privileged" or "confidential," as markings like this often are used indiscriminately. Opinion 256 at n.12. But a receiving attorney proceeds at his own risk if indicia of a privileged document do exist and there is not a reasonable basis to conclude that the privilege has been waived. This can often be gleaned by seeing on the face of a document the sending and receiving parties and the nature of the subject matter.

If, for example, sending and recipient parties are counsel and members of corporate management, respectively, the subject relates to the results of attorney-client communications or legal advice, and the document is marked "attorney-client privilege," then the ethics rules are implicated. But, where the source of the document and/or its privileged status is less clear, as indicated in ABA Formal Opinion 94-382, the prudent course for a receiving lawyer might be to contact the opposing party and raise the issue directly, have another lawyer not working on the matter assess the document separately to help determine whether it is privileged, or refrain from reviewing the materials until a definitive resolution of the proper disposition of the materials is obtained from a tribunal. For comparable suggestions, see Opinion 256 at n.13. See also ABA Formal Opinion 94-382.

It also bears repeating that internal (or outside) counsel having the responsibility for protecting privileged documents that subsequently are "leaked" may violate Rules 1.1(a) and (b) and 1.6(a) and (e) if they fail to exercise reasonable care to prevent the unauthorized disclosure of their client's confidences and secrets.[6]

Again, any such determination is fact specific. There is no indication in the Inquiry what steps had been taken to protect the confidentiality of the document at issue prior to the time it was obtained by the third party.

In summary, given the importance of preserving the confidentiality of privileged documents, lawyers have an ethical responsibility to take reasonable measures to ensure that confidential documents are protected so that they do not fall into the hands of third parties. The failure of counsel to take reasonable measures to protect a client's confidences and secrets can both waive the privilege and result in ethics violations.

Adopted: December 2002
Published: December 2002

Opinion No. 319

Purchase by a Lawyer of a Legal Claim From a Nonlawyer

• The D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct do not bar the purchase by a lawyer (not acting in the course of representing a

[5] As reflected in Opinion 256, a lawyer may also decline to review or use documents that may not be the subject of ethical restraints, and that he may otherwise be entitled to use, as a matter of "courtesy." See Opin. 256 at n.7. Depending on the significance of the documents, however, a lawyer may be required to consult with the client and Rules 1.2(a) and 1.4(b) prior to making such a determination.

[6] Opinion 256 provides some general guidance on the factors to be taken into account in making such assessments. If a lawyer fails to use reasonable care in instructing those who work for him on the handling of confidential material, that lawyer may violate Rule 1.6(e), if, as a result of his failure, the confidential material falls into the hands of a third party. A lawyer may also violate Rule 1.1 if he fails to devote sufficient care and attention to the protection of privileged documents. Both of these rules may be implicated, for example, if a lawyer fails to train his employees to properly mark and file confidential documents and to avoid leaving them in areas exposed to the general public.

client) of a legal claim (i.e., a chose in action) where the seller is not and has not been the lawyer's client. However, if the seller is not represented by counsel or otherwise experienced in dealing in choses in action, the lawyer should be careful to avoid actions by which in the course of negotiation and sale the lawyer may be deemed to be providing legal advice to the seller. Such actions risk creation of a lawyer-client relationship between buyer and seller that would transform the transaction into one governed by Rule 1.8(a).

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.8(a) (Business Transaction With a Client)
- Rule 8.4(c) (Lawyer Misconduct)

Inquiry

This Committee has received an inquiry asking whether a lawyer may purchase a chose in action[1] from a nonlawyer who is not the lawyer's client, with the lawyer acting either on his or her own behalf or as an agent for a corporation created and controlled by the lawyer. In 1931, the ABA Committee on Professional Ethics (predecessor of the present ABA Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility) concluded that a lawyer could not buy choses in action. ABA Formal Opinion 51 (Dec. 14, 1931). The precise question referred to that committee was whether a lawyer might ethically purchase "judgments, notes[, or] other choses in action . . . from bankrupt estates for much less than their face value and . . . then collect[] them at large profit [to the lawyer]." With one member dissenting, the ABA Committee concluded that this practice would violate Canon 28 of the Canons of Professional Ethics by stirring up strife and litigation.[2] The ABA Committee thought that its result, though it deprived lawyers of the opportunity to "enter a speculative field which might be profitable and which is open to laymen," was "entirely consonant" with the "dignity of the profession."

It does not appear that the D.C. Bar has ever considered this issue, and the topic is not at least directly covered in the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct or the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct. Under D.C. law, a chose in action can be assigned, and the assignee may sue in the assignee's name. D.C. Code § 28-2304.[3] The question is whether a lawyer may do what others may do under this D.C. law. Of course the ABA's Canons of Ethics in effect in 1930 have long since been replaced, first by the ABA Model Code of Professional Responsibility and then by the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, a modified version of which is in force in the District of Columbia. We conclude that while prudence will often counsel lawyers strongly against such purchases, with some restrictions the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct do not forbid a lawyer's purchase of a chose in action.

Discussion

If X has a chose in action, then X has a legal claim against another that might be pursued in court. Selling the chose in action is a way for X to obtain some value for this claim without having to bear the cost and risk of litigation. It thus may be a desirable goal for X. A lawyer with an understanding of litigation might be an apt purchaser for such a claim. Accordingly the sale transaction would appear to be potentially beneficial to both. With an important reservation that we discuss below, we do not see any ethical bar to an otherwise legal purchase by a lawyer from a nonlawyer of a chose in action, where the nonlawyer is not and has not been a client of the lawyer.

The concerns expressed in ABA Formal Opinion 51 do not support a conclusion under today's rules that there is anything intrinsically wrong with the purchase of a chose in action by a lawyer from a nonlawyer who is not a client. As we noted above, the sale may be a positive good to the seller. In general, we do not see any concerns in a lawyer's seeking out such a transaction, and there is certainly no concern expressed in our Rules about such a transaction where the seller is not the lawyer's current or former client. Consistently with that view, comment b to § 36 of the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers (2000) specifically notes that the Restatement does not disapprove a lawyer's purchase of a chose in action as long as the seller is not a current or former client of the lawyer.[4]

There is no equivalent in the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct to the former Canon 28, which was originally adopted in 1908. Indeed that Canon may be said to have evidenced or reinforced an inequity that used to exist but, we believe, no longer exists in the District of Columbia and many other jurisdictions. Under Canon 28 "stirring up litigation" was not really an inherent evil on all sides. Under the terms of that Canon a lawyer was explicitly allowed to initiate a recommendation of litigation to a person with whom the lawyer was in a position of "trust"—that is to say, to an existing client. The Canon merely forbade lawyers from recommending litigation to a non-client (unless a family member by blood or marriage). Without offending Canon 28, therefore, a person or a corporation with the means to employ lawyers generally could be kept advised about such litigation opportunities by existing counsel without having to know enough to request that information. Under that Canon it was only a person without such means and without existing counsel who could not receive such advice from a lawyer—unless well-enough informed to ask for it.

Our Rules of Professional Conduct afford more consideration for persons who may have significant legal problems or opportunities but who do not have existing counsel and a lawyer may advise a prospective client of the possibility of litigation as long as the requirements of Rule 7.1 are met. Thus the concern expressed in ABA Opinion 51 that a lawyer buying a chose in action from a non-client was "stirring up litigation" does not resonate under our existing

[1] A chose in action is a right to recover personalty—money or other personal property—by a lawsuit.

[2] Canon 28 provided in part:

> It is unprofessional for a lawyer to volunteer advice to bring a lawsuit, except in rare cases where ties of blood, relationship or trust make it his duty to do so. Stirring up strife and litigation is not only unprofessional, but it is indictable at common law. It is disreputable to hunt up defects in titles or other causes of action and inform thereof [sic] in order to bring suit or collect judgment, or to breed litigation by seeking out those with claims for personal injuries or those having any other grounds of action to secure them as clients, or to employ agents or runners for like purposes . . . .

[3] This provision states:

> § 28-2304. General assignments including choses in action.
>
> In a general assignment which includes choses in action, it is not necessary to execute a separate assignment of each chose in action, but the assignee, by virtue of the general assignment, may sue in his own name on the several choses in action included therein.

[4] Section 36 of the Restatement describes those financial transactions that a lawyer may not enter into with a client. Comment b thereto notes that this section "does not forbid a lawyer from taking an assignment of the whole [legal] claim [against another] and then pressing it in the lawyer's own behalf, so long as the lawyer has not represented the claim's original owner in asserting the claim."

Rules, and the reasoning of ABA Formal Opinion 51 does not form any part of our opinion herein.

That does not mean that there are no provisions of the D.C.Rules of Professional Conduct that would bear on the action by a lawyer of purchasing a chose in action from a nonlawyer who was not a client. First, the provisions of Rule 8.4 govern all conduct of lawyers, whether client-related or not. Rule 8.4(c) declares it to be misconduct for a lawyer to engage in conduct "involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation." This places obvious limits on the negotiation and execution of any transaction, including one with a non-client.[5]

A critical feature of the inquiry is the statement that the seller of the chose in action is not the lawyer's client and that the lawyer is not acting on behalf of a client when engaged in the purchase.[6] If the seller were a client, then the severe restrictions of Rule 1.8 would apply to any business transaction between the lawyer and client, including the purchase of a chose in action from the client. Under Rule 1.8(a), any business transaction between a lawyer and a client must be objectively fair and reasonable to the client and documented in a writing that can reasonably be understood by the client, and the client must consent in writing. Moreover, the client must be "given a reasonable opportunity to seek the advice of independent counsel" for the transaction.

Although the inquiry states that the seller would not be a client, we sound a note of caution on this point. There are many circumstances in which there would be no difficulty in accepting the assumption that the seller and the lawyer-purchaser would be at arms' length and negotiating as equals. The seller may be engaged in business and advised by other counsel or be experienced in assessing the value of such assets as the chose in action. In such situations, the lack of a lawyer-client relationship between buyer and seller would be apparent.

On the other hand, where the seller is an ordinary person who has a chose in action that the lawyer views as potentially valuable, there may well be a significant disparity of knowledge between the lawyer as a prospective purchaser and the lay seller. Buying a chose in action is not like buying a used car; almost everything about the existence and worth of a chose in action involves a legal issue. The lawyer-purchaser of a chose in action is in a position of expertise in understanding and assessing the worth of the purchase. The seller, if an ordinary person not represented by counsel, presumably lacks this knowledge. In a negotiation between them the lawyer-purchaser may make (or appear to make), and the seller may rely on, representations concerning such matters as the worth of the chose in action, the difficulty of success, and so on.

In addition, there may be other factors further increasing the disparity of bargaining power between them. If the lawyer as buyer is confident enough of ultimate recovery on the chose in action to make a present, unconditional payment to purchase it, then the seller might very well also have the option, in addition to selling the claim, of finding a lawyer to represent the seller on a contingent fee basis and with the possibility (though not a certainty, of course) of obtaining a larger ultimate recovery at an indefinite point in the future.[7] A seller contemplating selling the chose in action outright rather than becoming a plaintiff in contingent-fee litigation may be motivated by particularly pressing and immediate needs, such as for funds to meet other obligations.

In such potentially highly charged situations, the lawyer would face a grave risk in proceeding, and we think that lawyers would be well advised to avoid situations in which the seller is a person not represented by counsel, for the following reasons. Because a negotiating buyer typically urges the seller to accept, it would also be difficult in many circumstances to distinguish between such representations made in negotiating such a transaction and the provision of legal advice. The seller may not understand that the lawyer's adversity in the sale transaction should be a warning that the lawyer may not have the buyer's interests at heart in stating legal reasons or providing legal advice to the seller as to whether to agree to the transaction. In such circumstances—even if everything said by the lawyer-purchaser were absolutely correct—there would be a danger that representations as to legal questions made by the buyer and reasonably relied on by the seller would create ambiguity regarding the existence of a lawyer-client relationship between the two, converting the situation to one in which Rule 1.8 applied. In Opinion No. 313 we recently discussed the factors that may govern the creation of a lawyer-client relationship. We pointed out that no formal arrangement or retainer is necessary, and that the critical feature is the putative client's reasonable expectation that the lawyer is providing legal advice on which the lawyer expects the putative client to rely, or gives the putative client reason to rely. This doctrine was applied in circumstances similar to those we are discussing in Nelson v. Nationwide Mortgage Corporation, 659 F. Supp. 611, 617-18 (D.D.C. 1987). There, a borrower who had executed loan and mortgage documents asserted that in doing so she had relied on statements explaining the documents made by the lender's attorney at [5] This of course does not exhaust the prohibitions in Rule 8.4—other possibly relevant parts would include the ban on criminal activity that "reflects adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness, or fitness as a lawyer in other respects;" that on engaging in conduct that seriously interferes with the administration of justice, and that forbidding stating or implying an ability to influence improperly a government agency or official. See Rule 8.4(b), (d), and (e).

[6] The second question asked by the inquirer is whether a lawyer could incorporate a business for the purpose of purchasing a chose in action from an individual and then, "identify[ing] himself as an attorney acting as an agent for a corporation," attempting to purchase the chose in action from the individual. We take this as an alternative question—that is, in the event that our conclusion is that the inquirer cannot purchase the chose in action directly from the seller, could he instead form a corporation to do that and then personally serve as the corporation's agent. Because we answer the first question in the affirmative with limitations that would also apply to the second, we do not see any need to examine the second question in detail. Nonetheless we note that if such a corporation were formed and a lawyer served as its "agent" for this purpose, the lawyer would most likely be deemed to be acting as a lawyer with the corporation as client. See Rule 49(b)(2) of the Rules of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. This would mean that in the lawyer's dealings with the seller, those Rules of Professional Conduct that limit behavior of a lawyer serving a client would apply—most notably including Rule 4.1 (duty of truthfulness in statements to others when representing a client) and Rule 4.3 (preventing a lawyer who is representing a client from (a) giving advice to an unrepresented person adverse to his client other than the advice to secure counsel, and (b) stating or implying that the lawyer is disinterested in the matter while also requiring the lawyer to clarify the situation if the third person does not understand it). Rule 4.3 would severely constrict what the lawyer could say to an unrepresented person about the desirability of entering into the transaction.

The third question posed by the inquiry is, we take it, a further alternative: whether the lawyer could serve as an attorney to a corporation advising it whether a chose in action held by a third party might have value to the corporation. This seems to us to be a traditional attorney-client relationship and completely innocuous on the facts presented, as the lawyer in this case has no apparent contact with the owner of the chose in action (an issue might be presented if the lawyer used a nonlawyer to communicate the lawyer's views to the seller, but we see no need to delve into that completely hypothetical situation).

[7] See the discussion in comment b to § 36 of the Restatement, supra.

the loan closing. The borrower later sued the attorney for legal malpractice in failing to explain the documents adequately. The lawyer moved to dismiss on the ground that he was not the borrower's lawyer. Applying Virginia law, the District Court for the District of Columbia held that a claim for legal malpractice was stated because the plaintiff might be able to demonstrate that her "reliance [on the lawyer's statements] was both reasonable and foreseeable." Id. at 618; see Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, § 14 and comment f (1998). We can imagine that a similar result could well arise where the seller of a chose in action relied on statements of a lawyer-purchaser.

The question of what circumstances give rise to a lawyer-client relationship is one of substantive law rather than professional responsibility under the Rules of Professional Conduct, and accordingly we go no further than to suggest the significant possibility of such a result. But, as noted above, the existence of a lawyer-client relationship would trigger the applicability of Rule 1.8, which imposes strict substantive and procedural requirements on commercial transactions between a lawyer and a client.[8] The lawyer-purchaser in such circumstances would find himself or herself in difficult circumstances, as Rule 1.8(a) requires a written waiver from the client, an opportunity for the client to obtain independent counsel, and that "the transaction [be] . . . fair and reasonable to the client and transmitted to the client in a manner which can be reasonably understood by the client . . . ."

Conclusion

Therefore, while the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct do not forbid a lawyer from purchasing a chose in action from a nonlawyer, the purchasing lawyer should be aware of the risk that, given the legal nature of the thing sold, the seller may rely on representations by the buyer as to legal matters and later claim that an attorney-client relationship resulted, imposing Rule 1.8 requirements. To avoid misunderstandings and to protect both the seller and the buyer, we recommend that if possible the would-be purchaser seek to deal only with sellers who are represented by counsel and that the purchaser strongly suggest representation by counsel for sellers who are not represented. In the absence of such independent representation, the risk is that Rule 1.8 will later be argued to have applied, with the consequences, among others, that the deal will be subject to examination (probably after the fact and perhaps when the deal has proven decidedly favorable to the lawyer-purchaser) as to whether it was objectively fair and reasonable to the seller pursuant to Rule 1.8(a)(1).

If the seller refuses to obtain independent representation, it may be possible for the purchasing lawyer to (1) convince the seller to disclaim any intention of relying on the purchaser for legal advice or (2) avoid the making of representations in negotiation concerning the legal questions underlying the valuation of the chose in action, and by either or a combination of these to avoid a later claim by the seller of a lawyer-client relationship. However, we cannot state with certainty what would or would not be sufficient to establish that an unrepresented person had disclaimed such a relationship (particularly in a situation where it would be most likely to be raised—namely, where the deal had turned out to be markedly unfavorable to the seller), because, as pointed out above, that is a question of substantive law rather than professional responsibility.

Adopted: March 2003
Published: March 2003

Opinion No. 320

Jury Nullification Arguments by Criminal Defense Counsel

• A lawyer defending a criminal case may zealously advocate for the acquittal of his client using any evidentiary argument for which he has a reasonable good faith basis. Current legal standards strongly disfavor jury nullification and prohibit express exhortations that a jury nullify the law. Accordingly, a lawyer may not, consistent with the rules of professional conduct, expressly urge a jury to disregard the law. Nor may a lawyer disregard a ruling of the tribunal limiting the scope of permissible argument. The legal system continues, however, to permit juries to exercise the power to nullify. A lawyer may, therefore, within the bounds of zealous advocacy, advance arguments that have a good faith evidentiary basis even though those same arguments may also heighten the jury's awareness of its capacity to nullify.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 3.1 (Meritorious Claims and Contentions)
- Rule 3.3 (Candor Toward the Tribunal)
- Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Inquiry

The Committee has received an inquiry on a matter of criminal law advocacy: Do the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct prohibit an attorney for a criminal defendant from pursuing a "jury nullification" argument? The inquirer notes that the limited authority on the subject seems in conflict. Some judges appear to believe that pursuit of a jury nullification argument may subject an attorney to sanction under the rules. See, e.g., People v. Williams, 25 Cal.4th 441, 448, 21 P.3d 1209, 1212, 106 Cal.Rptr.2d 295, 298 (2001) (characterizing a jury nullification argument in closing as "a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct"). However, in dicta in an unpublished decision, one court has suggested that such arguments may constitute effective advocacy that satisfies the constitutional requirement that a defendant receive the effective assistance of counsel. See United States v. Sams, 104 F.3d 1407, 1996 WL 739013 at *2 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (unpublished opinion) (it "may be possible" for counsel to satisfy effectiveness standard through "reasonable strategy of seeking jury nullification when no valid or practicable defense exists"). We are asked to address this question.

Discussion

The power of a jury to nullify a prosecution—by which we mean the jury's decision to acquit the defendant despite its conclusion that he committed the offense, because of its disavowal of the law or circumstances under which the defendant is charged, see Horning v. District of Columbia, 254 U.S. 135, 138 (1920) (characterizing jury nullification as acquittal of defendant despite the weight of the evidence)—has a long and storied history in American law. It can be traced back at least as far as the seditious libel trial of John Peter Zenger in 1735, who was "obviously guilty" of the crime of publishing an item that held up public officials to ridicule but was acquitted nonetheless, to the wide approval of the public. See J. Alexander, A Brief Narrative of the Case and Trial of John Peter Zenger (S. Katz, ed., 1963). Or consider the 1851 case of several abolitionists who stormed into a Boston federal court and took by force a slave who was being held for return to Virginia under the Fugitive Slave Law, spiriting him to Canada. They, too, were acquitted of the federal criminal charge of aiding and abetting the escape, after their lawyer urged the jurors to find the fugitive slave laws unconstitutional. See United States v. Morris, 26 F.Cas. 1323 (C.C.D. Mass. 1851).

[8] Interestingly, ABA Opinion 51 did not involve any issue concerning sale of a chose in action by an unsophisticated, unrepresented person. The inquiry there involved a lawyer purchasing choses in action "from bankrupt estates," which is to say not from ordinary persons but from trustees in bankruptcy, whose obligation was to raise as much money from the estates for creditors as possible. Presumably those trustees had both sophistication and access to independent legal advice and could not be gulled into taking much less than what the choses were worth. Moreover, because trustees in bankruptcy would be able to make the claims in court if they could not have sold them, the question of whether to sell the choses in action would appear to have been more one of efficiency to the bankrupt estate than whether the claim would be made or not. Thus the logic of the opinion, which accuses the purchasing lawyer of stirring up litigation, is somewhat impenetrable.

In these early periods of American history, the power of the jury to nullify the law was explicit and affirmatively approved. With the turn of the 20th century, however, the law has developed a more strict separation between the domain of the court (to say what the law is) and the domain of the jury (to determine the facts). Jurors today are routinely instructed that they must accept the law as given to them by the court in its instructions. E.g., Sparf & Hanson v. United States, 156 U.S. 51 (1895).[1] Thus, under contemporary substantive legal standards, a suggestion by a lawyer to a jury that it should ignore the law as stated by the judge may be tantamount to an explicit invitation to the jury to ignore the judge's instructions. The question is when, if ever, do such invitations by criminal defense lawyers violate the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Our discussion is necessarily general in nature. Whether a particular jury nullification argument contravenes the Rules of Professional Conduct is, of course, case-specific and outside the scope of this Committee's inquiry. Counsel contemplating a jury nullification argument should be guided, however, by the following general principles:

Criminal defense lawyers representing an accused play a unique role in our legal system. They, perhaps more than any other attorneys, have a duty to "represent a client zealously and diligently within the bounds of the law." See D.C. Rule 1.3. Indeed, lawyers defending a criminal case are authorized to engage in conduct that, in other contexts, might seem inconsistent with the spirit of the Rules.

Defense counsel are not only permitted but also required, for example, to defend an adversarial proceeding and "require the government to carry its burden of proof" whenever the client elects to contest the proceeding. See D.C. Rule 3.1; see also id. Comment [3]; Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 110(2) (2002) (same). They must do so even if convinced that their client's guilt of the offense charged can be proven beyond a reasonable doubt. See Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, § 110, Comment f. Accordingly a defense lawyer may always oblige the government to prove its case, without violating the Rules of Professional Conduct. See United States v. Cavin, 39 F.3d 1299 (5th Cir. 1994). In this regard, the Rules act uniquely to assure that criminal defense lawyers will do their utmost in zealously representing a client.

Similarly, while most lawyers operate under an absolute obligation of candor to the tribunal, in this jurisdiction defense counsel who are unable to dissuade their clients from presenting false evidence and cannot withdraw from the representation without harming the client may put their client on the stand to testify in a narrative fashion. See D.C. Rule 3.3(b); see also id. Comments [4]-[8]. Although counsel may not argue this false evidence to the jury they nonetheless can participate indirectly in its presentation. Cf. Nix v. Whiteside, 475 U.S. 157, 166-71 (1986) (Sixth Amendment not violated when attorney refuses to cooperate with defendant in presenting perjured testimony). This D.C. provision, which reflects solicitousness to a defendant's right to testify, seeks to assure that a criminal defense lawyer's ethical obligations do not abridge a defendant's right to present a defense.[2]

Notwithstanding the somewhat greater latitude afforded the counsel for a criminal defendant, the lawyer remains subject to ethical restrictions contained in the Rules of Professional Conduct. United States v. Young, 470 U.S. 1 (1984); see also State v. Bennefield, 567 A.2d 863 (Del. 1989) (defense counsel characterization of State witnesses as "scum," "liars," and "snakes" deemed improper conduct).[3]

Thus, at a minimum defense counsel must necessarily conform their conduct to the substantive law of the jurisdiction in which the lawyer is appearing. See D.C. Rule 8.5(a); see also Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 105 (2000) ("a lawyer must comply with applicable law, including rules of procedure and evidence and specific tribunal rulings"). In this jurisdiction, such substantive law appears to preclude express advocacy of the jury nullification power.

The District of Columbia has no rule or statute authorizing jury nullification. Both the local courts and the federal courts have rejected assertions that juries are entitled to an instruction apprising them of their "right" to nullify the law. See United States v. Washington, 705 F.2d 489 (D.C. Cir. 1983) (fact that juries can abuse their power and return verdicts contrary to the law does not mean that courts must give such instruction); Reale v. United States, 573 A.2d 13 (D.C. 1990) (trial court not required to instruct jurors about their power of jury nullification). Indeed, both federal and local courts in this jurisdiction have endorsed jury instructions that are designed to discourage jury nullification. See, e.g., United States v. Pierre, 974 F.2d 1355 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (approving jury instruction that jury "should" return a guilty verdict if the government has proven its case beyond a reasonable doubt); United States v. Braxton, 926 F.2d 1180 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (same); Watts v. United States, 362 A.2d 706 (D.C. 1976) (en banc) (jury instruction may discourage nullification).

Moreover, the standard jury instruction given in District of Columbia courts contains this express admonition to the jury: "You may not ignore any instruction, or question the wisdom of any rule of law."

---

[1] Two states, Indiana and Maryland, retain state constitutional provisions that enshrine a jury's authority to determine the law as well as the facts. See Ind. Const. art. I, § 19; Md. Decl. of Rights, art. 23. But even in those states the jury instructions typically admonish the jury not to arbitrarily and willfully disregard the law or substitute their own judgment for what they think the law should be in a particular case. See e.g. Indiana Jury Instruction (quoted in Kourlis, "Not Jury Nullification; Not a Call for Ethical Reform; But Rather a Case for Judicial Control," 67 U. Colo. L. Rev. 1109, 1111 (1996)).

[2] The District's version of Rule 3.3 is substantially more permissive than that in many other jurisdictions. While its scope does inform our construction of the Rules, our resolution of the underlying question presented would be the same if the District's Rule were identical to that prevalent in other jurisdictions.

[3] Though examples of discipline for violations of the rules of professional conduct by defense counsel are rare, admonitions that they remain bound by those rules are more common. See, e.g., United States v. Rico, 51 F.3d 495, 511 (5th Cir. 1995) ("current professional standards do not require defense counsel to assert every potential defense, regardless how far-fetched or implausible"); Ethics Comm. of Bd. of Professional Responsibility of Tenn. Sup. Ct., Op. 88-F-11 7 (1988) (criminal defense lawyer who files motion to suppress without first investigating facts must comply with rules against asserting defenses solely for delay or harassment).

Criminal Jury Instructions for the District of Columbia, Instr. 2.01 (Bar Assn. of D.C. 4th ed 1993). Within this jurisdiction express exhortations to ignore the law are, therefore, likely to be deemed prohibited by law and may, therefore, result in violations of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct by lawyers who advocate such a course. See D.C. Rule 8.4.

The Committee recognizes, however, that there are many variant forms that a jury nullification argument made by a zealous advocate can take—forms that may range from explicit requests to ignore the law to far more nuanced arguments that arguably have the same effect (and about which reasonable minds may differ). Consider the following hypothetical: Counsel wishes to argue that the police investigation of and testimony about a crime is not credible because it is biased by animus toward the political viewpoint of the defendant. At one level this is a straightforward argument based upon reasonable inferences from the evidence—officers with political bias might, indeed, fabricate evidence. At another level, however, the same argument may also be characterized as a call for the jury to acquit based not on the evidence but on the political viewpoint of the defendant.

It is in practice often impossible to distinguish between these two forms of argument. Counsel may often be able to make good-faith evidentiary arguments that have the collateral effect of heightening the jury's awareness of its capacity to nullify. When do such arguments violate the Rules?

As guidance to the limits on closing argument that may be made consistently with the Rules of Professional Conduct, we find informative the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice. They provide:

> (a) In closing argument to the jury, defense counsel may argue all reasonable inferences from the evidence in the record. Defense counsel should not intentionally misstate the evidence or mislead the jury as to the inference it may draw.
>
> (b) Defense counsel should not express a personal belief or opinion in his or her client's innocence or personal belief or opinion in the truth or falsity of any testimony or evidence.
>
> (c) Defense counsel should not make arguments calculated to appeal to the prejudices of the jury.
>
> (d) Defense counsel should refrain from argument which would divert the jury from its duty to decide the case on the evidence.

ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, Prosecution Function and Defense Function, Standard 4-7.7 (3d ed. 1993). The Restatement, similarly, precludes a defense counsel from expressing a personal opinion or alluding to a matter that is not supported by admissible evidence. See Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 107 (2000).[4]

As we have already noted, some closing arguments may have a good faith basis yet nonetheless have the incidental effect of appealing to a jury's prejudice or enhancing its awareness of its ability to decide the case against the evidence. Thus, there is an obvious tension inherent in application of the ABA standards. Whatever may be said for the resolution of that tension in other contexts, in the context of criminal advocacy that tension should be resolved in favor of permitting any evidentiary argument for which a reasonable good faith basis exists, provided that the lawyer exercises his ability to do so within the constraints of existing law. See id. § 105 Comment c (2000); id. § 110, Comment d (same).

This is consistent with the treatment of other areas where the line between permissible and impermissible advocacy is difficult to police. As the Restatement notes in discussing limits on a lawyer's ability to express a personal opinion: "It may be difficult in practice to maintain the line between permissible zealous argument about facts and inferences to be drawn from them and impermissible personal endorsement. Latitude is left to the advocate in doubtful cases, subject to the superintending power of the presiding officer to prevent improper or misleading argument." Id. § 107, Comment b.[5]

We think this analysis strikes the correct balance in the context of jury nullification arguments as well—unless the advocate expressly urges nullification (an expression likely prohibited by the substantive law of this jurisdiction) or has been prohibited by the presiding officer from making a particular argument, a criminal defense counsel may zealously represent his client and may offer any argument for which he has a good faith evidentiary basis. Such arguments should not be deemed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Indeed, we can imagine situations in which it "may be possible for a defense lawyer to satisfy [the effective assistance requirement through] a reasonable strategy of seeking jury nullification when no valid or practicable defense exists." United States v. Sams, 104 F.3d 1407, 1996 WL 739013 at *2 (D.C. Cir. 1996). Because a "criminal defense lawyer may take any step required or permitted by the constitutional guarantee of the effective assistance of counsel," Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers, § 110, comment f, it is unlikely that any such step for which a reasonable evidentiary basis exists will be deemed to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Thus, to consider a final hypothetical, imagine a situation in which the court rejects a defendant's pre-trial challenge to a police search as a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Given that definitive ruling it is unlikely that a lawyer could argue that the jury should acquit the defendant because the scope of the search was excessive and that a not guilty verdict would send a message to the police to stop using such aggressive, impermissible tactics. Conversely, if the evidentiary predicate for the argument were laid, it might be appropriate for the lawyer to argue that the police's violation of departmental procedures designed to limit the scope and extent of a search were a basis for questioning the credibility of their testimony and the evidence gathered as a result of such violations. Although the distinction between the two arguments is, perhaps, a fine one, it is a distinction with substantial significance under the Rules.

Conclusion

Good-faith arguments with incidental nullification effects do not violate the Rules of Professional Conduct. Despite its disfavor, "the law permits a jury to [4] Notably, the ABA commentary also provides that the defense may argue for "jury nullification" in jurisdictions permitting such arguments—a comment presumably meant to refer to Indiana and Maryland. See ABA Standards § 4-7.7 commentary. By negative implication, this suggests that the ABA Standards counsel against the use of an express jury nullification argument where the substantive law of the jurisdiction in question precludes making such an argument. This is consistent with our understanding of counsel's obligation to comport their conduct to the prevailing substantive law in the governing jurisdiction.

[5] The presiding officer of a tribunal will, of course, judge the propriety of any argument in the first instance. When directed by a tribunal to abandon a line of argument because it is deemed to have crossed the line into impermissible advocacy of jury nullification, a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct may arise from counsel's persistence in pursuing the line of argument after the trial court has deemed it unacceptable. Failure to obey a court order may subject an attorney to discipline. See D.C. Rule 8.4 & comment [4]; see also Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 105 (2000) ("a lawyer must comply with applicable law, including rules of procedure and evidence and specific tribunal rulings").

acquit in disregard of the evidence, and . . . such an acquittal is unreviewable." Watts, 362 A.2d at 710. That power is a necessary consequence inherent in the right to trial by jury. So long as the power to acquit in disregard of the evidence exists, we do not believe that the Rules of Professional Conduct prohibit zealous advocacy by a criminal defense lawyer that appeals indirectly to that power. Unless prohibited by the presiding officer of a tribunal, arguments that have a good-faith evidentiary basis ought not to be deemed violations of the Rules of Professional Conduct, even if those same arguments also have the potential for enhancing the jury's exercise of its power of nullification

Inquiry No: 02-10-06
Adopted: May 20, 2003
Published: May 2003

Opinion No. 321

Communications Between Domestic Violence Petitioner and Counsel for Respondent in a Privately Litigated Proceeding for Criminal Contempt

• Counsel for a respondent may send an investigator to interview an unrepresented petitioner in preparation for a contempt proceeding in which the petitioner has alleged that the respondent has violated the terms of a domestic violence civil protection order, provided that respondent's counsel makes reasonable efforts to ensure that the investigator complies with the requirements of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. These obligations include ensuring that the investigator does not mislead the petitioner about the investigator's or the lawyer's role in the matter and that investigators do not state or imply that unrepresented petitioners must or should sign forms such as personal statements or releases of medical information. Counsel should also take reasonable steps to ensure that, where an investigator reasonably should know that the unrepresented person misunderstands the investigator's role, the investigator makes reasonable affirmative efforts to correct the misunderstanding.

If the petitioner is represented by counsel in connection with the domestic violence matter, respondent's counsel may not contact the petitioner without permission of petitioner's counsel.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 4.1 (Truthfulness in Statements to Others)
- Rule 4.2 (Communication Between Lawyer and Opposing Parties)
- Rule 4.3 (Dealing with Unrepresented Person)
- Rule 5.3 (Responsibilities Regarding Nonlawyer Assistants)
- Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Inquiry

We have received an inquiry from counsel representing domestic violence petitioners in the District of Columbia, who raises questions related to interviews of domestic violence petitioners by investigators working for defense counsel. For purposes of this opinion we have constructed a set of hypothetical facts, which we do not mean to suggest are true or typical of the conduct of defense counsel in similar cases. We instead use these hypothetical facts to illustrate the workings of the D.C. Rules in order to provide guidance on interviewing unrepresented and represented persons. The facts we will use for this purpose are as follows:

A woman secured a Civil Protection Order (CPO) from the D.C. Superior Court in a case in which she alleged that her former intimate partner had engaged in domestic violence against her.[1] The woman later filed a motion for contempt against her former partner for violation of the CPO. The motion alleged that the former partner had engaged in serious violations of the CPO, including death threats. Because such a motion may result in criminal sanctions, including fines and incarceration, the court appointed counsel to represent her former partner. Petitioner proceeded pro se, without the assistance of a prosecutor and without counsel.

Respondent's counsel sent an investigator to interview the petitioner at her home. The investigator, a friendly female college student, disclosed that she worked for respondent's "court-appointed" counsel but did not tell the petitioner that the petitioner had a right to refuse to speak to her. The investigator expressed sympathy for the petitioner's situation and asked the petitioner to explain her version of events. Based on their conversation, the investigator drafted a "statement of the petitioner" and asked the petitioner to sign the statement. The petitioner provided her initials and signature on the statement. The investigator then asked the petitioner to sign a release of confidential medical records, which the petitioner also signed.

After the interview described above had occurred, a lawyer began to represent the petitioner as pro bono counsel. In the course of that representation, the lawyer learned that the petitioner had agreed to the interview with the investigator because she believed that the investigator was a person "from the court" who was sympathetic and could help her in convincing the respondent to stay away from her. The petitioner also believed that she was required to cooperate and would be penalized if she refused. This belief arose in part from a prior experience in which the petitioner had been chastised by a judge for declining to speak with a guardian ad litem appointed to represent her son. The petitioner likewise believed that she was required to sign the papers the investigator presented to her, because the investigator had told her that she "needed" to sign the papers so that the investigator could obtain these records. Later, in the contempt proceeding, respondent's counsel used the signed statement obtained by the investigator to impeach the petitioner on cross-examination.

In this opinion we first discuss lawyers' responsibilities for the conduct of the investigators they supervise. We then analyze how an interview by an investigator supervised by respondent's counsel similar to the hypothetical above should be analyzed under Rule 4.3 of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. Finally, we consider whether, in cases in which the petitioner is represented by counsel, respondent's counsel must, under D.C. Rule 4.2, obtain permission of petitioner's counsel before seeking to interview the petitioner.

Discussion

Under D.C. Rules 5.3 and 8.4, respondent's counsel must make reasonable efforts to ensure that non-lawyer assistants, including investigators, conduct themselves in a manner consistent with the D.C. Rules.[2] D.C. Rule 8.4 (a) pro-

[1] D.C. law provides that when a judge finds good cause to "believe the respondent has committed or is threatening an intrafamily offense," the court may issue a CPO. D.C. Code § 16-1005 (1981).

[2] D.C. Rule 5.3 states:

> With respect to a nonlawyer employed or retained by or associated with a lawyer . . .
> (b) A lawyer having direct supervisory authority over the nonlawyer shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the person's conduct is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyer; and
> (c) a lawyer shall be responsible for conduct of such a person that would be a violation of vides that it is "professional misconduct for a lawyer to . . . violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through the acts of another." See also ABA Formal Op. 95-396 (1995) (lawyer with direct supervisory authority over an investigator is responsible for contacts made by the investigator if the lawyer did not make reasonable efforts to prevent them, instructed the investigator to make them, or, knowing that the investigator planned to make them, failed to instruct the investigator not to do so). Accordingly, the central question here is whether counsel for a respondent who requested, ratified or failed to take reasonable steps to prevent the conduct by an investigator described above would run afoul of any of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. D.C. Rule 5.3.

Under the hypothetical facts summarized above, where the petitioner was proceeding pro se without being represented by counsel at the time the interview occurred, the applicable rule is D.C. Rule 4.3, "Dealing with Unrepresented Person." That rule provides:

> In dealing on behalf of a client with a person who is not represented by counsel, a lawyer shall not:
> (a) Give advice to the unrepresented person other than the advice to secure counsel, if the interests of such person are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client;
> (b) State or imply to unrepresented persons whose interests are not in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client that the lawyer is disinterested. When the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to correct the misunderstanding.

Thus, as we have previously stated, under D.C. Rule 4.3, "a lawyer representing a client shall not give advice to an unrepresented person (other than advice to secure counsel) where the interests of that person may be in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client, and shall not, even with respect to a person whose interests are not in conflict with those of the lawyer's client, leave the impression that the lawyer is disinterested. . . . Rule 4.3 requires the investigating lawyer to clarify his position '[w]hen the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role in the matter.'" D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 269 n.3 (1997).

Although the specific language requiring counsel to make reasonable efforts to correct misunderstandings about the lawyer's role appears in Rule 4.3(b), addressing dealings with unrepresented persons whose interests are not adverse to those of counsel's client, rather than Rule 4.3(a), which is applicable here because the petitioner's interests clearly were adverse, Rule 4.3(b) also applies a fortiori where an unrepresented person misunderstands a lawyer's role in dealings with the person where the interests are adverse. Thus, among other requirements, D.C. Rule 4.3 requires lawyers to make reasonable efforts to ensure that, where investigators either know or "reasonably should know" that the unrepresented person misunderstands their role, the investigators make reasonable efforts to correct the misunderstanding. Indeed, as we have previously emphasized, Rule 4.3 requires lawyers "to take affirmative steps to avoid misunderstandings and assure" that the unrepresented person "correctly understands the lawyer's role in the matter." D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 287 (1999).

Whether an investigator "reasonably should know" that a petitioner misunderstands her role must be inferred from all of the circumstances, including the level of sophistication of the unrepresented person and the nature of the proceedings at issue. The inquirer suggests that it can generally be inferred that indigent unrepresented petitioners in domestic violence cases who decide to speak to a respondent's investigator misunderstand the investigator's role.[3] We cannot make this blanket assumption, however, because D.C. Rule 4.3 takes a different tack. Rather than barring counsel's contact with vulnerable unrepresented persons with adverse interests—clearly a choice available to the Court of Appeals—Rule 4.3 permits such contacts, so long as that counsel does not misrepresent his or her role.

This policy determination in Rule 4.3 serves several important purposes. One is the preservation of the ability of respondent's counsel to conduct an investigation in order to defend her client against serious criminal charges. Indeed, the responsibility of defense counsel to conduct a thorough investigation is embodied in D.C. Rule 1.3's mandate that counsel represent their clients with diligence and zeal. Rule 4.3 thus allows defense counsel to have access to information from witnesses, even complaining witnesses, so long as that contact with defense counsel is voluntary on the part of the unrepresented witness.

A second purpose of Rule 4.3 is to allow unrepresented persons to make their own decisions about whether to speak to counsel representing a client with adverse interests. The inquirer correctly emphasizes that the voluntariness of that choice may be called into question if the unrepresented person is confused about counsel's role. Rule 4.3 addresses that problem by requiring that respondent's counsel "make reasonable efforts to correct the misunderstanding" whenever he or she "knows or reasonably should know that the unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role."

Our hypothetical posits that the petitioner misunderstood the investigator's role, believing that the investigator was a person "from the court" who was in a position to "help her" by intervening with the respondent to stop the abuse. The relevant question under the language of Rule 4.3, however, is not whether the petitioner misunderstood the investigator's role, but whether the investigator knew or reasonably should know that the petitioner misunderstood her role. The circumstances under which respondent's counsel "reasonably should know" that an unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role will vary by context. One relevant factor is the likelihood of misunderstandings generated by the nature of the proceedings at issue. In the hypothetical presented above, for example, another "court appointed" figure—a guardian ad litem—had also previously appeared at the petitioner's door requesting an interview, and the petitioner had been chastised by a judge for declining to speak to that "court-appointed" official. Respondent's counsel cannot automati-the Rules of Professional Conduct if engaged in by a lawyer if:

---

(1) the lawyer requests or, with the knowledge of the specific conduct, ratifies the conduct involved; or

(2) the lawyer has direct supervisory authority over the person... and knows of the conduct at a time when its consequences can be avoided or mitigated but fails to take reasonable remedial action.

[3] The inquirer also suggests that respondent's counsel is barred from contacting unrepresented petitioners under the D.C. Domestic Violence Rule 8, which regulates discovery from the opposing party in privately prosecuted contempt proceedings. Rule 8 provides that "[f]or good cause shown and with due regard for the summary nature of the proceedings, the Court may authorize a party to proceed with discovery from the other party by requests for written interrogatories or production of documents." SCR-DV Rule 8. We do not address this issue because it is outside the scope of our authority, which is confined to questions of interpretation under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

cally be charged with knowledge of such a situation, but, to the extent that respondent's counsel is or reasonably should be aware that multiple interventions by the state are in process in a particular case, that counsel must instruct investigators not to mislead the unrepresented petitioner and to "make reasonable affirmative efforts to correct" any misunderstanding on the part of the unrepresented petitioner as to counsel's role in representing the respondent.

Another question raised by the hypothetical concerns the likelihood for misunderstanding generated when investigators for respondent's counsel identify themselves as working for "court appointed" counsel or counsel "from the court." To the extent that counsel or investigators reasonably should know, given the specific wording of such a statement and the context in which it is made, that such references to "the court" increase the probability that an unrepresented person will misunderstand counsel's partisan role in the matter, such language should be avoided. The fact that the language may be literally true does not cure the potential professional responsibility issue, because the D.C. Rules are clear that counsel must not "state or imply" to unrepresented persons that "the lawyer is disinterested." D.C. Rule 4.3(b) (emphasis supplied). Thus, in order to avoid any misunderstanding generated when investigators for respondent's counsel identify themselves as working for "court appointed" counsel or counsel "from the court," counsel and investigators must clearly identify themselves as representing the respondent in the matter.[4]

A similar potential for misunderstanding may arise to the extent that an investigator agrees to a petitioner's request to intervene with a respondent on her behalf, as in the situation we hypothesize. Here again, the relevant factor is whether the respondent's counsel "stated or implied" neutrality or nonpartisan authority in the situation. An investigator interviewing an unrepresented petitioner might agree to carry a message to the respondent, but should make clear to the petitioner that the investigator has no authority to require respondent to agree to petitioner's request. Counsel for the respondent should also remind the petitioner that, regardless of what act counsel for the respondent agrees to take—such as urging the respondent to stay away from the petitioner—counsel is representing the respondent's interests and not the petitioner's.

Similarly, if it becomes apparent that the unrepresented petitioner believes she is required to speak to the investigator from respondent's counsel, Rule 4.3 requires the investigator to take "whatever reasonable, affirmative steps are necessary" to correct such a misunderstanding. See Rule 4.3, comment [2].

Many other factors affect when counsel reasonably should know that an unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role. One such factor is the degree to which the unrepresented person understands the English language. Hearing impairment, psychological disorder or other mental incapacity, and juvenile status are other examples of factors that tend to lead counsel "reasonably to know" that an unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role. This list is far from exhaustive, but illustrates that what an investigator reasonably should know about whether a petitioner misunderstands the investigator's role must be inferred from all of the circumstances. While an investigator is not required to be a mind reader, she is not permitted under Rule 4.3 to ignore circumstances indicating that a petitioner misunderstands the partisan, adversarial role of respondent's counsel in the proceedings at issue.

Another question the inquirer raises is whether an investigator in circumstances such as those described in the hypothetical above would violate Rule 4.3(a) in obtaining a signed personal statement and release of medical records from an unrepresented petitioner. The answer depends on whether the investigator, in stating that the petitioner "needed to" sign the forms so that she could obtain the petitioner's medical information, in effect stated or implied that the petitioner was required to or should sign the release forms. An investigator who did state or imply such an obligation would be transgressing the prohibition in Rule 4.3(a) against giving legal advice to unrepresented persons whose interests are adverse to those of the supervising counsel's client.

The inquirer asks whether Rule 4.3 requires lawyers to advise unrepresented persons of their right to obtain independent legal advice before signing any substantive legal documents, including releases, drafted for an unrepresented person's signature by counsel for a client with adverse interests. The inquirer cites South Carolina Ethics Opinion 94-07 (1994), which supports this position. Other jurisdictions, however, have reached the opposite conclusion. See, e.g., Dolan v. Hickey, 385 Mass. 234, 236, 431 N.E.2d 229, 231 (1982) ("the acts of drafting documents and presenting them for execution, without more, do not amount to 'advice,' and are proper as long as the attorney does not engage in misrepresentation or overreaching"). The compilers of the Restatement of Law Governing Lawyers similarly reject the South Carolina Ethics Committee's view. See Restatement of Law Governing Lawyers § 103, Reporter's Note, Comment b, Rationale (rejecting approach adopted in S.C. Ethics Op. 94-07).

We do not see a basis in the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct for adopting the South Carolina Ethics Committee's approach. D.C. Rule 4.3(a) states that the only legal advice counsel for a client with adverse interests may give an unrepresented person is the legal advice "to secure counsel." Because the language of Rule 4.3(a) is permissive, rather than mandatory, we do not see grounds for adopting a general requirement that counsel advise an unrepresented petitioner to seek the advice of counsel. We note, however, that Comment [1] to Rule 4.3 emphasizes that an "unrepresented person, particularly one not experienced in dealing with legal matters, might assume that a lawyer will provide disinterested advice concerning the law even when the lawyer represents a client," and that a lawyer "must take great care not to exploit these assumptions" (emphasis added); see also Charles W. Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics § 11.6.3, at 617 (1986) ("when the lawyer makes clear that he or she is representing only the interest of the client, the mere presentation of the document for signing should not constitute implicit advice. Nonetheless, the position of the lawyer is precarious, and a written notice to the unrepresented party, making the lawyer's limited interests quite clear, is advisable.") Thus, investigators "must take great care" to ensure that unrepresented persons understand that the presentation of documents does not amount to offering advice to sign them.

Finally, the inquirer asks whether respondent's counsel should be required to instruct investigators to explain that any statements an unrepresented petitioner makes, or releases of information she provides, may be used against her in the contempt proceeding. D.C. Rule 4.3 contains no such a general requirement that counsel give this type of "Miranda" warning in the context of an interview of an unrepresented person, and we have found no substantive District of Columbia law that imposes such a requirement. To the contrary, in adopting Rule 4.3 the Court of Appeals struck a different balance between the public interest in protecting unrepresented persons from being misled about counsel's role and adverse counsel's interests in interviewing unrepresented persons. That balance seeks to protect the unrepresented person from being misled about counsel's role, but does not require that counsel actively discourage the unrepresented person from providing information to counsel or counsel's agents.

[4] See, e.g., ABA Formal Op. 93-378 (1993) ("When a lawyer contacts any witness, lay or expert, actual or potential, the lawyer must not knowingly leave the witness in ignorance of the lawyer's relationship to the case that gives occasion to the contact.")

Other sources of professional responsibility guidance further support the conclusion that it is not within the scope of defense counsel's duties to inform unrepresented persons, even complaining witnesses, of their legal situation. See, e.g., A.B.A. Standards for Criminal Justice 4-4.3, "Relations with Prospective Witnesses" ("It is not necessary for defense counsel or defense counsel's investigator, in interviewing a prospective witness, to caution the witness concerning possible self-incrimination and the need for counsel."); Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 106, comment c ("A lawyer other than a prosecutor . . . is not required to inform any nonclient witness or prospective witness of the right to invoke privileges against answering"). It follows that, if defense counsel has no duty to advise an unrepresented person of potential criminal consequences in agreeing to an interview, that counsel also has no duty to advise an unrepresented person, including an opposing party, of other legal consequences. Accordingly, we see no warrant to extend the requirements of Rule 4.3 to require Miranda-type warnings in the context of interviews of unrepresented persons by counsel or counsel's agents representing clients with adverse interests.

In sum, we conclude that, as general matter, counsel for a respondent may direct an investigator to seek an interview with an unrepresented petitioner, but must make reasonable efforts to ensure that the investigator does not mislead the petitioner about the investigator's role. In addition, respondent's counsel must instruct the investigator that, if it appears that the petitioner misunderstands the investigator's role, the investigator should take "whatever reasonable, affirmative steps are necessary to correct the misunderstanding." D.C. Rule 4.3 comment [2]. Finally, an investigator may ask an unrepresented petitioner to sign substantive documents, but must take "great care" that the unrepresented person understands that neither the lawyer nor the investigator is giving legal advice in connection with the preparation or execution of such documents. D.C. Rule 4.3, comment [1].

The second general matter the inquirer raises is whether, in cases in which counsel represents the petitioner in a contempt proceeding based on violation of a CPO, respondent's counsel must obtain permission of petitioner's counsel before seeking to interview the petitioner. The inquirer reports that some defense counsel view such petitioners not as parties, but merely as witnesses in the contempt proceeding, and argue that Rule 4.2 therefore does not apply or that Rule 4.2 is trumped by defense counsel's duty of zealous advocacy. Such a characterization is precluded by commentary to Rule 4.2 and by earlier opinions of this Committee.

Comment 4 to D.C. Rule 4.2 explicitly provides that any person who is represented by counsel concerning "the matter in question" falls within the ambit of the Rule, "whether or not a party to a formal proceeding." D.C. Rule 4.2 comment [4]. Accordingly, if the petitioner is represented by counsel, Rule 4.2 is applicable and forbids the respondent's lawyer from interviewing the petitioner without permission from the petitioner's lawyer, regardless of whether the petitioner is a formal "party" to the contempt proceeding.

Our conclusion further rests on our Opinion No. 263, in which we opined that a CPO modification proceeding and a CPO contempt proceeding, both based on the same underlying CPO, constitute the same "matter" under Rule 4.2. D.C. Ethics Op. 263 (1996). In that opinion we addressed a situation in which a lawyer representing a domestic violence CPO petitioner sought communication with the respondent about seeking a modification of the CPO to strengthen its protections. The petitioner's lawyer had also filed contempt charges based on alleged violations of the CPO. The court appointed counsel to represent the respondent in the contempt proceeding, but that counsel represented the respondent only in the contempt proceeding, and not on the CPO modification motion. The petitioner's lawyer accordingly inquired whether the respondent was "represented" for purposes of D.C. Rule 4.2 in the separate CPO modification proceeding. We concluded that, "at least with respect to litigation, a particular litigation is a 'matter.'" Id. In support of this conclusion, we reasoned that:

> While litigation may have many facets to it, those facets typically have at least some facts, evidence and legal principles in common. Activities or developments in one facet of a case rarely fail to have implications in others.

We also relied on ABA Ethics Opinion 95-396 (1995), which interpreted the term "matter" in ABA Model Rule 4.2 as encompassing that which was sufficiently "defined and specific, such that the communicating lawyer can be placed on notice of the subject of representation." D.C. Ethics Op. 263, quoting ABA Ethics Op. 95-396 (1995). Accordingly, we decided that "the relevant 'matter' is the legal proceeding brought by the domestic violence victim, with the CPO modification and contempt motions being but different aspects of that proceeding."

Under this approach, the domestic violence case constitutes the litigation, and the CPO and contempt proceedings involve aspects of the same underlying "matter" for purposes of D.C. Rule 4.2(a), even though counsel may represent the persons involved only with respect to some aspects of the litigation. If the petitioner is represented by counsel in connection with the domestic violence matter, the petitioner is represented as to "the subject of the representation" for purposes of Rule 4.2 (a). Accordingly, the respondent's lawyer or investigator may not contact the petitioner without the consent of the petitioner's lawyer or unless otherwise authorized by law to do so.

Inquiry No.: 00-10-37
Adopted: June 2003
Published: June 2003

Opinion No. 322

Whether a Nonlawyer Employed by a Law Firm May Be Partly Compensated by a Percentage of the Profits of the Cases on Which He Works

• A law firm may not compensate a nonlawyer employee, hired to work on designated class action claims against defendants who are members of a particular industry, based on a percentage of the profits earned from those cases. If the lawyers in the firm and the nonlawyer were to establish a separate partnership or other form of organization to litigate the class action cases, the fee arrangement would be permissible, provided that there were compliance with the restrictions of Rule 5.4(b) and other relevant rules governing such organizations.

Applicable Rule

- Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)

Inquiry

The inquirer is a partner in a small law firm. The firm is engaged in a series of class actions, in which it represents the plaintiff class, asserting claims against defendants who all are members of a particular industry. Notice to class representatives of compensation arrangements with employees would be possible, but it would be impractical to notify the putative class members. It is likely that these cases and new, related cases will continue for some years. Fees are contingent upon settlement or recovery. The firm contemplates that it will collect fees irregularly as some cases are resolved.

The firm has hired—as an employee—a nonlawyer, who has worked as a consultant in the relevant industry, to assist it in this series of cases. The employee is currently paid a modest base salary and is paid on an hourly basis for the time that he spends on the series of cases. The firm wishes to alter the compensation system for this employee. It proposes to continue paying him a modest salary, but for future cases, plans to compensate him from the revenue received from the series of class actions. The compensation would work in the following fashion: The employee and the firm's lawyers would keep track of their hours spent working on this series of cases as well as their expenses. As fees from these cases were received, they would be used to pay the employee for his expenses and for his time spent on the series of cases at an agreed-upon hourly rate. The firm also would be paid for its lawyers' expenses and time spent as fees were received. If the fees were insufficient to compensate both the employee and the firm for the time spent prior to receipt, the fees would be divided on a pro rata basis between the employee and the firm, and the uncompensated hours, as well as any additional hours spent, would be compensated from the next fees that were received. If the fees were more than sufficient to compensate the employee and the firm for expenses and hours, the remaining funds would be divided between the employee and the lawyers on a pro rata basis depending on their respective contributions of expenses plus hours times hourly rates. The employee could never receive more than 49 percent of those fees. If the fees did not materialize, the employee would receive no compensation other than his modest base salary. If the fees were inadequate to compensate the employee and the lawyers for all their hours at their agreed-upon hourly rates, they would share proportionally in the shortfall.

The following example illustrates the proposal: Assume that the employee has worked 90 hours and has expenses of $1,000. Assume his hourly rate is $100 per hour. Assume that the lawyer[1] has worked 75 hours, that his hourly rate is $200 per hour, and that he has incurred $5,000 in expenses. These hours are not spent by either the employee or the lawyer on just one case, but on a series of cases. One of these cases settles, resulting in fees of $100,000. The employee would be paid $10,000 ($1,000 in expenses + 90 hours × $100). The lawyer would be paid $20,000 ($5,000 in expenses + 75 hours × $200). That would leave $70,000 in fees. These fees would be divided based on the respective "investments" of the employee and the lawyer or at a ratio of $10,000 to $20,000 or 1 to 2. Thus, of the remaining $70,000, the employee would receive $23,333, and the lawyer would receive $46,667. If fees for the same hours and expenses were only $21,000, the employee would receive $7,000, the lawyer would receive $14,000, and the uncompensated hours and expenses ($3,000 and $6,000 respectively) would be carried over and added to future hours and expenses until another fee was received. That fee would then be divided using the ratio of hours times hourly rate plus expenses invested as of that time, which might differ from the first ratio. If no more fees were earned, there would be no compensation for these hours and expenses.

The inquiry is whether this compensation system satisfies the requirement of Rule 5.4(a)(3), which is one of the exceptions to the prohibition on a lawyer or law firm sharing legal fees with a nonlawyer.

> A lawyer or law firm may include nonlawyer employees in a compensation . . . plan, even though the plan is based in whole or in part on a profit-sharing arrangement.

If this proposed compensation system does not fall within this exception, the inquirer asks whether, pursuant to Rule 5.4(b), the firm and the employee could enter into a joint venture arrangement. The employee would be a principal of and have a financial interest in the joint venture, which would represent the plaintiffs in this series of class actions. Were such an organization formed, could it use the proposed compensation system?

Discussion

As this inquiry illustrates, the line between the prohibited sharing of legal fees with a nonlawyer and a permissible compensation plan based on profit-sharing is not clearly demarcated. This is so because a law firm's profits result almost entirely from its fees. In a sense, even paying nonlawyer employees a salary could be viewed as a sharing of fees, since fees are the firm's source of revenue.

Previous Committee Opinions

Comment [1] to Rule 5.4 provides, without further elaboration, that the rule is "to protect the lawyer's professional independence of judgment." Presumably, the notion is that a nonlawyer with a stake in the outcome might influence the handling of the case, for instance by pressuring the lawyer either to settle faster or to hold out for more, based on the nonlawyer's financial interest. Comment [10] says, however, that when a nonlawyer becomes a partner or principal in a law firm, as permitted by Rule 5.4(b), he or she may share in the fees.

In Opinion 233 (1993) this Committee described two historical motivations for prohibiting fee-sharing with nonlawyers in addition to preserving independent professional judgment: (1) preventing the unauthorized practice of law and (2) preserving client confidences. It is not immediately apparent how fee-sharing would threaten client confidences, at least in the context of this inquiry. It would appear that the employee would have the same job and presumably the same access to client confidences regardless of how he is paid. Nonlawyer exposure to client confidences by consultants, expert witnesses, secretaries, paralegals, and law clerks is, of course, common. We are not sure that preventing unauthorized practice is conceptually different from preserving professional independence. Both reasons add up to discouraging nonlawyers from influencing or making decisions about the practice of law, which should be reserved for lawyers. Arguably, if the employee had a more direct stake in the outcome of the class action cases, he might be tempted to interfere improperly in those cases. But if the law firm met the requirements set out in Rule 5.4(b) for admitting nonlawyers to the firm as partners (particularly assuring that they comply with the Rules of Professional Conduct), the threat to independent professional judgment or of unauthorized practice does not seem appreciably greater than in the case of a nonlawyer partner.

[1] For simplicity, assume only one lawyer in the firm works on these cases.

Some of this Committee's opinions, issued after Rule 5.4 was adopted, have taken a liberal approach to what might be called fee-sharing. Opinion 298 (2000) said that paying a collection agency a percentage of collections does not violate the prohibition against fee-splitting. Opinion 307 (2001) said that a firm may pay one percent of its fees to a government agency for referring a case. This referral fee clearly involved fee-splitting with a nonlawyer, but we said it was not the "evil" that the rule was designed to prevent. The aforementioned Opinion 233 permitted the sharing of a "success fee" with an independent consulting firm, provided that the client consented in advance. This "success fee," while clearly contingent on the outcome, was not clearly defined, so we do not know if it was to be fixed or to be designated as a percentage of the amount of the recovery. In fact, it is not clear from the Opinion whether the firm represented only plaintiffs, so the success fee might be triggered by a successful defense of a case.[2]

We must confront, however, Opinion 286 (1998). That opinion concerned referral fees to nonlawyers. The Committee thought that such fees were prohibited if contingent on the amount of recovery because such a payment is in effect paying some of the specific proceeds of a representation to a nonlawyer. If the referral fee were not contingent, if it were fixed and paid regardless of success, we said it would not be a division of fees and would be permissible. This distinction has the advantage of drawing what appears to be a clear line. If the nonlawyer is paid a flat fee, regardless of outcome, he/she is unlikely to pressure the lawyer as to how to handle the case or cross over the line of actually practicing law. Still it is hard to reconcile this result with paying a consulting firm, which will presumably participate in the case, unlike the referring party, a fee contingent on success, as long as the client grants advance approval.

Other Jurisdictions

The opinions of other jurisdictions weigh against the inquirer's proposal[3]. These opinions generally stand for the proposition that paying a percentage of firm net profits to nonlawyer employees is permissible, whereas paying a percentage of a fee in an identifiable case or series of cases is not. The inquirer referenced five opinions that he believed supported his proposed compensation system. We discuss each below.

(1) The Philadelphia Bar Association Professional Guidance Committee endorsed the payment of a percentage bonus to a nonlawyer employee if collections exceeded a predetermined figure, provided that "the bonus is not tied to or contingent on the payment of a fee from a particular case or specific class of cases relating to a particular client or debtor." Opinion 2001-7 (2001).

(2) The Utah State Bar Ethics Advisory Opinion Committee approved the payment to a non-employee paralegal, provided that the paralegal's compensation is independent of the lawyer's compensation by the client. Employee paralegals may be compensated based upon a percentage of gross or net income, provided compensation is not tied to specific fees from a particular case. UT Eth. Op. 02-07, 2002 WL 31079593 (Utah St. Bar).

(3) The New York State Bar Association Committee on Professional Ethics would prohibit paying an employee a percentage of a fee for cases that the employee referred. It would permit payment of a percentage of the firm's profits. NY Eth. Op. 733, 2000 WL 33347719 (N.Y. St. Bar Assn. Comm. Prof. Eth.).

(4) The South Carolina Ethics Advisory Committee approved a bonus system for paralegals based on a percentage of the paralegal's billings to the clients, as long as the percentage is not tied to a particular fee. SC Adv. Op. 97-02, 1997 WL 582907 S.C. Bar Eth. Adv. Comm.).

(5) The Illinois State Bar Association was ambiguous. A lawyer had a substantial collections practice, mainly from a single collection agency. He segregated his collections practice from the rest of his practice and determined that practice's net income on a monthly basis. He paid an employee a set percentage of the net monthly profit from the collections practice. The Illinois Committee found this "profit-sharing arrangement would be proper provided sharing is based on a percentage of overall firm profit and is not tied to fees in a particular case." IL. Adv. Op. 89-05, 1989 WL 550785 (Ill. St. Bar Assn.). This opinion's ambiguity arises out of the fact that the employee apparently would not share in the lawyer's total profit, but in the profit from the collections practice only. Arguably, our inquirer wants to do something similar: isolate a part of his firm's practice and pay the employee a percentage of the profits from that part of the practice. The difference, as we see it, is that the collections practice presumably would have a high volume of cases, none of which individually would be likely to have a significant effect on the collections profits.[4] The class action cases with which the inquirer is concerned would be few in number and might result in substantial fees, such that one successful result could have a major impact on the profitability of that part of the practice.

In addition to the Illinois opinion, we have found one other opinion that permits a nonlawyer to be compensated by a percentage of a subset of a law firm's profits, as opposed to its total profits. MI Eth. Op. RI-143 (1992) approved payment of a percentage of the net profits from a law firm's sports and entertainment practice area to a legal assistant who worked in that practice area. The Michigan committee had earlier approved paying a nonlawyer employee a bonus calculated on a lawyer's gross or adjusted gross income, but not tied to the employee's efforts to solicit clients. The committee did not think that basing the employee's compensation on the net profits of a practice area, rather than the net profits of the entire firm, jeopardized a lawyer's exercise of professional judgment. It stated that the result might be different if the compensation plan were based on the fees generated from a particular case or a particular client. Like the Illinois opinion, this opinion is cryptic, but we assume that the sports and entertainment practice of the law firm was extensive enough so that compensation was not tied to a handful of cases or clients, which is not the case with the proposal we confront.

[2] Comment [8] to Rule 3.4 endorses the payment of a contingent fee to an expert witness, provided that the fee is not a percentage of the recovery. This may not be fee-splitting since the expert would presumably be paid from the client's share of the recovery. An expert witness may not have much opportunity to interfere with the lawyer's professional independence given the witness's limited role. It was important to the Committee's analysis in Opinion 233 that the same economic result could have been achieved had the client contracted with the consulting firm to pay a success fee directly rather than the fee flowing through the law firm.

[3] Currently no U.S. jurisdiction other than this one permits nonlawyers to participate as partners or principals in law firms. The precedent from other jurisdictions reflects a more strict prohibition on the sharing of fees with nonlawyers, and thus its relevance is lessened somewhat.

[4] The assumption is based on the typical nature of a collections practice. The Illinois opinion does not address this point.

Moreover, all other opinions and cases that we have found permit profit-sharing with nonlawyer employees only as long as it is tied to the firm's overall profits and not to receipt of particular fees. ABA Informal Eth. Ops. 1440 (1979) and 1519 (1986); Trotter v. Nelson, 684 N.E. 2d 1150 (Ind. 1997) (profit-sharing plan may not be tied to a particular fee); State Bar of Texas v. Faubion, 821 S.W. 2d 203 (Tex. 1991) (shared fee with a nonlawyer prohibited if based on a particular case); In re Anonymous Member of the South Carolina Bar, 367 S.E. 2d 17 (S.C. 1988) (compensation plan for nonlawyers permissible based on a percentage of profits, but not if directly related to percentage of fees generated in individual case); FL Eth. Op. 02-1 (2002) (nonlawyer assistant's bonus must be for extraordinary efforts and cannot be based upon percentage of fees generated by the assistant); KS Eth. Op. 95-09 (1995) (may share fees with collection firm, but may not base compensation on collection firm's collections); CT Eth. Op. 93-1 (1993) (nonlawyer employees can be paid a bonus based on firm profits as long as they do not make professional decisions for the firm); NC Eth. Op. RPC 147 (1993) (cannot pay to legal assistant bonus based on income from assistant's real estate closings).

Prohibition on Sharing Fees from a Distinct Set of Cases

Although blurred somewhat by the past opinions of this Committee, there emerges a prohibition on splitting fees with a nonlawyer employee on a contingent basis arising out of a case or a category of cases, at least unless the client approves in advance (an impracticality here). This rule and its exceptions flow from precedent, but they may not be entirely logical. How does advance client approval guarantee the lawyer's independence, for example? Money is fungible, and every employee is going to be paid out of a law firm's revenues, which are its fees. If it is a firm's practice to pay bonuses tied to firm profitability, each employee has an incentive to influence the outcome of significant cases, particularly in small firms where such cases could have a major effect on profitability. In fact, even if a firm has no profit-sharing program, a nonlawyer has some incentive to affect the outcome of cases because she knows if the firm does not make a profit, it cannot afford to employ her. Nonlawyer employees or employees sharing in fees on a contingent basis would seem to pose less of a threat to independence of professional judgment than permitting a nonlawyer to be a partner in a law firm and be compensated like most partners based on a percentage of profit, particularly in a small firm where one case can have a major effect on profitability.

If we accept Opinion 286's distinction between bonuses contingent on the fees from a specific case or series of related cases, as opposed to bonuses contingent on overall profitability, we must conclude that the inquirer's proposal would violate Rule 5.4(a). The inquirer suggests that his proposal is not tied to a specific referral, client, or fee, but rather to revenue from pooled cases. We do not see this distinction as meaningful. If the underlying policy is to diminish the incentive for the nonlawyer to interfere with the lawyer's practice, tying the compensation to a small, identifiable set of related cases is no different than tying the compensation to a single case.[5]

Establishing a Joint Venture Organization

If Rule 5.4(a) prohibits the proposed compensation system, the inquirer asks whether the firm can enter into a similar compensation arrangement with the consultant if, rather than hire the consultant as an employee, the firm and the nonlawyer were to form a joint venture organization pursuant to Rule 5.4(b).

Rule 5.4(b) provides

> A lawyer may practice law in a partnership or other form of organization in which a financial interest is held or managerial authority is exercised by an individual nonlawyer who performs professional services which assist the organization in providing legal services to clients, but only if:
>
> 1. The partnership or organization has as its sole purpose providing legal services to clients;
> 2. All persons having such managerial authority or holding a financial interest undertake to abide by these Rules of Professional Conduct;
> 3. The lawyers who have a financial interest or managerial authority in the partnership or organization undertake to be responsible for the nonlawyer participants to the same extent as if nonlawyer participants were lawyers under Rule 5.1;[6]
> 4. The foregoing conditions are set forth in writing.

From the description the inquirer has provided, we assume that the employee "performs professional services which [would] assist the organization in providing legal services to clients." Rule 5.4(a)(4) provides, "Sharing of fees is permitted in a partnership or other form of organization which meets the requirements of paragraph (b)."

The District of Columbia Court of Appeals, which governs the D.C. Bar, has determined that lawyers and nonlawyers should be permitted to form a partnership or some other form of business venture. This reflects a judgment that clients can be better served when lawyers and other professionals combine to provide professional services to the public. See D.C. Rule 5.4, comments [3], [4], and [7]. Our Court of Appeals has decided that so long as the principals of these business units adhere to the Rules of Professional Conduct, such ventures are permissible.

We conclude, therefore, that forming such an organization is permissible under Rule 5.4(b). In reaching this conclusion, we recognize that it would clearly be permissible under Rule 5.4(b) for the law firm to admit the consultant as a partner. Partners are compensated in a myriad of ways, and compensation could be based on the success of the cases on which the partner/consultant works. If the compensation system could be effected in this fashion, we see no impediment to the consultant and lawyers entering into the proposed joint venture arrangement. We take comfort from Rule 5.4(b)'s requirement that nonlawyer partners adhere to the Rules of Professional Conduct and that their lawyer partners are responsible for seeing that they do. Because the cases on which the consultant/partner would work are class actions, and because all members of the class are unknown, some of the joint venture's "clients" will not know that a nonlawyer is a principal in the joint venture. This also would be the case if a law firm with a nonlawyer partner wants to bring a class action, and the joint venture would have to adhere to the various special rules that govern class actions and protect class members.

[5] We do not mean in any way to suggest that nonlawyer employees may not be paid a bonus because of exceptional performance or that a bonus or other compensation may not be tied to firm profitability. Many other jurisdictions have approved such arrangements and found them not to violate Rule 5.4, as long as the compensation was not tied to the fees earned from a specific case or set of cases.

[6] Rule 5.1 sets forth the responsibilities of a partner or supervisory lawyer to make reasonable efforts to ensure that the lawyers she supervises or practices with conform to the Rules of Professional Conduct.

We point out, however, that the organization must adhere to the restrictions set out in Rule 5.4(b) as well as other restrictions set out in the Rules and elsewhere. For example, Rule 7.5(d) would require clients to be informed with clarity whether they were being represented by the law firm or by the joint venture organization, which would have to have a different names. These two entities would have to be separate entities in fact. Efforts would have to be made to protect the client secrets of the law firm from the members of the joint venture organization who were not firm members. Many of the considerations set forth in our Opinion No. 303, which concern the sharing of office space by unaffiliated lawyers, would apply. These would include separate letterhead, separate filing systems, appropriate signage if the same offices are utilized by both entities, proper telephone greetings by the receptionists, restrictions on access to computerized records, and the like.

We also believe that there would be some substantial practical barriers to the formation of such a joint venture organization unless the class action cases were all brought in the District of Columbia. No other U.S. jurisdiction permits lawyers and nonlawyers to practice together in this fashion. In fact, a member of the Virginia bar, who practices in a District of Columbia law firm that includes a nonlawyer as a partner, apparently may not engage in the practice of law in Virginia. VA Eth. Op. 1584 (1994). Were this joint venture organization to litigate any of these class actions in jurisdictions other than the District of Columbia, it might well face a claim that under the rules of the forum jurisdiction, it had entered into an unethical fee arrangement. See Rule 8.5(b) (choice of law rule applies disciplinary rules of foreign jurisdiction to conduct in connection with judicial proceedings in that jurisdiction.) In short, we believe that these practical limitations, plus the requirement that separate firms adhere to the appropriate formalities to operate in fact separately, may mean that such arrangements will be of utility only in limited circumstances.

Nevertheless, our Rules permit such organizations, and we see little distinction between forming such a joint venture organization with a consultant as a principal and the formation of a small public utilities law practice with an economist as principal. In each case the nonlawyer shares the fees, has a say in the organizational governance, and may be involved in every case. Rule 5.4 expressly allows the latter structure, and Comment 7 expressly endorses an economist's joining a public utility practice. If our Rules allow one, they should allow both. So while the compensation plan would violate Rule 5.4(a) if implemented by a law firm, it is permitted by Rule 5.4(b) if the firm and the nonlawyer employee form a joint venture organization, provided that they adhere to the restrictions that the Rules impose on such an organization.

Adopted: 16 February 2004
Published 17 February 2004

Opinion No. 323

Misrepresentation by an Attorney Employed by a Government Agency as Part of Official Duties

• Lawyers employed by government agencies who act in a non-representational official capacity in a manner they reasonably believe to be authorized by law do not violate Rule 8.4 if, in the course of their employment, they make misrepresentations that are reasonably intended to further the conduct of their official duties.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Inquiry

The Committee has received an inquiry on a matter relating to the obligation of an attorney under Rule 8.4(c). We are asked to determine whether attorneys who are employed by a national intelligence agency violate the Rules of Professional Conduct if they engage in fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation in the course of their non-representational official duties.

Discussion

Rule 8.4(c) of the Rules of Professional Responsibility makes it professional misconduct for a lawyer to "engage in conduct involving fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation." This prohibition applies to attorneys in whatever capacity they are acting—it is not limited to conduct occurring during the representation of a client and is, therefore, facially applicable to the conduct of attorneys in a non-representational context. See ABA Formal Op. No. 336 (1974) (lawyer must comply with applicable disciplinary rules at all times).[1]

The prohibition on misrepresentation would, therefore, facially apply to attorneys conducting certain activities that are part of their official duties as officers or employees of the United States when the attorneys are employed in an intelligence or national security capacity. Thus, though the inquirer asked specifically about misrepresentations made by intelligence officers acting in their official capacity as authorized by law, the principles enunciated in this opinion are equally applicable to other governmental officers who are attorneys and whose duties require the making of misrepresentations as authorized by law as part of their official duties.

Such employees may, on occasion, be required to act deceitfully in the conduct of their official duties on behalf of the United States, as authorized by law. It is easy, for example, to imagine attorneys whose work for the CIA might require their personal clandestine work and falsification of their identity, employment status, or fidelity to the United States. We are confronted with the question whether such misrepresentations run afoul of Rule 8.4's anti-deceit prohibition.[2]

For three reasons, we conclude that Rule 8.4 does not prohibit conduct of the nature described.

First, our conclusion is premised on our understanding of the purposes for which Rule 8.4 was adopted. The prohi-

[1] This opinion applies only to the conduct of attorneys acting in a non-representational capacity. It does not address potentially applicable requirements under Rule 4.1(communication with clients), or Rule 4.3 (dealing, on behalf of clients, with unrepresented parties) which, inter alia, prohibits attorneys from making a false statement of material fact to a third party "in the course of representing a client."

[2] Rule 8.4(c) prohibits a lawyer from engaging in conduct "involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation." And "fraud" is, of course, separately defined by the Rules. See D.C. Rules of Prof. Conduct, Terminology (defining "fraud" and "fraudulent" as "conduct having a purpose to deceive"). For convenience sake, we refer to Rule 8.4(c) as the anti-deceit provision, while recognizing that the scope of the prohibition may depend upon a close analysis of the meaning of each of the four related prohibitions.

bition against engaging in conduct "involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation" applies, in our view, only to conduct that calls into question a lawyer's suitability to practice law. The Comments to Rule 8.4 discuss why the current version discarded earlier references to a prohibition on conduct involving "moral turpitude" (as the conduct that had been proscribed was referred to in our former Code of Professional Responsibility). Comment [1] explains that this somewhat archaic formulation, > can be construed to include offenses concerning some matters of personal morality, such as adultery and comparable offenses, that have no specific connection to fitness for the practice of law. Although a lawyer is personally answerable to the entire criminal law, a lawyer should be professionally answerable only for offenses that indicate lack of those characteristics relevant to law practice.

D.C. Rule 8.4, Comment [1]; see also In re White, 815 P.2d 1257 (Or. 1991) (concluding that Rule applies to conduct in violation of criminal law if it "reflects adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer in other respects").

Thus, in rejecting the formulation of "moral turpitude" and substituting the current anti-deceit formulation, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals has indicated its intention to limit the scope of Rule 8.4 to conduct which indicates that an attorney lacks the character required for bar membership. As the Comments elaborate, this may include "violence, dishonesty, breach of trust, or serious interference with the administration of justice." D.C. Rule 8.4, Comment [1].[3] But, clearly, it does not encompass all acts of deceit—for example, a lawyer is not to be disciplined professionally for committing adultery, or lying about the lawyer's availability for a social engagement.

Given this understanding of Rule 8.4, in our judgment the category of conduct proscribed by the Rule does not include misrepresentations made in the course of official conduct as an employee of an agency of the United States if the attorney reasonably believes that the conduct in question is authorized by law. An attorney's professional competence and ability are not called into question by service in our intelligence or national security agencies in conformance with legal authorization, nor is it called into question by the use of effective covert means to achieve legitimate national security goals. Cf. Apple Corps Ltd. v. International Collectors Society, 15 F. Supp. 2d 456, 476 (D.N.J. 1998) (concluding that investigator's and tester's misrepresentation of identity is not a misrepresentation of "such gravity as to raise questions as to a person's fitness to be a lawyer"). As a consequence, we do not believe that Rule 8.4(c) is intended to reach lawful, authorized official conduct, even if there is a deceitful component to that conduct.

Second, our conclusion in this regard is buttressed by an analogous provision of the Rules and its construction within this jurisdiction. Rule 4.2 prohibits certain communications between a lawyer and an opposing party who is represented by counsel. This jurisdiction has construed the Rule to permit lawful law enforcement activity. Thus, our Commentary says that:

> This Rule is not intended to enlarge or restrict the law enforcement activities of the United States or the District of Columbia which are authorized and permissible under the Constitution and the laws of the United States or the District of Columbia. The "authorized by law" proviso to Rule 4.2(a) is intended to permit government conduct that is valid under this law.

Rule 4.2, Comment [8].[4]

The Virginia Standing Committee on Legal Ethics recently recognized the parallel between law enforcement and intelligence activity in an opinion that is consistent with our views. In Va. Legal Ethics Opinion 1738 (2000), the Virginia Standing Committee considered whether the ethical rule prohibiting non-consensual tape recording then in effect in Virginia applied to law enforcement undercover activities. The Virginia Standing Committee concluded that it did not. In Va. Legal Ethics Opinion 1765 (2003), the Virginia Standing Committee then considered whether the policies animating the exception for law enforcement undercover activities expressed in Opinion 1738 also authorized the use of non-consensual tape recording and other covert activities by attorneys working for a federal intelligence agency. Reasoning by analogy to its earlier decision concerning law enforcement undercover activities, the Committee agreed that covert intelligence activities also serve "important and judicially-sanctioned social policies." Accordingly Opinion 1765 concluded that "when an attorney employed by the federal government uses lawful methods such as the use of 'alias identities' and non-consensual tape-recording, as part of his intelligence or covert activities, those methods cannot be seen as reflecting adversely on his fitness to practice law; therefore such conduct will not violate the prohibition in Rule 8.4(c)." That reasoning is equally persuasive to this Committee.

To be sure, Rule 8.4 does not have an "authorized by law" proviso, like that in Rule 4.2, and the absence of such a provision authorizing deceit in the intelligence, national security, or other foreign representational context might be construed as indicating that such conduct is not permitted. Nonetheless, we agree with Virginia that the treatment of law enforcement activity is instructive of the proper treatment of intelligence activity. A better construction is to view Comment [8] to Rule 4.2 as expressing a general approval of lawful undercover activity by government agents and the failure to mention the myriad ways in which the issue might arise simply reflects the drafters' focus on the more immediate issue of law enforcement activity that was before them. We do not think that the Court of Appeals intended to authorize legitimate law enforcement undercover activity while proscribing covert activity in aid of our national security; we would not impute so illogical an intent to the drafters absent far stronger evidence.

Third, "[t]he Rules of Professional Conduct are rules of reason. They should be interpreted with reference to the purposes of legal representation and of the law itself." D.C. Rules, Scope, Comment [1]. Some activities conducted on behalf of the United States necessarily involve circumstances where disclosure of one's identity or purpose would be inappropriate—and, indeed, potentially dangerous. We do not think that the Rules of Professional Conduct require lawyers to choose between their personal safety or compliance with the law, on the one hand,[5] and

[3] In March 2003, the Virginia Supreme Court made this connection explicit by amending the Virginia version of Rule 8.4(c) to prohibit "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation which reflects adversely on a lawyer's fitness to practice law." Va. R. Prof. Cond. 8.4(c).

[4] Some other jurisdictions have construed this provision to preclude law enforcement agents, acting at the direction of a lawyer, from conducting covert, undercover activity against individuals who are represented by counsel. Cf. In re Gatti, 8 P.3d 966 (Or. 2000), overruled, Or. DR 1-102(D) & Or. Formal Op. 2003-173.

[5] In some circumstances, federal law affirmatively prohibits disclosure of information relating maintenance of their bar licenses, on the other. See Utah State Bar Ethics Advisory Committee Op. No. 02-05 (2002) (relying on "rule of reasons" provision to conclude that government attorneys' "lawful participation in a lawful government operation" does not violate Rule 8.4 if deceit is "required in the successful furtherance" of the undercover or covert operation).

For these several reasons we are convinced that the anti-deceit provisions of Rule 8.4 do not prohibit attorneys from misrepresenting their identity, employment or even allegiance to the United States if such misrepresentations are made in support of covert activity on behalf of the United States and are duly authorized by law.[6]

Finally, we emphasize the narrow scope of this opinion. It applies only to misrepresentations made in the course of official conduct when the employee (while acting in a non-representational capacity, see supra n.1), reasonably believes that applicable law authorizes the misrepresentations. It is not blanket permission for an attorneys employed by government agencies to misrepresent themselves. Nor does it authorize misrepresentation when a countervailing legal duty to give truthful answers applies. Thus, for example, false testimony under oath in a United States court or before the Congress is prohibited, see In re Abrams, 689 A.2d 6 (D.C. 1997) (en banc), notwithstanding any countervailing intelligence or national security justification. And, of course, this opinion does not authorize deceit for non-official reasons, or where an attorney could not, objectively, have a reasonable belief that applicable law authorizes the actions in question.

With that limitation, our conclusion is as follows: Lawyers employed by government agencies who act in a non-representational official capacity in a manner they reasonably believe to be authorized by law do not violate Rule 8.4 if, in the course of their employment, they make misrepresentations that are reasonably intended to further the conduct of their official duties.

to the identity of covert agents, for example. See, e.g., 50 U.S.C. § 421.

[6] This Committee lacks the expertise to precisely identify, for example, which covert activities are authorized by law. Moreover, such an enumeration would exceed our charter, which ordinarily limits our opinions to interpretations of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct. We emphasize, however, that for conduct to come within the safe-harbor of this opinion the lawyer must reasonably believe that the conduct in question was both authorized by law and reasonably intended to further the attorney's official duties.

Inquiry No.: 01-11-25
Adopted: 29 March 2004
Published: 30 March 2004

Opinion 324

Disclosure of Deceased Client's Files

- When a spouse who is executor of a deceased spouse's estate requests that the deceased spouse's former attorney turn over information obtained in the course of the professional relationship between the deceased spouse and the former attorney, the former attorney may provide such information to the spouse/executor, if (1) the attorney concludes that the information is not a confidence or secret, or, (2) if it is a confidence or secret, the attorney has reasonable grounds for believing that release of the information is impliedly authorized in furthering the interests of the former client in settling her estate. Where these conditions are not met, the deceased spouse's former attorney should seek instructions from a court as to the disposition of materials reflecting confidences or secrets obtained in the course of the professional relationship with the former client. In the absence of such a court order, the attorney should dispose of the materials according to the guidance in Opinion 283.

Applicable Rule

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality)

Inquiry

We have received a request for an opinion concerning disposition of documents in the possession of an attorney following a client's death. The inquirers are members of a law firm who represent a husband who is executor and sole heir of his deceased wife's estate. The husband has asked that his wife's former attorney[1] turn over to the estate all documents and files his deceased wife furnished to her attorney, as well as all documents and files the attorney generated or retained in connection with the representation of the wife. These documents and files may be relevant to a legal claim the estate may have against third parties. The inquirers state that the wife's attorney has expressed concerns that releasing the requested documents and files might violate "the attorney-client or attorney work product privileges" and that, "due to the nature of the representation of the deceased spouse," the materials "constitute secrets [sic] and are protected by attorney-client privilege."

The inquirers ask three questions: First, what should become of the documents and files the deceased wife furnished to her attorney? Second, what should become of the documents and files the attorney has generated and retained in connection with her former representation of the deceased wife? Third, may this attorney speak with the former client's husband, who is the executor and sole heir to the estate, without violating "the attorney-client or attorney work product privileges"?

Although the inquirers cast their questions in the framework of privilege law, our answers are confined to their professional responsibilities under the D.C. Rules of Professional Responsibility ("D.C. Rules"), because our charter ordinarily does not extend to questions of substantive law beyond interpretation of the Rules. We thus offer this analysis of the scope of an attorney's continuing duties of confidentiality to a deceased client under D.C. Rule 1.6.

Discussion

D.C. Rule 1.6(a) provides that a lawyer may not reveal "a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client," except under certain specified circumstances. Rule 1.6(b) defines a "confidence" as "information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law," and "secret" as any "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client." Thus, unlike ABA Model Rule 1.6 and the rules of many other jurisdictions, D.C. Rule 1.6 does not define as confidential all information relating to legal representation.[2] Material that is not privileged under applicable evidentiary law and does not

[1] The term "former attorney" refers to the fact that the client is deceased. We do not intend to imply that the attorney-client relationship terminated for some other reason prior to the client's death.

[2] The deliberate decision to incorporate this difference from ABA Model Rule 1.6 is reflected in the legislative history of D.C. Rule 1.6. See Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct and Related Comments, Showing the Language Proposed by the American Bar Association, Changes Recommended by the District of Columbia Bar Model Rules of Professional Conduct Committee, and meet the definition of a "secret" under D.C. Rule 1.6(b) may be disclosed. See D.C. Rule 1.6 Comment [6].

The "fundamental principle" underlying D.C. Rule 1.6 is that the lawyer should hold inviolate client "secrets and confidences" so that the client will be "encouraged to communicate fully and frankly with the lawyer even as to embarrassing or legally damaging subject matter." D.C. Rule 1.6 Comment [4]. This duty of confidentiality applies to information in any form,[3] and continues after the termination of the lawyer's employment. D.C. Rule 1.6(f). The "duty of confidentiality continues as long as the lawyer possesses confidential client information" and extends "beyond the end of the representation and beyond the death of the client." Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 60 comment e (2000).

The attorney-client privilege also usually extends beyond the death of a client. See, e.g., Swidler & Berlin v. United States, 524 U.S. 399 (1998) (holding that attorney-client privilege extends beyond the death of a client and citing numerous cases in agreement from a wide variety of jurisdictions.) As the Court in Swidler discussed, the testamentary exception to the general rule that attorney-client privilege extends beyond a client's death may permit disclosure of privileged information in the context of settling a deceased client's estate, because "the privilege, which normally protects the client's interest, could be impliedly waived in order to fulfill the client's testamentary intent." Id. at 405 (citations omitted). A spouse may waive a deceased former client's attorney-client privilege in other circumstances as well, such as where a statute authorizes or requires this step. See, e.g., State v. Doe, 101 Ohio St. 3d 170, 803 N.E.2d 777 (2004) (applying 50-year old untested Ohio statute authorizing surviving spouse to waive deceased spouse's attorney-client privilege to require an attorney to testify about what a deceased client told her in a missing-child case).

In short, whether the materials at issue in the inquirers' situation can be revealed to the inquirers' client in his capacity as executor of his wife's estate depends on the nature of the information they contain. Revealing the information would be appropriate if it does not constitute a confidence or secret under the definitions in D.C. Rule 1.6(a). Even if the information is covered by the duty of confidentiality as defined in Rule 1.6, release would be appropriate so long as the attorney has reasonable grounds for concluding that release of the information is impliedly authorized in furthering the former client's interests in settling her estate. The inquirers have told us nothing about the nature of the matter in which the wife sought an attorney's representation, except that it may be relevant to a legal claim the estate may wish to pursue against third parties. With these limited facts we cannot opine on the proper disposition of the documents and files retained by the deceased wife's former attorney, but do offer a more general analysis that we hope will be of help.

In general, the exceptions to D.C. Rule 1.6 permit a lawyer to reveal confidences and secrets when: (i) the "lawyer has reasonable grounds for believing that a client has impliedly authorized disclosure of a confidence or secret in order to carry out the representation," Rule 1.6(c)(4); (ii) with the client's consent, after full disclosure to the client, Rule 1.6(d)(2); or when permitted by the Rules or (iii) "required by law or court order," Rule 1.6(d)(1). Much information an attorney gains in the course of a representation is routinely disclosed on grounds of implied authorization to carry out the representation, as in drafting a complaint, for example. In the ordinary case, release of information an executor requests would be impliedly authorized under D.C. Rule 1.6(d)(4). In some unusual circumstances, however, an attorney facing the question of disclosure of a deceased client's files or other information to a spouse/executor may confront a more difficult dilemma. An attorney unsure whether a deceased former client wanted information to be disclosed cannot seek the client's instructions as contemplated under D.C. Rule 1.6(d)(1). Instead, the attorney must decide what the client's instructions would have been if the attorney could have consulted her, and this may present a close question.

To take a hypothetical example: Imagine that a wife's will states that she wishes to divide her property equally among her children. The wife later consults another attorney ("second attorney") and confides to this second attorney that, prior to her current marriage, she gave birth to a child about which she has not informed her current husband, and wishes to provide for that child in her will without disclosing the nature of her relationship to this individual. The second attorney begins to prepare a new draft of her will, but the wife unexpectedly dies before it is finalized and signed. After the wife's death, the husband, who is executor of the wife's estate, asks the second attorney for information about the representation. The second attorney must decide whether she has information that is a confidence or a secret. In the example, the fact of the wife's prior child is probably both: the wife told the second attorney this information in the course of seeking legal advice, and stated that she did not want this information disclosed to her husband. But whether the wife would want her wishes to provide for this individual to be known after her death is a more difficult question. The wife expressed to the second attorney her wish that all of her children be provided for, on the one hand, but may wish that her husband not learn of her prior child, on the other.

The decision about what to do in such a situation will require the attorney to exercise her best professional judgment. An attorney who reasonably believes that she knows what her client would have wanted, on the basis of either what the client told her or the best available evidence of what the client's instructions would have been, should carry out her client's wishes. The attorney will usually be best situated to make this determination. In rare situations, however, the attorney may wish to seek an order from the court supervising disposition of the estate and present the materials at issue for the court's in camera consideration.

In reaching these recommendations, we are assisted by a number of opinions from other jurisdictions. The Disciplinary Board of the Hawaii Supreme Court, for example, addressed the question of when an attorney may disclose confidential information concerning a deceased client in Formal Opinion No. 38 (1999). The Changes Recommended by the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia Bar (unpublished document dated November 19, 1986), at 41 (deleting ABA Model Rule language covering all "information relating to representation of a client" and inserting D.C. Rule 1.6(b) language defining "confidence" and "secret"); id. at 44 (adding same language to D.C. Rule 1.6 comment [6]); id. at 50 (explaining that D.C. Rule 1.6(a) is substantially identical to ABA Model Code DR 4-101(A), which defines "confidence" and "secret"); id. at 52 (explaining that the Committee and Board preferred the narrower scope of DR 4-101(A) to the ABA's unexplained change in the scope of Model Rule 1.6).

---

[3] See D.C. Rule 1.6 Comment [6] ("This ethical precept, unlike evidentiary privilege, exists without regard to the nature or source of the information or the fact that others share the knowledge"); Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 59 comment b (definition of confidential information includes documents, files, photographs and other similar materials).

Board noted that the duty of confidentiality is broader than the attorney-client privilege and that, although a client's heir or personal representative may have authority to waive the attorney-client privilege, the confidentiality protection under the Hawaii Rules of Professional Conduct may still apply. The Board further noted that obtaining client consent to such a disclosure under the Hawaii rules would not be possible once the client was deceased. The Board concluded, however, that such disclosure might be impliedly authorized in order to carry out the representation, and that in determining the necessity of disclosure of confidential information on this ground the attorney should "consider the intentions of the client." Thus, if an attorney reasonably determines that confidentiality should be waived in order to effectuate the deceased client's estate plan, the attorney would be both "permitted and obligated to make such disclosure." See also Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 60 comment I ("the lawyer may reveal confidential client information to contending heirs or other claimants to an interest through a deceased client" if there is "a reasonable prospect that doing so would advance the interest of the client-decedent").[4]

The Philadelphia Ethics Committee recently considered a situation in which an inquiring attorney represented a client who committed suicide while being treated for mental health problems in a treatment facility. Philadelphia Bar Ass'n Ethics Op. 2003-11 (2003). The former client's father asked the inquirer for information about his son's death, and the inquirer asked whether Pennsylvania Rule of Professional Conduct 1.6 prohibited the inquirer from complying with the father's request. The Committee reasoned that none of the exceptions to Rule 1.6 applied, but that the lawyer could look to the legal representative of the client for decisions on the client's behalf.[5] The Committee concluded that if the father was appointed executor of his son's estate, he would be authorized to consent to the disclosure of information relating to his son's representation. The Committee cautioned, however, that if the attorney were aware that the former client would not have consented to the revelation of information, the information should not be disclosed.

Finally, in Nassau County (N.Y.) Committee on Professional Ethics Opinion No. 03-4 (2003), the inquirer had represented a woman who sought to file a divorce action against her husband. The client told the inquirer that she did not want to serve papers against her husband or tell him about her plans until she had discussed the matter with her children after they finished their pending college semesters. Ten days later, the client died suddenly. The client's husband discovered that his wife had sought legal representation when he found a check stub showing her payment of the inquirer's retainer fee, and asked the inquirer for itemized billing information. The Nassau County Ethics Committee concluded that, if the information sought revealed the former client's confidences or secrets related to the inquirer's representation of her, the inquirer could not disclose the information requested. The Committee noted that the spouse/executor was the very person whom the inquirer's former client requested not be informed of her plans to seek a divorce until she had "informed her children, a plan upset by her sudden death," and that it was unclear whether the spouse/executor, in requesting the detailed billing records, was "acting to protect the estate and its beneficiaries, or to satisfy his own personal interests." Nassau Op. 03-4 at 2, 5.

The Nassau County Ethics Committee had several helpful suggestions for lawyers facing similar situations. First, the Committee suggested that the inquirer determine whether the spouse/executor would accept the requested itemized billing information in a redacted form that avoided disclosure of his wife's secrets and confidences. This course, the Committee pointed out, could satisfy the spouse/executor's fiduciary duty to determine the proper amount of the partial refund of the retainer fee owed the estate. A similar result might be achieved by offering the written retainer agreement redacted so as to omit the purpose of the legal representation. Op. 03-4 at 6. Finally, the Committee noted that, if the spouse/executor was not satisfied with such offers of redacted documents, the inquirer's refusal to turn over all of the information requested might lead the spouse/executor to seek judicially ordered disclosure in the probate proceeding or related separate action. This development would require the inquirer to present the relevant facts and professional responsibility issues to a court for its determination, including a possible in camera examination of the inquirer's unredacted records. If a court ordered disclosure of the records, the inquirer could either comply with the order, as permitted under the New York provision equivalent to D.C. Rule 1.6(d)(2)(A), or seek appellate review if appropriate.

Our prior opinions have said that an attorney must refuse requests for disclosure of confidential client information until a court has entered a final judicial order requiring such disclosure. See D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 214 (1990). We concluded that the attorney need not also pursue appellate review of that order. Id. We further noted that the attorney must give the client notice of the order and a reasonable opportunity to seek review of the order independently. Id. These are conditions that cannot be satisfied when the client is deceased. Nonetheless, we think the reasoning of the Nassau Committee is sound on this point, and that, in the general case of a deceased client, an attorney may disclose confidential client information once he or she has been finally ordered to do so by a court, without necessarily seeking appellate review of the court's order. D.C. Rule 1.6(d)(2)(A).

Our prior opinions have also offered guidance to attorneys on handling documents and other materials related to the representation of a former client. In D.C. Bar Ethics Opinion 283 (1998), we advised that lawyers must take care to protect the confidentiality of the contents of clients' closed files. We advised that in a situation in which it was not possible to obtain instructions from the former client or his legal representative as to what to do with such files, a lawyer who concludes that "further retention of a former client's closed files is 'not reasonably practical to protect a client's interests' may destroy the files five years after the termination of the representation." Id.

In sum, the proper disposition of the documents the wife's former attorney retains from the prior representation depends on the husband/executor's status

[4] Other ethics committee opinions reaching similar conclusions include Kansas Bar Association Professional Ethics Advisory Comm. 01-1 (2001) (a lawyer may use or reveal confidential client information or documents to advance a deceased client's interests in the disposition of property rights by inheritance, but the transfer of information or documents should be limited to that necessary to defend and prove the rights at issue and should not contain information that could be adverse to the deceased client); North Carolina State Bar Ethics Op. 206 (1995) (a lawyer may reveal a client's confidential information to the personal representative of the client's estate, unless the disclosure of confidential information would be clearly contrary to the goals of the original representation or would be contrary to the instructions of the client to the lawyer prior to the client's death).

[5] Here the Committee turned to Rule 1.14, which deals with a client under a disability, perhaps because that Rule would have applied to the former client while living.

in relation to the matter handled in the prior representation. If the matter relates to the husband's fiduciary duties in handling the disposition of the wife's estate, and if disclosure of the information is impliedly authorized in order to further the deceased client's interests as the former attorney can best ascertain them, then the attorney should furnish the materials to the husband/executor. On the other hand, if these conditions are not met, the wife's former attorney should not turn over the documents. If the attorney reasonably believes that the correct course of conduct is uncertain, she should seek instructions from a court. If no such instructions are forthcoming, the attorney should dispose of the documents according to the guidelines in our Opinion 283. The same analysis applies on the inquirers' question whether the former wife's attorney may speak to the executor/husband. An attorney may disclose a deceased former client's secrets and confidences in any manner, including oral conversation, only if the conditions discussed in this opinion have been met.

Inquiry No. 04-01-02
Adopted: 18 May 2004
Published: May 2004

Opinion No. 325

Agreement to Distribute Former Firm Profits to Partners From Former Firm Only as Long as They Continue To Practice in new Merged Firm: Rule 5.6(a)

- When a law firm is about to merge with another firm, its partners agree to distribute profits already earned by the former firm, but which will be paid in the future, only to partners who continue to practice with the post-merger firm. This agreement violates Rule 5.6(a) because it creates a financial disincentive to partners to leave the merged firm and practice with another firm. The exception in Rule 5.6(a) for an agreement relating to benefits upon retirement applies only to the type of retirement typical at the end of a career and not to all departures from a firm.

Applicable Rule

- Rule 5.6(a)

Inquiry

The inquirer poses a question of the interpretation of Rule 5.6(a) as applied in the context of law firm mergers. As stated by the inquirer, the facts are these:

1. Factual background

The inquirer was a partner in a Law Firm, which merged with another firm to become Merged Law Firm. Before the merger, the Law Firm was owed fees by some clients for work that had already been completed. These fee payments were to be made over time, but the Law Firm needed to do nothing further to be entitled to them. Anticipating the merger, the partners of Law Firm assigned the future right to receive these fees to a new entity, Receivables LLC. Under the agreement of those partners that created this LLC, each Law Firm partner was entitled to a fixed and specifically stated percentage share of the LLC's receivables equal to that partner's share of Law Firm profits. This was called a Management share. In addition, those partners who were regarded as having originated client business that led to the receivables were entitled to a further specifically enumerated percentage of the receivables, called an Originator's share. The inquirer was an Originator and thus was entitled both to a Management share representing his share of the pre-merger Law Firm's profits, plus an Originator's share. Thus, after the merger the LLC received sums attributable to Law Firm work done before the merger and paid those out to the partners of the pre-merger Law Firm.

Under the documents creating Receivables LLC, the partners' rights to receive Management and Originator's shares were not unconditional. The agreement creating the LLC provides that if any partner of the pre-merger Law Firm who is a member of Receivables LLC leaves the Merged Law Firm before December 31 of the year following the year of the merger (a period of two years from the effective date of the merger), that partner's Management share in Receivables LLC ceases at that time—does not vest[1] in the terminology of the agreement—and the payments stop, unless the departure within that period from the Merged Law Firm is attributable to death, illness, or retirement from the practice of law, in which case the payments do not stop with the departure from the Merged Law Firm. If the partner leaves the Merged Law Firm after two years have elapsed since the merger, then the payments continue despite the departure. In addition, if any partner who is also an Originator, like inquirer, leaves the Merged Law Firm at any time and for any reason, then that Originator's share becomes void and the payments of the Originator's share stops. Thus, documents creating Receivables LLC condition the right to receive sums owed to the pre-merger Law Firm in such a way as to create incentives to partners of the former Law Firm to continue practicing with the Merged Law Firm.

The inquirer reports that after the merger, the Merged Law Firm decided to pursue clients whose interests tended to conflict with those of the clients whom the inquirer tended to represent. It was not possible for inquirer to continue to represent the clients that were the inquirer's traditional client base. The inquirer states, "At the [Merged Firm's] direction, I am forced to find a new firm to practice with." The departure of the inquirer would effectively be before the expiration of the two-year period, so that departure would result in the loss by the inquirer of all rights to a continuing share, including both a Membership share and an Originator's share of income from Receivables LLC.

2. The Applicable Rule

Rule 5.6(a) provides that a lawyer may not "make or participate in making a partnership or employment agreement that restricts the rights of a lawyer to practice after termination of the relationship, except an agreement concerning benefits on retirement ..." While there has been a great deal written about Rule 5.6(a) (including our opinions 291, 241, 221, and 65 [2]), we think it useful to discuss its basic framework.

The Rule first bars a lawyer from participating in the offering or making of a partnership or employment agreement that "restricts the right of a lawyer to practice after termination of the relationship . . ." There is then an exception for agreements "concerning benefits upon retirement ..." Rule 5.6(a) is "substantially similar" to its predecessor, DR 2–108(a) of the Model Code of Professional Responsibility. See the report of the District of Columbia Bar Model Rules of Professional Conduct Committee, with the changes recommended by the Board of Governors, submitted with the Board's Petition recommending adoption the Rules to the D.C. Court of Appeals, November 1986 at page 210.

Rule 5.6(a) seeks to prevent lawyers from entering into agreements that will discourage lawyers from moving from one firm to another. The reason for the Rule is that clients may benefit when their lawyers (either at the beginning of their careers or later) can improve their work environment. The D.C. Court of Appeals has favorably quoted the Committee's determination in Opinion No. 241 that the Rule is a mechanism "to protect the ability of clients to obtain lawyers of their own choosing and to enable lawyers to advance their careers." Neuman v. Akman, 715 A.2d 127, 131 (D.C. 1998). The Committee has more recently stressed that clients not infrequently recommend a change of law firm to lawyers, for various reasons, and Opinion No. 273 (1997) requires lawyers to consult with their clients before changing firms precisely because such changes are often important to clients. This principle of facilitating lawyers' changes in their practice environment to benefit clients finds expression elsewhere in our Rules, such as the special provisions seeking to facilitate the movement of lawyers from firm to firm in Rule 1.10. See Comments [10], [11], and [21] to Rule 1.10.[3] Such considerations are not unique to the District of Columbia but are shared by other jurisdictions. See 2 Hazard & Hodes, The Law of Lawyering § 47.4 at 47-5 (3d ed. 2001).

[1] The term "vest," while perhaps not entirely legally accurate, is used in the LLC documents, and for convenience we will use it here.

[2] Opinion 65 interpreted the former DR 2-108(A).

It has long been clear that Rule 5.6(a) bars not only agreements that would explicitly restrict lawyers' practices but also reaches agreements that may not explicitly bar such actions but create financial disincentives to taking these actions. In Opinion No. 65 (1979) this Committee considered an agreement that sought to compel a lawyer to pay 40 per cent of any fees received from a client of the lawyer's former firm if earned within two years after the lawyer's departure from the firm. It concluded that such an agreement violated DR 2 108(a) because "[i]ts effect is to impose a barrier to the creation of a lawyer/client relationship between the departing lawyer and the clients of his former firm." Even if it did not do so literally, the Committee noted, such a barrier interfered with clients' choice of attorney because "[t]he departing attorney would find work for clients of the former firm economically less attractive than work at similar rates received from other clients, and might be deterred from accepting employment from such clients."

Opinion No. 241 (1991) concluded that an agreement created a financial disincentive on a departed lawyer's competition with the lawyer's former firm. There, a law firm's partnership agreement provided for the repayment of a partner's capital account over a period of five years, except that where after departure a partner practiced law in the District of Columbia, the repayments were delayed for five years or until the departing partner had reached the age of 65 or stopped practicing in the District of Columbia. The Committee concluded that the agreement violated Rule 5.6(a) because "the financial penalties imposed on a departing lawyer serve no other purpose than restricting practice and insulating the firm from potential competition."

We note, however, that the simple existence of an economic cost to leave a firm does not necessarily mean that Rule 5.6(a) has been violated. To constitute a violation, an agreement must effectively "restrict the rights of a lawyer to practice after termination of the relationship." Where such a restriction is not explicit, the effect of the agreement must be to create such a restriction on competition or other limitation on practice. For this reason, it can be necessary to examine surrounding circumstances to determine whether a violation of the Rule 5.6(a) has occurred where the restriction on a lawyer's practice is not expressed.[4]

The Rule also contains an exception for "an agreement concerning benefits on retirement." Much of the attention that has been paid to this rule by courts, ethics committees, and commentators has dealt with this exception, whose scope is often debated. See, e.g., Borteck v. Riker, Danzig, Scherer, Hyland & Perretti LLP, 844 A. 2d 521 (N.J. 2004) (in which, at 530-31, the New Jersey Supreme Court called upon its Professional Responsibility Rules Committee to review Rule 5.6(a) "to determine whether the rule should define 'retirement' and, if so, to propose a definition or related criteria"); Neuman, supra, 715 A. 2d at 136 (in which the D.C. Court of Appeals discussed, but found it unnecessary to decide, the issue of the scope of the exception). Courts that have decided the issue have generally concluded that the exception extends only to the kind of retirement that occurs at the end of a career. E.g., Cohen v. Lord, Day and Lord, 550 NE 2d 410 (N.Y. 1989); see Borteck, 844 A.2d at 527. Professors Hazard and Hodes agree that if "retirement" meant simply the termination of the "partnership or employment" relationship, then the exception would swallow the rule. It would except from the Rule's prohibition every agreement made on termination of every relationship. 2 Hazard and Hodes, The Law of Lawyering § 47.4 at 47-5 to 47-6. (3d ed. 2001). Although in Neuman v. Akman, 715 A. 2d at 126, the D.C. Court of Appeals did not have to decide the issue, by extensively describing why the agreement there at issue constituted a "retirement agreement" within the meaning of a retirement at the end of a career, and by favorably citing Gray v. Martin, 663 P. 2d 1285, 1290 (Oregon App. 1983), see Neuman, 715 A. 2d at 134, the court suggested that if called upon it would view this issue no differently from the other authorities we have cited. We therefore conclude that the provisions in question here, which apply when a partner leaves the Merged Law Firm regardless of age, do not come within the "retirement" exception of Rule 5.6(a).

3. Discussion

We first note that it might be argued that the agreement to form Receivables LLC was not a "partnership" agreement within the meaning of the Rule. However, the LLC was created by the partners of the pre-merger Law Firm solely to obtain and distribute to those partners funds owed to the pre-merger Law Firm in payment for its previously completed legal work. We therefore conclude that the agreement that created Receivables LLC is a "partnership . . . agreement" within the meaning of the Rule. Otherwise, a firm could avoid the prohibition of Rule 5.6 by creating a separate organization to handle portions, but not all, of the firm's law practice. Law firm mergers have become more frequent in recent years. Individual

[3] The case at hand is an example of the benefit that may flow to clients from a change of firm by a lawyer. The inquirer changed firms because the Merged Firm's practice had become less hospitable to the clients he represented, and he sought to practice in a different firm where his clients' goals did not conflict with those of other firm clients.

[4] See Opinion No. 221, involving a lawyer who had departed from a firm taking contingent fee clients along with him. An employment agreement between the lawyer and that firm provided that in the event of such a departure and the later receipt by the lawyer of a contingent fee from that client, a portion of that fee would be allocated and paid back to the former firm, with the allocation made on the basis of a percentage formula depending on the length of time the lawyer had worked on the case while at the firm. The Committee concluded that if the percentage formula "represent[ed] a generally fair allocation of fees based on the firm's historical experience there is no violation of Rule 5.6(a). On the other hand, if the firm's share is excessive, this would have the effect of restricting the right of the departing lawyer to practice after the termination of the relationship in violation of Rule 5.6(a)." The Committee also pointed out that it "cannot make fact findings" and thus "can neither approve nor disapprove the specific percentages used by the firm."

lawyers in a firm that is contemplating merging with another may be concerned about whether the firm that would result from the merger would be as satisfactory a place for them to practice for clients as was their pre-merger firm. Similarly, the question of which partners in the negotiating firms are likely to remain at the merged firm can be a feature of merger negotiations. In these contexts the limitations of Rule 5.6 can be particularly significant. It would not be consistent with the language or purpose of that Rule to allow partners of one or both of the merging firms to escape scrutiny under it by forming separate organizations to achieve some of their purposes.

We now examine in turn the two kinds of payments made under the agreement forming the LLC. We note as a preliminary point that we do not think that it could be argued that for purposes of this analysis under Rule 5.6 the Merged Firm is somehow a continuation of the pre-merger Law Firm. The LLC was formed only by the partners of the pre-existing Law Firm (and not by others involved in the merger) and applies only to them, and operation of the LLC is independent of the compensation of the Merged Law Firm.

Under the LLC, the Membership share amounts are paid to former Law Firm partners pursuant to fixed percentages attributable to each partner's ownership share of the pre-merger firm. These Membership interests expire, i.e., do not "vest," if a lawyer leaves the Merged Firm before the end of the two-year period, unless the reason for departure during that period is death, disability, illness, or retirement from the practice of law, in which case the right to continue receiving the payments vests even though the lawyer in question has departed before the two years had passed. As we have seen, the inquirer left within the two years, before his interest became fixed, because he felt that he could not pursue his practice freely and serve the clients that would most benefit from his experience and developed expertise, in the new direction that the Merged Firm took.

In effect, the imposition of the two-year vesting period is an action by the partners of the pre-merger Law Firm that uses assets belonging to them to induce themselves not to depart from the Merged Firm for at least two years after the merger. The pre-merger firm's entitlement to the payments was fixed before the merger. With the termination of the pre-merger Law Firm, its partners had the unconditional right to receive those sums as they were eventually paid. The agreement creating the LLC provides that these payments are to be distributed based on a formula using each lawyer's percentage share of the profits of the pre-merger Firm, a fixed formula entirely based on past events. But the agreement goes further and adds the condition that each lawyer's entitlement to continue to receive these payments depends on that lawyer remaining with the Merged Firm for two years. The fact that there is an exception to the two-year vesting requirement for partners who may retire from practice, die, or become disabled before the end of the two years underscores that those partners who are capable of leaving the firm to practice elsewhere are the ones who are affected by a financial disincentive inherent in the vesting period.[5]

For this reason, while the agreement here does not explicitly say that it cuts off payments where a lawyer leaves the Merged Firm to practice with others before the two-year vesting period ends, that is its clear impact—and it is what happened in the inquirer's situation. The two-year vesting requirement applies to cut off payments of the Management shares only to those lawyers who depart because they intend to practice law elsewhere.[6] It accordingly penalizes (by stopping the flow of previously earned income) those who continue to practice but do not do so with the Merged Firm. While it is of course possible that a partner would leave to practice law but not in competition with the Merged Firm (such as by moving to another city—although in specialized practice areas even such a move may not avoid competition with a lawyer's former firm), we believe that that is a comparatively rare occurrence for lawyers who have reached the stage in their careers where they are partners in a firm. That mere possibility does not change the dominant practical impact of the provision, which is to penalize those partners who seek to serve their clients by practicing elsewhere than the Merged Law Firm by depriving them of a portion of previously earned fees that otherwise would be theirs. Nor does the fact that the inquirer left the Merged Law Firm to conduct a kind of practice that that firm was not interested in pursuing affect our view. The inquirer wished to continue to represent clients with views generally opposed to that of the Merged Law Firm's clients. The purpose of Rule 5.6 is to bar agreements among lawyers that would create restrictions on a lawyer's ability to move to a better practice environment within which to seek to represent his or her clients' interests. An agreement that penalizes a lawyer for leaving a firm where most of the practice is hostile to the lawyer's particular clients is just as harmful to the purpose of Rule 5.6 as trying to prevent a lawyer from competing for the same kinds of clients as his former firm.[7]

The Originators' shares present a different and more difficult issue. The right to continue to receive an Originator's share does not ever become fixed, or vest, and therefore a partner who departs from the Merged Firm for any reason, including death, illness, retirement, moving to another firm (whether in competition with the Merged Firm or not), or leaving the profession to pursue another endeavor,

[5] Even with our conclusion that "retirement" means the end of a career practicing law, this portion of the agreement is not an "agreement concerning benefits on retirement" within the meaning of Rule 5.6(a). Its primary purpose is not to provide for retirement benefits, but to create a vesting period for continued entitlement to a division of fees earned in the past. This vesting period is imposed on partners who do not retire; the fact that it is waived for those who do retire does not alter its impact on those who do not. Moreover, none of the factors relied on by the court in Neuman as showing the kind of agreement that is a true retirement agreement under this view is present here. The funds distributed here are profits from work already done, not work to be done; there is no requirement that entitlement to those distributions is limited to partners of conventional retirement, and the payment of the benefits is not spread "over the entire remaining lifetime of the retiring partner." Neuman, 715 A 2d. at 136 - 38.

[6] Presumably a partner who enters another field of endeavor has "retire[d] from the practice of law" and would thus be entitled to continue to receive the Management shares even if he or she left the firm before the two years had expired.

[7] We also do not believe that the fact that a lawyer need remain at the Merged Firm for only two years before being able to depart assured of continuing to receive the Management share makes a difference. Clients whose situations would improve if their counsel could change firms should not be asked to wait while their preferred counsel fulfills a two-year vesting period. It is possible that in setting the two-year period the drafters of the Receivables LLC documents sought to derive some comfort from footnote 13 in Neuman, 715 A.2d at 136. That footnote deals, however, with a provision in a retirement plan approved by the Court under which a retired lawyer could resume practice after two years of retirement and still receive retirement benefits from the lawyer's former firm. The Court describes that provision as having "limited anti-competitive effect". But under the retirement exception to Rule 5.6, when a lawyer retires is when a full restriction on the lawyer's right to practice is permitted. Thus, as a condition to the continued receipt of retirement benefits a law firm could demand a much longer period of restricted practice than two years, and it is only by comparison to that possibility that a two year restriction is "limited." A two year restriction on practice in the middle of a lawyer's career is not "limited."

loses the right to continue to receive Originator's shares. Indeed, the inquirer informs us that in the case of a partner entitled to an Originator's share who died, the payment of that share was indeed terminated. Upon inquiry from the deceased partner's estate, the Merged Firm stated that this treatment of Originators' shares existed because while under the compensation arrangements of the pre-merger Law Firm, partners were given recognition for matters that they "originated" (i.e., were responsible for bringing in to the firm), such an arrangement was no longer possible in the Merged Law Firm, and the LLC treatment of Originators' shares was created to mimic the compensation from these sources of income in the pre-merger Law Firm.

While we do not see the issue as wholly free from doubt, we conclude that the treatment of the non-"vested" Originators' shares also falls afoul of Rule 5.6. With respect to these shares, the Receivables LLC agreement conditioned the distribution of the previously earned assets of the pre-merger Law Firm, which was ending its business, so that they continued to be paid only as long as the pre-merger firm's ex-partners continued to practice at the designated new post-merger firm. If the pre-merger firm had simply wound up its affairs entirely, presumably the partners would have distributed this right to future income to themselves as individuals, unconditionally. But instead the partners of the pre-merger Firm conditioned the future distribution of that asset on continued practice with a new and different firm. Moreover, while the Originator's share ceases to be paid to a partner who leaves the Merged Firm for any reason, including illness, death, and retirement, this fact would have more force if it were applied by a law firm that was operating and continuing to operate its own practice. With a firm that is an ongoing practice, it makes basic sense to stop compensating partners who depart. But in the context of a firm that has wound up its affairs and sought nonetheless to exercise some future control over the distribution of previously earned assets, it would blink reality to fail to observe that death and disability are not voluntary departures and that retirement, while it may be delayed, is also ultimately largely involuntary. Thus the clear effect of the non-vesting feature of the Originators' shares is to discourage partners from voluntarily leaving the Merged Firm as long as the payments continue, and the primary route of voluntary departure is, as in the case of the inquirer, leaving to practice at another firm. We do not see why the future payout of a previously fully earned asset would be conditioned on a partner's staying with the Merged Firm unless the purpose of the condition were to incentivize the recipients to stay with the firm by depriving them of that previously earned asset if they left it. We believe that Rule 5.6(a) does not allow the partners of a firm that is winding up its affairs because the partners are, as part of a merger, joining a new firm, to use their former firm's assets to create financial disincentives to themselves to leave the new firm.

As just suggested we do not mean to imply that the same considerations apply when a firm has an ongoing practice and simply ceases to compensate lawyers who leave it. Firms whose method of current compensation takes account of contributions of partners in previous years, even identifying streams of income as having been attributable to partners' work in previous years and increasing their compensation by a portion of that amount, do not run afoul of the Rule simply because when a partner leaves the firm, regardless of the reason, the firm stops compensating that partner and thus does not continue to compensate the partner for continued benefit of his or her prior work to the firm. Firms benefit presently and in the future from the contributions of their partners, and the quantification of this as part of the compensation process is common and does not violate the Rule (at least not without more, such as some inequality of treatment that falls disproportionately on those partners who leave to compete with the firm). Any partner who leaves a firm that has such a compensation system cuts himself or herself off from future compensation at that firm, even where the departing partner contributed measurably to the continuing success of the firm and could have continued to participate in that success by remaining there. Thus, we do not conclude that an ongoing firm that cuts off elements of compensation at the time of a lawyer's departure from a firm, no matter what the lawyer intends to do after departure, necessarily violates Rule 5.6(a) merely because some departing lawyers would thereafter be competing with the firm, and we are not aware of any case or authority that so concludes.[8]

But in the matter now before us, the pre-merger Law Firm wound up its affairs and distributed its assets to the partners, yet the former partners sought to retain some control over those assets after distribution, and sought thereby to continue—for years into the future—to condition future entitlement of the former partners' right to receive payment on their continued work for the Merged Firm. It is this attempt by partners of the pre-merger Law Firm to continue to influence the future practices of partners some time after their departure from the pre-Merger Firm that leads us to conclude that treatment of this payment as well violates the Rule.

Adopted: October 2004
Published: December 2004

Opinion No. 326

Referral of Person Adverse to a Client to Another Lawyer

• When a lawyer is approached by a potential client about a representation adverse to an existing client, after declining the case, the lawyer may refer the potential client to another lawyer.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.4 (Communication)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- Rule 4.3 (Dealing with Unrepresented Persons)

Inquiry

A lawyer is approached by a person seeking representation in a matter adverse to a party with whom the lawyer has an on-going lawyer-client relationship. After declining the representation, may the lawyer refer the person to another lawyer?

Discussion

Lawyers frequently decline representations but suggest the names of other lawyers who might represent the potential client. For example, a lawyer who is approached by a person seeking to write a will might refer that person to another lawyer or other lawyers who have expertise in trusts and estates law that the referring lawyer lacks. A lawyer who represents a client in a grand jury investigation might refer another person who has been subpoe-

[8] Compare comment b. to § 13(b) of the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers (2000), which discusses denial of "benefits" effective at the time of a lawyer's departure from a firm.

naed to testify before the grand jury to another lawyer or other lawyers to avoid a possible conflict of interest. But what are a lawyer's obligations when approached by a person who wants to sue an existing client? We assume, for purposes of this opinion, that the lawyer would decline the representation.[1] May the lawyer recommend another lawyer or a list of lawyers to the person who wishes to sue her client?[2]

The Rules of Professional Conduct

The District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct do not speak directly to this situation. Nor have we been able to find authority from other jurisdictions directly on point. Two Rules seem to be relevant indirectly. First, Rule 4.3 provides:

In dealing on behalf of a client with a person who is not represented by counsel, a lawyer shall not:

> (a) give advice to the unrepresented person other than advice to secure counsel, if the interests of such person are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client . . .

Rule 4.3(a) contemplates a different situation than the inquiry under consideration, namely that the lawyer is already representing a client in a matter potentially adverse to the unrepresented person. The inquiry presumes either that the matter has not yet been initiated or that the lawyer does not represent the existing client in that particular matter.[3] Nor does the Rule address whether it is appropriate for the lawyer to recommend a specific lawyer or list of lawyers whom the unrepresented person might engage as opposed to advising the person that he needs to engage (unspecified) counsel. We can, however, distill from Rule 4.3(a) that a lawyer is permitted to advise an unrepresented person, adverse to her client, to retain counsel even though her client might gain a tactical advantage if the person remained unrepresented. Lawyers frequently give this advice and tell persons potentially adverse to their clients that they ought to engage counsel.

Rule 1.3 is also tangentially relevant. In addition to the requirement that a lawyer represent her client zealously and diligently within the bounds of the law, Rule 1.3(a) provides that "A lawyer shall not intentionally: . . . (2) prejudice or damage a client during the course of the professional relationship." The requirement that a lawyer not damage a client does not mean, however, that the lawyer must press for every conceivable tactical advantage. Comment [1] to Rule 1.3 provides that the duty of zealous representation does not require a lawyer to press for every advantage that might be realized for a client. Moreover, zealous representation must at times be tempered by the lawyer's obligation to the administration of justice. In fact, certain conduct that might arguably prejudice a client's case is mandatory under the Rules such as the requirement in Rule 3.3(a)(3) that the lawyer disclose adverse and dispositive legal authority adverse to the client's position, if her opponent overlooks it.

Recommending that an adverse person retain counsel does not constitute damage or prejudice to a client within the meaning of Rule 1.3(a). Rule 4.3(a) specifically permits such a recommendation. In the situation under inquiry, where the person has already determined to engage counsel prior to approaching the lawyer, such general advice would be superfluous. We do not believe that the further step of recommending a specific lawyer or list of lawyers prejudices the referring lawyer's existing client. We assume that in making such a referral, the lawyer will act in good faith and will recommend competent and independent counsel. First, the person would almost certainly find a lawyer even in the absence of a recommendation. Second, it would be mere speculation to conclude that the lawyer that the person might find on his own would not be as competent as the one recommended by the conflicted lawyer. The lawyer could be as good, better, or not as good as the one that the conflicted lawyer might recommend. Moreover, we cannot assume that it is disadvantageous to the referring lawyer's existing client for its adversary to be represented by competent counsel. Competent opposing counsel is likely in many cases to contribute to reaching a reasonable resolution of the dispute.

More basically, inherent in our adversary system is the principle that persons ought to be represented by competent lawyers and that disputes ought to be resolved on their merits. Assisting a person to obtain competent representation is entirely consistent with that principle. Once the issue is joined, a lawyer can and should take whatever lawful and ethical measures that are required to vindicate her client's position. Assisting an adversary to obtain competent representation, so that the issue can be joined, is not inconsistent with that duty. It is consistent, however, with the lawyer's obligation to the administration of justice. At times, the interests of the legal system and the public interest may prevail over that of the client, e.g., Rule 3.3(a)(3). We believe that recommending competent counsel to an unrepresented person, can never constitute prejudice to a client within the meaning of Rule 1.3(a).

Practical Considerations

There are, however, some practical considerations to recommending counsel to a potential adversary of a lawyer's client. First, will the person trust the recommendation? Second, while the principles that underlie our adversary system may permit such a recommendation, some clients may not understand why their lawyer assisted an adversary to obtain counsel to sue them. Thus, as a matter of client relations, a lawyer may prefer not to make such a recommendation. Moreover, a prudent lawyer who elects to make a recommendation might be wiser to suggest more than one name to avoid recriminations from the inquirer, should the recommended lawyer prove unsatisfactory, or from her client, should the recommended lawyer turn out to be vexatious.[4]

The practical consideration relating to two other Rules merit discussion. There is always the possibility that in discussions with a potential client, a lawyer may learn confidences or secrets that the person does not want revealed.[5] If the

[1] Rule 1.7 generally prohibits the lawyer from accepting such a representation. It is possible, of course, for the lawyer to seek a waiver from the existing client (and the potential client) under Rule 1.7 and sue her client, if that existing client were represented by another lawyer in the matter.

[2] The most likely scenario is that the lawyer is approached by a potential plaintiff. She could also be approached by a defendant, already sued by her client who is represented by another lawyer in the matter. Presumably similar situations might arise in a non-litigation context such as a potential client who wants to retain counsel to represent him in a business transaction with the lawyer's existing client. In a non-litigation context, where the adversarial relationship is less stark, the existing client is less likely to be offended by its lawyer's referral of the potential client to another lawyer.

[3] If the lawyer represents the client in a matter already initiated, presumably the unrepresented person would not seek to engage the lawyer representing his adversary.

[4] It may not always be possible to recommend more than one lawyer. For example, if the person is seeking pro bono counsel, furnishing a list of names may be impractical.

[5] We assume that the lawyer discovers the conflict before forming a lawyer-client relationship. Whether such a relationship has been formed is a matter of substantive law. Comment [7] Rule 1.6. See ABA Formal Op. 95-390 (citing Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 26 (Tent. Draft No. 5 1992) for the indicia of when a lawyer-client relationship arises.

lawyer does learn of these confidences or secrets and then realizes that the potential client is adverse to an existing client, she faces a dilemma: Under Rule 1.4, which concerns the lawyer's obligation to communicate with clients, she may have an obligation to inform her existing client that someone intends to sue it. In some circumstances the failure to inform the existing client could be damaging. Suppose, for example, the potential client seeks to bring a sexual harassment claim against her employer, an existing client, because of an on-going hostile environment. The client should want to know this as soon as possible so that it could investigate and if necessary remediate the situation. On the other hand, the potential client might not want to disclose to the lawyer's existing client that she is contemplating a lawsuit. Comment [7] to Rule 1.6, which prohibits, in general, the disclosure of confidences and secrets, makes it clear that the lawyer's duty of confidentiality attaches when the lawyer agrees to consider whether to take on a client. "Thus, a lawyer may be subject to a duty of confidentiality with respect to information disclosed by a client to enable the lawyer to determine whether representation of the potential client would involve a prohibited conflict of interest . . ." Presumably, most lawyers ascertain at the outset the name of the adverse party prior to discussing with a potential client a new matter. But if a lawyer neglects to do so or if a lawyer, particularly in a large firm, does not recognize at the outset that the adversary is a firm client, the lawyer may be seized with confidential or secret information.[6]

Under those circumstances, the specific obligation under Rule 1.6 not to reveal those confidences and secrets trumps the more general Rule 1.4 obligation to keep clients informed. Nevertheless, a lawyer who must refrain from telling her client information that the client would wish to know—even if the only "secret" was the potential client's contemplated suit—might hesitate before taking the steps of actually recommending counsel to the inquiring person. Many clients might find it difficult to understand that their lawyer not only failed to tell them they were about to be sued, but also recommended counsel to file that suit.

In sum, we believe that it is consistent with a concept of our adversary system, and not prohibited by the Rules of Professional Conduct, for a lawyer, if she chooses, to refer a person seeking representation to another lawyer, even if the representation would be adverse to the referring lawyer's existing client. Each lawyer must decide for herself whether under the particular circumstances this is a wise thing to do.

Adopted: December 2004
Published: December 2004

Opinion 327

Joint Representation: Confidentiality of Information Revisited

• Where one client has given consent to the disclosure of confidential information by the lawyer to another client, we have already concluded that the lawyer may reveal the confidence or secret. Here we conclude that the lawyer must do so if the information is relevant or material to the lawyer's representation of the other client. Because the disclosing client previously has waived confidentiality, there is nothing to weigh against either the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the non-disclosing client or the lawyer's obligation to keep that client reasonably informed of anything bearing on the representation that might affect that client's interests.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1. 3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1. 4 (Communication)
- Rule 1. 6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1. 7 (Conflict of Interest)
- Rule 1. 16 (Terminating Representation)

Inquiry

The inquiry comes from a law firm that has succeeded to the representation of several clients who had been represented by a prior firm. The prior firm had originally represented multiple clients in the same matter. In its retainer agreement, the prior firm had explained to all of the jointly represented clients that it was "understood that (a) we will not be able to advise you about potential claims you may have against any of the Other Individuals whom we represent and (b) information you provide to use in connection with our representation of you may be shared by us with the Other Individuals whom we represent."[1] After apparently learning certain confidential information from one of the jointly represented clients, the prior firm withdrew from representing the other clients and continued to represent only the client from whom the confidential information had been learned. Upon assuming the representation of the other clients, the inquiring law firm requested that the prior firm disclose all information relevant to its prior representation of those clients, including the confidential information that had led to its withdrawal. The prior firm refused. The inquirer seeks an opinion whether, under these circumstances, the prior firm is required to share with the other clients all relevant information learned during its representation, including any relevant confidences and secrets.

Discussion

In Opinion No. 296, we concluded that the mere fact of joint representation, without more, does not provide a basis for a lawyer to conclude that the client has impliedly authorized disclosure of confidences or secrets to another client. "Without clear authorization, a lawyer may not divulge the secrets of one client to another, even where the discussion involves the subject matter of the joint representation. This is particularly true where disclosure would likely be detrimental to the disclosing client." D.C. Ethics Op. 296.[2] Under [6] Under some circumstances, disclosure of confidential information by a potential client that might be useful to the representation of an existing adverse client, might disqualify the lawyer from representing the existing client in the matter adverse to the potential client. Comment [7], Rule 1.10. See N.Y. Eth. Op. 643, 1993 WL 57240 (N.Y. St. Bar Assn. Comm. Prof. Eth.) (a confidence revealed in an intake interview of prospective client relevant to representation of existing client requires withdrawal from existing representation and separate lawyers for each client.) Fl. Eth. Op. 92-1, 1992 WL 602798 (Fla. St. Bar Assn.) (presuming confidential information is always obtained in Legal Aid intake interview). A conflict obtained as a result of learning confidential information in deciding whether to enter into a representation is not imputed to other associated lawyers when no lawyer-client relationship is formed. Rule 1.10(a) and Comment [7].

[1] The retainer agreement defined the term "Other Individuals" by listing the names of those individuals whom the prior firm "may represent."

[2] We do not read D.C. Ethics Op. 296 to suggest that privileged information provided by one client during the course of a joint representation (that is also relevant to the joint representation) remains privileged in a subsequent dispute between the two clients. Such an interpretation would appear to be inconsistent with District of Columbia law. See Griva v. Davison, 637 A. 2d 830, 847-48 (D.C. 1994) (with respect to matters known at the time of communication to be in the common interest of an attorney's two clients,"'a communication by A to X as the common attorney of A and B, who afterwards become party opponents, is not privileged as between A and B since there was no secrecy between them at the time of communication.'") (quoting 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 2312 at 605-06 (McNaughton rev. ed. 1961)) (citing Eureka Inv. Corp., N. V. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 743 F. 2d 932, 937 (D.C. Cir. 1984)).

such circumstances, the lawyer's only option is to seek consent of the disclosing client to share the information or ask the client to disclose the information directly. If the client refuses, the resulting conflict of interest requires the lawyer's withdrawal.[3]

The inquirer presents a variation on the question addressed in Opinion No. 296: in contrast to the earlier opinion, where we recognized that "[t] he retainer agreement did not address the impact of joint representation on client confidences or seek consent for the Firm to share confidences of one party to the joint representation with the other," id. at 174, the retainer agreement here expressly provided that information disclosed in connection with the representation "may be shared" with the other clients in the same matter. The question raised by this inquiry, however, is not whether the information "may" be shared but whether it "must" be shared. Rather than seeking permission to disclose the confidential information (which is the way this issue has often arisen in other jurisdictions), the prior firm has refused to reveal the information. The issue we now consider is whether, under the specific facts presented here, the prior firm has an affirmative obligation to disclose.[4]

When one client provides a lawyer with material information and makes clear (either directly or indirectly) that such information is not to be communicated to another, jointly represented client, the lawyer faces a potential conflict. If the information is relevant or material to the other client, the failure to disclose it would compromise the lawyer's duties of loyalty (D.C. Rules 1.3(b) & 1.7(b)), diligence (D.C. Rule 1.3(c)), and communication (D.C. Rule 1.4) to that other client. On the other hand, sharing the information would compromise the communicating client's expectations of confidentiality and risk impairing that client's trust in the lawyer. See generally Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 60, cmt. l (2000) ("Restatement") (discussing the lawyer's "dilemma"). Because the lawyer simply cannot continue in the representation without compromising either the duty of communication to the non-disclosing client or the expectation of confidentiality of the disclosing client, the lawyer must ordinarily eliminate the conflict by withdrawing.[5]

> In a comment to its Model Rule 1.7, the ABA makes this point expressly:
>
> As to the duty of confidentiality, continued common representation will almost certainly be inadequate if one client asks the lawyer not to disclose to the other client information relevant to the common representation. This is so because the lawyer has an equal duty of loyalty to each client, and each client has the right to be informed of anything bearing on the representation that might affect that client's interests and the right to expect that the lawyer will use that information to that client's benefit. See Rule 1.4. The lawyer should, at the outset of the common representation and as part of the process of obtaining each client's informed consent, advise each client that information will be shared and that the lawyer will have to withdraw if one client decides that some matter material to the representation should be kept from the other.

ABA Model Rule 1.7, Comment [31].

At least one jurisdiction has recognized that a lawyer under such circumstances has broad discretion to disclose confidential information before withdrawing. In A. v. B., 726 A. 2d 924 (N. J. 1999), the New Jersey Supreme Court considered whether a law firm, which jointly represented a husband and wife in drafting wills in which they devised their respective estates to each other, may disclose to the wife the fact that the husband had recently fathered an illegitimate child. The law firm's retainer letter explained that information provided by one spouse could become available to the other. "Although the letter did not contain an express waiver of the confidentiality of any such information, each spouse consented to and waived any conflicts arising from the firm's joint representation." Id. at 925. The information was clearly relevant to the wife because, as the court explained, "[t]he wife's will leaves her residuary estate to her husband, creating the possibility that her property ultimately may pass" to his illegitimate child. Id. at 926.

The law firm became aware of the husband's illegitimate child after the wills were executed.[6] The law firm wrote to the husband that it believed it had an ethical obligation to disclose to the wife the existence (but not the identity) of the child on the grounds that it needed to inform the wife that her current estate plan might devise a portion of her assets through her spouse to that child. The law firm urged the husband to inform his wife and that, if he did not, the law firm would do so. The husband refused and obtained an injunction from the appellate division to prevent the law firm from disclosing to the wife the existence of the child.

The Supreme Court reversed. New Jersey's Rule 1.6 "permits, but does not

[3] Whether the lawyer must withdraw from representing all clients or only from clients other than the disclosing client depends (at least in part) on whether the lawyer's retainer agreement permits the lawyer to continue to represent only one or some of the parties. See, generally, D.C. Ethics Ops. 317 & 296. In the inquirer's case, the retainer agreement permitted the prior firm to continue to represent the client whose confidential information precipitated the conflict: "A judgment by us that you or one of the Other Individuals should seek separate counsel would be a judgment solely within our discretion, and the party who in our sole determination should seek separate counsel waives any objection to our continuing representation of the other party or parties in any matter including the one presenting the conflict, and for any purpose, including in connection with asserting position on behalf of our continuing client(s) that are or may be directly adverse to the individual seeking separate counsel."

[4] We are assuming in this opinion that the information that caused the prior firm to withdraw constituted, in fact, a client "confidence" or "secret. " If the information prompting the withdrawal were not a confidence or secret, there would clearly be nothing to balance against the prior firm's duty of loyalty to the non-disclosing clients and its duty to keep those clients "reasonably informed about the status of [the] matter." D.C. Rule 1.4(a); see also D.C. Rule 1.16, Comment [10] (upon withdrawal, "a lawyer must take all reasonable steps to mitigate the consequences to the client"). We are also assuming that the confidence or secret is relevant or material to the representation of the other clients. If the information were not relevant or material to the prior firm's representation of the other clients, then there would be no duty under D.C. Rule 1.4 to disclose such information to the other clients.

[5] Typically, our rules require a lawyer withdrawing under such circumstances simply to give "notice of withdrawal, without elaboration," D. C. Rule 1.6, Comment [19]. However, there is an exception permitting a lawyer, upon withdrawing, to "retract or disaffirm any opinion, document, affirmation or the like that contains a material misrepresentation by the lawyer that the lawyer reasonably believes will be relied upon by others to their detriment." Id. (emphasis added). The language of the comment makes clear that this requirement is not mandatory: "[A]fter withdrawal under either Rule 1. 16(a)(1) or Rule 1.16(b)(1) or (2), the lawyer may retract or disaffirm any opinion, document [etc.] . . . ." D. C. Rule 1.6 Comment [19] (emphasis added). We made clear in Opinion No. 296, however, that such a "noisy" withdrawal disaffirming earlier written statements is permissible only "if there is a reasonable basis to expect that future harm may occur without such disavowal." D. C. Ethics Op. 296. In the absence of such a reasonable basis, the most the lawyer may do is "to warn the affected co-client that a matter seriously and adversely affecting that person's interests has come to light, which the other co-client refuses to permit the lawyer to disclose." Restatement § 60, cmt. l.

[6] The law firm learned of the husband's paternity because the mother of the illegitimate child had coincidentally retained the same law firm to pursue a paternity action against the husband. As a result of a clerical error, the law firm did not become aware of the conflict until discovery had commenced in the paternity suit. Upon learning of the conflict, the law firm immediately withdrew from representing the mother, informing her that the law firm was representing both the husband and wife in an unrelated matter.

require, a lawyer to reveal confidential information to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary 'to rectify the consequences of a client's criminal, illegal or fraudulent act in furtherance of which the lawyer's services had been used.'" Id. at 927 (quoting NJ RPC 1. 6(c)) (emphasis added).[7] The court construed the term "fraudulent act" to apply in this situation: "[T]he husband's deliberate omission of the existence of his illegitimate child constitutes a fraud on his wife. When discussing their respective estates with the firm, the husband and wife reasonably could expect that each would disclose information material to the distribution of their estates, including the existence of children who are contingent residuary beneficiaries. The husband breached that duty." Id. Under New Jersey law, therefore, the law firm was permitted to disclose the confidential information.[8]

The court considered and then distinguished two decisions from other jurisdictions that had prohibited disclosure to co-clients. The Florida State Bar Association's Committee on Professional Ethics had considered a factual situation similar to the one in New Jersey: Lawyer had prepared wills for both Husband and Wife and then subsequently learned from Husband that he had executed a codicil that made substantial beneficial disposition of his estate to a woman with whom he had been having an extramarital relationship. See Florida Formal Op. 95-4 (1997). Lawyer had never discussed with Husband and Wife whether confidential information learned from the one would be shared with other. Under these circumstances, the Florida Bar concluded that not only is Lawyer "not ethically required to disclose the information to Wife" but "Lawyer's ethical obligation of confidentiality to Husband precludes Lawyer from disclosing the information to Wife." Id. at 3. Indeed, the Florida Bar expressly rejected the discretionary approach favored in the Restatement.

> Florida lawyers must have an unambiguous rule governing their conduct in situations of this nature. We conclude that Lawyer owes duties of confidentiality to both Husband and Wife, regardless of whether they are being represented jointly. Accordingly, under the facts presented Lawyer is ethically precluded from disclosing the separate confidence to Wife without Husband's consent.

Id. at 5-6

The New York State Bar Association's Committee on Professional Ethics came to the same conclusion. According to the Committee, a lawyer representing a two-person partnership may not inform one of the partners that the other had, in a conversation that was expressly deemed to be "in confidence," advised the lawyer that he was actively breaching the partnership agreement.[9] The Committee concluded that, in the absence of prior consent by the clients to the sharing of all confidential communications—and because the disclosing client had "specifically in advance designated his communication as confidential" and the lawyer did not indicate that any information would be shared with the other client—the lawyer may not disclose to the co-client the communicating client's statement. See New York State Bar Op. 555, at 6 (1984).[10]

The New Jersey Supreme Court distinguished both of these prior decisions on the ground that "the New York and Florida disciplinary rules, unlike [New Jersey's] RPC 1.6, do not except disclosure needed 'to rectify the consequences of a client's . . . fraudulent act in the furtherance of which the lawyer's services had been sued.'" A. v. B. 726 A.2d at 931. Moreover, the husband and wife in the New Jersey case, "unlike the co-clients considered by the New York and Florida Committees, signed an agreement suggesting their intent to share all information with each other." Id.[11]

We have already approved of the approach of the New York and Florida committees. See D.C. Ethics Op. 296. And, unlike New Jersey's version of Rule 1.6 and the current Model Rule—which permit the disclosure of client confidences to rectify the consequences of a client's fraudulent act—the D.C. Rule includes far narrower exceptions: to prevent a criminal act that the lawyer reasonably believes is likely to result in death or substantial bodily harm or to prevent bribery or intimidation of persons involved in proceedings before a tribunal. See D.C. Rule 1.6(c).

In addition, of course, D.C. Rule 1.6 permits a lawyer to use or reveal a client confidence or secret with the consent of the client, after full disclosure. See D.C. Rule 1.6(d)(1). As we made clear in Opinion No. 296, a lawyer needs "to obtain written consent from both clients that the lawyer may divulge to each client all confidences received during the course of the retention that relate to the representation. " D.C. Ethics Op. 296, at 175. According to the inquiry, the prior firm had made clear to each of its clients that information provided in connection with the representation "may be shared" with co-clients.

---

[7] A. v. B. was decided in 1999. At that time, the ABA's Model Rule 1.6 permitted a lawyer to reveal confidential information to the extent that the lawyer reasonably believed necessary "to prevent the client from committing a criminal act that the lawyer believes is likely to result in imminent death or substantial bodily harm" or to the extent necessary to allow lawyers to defend themselves against charges of misconduct or malpractice lodged by clients or former clients. Model Rule 1.6 has since been amended twice. First, in 2002, the rule was changed to allow lawyers to reveal confidential information when they, themselves, are seeking legal advice about their compliance with the rules and when necessary to comply with other law or court order. Second, in 2003, Model Rule 1.6 was amended to recognize that confidential information may be revealed to prevent future fraud or harm from past fraud. Under the current version of Model Rule 1.6, lawyers may reveal confidential information to the extent they reasonably believe necessary "to prevent the client from committing a crime or fraud that is reasonably certain to result in substantial injury to the financial interests or property of another and in furtherance of which the client has used or is using the lawyer's services;" and "to prevent, mitigate or rectify substantial injury to the financial interests or property of another that is reasonably certain to result or has resulted from the client's commission of a crime or fraud in furtherance of which the client has used the lawyer's services. " ABA Model Rule 1.6(b)(2), (3) (2003). As a result of these amendments, Model Rule 1.6 now closely resembles New Jersey's Rule 1.6. D.C. Rule 1.6, however, has not been amended, so it does not recognize any of the fraud exceptions found in the New Jersey rule or in the current version of the Model Rule.

[8] The court also relied on the Restatement, which "reposes the resolution of the lawyer's competing duties within the lawyer's discretion." Id. at 929; Restatement § 60, cmt. l ("after consideration of all relevant circumstances, [the lawyer] has the further discretion to inform the affected co-client of the specific communication if, in the lawyer's reasonable judgment, the immediacy and magnitude of the risk to the affected co-client outweigh the interest of the communicating client in continued secrecy").

[9] The Committee determined that, given the size of the partnership, it was reasonable to view "the particular situation here presented as one where the partners are joint clients of the lawyer." NY State Bar Ass'n, Comm. on Prof. Ethics Op. 555, at 2.

[10] See also NY City Bar Ass'n, Formal Op. 1999-07 (1999) (holding that lawyer's duties of confidentiality and loyalty mandate that lawyer refuse to provide information to one former client to the detriment of the other former client).

[11] See also Philadelphia Bar Ass'n, Op. No. 94-8 (1994) (concluding that, where circumstances support the conclusion that clients impliedly authorized lawyer to disclose confidential information to one another, the lawyer is not prohibited from disclosing such information). The New Jersey Supreme Court recognized a third basis for distinguishing its case from the prior two—namely, that the law firm learned of the husband's paternity from a third party, not from the husband himself, so "the husband did not communicate anything to the law firm with the expectation that the communication would be kept confidential." A. v. B., 726 A. 2d at 931.

We believe that this constitutes consent, authorizing the prior firm to disclose confidential information learned during the course of the representation that may be relevant or material to its representation of another client in the same matter.[12]

The retainer agreement presumably reflects a collective determination by all co-clients that the interests in keeping one another informed outweighs their separate interests in confidentiality. Where the disclosing client has expressly or impliedly authorized the disclosure of relevant, confidential information to the lawyer's other clients in the same matter,[13] the duty to keep the non-disclosing clients informed of anything bearing on the representation that might affect their interests requires the lawyer to disclose the confidential information. Our rules provide that a "lawyer shall keep a client reasonably informed about the status of a matter and promptly comply with reasonable requests for information." D.C. Rule 1.4(a) (emphasis added). Where the disclosing client has unambiguously consented to further disclosure, a lawyer's duty of loyalty to and the duty to communicate with the non-disclosing client tips the balance in favor of disclosure. Indeed, in light of the disclosing client's consent, there is nothing left on the other side of the balance.[14]

It is, of course, possible that a client who has otherwise consented to the disclosure of confidential information may withdraw such consent for a specific disclosure. Where a client informs the lawyer before disclosing certain confidential information that he or she intends to reveal something that may not be shared with the lawyer's other clients (notwithstanding a prior agreement to do so), the lawyer has an obligation at that point to inform the client that no such confidences may be kept. Under such circumstances, the lawyer can generally withdraw from representing the disclosing client and continue to represent the other clients. Here, by contrast, the prior firm apparently received information that it knew the disclosing client did not wish revealed to the other clients.[15] Under the terms of the retainer agreement, the prior firm's duty to communicate any relevant information to the other clients included any relevant information learned from other clients in the same matter, and this duty attached at the moment the prior firm learned the information. This underscores how important it is for a lawyer carefully to explain to all clients in a joint representation that, when they agree that any relevant or material information may be shared with one another, they cannot expect that any relevant or material confidential information they may subsequently reveal to the lawyer will be kept from the other co-clients.

Finally, we wish to emphasize that this inquiry raises anew the concerns we have expressed elsewhere about the hazards of representing multiple clients in the same matter. See, e.g., D.C. Ethics Ops. 217, 232, 265 & 301. By agreeing to undertake the representation of multiple clients and by obtaining a limited waiver of confidentiality, lawyers may expose themselves to significant risks. As we have concluded here, a lawyer violates the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct when her or she withholds from one client relevant or material confidential information obtained from a co-client who has consented to the disclosure.

Inquiry No. 04-04-16
Adopted: February 2005
Published: March 2005

[12] We are mindful of the concerns we expressed in Opinion No. 309 about the "considerable potential for mischief" when advance waivers of confidentiality are read too broadly. However, we do not treat the waiver of confidentiality at issue here as an "advance waiver" because a confidentiality waiver given as part of an agreement for representation by a single lawyer of multiple clients is more in the nature of a current, rather than an advance, waiver. See D.C. Ethics Op. 309, nn. 3 & 10.

[13] Disclosure of client confidences is permissible not only when the client expressly consents but also "when the lawyer has reasonable grounds for believing that a client has impliedly authorized disclosure of a confidence or secret in order to carry out the representation." D.C. Rule 1. 6(d)(4).

[14] It is worth emphasizing that our opinion turns on the specific circumstances created by the prior firm's retainer agreement. If the clients had not all agreed that the prior firm was authorized to share relevant or material information, the "default" rule in our jurisdiction is that the prior firm would have been prohibited from sharing one client's confidences with the others. See D.C. Ethics Op. 296. But by contracting around this "default" rule, the clients (and the prior firm) agreed that relevant or material information would be shared. Under these specific circumstances—where the disclosing client has effectively consented to the disclosure—an attorney's subsequent refusal to share such information with the other clients violates the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

[15] It appears that the lawyer described in the New York State Bar Association's Opinion No. 55 acted similarly when he represented a two-person partnership yet entered into a conversation expressly deemed to be "in confidence" with only one of the partners.

Opinion No.328

Personal Representation of Constituents of an Organization, Including Individuals Who Participate in an Organization's Governance

• An attorney representing a constituent of an organization personally, should make clear at the outset of the representation when he or she does not represent the organization as an entity. The lawyer should ensure that the client, as well as non-client constituents of the organization with whom the lawyer may interact, understand the lawyer's role.

Further, in view of the pervasive nature of confidential information of the organization to which such a lawyer is likely to be exposed, in determining whether it is permissible to subsequently undertake matters that are adverse to the corporation, the lawyer must consider whether the organization is a "de facto client" for purposes of assessing potential conflicts of interest. The analysis is similar to that where a lawyer represents a subsidiary or other affiliate of a corporation.

Ideally, the lawyer should expressly address these issues with the client at the outset of the representation and incorporate the understanding in the retainer agreement.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
• Rule 1.8(e) (Conflict of Interest: Prohibited Transactions)
• Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
• Rule 1.13 (Organizations as Clients)

Inquiry

With the recent heightened scrutiny and increasing accountability of persons who participate in corporate governance, and the resulting concerns among such persons as to their potential personal liability or other exposure to legal risk, such individuals may choose with greater frequency than in the past to retain independent counsel to protect their personal interests. Such persons could include board members, corporate officers, or groups of persons who serve on audit committees of the board of directors or other "special committees" of the board set up to ensure compliance with the directives of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, 15 U.S.C. § 7201. These personal representations must be distinguished from those in which the lawyer has an organization as a client and, in carrying out that role, assists constituents of the organization in meeting their duties to the entity.[1]

We address here only personal representations in which individual organizational constituents may have interests which are potentially diverse from the interests of the organization as an entity.[2] The inquiry is how such a lawyer should interact with the organization, both with regard to carrying out that representation and in assessing conflicts of interest in accepting new matters that may be adverse to the organization.

Discussion

I. Establishing the Representation

Obviously, representation of an organization qua organization and representation of a constituent of an organization personally are not the same thing. Under Rule 1.13, when a lawyer represents an organization, the lawyer-client relationship is with the organization as an entity and not its constituents. Comment 13 to Rule 1.7 states in part: "As is provided in Rule 1.13, the lawyer who represents a corporation, partnership, trade association or other organization-type client is deemed to represent that specific entity, and not its shareholders, owners, partners, members or 'other constituents.'" Conversely, when a lawyer represents a constituent personally, that will typically arise because of a perceived potential disparity of interest with the organization, and the representation will be of the constituent only.[3]

A lawyer's failure to give sufficient consideration to the distinction between these two types of representation can by itself unwittingly cause a change in how the representation will be treated. For example, a lawyer's receipt of sensitive information from an unwary constituent can result in a de facto representation of the constituent where that had not been intended by the lawyer. Comment 14 to Rule 1.7 states:

> [T]here may be cases in which a lawyer is deemed to represent a constituent of an organization client. Such de facto representation has been found where a lawyer has received confidences from a constituent during the course of representing an organization client in circumstances in which the constituent reasonably believed that the lawyer was acting as the constituent's lawyer as well as the lawyer for the organization client. See generally ABA Formal Opinion 92-365.

At the outset of a representation, therefore, the lawyer must determine which of these two types of representation he is being asked to undertake and then fully inform the prospective client of the distinction. The lawyer and prospective client should then reach a clear understanding as to which type of representation is desired.[4] Failure to address this at the beginning of the representation can impair the lawyer's ability to carry out the client's goal. Having decided which type of representation to undertake, the lawyer's conduct should then be consistent with that decision.

II. Carrying Out a Personal Representation

This Committee has previously addressed issues related to the implications of a lawyer's representation of an entity for his or her obligations to related entities and persons. See D.C. Ethics Opinion 216 (1991) (Representation of Closely Held Corporation in Action Against Corporate Shareholder); D.C. Ethics Opinion 269 (1997) (Obligation of Lawyer for Corporation to Clarify Role in Internal Corporate Investigation); D.C. Ethics Opinion 305 (2001) (Ethical Considerations Arising From Representation of Trade Association).

In Opinion No. 269, we addressed a corporate lawyer's obligations when conducting an internal investigation of a corporation. In a portion of that opinion, we also discussed the lawyer's obligation when he or she represents a constituent of the corporation, but not the corporation itself:

> Where such representation is of the constituent alone, that person is the lawyer's sole client, just as the lawyer representing the corporation has that entity as his sole client. The lawyer has no attorney-client relationship with the person paying the lawyer's fees, and the lawyer must take care that his activities on behalf of his client are not influenced by that person. Id. And as regards attorney-client confidentiality, that obligation is owed to the constituent-client only, and not to the person paying the lawyer's fees. Id.

Thus, when representing a constituent who participates in an organization's management, a lawyer should be sensitive to the false impression that because he has been welcomed into the inner sanctum of an organization, he is a "safe" person for non-client constituents to speak with and that his loyalty to the organization can be assumed. It is incumbent upon an attorney in that situation to make clear to other organization constituents who are not his client, before being asked to convey information that may constitute corporate confidences or secrets, that the lawyer's interests may be separate from those of the entity.

All this does not mean, however, that a client-constituent's potential adversity to an entity will always be as harsh or direct as the adversity of an outsider, for the adversity may be tempered by the constituent's legal obligations to the entity. Thus, the lawyer, as the client's agent, should bear in mind the hazards of assisting a client in violating any of the client's obligations to the entity because that could increase, rather than lessen, the client's potential liability. The client's obligations may include, depending on various circumstances and applicable law, a duty to maintain trade secrets or other confidential information. "Whistle-blower" laws may or may not apply to various organizations and various circumstances. Thus, a lawyer for a constituent may carry some obligation to protect the interests of the organization because his client may have such obligations.

---

[1] That the corporation or other entity is responsible for the payment of the lawyer's fee is not determinative. Rule 1.8(e) provides as follows with respect to payment of fees from someone other than the client:

> (e) a lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless:
>
> (1) the client consents after consultation;
>
> (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independence of professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and
>
> (3) information relating to representation of a client is protected as required by Rule 1.6.

[2] Thus, we do not address circumstances in which a lawyer represents an organization, and in doing so, assists a constituent whose interests are identical to those of the organization.

[3] On occasion, however, dual representation of an organization and a constituent can take place. Specifically, Rule 1.13(c) states:

> A lawyer representing an organization may also represent any of its directors, officers, employees, members, shareholders, or other constituents, subject to the provisions of Rule 1.7. If the organization's consent to the dual representation is required by Rule 1.7, the consent shall be given by an appropriate official of the organization other than the individual who is to be represented, or by the shareholders.

[4] As noted above, in rare instances a dual representation may be appropriately intended and effectuated. These representations should similarly be defined in scope.

The lawyer should consider these factors and chart a course that is consistent with his client's interests and the client's legal duties to the organization.

III. Undertaking New Matters Adverse to the Organization

Finally, we address the extent to which a lawyer who represents, or has represented, an organization's constituent on a personal basis properly can undertake new matters that are potentially adverse to the organization. In other words, we now discuss whether, for conflict of interest purposes, the lawyer should consider the organization as the client, even though the lawyer represented only the constituent.

Rule 1.7(b)(1) provides:

> Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, [related to consent] a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if:
>
> (1) That matter involves a specific party or parties, and a position to be taken by that client in that matter is adverse to a position taken or to be taken by another client in the same matter, even though that client is unrepresented or represented by a different lawyer. (Emphasis added.)

As discussed above, if the lawyer represents an organization's constituent personally then the entity itself is not "another client" under Rule 1.7(b)(1) in a literal or automatic sense. The inquiry, however, must go deeper and examine the de facto relationships that arise out of the representation. Indeed, there are many apt analogies in converse situations, in which a lawyer's representation of a large entity has been deemed to impact potential conflicts with constituents of the entity. We believe these situations are pertinent to an analysis of the present inquiry.

In addition, apart from the potential existence of a direct conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(1), a lawyer representing a constituent, and considering a new representation adverse to the organization, should also consider whether his or her representation creates a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(2), 1.7(b)(3) or 1.7(b)(4).[5] Comment 14 to Rule 1.7 frames the issue well:

> The propriety of [undertaking a new] representation must also be tested by reference to the lawyer's obligation under Rule 1.6 to preserve confidences and secrets and to the obligations imposed by paragraphs(b)(2) through (b)(4) of this rule. Thus, absent consent under Rule 1.7(c), such adverse representation ordinarily would be improper if:
>
> (a) the adverse matter is the same as, or substantially related to, the matter on which the lawyer represents the organization client.
>
> (b) during the course of representation of the organization client the lawyer has in fact acquired confidences or secrets (as defined in Rule 1.6(b)) of the organization client or an affiliate or constituent that could be used to the disadvantage of any of the organization client or its affiliate or constituents, or
>
> (c) such representation seeks a result that is likely to have a material adverse effect on the financial condition of the organization client.

Similarly, in Opinion No. 305, this Committee stated that representation of a trade association does not per se create an attorney-client relationship with all members of the trade association, but also does not per se preclude it. Instead, the surrounding circumstances, including the existence of disclosures of confidential information to the lawyer, must be assessed:

> [D]etermining whether and to what extent the individual member has become a client requires careful examination of all of the circumstances of the firm's relationship to and representation of the trade association." ABA Ethics Op. No. 92-365. An attorney-client relationship may be formed in the absence of an express agreement, and is "not dependent on the payment of fees [or] . . . upon the execution of a formal contract." Westinghouse Elec. Corp. v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 580 F.2d 1311, 1317 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 955 (1978). What is most important is whether the member of the trade association disclosed confidential information to the association's lawyer, and the surrounding circumstances and expectations. ABA Ethics Op. No. 92-365. See also Westinghouse, 580 F.2d at 1319-1320; Glueck v. Jonathan Logan, Inc., 653 F.2d 746, 749 (2d. Cir. 1981).

In ABA Formal Opinion No. 95-390, "Conflicts of Interest in the Corporate Family Context," the ABA stated:

> [W]hen a lawyer is considering whether he can assume the representation adverse to a corporate affiliate of a client, he must consider not merely the terms of his engagement to that client but in addition whether the circumstances are such, that the affiliate has reason to believe, on the basis of the lawyer's dealings with it, that it has a client-lawyer relationship with the lawyer.

When the constituent is a high-level official in the organization, it is significant that he may be embedded in the highest level of the decision-making process. Accordingly, it is likely that a lawyer representing such a constituent will be privy to information as to the organization as a whole and its finances, and may acquire knowledge of matters that are of great sensitivity to the organization.

Accordingly, in applying the test of accessibility to confidential client information, a lawyer representing such a constituent may find himself or herself privy to such knowledge. Given the cross-fertilization with upper management and the sensitivity of the issues likely to be encountered in such a representation, the organization may have a reasonable expectation that the lawyer will not be adverse to it in another matter. While again, the determination will be fact-dependent, the lawyer representing a highly placed constituent should be sensitive to such potential conflicts.

Finally, once the constituent represented personally has become a former client rather than a current client, Rule 1.9, rather than Rule 1.7, will apply.[6] Here again, the test for whether the organization should be deemed a "former client" for purposes of this rule should be the same as for Rule 1.7 discussed above. In the case of a former representation, however, there will be the additional factor of

---

[5] Those portions of the rule provide:

> Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, [related to consent] a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if: . . .
>
> (2) Such representation will be or is likely to be adversely affected by representation of another client;
>
> (3) Representation of another client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by such representation; or
>
> (4) The lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.

[6] Rule 1.9 provides as follows:

> A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client consents after consultation.

whether the new matter is "substantially related" to the prior matter. See Comment 2 to Rule 1.9.

Approved: April 2005
Published: April 2005

Opinion 329

Non-Profit Organization Fee Arrangement With an Attorney to Whom It Refers Matters

• An arrangement by a non-profit organization to pay an attorney an annual $10,000 retainer fee for handling small compensation claims for day laborers on a contingent fee basis and then receive back the first $10,000 the attorney receives each year in fees to cover the organization's costs does not violate Rule 5.4(a) so long as the reimbursements are restricted to recouping out of pocket expenses and are not tied to the amount of fees collected by the attorney in the representation of a particular client or clients.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 5.4(a) (Lawyer May Not Share Legal Fees With a Non-Lawyer)
• Rule 7.1(b)(5) (Consideration May be Paid by a Lawyer to an Intermediary for the Referral of Legal Business)

Inquiry

The inquirer, a District of Columbia non-profit entity, would like to assist day laborers in pursuing small workers' compensation claims. The non-profit has learned from experience that the day laborers have a difficult time finding competent counsel who are willing to provide representation in these types of cases. To help facilitate adequate representation, the non-profit proposes to pay a qualified attorney a $10,000 annual retainer for handling these matters; allow the attorney to take a 10 percent contingency fee from client awards; and then require the attorney to pay the non-profit the first $10,000 he receives in contingent fees each year to permit it to recoup its out-of-pocket retainer costs. Other than recouping out-of-pocket costs, the financial arrangement the non-profit has with the attorney is not in any way tied to the amount of fees collected by the attorney in the representation of a particular client. The non-profit has asked the Committee to opine whether this arrangement complies with the DC Rules of Professional Conduct. The Committee concludes that it does for the reasons set forth below.[1]

Discussion

Rule 5.4(a) of the DC Rules states that "a lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a non-lawyer" except in certain narrow circumstances not pertinent to this inquiry. This provision could be interpreted to preclude a lawyer from ever sharing a portion of the fees that the lawyer receives from a client with an organization that made the referral. DC Rule 7.1(b)(5), however, indicates otherwise. It specifies that referral fees arrangements with intermediaries can be proper if the lawyer "takes reasonable steps to ensure that the potential client is informed of: a) the consideration, if any, paid or to be paid by the lawyer to the intermediary, and b) the effect, if any, of the payment to the intermediary on the total fee to be charged." In addition, Comment 6 to Rule 7.1 notes that "a lawyer may participate in lawyer referral programs and pay the usual fees charged by such programs."

There appears to be an inherent conflict, therefore, between the flat prohibition on fee-sharing between lawyers and non-lawyers found in Rule 5.4 and the implied acceptance of sharing fees with non-lawyers found in Rule 7.1. Numerous ethics opinions here and in other jurisdictions have examined this conflict to determine whether fee-sharing arrangements are permitted under certain circumstances. Generally, these opinions have looked to the public policies that underlie Rule 5.4 and have determined that the arrangements are permissible if they comply with them. In reaching this conclusion, the ethics opinions, including one by this Committee, have focused on two of the policy considerations: 1) whether a proposed arrangement would interfere with a lawyer's independent judgment; and 2) whether refusing to permit the arrangement would result in fewer legal resources being available for those in need of them.

This Committee opined in 2001 that a lawyer may "participate in a federal government referral service that negotiates contracts to provide legal services to federal agencies where that program requires the lawyer to submit one percent of the legal fees received through the service to the government office in order to fund the program." D.C. Legal Ethics Comm., Op. 307 (2001). The Committee concluded that the arrangement was acceptable even though it would involve fee-sharing between lawyers and non-lawyers because of the policy considerations underlying the rule. Id. The Committee noted that Comment 6 to Rule 7.1 "suggests that the drafters of the D.C. Rules were not particularly concerned about the manner in which non-profit lawyer referral services structured their fee arrangements; their principal focus was on preventing non-lawyer intermediaries from using their power over lawyers who rely on them for business referrals to influence those lawyers' 'professional independence of judgment.'" Id. (citing Rule 5.4 cmt. 1). The Committee then concluded that the proposed arrangement obviated this concern because the inquiring organization presented "no risks of interfering with participating lawyers' independent professional judgment." Id.[2] In addition, the Committee pointed out that the referring organization "is a non-profit service aimed at achieving important public policy objectives, including holding down the cost to taxpayers of legal services provided to government agencies." Id.[3]

Opinion 307 cited several opinions from other jurisdictions that have also permitted fee-sharing between lawyers and non-lawyer non-profits. For example, it referred to a Michigan decision that held that "a not-for-profit lawyer

[1] For the purposes of this Opinion, the Committee is assuming that the non-profit is not otherwise profiting from its relationship with the attorney. Under § 32-1530 of the D.C. Code, it is unlawful for a person to make it a "business" to solicit employment for a lawyer in respect of any claims or award for workmen's compensation. The arrangement as described to the Committee would not be proscribed by this Code provision.

[2] D.C. Legal Ethics Comm., Op. 233 also addresses the policies behind the ban on fee-sharing: "The bans on fee-sharing and partnerships with nonlawyers have long been a feature of codes of legal ethics. They were motivated by a number of concerns, chiefly that nonlawyers might through such arrangements engage in the unauthorized practice of law, that client confidences might be compromised, and that nonlawyers might control the activities of lawyers and interfere with the lawyers' independent professional judgment." In the opinion, payments of "success" fees to non-lawyer consultants were acceptable even though the payments were passed through a law firm because the payment procedure was "a formality of no consequence." D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 233 (1993).

[3] See also D.C. Legal Ethics Comm., Op. 253 (1994) (holding that a referral arrangement between an insurance company and a law firm that involved payments made for each referred case "would not run afoul" of rules 5.4 and 7.1 even though the referral fee "would be paid by the firm from its percentage contingency fee," but that the arrangement could fail if there are potential conflict of interest problems under rules 1.7 and 1.3).

referral service registered with the state bar may charge as a referral fee a percent of the fee collected by the referred." Mich. State Bar Comm. on Prof. and Judicial Ethics, Op. RI-75 (1991). In rendering its opinion, the Michigan committee pointed to the same policy reasons for its decision, noting that so long as the referral service takes measures to protect against undue influence on the lawyers, "the professional judgment of the lawyer is not interfered with and the rule against fee-splitting with nonlawyers is not violated." Id.

Opinion 307 also referred to Pennsylvania, Arkansas and Virginia opinions which concluded that lawyer referral services operated by local bar associations may accept a percentage of fees earned by lawyers from referred clients. See Pa. Bar Ass'n Ethics Op. 93-162 (1993); Ark. Bar Assoc., Op. 95-01 (1995); and Va. Legal Ethics Comm. Op. 1744 (2001). These opinions noted that a number of jurisdictions help fund their legal referral services through the return of fees from referred lawyers. The Arkansas Bar Association further stated that "the increase in revenue produced for the Bar Association will help maintain this public service." Ark. Op. 95-01. The Virginia opinion also provides support for the idea that fee-sharing is permissible when the arrangement would not interfere with a lawyer's professional judgment and furthers the public policy of providing legal services to those in need of them. It concluded that a private practitioner who received pro bono work from a non-profit association could return court-awarded attorney's fees to the association. Va. Legal Ethics Comm. Op. 1744 (2001). In reaching this conclusion, the committee pointed out that "a legal ethics rule prohibiting lawyers from sharing court awarded fees with public interest groups would jeopardize this important source of funding." Id.[4]

The American Bar Association has indicated on at least three occasions that similar fee sharing arrangements did not violate its earlier Code of Professional Responsibility. In Formal Opinion 291, the ABA determined that "a bar association may require members of a lawyer referral panel to help finance the service either by a flat charge or a percentage of fees collected." ABA Formal Op. No. 291 (1956). In addition, the ABA concluded that it was "ethically proper" for a lawyer referral service to require attorneys to return all or part of consultation fees, as well as a percentage of fees earned, to the service. ABA Informal Op. 1076 (1966). Finally, Formal Opinion 93-374 noted that a lawyer may perform pro bono litigation services and then share a portion of any court awarded fees with the non-profit organization that referred the lawyer to the client. ABA Formal Op. 93-374 (1993).

The Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers reflects the same view that concerns about fee-sharing are not present when fees are shared with a referring non-profit organization. The Restatement contains a provision similar to Rule 5.4(a) of the D.C. Rules. See Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers § 10(3) (1998) ("a lawyer or law firm may not share legal fees with a person not admitted to practice as a lawyer," except in certain irrelevant circumstances). Comments to Section 10 indicate that the fee-sharing prohibition should only be interpreted strictly where policy concerns warrant a narrow interpretation. Comment b notes, for example, that "this section should be construed so as to prevent non-lawyer control over lawyers' services, not to implement other goals such as preventing new and useful ways of providing legal services or making sure that non-lawyers do not profit indirectly from legal services in circumstances and under arrangements presenting no significant risk of harm to clients or third persons." Id. § 10 cmt. b. In addition, the comments note that although fee-sharing gives power to the non-lawyer referrer, "that incentive is not present when the referral comes from a nonprofit referral service." Id. at cmt. d.[5]

Case law provides further support for the view that sharing fees between a lawyer and a referral service is acceptable under the various rules of professional conduct. In Emmons v. State Bar of California, 6 Cal. App. 3d 565 (1970), for example, a California court denied the plaintiff's request for a declaratory judgment that would allow the plaintiff to avoid paying a one-third referral fee to the bar association's lawyer referral service.[6] See Id. Similar to the opinions issued by the various states' ethics committees, the court in Emmons relied on policy reasons for permitting this fee-splitting. The court noted that "there are wide differences—in motivation, technique, and social impact—between the lawyer reference service of the bar association and the discreditable fee-splitting" prohibited by the rules. Id. at 573. Fee-splitting that should not be allowed "carries with it the danger of competitive solicitation; poses the possibility of control by the lay person, interested in his own profit rather than the client's fate; facilitates the lay intermediary's tendency to select the most generous, not the most competent, attorney." Id. at 573-74. On the other hand, fee-splitting with the bar association's lawyer reference service was permissible because "the bar association seeks not individual profit but the fulfillment of public and professional objectives. It has a legitimate, nonprofit interest in making legal services more readily available to the public." Id. at 574.[7]

While these opinions, court decisions, and standards suggest strong support for the proposed arrangement, there is one aspect, namely the fact that the attorney will be representing the day laborers on a contingent fee basis, that requires further analysis. In an opinion rendered in 1998, this Committee determined that Rule 5.4 precluded a lawyer from making payments to a referral service if the payments are "contingent upon, and tied to, the lawyer's receipt of revenue from the referred legal business and is tied to the amount of those fees." D.C. Legal Ethics Comm., Op. 286 (1998). According to this Opinion, the only departure from the ban on fee-sharing that Rule 7.1 permits is the authorization of payments to referring organizations when the payments are non-contingent and "paid regardless of the success or outcome" because that

[4] See also Va. Legal Ethics Comm. Op. 1751 (2001) (noting that many jurisdictions accept arrangements permitting a referral service to receive a percentage fee from referred attorneys, and stating that this widespread acceptance "indicates a strong support by the various bars for increasing public access to legal services").

[5] Other provisions of the Restatement that address fees similarly indicate concern with arrangements that might compromise a lawyer's independence. See e.g. id. § 47 cmt. b ("the traditional prohibition of fee-splitting among lawyers is justified primarily as preventing one lawyer from recommending another to a client on the basis of the referral fee that the recommended lawyer will pay, rather than the lawyer's qualifications"); id. § 134 cmt. c (noting that a lawyer's loyalty to a client must not be compromised by a third party source of payment).

[6] This case has been widely cited by ethics committee opinions. See, e.g., D.C. Legal Ethics Comm., Op. 307; Va. Op. 1751; Ark. Op. 95-01; Pa. Op. 93-162; Mich. Op. RI-75.

[7] Kean v. Stone, 966 F.2d 119 (3rd Cir. 1992), also supports the idea that fee-splitting between a lawyer referral service and a lawyer may be permissible. Kean holds that a union may "benefit indirectly from the proceeds of law practice" where litigation fees are "paid into a separate account used solely by lawyers for litigation purposes." 966 F.2d at 123.

does not represent a division of legal fees. Id.[8] A later opinion from this Committee relating to soliciting plaintiffs for class action lawsuits or obtaining legal work through Internet-based web pages expressed approval of this interpretation of the rules. See D.C. Legal Ethics, Op. 302 (2000) (agreeing with the view that "any fee a law firm pays to a service provider [on the internet] cannot be linked to or contingent on the amount of legal fees the lawyers obtain from a posted project. . . since such an arrangement would violate D.C. Rule 5.4's prohibition against lawyers sharing legal fees with non-lawyers").

These two opinions could be interpreted to preclude any fee-sharing arrangement where the fees are contingent upon a lawyer's receipt of revenue from a referred client. But the opinions are narrower than that and do not address whether a non-profit that refers its clients to lawyers may recoup its out-of-pocket costs in situations where the lawyer collects sufficient funds to pay them from the various contingent fees he or she receives.[9] This fee arrangement is different from the one precluded in Opinion 286 and referred to in Opinion 302 because it is not tied to the amount of fees collected by the lawyer in his or her representation of a particular client. In addition, both of these opinions pre-dated Opinion 307 which supports a fee-splitting arrangement which is far more analogous to our situation than those referred to in Opinions 286 or 302.

This Opinion, however, is limited to the specific facts of this Inquiry and should not be interpreted as a deviation from previously-expressed concerns about contingent fee-sharing arrangements which are explicitly linked to the amounts of fees collected by an attorney in the representation of a specific client or specific clients.

It is the opinion of the Committee that Rule 5.4's prohibition on fee-sharing does not preclude a non-profit from recouping its out-of-pocket expenses by requiring a lawyer to whom cases are referred to repay the expenses if sufficient funds are received from contingent fees obtained from various representations. Opinion 307 makes it clear that:

> [T]he drafters of the D.C. Rules were not particularly concerned about the manner in which non-profit lawyer referral services structured their fee arrangements; their principal focus was on preventing non-lawyer intermediaries from using their power over lawyers who rely upon them for business referrals to influence those lawyers' professional independence of judgment.

D.C. Rule 5.4, Comment [1].

Because the particular structure of the relationship between the non-profit and the lawyer here is comparable to that which normally exists with a lawyer and a non-profit referral service, the Committee concludes that the Committee's rationale for its Opinion 307 applies equally to this type of arrangement because it: 1) does not interfere with the lawyer's independent judgment;[10] and 2) will benefit the public by facilitating the provision of legal services to those who are in need of them.[11] As pointed out in the Committee's Opinion 225, which concluded that a prepaid legal services plan complied with the Rules of Professional Conduct:

> Nothing in the Rules of Professional Responsibility purports to limit or discourage the use of innovative ways of providing legal services. . . . "Innovative approaches and fresh ideas in this area may result in the availability of necessary low-cost legal services to individuals who could not previously afford to employ an attorney."

As part of the arrangement, however, the inquiring non-profit and the attorney providing the services, must comply with the notice provisions set forth in Rule 7.1(b)(5).

Approved: May 2005
Published: June 2005

Opinion No. 330

Unbundling Legal Services

• The provision of legal services through unbundled legal service arrangements is permissible under D.C. Rule 1.2, provided the client is fully informed of the limits on the scope of the representation and those limits do not bar the provision of competent service. Not only the duty of competence, but all the duties that generally attach to lawyer-client relationships will apply to such arrangements, including diligence, loyalty, communication, confidentiality and avoidance of conflicts of interest. Opposing counsel who is dealing with a party who is proceeding pro se should treat that party as unrepresented unless and until the party or a lawyer for the party provides reasonable notice that the party has obtained legal representation. The D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct do not articulate any requirement that attorneys must identify themselves to the court if they provide assistance to a pro se litigant in the preparation of documents to be filed in

[8] This opinion relied in part on an opinion issued by the Florida Bar Professional Ethics Committee, which held that "a nonlawyer hired to engage in permissible marketing activities on behalf of a lawyer may be paid a straight salary," but that "if commissions would be tied to legal fees derived from business brought to the firm by the nonlawyer's efforts, payment of those commissions would constitute a violation of [the Florida rule that] forbids a lawyer to divide a legal fee with a nonlawyer." Fla. Bar Prof. Ethics Comm., Op. 89-4 (1989).

[9] The Committee does not address the question whether the attorney must return any portion of the retainer that is not utilized to provide legal services to day laborer clients. The situations in which all or a portion of the retainer needs to be returned are governed by the Committee's Opinion 264. It is our understanding that this is a retainer to ensure availability which is explicitly permitted in that Opinion.

[10] That the non-profit in question does not appear to be affiliated with any bar association should not affect the non-profit's ability to receive a portion of fees from referred lawyers. See Prof. Ethics Comm. of the State Bar of Tex., Op. 502 (1994) (holding that a non-profit service that was not established by a bar association may refer clients to a lawyer and then receive a portion of the fee collected by the lawyer in part because Texas public policy supports the establishment of lawyer referral services, and the fees received through this arrangement would benefit this policy).

[11] It should also be noted that both ethics committees and courts have indicated that if an attorney were to raise a client's fee to cover the cost of returning some of the funds to a referral service, the arrangement would be ethically unacceptable. See, e.g., Cal. State Bar Ethics Op. 1983-70 (1983) (holding that a lawyer referral service may require attorneys to return to the service a percentage of all fees above a minimum threshold that the attorney receives from referred clients, but that the attorney may not raise the legal fees to cover the amount paid to the service, as "such arrangements should be structured in order to avoid the risk of increased costs to the clients"); Alpers v. Hunt, 86 Cal. 78, 88 (Cal. 1890) (holding that a contract made with a non-lawyer through a third party who would receive one third of any recovered funds was invalid in part because "such a practice would tend to increase the amounts demanded for professional services. In such a case an attorney would be induced to demand a larger sum for his services, as he would have to divide such sum with a third person"). In addition, The D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct require that any fee charged to a client be reasonable. See D.C. Rules of Prof'l Conduct R. 1.5. See also American Bar Association Formal Op. 00-420 (2000); Blum v. Stenson, 465 U.S. 886 (1984). However, by allowing an attorney only a 10% contingency fee and by requiring the attorney to return only the $10,000 that had been advanced, the proposed arrangement avoids offending these fee-based concerns.

court, but attorneys who provide such assistance to pro se litigants should check whether any other source of law in the relevant jurisdiction imposes a disclosure requirement.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.1 (Competence)
- Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.4 (Communication)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality)
- Rule 1.7, 1.9 (Rules on Conflict of Interest)
- Rule 3.3 (Candor toward the Tribunal)
- Rule 4.2 (Communication between Lawyer and Opposing Parties)
- Rule 4.3 (Dealing with Unrepresented Person)

Inquiry

In this opinion we join the ethics committees of many other jurisdictions in examining the practice of "unbundling" legal services. "Unbundling" refers to the separation of the tasks full service lawyers typically conduct into their discrete components, only some of which the client contracts with the lawyer to provide.[1] Examples of unbundled service arrangements include a lawyer who drafts a complaint or an appellate brief for a client to file pro se, counsels a client through an uncontested divorce without filing a notice of appearance in the case, or advises a small business about how to institute debt collection procedures or drafts a contract for it. See ABA Bar Association Section of Litigation, Report of the Modest Means Task Force, Handbook on Limited Scope Legal Assistance 16-46 (2003) [hereinafter ABA Task Force] (giving numerous examples). Advocates argue that such arrangements offer creative means of addressing the current crisis in the provision of legal services to persons of modest means. Id. at 8 (noting a finding that at least one party is unrepresented in 90% of domestic relations cases in the District of Columbia). By paying for only some of the services a full service lawyer would provide, clients may save considerable sums. Even more importantly, clients of modest means may be able to afford to obtain legal services that otherwise would be inaccessible to them. For example, a client might not be able to enter into a full service representation arrangement that required up-front payment of a retainer of several thousand dollars, but could afford to pay a lawyer at the same billing rate for selected services on a pay-as-you-go basis.

As all commentators who have addressed the increasing popularity of unbundling arrangements have noted, however, such practices raise significant ethics issues. We therefore write to provide guidance on questions the unbundling of legal services may raise under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

Discussion

The first question is whether the unbundling of legal services is permissible at all under the D.C. Rules. We are convinced that it is. In so concluding, we join all the ethics committees and judicial opinions of other jurisdictions of which we are aware in reasoning that a client may, if fully informed and freely consenting, contract for limited service arrangements with a legal services provider.[2] This conclusion rests on the express language of D.C. Rule 1.2(c), which states that "a lawyer may limit the objectives of the representation if the client consents after consultation." Unbundling legal services is simply a limiting of the objectives of a lawyer-client relationship. In this sense it is neither particularly novel nor particularly troubling.[3]

It is likewise clear, however, that the provision of legal services through unbundling arrangements cannot sweep away the applicable rules of professional conduct. We recently considered similar issues in Opinion 316, in which we examined the provision of legal information by lawyers through internet chat room communications. As we noted there, once the provision of even limited legal services gives rise to a client-attorney relationship, all the usual duties of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct attach to that relationship.[4] D.C. Ethics Op. 316 at 231. These duties include competence, diligence, communication, confidentiality and the avoidance of conflicts of interest. Id.

Competence

D.C. Rule 1.1 provides that lawyers must provide competent representation to their clients, and the unbundling of legal services in no way obviates lawyers' duties of competence. In other words, the scope of the services may be limited but their quality may not. When hired to diagnose legal problems, an attorney providing services under an unbundling arrangement must be as thorough in identifying legal issues as an attorney who intends to continue with a case through its conclusion. See D.C. Rule 1.1 comment [2] ("Perhaps the most fundamental legal skill consists of determining what kind of legal problems a situation may involve"). An attorney who discovers that a client has a legal problem that falls outside the scope of the limited service agreement should inform her client of the problem, the fact that she is not representing the client regarding it, and that the client should consider seeking independent legal representation. See Los Angeles County Bar Assoc. Ethics Op. 502, at 1 (Nov. 4, 1999) (attorney in limited scope arrangement "has a duty to alert the client to legal problems which

---

[1] One leading proponent has explained unbundling as follows:

> [L]awyers generally offer a full service package of discrete tasks that encompass traditional legal representation. More specifically, the lawyer implicitly or explicitly undertakes the following services on behalf of a client: (1) gathering facts, (2) advising the client, (3) discovering facts of the opposing party, (4) researching the law, (5) drafting correspondence and documents, (6) negotiating, and (7) representing the client in court.
>
> When a client hires a lawyer, generally both client and lawyer assume that the lawyer will perform these services in a full-service package. . . . Unbundling these various services means that the client can be in charge of selecting from lawyers' services only a portion of the full package and contracting with the lawyer accordingly.

Forrest S. Mosten, "Unbundling of Legal Services and the Family Lawyer," 28 Fam. L. Q. 421 (1994). A recent symposium also considers the ethical issues involved in unbundling arrangements. See Symposium Issue, The Professional Lawyer, 2004, at 59-106.

[2] A sampling of such opinions includes Lerner v. Laufer, 359 N.J. Super. 201, 217, 819 A.2d 471, 482 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 2003) ("the law has never foreclosed the right of competent, informed citizens to resolve their own disputes in whatever way may suit them"); Alaska Bar Assoc. Ethics Op. No. 93-1 (May 25, 1993) (lawyer may ethically limit the scope of his representation but must notify client clearly of the limitations on the representation and the potential risks the client is taking by not having full representation); Arizona State Bar Assoc. Ethics Op. No. 91-03, at 4 (Jan. 15, 1991) (lawyer may agree to represent a client on a limited basis as long as the client consents after consultation and representation is not so limited in scope as to violate ethics rules); ABA Informal Op. 1414 (June 6, 1978) (lawyer may give advice and assist in the preparation of pleadings for litigants who are otherwise proceeding pro se).

[3] See, e.g., Colo. Bar Ass'n Ethics Comm., Formal Op. 101, at 2 (Jan. 17, 1998) (noting examples of "commonplace and traditional" arrangements under which clients ask their lawyers "to provide discrete legal services, rather than handle all aspects of the total project").

[4] See also ABA Task Force, at 7 (lawyers who provide limited service assistance "create attorney-client relationships with the people whom they help").

are reasonably apparent, even though they fall outside the scope of retention, and to inform the client that the limitations on the representation create the possible need to obtain additional advice, including advice on issues collateral to the representation").[5]

Another consideration is whether a matter can be handled competently through a limited service arrangement. Because of the limits short term or limited purpose arrangements may place on a lawyer's ability to assist the client with complex legal problems, some cases may not be appropriate for unbundling. The ABA Ethics 2000 Commission revision to Model Rule 1.2(c) thus provides that a lawyer may limit the scope of representation only "if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances," and in accompanying comment [6] gives the following explanatory example:

> If, for example, a client's objective is limited to securing general information about the law the client needs in order to handle a common and typically uncomplicated legal problem, the lawyer and client may agree that the lawyer's services will be limited to a brief telephone consultation. Such a limitation, however, would not be reasonable if the time allotted was not sufficient to yield advice upon which the client could rely.

The ABA Task Force gives the following additional advice: "Lawyers should consider several factors in determining whether limited representation is appropriate, including the capacities of the client, the nature and importance of the legal problem, the degree of discretion that decision-makers exercise in resolving the problem, the type of dispute-resolution mechanism, and the availability (or not) to the client of other self-help resources." ABA Task Force at 59.[6]

Also important is the client's understanding of the scope of the services to be provided under an unbundling arrangement. Because the tasks excluded from a limited services agreement will typically fall to the client to perform or not get done at all, it is essential that clients clearly understand the division of responsibilities under a limited representation agreement. The D.C. Rules generally require only a written statement of the basis of an attorney's fee, but not individualized written retainers or representation agreements. See D.C. Rule 1.5(b) & comment [2]. Particularly in the context of limited-representation agreements, however, a writing clearly explaining what is and is not encompassed within the agreement to provide services will be helpful in ensuring the parties' mutual understanding. See D.C. Ethics Op. 238 (1993) (requiring attorney to state in writing how additional consultation time would be charged to a client).

Conflicts of Interest

There are few precedents considering conflicts of interest issues in the limited service representation context, but a recent opinion of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics ("Committee") provides helpful preliminary guidance. In Opinion 2005-01, the Committee considered two bar association pro bono programs under which large firm commercial lawyers provide initial legal consultations, and sometimes some additional representation, to individuals seeking to file Chapter 7 bankruptcy petitions. The inquirer explained that it would be infeasible for the pro bono lawyers to conduct a complete conflicts check prior to every consultation to see if any creditor of the prospective client was a client of the pro bono lawyer's firm. In considering this issue, the Committee examined evidence about how often Chapter 7 debtors end up in contested proceedings in which a creditor objects to the discharge of the debt. The statistics showed that such contested Chapter 7 proceedings are rare. The Committee therefore concluded that lawyers participating in the pro bono programs have a duty to avoid conflicts arising from representing a client adverse to an existing client of their firm, but that they can generally satisfy this duty by determining, in their initial interview with the debtor, whether any unusual facts suggest direct adversity with a particular creditor so as to require further investigation into whether the creditor is the firm's client. Moreover, the Committee observed, in the rare case in which a client creditor does object to the discharge of a debt or otherwise takes action adverse to the Chapter 7 debtor, the pro bono lawyer cannot represent the debtor unless both clients consent to the dual representation after full disclosure. In other words, the low likelihood of adversity with another client under the particular facts presented lessens the extent of the conflicts investigation required in connection with an initial consultation. Where such a conflict is more likely, however, the rules do not change simply because the representation of the second client involves a limited service arrangement.

In short, attorneys participating in unbundled service arrangements owe the duties of diligence, promptness, loyalty, and communication within the defined scope of the representation as does any lawyer under D.C. Rules 1.3 and 1.4, along with the duties of confidentiality and avoidance of conflicts of interest under D.C. Rules 1.6, 1.7, and 1.9.[7] See D.C. Ethics Op. 316 (attorney providing tailored legal advice rather than general legal information over the internet may create an attorney-client relationship and, in doing so, incurs the same duties of confidentiality and avoidance of conflicts as an attorney providing face-to-face legal counseling).

Communication with Opposing Party

With respect to some issues, however, attorneys' duties in the context of unbundled service arrangements are less clear. One such issue concerns communications with an opposing party. When an attorney is assisting a client for some purposes but not for others, the question may arise as to whether that client is "represented" for purposes of D.C. Rule 4.2, which forbids lawyers to communicate directly with persons "about the subject of the representation with a party known to be represented by another lawyer in the matter" without the prior consent of the lawyer representing such person. D.C. Rule 4.2(a).

When a lawyer provides only limited or behind-the-scenes assistance to a litigant who has filed pro se, opposing counsel cannot be expected to be aware of the lawyer's involvement. In such a situation, opposing counsel acts reasonably in [5] See also ABA Task Force, at 25 ("although representation may be limited to an interview and advice, the interview must be at least as thorough as full-service representation").

[6] See also New York City Bar Ass'n Op. 2005-01 ("lawyer should independently evaluate whether the complexities of the case or the limitations of the client make it unlikely that the client could effectively proceed pro se").

[7] We also note that under a currently proposed revision to D.C. Rule 6.5, D.C. Rules 1.7 and 1.9 will apply to lawyers who provide "short-term limited legal services" to a client "under the auspices of a program sponsored by a nonprofit organization or court" only if "the lawyer knows that the representation of the client involves a conflict of interest," and D.C. Rule 1.10 will apply "only if the lawyer knows that another lawyer associated with the lawyer in a law firm is disqualified by Rule 1.7 or 1.9 with respect to the matter." See District of Columbia Bar Rules of Professional Conduct Review Committee, Proposed Amendments to the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct: Report and Recommendations 179 (Jan. 31, 2005).

proceeding as if the opposing party is not represented, at least until informed otherwise.[8] Even if the lawyer has reason to know that the pro se litigant is receiving some behind-the-scenes legal help, it would be unduly onerous to place the burden on that lawyer to ascertain the scope and nature of that involvement. We therefore believe that the most reasonable course for an attorney dealing with a party who is proceeding pro se is to treat the party as not having legal representation, unless and until the party or a lawyer for the party provides reasonable notice that the party has obtained legal representation.

Disclosure of Involvement

The issue on which courts and ethics committees evaluating practices related to the unbundling of legal services have had the most difficulty agreeing concerns the extent to which lawyers must disclose their involvement when they have provided substantial assistance to a litigant in drafting documents that are to be filed in court. Some opinions have concluded that attorneys need not disclose their involvement in preparing court-filed documents;[9] others have concluded that attorneys should disclose their involvement.[10]

After carefully examining the D.C. Rules and opinions from various jurisdictions, we conclude that nothing in the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct requires attorneys who assist pro se litigants in preparing court papers to place their names on these documents or otherwise disclose their involvement. Attorneys who provide limited-service assistance typically will not see the preparation of documents through to the end and thus cannot control what is in the final document filed by the pro se litigant. See ABA Task Force at 75 (listing this and other concerns identified in a lawyer focus-group study). Some opponents of the practice of "ghostwriting" court documents, as it is frequently called, argue that the chief sin of this practice is that it misleads the court into thinking a litigant is proceeding without legal assistance and thus granting special solicitude to the litigant. This, however, is an issue for the courts to identify if they perceive a problem with the practice. Some jurisdictions have undertaken specific rule modifications to address lawyers' obligations in the context of providing limited drafting assistance to otherwise pro se litigants,[11] but, in the absence of any such directives in the D.C. Rules, we decline to read into them an obligation concerning disclosure of limited assistance.

In sum, in our opinion the provision of legal services through unbundled legal service arrangements is permissible under D.C. Rule 1.2, provided the client is fully informed of the limits on the scope of the representation and these limits do not prevent the provision of competent service. The duties that generally attach to lawyer-client relationships, including those of competence, diligence, loyalty, communication, confidentiality and avoidance of conflicts of interest, apply to such relationships. If a party is proceeding pro se, opposing counsel should treat that party as unrepresented unless and until that counsel receives reasonable notice of representation from the party or her lawyer. Attorneys who provide substantial assistance in the preparation of documents to be filed in court or other tribunal should check the rules of the relevant forum to determine the extent of their disclosure obligations; the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct do not address this question.

Adopted: July 2005
Published: July 2005

Opinion 331

Contact With In-House Counsel of a Represented Entity

• In general, a lawyer may communicate with in-house counsel of a represented entity about the subject of the representation without obtaining the prior consent of the entity's other counsel.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 4.2 (Communication Between Lawyer and Opposing Parties)

Ethics rules generally prohibit lawyers from communicating with a person about the subject of the representation with a person the lawyer knows is represented by another lawyer with respect to that matter.[1] Several members of the committee have encountered questions from members of the bar about whether the D.C. version of this prohibition, Rule 4.2 of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, would bar a lawyer from communicating with an organization's in-house counsel about a matter when that organization is represented by outside counsel on the same matter. While no formal inquiry has been made to the committee, we believe that the issue comes up sufficiently frequently to warrant an opinion.

[8] Some jurisdictions have modified their rules in order to more directly address the issue of attorney communication with a party receiving limited legal assistance. See, e.g., Colo. RPC 4.2 comment ("a pro se party to whom limited representation has been provided . . . is considered to be unrepresented for purposes of this Rule unless the lawyer has knowledge to the contrary"); Colo. RPC 4.3 comment ("pro se parties to whom limited representation has been provided . . . are considered to be unrepresented for purposes of this Rule"); Me. Bar. R. 3.6 (f) (party being provided with limited representation "is considered to be unrepresented" except to extent the limited-representation attorney provides written notice to opposing counsel of the time period in which counsel should communicate only with the limited-representation attorney); Wash. RPC 4.2 (b); 4.3 (b) (similar to Maine).

[9] See, e.g., Los Angeles County Bar Ass'n Ethics Op. 502 (1999) (attorneys assisting pro se litigants need not disclose their involvement); Professional Ethics Commission, Op. No. 89 (2003) (attorney did not act unethically in drafting complaint for litigant to file and proceed with pro se).

[10] See, e.g., Duran v. Carris, 238 F.3d 1268 (10th Cir. 2001) (participation by attorney in drafting pro se appellate brief must be acknowledged by signature); Lerner, supra, 819 A.2d at 483 n.2 (suggesting that "any party's consent to limit the attorney's scope of representation . . . should be fully disclosed to the court"); Ricotta v. State, 4 F. Supp. 2d 961, 986-88 (S.D. Calif. 1998) (failure of attorney to reveal her extensive role in drafting pro se litigant's lengthy oppositions to defendants' motions to dismiss was improper, but court would not hold counsel in contempt because rules of professional conduct and court rules failed to provide clear guidance); New York State Bar Ethics Op. 613, at 5 (April 1990) (lawyer who assists pro se litigant in preparation of documents to be filed in court must disclose her name); Del. Bar Ass'n Ethics Op. 1994-2, at 2 (May 6, 1994) (if an organization prepares documents other than initial pleadings, the extent of the organization's participation should be disclosed by means of a letter to opposing counsel and the court); Kentucky Bar Assoc., Ethics Op. E-343 (Jan. 1991) (counsel may limit representation of a pro se litigant to preparation of initial pleadings, and "the better and majority view appears to be that counsel's name should appear somewhere on the pleading").

[11] The State of Washington, for example, has adopted rules that authorize lawyers to help otherwise self-represented persons to draft pleadings, motions and documents to be filed in court and to rely on the otherwise self-represented person's representation of facts "unless the attorney has reason to believe that such representations are false or materially insufficient." Wash. Super. Ct. R. 11(b). Colorado requires attorneys to "advise the pro se party that a pleading or paper for which the attorney has provided drafting assistance must include the attorney's name, address, telephone number and registration number," but provides that this disclosure does not "constitute entry of appearance by the attorney." Colo. R. Civ. P. 11(b).

[1] Restatement of the Governing Lawyers § 99 (Restatement); Rule 4.2 of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct.

The goal of Rule 4.2 is clear. In explaining it to the Court of Appeals when proposing the present version, the D.C. Bar Board of Governors said that its "basic purpose. . . is to prevent a client, who on the one hand is presumed to be relatively unsophisticated legally but who on the other hand has ultimate substantive control over the matter, from making uninformed or otherwise irrational decisions as a result of undue pressure from opposing counsel." Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct and Related Comments 187 (Nov. 19, 1986) ("Jordan Committee Report"); see also Restatement, § 99, comment b.

We start by noting that the foregoing rationale for the anti-contact rule does not apply where a lawyer desires to contact an organization's in-house counsel. Such a communication would be lawyer to lawyer, and concerns about protecting the organization from overreaching and deception by the lawyer initiating the communication should not apply. Nor is it likely that in-house counsel would inadvertently make disclosures harmful to the organization, as a non-lawyer might do.[2] Therefore, if the Rule forbids contact with those in-house counsel who are representing their client on the matter in question, that would be an unintended result. And we do not believe that the text of the Rule compels that result.

The structure of the D.C. version of rule 4.2 is more elaborate than the ABA Model Rule 4.2, which has only one sentence. The D.C. version has four subparagraphs, of which the first three are pertinent here. Subparagraph (a), which is similar to ABA Model Rule 4.2, generally prohibits a lawyer from communicating about the subject of the representation with "a party known to be represented by another lawyer in the matter," unless the lawyer has the prior consent of that other lawyer or is authorized by law to make the communication. The significance of the other party being "known to be represented by another lawyer" within the meaning of subparagraph (a) is quite clearly that a lawyer's communication should be with that other lawyer rather than directly with the party—because, as just mentioned, the purpose of the Rule is to avoid situations in which a lawyer may take advantage of a non-lawyer by directly communicating with that person. When a party is represented by in-house counsel there would not seem to be any reason why a lawyer could not communicate with that counsel.

Subparagraphs (b) and (c) then deal with specific issues surrounding parties that are organizations. Subparagraph (b) provides that a lawyer may communicate on the subject of the representation with "a nonparty employee of the opposing party" without obtaining the consent of the opposing party's lawyer.[3] A non-party employee is one who does not have the authority to speak for, and bind, the organization with respect to the representation in question; thus, a non-party employee cannot make the kind of unwise or pressured decisions for the organization that the Rule is designed to prevent. See Comment [3] to Rule 4.2.[4] Subparagraph (c) then defines an organization "party" as including "any person, including an employee of a party organization, who has the authority to bind a party organization as to the representation to which the communication relates." Thus, it is the ability of an organization employee to bind the party organization as to the representation itself that is critical in defining "party."

As just noted, considering subparagraph (a) and the purpose of the Rule, it would seem that an opposing lawyer could communicate with in-house counsel who was representing the other party. Based on language in subparagraph (c) (defining "party" as any employee "who has the authority to bind a party organization as to the representation to which the communication relates"), an argument could be made that the in-house counsel who are representing their client in that matter may fall under that definition of "party" because, by virtue of that very representation, they can to some extent speak for and bind their client, and that a lawyer could not communicate with in-house counsel without the consent of outside counsel. We find this argument unpersuasive because it ignores the drafters' clear intentions expressed in the text of subparagraph (a), it would create a restriction on communication that is inconsistent with and counterproductive to the Rule's purpose, it would not seem to have any perceptible purpose, and it would lead to peculiar and unworkable results.

Most importantly, such an interpretation would run counter to the text of subparagraph (a). As we have noted, the critical point under subparagraph (a) is the fact that the party is "represented by another lawyer," and the clear requirement of subparagraph (a) is that a lawyer must communicate with a party, if at all, by communicating with that party's lawyer. Where it is in-house counsel who is representing a party, it is the clear import of subparagraph (a) that the lawyer should communicate with that counsel.

It is true that subparagraph (a) does not expressly say that the communication must be made to the lawyer representing the opposing party where there is such a lawyer. Nonetheless that is its clear implication—where the Rule forbids communication with a represented party there is no one else, other than counsel providing that representation, to communicate with.[5] To the extent it might be argued that subparagraph (a) is not fully or sufficiently explicit to counter a literalistic reading of subparagraph (c) with respect to in house counsel, we recur to the fact that Scope note [1] instructs us that these Rules are to be read as rules of reason that "should be interpreted with reference to the purposes of legal representation and of the law itself." Reading Rule 4.2(c) to define an in-house lawyer as the "party" simply because (as is likely the only real distinction in many circumstances) house counsel get paid a salary while outside counsel

[2] It is possible that an organization's outside counsel may complain that, by bypassing outside counsel to discuss a matter with in-house counsel, the lawyer has interfered with the outside counsel's relationship with the organization. However, D.C. Rule 4.2 does not address those considerations, and we do not believe that they raise any issue under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

[3] But subparagraph (b) further provides that before a lawyer may talk to such a non-party employee, the lawyer must disclose the lawyer's identity and the fact that the lawyer represents a party with a claim against the non-party employee's employer.

[4] Indeed, comment [3] explains that an opposing lawyer may talk to an organization's employee who has "the authority to bind the organization with respect to matters underlying the representation" without the consent of the organization's counsel "if [the employee does] not also have authority to make binding decisions regarding the representation itself." See Comment [3], Rule 4.2.

[5] Subparagraph (c) does as a practical matter require communication with the opposing party's lawyer. If the lawyer seeking communication must communicate with the opposing party, cannot communicate with the party because of Rule 4.2, and may communicate with the counsel representing the party, then the lawyer must communicate with counsel. "A lawyer representing a client in a matter usually may not deal directly with others who have their own counsel in the matter. The lawyer must communicate through their counsel exclusively." ABA/BNA Lawyer's Manual on Professional Conduct at 71:301 (2004) (emphasis added). Effectively forcing one goal by making other courses impossible is a well-known legal mechanism. Cf. Lumley v. Wagner, 42 Eng. Rep. 687 (1852) (even though court believed it could not require a singer to perform for a company to which the singer was contractually bound, court could, and did, enjoin her from performing for anyone else during the relevant period).

are paid fees would serve no discernable purpose, is foreign to the purposes for which the Rule was written, and would bring about peculiar and clearly unintended results, to such an extent that we could not interpret the Rule reasonably to bring about that result.

It is not possible to discern any sensible policy that would support a reading of subparagraph (c) as forbidding communication with house counsel while allowing it for outside counsel. The fact that in-house counsel may have the power to bind the party does not distinguish in-house counsel from outside counsel: as the Restatement shows, any lawyer representing a party, whether in-house or not, will have at least some power to speak for, or bind, that party within the scope of a representation Restatement at §§ 26, 27. Otherwise, communication with a party's lawyer would be useless because what the lawyer said would not be reliable; indeed it is precisely because a party's counsel can reliably speak for the party that Rule 4.2(a) can require a lawyer to speak to a party's lawyer rather than to the party itself. It does not appear that there was any reason why the term "authority to bind a party organization" was included in the Rule's definition of "party" except in order to deal with the familiar issue of which natural persons can in particular instances make decisions that will bind an artificial person—an organization—within its sphere of operation. That is the only issue discussed in the pertinent comments to D.C. Rule 4.2 (comments [2] and [3]). It is the only issue discussed in the pertinent sections of the Board of Governors' recommendations to the D.C. Court of Appeals.[6] See Jordan Committee Report at 187 & 189–91.

Moreover, if Rule 4.2(c) were read to forbid a lawyer to contact in-house counsel representing an opponent, that would lead to an absurd result whenever (as frequently occurs) the organization had decided not to hire outside counsel. If in-house counsel were considered to be the "party," then under this interpretation opposing counsel could not communicate with the organization at all; subparagraph (a) would prevent the lawyer from speaking directly to senior management of the organization because the organization is clearly being represented by in-house counsel, yet subparagraph (c) would bar the lawyer from talking to in-house counsel because, as one who could "bind" the organization as to the representation, the in-house counsel would be considered to be the "party." It could hardly be contended that this was an intended result, and it would certainly be an unworkable result.[7]

It might be argued that a distinction can be drawn between the activities of in-house and outside counsel because counsel who are employees might be more likely to be given powers by their employers that extend beyond strictly counsel functions. For example, in-house counsel might be given the power to settle cases without referring to others in the organization. There are several reasons why such an approach based on such a perceived distinction would not be warranted. First, given the purpose of the Rule, which is to prevent lawyers from communicating directly with parties who are nonlawyers where those parties are represented by counsel, this distinction, even if it exists, is irrelevant. That an in-house lawyer may have some additional functions does not alter the fact that it is that lawyer who is representing the party. Second, it is not clear that the distinction does exist—a client may give any lawyer, in-house or outside, functions that lawyers do not usually have and that are usually exercised by a party, such as authority to settle a dispute. See Restatement § 22 comments c and e, § 27 comment d. It is not at all clear whether it is more or less common to find such authority in the hands of counsel who are employees as opposed to those who are not.

Similarly it might be claimed that allowing an opposing counsel to pick and choose the lawyer with whom to communicate among in-house and outside counsel representing the other party allows the lawyer leeway that might be abused. For example a lawyer might call opposing lawyer A to ask for an extension while knowing that opposing lawyer B would likely reject it for a reason that A may not be aware of. But this is not a problem that Rule 4.2 is aimed at or is suited to solve. The Rule is aimed at the problems that may flow when a lawyer communicates directly with a party even though that party is represented by counsel. The problem of one lawyer trying to take advantage of the fact that an opponent may have multiple lawyers with varying degrees of knowledge or involvement is a different issue—and should not be addressed in a haphazardly incomplete fashion by declaring one of the opposing lawyers to be the party, which, as we have discussed, has nothing to do with the purpose of the Rule and creates other difficulties.[8]

In sum, we conclude that a lawyer who is also an employee of a client organization represents that client; the in-house counsel is not also the "party" within the meaning of D.C. Rule 4.2(c). The fact that in-house counsel represent their client in a matter does not mean that Rule 4.2 prohibits opposing counsel from communicating with them, even when the client has also retained outside counsel on the same matter.[9]

[6] The significance of this point appears with more than usual clarity in these circumstances. As noted above, the ABA Model Rule 4.2 contains only a single sentence with approximately the language of D.C. Rule 4.2(a). The Jordan Committee added subparagraphs (b) and (c) and explained its reasons for doing so at length; the portion of this discussion pertaining to non-governmental parties is at pages 189–191 of the Jordan Committee Report. Nothing in this discussion even remotely addresses any concern over communications with counsel depending on whether they are in house or outside. It is obvious from a reading of this portion of the Committee's report that any effect of constricting a lawyer's ability to communicate with in-house counsel representing an opponent would be unintended by the drafters.

[7] The phrase "represented by another lawyer" in subparagraph (a) clearly refers only to counsel other than the lawyer seeking to make the contact; it cannot be read to refer to in-house counsel when no outside counsel has been hired yet not to refer to in-house counsel when outside counsel has been hired.

[8] This "solution" of regarding in-house counsel as the "party" would be incomplete and in some cases counterproductive. The same kind of attempt to pick and choose whom to call can occur when this interpretation of the Rule would have no effect, such as when are multiple law firms (for example where one serves as local counsel) and no house counsel involved in the representation. Similarly the opponent is often represented only by in-house counsel with more than one in-house lawyer is involved in the representation. Finally, it not infrequently occurs that day-to-day representation is provided by house counsel but a law firm is also involved on a more strategic or coordinating level. Here an opposing lawyer might seek to avoid calling house counsel and might call a lawyer in the firm to make a request because of that lawyer's lack of familiarity with day-to-day developments. In such situations deeming in house counsel to be the party and forcing communications to be with the law firm would constitute a distinct disadvantage to the party.

[9] The D.C. Bar Rules of Professional Conduct Review Committee has recommended adding a comment to Rule 4.2 that would expressly conclude that "Because this Rule is primarily focused on protecting represented persons unschooled in the law from direct communications from counsel for an adverse person, consent of the organization's lawyer is not required where a lawyer seeks to communicate with in-house counsel of an organization." Proposed Amendments to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct: Report and Recommendations, at 151 (January 31, 2005). Since comments to the Rules explain and illustrate them rather than providing new substance (see Scope note [6] to the Rules), the Rules Review Committee's recommendation of this new comment means that that Committee interprets Rule 4.2 consistently with this opinion.

This result is consistent with the authorities that have considered the issue under versions of the Rule that are similar to the Model Rule and do not include subparagraphs (b) or (c), providing further reason to interpret the D.C. Rule to avoid any conclusion that a contrary result was an unstated purpose of our rule. The Restatement (§ 100, comment c) concludes that an opposing lawyer's contact with in-house counsel of a corporation is generally not barred by the anti-contact rules that apply in the United States. The same result was reached by the District of Connecticut in In re Grievance Proceeding, 2002 WL 31106389 (D. Conn. 2002). That court concluded that in those circumstances an in-house lawyer "does not fall within the plain meaning of 'party' for purposes of [Connecticut's version of Rule 4.2]." Id. at *3.[10] The District Court noted that the purpose of Rule 4.2 is "to protect the lawyer-client relationship by preventing opposing counsel from taking advantage of a non-lawyer's relative unfamiliarity with the law or prompting a non-lawyer's inadvertent disclosure of information against interest." Id. The court added that communication with a general counsel generally will not raise the same concerns as communication with a non-lawyer employee. In holding that Rule 4.2 does not prohibit the communication, the court noted that hiring an outside counsel generally will not transform the general counsel from attorney to party for purposes of Rule 4.2.

We agree with the result reached by the authorities cited above and conclude that, in the District of Columbia, a lawyer generally is not proscribed by D.C. Rule 4.2 from contacting in-house counsel even though the entity is represented by outside counsel.[11] Of course, if the in-house counsel is represented personally in a matter, Rule 4.2 would not permit a lawyer to communicate with that in-house counsel regarding that matter, without the consent of the in-house counsel's personal lawyer.

Approved: September 2005
Published: October 2005

[10] § 100, Comment c. A similar result was reached in In re James Finkelstein, 901 F.2d 1560 (11 th Cir. 1990).

[11] The Committee notes, however, that even though this opinion concludes that a lawyer may generally initiate contact with in-house counsel, in-house counsel is not obligated to engage in the communication and may direct the lawyer to communicate only with the organization's outside counsel.

Opinion 332

Firm Names for Solo Practitioners

- A lawyer who opens a solo practice may conduct his or her business under any trade name that does not constitute a false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services. The use of the word "firm" in the firm name does not inherently constitute a misleading representation about a solo practitioner. A solo practitioner must take care, however, to insure that clients and potential clients are not misled as to the nature of his or her practice.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 7.5 (Firm Names and Letterheads)
- Rule 7.1 (Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services)

Inquiry

The Committee has received an inquiry regarding the permissible firm names that may be adopted by a solo practitioner. We have been asked to provide guidance on the nature of acceptable firm names that comport with the Rules of Professional Conduct. In particular, we are asked, may Jane Doe, a solo practitioner without employees, practice under the name "The Doe Law Firm" or "The Advocacy Law Firm?"

Background

Rule 7.5(a) generally provides that: "A lawyer shall not use a firm name, letterhead or other professional designation that violates Rule 7.1." D.C. Rule 7.5. Rule 7.1(a), in turn, prohibits lawyers from making a "false or misleading communication" concerning the lawyer or the lawyer's services. A statement is false or misleading if it: contains a material misrepresentation of fact; omits a fact necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading; or contains an assertion about the lawyer or the lawyer's services that cannot be sustained. Id. § 7.1(a).

This general prohibition on materially misleading representations is applied to law firm names, in part, through Rule 7.5(d), which provides: "Lawyers may state or imply that they practice in a partnership or other organization only when that is the fact." Thus, for example, lawyers who share office facilities but who are not, in fact, partners may not denominate themselves as, say, "Smith and Jones" because that title suggests a partnership in the practice of law that does not in fact exist. D.C. Rule 7.5, Comment [2]. More broadly, one may not use the name of a particular lawyer as part of the firm's name if the lawyer is not associated with the firm or is not a predecessor of the firm. Id. at Comment [1].

Courts and other Bars have applied this Rule and its commentary in a manner that furthers the general prohibition on a misleading firm name. Thus, it is commonplace that a firm name must reflect accurately the nature of the entity that bears it and the nature of the relationship of the lawyers who are affiliated with it. A law firm, for example, may only call itself "Medical Malpractice Trial Attorneys, Inc." if it, in fact, handles malpractice cases through trial. See Phila. Ethics Op. 98-17 (1998); see also In re Shannon, 638 P.2d 482 (Or. 1982) ("Shannon and Johnson's Hollywood Law Center" trade name is permissible because it has no tendency to mislead). For this using the word "advocacy" in a firm name is acceptable, so long as the firm in fact does advocacy (as most do) and does not limit its practice to, say, serving as a neutral third-party arbiter.

The possibility for confusion is particularly acute in the context of firm names that misrepresent the nature of the connection between and amongst the members of the entity so named. It is, for example, misleading to state that one is a member of a "Professional Services Group" of attorneys and accountants, where the group has no formal existence. See In re Schneider, 710 N.E.2d 178 (Ind. 1999). Conversely, if two lawyers who share offices maintain a continuing relationship akin to that of "of-counsel" association, they may hold themselves out as such, though they may not take the next step of misleadingly practicing under a trade name such as "Law Offices at X Square" which implies a unitary relationship. See N.Y. City Ethics Op. 1995-8 (1995); see also ABA Informal Op. 85-1511 (1985) (firm may name itself "The X Partnership" where X is a retired former partner).

Our own Court of Appeals added a further gloss when it construed Rule 7.5 in In re Karr, 722 A.2d 16, 22-26 (1998), reading the Rule broadly to permit identification of "partnerships" that were less than "full-fledged" ones. Karr had operated his law firm under a trade name that included the last name of William McLain (e.g. "Karr and McLain"). McLain, however, was not an equity partner in the firm, but rather functioned, apparently, as a non-equity partner. The Court concluded that the purpose of Rule 7.5(d) is for "partners [to be] accurately identified as such . . . so that the public is not misled." Karr 722 A.2d at 25. Given that the Rules might be read to permit the identification of partnerships taking any of a number of forms recognized under law, the Court concluded that Karr's use of McLain's name did not constitute a "false or misleading" communication that McLain was a "partner" in the firm. Id. at 26.

Discussion

With this background in mind we turn to the question presented, which may be restated as follows: is an implicit statement that one practices in a partnership or multi-member organization made when a solo practitioner styles his or her law office as "The Doe Law Firm" or "The Advocacy Firm" or similar names?

In our view, this question is really comprised of two distinct components—first, whether the use of the word "firm" by a solo practitioner is always and inherently misleading because it necessarily contains a material misrepresentation or omits a fact that renders the statement materially misleading. In other words, we believe the first stage of our inquiry is to ask whether the use of the word "firm" is such that we may conclude that it is likely to be misleading in all or nearly all applications because it necessarily is inconsistent with solo practice. The second component of the inquiry asks whether the use of the word "firm" to describe a solo practitioner is sufficiently clear and unambiguous that it may never be deemed misleading, whatever the context.

As we discuss below, in our view neither absolute conclusion is warranted. As a general matter, the use of the word "firm" by a solo practitioner is not presumptively misleading. But practitioners electing to use this naming convention must exercise caution to avoid its use in contexts where it is misleading or is likely to be so.

Is the use of the word "Firm" inherently false or misleading?

Though we have found no law or opinions addressing this question directly, in our judgment, the use of a name such as "The Jane Doe Firm" is not inherently misleading. It does not, in our view, convey to a reasonable observer that the lawyer necessarily practices with other lawyers. Rather, in our view the use of the term 'firm' may also be used to distinguish between the lawyer in her individual capacity, as opposed to her business or professional capacity. For example, a telephone listing for The Jane Doe Law Firm distinguishes the telephone number from Jane Doe's residential number. The recipient of a letter from The Jane Doe Law Firm knows that a lawyer as opposed to a layperson has written to him.

To begin with, we recognize that the common usage of the word "firm" in the English language is sometimes ambiguous. People use the term both to mean "a business enterprise" and to mean "a group of more than one person in a business." Reflecting that ambiguity, the Oxford English Dictionary first defines "firm" as: "The 'style' or name under which the business of a commercial house is transacted"—that is a definition that applies irrespective of the number of participants in the firm. However, the OED then offers, as a second definition of "firm" the following: "A partnership of two or more persons carrying on a business"—a definition which, of course, connotes more than one participant.[1]

Furthermore, the Terminology section of our own Rules explicitly recognizes that the word "firm," as used in the Rules, does not necessarily suggest the presence of other legal staff. Thus, the Rules define "firm" or "law firm" to mean " a lawyer or lawyers in a private firm . . ." D.C Rules, Terminology [4] (emphasis supplied). This specific definition is, at least implicitly, a recognition that firms may consist of many lawyers or only a single practitioner.[2]

Where the question is whether a particular form of firm name might mislead members of the public, the public's actual confusion (or lack thereof) seems germane to our inquiry. It is, therefore, worth asking whether the public is actually confused by the fact that a solo practitioner uses the word "firm" to describe her law practice.

The answer appears to be: "no." A cursory review of the local Yellow Pages reveals dozens of legal offices styled in the form "Doe Law Firm" comprised, from all appearances, of only a single practitioner. Moreover, when we informally inquired of the Office of Bar Counsel regarding the nature of any complaints they might have received concerning misleading law firm names, we were advised that Bar Counsel had no recollection of having received a complaint about a firm name of the form "Doe Law Firm" in the past quarter century. Though the absence of evidence can never be conclusive evidence of absence of a problem, we think the apparent lack of public confusion significant. At a minimum it buttresses our conclusion that, in the real world, the use of the word "firm" is not necessarily misleading when applied to a solo practitioner. For example, notwithstanding a name such as "Doe Law Firm" clients are unlikely to be misled into thinking they are dealing with a multi-lawyer organization when the practitioner operates out of a home or one-room office.

We can, of course, readily imagine names that one might adopt for which this analysis would not be true—where the name clearly implies that which is not true and is therefore inherently misleading in all circumstances. For example, Bar Counsel does report that they have received complaints regarding the use of names of the form "Doe & Associates". It is useful to reiterate that, as we said in Opinion No. 189 (decided under the former Code of Professional Responsibility), a solo practitioner may not practice under the name "John Doe & Associates" for the use of the word "associates" would naturally be read to necessarily imply the existence of other legal staff in the practice. See D.C. Ethics Op. 189 (1988). This prohibition remains in effect today under Rule 7.5(d) of the Rules of Professional Conduct. Cf. Disciplinary Counsel v. Furth, 754 N.E.2d 219 (Ohio 2001) (solo practitioner may not practice under his name followed by "Associates, Attorneys and Counselors at Law"); cf., Medina County Bar Ass'n v. Grieselhuber, 678 N.E.2d 535 (Ohio 1977) (solo practitioner may not style his firm "and Affiliates" or hold himself out as "Body Injury Legal Centers"). Similarly a solo lawyer using the title "Senior Attorney and Director of Services" misleads because the lawyer implies the existence of other staff. Oklahoma Bar Ass'n v. Leigh, 914 P.2s 661 (Okla. 1996).

Finally, as our Rules make clear, see Rule 7.5, comment [1], any analysis of the "Doe Law Firm" naming convention should take into account broader constitutional considerations. The Supreme Court has held that the First Amendment protects commercial speech and that the public, generally, has a right to receive truthful and non-deceptive information. See Bates v. State Bar, 433 U.S. 350 (1977) (commercial speech serves individual and societal interests in assuring informed and reliable decision-making). To be sure, a state may regulate trade names where their use is deceptive, see Friedman v. Rogers, 440 U.S. 1 (1979), but the First Amendment clearly prohibits the regulation of lawyer speech where such regulation is based merely on speculative harms. E.g. In re RMJ, 455 U.S. 191 (1982) (rejecting restriction on listing expertise); Peel v. Attorney Registration and Disciplinary Com'n of Illinois, 496 U.S. 91 (1990) (rejecting restriction on advertisement as trial specialist); Ibanez v. Florida Dept. of Business and Prof. Regulation, 512 U.S. 136 (1994) (rejecting listing of CPA qualification). As the Supreme Court has said: "[T]he States may not place an absolute prohibition on certain types of potentially misleading information. . . if the information also may be presented in a way that is not deceptive." In re RMJ, 455 U.S. at 203.

[1] Other dictionaries reflect similar ambiguity. Webster's Tenth Collegiate, for example, defines a firm as: "1. the name or title under which a company transacts business; 2. a partnership of two or more persons that is not recognized as a legal person distinct from the members composing it; [or] 3. a business unit or enterprise." Nor does the word "company" necessarily imply multiple components. Webster's, for example, defines it as both "a chartered commercial organization" and an "association with another."

[2] Our analysis is limited, of course, to the Rules of Professional Conduct. Independent provisions of Federal or District law might otherwise provide authorization for or limitations on the trade names that a solo practitioner or other law firms may adopt and must, of course, be complied with. See, e.g., D.C. Ethics Op. 254 (1995) (authorizing use by lawyers in District of abbreviations such as "LLP," "LLC," and "PLLC" in light of statutory authorization for formation of such organizations by District law), revising D.C. Ethics Op. 235 (1993) (pre-statute prohibition on such abbreviations).

Thus, at a minimum, we believe that, in interpreting the Rules of Professional Conduct, we should err on the side of permitting lawyers to choose their own trade names unless there is a clear indication that the name is deceptive or misleading. For this reason, in our view, the naming convention "Doe Law Firm" is not per se impermissible.

The use of "firm" may be misleading in certain contexts

Our conclusion that the use of "firm" as a naming convention by a solo practitioner is not inherently misleading or false does not, however, end the inquiry. For we can readily imagine that, under particular circumstances, the use of the term could be misleading or confusing. Thus, solo practitioners who practice under a name such as the "Jane Doe Firm" must exercise caution in the conduct of their practice and, when faced with circumstances in which a client may reasonably be confused, are under an affirmative obligation to avoid any misunderstanding.

Cases and opinions on lawyer's speech make clear that context matters. Thus, for example, while the phrase "legal clinic" is not inherently misleading, see Bates v. State Bar, 433 U.S. 350 (1977); Jacoby v. State Bar, 562 P.2d 1326 (Cal. 1977), it can be misleading in context when it implies the existence of a separate entity where none exits, see In re Shapiro, 656 N.Y.S.2d 80 (App. Div. 1996) (listing as "Accident Legal Clinic of Shapiro and Shapiro" misleading because clinic not separate from law firm and firm handled more than accident claims). Similarly, two firms may reflect their association with each other—but only in a manner that contextually makes clear the nature of their relationship. E.g., ABA Formal Op. 94-388 (1994) (firms may designate themselves as "Allied" or in a "Network" provided additional disclosure regarding nature of relationship between the firms is also made to prevent misleading client); ABA Formal Op. 84-351 (1984) (law firms may list themselves as "Affiliated" or "Associated," so long as communications regarding the nature of the firms' relationship are clear and not misleading).

Our own opinions on related matters offer similar, cautionary advice about the need for contextual analysis. For example, in D.C. Ethics Op. 224, we wrote: "A lawyer, all of whose partners die, retire, or otherwise leave the partnership is not precluded from continuing to use the former partnership name, absent reason to believe that clients or potential clients are led by the firm name to believe that the lawyer practices in a partnership or with other lawyers." Thus, the rule there (as here) was that the firm name was not presumptively misleading (even though the lawyer named was no longer practicing in the firm), but that a lawyer who knew or reasonably should have known of any confusion on the part of clients or potential clients was obliged to correct the misimpression.

A lawyer's obligation is not limited, however, to affirmatively correcting clients who are actually misled. As Rule 7.5(d) comment [1] makes clear, in some situations efforts must be made to avoid deception by "avoid[ing] a misleading implication." We can imagine contexts where the use of the name "Jane Doe Firm" would give rise to such a misleading implication.

One such circumstance that comes readily to mind would be a solo practitioner using the firm naming convention who shares office space and staff with other lawyers. As we noted in Opinion 303, office-sharing arrangements are rife with the potential for confusion. See D.C. Ethics Op. 303 ("Office-sharing arrangements. . . create a risk of public confusion."). That potential would seem to be magnified by the use of a potentially confusing firm name. In such a case, the unwary client might reasonably suppose that the other professionals present are also members of the practitioner's firm, and the prudent practitioner must take steps, through affirmative representations and through language in any engagement agreement, for example, to insure that confusion does not arise. See id. (Noting that "[i]f a potential client appears confused about the relationship among the attorneys in such an arrangement, the attorney should take steps to resolve this confusion" and requiring attorney to make an affirmative disclaimer of any affiliation with the other attorneys in the shared office space).

It bears emphasis: Our discussion of the solo practitioner sharing office space is meant to be illustrative only. There are certainly other situations where the use of the word "firm" may be misleading. The solo practitioner who elects to practice under the "Law Firm" name should do so ever mindful of the context in which his or her actions will be viewed.

Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, we believe that a solo practitioner may practice under a trade name that uses the term "firm" or "law firm" without violating the Rules of Professional Conduct. In doing so, practitioners should exercise caution to insure that the manner in which they conduct their practice does not, in context, mislead clients or potential clients. Practitioners are also affirmatively obliged to correct any misimpression that might arise whenever they know or reasonably should know that a client may be confused.[3]

Inquiry No: 05-03-01
Adopted: October 18, 2005
Published: November 2005

[3] One member of the Committee is not satisfied with the reasoning on which this opinion relies. Although he has chosen not to file a dissenting opinion, he has requested that his disagreement with the opinion as written be formally noted.

Opinion 333

Surrendering Entire Client File Upon Termination of Representation

• Upon the termination of representation, an attorney is required to surrender to a client, to the client's legal representative, or to a successor in interest the entire "file" containing the papers and property to which the client is entitled. This includes copies of internal notes and memoranda reflecting the views, thoughts and strategies of the lawyer.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.8(i) (Imposing lien on attorney work product)
• Rule 1.16(d) (Surrendering files upon termination of representation)

Inquiry

A law firm previously represented a bank in a variety of matters. After the firm's representation in those matters ended, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation ("FDIC") was appointed as receiver for the bank. The FDIC's outside counsel has requested access to all of the firm's files regarding the bank. The firm has provided access to all client files with the exception of a small folder containing individual attorney handwritten notes and several internal memoranda reflecting attorneys' thoughts, impressions and strategy ideas. Outside counsel for the FDIC claims to be entitled to all of the bank's files—including the firm's opinion work product—by virtue of the FDIC's statutory assumption of all rights, titles, powers and privileges of the insured depository institution. The FDIC's counsel has never articulated why the particular material that the firm is withholding is necessary for its investigation of the bank's failure. Instead, it argues simply that the FDIC, as the bank's successor in interest, is entitled to these documents.

Discussion

D.C. Rule 1.16 provides that "[i]n connection with any termination of representation, a lawyer shall take timely steps to the extent reasonably practicable to protect a client's interests, such as . . . surrendering papers and property to which the client is entitled . . . The lawyer may retain papers relating to the client to the extent permitted by Rule 1.8(i)." D.C. Rule 1.16(d). D.C. Rule 1.8(i) creates a narrow exception to the general rule that clients are entitled to their files by allowing a lawyer to secure unpaid fees or expenses by placing a lien "upon the lawyer's own work product, and then only to the extent that the work product has not been paid for." D.C. Rule 1.8(i).[1] The Comment to D.C. Rule 1.8 states, "if the client has paid for the work product, the client is entitled to receive it, even if the client has not previously seen or received a copy of the work product." D.C. Rule 1.8, Comment [9].

The Committee has recognized that the surrender of all files to the client at the termination of a representation is the general rule and that the work-product exception applicable to liens for unpaid fees or expenses should be construed narrowly. See D.C. Ethics Op. 250 (1994); D.C. Ethics Op. 230 (1992). Work product "immunity" is a doctrine of evidence law, which may shield attorney work product from discovery by opposing counsel; it does not shield that same attorney work product from the attorney's own client.

Indeed, the Committee has explicitly recognized that the District of Columbia has rejected the "end-product" approach of some jurisdictions[2]—where the client only owns the pleadings, contracts, and reports that reflect the final result of the attorney's work—in favor of the majority, "entire file" approach, "which does not permit a lawyer to acquire a lien on any of the contents of the client file except that portion of work product within the file that has not been paid for." D.C. Ethics Op. 283 n.3 (1988); see also D.C. Ethics Op. 168 (1986) (for purposes of determining what needs to be turned over to a former client or substitute counsel, the "entire contents of a client's file" includes "all notes, memoranda and correspondence constituting 'work product'"); Sage Realty Corp. v. Proskauer Rose Goetz & Mendelsohn LLP, 91 N.Y.2d 30, 34, 689 N.E.2d 879, 666 N.Y.S.2d 985 (N.Y. 1997).

D.C.'s approach has been embraced by the Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers (2000), which states that, "On request, a lawyer must allow a client or former client to inspect and copy any document possessed by the lawyer relating to the representation, unless substantial grounds exist to refuse." Id. at § 46(2). An attorney must surrender all papers and property to which the client is entitled. This requires the attorney to consider carefully the contents of the "file," ensuring that it contains all material that the client or another attorney would reasonably need to take over the representation of the matter, material substantively related to the representation, and material reasonably necessary to protect or defend the client's interests. An attorney would not be required to surrender material that relates solely to the prior management of the case (such as material concerning which of the firm's lawyers were assigned particular research projects) or to matters that are completely unrelated to the substance of the representation.

Conclusion

For these reasons, at least so far as the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct are concerned, nothing in the matter at hand would justify withholding the relevant file from counsel for the FDIC.[3]

Inquiry No: 05-10-05
Adopted: December 20, 2005
Published: December 2005

Opinion 334

Agreement Between Lawyer and Media Representatives

• Rule 1.8(c) does not apply to an agreement between a lawyer representing a client and representatives of the media who are interested in obtaining the lawyer's story.

[1] Although not relevant here, D.C. Rule 1.8(i) also provides that, even when payment has not been made, work product cannot be withheld (i) when the client has become unable to pay, or (ii) when withholding the lawyer's work product would present a significant risk to the client of irreparable harm.

[2] A minority of courts and state bar legal ethics authorities distinguish between the "end product" of an attorney's services—e.g., filed pleadings, final versions of documents prepared for the client's use, and correspondence with the client, opposing counsel and witnesses—and the attorney's "work product" leading to the creation of those end product documents, which remains the property of the attorney (see, e.g., Federal Land Bank v. Federal Intermediate Credit Bank, 127 F.R.D. 473, aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 128 F.R.D. 182 (S.D. Miss. 1989); Corrigan v. Armstrong, Teasdale, Schlafly, Davis & Dicus, 824 S.W.2d 92 (Mo. Ct. App.); Alabama State Bar, Formal Ethics Op. RO 86-02; Arizona State Bar Comm. on Rules of Prof'l Conduct, Op. No. 92-1; Illinois State Bar Assn., Op. No. 94-13; North Carolina State Bar Ethics Comm., RPC 178 (1994); Rhode Island Supreme Ct. Ethics Advisory Panel, Op. No. 92-88 (1993); Wisconsin Ethics Opinion E-82-7 (1998)).

[3] This assumes, of course, that the FDIC, is, as a matter of federal law, in effect the "client" and is entitled to any property or files to which the bank would be entitled if it were still the firm's client .

But Rule 1.7(b)(4) does apply in such circumstances, and the lawyer must be vigilant to determine those circumstances where an agreement with media representatives gives the lawyer a personal interest in the matter that may be at odds with the lawyer's obligation to the client.

Obtaining valid consent of the client under Rule 1.7(c) to a conflict arising in such circumstances is difficult because it requires the client to anticipate future aspects of the representation to assess their potential impact on the lawyer's ability to represent the client. In such circumstances either the client should have independent counsel or the lawyer should consult independent counsel to assure that the lawyer will obtain an objective view of whether the representation can proceed with consent.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.8(c) (Conflict of Interest—Acquiring Media Rights from Client)
- Rule 1.7(b)(4) (Conflict of Interest—Lawyer's Personal Interests)
- Rule 1.7(c) (Conflict of Interest—Client's Consent to Conflict)
- Scope Comment [5] (Interpretation of Specific versus General Rules)

Inquiry

A question posed by an inquirer raises important issues concerning Rules 1.7 and 1.8, as well as more general issues concerning how to interpret the D.C. Rules when more than one might apply to the same situation.

The inquirer is a lawyer who represents a pro bono client in litigation. Under their agreement, the client pays nothing for the legal representation and is not required to reimburse the lawyer for expenses of the litigation. The litigation had drawn the interest of the press, and the inquirer finds it necessary to speak to media representatives in the course of the representation. The inquirer has been approached by reporters for newspapers and magazines who are contemplating writing books, and "perhaps" producing motion pictures, about the litigation. The inquirer states that the primary interest of these media representatives is in the lawyers who are conducting the litigation rather than the client. The media representatives would like to discuss an arrangement under which the inquirer would receive compensation from them for the inquirer's cooperation and the rights to the inquirer's story; the client, while not the primary focus of the media's interest, would also receive compensation "for his life rights." The inquirer would not divulge any confidential information protected by Rule 1.6 (that is to say, the inquirer will disclose neither "confidences" nor "secrets" under that Rule) about the client without the client's consent. The inquirer asks whether the arrangement sought by the media representatives would violate Rule 1.8(c), which provides:

> Prior to the conclusion of representation of a client, a lawyer shall not make or negotiate an agreement giving the lawyer literary or media rights to a portrayal or account based in substantial part on information relating to the representation.

In particular, the inquirer notes, this Rule expressly applies only to an agreement giving the lawyer literary or media rights of the client while, by contrast, in the situation at hand the media, not the lawyer, seek the client's and the lawyer's literary and media rights.

We conclude that (1) Rule 1.8(c) does not apply to the facts as presented but (2) Rule 1.7(b)(4) does, and the inquirer cannot proceed to negotiate with the media representatives without full disclosure to the client and an appropriate waiver under Rule 1.7(c), if such a waiver is possible.

1. Rule 1.8(c).

This Rule, quoted above, deals with a specific and defined conflict of interest: it arises when a lawyer acquires literary or media rights concerning the lawyer's representation of a client where that representation is ongoing at the time of the acquisition and where the lawyer generally has the intention to exercise those rights later on, for example by writing a book about the matter. The existence of those media rights in the lawyer's hands may influence choices made by the lawyer in the representation because the media rights may be worth more if some steps are taken by the lawyer rather than others. If, for example, the lawyer had acquired the right to popularize the client's story, acceptance of an early settlement might diminish the value of that right, so that the lawyer would then have a personal financial interest in maximizing the value of the media rights that might negatively influence the lawyer's ability to make the best decisions for the client.

> The policy served by the Rule is obvious. A lawyer holding media rights to the story of the very case in which he is involved has an interest in seeing the case sensationalized. The lawyer also has the means of sensationalizing it, by his choices of tactics and by the recommendations he makes to the client (not to plead guilty to a lesser charge, for example). Thus the risk that the lawyer will succumb to these temptations and actually provide less than vigorous representation is not trivial.
>
> 1 Hazard and Hodes, The Law of Lawyering, §12.10 at 12-28 (Third Edition, 2004 Supplement). The Rule therefore forbids the acquisition of such rights by the lawyer while the representation is ongoing and the lawyer's decisions for the client still may be so influenced, and there is no provision therein for waiver by the client.

There is an exception to this rule where the lawyer represents the client only in seeking to sell the client's literary rights and has a contingent fee arrangement with the client such that the more value the lawyer secures for the client, the greater the fee to the lawyer. See D.C. Rule 1.8, Comment [4]. The clear rationale for the exception is that in such a case the lawyer is induced by the contingent fee to seek the most advantage for the client in the matter at hand, as both are interested in maximizing the value of the literary rights. By contrast, where the subject matter of the lawyer's representation of the client is other than protecting and enhancing the literary rights of the client, the publicity value of steps taken or not taken in the representation could make the lawyer's interest in the literary rights conflict with the client's best interest.

2. Would the sale of the inquirer's story that is the subject of the inquiry be barred by Rule 1.8(c)?

The inquirer states that media representatives have approached him regarding a book or possibly a movie about the representation. The representatives apparently also have approached, or intend to approach, his client and apparently have offered to compensate both.

We do not believe that the present situation triggers Rule 1.8(c).[1] That provision prohibits a lawyer from "mak[ing] or negotiat[ing] an agreement giving the lawyer literary or media rights to a portrayal or account" based on the representation (emphasis added). We believe the rule prohibits a lawyer from acquiring media rights from the client or otherwise;

[1] As we make clear later, this situation most assuredly falls within the scope of Rule 1.7(b). We discuss the conflicts under Rule 1.7 in full detail later on in this opinion.

it does not, however, prohibit the lawyer from making an agreement with media representatives with respect to his own media rights.

The predecessor provision in the Code of Professional Responsibility, DR 5-104(B), made this clear by providing:

> Prior to conclusion of all aspects of the matter giving rise to his employment, a lawyer shall not enter into any arrangement or understanding with a client . . . by which he acquires an interest in publication rights with respect to the subject matter of his employment . . .

This provision thus simply barred the lawyer from acquiring literary rights from the client. The modified version in the present Rule 1.8(c) maintains the focus on barring the acquisition by a lawyer of literary rights, but broadens this bar so that it is not just the client, but anyone, from whom the lawyer is barred from acquiring such rights.

When the D.C. Bar Board of Governors recommended adoption of the Rules of Professional Conduct, it observed only that the new Rule 1.8(c) was "substantially similar" to the Code provision, noting only that the term "publication" rights had been changed to "literary or media" rights, "a more generally inclusive term." Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct and Related Comments at 75 (November 19, 1986) ("The Jordan Committee Report").[2] The Board of Governors did not mention that the text had also been changed to bar the acquisition of media rights by the lawyer not only from the client, but from others (for example, a client's spouse or relative). But, as noted, with these changes the focus of the prohibition remained on the lawyer acquiring media rights that could later be sold to media representatives.

The transaction contemplated by the inquirer would involve a sale of media rights by the inquirer to media representatives, not the acquisition by the inquirer of someone else's rights, and specifically, not the unconsented use by the inquirer of confidences or secrets of the inquirer's client.[3] This difference takes the inquirer's proposed transaction outside of the language of Rule 1.8(c). Equally as important, this factual difference is significant in that in some circumstances such a distinction diminishes the potential for evil that the Rule was designed to address. In a situation of the type prohibited by the Rule, the lawyer obtains media rights, say from the client, and holds those rights while continuing to conduct the representation, while intending to make a media deal involving those rights at some later time. Thus the lawyer acquires and holds an asset (the media rights) whose value may fluctuate as events occur in the representation. This gives the lawyer a financial interest in handling the representation so as to maximize the later value of the media rights, but that course might well not coincide with the course that is best for the client. As succinctly stated in comment [4] to Rule 1.8, "Measures that might otherwise be taken in the representation of the client may detract from the publication value of an account of the representation." This interest is so likely to conflict with the lawyer's interest in procuring the best result for the client that the prohibition of Rule 1.8(c) is absolute; as we have noted, D.C. Rule 1.8(c) does not allow for the possibility of waiver in any circumstances.

In the situation posed by the inquirer, by contrast, the lawyer does not seek to acquire literary rights that may be the subject of a later arrangement by the lawyer with a media representative, but instead seeks to make an arrangement now with such a representative, based on the lawyer's story. As we have suggested above, there are many such situations that could create serious conflicts of interest, depending on the particular circumstances. But there are also circumstances that would not necessarily raise any such conflict. For example, a lawyer might give an "account" of the matter by writing an article or delivering a lecture for a fee that was fixed and could not vary with later developments in the representation. In such a situation the lawyer's later activity in the case would not subsequently be influenced by any financial interest in what that fee would be, as it would be fixed and unchangeable by later developments.

Indeed there are at least some familiar transactions that are similar to the inquirer's in concept but do not appear ever to have been thought to involve a violation of Rule 1.8(c). The most prominent example would be a situation in which a lawyer writes an article for a publication about the legal profession, or makes a speech or appears at a seminar, where the subject matter includes giving an "account" of current and uncompleted client matters. Such events are extremely common. Some such instances have raised other issues such as the possibility that they would constitute ex parte communications with a court (D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion No. 5, April 23, 1975) or inappropriate advertising

[2] In Opinion No. 202, we also pointed out that Rule 1.8(c) is "substantially similar" to the prior Code version and also noted that the newer provision "closely parallels" the former. In that opinion we considered a situation in which a lawyer represented a client in litigation that had attracted the attention of the public; during the course of that litigation, the client approached the lawyer also to negotiate the sale of the literary rights to the client's story, with the lawyer's fee for that representation to be a portion of the value of those rights. We opined that while it was normally acceptable for a lawyer to accept a share of the client's literary rights as a contingent fee in a matter involving negotiation of those rights with a publisher, the lawyer's negotiating the value of those rights while also representing the client in litigation was barred by the Rule until that litigation was over.

[3] As noted above, while the inquirer states that the inquirer will not reveal confidences or secrets of the client to the media without the client's valid consent, he also states that the reporters may seek to make an agreement with the client seeking such consent. This itself raises potential issues under both Rule 1.7(b)(4) and 1.8(c) if the inquirer were to participate in such a waiver process.

First, we caution that for the lawyer to seek to represent the client in such a transaction with the media representatives would itself involve the lawyer in a further conflict of interest because the lawyer would have an interest in having a deal favorable to the lawyer go forward and so would not be in a position to advise the client as to whether the deal was in the client's best interest. (As our Opinion 202 concludes, the final sentence in comment [4] to Rule 1.8 does not necessarily apply where representation in the marketing of literary rights occurs simultaneously with other representation of the client that might be impacted by, or have an impact on, the representation about sale of rights. See footnote 2, supra.)

Second, a transaction in which it could be argued that the lawyer effectively assisted the media representatives in obtaining media rights from the client might itself constitute at least the substantial equivalent of a transaction that violated Rule 1.8(c). It would be a violation of the lawyer's legal duty for the lawyer to use client confidences or secrets protected by Rule 1.6 for the lawyer's benefit rather than the client's. Thus, the lawyer's obtaining a waiver of the confidentiality obligation from the client could amount to the lawyer's obtaining the client's agreement to relinquish the client's right to restrict publication of the material by the lawyer—arguably the equivalent of a lawyer's making "an agreement [with the client] giving the lawyer literary or media rights" within the meaning of Rule 1.8(c). It appears that this was the situation in Harrison v. Mississippi Bar, 637 So. 2d 204 (Miss. 1994). There the Mississippi Supreme Court upheld the disbarment of a lawyer in part because the lawyer had violated Mississippi's equivalent of D.C. Rule 1.8(c). The lawyer argued that the story she sold to a publisher was only the lawyer's story, not the client's, but the Court noted that the contract with the publisher required the lawyer to obtain the consent of the client to use of information about the client matter being handled by the lawyer, and further pointed out that despite the lawyer's claim to the contrary the lawyer still represented the client's estate at the time the contract was signed. It was explicitly on that basis that the Court held that the conduct in question violated the Rule. 637 So. 2d at 224.

(cf. Opinion No. 41, November 22, 1977), but they have never been considered to constitute the acquisition of literary rights so as to trigger Rule 1.8(c) or its predecessor, so far as we are aware. These types of transactions do not fall under the language of Rule 1.8(c), and especially since Rule 1.7 is present and would apply to any such arrangement that constituted a conflict of interest, there is no reason to strain the language of Rule 1.8(c) to cover them.

That conclusion is all the more justified because there are other benefits that may flow from some kinds of public attention to "accounts" of ongoing legal matters—as long as that can be done without violating Rule 1.7 (a subject to which we turn below). In addition to education of the bar, as suggested in the previous examples, there can also be benefit to clients whose causes may be assisted by better public understanding, and to the public at large from better understanding of legal issues that may affect it. Thus there would, in at least some circumstances, be good policy grounds to avoid overextension of the reach of Rule 1.8(c).

3. The application of Rule 1.7(b)(4).

The situation described by the inquirer raises a serious issue under D.C. Rule 1.7(b)(4). Rule 1.7(b)(4) generally provides that a lawyer may not represent a client with respect to a matter where:

> the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.

This subparagraph clearly covers the very wide range of interests or responsibilities that a lawyer may have that do not involve representation of a different client (conflicts created by differing interests of multiple clients are handled by subparagraphs (b)(1), (2), and (3)) that will or reasonably may affect the lawyer's ability to represent the client. Obvious examples would be such matters as personal investments of a lawyer in company X that might influence the lawyer's ability to pursue a claim against X on behalf of a client; a friendship with an officer of company X that might reasonably be thought to affect the lawyer's ability to represent a client in pursuing a large claim against X; or the lawyer's guardianship of a person who appears to have played a role in activity that the client wants to challenge. The broadly worded scope of subparagraph (b)(4) shows that any kind of interest or obligation of the lawyer can trigger the applicability of the subparagraph if the presence of that interest could reasonably adversely affect the lawyer's ability to represent a client in a matter.

The inquirer's situation clearly creates a potential for a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4). The inquirer proposes to make an agreement with representatives who cover the litigation the lawyer is engaged in for various media companies and who are considering writing books or possibly producing a motion picture about that litigation. The situation as presented in the inquiry sounds as though the media representatives' plans are not fixed; for example it is not clear whether they will seek only to write a book or whether they will attempt to produce a motion picture. Thus it sounds as though whatever financial arrangement the media representative would make would have some contingent features, which would depend upon whether, say, merely a book, or perhaps a movie, may be made out of the story of the litigation. Further, the inquirer states that while the primary focus of the media representatives is on the litigation and the lawyer, the lawyer's client "would also receive compensation for his life rights." No confidential information would be used without the client's consent.

We first observe that even if the inquirer's action would not violate Rule 1.8(c) because the lawyer is not seeking to acquire the literary or media rights of another, nonetheless something similar (at least) to the concerns underlying Rule 1.8(c) may well be present in some situations. In the situation posed by the inquirer, it seems possible that because the media's plans as to how to present the story are not fixed, the inquirer might well face a conflict between, on the one hand, obligations to do the best possible thing for the client, and, on the other, a personal interest in having the case be the kind of story that would enhance its interest to the media and the public. Such a situation would present a serious conflict of interest, in our view. Indeed, any agreement made by a lawyer with media representatives presents a conflict of interest if, as a practical matter, its value to the lawyer might fluctuate depending on later events in a related matter in which the lawyer is representing a client.

By contrast, a transaction with media representatives in which any financial compensation was immediately fixed and would not change regardless of what later happened in the case would be less objectionable because the inquirer's later steps in the case would not as obviously be influenced by the possibility that some steps might tend to increase the value of the media contract available. There still could be features requiring attention under Rule 1.7(b)(4). For example, the publicity value of the agreement might still fluctuate in a meaningful way to the lawyer, depending on certain choices that are made in the course of the litigation; or the negotiations over the terms of any agreement might take place during a period in which the lawyer's actions in the litigation might well be influenced by the negotiations themselves. The inquirer should also be extremely circumspect in describing, in any negotiations, those later events in the case that the inquirer expects to occur and should not make any representations about the future of the case where there is any doubt at all that such eventualities might occur.

The question of how, and even whether, a client may consent to the conflict under Rule 1.7(c) is highly important. Valid consent may be obtained only after consultation with the client, which the Rules define as "communication of information reasonably sufficient to permit the client to appreciate the significance of the matter in question." D.C. Rules, Terminology [3]. In situations involved here, the question is whether the lawyer's judgment on how to conduct the representation for the client might be adversely affected by the lawyer's pecuniary or publicity interest. There are two impediments to a clear appreciation by the client of what is at stake—first, future developments in the representation involve possibilities that may well not be presently understood, so that an appreciation of them currently might be difficult or impossible. Second, questions of the impact on the lawyer's judgment in carrying out the representation involve issues peculiarly within the knowledge of lawyers but nor of clients.

As to the first of these problems, our Opinion No. 309 comprehensively examines the question of the degree to which consent can be valid where it is given in advance of events that affect the scope of the conflict. We there concluded that a valid advance consent can be given only where full consultation as described in the Rules can be had, and a client has the ability to give fully informed consent, in advance. We note that the situation presented here—where a conflict that arises under Rule 1.7(b)(4) is sought to be waived in advance—was not specifically treated in that opinion, but it is clear that a large part of obtaining a valid waiver of any conflict caused by the lawyer's negotiation of a contract with media representatives would involve the explanation to the client in detail of the kinds of choices that the lawyer is put to in litigation and the possible impacts on those choices that are the result of having the media contract. This is likely to be more difficult than explaining the usual conflict caused by potential loyalty to another client that arises under Rule 1.7(b)(2). Loyalty, and the ability to act despite somewhat divided loyalties, is a relatively simple concept to understand. But the impact of the lawyer's personal interests on the lawyer's ability to make tactical and strategic decisions for a client, which is presented in a conflict arising under Rule 1.7(b)(4), requires the lawyer to explain, and the client to understand, the significance to the client of influences on the lawyer's handling of specific issues. In these circumstances, it would be highly advisable for the client to have the benefit of independent counsel to offer advice on the scope of any adverse impact on the lawyer's ability to provide adequate representation despite whatever influence the media arrangement may have. If that is for some reason not possible, the lawyer should likely obtain independent legal advice to provide the most objective view possible of the lawyer's ability to act adequately for the client in the circumstances.

Actually the problems involved in this situation are more common than might be supposed. Although it might be rare to encounter a media arrangement in which a lawyer is paid money for participating in a story about the lawyer's ongoing representation, many lawyers know that working on particular matters might draw attention and publicity that could be valuable to them. Moreover, it is quite possible that, without having had any contact with the media concerning a particular representation, a lawyer might know or at least anticipate attention from the media concerning a matter on which the lawyer is working. It may also be true that such media attention is more likely if one issue predominates (say a widely anticipated one arising from a newly enacted statute) than another (say an older issue that may render the newer one irrelevant). A lawyer should always be alive to the possibility of potential influence on the lawyer's judgment and ability to pursue the best course for the lawyer's client. We do not mean to suggest that such instances regularly, or even often, create conflicts of interest. Our purpose is to show that there is a wide range of issues involving actual or potential media attention that could raise questions under Rule 1.7(b)(4) but do not raise issues under Rule 1.8(c).

4. The "principle of priority" under Scope Comment [5].

We have concluded above that while Rule 1.8(c) does not extend to the situation presented by the inquirer, Rule 1.7(b)(4) does. This situation—in which we essentially conclude that Rule 1.8(c) constitutes a special case of what would otherwise be a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4), and that the latter may apply even where Rule 1.8(c) does not—raises a significant question of which Rule takes precedence over the other that is the subject of Scope Comment [5].

Scope Comment [5] enunciates an important rule of interpretation. It states, in its entirety:

> In interpreting these Rules, the specific shall control the general in the sense that any rule that specifically addresses conduct shall control the disposition of matters and the outcome of such matters shall not turn upon the application of a more general rule that arguably also applies to the conduct in question. In a number of instances, there are specific rules that address specific types of conduct. The rule of interpretation expressed here is meant to make it clear that the general rule does not supplant, amend, enlarge, or extend the specific rule. So, for instance, the general terms of Rule 1.3 are not intended to govern conflicts of interest, which are particularly discussed in Rules 1.7, 1.8, and 1.9. Thus, conduct that is proper under the specific conflicts rules is not improper under the more general rule of Rule 1.3. Except where the principle of priority stated here is applicable, however, compliance with one rule does not generally excuse compliance with other rules. Accordingly, once a lawyer has analyzed the ethical considerations under a given rule, the lawyer must generally extend the analysis to ensure compliance with all other applicable rules.

Scope Comment [5] makes clear that where conduct is proper, either explicitly or implicitly, under a specific rule dealing with that type of conduct, a more general rule should not be used to render that conduct improper. Thus, for example, if lawyer A moves from partnership in firm X to partnership in firm Y, and firm Y is adverse to firm X on a heated matter, which, however, lawyer A has had nothing to do with and has learned nothing of, Rule 1.10(b) provides, as a result of the balance struck in that Rule, that firm Y does not have a conflict of interest despite the fact that A used to be a partner in firm X. Scope Comment [5] provides that no general rule, such as Rule 1.3 (which requires that a lawyer represent a client "zealously and diligently"), should be cited to upset this balance. The reason is that the conflict of interest rules exist, ultimately, to assure that no such conflict should impede a lawyer from acting "zealously and diligently" for a client. Thus, when Rule 1.10(b) was written, it took into account, and balanced, the considerations behind Rule 1.3. Citing Rule 1.3 in a particular case to invalidate some activity permissible under Rule 1.10(b) would upset that balance written into the Rule and disserve the other considerations.[4]

None of this pattern is present in considering Rules 1.8(c) and 1.7(b)(4). First, this is a case where the inquirer's situation does not fall precisely under the terms of the specific Rule—1.8(c). There is no indication at all, from the purpose, terms, or history of Rule 1.8(c), that it struck any kind of a balance or was in any other way intended to exonerate behavior that was similar to, but fell outside of, the [4] Note that even though Rule 1.10(b) implicitly, rather than explicitly, provides that a firm is not disqualified where a lawyer has moved to it from another firm, and at the first firm the lawyer had not worked on the matter at issue or had acquired no information protected by Rule 1.6 concerning that matter, it clearly intends that result. First, comments [10] and [11] to that Rule are quite explicit as to the balance of competing interests that is expressed in that Rule. Second, subparagraph (b) states a rule for lawyers moving between firms that is materially narrower than the rule stated in subparagraph (a); it is inescapable from the order of these paragraphs that the drafters intended subparagraph (b) to extend only as far as it does rather than intending that other Rules could supplement it so that it would extend as far as subparagraph (a) does. There is nothing about Rule 1.8(c) that indicates that the drafters wanted similarly to immunize conduct that fell outside of the particular circumstances covered by that Rule. Similarly, Rule 1.7(d) allows a lawyer to continue representation of a client despite the presence of a conflict of interest arising under Rule 1.7(b) (1) and the refusal of the client asserting the conflict to waive it, where the conflict was "thrust upon" the first client and lawyer because it had not been reasonably foreseeable at the outset of the representation and arose only after the representation had commenced. See our Opinion No. 292 (1999). And the proviso to Rule 1.10 (a) creates an exception to the general rule requiring all lawyers in the firm to be disqualified where one would be. The exception does not require disqualification of an entire firm where a firm lawyer is disqualified because the lawyer was consulted by a potential client who did not become a client. See also comment [7] to Rule 1.10. This accommodation encourages full consultation between prospective clients and lawyers. See Proposed Amendments to the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct (as adopted by the Board of Governors, March 8, 1994) at 36-37.

defined scope of behavior that it covers. Instead, Rule 1.8 simply mandates particular treatment of a specific fact situation and says nothing, explicitly or implicitly, about other situations that might be similar. This is in keeping with the general character of Rule 1.8, which "deal[s] with a series of specific situations in which the lawyer's own interests—often her financial interests—may conflict with the interests of a client. Many of the conflicts of interest that are per se prohibited are catalogued in this rule." 1 Hazard & Hodes, The Law of Lawyering, §10.4 at p. 10–14. (3d ed 2004 Supp.)[5]

> Some situations are so fraught with danger of serious impropriety . . . that a per se rule of disqualification is imposed—a prophylactic ban that sometimes is not waivable, even by a sophisticated and well-counseled client. In these situations, (some of which are catalogued in Rule 1.8) the public interest in maintaining public confidence in the legal system outweighs the interests of individual lawyers and clients in freely contracting with each other.

Id., §10.4, at 10-12. Thus, as we have concluded, Rule 1.8(c) creates a special class of per se rules covering situations as to which the drafters concluded that the level of potential impropriety and adverse impact on the lawyer's ability to represent the client properly is so great that such a specific rule is warranted.[6] But that alone does not mean that where a situation is presented that does not fall under the strict Rule 1.8(c) formula it should, by virtue of Scope Comment [5], escape any consideration under Rule 1.7(b)(4). This situation accordingly falls under the more general doctrine expressed in that comment: "Except where the principle of priority stated here is applicable, however, compliance with one rule does not generally excuse compliance with other rules."

Approved: January 2006
Published: January 2006

Opinion 335

Whether a Lawyer May, as Part of a Settlement Agreement, Prohibit the Other Party's Lawyer From Disclosing Publicly Available Information About the Case

A settlement agreement may not compel counsel to keep confidential and not further disclose in promotional materials or on law firm websites public information about the case, such as the name of the opponent, the allegations set forth in the complaint on file, or the fact that the case has settled. Such conditions have the purpose and effect of preventing counsel from informing potential clients of their experience and expertise, thereby making it difficult for future clients to identify well-qualified counsel and employ them to bring similar cases. By diminishing the opportunity for the lawyer to represent future clients in similar matters, such conditions violates D.C. Rule 5.6(b), which prohibits lawyers from offering or making a settlement agreement that restricts a lawyer's right to practice. A settlement agreement may provide that the terms of the settlement and other nonpublic information may be kept confidential, but it may not require that public information be confidential.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.2—Scope of Representation
- Rule 1.6—Confidentiality
- Rule 5.6—Restrictions On Right To Practice
- Rule 7.1—Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services

Inquiry

A defendant wishes to settle the claim of the inquirer's client conditioned on an agreement that the inquirer will keep confidential not only the terms of the settlement but also the fact of the settlement, the identity of the defendant, and the allegations of the complaint. The complaint has been filed and is not under seal. Moreover, the complaint has received substantial media attention. The inquirer's law firm has reported developments in the litigation on its website, we assume with the consent of his client. Discussions about the firm's experience on its website are part of the firm's effort to attract new clients. The inquirer asks whether the defendant can include in a settlement agreement a provision requiring him to remove information about the case from the firm's website and not to disclose further on the website or in other promotional materials, otherwise public information such as the defendant's name, the allegations of the complaint, and the fact (but not the terms) of settlement.

Discussion

Settlements are frequently conditioned on the confidentiality of their terms. The rationale for this practice is that the terms of a settlement constitute non-public information learned by a lawyer in the course of the representation, which, if the client requests be held inviolate, are "secrets" within the definition of D.C. Rule 1.6(b). Subject to certain exceptions, a lawyer is not permitted to reveal his client's secrets. D.C. Rule 1.6(a).[1] In most instances, we suspect, a plaintiff's request that the terms of a settlement remain confidential results from the defendant's insistence and the plaintiff's indifference. Nonetheless, there are undoubtedly circumstances in which a plaintiff has her own motives for wishing settlement terms to remain confidential, such as preventing other persons from learning precisely how much (or little) she has recovered.

[5] Other such provisions in Rule 1.8 include at least subparagraphs (a) (special rules limiting lawyer's ability to enter into a business transaction with a client); (b) (lawyer may not prepare an instrument that gives the lawyer or a relative a substantial gift from the client, except where the lawyer is related to the client), (d) limits lawyer's ability to provide financial assistance to a client in litigation or administrative proceedings),and (e) (limits on the lawyer's ability to receive fees from someone other than the client). In each such situation, just as with subparagraph 1.8(c), in the absence of these provisions the activity in question would involve Rule 1.7(b)(4). But, rather than taking into account policies or considerations foreign to those applicable under Rule 1.7, these Rule 1.8 provisions dictate precisely and uniformly how to apply the conditions underlying Rule 1.7(b)(4).

[6] In certain circumstances, unlike subparagraph (c), Rule 1.8 does go further and affirmatively provide a safe haven for particular conduct. Examples include the observation in comment [1] that the severe restrictions on lawyers contracting with their clients do not include "standard commercial transactions", and Rule 1.8(d)(1) and (2), which explicitly allow lawyers to advance or guarantee certain types of financial assistance to clients. In at least these instances, portions of Rule 1.8 themselves reflect balances, which, under Scope Comment [5], should not be set at naught by other, more general Rules. To illustrate, we consider a hypothetical situation where a lawyer has a client that is an automobile dealership, from which the lawyer buys automobiles for personal use, getting a discount. In response to a challenge of this practice as taking undue advantage of the client, the lawyer seeks to establish that the prices the lawyer paid for the automobiles were such that the deals constituted "standard commercial transactions" within the meaning of comment [1] to Rule 1.8 and thus outside the scope of Rule 1.8(a). A conclusion that regardless of whether the deals viewed objectively were "standard" and thus proper under Rule 1.8(a), the practice still violated Rule 1.7(b)(4) would violate the doctrine established by Scope Comment [5].

[1] See ABA Comm. on Ethics and Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 00-417 (2000); Colo. Bar Ethics Comm., Formal Op. 92 (1993); N.M. Bar Ethics Adv. Op. Comm., Adv. Op. No. 1985-5 (1985).

The Inquiry, however, goes beyond the confidentiality of the settlement terms, and raises the question whether, as part of the settlement, one lawyer may prohibit another from further disclosure of already public information, including the name of the defendant and the allegations of the complaint, as well as information that can readily be inferred from the public record, such as the fact that the litigation settled. Once the complaint was filed in court, the name of the defendant and the plaintiff's allegations against it are available to the public. While terms of a settlement are frequently confidential, the fact of settlement rarely is. If a settlement is not announced by the parties, the public record may not actually disclose that it has occurred, although in cases where settlements require court approval, it will. But the voluntary dismissal will alert most knowledgeable persons that there has almost certainly been a settlement, and in most instances, a number of people will become aware that the case has settled.[2]

Nevertheless, a lawyer has a duty to abide by his client's decision whether to accept an offer of settlement. D.C. Rule 1.2(a). This is so even if the lawyer believes the decision to be unwise. D.C. Rule 5.6(b), however, prohibits lawyers from including certain types of terms in settlement agreements: A lawyer may not participate in offering or making "an agreement in which a restriction on the lawyer's right to practice is part of the settlement of a controversy between parties." This is generally understood to mean an explicit agreement as part of the settlement prohibiting plaintiff's counsel from representing other persons.[3] Thus, for example, a settlement of a case brought on behalf of consumers against the manufacturer of a product may not be conditioned on plaintiffs' counsel agreeing not to represent other consumers of the product against the settling manufacturer.[4] This same rule, or a similar version, also has been interpreted to prohibit an agreement not to use information learned in the course of the case in a future representation against the same party. Enforcement of such an agreement might effectively prevent the lawyer from representing future clients since the only way for the lawyer to ensure that he does not use information that he has learned is to decline to represent anyone else in a similar case.[5] Other jurisdictions also have prohibited similar clauses in settlement agreements restricting "plaintiff or plaintiff's counsel from using case information to assist other litigants or claimants;"[6] requiring plaintiff's counsel to turn over her entire file, including her work product, to defense counsel to be sealed;[7] "barring a lawyer representing a settling claimant from subpoenaing certain records or fact witnesses in future actions against the defending party;"[8] or forbidding disclosure of "the business or operations of the defendant corporation"[9] An underlying rationale for all these opinions is that the prohibited provisions restrict the lawyer's right to practice by effectively preventing him or his firm from representing clients in certain kinds of cases against the settling party.

Underlying each of the opinions disapproving restrictions on the future conduct of lawyers, under the rule equivalent to D.C. Rule 5.6, is the intent to preserve the public's access to lawyers who, because of their background and experience, might be the best available talent to represent future litigants in similar cases, perhaps against the same opponent.[10] A similar rationale underlies the interpretation of D.C. Rule 5.6(a), forbidding restrictions on lawyers moving from one firm to another.[11] We believe that the purpose and effect of the proposed condition on the inquirer and his firm[12] is to prevent other potential clients from identifying lawyers with the relevant experience and expertise to bring similar actions. While it places no direct restrictions on the inquirer's ability to bring such an action, even against the same defendant if he is retained to do so, it does restrict his ability to inform potential clients of his experience. As such, it interferes with the basic principle that D.C. Rule 5.6 serves to protect: that clients should have the opportunity to retain the best lawyers they can employ to represent them. Were clauses such as these to be regularly incorporated in settlement agreements, lawyers would be prevented from disclosing their relevant experience, and clients would be hampered in identifying experienced lawyers.

There was a time, of course, before the advent of websites and marketing departments and lawyer advertising, when public disclosures of relevant expertise were frowned upon, if not outright prohibited. Those days are gone.[13] But even then, if asked, a lawyer was able to disclose public information about cases that he had handled if a potential client inquired as to his experience. If the conditions proposed by the defendant could be part of a settlement agreement, why could the defendant not propose that the lawyer never speak of the case again unless compelled to do so by formal process? This would bring about a situation where a lawyer could not reveal to a potential client public record information that would demonstrate his experience and ability. The only restrictions on lawyer advertising in the District of Columbia are that all claims must be truthful and subject to substantiation. D.C. Rule 7.1.[14] The implication of this liberal rule permitting advertising is that the consumers of legal services—like the consumers of other products and services—benefit from the dissemination of accurate information in choosing legal representation. Given that policy, we believe confidentiality provisions in set-

[2] For example, when a case settles, the prospective witnesses are informed. If the case draws media attention, as this one has, the media becomes aware of the settlement when the case is dismissed.

[3] See D.C. Rule 5.6, Comment [2].

[4] In re Hager, 812 A.2d 904, 918-19 (D.C. 2002). See generally D.C. Ethics Op. 35 (1977).

[5] ABA Comm. on Ethics and Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 00-417 (2000).

[6] Tenn. Bd. of Prof'l Resp., Formal Op. 98-F-141 (1998).

[7] N.M. Bar Ethics Adv. Op. Comm., Adv. Op. 1985-5 (1985). This opinion says, cryptically, such a restriction may in some, but not necessarily all, cases inhibit the representation of future clients.

[8] Colo. Bar Ethics Comm., Formal Op. 92 (1993).

[9] N.Y. State Bar Ass'n Comm. on Prof'l Ethics, Formal Op. 730 (2000).

[10] E.g., N.Y. State Bar Ass'n Comm. on Prof'l Ethics, Formal Op. 730 (2000).

[11] D.C. Ethics Op. 325 (2004). See Neuman v. Akman, 715 A.2d 127, 131 (D.C. 1998). The court in Newman interpreted D.C. Rule 5.6(a), which prohibits employment agreements restricting a lawyer's right to practice after termination, to apply to a part nership agreement that denied certain financial benefits to departing partners. Such provisions might deter lawyers from joining new firms, which would limit their ability to offer clients their services in an organizational setting that might better serve the clients.

[12] Lawyers are generally not parties to settlement agreements, but they must adhere to the confidentiality provisions either because their clients implicitly instruct them to keep matters confidential, with which request the lawyers must comply pursuant to D.C. Rule 1.6, or because violating the confidentiality provision would undo the settlement and damage their clients, in violation of D.C. Rules 1.2 and 1.3(b).

[13] Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626 (1985); Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977).

[14] See D.C. Ethics Op. 249 (1994).

tlement agreements that prohibit a lawyer from disclosing such public information as the name of the defendant, the public allegations, and the fact of settlement would violate D.C. Rule 5.6(b). Such provisions restrict a lawyer's right to practice by interfering with his ability to inform future potential clients of his relevant experience and expertise.

If a client withholds permission for her lawyer to disclose public information, we agree that the lawyer must keep the information secret and that D.C. Rule 1.6 applies.[15] A plaintiff settling a sexual harassment claim, for example, may wish to protect her privacy by not allowing her lawyer to publicize further any information about her case. A settlement agreement may require a lawyer to keep non-public information confidential. It is well established that non-public information, such as the terms of a settlement, may remain confidential.[16] In addition to settlement terms, other non-public matters can be kept confidential, such as disputes that are never made public but which are decided through confidential arbitration procedures. The line that we draw is that the confidentiality of otherwise public information cannot be part of a settlement agreement even if the lawyer's client agrees that such a provision be included. Once the matter is public, a settlement agreement may not impose confidentiality on otherwise public matters without violating D.C. Rule 5.6(b). A lawyer may not propose or agree to such a confidentiality provision. In drawing this line we are striking a balance consistent with the rationale of the Rules and with widely accepted practices. While it might be argued that a lawyer would be better able to market his services, and a client better able to identify a qualified representative, if no information about any case, including the terms of settlement, could be kept confidential, such a decision is contrary to long-standing accepted practices with respect to settlement agreements. On the other hand, if the parties can agree to keep all public information about all cases confidential, clients' ability to identify qualified lawyers would be greatly restricted. A reasonable resolution is to draw a line between information that is public at the time of settlement and information that remains confidential. New York seems to have taken a similar approach.[17] This balance between the well-accepted practice of keeping non-public settlements confidential, with the concomitant effect on the willingness of parties to settle, and allowing clients to identify experienced counsel by prohibiting confidentiality clauses in settlement agreements of otherwise public information, strikes us as a reasonable application of Rule 5.6(b). It also has the virtue of offering clear guidance to practitioners.

Our broad reading of D.C. Rule 5.6(b) is consistent with the Court of Appeals' equally broad interpretation of Rule 5.6(a). Almost any financial disincentive to a lawyer's changing firms has been determined to be an impediment that violates Rule 5.6(a) because it interferes with clients' ability to choose lawyers.[18] A similar approach leads to the conclusion that the proposed settlement provision, by inhibiting a lawyer's ability to attract clients, interferes with clients' ability to obtain the most competent representation.

We acknowledge that confidentiality provisions, such as the one at issue, might have value that the client can trade in order to get better terms from the other side. If a lawyer may not agree to such a provision, he deprives his client of that value. Yet an agreement that the lawyer will not represent future clients against the settling defendant also has value that his client could trade. In most cases, we suspect the value of the lawyer's agreement not to sue again exceeds the value of the prohibition on further disclosing public information. Yet the Rules of Professional Conduct prohibit such agreements not to sue as part of settlements. This is a policy choice that the value to future clients of the ability to choose the best lawyer to represent them exceeds the harm to the current client of not being able to trade for consideration her lawyer's ability to sue the settling defendant in the future. Moreover, when such settlement terms are taken off the table because they are prohibited, clients are not harmed. If all parties are prohibited from agreeing to such provisions, they have no value. It seems improbable that if such confidentiality clauses are prohibited to all litigants, there would be any measurable effect on the number of settlements or on the value of those settlements.

We emphasize, however, that if a client withholds permission for her lawyer to disclose public information, the lawyer should comply with his client's wishes. D.C. Rule 5.6(b) concerns only settlement agreements. If a client wishes her lawyer not to disclose further public information, she does not need the mechanism of a settlement agreement to enforce her instructions. The only reason to make confidentiality a provision of the settlement agreement is to give the opposing party a mechanism to enforce confidentiality. We believe such opponent-driven secrecy clauses are restrictions on the lawyer's right to practice in violation of Rule 5.6(b).

Approved: May 16, 2006
Published: July 2006

Opinion 336

A Lawyer's Fiduciary Role as a Court-Appointed Guardian of an Incapacitated Individual

• A lawyer who has been appointed as a guardian of an incapacitated individual (but who is not acting as an attorney for the incapacitated individual) must not knowingly make a false statement of material fact or law to a tribunal or otherwise engage in conduct involving dishonesty or misrepresentation. A lawyer acting as a guardian who assists the incapacitated individual in obtaining government benefits, but then subsequently learns that the incapacitated individual's true identity is not as it has been represented may well be required under applicable law to disclose the correct information. Moreover, a lawyer who receives information clearly establishing that a fraud has been perpetrated on a tribunal must reveal the fraud; there is no duty of confidentiality imposed by the Rules of Professional Conduct that would prevent the lawyer acting solely as a guardian from making such a disclosure.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 3.3—Candor Toward the Tribunal
• Rule 8.4—Misconduct

Inquiry

The inquirer, a member of the District of Columbia Bar, has been appointed by [15] Cf. Sealed Party v. Sealed Party, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28392 (S.D. Tex. 2006) (Under Texas law, a lawyer violates his fiduciary duty to a former client by revealing public information about a case without obtaining the client's consent).

[16] ABA Comm. on Ethics and Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 00-417 (2000); Colo. Bar Ethics Comm., Formal Op. 92 (1993); N.M. Bar Ethics Adv. Op. Comm., Adv. Op. 1985-5 (1985).

[17] A settlement agreement may not impose on a lawyer a higher degree of confidentiality than the lawyer owes his own client. N.Y. State Bar Ass'n Comm. on Prof'l Ethics, Formal Op. 730 (2000).

[18] See Neuman v. Akman, note 11 supra; D.C. Ethics Op. 241 (1993); D.C. Ethics Op. 325 (2004).

the Probate Division of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia to serve as a "permanent general guardian[]" of an incapacitated individual, with the powers and duties set forth in D.C. Code § 21-2047.[1] He has asked the Committee for guidance on how to proceed on the following set of facts. Prior to the inquirer's appointment as guardian of the incapacitated individual, the incapacitated individual had suffered a stroke that left him partially paralyzed and required that he be hospitalized. He presented a name and social security number at the time of admission to the hospital. The Court acted on the assumption that the name and social security number were legitimate. The inquirer has determined categorically that the incapacitated individual's identity is false, but he has no way of determining the incapacitated individual's true identity. The incapacitated individual is an immigrant, but the inquirer has been unable to determine his status or to locate any family members. He is presumed to be homeless, is gravely ill, and cannot care for himself. He is totally nonverbal and is unable to write or comprehend communications.

Before learning that the individual's identity was false, the inquirer used the social security number and other identifying information the incapacitated individual provided to obtain Medicaid and social security benefits and to place the incapacitated individual in a nursing home.[2] Pursuant to D.C. Code § 21-2047, the inquirer, as guardian, has responsibility for the care, custody, and control of the incapacitated individual, including, among other responsibilities, discretion to take appropriate action to compel performance by any person of a duty to support the incapacitated individual and pay sums for his welfare; an obligation to maintain sufficient contact with the incapacitated individual to know the incapacitated individual's capacities, limitations, needs, opportunities, and physical and mental health; an obligation to take care of the incapacitated individual's personal effects; and an obligation to conserve any excess money for the incapacitated individual's future needs. (In this case, the only funds at issue are those that the incapacitated individual has received from government assistance programs). The inquirer has determined that the incapacitated individual cannot be safely discharged from the nursing home.

The inquirer seeks guidance on how to resolve an apparent conflict between his duties under the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") and the District of Columbia guardianship statute. In particular, the inquirer wants to know whether he may continue to use the name that the incapacitated individual has been using; whether he has any affirmative duty to disclose information about the incapacitated individual's false identity to third parties; and whether he must follow the District of Columbia guardianship laws or the Rules whenever a conflict between them arises.

Discussion

As we understand the facts of the inquiry, the inquirer is not serving as counsel to the incapacitated individual. Rather, the inquirer has the statutory powers and duties enumerated in the guardianship statute under which he was appointed.[3] Moreover, the inquirer has given no indication that an attorney-client relationship existed prior to the individual's incapacity.

We believe the fact that the incapacitated individual has never had the ability to communicate with the inquirer or participate in decisions about his welfare supports the conclusion that no lawyer-client relationship has been formed. As noted by the ABA Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility, a "client-lawyer relationship presumes that there can be effective communication between client and lawyer, and that the client, after consultation with the lawyer, can make considered decisions about the objectives of the representation and the means of achieving those objectives." ABA Formal Op. 96-404 (1996); see also NC Bar Formal Ethics Op. 11 (2005) (A lawyer appointed as a guardian ad litem for a parent with diminished capacity in a Termination of Parental Rights action does not have a lawyer-client relationship with the parent). Absent information that would indicate such a relationship ever existed between the inquirer and the incapacitated individual, we believe that it is reasonable to conclude that no such relationship exists.

Certain Rules of Professional Conduct are applicable to the inquirer's conduct notwithstanding the fact that the inquirer is not acting as the incapacitated individual's counsel. Although some Rules apply only if a client-lawyer relationship has been formed, see, e.g., Rules 1.2; 1.6; 1.16, others apply to members of the bar regardless of whether they are engaged in professional activities. Specifically, D.C. Rules 3.3(a)(1), 3.3(d), and 8.4(c) govern the inquirer's conduct, even though he is not functioning as counsel to the incapacitated individual.

Rule 3.3(a)(1), which mandates candor to a tribunal, provides that "a lawyer shall not knowingly . . . make a false statement of material fact or law to a tribunal." Comment [2] to Rule 3.3 provides that, "[t]here may be circumstances where failure to make a disclosure is the equivalent of an affirmative misrepresentation." Rule 3.3(d) provides in pertinent part that "[a] lawyer who receives information clearly establishing that a fraud has been perpetrated upon the tribunal shall promptly reveal the fraud to the tribunal unless compliance with this duty would require disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6, in which case the lawyer shall promptly call upon the client to rectify the fraud."[4] Rule 8.4(c) provides that "it is professional misconduct for a lawyer to . . engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation."

The Rules define "tribunal" broadly to include regulatory agencies that render decisions of a judicial or quasi-judicial nature, regardless of the degree of formality or informality of the proceedings.

[1] Letter of Guardianship Issued Pursuant to Original Order of Appointment under Guardianship and Protective Proceeding Act of 1986, Effective September 30, 1989.

[2] It is not clear from the inquiry to whom the incapacitated individual initially provided this information. The inquirer says he presumed the individual had "borrowed" the identifying information.

[3] Appointment of a lawyer as guardian for an incapacitated individual does not create an attorney-client relationship where none existed previously, and a guardian under the District of Columbia statute is not required to be a lawyer. See D.C. Code § 21-2043, which provides that "any qualified person may be appointed guardian of an incapacitated individual." The statute also lists as priority for consideration for guardianship appointment qualified spouses, adult children, parents, and relatives of the incapacitated individual; it does include a prerequisite that a guardian be qualified to serve as counsel for the incapacitated individual or any requirement that a guardian serve as counsel. This is different from the situation where a lawyer is appointed as a guardian ad litem. In D.C. Ethics Op. 295 (2000), we concluded that a lawyer appointed as a guardian ad litem in a child abuse and neglect proceeding is properly considered to be the child's lawyer.

[4] Whether or not the incapacitated individual committed fraud when originally presenting his false identity—a question that we have no occasion to address here—the inquirer has received "information clearly establishing that a fraud has been perpetrated upon the tribunal," and must, therefore, reveal the fraud to the tribunal unless revealing it would violate Rule 1.6. However, as we explain above, Rule 1.6 does not apply here because the incapacitated individual is not the inquirer's client.

D.C. Rules, Terminology. Accordingly, if the inquirer, in performing his duties as guardian, finds it necessary to appear at a hearing before an agency that determines entitlement to benefits, Rule 3.3(a)(1) would apply to the inquirer's conduct before that tribunal.

The inquirer is obligated under the guardianship statute to "report in writing the condition of the ward and of the incapacitated individual's estate . . . at least semi-annually." D.C. Code § 21-2047. Even though there has been no finding that the incapacitated individual has the requisite state of mind to have committed fraud or a crime, the inquirer has obtained "conclusive" evidence that the incapacitated individual is not who he purports to be. Accordingly, the inquirer has an affirmative duty to "reveal the fraud to the tribunal." D.C. Rule 3.3(d). Indeed, withholding the fact that the incapacitated individual had obtained benefits using a false name and social security number would likely constitute a "circumstance[] where the failure to make a disclosure is the equivalent of an affirmative misrepresentation." D.C. Rule 3.3, Comment [2].

Whether appearing before a tribunal, completing paperwork to continue benefits, attesting to guardianship of the incapacitated individual, or cashing the incapacitated individual's benefit checks, the inquirer must, at all times, comply with the requirements of Rule 8.4(c), which prohibits conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation. Virtually any conduct by the inquirer that relies on or otherwise uses information the inquirer knows to be false would constitute dishonesty, deceit, or misrepresentation, even if the conduct is not legally fraudulent.

Conclusion

The inquirer may not continue to use the name that the incapacitated individual is using; we believe that failure to disclose the false identity would be the equivalent of misrepresentation. This matter presents no conflict between District of Columbia guardianship law and the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Approved: May 2006
Published: September 2006

Opinion 337

Lawyer as Expert Witness

A lawyer serving as an expert witness to testify on behalf of a party does not thereby establish an attorney-client relationship with that party. Therefore, D.C. Rule 1.9 governing conflicts of interest with former clients would not apply to prohibit a lawyer from subsequently taking an adverse position to the party for whom the lawyer testified as an expert witness, even where the matter for which the lawyer testified and the matter involved in the subsequent representation are substantially related to one another. However, any firm that hires a lawyer as an expert witness should assure that the lawyer's role as expert witness is made clear and should obtain the client's informed consent if the expert's role changes to that of co-counsel.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.4 (Communication)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General)
- Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification: General Rule)
- Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Inquiry

We have received an inquiry concerning the obligations of a lawyer who acts as an expert witness. The Inquirer is an attorney who has served as an expert witness in litigation involving bank regulatory and supervisory matters. She has been asked to provide expert testimony on behalf of an individual plaintiff who borrowed money from a savings bank that was placed in federal receivership and had its assets (including the loan at issue) sold to another financial institution.

The defendant bank's attorney has objected to the Inquirer's serving as an expert witness because one or both of the law firms with whom the Inquirer was formerly employed did legal work for the defendant bank in prior years. For the purposes of this Opinion, we have been asked to assume that the D.C. Rules apply and that the prior representation of the defendant bank by the Inquirer's former law firms involved neither the plaintiff in the current lawsuit (for whom the Inquirer wishes to testify) nor the plaintiff's loan, which is the sole subject of the suit. The Inquirer has never worked on any previous matter for the defendant bank, and neither has the law firm with which she is currently employed.

Discussion

A. A Lawyer Serving Solely as an Expert Witness Does Not Thereby Create an Attorney-Client Relationship

A lawyer specializing in a particular legal subject may be engaged to serve as an expert witness who is expected to testify at a trial or hearing. As a general matter, a client-lawyer relationship can come into being as a result of reasonable expectations of the client and a failure of the lawyer to dispel these expectations. See D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 316 (2002) (recognizing that what conduct gives rise to an attorney-client relationship is one of substantive law in the relevant jurisdiction but that "[m]any courts look to the reasonable expectations and reliance of the putative client"); see also ABA Formal Op. 95-390 at 8. Clients can reasonably expect that lawyers whom they consult to perform legal services for them are bound by certain basic professional obligations, including the duties of confidentiality, see D.C. Rule 1.6, and the avoidance of conflicts of interest, see D.C. Rule 1.7. Effective February 1, 2007, a lawyer shall also be subject to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct with respect to the provision of "law-related services," which are defined as "services that might reasonably be performed in conjunction with and in substance are related to the provision of legal services." D.C. Rule 5.7(b) (eff. Feb. 1, 2007).

We believe, however, that if a lawyer serves solely as an expert witness on behalf of another law firm's client,[1] and the law firm explains this role to the client at the outset, then the expert witness would not typically have an attorney-client relationship with the party for whom she may be called to testify. A lawyer who is employed to testify about requirements of law or standards of legal practice, for example, acts like any non-lawyer expert witness. The expert provides evidence that lies within her special area of knowledge by reason of training and experience and has a duty to provide the court, on behalf of the other law firm and its client, truthful and accurate information. Towards this end, the lawyer serving as an expert witness may review selected discovery materials, suggest factual support for her expected testimony, and exchange legal authority applicable to her testimony with the law firm. The testifying expert also may help the law firm to define potential areas for further inquiry.

[1] This question is distinct from a consultant providing expert legal advice to a firm and/or its client. A legal consultant may act as a lawyer representing the client, rather than as a witness. The lawyer as expert consultant may act in the role of co-counsel in the matter as to the area upon which she is consulted and as such is subject to all of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. There are a wide variety of circumstances in which a lawyer acts as a consultant and may thereby be undertaking a representation. See also D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(6) (eff. Feb. 1, 2007) (permitting a lawyer who consults with another lawyer to use or reveal client confidences and secrets "to the extent reasonably necessary to secure legal advice").

She nevertheless is presented as an objective witness and must even provide opinions adverse to the party for whom she expects to testify if frankness so dictates. A duty to advance a client's objectives diligently through all lawful measures, which is inherent in a client-lawyer relationship, see D.C. Rule 1.3, is inconsistent with the role of an expert witness. Moreover, if an expert may testify at trial and her name has been provided to opposing counsel under procedural rules, she may be deposed by the opposing party. Communications between the expert and the retaining law firm or its client used by the expert in preparing her testimony ordinarily are discoverable.

The ABA has issued an opinion consistent with this conclusion. See ABA Formal Op. 97-407. Similarly, most state bar ethics committees that have considered the issue have rendered opinions that support the conclusion that a lawyer employed as an expert witness does not form a client-lawyer relationship with the party for whom she is engaged to testify. See, e.g., Virginia State Bar Ethics Op. 1884 (1989) (noting that if an attorney serves purely as an expert witness, the Code of Professional Responsibility is inapplicable and does not preclude service as an expert witness on different issues for both parties of an action); State Bar of S.D., Ethics Comm. Op. 91-22 (1992) (lawyer serving as expert witness for insurance company A defending a bad faith claim brought by insurance company B may represent an insured of insurance company B in an unrelated claim against a third party, in part because insurance company A is not the expert witness's client); Phila. (Pa.) Bar Ass'n, Prof. Guidance Comm. Op. 88-34 (1988) (it is permissible under Pennsylvania's Rules for a lawyer to serve as an expert witness for a party while at the same time serving as anexpert witness for the party's opponent in another unrelated suit).

D.C. Rule 1.9 states that "a lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client consents after consultation." Id. As we have already discussed, a client-lawyer relationship will not exist by virtue of the Inquirer's serving as an expert witness. Therefore, Rule 1.9 is not triggered by this Inquiry.[2]

B. Clarifying the Lawyer/Expert's Role

The law firm that hires a lawyer as an expert witness should take care to avoid confusion in the mind of its client as to the different role a lawyer plays as an expert witness. In order to avoid any misunderstanding about whether a client-lawyer relationship is created, the law firm should make the expert's role clear at the outset of the engagement—for example, through a written engagement letter defining the relationship, including its scope and limitations, and the responsibilities of the expert witness. It is also the responsibility of the law firm that has engaged the expert witness to assure that its client is fully informed as to the nature of the expert's role, see D.C. Rule 1.4, especially because any communications between the client and lawyer expert are likely to be discoverable.[3]

In actual practice, the distinction between the role of a lawyer acting as an expert witness and a lawyer acting in a representational capacity can become blurred. The simplest situation, which we have already discussed above, is when the lawyer is hired as an expert witness and the lawyer expert forms no attorney-client relationship with either the hiring law firm or the law firm's client.

A more complicated situation can arise when a lawyer serving as co-counsel in the case becomes an expert witness. Under this scenario, the Rules of Professional Conduct clearly apply, and the client needs to provide informed consent to the lawyer's changing roles. For example, if a lawyer in the case becomes an expert witness, the client needs to understand that whatever confidences and secrets may have been revealed to the lawyer may be subject to discovery now that the lawyer has become a witness. D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(1) requires a client's informed consent before any such confidences or secretes may be used or revealed.

A third scenario—where a lawyer originally hired as an expert witness is asked to become a consultant or co-counsel on a different aspect of the case—raises some additional complications. Where an expert witness morphs into a co-counsel role, the expert witness must exercise special care to assure that the law firm and the client are fully informed and expressly consent to the lawyer's continuing to serve as an expert witness with respect to some issues in the case. See D.C. Rule 1.2(c) (stating that a "lawyer may limit the objectives of the representation if the client consents after consultation.") The lawyer serving as a consultant or co-counsel is clearly bound by the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct relating to conflicts of interest and imputed disqualification with respect to such service.

C. Additional Considerations

Even though the lawyer's role as an expert witness does not form a client-lawyer relationship with the party on whose behalf she is to be called, the lawyer who serves as an expert witness is still subject to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct that govern lawyers generally. For example, were the expert witness to testify falsely, discipline under D.C. Rule 8.4 would be warranted. See generally ABA Formal Op. 336 (1974); ABA Formal Op. 97-407.

Moreover, D.C. Rule 1.7(b)(4) may impose certain limitations upon the lawyer and her law firm as a result of her serving as an expert witness. For example, if she were asked to represent a client in a matter adverse to the party for whom she currently is serving as an expert, her responsibilities to that party, as well as her own financial, business, or personal interests might preclude the representation

[2] We note that, even if the Inquirer's serving as an expert witness on behalf of a particular party constituted a "representation" of that party sufficient to trigger the obligations of D.C. Rule 1.9, neither she nor her new law firm would be disqualified under the facts as presented here. The Inquirer never personally represented the defendant bank while working at her prior law firms, and her new firm has never represented the defendant bank. Because the defendant bank is not a client "about whom the [Inquirer] has in fact acquired information protected by Rule 1.6 that is material to the matter," there is no conflict of interest that would be imputed to the new law firm. See D.C. Rule 1.10(b).

[3] In 1993, Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 was amended to make information "considered" by an expert witness discoverable (previously, it was a narrower "reliance" standard). The comments to this amendment state that its disclosure requirements were intended to overcome privilege claims, and every federal court to decide the issue has so held. See Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Intercountry Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 412 F.3d 745 (7th Cir. 2005); In re Pioneer Hi-Bred Int'l, Inc., 238 F.3d 1370 (Fed. Cir. 2001). Therefore, the traditional protection afforded by the opinion work product and attorney-client privileges has largely given way to a policy favoring mandatory disclosure of information provided to expert witnesses.

altogether.[4] And if she were asked to represent a client after the conclusion of her service as an expert witness, she might be bound by a confidentiality agreement with the party for whom she testified that could preclude her from zealously representing the new client. See D.C. Rule 1.7(c)(2) (eff. Feb. 1, 2007) (even with the client's informed consent, a lawyer may only represent a client if she "reasonably believes that [she] will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client").

Approved: December 19, 2006
Published: February 2007

Opinion 338

Whether A Law Firm May Retain the Name of a Partner Who Becomes Both "Of Counsel" to that Law Firm and a Partner in a Different Law Firm Also Bearing His Name

A lawyer may have an "of counsel" relationship with one firm and be a partner in a different firm, so long as the lawyer's "of counsel" association with the first firm is regular and continuing and the lawyer is generally available personally to render legal services to that firm's clients; and the two firms are treated as one for conflicts of interest purposes. When a former partner continues to render legal services to the firm's clients, that firm may retain the former partner's name in the firm name, even though the former partner also practices in a new firm with a name that also includes his name.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification: General Rule)
- Rule 7.1 (Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services)
- Rule 7.5 (Firm Names and Letterheads)

Inquiry

A partner[1] of a firm bearing his name ("X") is withdrawing from the partnership and becoming "of counsel." He is the only lawyer in the firm practicing in the area in which he specializes. X intends to form a new firm in which he will be a partner, and that new firm will also include his name. This new firm will specialize principally in the area in which X specializes. The parties have agreed that each firm will redirect to the other any misdirected telephone calls, correspondence, or other communications and that the firms will have a unified conflict of interest policy.

Discussion

This inquiry raises the following questions: (1) whether X may be "of counsel" in one firm and a partner in another; and (2) whether the law firm may continue to include X's name in the firm name after he withdraws as a partner and continues to practice with the firm in an "of counsel" relationship and whether, at the same time, X may have his name included in that of the new law firm that he will form and in which he also will practice law.

A. Practicing in More Than One Firm

D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion 247 (1994) recognizes that a lawyer may have an "of counsel" relationship with a firm with respect to specific matters, while at the same time maintaining a separate practice with other lawyers in shared office space. Nevertheless, whether a former partner of a firm may be "of counsel" in one firm and a partner in another has not been specifically addressed in the District of Columbia. Nor is there any authority in this jurisdiction as to whether a lawyer may be a partner in more than one law firm.

The prevailing view among the various jurisdictions that have considered these issues is that a lawyer is not prohibited from being a partner in more than one firm if the firms are treated as one for imputation of conflicts.[2] The American Bar Association recognized that lawyers may simultaneously work for more than one law firm when it considered the ethical issues associated with the use of temporary lawyers by firms.[3] Later, in ABA Formal Opinion 357 (1990), the ABA concluded that a lawyer could have a regular "of counsel" relationship with more than two firms and that "the lawyer is associated with each firm with which the lawyer is of counsel."[4] For purposes of attribution under Model Rule 1.10(a), the ABA concluded that all disqualifications of each firm will be attributed to the "of counsel" lawyer. In essence, the lawyer's "of counsel" relationship with both firms effectively makes the two firms a single firm for conflict of interest purposes.

Likewise, D.C. Rule 1.10(a) provides that, "[w]hile lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rules 1.7 or 1.9 . . . .[5] In addition, our Opinion 247 concludes that an "of counsel" designation makes that lawyer "associated with the firm" for purposes of our Rule 1.10(a), and that a disqualification of a lawyer of the firm for which he is "of counsel" disqualifies the "of counsel" lawyer who maintained a separate practice even though he had had no involvement in the prior representation.

We conclude, based on the above analysis, that a lawyer may practice in more than one firm—specifically, that X may be "of counsel" in one firm and a partner in another. Because X will be "associated with" each firm for purposes of imputation under D.C. Rule 1.10(a), any disqualification of a lawyer in either firm will be imputed to all lawyers in both firms, unless excepted by Rule 1.10(a)(1) or (2).[6] The firms, however, must be aware that to comply with the [4] If the conflict arises only under Rule 1.7(b)(4), then the revised Rules would not necessarily impute that disqualification to her entire firm. See D.C. Rule 1.10(a)(1) (eff. Feb. 1, 2007). Just because a lawyer serving as an expert might have a financial, business, property or personal interest in a particular party does not always mean that her entire firm would thereby be precluded from representing a client adverse to that party.

---

[1] While the term "partner" is used throughout this opinion, the same analysis and conclusions apply to a shareholder in a law firm organized as a professional corporation or professional limited liability company, or a member of an association authorized to practice law. The term "firm" refers to any of the aforementioned entities as well as a sole proprietorship. See D.C. Rule 1.0 (c).

[2] See Philadelphia Bar Ass'n Ethics Op. 2001-5 (2001); Md. State Bar Ass'n Comm. On Ethics Op. 88-45; Pennsylvania Bar Ass'n Ethics Op. 88-176 (undated); New Jersey Sup. Ct. Advisory Comm. On Prof. Ethics, Op. 637 (1990). The Supreme Court of Ohio Board of Commissioners on Grievances and Discipline disapproved lawyers being partners in more than one firm, see Opinion 1999-7 (1999), but in Opinion 2004-11 (2004), it concluded that an Ohio lawyer may practice law in Ohio and be of counsel to another firm in another state; or an out-of-state lawyer, not licensed in Ohio, may become of counsel to an Ohio lawyer or law firm.

[3] See ABA Comm. on Ethics and Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 88-356 (1988).

[4] ABA Comm. on Ethics and Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 90-357 (1990).

[5] Rule 1.10(a), effective 2/1/07. The prior version of this rule is identical to the rule quoted above, except that the prior version contained references to D.C. Rules 1.8(b) and 2.2 which have been deleted. These deletions do not affect the substantive analysis of this opinion.

[6] This, of course, is not an issue here because the parties have agreed to treat both firms as one firm for purposes of conflicts of interest.

requirements of D.C. Rule 1.6, a firm may need to obtain a client or potential client's permission to disclose, with respect to any new matter, sufficient information to the other firm so that both firms may check potential conflicts.[7]

B. Using the Lawyer's Name in More Than One Firm Name

The second question presented by this inquiry is in two parts: (i) whether the firm from which X is withdrawing as a partner may continue to use X's name in the firm name, and (ii) whether the firm that X is forming also may use his name in the firm name. In D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion No. 277 (1997), we concluded that a firm may retain the name of a former partner who was severing her relationship with the firm, except where the former partner is practicing law elsewhere. We based our conclusions on D.C. Rules 7.5(a) and 7.1. Rule 7.5(a) provides:

A lawyer shall not use a firm name, letterhead, or other professional designation that violates Rule 7.1. A trade name may be used by a lawyer in private practice if it does not imply a connection with a government agency or with a public or charitable legal services organization and is not otherwise in violation of Rule 7.1.

Rule 7.1 states:

> A lawyer shall not make a false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services. A communication is false or misleading if it:
> (1) Contains a material misrepresentation of fact or law, or omits a fact necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading; or
> (2) Contains an assertion about the lawyer or the lawyer's services that cannot be substantiated.

In Opinion No. 277, we noted that ethics opinions in the District of Columbia and elsewhere have long recognized that it is permissible for law firms to use trade names that include the names of deceased or retired partners. That Opinion also referenced ABA Formal Opinion 90-357 in which the ABA concluded that it would not be misleading to "use a retired partner's name in the firm name, while the same partner is of counsel, where the firm name is long-established and well-recognized."[8]

The inquirer in Opinion No. 277 was a founding partner of a law firm bearing her name. She wanted to have her name removed from the firm's name after she withdraws and wanted to know whether the Rules of Professional Conduct would require the law firm to remove her name from the firm name once she departs. In her inquiry, she indicated that she did not know whether she would continue to practice after her withdrawal. We concluded that a law firm may retain in its name the name of a former partner, except where the former partner is practicing law elsewhere or where the firm is prohibited by law from retaining the name. We believed that if the former partner were practicing elsewhere, "the possible identifying value of the firm name as a trade name yields to the greater possibility that the public will be misled by retention of the departed lawyer's name in the firm name." Opinion No. 277 noted that it would be misleading to include in a firm name the name of a lawyer who has ceased practicing with the firm but is, in fact, practicing elsewhere, presumably because it would imply that the lawyer who is practicing elsewhere had a continuing relationship with the firm from which the lawyer has withdrawn.

This inquiry demands a different conclusion than suggested by the proviso in Opinion No. 277—that a withdrawing lawyer's name may be retained in the firm name, unless the lawyer practices elsewhere. First, the facts here are distinguishable from those in that Opinion. Here, unlike the lawyer in that opinion, X will continue to practice with the firm as "of counsel," while at the same time practicing at the second firm. Second, our rules do not prohibit the use of the lawyer's name in the firm names under these the circumstances. More importantly, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals recently adopted new language in the commentary to D.C. Rule 7.5 that makes clear that Opinion No. 277 was focused on the following concern: that it is "misleading to continue to use the name of a lawyer formerly associated with the firm who currently is practicing elsewhere."[9] This prohibition clearly does not apply here because the former partner will not be "formerly associated" with the firm. Rather, the lawyer will continue to be associated with the firm.

In D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion 332 (2005), we said that a lawyer may conduct his or her business under any trade name that does not constitute a false or misleading communication under D.C. Rule 7.1 about the lawyer's services.[10] Here, the question is whether including a former partner's name in the old firm name, as well as in the new firm's name will mislead the public. We conclude that if the lawyer has a regular and continuing association with both firms and will be generally available personally to render legal services at each firm that bears his name, using his name in the names of both firms is consistent with D.C. Rule 7.5(a). If, instead, he were to practice with only one of the firms, including his name in both could mislead the public. Under these circumstances, however, while using X's name in both firm names may be unusual, it would not be misleading, so long as he maintains a regular and continuing association with both firms and is generally available personally to render services at each firm. We caution, however, that X must take special care to ensure that each client to whom he renders legal services understands which firm will be delivering legal services and responsible for the client's legal matter.

Dissent

We three undersigned non-lawyer members of the Legal Ethics Committee hereby register our dissent to Part B of D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion No. 338.

Rule 7.1(a) states that "[a] communication is false or misleading if it: . . . (2) Contains an assertion about the lawyer or the lawyer's services that cannot be substantiated." According to the Inquiry, an attorney is leaving a firm where his name is in the firm name and setting up a second law practice where he will also be a named partner. It is contended by the inquirer that he will remain "of counsel" to the first firm and therefore, it would not be misleading to allow his name to continue to be used in the firm name, although he will become, in essence, a former partner and current "of counsel" attorney.

As the definitions and actual practices related to lawyers in "of counsel" roles are quite broad, we believe it is likely that allowing the inquirer's name to be continued as part of the name of the firm he has essentially left is, at best, confusing and, at worst, misleading to potential clients. We find that simply designating "of counsel"

[7] Under D.C. Rule 1.6, client consent would be required only if the information is a client confidence or secret.

[8] See note 4 supra.

[9] D.C. Rule 7.5, Comment [1] (effective 2/1/07); see D.C. Ethics Opinion 277 (1997) (Emphasis added).

[10] Opinion 332 addressed the question whether a solo practitioner may use the word "firm" in the firm name.

on the letterhead, business cards, internet advertising, and the like, would be insufficient notice to prospective clients that the lawyer is practicing elsewhere in his own partnership or firm. (Partnership is a commonly understood term.)

As the majority acknowledges, Opinion No. 277 (1997) recognized that it was not improper for a firm to continue to use the name of retired or deceased members in the firm name. That we understand to be a longstanding practice and is acceptable because it identifies an entity that has become known to the public and carries a certain cachet. We believe that is an acceptable practice because it is not designed to fool the public but rather recognizes the distinguished service of superannuated or dead partners.

Opinion No. 277 quotes ABA Formal Opinion No. 357 (1990), which recognized that if a partner in a law firm is retiring to become "of counsel," the lawyer's name may be retained in the law firm's name. According to the majority, we concluded in Opinion No. 277 "that a law firm may retain in its name the name of a former partner, except where the former partner is practicing law elsewhere or where the firm is prohibited by law from retaining the name." The majority further recognized in Opinion 277 that, if the former partner were practicing elsewhere, "the possible identifying value of the firm name as a trade name yields to the greater possibility that the public will be misled by retention of the departed lawyer's name in the firm name." Even disclosing a dual association/relationship in writing to the client at the time of retention would not timely alert the prospective client to ask about the parameters of the lawyer's "of counsel" relationship at the firms. It is, in our view, too little, too late. The client has already walked in the door under a false impression that is not cured by disclosure in a retention letter.

On this basis alone, we dissent.
Joseph Brent, PhD
Steven Ebbin, PhD
Donald Zauderer, PhD

Approved: October 2006
Published: February 2007

Opinion 339

Threat of Criminal Referral In Civil Debt Collection Matter

• Lawyers violate D.C. Rule 8.4(g) when they threaten criminal charges for the sole purpose of securing an advantage in a civil matter. In the context of a debt collection action, the mere citation of or reference to a criminal statute during the course of the action does not constitute a per se violation of this Rule. A further reference to the potential for a criminal referral if the debt is knowingly paid with a check drawn on insufficient funds does not violate our Rules unless phrased in a manner that is likely to mislead or confuse the recipient.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 4.1 (Truthfulness in Statements to Others)
• Rule 4.3 (Dealing with Unrepresented Person)
• Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Inquiry

The Committee has received an inquiry on a matter relating to the obligation of an attorney under D.C. Rule 8.4(g). Inquirer is a practitioner who engages in commercial collection work on behalf of clients. We are advised that situations often arise where the alleged debtor responds to a demand for payment by writing a check on an account with insufficient funds.

Under District of Columbia law, if the drafter of a check drawn on insufficient funds (a "bounced check") fails to cure the default within 5 days of having been notified of the insufficiency, that failure constitutes prima facie evidence of a criminal intent to defraud and of knowledge that the account on which the check was drawn had insufficient funds. See D.C. Code § 22-1510. In effect, once debtors receive notice that a check has bounced, if they do not fund the check promptly they are at substantial risk of criminal charges and, because of the effect of the District's rules relating to proof, of conviction.

We are asked whether a standard form commercial collection demand letter may explicitly refer to the D.C. Code provisions that criminalize the writing of a check drawn on insufficient funds and the related provisions regarding notice, cure, and the presumption of intent. If it may, we are further asked whether the demand letter may advise the recipient that, in the event a bounced check is not funded, the inquirer may refer the matter to prosecution authorities for their review.

Discussion

A. Basic Principles

Rule 8.4(g) of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct makes it professional misconduct for a lawyer to "seek or threaten to seek criminal charges . . . solely to obtain an advantage in a civil matter."

Notably, this prohibition does not form a part of the Model Rules adopted by the American Bar Association. It was long a part of the Model Code of Professional Responsibility (see DR 7-105(A)), but it was omitted from the newer Model Rules. The differing explanations for that omission from the Model Rules (and conversely, for inclusion of the provision in the District's Rules) point to the two major themes that recur in interpretation of the provision.

Some say that the prohibition in Rule 8.4(g) was omitted from the Model Rules because it was overbroad and prohibited legitimate negotiating tactics. See Committee on Legal Ethics v. Printz, 416 S.E.2d 720, 722-23 (1992) (relying on 1 G. Hazard & W. Hodes, Law of Lawyering § 4:4:102 (2d ed. 1990)). On this reading, there are situations in which the reference to related criminal charges is considered an appropriate tactic. E.g. Alaska Ethics Op. 97-2 (1997) (allowing explicit threat of criminal referral); Mich. Ethics Op. RI-78 (1991) (because Rule 8.4(g) had been omitted, no specific ethical rule prohibits a lawyer from calling to the attention of an opposing party the possible applicability of a penal statute or making reference to specific criminal sanctions or from warning of the possibility of criminal prosecution).

Others, however, argue that the omission of Rule 8.4(g) from the Model Rules was simply because other provisions of the rules already prohibited the making of extortionate, fraudulent, or otherwise abusive threats. See ABA Formal Op. 92-363 (1992); Fla. Ethics Op. 89-3 (1989). On this reading, Rule 8.4(g)'s prohibition addresses conduct that is, in nearly all circumstances, improper under other applicable Rules or laws.[1]

[1] As ABA Formal Op. 94-383 makes clear, the use of a threat of a criminal prosecution may also violate Rule 8.4(b) to the extent that the conduct is extortionate under the criminal laws of a jurisdiction. Most notably in the District "A person commits the offense of blackmail if, with intent to obtain property of another or to cause another to do

The principal guidance we have as to the purpose behind the decision of our own Court of Appeals to adopt the Rule is the explanatory language of the District of Columbia Bar Jordan Committee when it first forwarded proposed Rule 8.4 to the Court of Appeals. There the Committee explained that "the conduct prohibited by paragraph (g) . . . is tantamount to common law blackmail [and is] serious enough, and its occurrence frequent enough, that a rule clearly forbidding that conduct [is] needed." See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Op. No. 220 n.1 (quoting Jordan Committee).[2]

One of our prior opinions provides some additional indication of the scope of the rule. In Opinion 220, we considered the circumstances under which a threat to file a disciplinary action against an opposing attorney (conduct also prohibited by Rule 8.4(g)) would violate the Rule.[3] There we identified two salient factors that guided the Committee's analysis.

First, we noted that in situations where an explicit reference to the charges was made "[t]he only question under Rule 8.4(g) is whether the charges were threatened or filed 'solely to obtain an advantage in a civil matter.'" Id. (emphasis in Op. 220) (footnote omitted). Thus, we stressed that the text of the Rule makes the operative question whether civil advantage is the only purpose motivating the threat. This, of course, would tend towards a narrowing construction of the prohibition.

In other jurisdictions, such as Connecticut, where the same prohibition exists, substantial weight also has been given to the use of the phrase "solely." Thus, the Connecticut equivalent of Rule 8.4(g) (Rule 3.4(7) in its numbering system) has not been read as a blanket prohibition on all mention of criminal law. Rather, as Connecticut courts have held, see Somers v. Statewide Grievance Comm., 245 Conn. 277, 292 (1998), the key to interpreting the Rule lies in the use of the word "solely" in the phrase, "solely to obtain an advantage in a civil action." Somers makes it clear that there is no per se prohibition against simultaneously pursuing a criminal complaint and a civil action against the same party unless the attorney's sole reason for filing a criminal complaint is to seek an advantage in the civil action.

Somers also pointed out that the court will investigate the attorney's motive and intention in filing the criminal complaint as part of its examination as to whether gaining an advantage in the civil action was the attorney's "sole" reason. See also Conn. Ethics Op. 99-50 (1999) (attorney may civilly seek restitution on an alleged debt while a criminal matter is pending so long as the complainant does not condition an agreement to drop the prosecution on the settlement of the alleged debt). While this inquiry may protect a lawyer's appropriate acts, it should be emphasized that courts interpreting Rule 8.4(g) seldom mention this single motive limitation, and reliance on a multiple motive defense is risky. See, e.g., People ex rel. Gallagher v. Hertz, 608 P.2d 335 (Colo. 1979) (implicitly rejecting a multiple motive defense).

This leads directly to the second aspect of our Opinion 220. Pointing out that the focus on motive precluded a categorical rule, we noted that the "determination of for what purpose or purposes the . . . charges at issue were threatened is a factual question" and thus one that is typically beyond the scope of the Committee's capacity to adjudicate. Id.

We agree that each inquiry is fact specific. Thus, it appears as a general rule that if the attorney has at least one other bona fide reason to counsel or threaten a criminal prosecution while a civil action is pending or intended, he or she may enjoy the advantage in a civil action without violating the rule. Typically, however, the existence of this "other motive" will be a fact-driven inquiry; notwithstanding the analysis that follows, a cautious practitioner will not place too great a reliance on his or her ability to convince an observer ex post of the existence of an ex ante justification.[4]

B. Analysis

Relying on the forgoing, we might be inclined to offer no firm opinion on the pending inquiry—reasoning that the motive of the inquirer is a fact-specific question as to which we lack adequate information. That course, however, would fail to give Rule 8.4(g) any great effect since the specter of a Bar Counsel inquiry, while daunting, is sufficiently rare as to not be a likely vehicle for the development of a common law of acceptable Rule 8.4(g) practice. Moreover, we consider it significantly more valuable for practitioners in this jurisdiction to have the benefit of our guidance than to be left with the uncertainty of a case-by-case development of the prohibition.

To be sure, some questions cannot be answered in an advisory opinion such as this, because motivations may well be obscured. But, we have concluded that the inquirer's question is sufficiently clear and well-defined that we can offer some guidance while also advancing certain general principles that may apply to other matters.[5]

To provide the context for our discussion, and because we have said that context is critical, we address in this opinion an idealized collection letter of the following form:

Clause 1: Creditor, my client, alleges that you, Debtor, owe him a debt in the amount of $X.

Clause 2: On his behalf I demand payment.

Clause 3: You may settle this demand by writing a check in the amount of $X.

Clause 4: In the District of Columbia, it is a crime to intentionally pay with a "bad check"-that is, one you know will bounce. If, after paying with the check, you are or refrain from doing any act, that person threatens * * * [t]o accuses any person of a crime." D.C. Code § 22-3252. While the collection letter we consider here is well short of this standard, attorneys should be mindful of the strictures of Rule 8.4(b) and District law. They should also refrain from any effort to exert improper influence over the criminal process or any suggestion of the capacity to exert such influence.

[2] Other jurisdictions couch the analysis in similar fashion: In jurisdictions where Rule 8.4(g) or its equivalent was completely omitted, it has been held that criminal charges may be threatened when the lawyer has a good faith belief that they are warranted by the facts. See Utah Ethics Op. 03-04 (2003). Conversely, in jurisdictions where Rule 8.4(g) or its equivalent exists, the limitations on attorney conduct have been read more stringently. E.g. Conn. Ethics Op. 00-24 (2000) (forbidding prosecutor from conditioning dismissal of criminal charges on dismissal of civil counter-complaint).

[3] We also addressed Rule 8.4(g) tangentially in Opinion 263. There we concluded that seeking to initiate a criminal contempt proceeding for violation of a Civil Protective Order was not, under District law, seeking to initiate a criminal charge. As a consequence, the attorney's threat to seek criminal contempt fell outside the ambit of Rule 8.4(g)'s prohibition.

[4] We note, as well, that provisions of the D.C. Code place limits on the manner and means by which a debt may be collected. See e.g. D.C. Code § 28-3814 (c)(5) (prohibiting "threat that nonpayment of an alleged claim will result in the arrest of any person"). It goes without saying that the practice of an attorney collecting a debt within the District must conform to District law. The question here is whether the Rules of Professional Conduct impose obligations beyond those imposed by generally applicable statutes.

[5] The inquirer also asked about limitations on his ability to instruct his client to proceed independently in a certain course of action whenever a situation to which his instructions might apply arises. Because a lawyer may not advise another to act in a manner that contravenes these Rules any more than he may act himself, our answer to the question of what a lawyer may do independently also controls what he may advise a client to do.

told that you don't have enough money in the bank to cover it, you will have 5 days to deposit sufficient funds. If you fail to do so, that can be used as evidence that you intended to pay with a bad check.

Clause 5: If you attempt to settle this debt with a check drawn on insufficient funds, I may refer this matter to the police for investigation and prosecution.

Clearly, the first three clauses of this idealized letter are nothing more than a typical, permissible demand letter. Our opinion focuses on whether the fourth and fifth clauses may also be included. And as to each clause we ask two distinct questions: Is it a threat? And, if so, is it a threat made solely for the purpose of gaining advantage in a civil matter.

1. Citation to or Quotation of Applicable Law: We begin with the fourth clause, in which the writer cites to, or quotes the D.C. Code provisions that relate to bounced checks. We believe that citation and/or quotation of the law, without any characterization of it, is permissible because it is not reasonably construed as a per se threat.

To be sure, we recognize that the citation of the criminal provisions of law is intended to have the collateral effect of achieving payment of the alleged outstanding debt through a check drawn on sufficient funds. We recognize as well that the inquirer's desire to call attention to the criminal law is, as we have been told, the result of past experience and an attempt to avoid similar problems in the future.

But having a collateral effect is not, in our view, equivalent to making a "threat" in order to achieve that effect. There are any number of situations in which a lawyer might reasonably cite to applicable law, and we would be reluctant to apply a per se rule prohibiting the citation of law. It would be odd, indeed, if a lawyer could not cite a potential sanction or reference a criminal provision in any agreement or discussion with a third party. Citation of underlying fraud law in this context is, in our view, no more a threat than is the routine situation in a discovery deposition where an adversary lawyer advises a deponent of the potential penalties for perjury. We, therefore, are unwilling to assume that the mere citation or quotation of a criminal law, without more, constitutes a threat of prosecution.[6]

Our conclusion that the mere citation of law is not threat is, of course, subject to other limitations contained in our Rules. Under Rule 4.1, a lawyer may not make a misleading statement of fact or law to a third party. And, under Rule 4.3, a lawyer may not provide advice to an unrepresented party. As a general matter, we think that the simple citation of an applicable criminal rule will violate neither prohibition inasmuch as it will, if accurate, not be misleading; furthermore, without any recommendation as to appropriate action, the citation cannot be construed as the provision of "advice." There may, however, be situations in which a lawyer's conduct violates these Rules—as, for example, if a selective quotation omits a relevant portion of the law. Thus, while the context of any citation to the law will always need to be examined, in our view the simple reference to a potentially applicable criminal law does not per se fall afoul of D.C. Rule 8.4(g).

2. Potential Referral to Prosecutor: We next turn to the question presented by the fifth clause of our notional letter: whether inquirer may go further than citing the applicable law and inform the recipient of the letter that, in addition to, or in lieu of, a suit to collect the alleged debt, the inquirer may bring the matter of any bounced check that is not promptly funded to the attention of the prosecuting authorities who may then independently choose to prosecute any violation.

To begin with, we think it beyond dispute that such a statement is a "threat" under any meaningful construction of that term. To be sure, the statement of one's legal options is also a statement of fact. But by contrast with a simple citation of law, the statement that one may refer a matter to the prosecuting authorities constitutes an explicit suggestion that the inquirer may (or perhaps will) take a particular action—moving the demand letter beyond a citation of law to a threat to take steps to see the law implemented.

We are left then with the question of whether this threat is solely to gain advantage in a civil matter. And here, the rather confused nature of the "threat" involved creates uncertainties in the analysis.

For this is not a threat directly relating to the underlying claim of a debt. The inquirer does not wish to draft a collection letter that says "if you do not pay the debt I may refer the matter to the police." As well he should not, for we would have little trouble in concluding that such a threat tied directly to the alleged debt would contravene our Rules. Here, however, the threat is directed at a future act to be done by the creditor—and one that is not certain to occur. Thus, the threat is a contingent one based upon a yet-to-occur set of facts: "if you pay the debt and if you pay it with a bad check, and then do not fund it after I provide notice that the check is unfunded, then I may refer the matter to the police."

Thus, under one construction, the "threat" (of referral if payment is made by way of an unfunded check) is not connected to the civil action, which has as its objective the collection of the debt and is, at least upon initiation, agnostic as to the means by which the debt is paid – check, money order, cash or, conceivably, in-kind services. And a relatively innocuous reference of the form that might be used (e.g. "failure to pay with a check drawn on sufficient funds may result in referral of this matter for prosecution") is quite distant from the threats of "blackmail" or extortion that motivated the Jordan Committee to include Rule 8.4(g) in our Rules.[7]

This construction is buttressed by the requirements of the District Code that make notice and an opportunity to cure effectively a prerequisite for a successful criminal prosecution for paying a debt with a bad check. Thus, the situation here might be analogized to that in other jurisdictions where ethics committees have opined that letters referring to the criminal sanctions imposed for stopping payment on a check were not sent solely for the purpose of gaining an advantage in a civil matter. See, e.g., Decato's Case, 379 A.2d 825 (N.H. 1977); Florida Ethics Op. 85-3; Georgia Ethics Op. 26 (1980); Utah Ethics Op. 71 (1979). Each of these opinions rested on the fact that state law imposes a requirement of such notification before bringing a civil action—in other words, the premise is that the Rules of Professional Conduct cannot prohibit that which underlying local law requires for the zealous representation of a client.

But another more troubling construction is also possible. Unlike the situations just referred to, D.C. law does not mandate the drafting of a demand letter as a pre-requi-

[6] Even were the citation of law construed as a "threat" we also think that the mere citation of a potentially applicable law in a communication cannot per se be deemed "solely" for the purpose of achieving an advantage in the pending civil matter. The existence of alternate purposes for the citation of law seems sufficiently likely to make a per se rule unreasonable.

[7] Indeed, this threat is not quintessential "blackmail"—a situation in which one is threatened concerning an act that has already occurred. Ordinarily, one is not subject to blackmail (which, the Jordan Committee reminds us is at the core of the concerns underlying Rule 8.4(g)) for acts that have not yet been completed. This is why Rule 8.4(g) would not apply to any threat made by a lawyer to a witness during a deposition (e.g., that if you don't testify honestly, you can be prosecuted) and also counsels against a blanket per se extension of Rule 8.4(g) to the circumstances under consideration in this opinion.

site to a claim; rather it provides that the failure to respond to such a letter has evidentiary consequences. Moreover, in each of the instances referenced above, the attorney was responding to an act by the debtor that had already occurred—the stopping of payment on a check already drawn. By contrast, here the inquirer is writing in respect of an event that has yet to occur—the payment of the alleged debt by means of an unfunded check.

Given these factors, the proposed fifth clause of the demand letter does raise concerns. In light of the contingent nature of the threat, and especially when one considers that the recipient of a demand letter of the form suggested is likely to be unschooled in the law, the context in which the letter is sent and the identity of the recipient might give rise to questions concerning the senders' true motive. A lawyer who knowingly blurs this distinction in a demand letter may be in violation of Rules 4.1, 8.4(c) and 8.4(g) as well as District statutes relating to wrongful debt collection tactics or blackmail.[8]

And we cannot, of course, assume that all claims of debt are incontestable—to the contrary, the debtor may well have valid defenses to the alleged debt. The possibility exists that, confusing the threat of referral for a bad payment with the threat of referral for a non-payment, the debtor may be misleadingly induced to forgo these legitimate grounds for contesting the debt.

The extent to which confusion is likely is, of course, an empirical question as to which the Committee has no data and regarding which the members of the Committee have divergent views. Some consider such confusion highly likely; others much less so.

In the end, however, it is clear to a majority of the Committee that Rule 8.4(g) is not the appropriate vehicle for addressing these empirical concerns. The Rule speaks to a prohibition on threats made "solely" for advantage. Here, the inquirer has articulated a clear and plausible alternate motivation—his experience that many creditors pay with unfunded checks and his desire to avoid the costs and inconvenience associated with that occurrence. We credit such experience. And even if we were disinclined to do so, for purposes of an advisory opinion such as this, we are bound to accept such an articulated representation at face value. See Rule E-5, Rules of the D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee ("The Committee assumes the facts, as stated in the inquiry, are accurate, and ordinarily it will not look beyond those stated."). Given this eminently plausible alternate motivation we are convinced that Rule 8.4(g) is not violated by this type of threat of referral if the lawyer writing the demand letter is acting with a similar motivation.

Of course it goes without saying that a lawyer may not use this alternate motivation as a pretext for including threatening language in a demand letter merely to intimidate unsophisticated recipients. That would violate the Rule. Whether any individual lawyer has the requisite motivation in any particular case is, of course, a "factual question which this Committee is not equipped to decide." D.C. Ethics Op. 220.

Moreover, caution must be exercised when drafting a form collection letter that contains an analog to the fifth clause. As we have already noted, Rule 4.1 prohibits the making of misleading statements—and we can certainly imagine a letter being drafted that, either by omission of relevant qualifying information or by inclusion of material that goes beyond a simple statement of intent would become, in context, misleading. Thus, the careful practitioner should not read this opinion as an authorization for collection techniques that amount to "high-pressure tactics" or confusing conduct.

Indeed, though it is not required by our rules, the potential for confusion may be ameliorated to a degree by a disclaimer, explicitly advising the recipient of the letter of his right to contest the underlying debt and noting that the criminal laws refer to the means of payment, not whether a payment is, in fact, due. In essence, the inclusion of the fifth clause is assuredly made less misleading if another clause clarifies that "you may contest the debt. The potential for criminal referral arises only if you choose not to contest the debt and then pay the debt with a bad check."

In the end, however, even without such a disclaimer, we are of the view that an appropriately couched reference to the potential for a criminal referral of the matter that is based upon an attorney's prior experience or other non-pretextual motivation and that is contained in a form letter is not, per se a threat made "solely" for advantage in a civil action. We cannot say that such references are, in all instances, prohibited by Rule 8.4(g).

Conclusion

In sum, the mere citation of a criminal statute or a reference to a criminal sanction that does not mischaracterize the sanction is, in our view, permissible under the Rules. A statement that the attorney may refer the matter for prosecution if payment is made through an unfunded check is not prohibited, though a cautious practitioner will consider accompanying any such reference with a suitable disclaimer.

Inquiry Number: 05-12-22
Published: May 2007

Opinion 340

Contacts with Government Officials In Litigated Matters

• Under D.C. Rule 4.2(d), a lawyer representing a client in a dispute being litigated against a government agency may contact a government official within that agency without the prior consent of the government's counsel to discuss substantive legal issues, so long as the lawyer identifies himself and indicates that he is representing a party adverse to the government. In addition, the lawyer may also contact officials at other government agencies who have the authority to affect the government's position in the litigation concerning matters, provided that the lawyer makes the same disclosures as stated above. The lawyer cannot, however, contact government officials either within the agency involved in the litigation or elsewhere concerning routine discovery matters, scheduling issues or the like, absent the consent of government counsel.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 4.2(d) (Communicating with Government Officials)

Inquiry

We have received an inquiry from an attorney representing an agency of the United States Government concerning the interpretation of D.C. Rule 4.2 governing contacts with represented persons. The attorney is employed by a government agency that frequently finds itself in contract disputes with private entities that provide services to the agency. In these disputes, according to the inquirer, the government contracting officer has the authority to resolve or settle the dispute on behalf of the government. The inquirer requests guidance on when and under what circumstances attorneys for the adverse party may contact the government contracting officer concerning the dispute, and whether they may do so without the consent of the attorneys representing the government agency. Specifically, the inquirer asks whether a private attorney representing the agency's adversary can contact the government contracting officer concerning legal arguments contained in the government's court filings absent consent of the government attorney in the matter.

8. To demonstrate the point, consider the absurd hypothetical in which the fifth clause of our notional letter instead reads: "By the way, jaywalking is a misdemeanor and if I observe you jaywalking I will refer you to the prosecutor." Such a threat, so clearly distinct from the underlying effort to collect a debt, would not be for the purpose of gaining an advantage in the civil action. The issue that arises with the proposed action we consider here is that, though distinct from the underlying debt collection, the action for payment with a bounced check is sufficiently closely related that we cannot disregard the real possibility of confusion.

The inquirer also asks whether contacts, again without the consent of the government attorney, can take place between attorneys for private entities in a dispute with the government and government officials who are not employed by the agency involved but who nevertheless could, by virtue of their positions, affect the government's position in the dispute.

Background

D.C. Rule 4.2 generally prohibits communications between a lawyer and persons represented by counsel about the subject of the representation absent the consent of the represented person's counsel. "Person" for the purposes of the Rule includes organizations and specifically covers those individuals within an organization who have "the authority to bind [the] organization" as to the particular matter at issue. D.C. Rule 4.2(c). As we explained in Opinion 80, the government officials "who are deemed to be government 'parties' with whom communications under the rule are restricted are quite limited, including only those persons who have the power to commit or bind the government with respect to the matter in question." D.C. Ethics Op. 80 (1979) (interpreting DR-7-104(A)(1)).

The purpose of Rule 4.2 as it relates both to represented individuals and organizations is to "protect[ ] represented persons unschooled in the law from direct communications from counsel for an adverse person." D.C. Rule 4.2, Comment [5]; see also D.C. Ethics Op. 331 (2005) (recognizing the "basic purpose" of Rule 4.2 "is to prevent a client, who on the one hand is presumed to be relatively unsophisticated legally but who on the other hand has ultimate substantive control over the matter, from making uninformed or otherwise irrational decisions as a result of undue pressure from opposing counsel") (internal quotations omitted) The concept embodied in Rule 4.2 is not a novel one and was reflected in the Code of Professional Responsibility. See DR 7-104 (prohibiting communication by a lawyer with "a party he knows to be represented by a lawyer in [the] matter"). In this jurisdiction, the general prohibition stated in Rule 4.2 is subject to a number of exceptions. For example, Comment [5] allows a lawyer to contact in-house counsel of an organization without the consent of outside counsel representing the organization. See also D.C. Ethics Op. 331.

This inquiry involves the exception contained in D.C. Rule 4.2(d) that permits contacts without the consent of counsel for the government between a lawyer and "government officials who have the authority to redress grievances of the lawyer's client," provided that the lawyer discloses to the government official "both the lawyer's identity and the fact that the lawyer represents a party that is adverse" to the government.[1] The exception stated in Rule 4.2(d) is not found in the current or prior versions of the ABA Model Rules. However, Comment [5] to Model Rule 4.2 provides that "[c]ommunications authorized by law [and thus exempt from the restrictions of the Rule] may include communications by a lawyer on behalf of a client who is exercising a constitutional or other legal right to communicate with the government." See also ABA Formal Op. 97-408 (authorizing communication with government officials represented by counsel "provided that the sole purpose of the lawyer's communication is to address a policy issue").

The adoption of the exception concerning government officials contained in D.C. Rule 4.2(d) has been the subject of extensive debate and discussion, much of it decades ago. In 1975, we received an inquiry concerning whether or not Rule 4.2's predecessor, DR 7-104(A)(1), applied to contacts with government officials. At that time, DR 7-104(A)(1) simply prohibited communications by a lawyer with a represented party, and, unlike the current Rule, did not contain any language excepting government agencies or officials.[2] We felt that the matter was sufficiently important that we published a tentative draft opinion and solicited comments on that opinion. See D.C. Ethics Op. 80 n.1. After some four years of consideration and a number of public comments, we released Opinion 80, which concluded that the then-existing rule prohibited contact, absent consent, with "those . . . who have the power to commit or bind the government with respect to the subject matter in question." Id. We recommended, however, that the rule be amended to eliminate the prohibition on contacting government officials absent consent.

Our recommendation was ultimately endorsed and adopted by the Jordan Committee, which made recommendations concerning the District of Columbia's adoption of the ABA Model Rules. In its 1986 report to the Court of Appeals, the Jordan Committee recommended that Rule 4.2 be restricted to "non-governmental parties" and discussed the reasons for its recommendation at length:

> Government officials, especially those who have significant decision making authority, are almost always capable of resisting any arguments or other suggestions that are not proper and genuinely persuasive. Moreover, any government official who is in a high enough position to make binding decisions can surely be relied upon to exercise... individual judgment as to whether to engage in such direct communications at all. . . .

---

[1] Rule 4.2(d) states as follows:

> This rule does not prohibit communication by a lawyer with government officials who have the authority to redress the grievances of the lawyer's client, whether or not those grievances or the lawyer's communications relate to matters that are the subject of the representation, provided that in the event of such communications the disclosures specified in (b) are made to the government official to whom the communication is made.

Rule 4.2(b) which is referenced in Rule 4.2(d) provides:

> During the course of representing a client, a lawyer may communicate about the subject of the representation with a nonparty employee of an organization without obtaining the consent of that organization's lawyer. If the organization is an adverse party, however, prior to communicating with any such nonparty employee, a lawyer must disclose to such employee both the lawyer's identity and the fact that the lawyer represents a party that is adverse to the employee's employer.

[2] DR 7-104(A)(1) provided that during the course of representing a client, a lawyer shall not, absent consent:

> [c]ommunicate or cause another to communicate on the subject of the representation with a party he knows to be represented by a lawyer in that matter.

Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct and Related Comments 187 (Nov. 19, 1986) ("Jordan Committee Report"). The Jordan Committee Report noted, among other reasons, that government agencies had "the power to protect themselves by adopting rules and regulations concerning communications between private attorneys and government officials." Id. at 188.

In the public comment process that followed the release of the Jordan Committee Report, the exclusion of governmental parties from D.C. Rule 4.2 was again the subject of considerable comment. See Analysis of Comments Submitted to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals in Response to the Court's Order of September 1, 1988. As a result of the comment process, the Court of Appeals modified the Jordan Committee's original recommendation. The language restricting D.C. Rule 4.2 to "non-governmental parties" was deleted, and D.C. Rule 4.2(d), in its current form, was substituted along with what are now Comments [10] and [11]. Neither Rule 4.2(d) nor the relevant Comments have been amended since their adoption by the Court of Appeals in 1990.

We have addressed D.C. Rule 4.2(d) only once since 1990. In Opinion 280, the inquirer was an attorney who had represented a chiropractor before a District of Columbia licensing board in a proceeding that had concluded with a consent order. The inquirer felt that the board staff had acted improperly in the proceedings leading to the consent order and further understood that members of the board itself were unhappy with the staff "imposing its will on the board with respect to a number of matters." D.C. Ethics Op. 280 (1998). The inquirer wished to discuss with an individual board member both the consent order reached in his client's matter and the general dissatisfaction with the staff's conduct. After reviewing Opinion 80 and discussing the subsequent treatment of the issue in the Jordan Committee Report, we concluded that the proposed contacts did not violate D.C. Rule 4.2. In support of our conclusion, we cited Comment [7] (now renumbered as Comment [11] but not otherwise amended), which explains that lawyers may bypass government counsel "with respect to genuine grievances."

Discussion

The first question posed by the inquirer is whether it is permissible to communicate about substantive legal issues with a government contracting officer in a matter being litigated absent the consent of the government lawyer. The inquirer suggests a distinction between discussing basic policy positions of the government, concerning which non-consensual contacts are concededly authorized by D.C. Rule 4.2(d), and discussing substantive legal issues, concerning which prior consent should arguably be obtained. We do not find support for this distinction in D.C. Rule 4.2(d).

Comment [11] provides the relevant guidance:

> Paragraph (d) does not permit a lawyer to bypass counsel representing the government on every issue that may arise in the course of disputes with the government. It is intended to provide lawyers access to decision makers in government with respect to genuine grievances, such as to present the view that the government's basic policy position with respect to a dispute is faulty, or that government personnel are conducting themselves improperly with respect to aspects of the dispute. It is not intended to provide direct access on routine disputes such as ordinary discovery disputes, extensions of time or other scheduling matters, or similar routine aspects of the resolution of disputes.

Contacts concerning substantive legal issues appear to fall within the rubric of "genuine grievances" rather than "routine disputes" relating to run-of-the-mill discovery and scheduling issues. The reference to a "basic policy position" in Comment [11] is preceded by the language "such as" and is thus simply illustrative of the type of "genuine grievances" that do not require prior consent. A "genuine grievance" can and frequently does pertain to substantive legal arguments advanced by the government. One of the virtues of Comment [11] is that the line that it draws between those contacts that require consent and those that do not is relatively easy to discern. Even if we were empowered to re-draw this line, we would hesitate before advocating an approach which distinguishes between "basic policy positions" and "substantive legal arguments." One reason that a "basic policy position" can be "faulty", and therefore a permissible subject of non-consensual contacts with government officials under Comment [11], is that it is based on flawed "substantive legal arguments." The inquirer concedes that D.C. Rule 4.2 authorizes a lawyer to argue to a government official that the government's position is faulty, but would not permit the lawyer to make any reference to the legal arguments made by either side. This seems to us unworkable in practice. In addition, making a distinction between "basic policy position[s]" and "substantive legal arguments" has no support in the language of D.C. Rule 4.2 and its accompanying Comments.

The second question asked by the inquirer concerns the extent to which a lawyer for a private party (without the consent of the government lawyer) may contact officials in other agencies or organizations who might affect the government's position in the on-going litigation as part of an effort to further the cause of the lawyer's client. In some instances, the inquirer posits that the government official contacted might not even be aware of the specific dispute in which the government is engaged or the particular issues that are being raised in the dispute. If the official contacted has the "authority to redress the grievances of the lawyer's client" then the contact is within the scope of D.C. Rule 4.2(d), so long as the lawyer makes the appropriate disclosures required under D.C. Rule 4.2(b). If, on the other hand, the official contacted does not have the power to bind the agency in the matter, then the contact remains permissible absent consent because the government official is not a person represented in the matter. See Rule 4.2(c) (for organizations, the term "'party' or 'person'" includes only those individuals who have "the authority to bind an organization as to the representation to which the communication relates."); see also D.C. Ethics Op. 80 (limiting government officials covered by the rule to "only those persons who have the power to commit or bind the government to the matter in question").[3] We note that even though we conclude that a lawyer may generally initiate contact with a government official, an official is not obligated to engage in the communication and may ask the lawyer to communicate with government counsel rather than directly with the official.

Inquiry Number: 06-08-10
Published: June 2007

3. If the government official contacted is an attorney who serves as an "in-house counsel," then contact absent consent would be permissible under Comment [5] to Rule 4.2.

Opinion 341

Review and Use of Metadata in Electronic Documents

• A receiving lawyer is prohibited from reviewing metadata sent by an adversary only where he has actual knowledge that the metadata was inadvertently sent. In such instances, the receiving lawyer should not review the metadata before consulting with the sending lawyer to determine whether the metadata includes work product of the sending lawyer or confidences or secrets of the sending lawyer's client.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
• Rule 3.4 (Fairness to Opposing Party and Counsel)
• Rule 4.4 (Respect For Rights of Third Persons)
• Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Inquiry

We have received numerous inquiries concerning a lawyer's obligations regarding metadata that is imbedded in electronic documents received from opposing counsel. Metadata is electronically stored information, typically not visible from the face of the document as printed out or as initially shown on the computer screen, but which is imbedded in the software and retrievable by various means. Often described as "data about data," metadata provides information regarding the creation and modification of a document, and sometimes includes comments by persons participating in the creation or modification of the document.[1] To the uninitiated, metadata is hidden and perhaps unknown, but to competent computer-users, the existence of metadata is well known and may be a simple "click" or two away. The information that is embedded is often mundane and of little or no interest, but in some instances it may reveal significant information.

In assessing the ethical obligations of both the sending and receiving lawyer with respect to metadata, we find it useful to distinguish between electronic documents provided in discovery or pursuant to a subpoena from those electronic documents voluntarily provided by opposing counsel. Although the Florida and Alabama Bars have recognized a similar distinction, see Florida Bar Op. 06-2; Alabama State Bar, Office of Gen. Counsel Op. No. R0-2007-02, the distinction has not been universally recognized in other ethics opinions addressing metadata. See ABA Formal Op. 06-442; Maryland Bar Ass'n Ethics Docket No. 2007-09.

Analysis

A. Electronic Documents Provided Outside of Discovery

1. The Sending Lawyer

Lawyers sending electronic documents outside of the context of responding to discovery or subpoenas have an obligation under Rule 1.6 to take reasonable steps to maintain the confidentiality of documents in their possession. This includes taking care to avoid providing electronic documents that inadvertently contain accessible information that is either a confidence or a secret and to employ reasonably available technical means to remove such metadata before sending the document. See N.Y. State Bar Ass'n Committee Op. 782. Accordingly, lawyers must either acquire sufficient understanding of the software that they use or ensure that their office employs safeguards to minimize the risk of inadvertent disclosures.[2]

2. The Receiving Lawyer

More often than not, the exchange of metadata between lawyers is either mutually helpful or otherwise harmless. Lawyers routinely exchange contracts, stipulations, and other documents that include "track changes" or other software features which highlight suggested modifications. Similarly, spreadsheets include necessary metadata such as formulas for the columns and rows, thereby providing a useful understanding of the calculations made.

But when a receiving lawyer has actual knowledge that the sender inadvertently included metadata in an electronic document, we believe that the principles stated in Opinion Nos. 256 and 318 relating to inadvertent production of privileged material should be used in determining the receiving lawyer's obligations. In Opinion No. 256, we stated that, where a lawyer knows that a privileged document was inadvertently sent, it is a dishonest act under D.C. Rule 8.4(c) for the lawyer to review and use it without consulting with the sender. We reached a similar conclusion in Opinion No. 318, regarding the receipt of documents from third parties. However, we noted in Opinion 318 that, where the privileged nature of the document is not apparent on its face, there is no obligation to refrain from reviewing it, and the duty of diligent representation under D.C. Rule 1.3 may trump confidentiality concerns.

Consistent with Opinion No. 256, we agree generally with the New York and Alabama Bars to the extent that they have found Rule 8.4(c) to be implicated when a receiving lawyer wrongfully "mines" an opponents' metadata. See N.Y. State Bar Ass'n Committee Op. 749 (concluding that lawyers have an obligation not to exploit an inadvertent or unauthorized transmission of client confidences or secrets and that "use of such information . . . [is] conduct 'involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation'"); and Alabama State Bar, Office of Gen. Counsel Op. No. R0-2007-02 (finding that "[t]he unauthorized mining of metadata by an attorney to uncover confidential information would be a violation of... Rule 8.4").

In our view, however, Rule 8.4 is implicated only when the receiving lawyer has actual prior knowledge that the metadata was inadvertently provided. Given the ubiquitous exchange of electronic documents and the sending lawyers' obligation to avoid inadvertent productions of metadata, we believe that mere uncertainty by the receiving lawyer as to the inadvertence of the sender does not trigger an ethical obligation by the receiving lawyer to refrain

[1] The Federal Judicial Center recently issued a publication on electronic discovery that defined the term "metadata" as

> [i]nformation about a particular data set or document which describes how, when, and by whom the data set or document was collected, created, accessed, or modified; its size; and how it is formatted. Some metadata, such as file dates and sizes, can easily be seen by users; other metadata can be hidden from users but are still available to the operating system or the program used to process the data set or document.

Barbara J. Rothstein, Ronald J. Hedges, & Elizabeth C. Wiggins, Managing Discovery of Electronic Information: A Pocket Guide for Judges 24-25 (Federal Judicial Center 2007), www.fjc.gov/public /pdf.nsf/lookup/eldscpkt. pdf/$file/eldscpkt.pdf.

[2] For information on methods for handling metadata, see The Sedona Conference Working Group Series, The Sedona Guidelines: Best Practice Guidelines & Commentary for Managing Information & Records in the Electronic Age (Sept. 2005), www.thesedonaconference.org/dltForm?did=TSG9_05.pdf.

from reviewing the metadata. This standard is consistent with our conclusion in Opinion No. 256.[3]

Where there is such actual prior knowledge by the receiving lawyer as to the inadvertence of the sender, then notwithstanding the negligence or even ethical lapse of the sending lawyer, the receiving lawyer's duty of honesty requires that he refrain from reviewing the metadata until he has consulted with the sending lawyer to determine whether the metadata includes privileged or confidential information.[4] If the sending lawyer advises that such protected information is included in the metadata, then the receiving lawyer should comply with the instructions of the sender. The receiving lawyer may, however, reserve his right to challenge the claim of privilege and obtain an adjudication, where appropriate.

A receiving lawyer may have such actual prior knowledge if he is told by the sending lawyer of the inadvertence before the receiving lawyer reviews the document. Such actual knowledge may also exist where a receiving lawyer immediately notices upon review of the metadata that it is clear that protected information was unintentionally included. These situations will be fact-dependent, but can arise, for example, where the metadata includes a candid exchange between an adverse party and his lawyer such that it is "readily apparent on its face," D.C. Ethics Op. 318, that it was not intended to be disclosed. As we stated in Opinions 256 and 318, a prudent receiving lawyer who is uncertain whether the sender intended to include particular information should contact the sending lawyer to inquire.

We recognize that other ethics opinions take a different view and have concluded that neither Rule 8.4(c) nor any other ethics rule prohibits the review of metadata. In Formal Opinion 06-442, the ABA noted that there is no rule expressly prohibiting such conduct. The ABA discussed Model Rule 4.4(b), which relates to the inadvertent production of documents, as "the most closely applicable rule," but it declined to state that it directly applied to metadata transmitted within an electronic document. The ABA nevertheless noted that under Model Rule 4.4(b), where it applies, a receiving lawyer has no obligation under the ethics rules beyond notifying the sender.[5]

Notably, however, the version of Rule 4.4(b) adopted by the D.C. Court of Appeals, effective February 1, 2007, is more expansive than the ABA version. Indeed, the D.C. Rule largely codified Opinion No. 256 regarding inadvertent production of privileged documents. See D.C. Rule 4.4, Comments [2] & [3]. D.C. Rule 4.4(b) provides:

> A lawyer who receives a writing relating to the representation of a client and knows, before examining the writing, that it has been inadvertently sent, shall not examine the writing, but shall notify the sending party and abide by the instructions of the sending party regarding the return or destruction of the writing.

Although the purpose of Rule 4.4(b) was to address the inadvertent disclosure of entire documents (whether electronic or paper),[6] we see no reason why it would not also apply to an inadvertently transmitted portion of a writing that is otherwise intentionally sent.

B. Electronic Documents Provided in Discovery or Pursuant to a Subpoena

When metadata is provided in discovery or pursuant to a subpoena, the rules of professional conduct are not the only rules of which lawyers must be aware. Although such other rules lie outside our jurisdiction, we note that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure now provide steps to identify and address issues related to electronic discovery. See F. R. Civ. P. 16(b), 26 (f), 33(d), 34(a) and 37(f) (effective Dec. 1, 2006). Under these new rules, parties are required to consult at the outset of a case about the nature of pertinent electronic documents in their possession and the manner in which they are maintained. This should include specific discussions as to whether a receiving party wants to obtain the metadata, and if so, whether the sending party wishes to assert a claim of privilege as to some or all of the metadata.

Although decided prior to the implementation of the amended federal rules, the case of Williams v. Sprint/United Mgt., 230 F.R.D. 640 (D. Kan. 2005), illustrates how metadata may be considered probative evidence in litigation. In Williams, plaintiff employees brought a class action claiming age discrimination in connection with a reduction-in-force ("RIF"), and they sought and obtained from the defendant electronic versions of Excel spreadsheets that were created and used by the defendant to identify pools of employees subject to the RIF. The defendant "scrubbed" the metadata from these spreadsheets before producing them, and plaintiffs objected. They moved to compel production of the metadata as originally maintained. The court held that because the metadata could be relevant in determining whether defendants had manipulated the employee pools as alleged, defendants had to provide the metadata to plaintiffs.[7]

1. The Sending Lawyer in the Discovery/Subpoena Context

D.C. Rule 3.4(a) provides the relevant guidance for lawyers providing access to

[3] By stating that the standard for a violation is "actual knowledge," we do not condone a situation in which a lawyer employs a system to mine all incoming electronic documents in the hope of uncovering a confidence or secret, the disclosure of which was unintended by some hapless sender. The Rules of Professional Conduct are "rules of reason," Scope [1], and a lawyer engaging in such a practice with such intent cannot escape accountability solely because he lacks "actual knowledge" in an individual case. Moreover, as stated in Rule 1.0(f), "[a] person's knowledge may be inferred from circumstances."

[4] In Opinion No. 256, we discussed the analogous situation of a lawyer who finds a wallet in the street. Here, the more appropriate analogy may be to a lawyer who inadvertently leaves his briefcase in opposing counsel's office following a meeting or a deposition. The one lawyer's negligence in leaving the briefcase does not relieve the other lawyer from the duty to refrain from going through that briefcase, at least when it is patently clear from the circumstances that the lawyer was not invited to do so.

[5] In its Opinion No. 2007-09, the Maryland Bar also concluded that Rule 8.4(c) is not implicated by a receiving lawyer's accessing metadata. But the Maryland Bar relied on its version of Rule 4.4. which has not been amended to impose any obligation on the lawyer who receives an inadvertently produced document. The Maryland Bar stated that its opinion was "heavily influenced by the difference between the Maryland Rules of Professional Conduct and [ABA Model Rule 4.4]." D.C. Rule 4.4(b), by contrast, imposes upon the receiving lawyer an obligation not only to contact the sending lawyer (as the Model Rule requires), but also to abide by the sending lawyer's instructions regarding the return or destruction of the document.

[6] Under D.C. Rule 1.0(o), a "writing" is defined as "a tangible or electronic record of a communication or representation, including handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photography, audio or video recording, and e-mail."

[7] By citing Williams, we do not necessarily mean to endorse its holding or to provide any guidance with respect to the rules of discovery. See Speedway v. NASCAR, Inc., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92028 (E.D. Ky. Dec. 18, 2006) (criticizing the specific holding in Williams). Rather, we cite Williams merely to illustrate that courts have required the production of metadata as probative evidence, and we discuss below the implications of this conclusion for the responsibilities of lawyers under the rules of professional conduct.

tangible evidence in discovery:

> A lawyer shall not . . . Obstruct another party's access to evidence or alter, destroy, or conceal evidence, or counsel or assist another person to do so, if the lawyer reasonably should know that the evidence is or may be the subject of discovery or subpoena in any pending or imminent proceeding. Unless prohibited by law, a lawyer may receive physical evidence of any kind from the client or from another person.

Because it is impermissible to alter electronic documents that constitute tangible evidence, the removal of metadata may, at least in some instances, be prohibited as well.[8] In addition to issues regarding discovery sanctions, the alteration or destruction of evidence can, under some circumstances, also constitute a crime. See D.C. Rule 3.4, Comment [4].

2. The Receiving Lawyer in the Discovery/Subpoena Context

In view of the obligations of a sending lawyer in providing electronic documents in response to a discovery request or subpoena, a receiving lawyer is generally justified in assuming that metadata was provided intentionally. Moreover, when a document is sought in discovery or through subpoena, the scope of what is protected is narrowed from anything that is a confidence or secret to that material which falls within an evidentiary privilege. See D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(2)(A); Adams v. Franklin, No. 05-CV-233, slip op. at 5 (D.C. May 10, 2007) ("the lawyer's ethical duty to preserve a client's confidences and secrets is broader [than] the attorney-client privilege").

In addition, when an electronic document constitutes tangible evidence, or potential tangible evidence, the receiving lawyer has an obligation competently and diligently to review, use, and preserve the evidence. See D.C. Rules 1.1, 1.3. The electronic document is similar to any other tangible evidence that the lawyer is expected to review in order to advance her client's interests. Where useful, for example, the lawyer in such instances may consult with a computer expert to determine the means by which the metadata can be most fully revealed and reviewed, much as a lawyer does with a finger-print expert.[9]

Notwithstanding all this, even in the context of discovery or other judicial process, if a receiving lawyer has actual knowledge that metadata containing protected information was inadvertently sent by the sending lawyer, the receiving lawyer, under Rule 8.4(c), should advise the sending lawyer and determine whether such protected information was disclosed inadvertently. See D.C. Ethics Op. 256 ("The line we have drawn between an ethical and an unethical use of inadvertently disclosed information is based on the receiving lawyer's knowledge of the inadvertence of the disclosure."). If the sender advises that protected information was unintentionally provided, then the receiving lawyer should follow the directives of the sending lawyer regarding the disposition of the electronic document. Under these circumstances, however, the receiving lawyer is permitted to take protective measures to ensure that potential evidence is not destroyed and to preserve the right to challenge the claim that the information is privileged or otherwise not subject to discovery and obtain an adjudication on that point. Of course, this is all subject to applicable rules of procedure and court orders that may otherwise govern.[10]

Conclusion

We conclude that when a receiving lawyer has actual knowledge that an adversary has inadvertently provided metadata in an electronic document, the lawyer should not review the metadata without first consulting with the sender and abiding by the sender's instructions. In all other circumstances, a receiving lawyer is free to review the metadata contained within the electronic files provided by an adversary.

(No Inquiry Number)
Published: September 2007

Opinion 342

Participation in Internet-Based Lawyer Referral Services Requiring Payment of Fees

• Lawyers may participate in both not-for-profit and for-profit lawyer Internet-based referral services where the services require a flat fee for participation, a flat fee for transmitting the lawyer's name to a potential client, and/or a flat fee for every client secured as a result of a referral.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)
• Rule 7.1 (Communications Regarding a Lawyer's Services)

Inquiry

We have received a number of inquiries concerning participation in, and the creation of, Internet-based referral services. All inquires seek guidance on whether a lawyer's participation in a specific program would be permissible under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. Specifically, we have been asked to provide guidance with respect to the applicability of D.C. Rules 5.4 and 7.1 to lawyer participation in referral services under the terms common to the programs reviewed.

Most referral programs are run by State Bar Associations or other nonprofit organizations. There are, however, a substantial number of programs that are operated by for-profit organizations, and these services vary in size, sophistication, legal specialty, and design. While most sites have numerous disclaimers that could be accessed from the home page, the cost of lawyer participation and the existence of fees required if a lawyer is selected through the referral service are often not apparent without signing up for the service.

[8] This is not to suggest that all metadata should be treated alike. For example, a Joint Court-Bar Committee of the United States District Court for the District of Maryland has issued a suggested protocol that defines and distinguishes between different kinds of metadata, only some of which are subject to routine production. See Suggested Protocol for Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, In re: Electronically Stored Information, ¶11 (D. Md.), www.mdd.uscourts.gov/localrules/localrules.html. The purpose of the protocol is "to facilitate the just, speedy, and inexpensive conduct of discovery involving [electronically stored information or 'ESI'] in civil cases, and to promote, whenever possible, the resolution of disputes regarding the discovery of ESI without Court intervention." Id. ¶1.

[9] In concluding that a lawyer may review metadata in documents produced in discovery (that is, unless and until the lawyer has actual knowledge that the metadata contains protected information), we do not intend to suggest that a lawyer must undertake such a review. Whether as a matter of courtesy, reciprocity, or efficiency,"a lawyer may decline to retain or use documents that the lawyer might otherwise be entitled to use, although (depending on the significance of the documents) this might be a matter on which consultation with the client may be necessary." D.C. Ethics Op. 256, n.7 (citing D.C. Rules 1.2(a) and 1.4(b)); see also D.C. Ethics Op. 318, n.5.

[10] When in litigation, an attorney must comply with the applicable rules of procedure of the court in which the litigation resides. In this regard, for example, Rule 26(b)(5)(B) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure requires a lawyer who is informed by opposing counsel that an allegedly privileged document was produced, to return, sequester or destroy the document until the court adjudicates the claim of privilege. See also D.C. Rule 3.4(c) (requiring a lawyer to comply with the rules of a presiding tribunal).

The common elements among the inquiries included the following: (1) the services do not charge a fee to the prospective client or consumer; (2) they charge, instead, a flat fee for lawyers to participate in the service; (3) they require that the fees charged by the lawyers to clients secured through the referral service not be higher than fees charged to clients who do not use the referral service; (4) they provide guidelines on the type of information that participating lawyers must provide; (5) they adopt specific qualification requirements for lawyers to participate (e.g., certificates of specialties, malpractice insurance, minimum number of years of practice); (6) they include disclaimers to prospective clients that the lawyer is responsible for the content of the description of the lawyer's services; and (7) they provide disclaimers stating that the referral service does not provide legal advice or recommend a particular lawyer. In addition, none of the referral services reviewed appear to solicit prospective clients by "in-person contact."[1] While the referral services advertise in a variety of media, the consumer or the prospective client must initiate the contact with the referral service to receive any referrals.

Background

Rule 7.1 of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct governs all communications regarding a lawyer's services, including advertising. The Rule prohibits a lawyer from making a false or misleading communication about her services and imposes certain limits on in-person solicitation.[2]

Prior to February 1, 2007, D.C. Rule 7.1(b) permitted lawyers to use paid intermediaries to make in-person contact with prospective clients, so long as the lawyer reasonably knew that such solicitation was consistent with the intermediary's contractual or other legal obligations and the lawyer took reasonable steps to ensure that the potential client was informed about how much the intermediary was paid and the effect, if any, of the payment on the lawyer's total fee.[3] The current version of D.C. Rule 7.1(b) no longer permits the use of paid intermediaries. "A lawyer shall not give anything of value to a person (other than the lawyer's partner or employee) for recommending the lawyer's services through in-person contact." D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(2). Comment [5] explicitly states that a "lawyer is no longer permitted to conduct in-person solicitation through the use of a paid intermediary."

The District of Columbia Bar Rules of Professional Conduct Review Committee recommended this change for two reasons:

> First, lawyer advertising in now widespread, reaching diverse communities in the District of Columbia, including non-English speakers and immigrants. Concerns that certain persons, without the intervention of a paid intermediary, would be unable to locate a lawyer to hire, should no longer exist. Second, there is reason to believe that at least some paid intermediaries, who are effectively beyond the power of the Bar to regulate, have used harassing, abusive, or unseemly practices in soliciting potential clients for lawyers.

District of Columbia Bar Rules of Professional Conduct Review Committee, Proposed Amendments to the District to Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct: Final Report and Recommendations (Clean Copy) 179 (June 21, 2005; revised Oct. 6, 2005).

While we have not previously addressed an inquiry about Internet-based referral services that charge lawyers a fee for participating, we have addressed similar or analogous inquires. All of those inquiries have been resolved, at least in part, with references to the now prohibited practice of using paid intermediaries. See, e.g., D.C. Ethics Ops. 261 (1995), 286 (1998), 302 (2000), & 307 (2001). Thus, our conclusions reached in these prior opinions must be read and reassessed in light of the recent amendments to D.C. Rule 7.1.

There are three principal differences between the Model Rules (and those of other jurisdictions) and D.C. Rule 7.1 that are relevant to the inquiries. First, D.C. Rule 7.1 is more permissive than the Model Rule with respect to lawyer solicitation. Model Rule 7.3 generally prohibits a lawyer from engaging in any in-person solicitation of potential clients (which the Model Rules define to include both live telephone calls and "real-time electronic contact") unless the potential client is either a lawyer or has a pre-existing relationship with the contacting lawyer. By contrast, in the District of Columbia, Rule 7.1 permits a lawyer to make such in-person solicitations so long as the lawyer's claims are not misleading, the solicitation does not involve the use of coercion, duress, or harassment, and the potential client has the capacity to make reasoned judgments regarding the selection of a lawyer. See D.C. Rule 7.1(b).[4]

---

[1] "In-person contact" or solicitation "include[s] telephone contact but not electronic mail." D.C. Rule 7.1, Comment [5].

[2] As amended, D.C. Rule 7.1 states in pertinent part that:

> (a) A lawyer shall not make a false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services. A communication is false or misleading if it:
>
> (1) Contains a material misrepresentation of fact or law, or omits a fact necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading; or
>
> (2) Contains an assertion about the lawyer or the lawyer's services that cannot be substantiated.
>
> (b) (1) A lawyer shall not seek by in-person contact, employment (or employment of a partner or associate) by a nonlawyer who has not sought the lawyer's advice regarding employment of a lawyer, if:
>
> (A) The solicitation involves use of a statement or claim that is false or misleading, within the meaning of paragraph (a);
>
> (B) The solicitation involves the use of coercion, duress or harassment; or
>
> (C) The potential client is apparently in a physical or mental condition which would make it unlikely that the potential client could exercise reasonable, considered judgment as to the selection of a lawyer.
>
> (2) A lawyer shall not give anything of value to a person (other than the lawyer's partner or employee) for recommending the lawyer's services through in-person contact.
>
> (c) A lawyer shall not knowingly assist an organization that furnishes or pays for legal services to others to promote the use of the lawyer's services or those of the lawyer's partner or associate, or any other lawyer affiliated with the lawyer or the lawyer's firm, as a private practitioner, if the promotional activity involves the use of coercion, duress, compulsion, intimidation, threats, or vexatious or harassing conduct.

[3] The prior version of D.C. Rule 7.1 included the following language:

> (b) A lawyer shall not seek by in-person contact, or through an intermediary, employment (or employment of a partner or associate) by a nonlawyer who has not sought the lawyer's advice regarding employment of a lawyer, if:
>
> . . . .
>
> (4) The solicitation involves use of an intermediary and the lawyer knows or could reasonably ascertain that such conduct violates the intermediary's contractual or other legal obligations; or
>
> (5) The solicitation involves the use of an intermediary and the lawyer has not taken all reasonable steps to ensure that the potential client is informed of (a) the consideration, if any, paid or to be paid by the lawyer to the intermediary, and (b) the effect, if any, of the payment to the intermediary on the total fee to be charged.

[4] Lawyers should be aware that substantive law may limit certain solicitation practices in particular circumstances. See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-3225.14 (limiting the ability of lawyers and other "practitioners," whether directly or through a paid intermediary, to solicit clients during the 21-day period following a motor vehicle accident).

Second, the D.C. Rule 7.1 is less restrictive than other jurisdictions in regulating advertising. The rule only requires that advertising not contain misrepresentations of fact or law or assertions that cannot be substantiated. See D.C. Rule 7.1(a). Comment [4] further states that any restrictions beyond these limited requirements impose barriers to the flow of information about lawyers' services. Although Model Rule 7.2 is similar in this regard, other jurisdictions are much more restrictive. See, e.g., Iowa Rule of Professional Conduct 32:7.2 Advertising.

Finally, D.C. Rule 7.1 differs from the Model Rule regarding participation in lawyer referral programs. Both rules now prohibit a lawyer from paying a person to recommend her services (e.g., intermediaries), and both rules carve out an exception for referral services. Model Rule 7.2, however, states that a lawyer may "pay the usual charges of . . . a not-for-profit or qualified lawyer referral service" (emphasis added). A "qualified lawyer referral service" is defined as one that "has been approved by an appropriate regulatory authority." Model Rule 7.2(b)(2). Comment [6] to D.C. Rule 7.1, on the other hand, simply states that "a lawyer may participate in lawyer referral programs and pay the usual fees charged by such programs." Thus, the D.C. Rule, which was adapted from the Model Rule, specifically omitted wording that would limit payment of fees only to not-for-profit referral services or to services that are otherwise regulated by appropriate authorities.[5]

Discussion

In the District of Columbia, questions regarding a lawyer's participation in an Internet-based referral service are no different than any other question about lawyer communications regarding legal services. We have previously said that "we see nothing untoward in lawyers communicating about their services through web sites, provided that such communications comply with our general rules governing lawyer communications with clients." D.C. Ethics Op. 302. Such communications are governed by D.C. Rule 7.1.

As an initial matter, the rule requires lawyers to ensure that their listings with the referral services, and any statements made by the referral services about the lawyers' services, satisfy D.C. Rule 7.1(a). Thus, the lawyers must ensure that the communications about their services provided by the referral service are neither false nor misleading and that any affirmative statements about their legal services can be substantiated. See D.C. Ethics Op. 249 (1994). The referral programs under review request information such as the following: office locations; contact information; years of practice; certificates of specialty if the State Bar recognizes specializations; current areas of practice; certificate of malpractice insurance; and current bar memberships. Our rules expressly permit the public dissemination of this type of information.[6]

The referral service must also conform to the requirements of D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(2), which prohibits a lawyer from giving "anything of value to a person (other than the lawyer's partner or employee) for recommending the lawyer's services through in-person contact." As previously discussed, this language was added to make clear that use of paid intermediaries in the District of Columbia is now prohibited. Notwithstanding this change to the text of the rule, the relevant language in the Comments remains unchanged, and it states that "a lawyer may participate in lawyer referral programs and pay the usual fees charged by such a programs." D.C. Rule 7.1, Comment [6]. Thus, Rule 7.1(b)(2) was not intended to curtail participation in fee charging referral programs, but, rather, to stop lawyers from using paid intermediaries to make in-person solicitations. The key distinction between referral programs and paid intermediaries is that referral programs do not generally engage in unsolicited in-person contact with prospective clients.

Each of the referral programs described by the inquirers requires that the prospective client initiate contact with the referral service to receive any information about a prospective lawyer. While the referral services advertise through websites and other media outlets, none of them initiates unsolicited in-person communications with prospective clients. Instead, the inquirers all described Internet-based services through which prospective clients can electronically request a referral. For some services, the prospective client can call the referral service for technical assistance in using the web site to request a referral. Others allow the prospective client to either submit the request electronically, or call the service to receive referrals. But none of the services engage in any unsolicited contact with prospective clients.[7]

Each referral service also informs the prospective client that the service is simply providing a list of available lawyers and is not recommending any particular lawyer. In many cases, the service provides multiple random referrals for each request. While the particular programs described in the inquiries we received do not recommend any specific lawyers when they transmit the names to potential clients, we do not believe that our conclusions would change if these programs were to make specific recommendations. Such recommendations would, however, be subject to scrutiny under Rule 7.1(a). Specifically, we believe that a service that recommends a lawyer without offering any explanation of the basis for the recommendation could be misleading, particularly if the service simply recommends any lawyer who pays a fee. However, if the basis for the recommendation is clearly explained, such advertising is unlikely to run afoul of Rule 7.1(a).[8]

With respect to fees, the programs described by the inquirers require of each lawyer a flat fee to participate or to have information listed with the service for a specified period of time. Such fees are permissible if they are "the usual fees charged by such programs." D.C. Rule

[5] Because the Internet crosses jurisdictional boundaries, and because we rely on unique aspects of the District of Columbia Rules, lawyers who accept referrals should exercise particular care when doing so from clients based in, or regarding matters arising out of, other jurisdictions, because the rules of those jurisdictions may apply. See D.C. Rule 8.5(b), D.C. Ethics Op. 311 (2002).

[6] "This rule permits public dissemination of information concerning a lawyer's name or firm name, address, and telephone number; the kinds of services the lawyer will undertake; the basis on which the lawyer's fees are determined, including prices for specific services and payment and credit arrangements; a lawyer's foreign language ability; names of references and, with their consent, names of clients regularly represented; and other information that might invite the attention of those seeking legal assistance." D.C. Rule 7.1, Comment [3].

[7] Because most of these services allow referrals to be made over the telephone, the communications arguably fall within the definition of "in-person" solicitation under the D.C. Rules. But we interpret the prohibition in D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(2) against paying a person for recommending the lawyer's services through in-person contact not to extend to situations in which a prospective client makes a telephone call to a referral service and affirmatively requests a name or names of lawyers. We do not believe that D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(2) was intended to prohibit a lawyer from paying to participate in a referral service in which the prospective client initiates the contact, expressly seeking lawyer referrals.

[8] The location of such an explanation is likely to vary from web site to web site depending on the design. We have cautioned before that, "because web pages allow multi-layered communications, questions may arise about whether a visitor to a web page may be misled because relevant disclosures are hidden many clicks away from the main pages." D.C. Ethics Op. 302.

7.1, Comment [6]. What is "usual" will vary over time and among different services based on the costs of operating them. At a minimum, "usual" means that the fees fall within a range of fees charged by comparable services.

D.C. Rule 5.4 generally prohibits lawyers from "sharing" fees with nonlawyers. The purpose of this prohibition is to "protect the lawyer's professional independence of judgment." D.C. Rule 5.4, Comment [1]. Although some of the referral programs make the payment of a fee contingent upon securing a client from the referral, none of them makes the fee contingent on the outcome of the case or on the amount of the legal fees. As we explained in Opinion 286, "[a] non-contingent payment for the referral of legal business, i.e., one that is paid regardless of the success or outcome of the representation, is not a division of legal fees. Such payments are simply part of a lawyer's marketing expenses, payable whether or not they produce revenue for the lawyer."[9] Thus, we conclude that a flat fee for transmittals, or for each client secured, does not violate either D.C. Rule 7.1 or 5.4.

In Opinion 307, we considered a referral system operated by the federal government. That referral program required that a law firm bidding to participate on a schedule contract to provide legal services to a government agency pay one percent of the fee income generated in order to cover the costs of the referral program. We concluded that > the drafters of the D.C. Rules were not particularly concerned about the manner in which non-profit lawyer referral services structured their fee arrangements; their principal focus was on preventing non-lawyer intermediaries from using their power over lawyers who rely on them for business referrals to influence those lawyers' "professional independence of judgment." D.C. Rule 5.4, Comment [1].

We went on to recognize that "the development of referral schemes that do not compromise lawyers' independence [is] a positive development, though we recognize that our Rules are less clear than they could be on this issue." D.C. Ethics Op. 307. The recent amendments to D.C. Rule 5.4 now expressly allow a lawyer to share legal fees "with a nonprofit organization that employed, retained, or recommended employment of the lawyer in the matter and that qualifies under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code." D.C. Rule 5.4(a)(5).[10]

Thus, while there is no distinction between not-for-profit and for-profit referral services in D.C. Rule 7.1, D.C. Rule 5.4 does make a distinction between not-for-profit and for-profit programs with respect to fee sharing. But as long as the lawyers participating in a for-profit Internet-based referral program pay a flat fee, or a flat fee per transmittal, rather than a portion of the fees earned from the client, D.C. Rule 5.4 is not violated.

Finally, all of the inquiries we received made clear that none of the participating lawyers would have any financial interest in the referral service. Nor would any participating lawyer have any employment or contractual relationship with the referral service provider even where the provider was a large entity with other business interests. If such a relationship were to exist, it would likely prove problematic under D.C. Rule 5.4(b).

In sum, the amended D.C. Rules prohibit a lawyer from conducting, "in-person solicitation through the use of a paid intermediary," but allow a lawyer to "participate in lawyer referral programs and pay the usual fees charged by such programs." See D.C. Rule 7.1, Comments [5] and [6]. Thus, we conclude that participation in lawyer referral programs, like those described above, that conform to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct in general, and to D.C. Rules 7.1 and 5.4 in particular, is permitted.

Inquiry Nos. 06-01-24 and 06-08-11
Published: November 2007

Opinion No. 343

Application of the "Substantial Relationship" Test When Attorneys Participate in Only Discrete Aspects of a New Matter

• A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter is prohibited from representing another person in the same or substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client, unless the former client gives informed consent. Two matters are "substantially related" to one another if there is a substantial risk that confidential factual information as would normally have been obtained in the prior representation is useful or relevant in advancing the client's position in the new matter. Subject to certain conditions, a lawyer may limit the scope of the new representation such that factual information normally obtained in the prior matter would be legally irrelevant to the advancement of the current client's position in the new matter. Specifically, by agreeing only to represent a client as to a discrete legal issue or with respect to a discrete stage in the litigation, a lawyer may be able to limit the scope of the representation such that the new matter is not substantially related to the prior matter. Restrictions on the scope of the representation that effectively ensure that there is no substantial risk that confidential factual information as would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would be useful or relevant to advance the client's position in the new matter may, under certain circumstances, be sufficient to avoid a conflict of interest.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
• Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
• Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification: General Rule)

Inquiry

We have received a number of inquiries that present the general question whether lawyers may limit their participation in a matter in such a way that the current matter is not substantially related to a prior matter in which they represented a former client whose interests are adverse to those of the current client. In other words, even though the overall representation of the current client may be substantially related to the prior representation, we have been asked whether lawyers may nonetheless limit their own participation in the new representation such that the specific matter on which they are representing the current client is not substantially related to the prior matter in which they had represented the former client.

In considering this important question, we find it useful to distinguish between two ways in which a lawyer may be able to limit her participation in a case: First, a client may want a lawyer to represent it as to a discrete legal issue as part of a larger legal representation whose interests are adverse to the lawyer's former client, where the specific legal issue is one that is entirely distinct from the matter in which the lawyer (or the lawyer's law firm) had previously represented a former client. For example, Lawyer is an expert in patent law. Client hired Lawyer to advise and represent Client in obtaining all of the rights under a particular patent through an assignment from the original patent holder. Sometime later, Client approaches Lawyer to represent it in a patent infringement suit against Company. However, Lawyer's law firm has previously represented Company in a different patent infringement case involving the same underlying technology. Lawyer informs Client that she cannot participate in the patent infringement action against Company but that she could represent Client on the limited question whether Client's own patent had been properly assigned to it. In other words, Lawyer would represent Client only to the extent that Company asserts that Client lacks standing to pursue the infringement claim on the grounds that the patent had not been properly assigned. Client would hire other lawyers to prosecute its infringement claims. Given that Lawyer's participation would be limited only to whether the patent had been properly assigned to Client rather than to whether Company had infringed that patent, would such a limited representation be permissible under D.C. Rule 1.9 even without Company's informed consent? If so, what precautions or conditions would Lawyer need to take into account?

[9] Opinion 286, along with other opinions discussing payments of fees for referrals (see, e.g., D.C. Ethics Op. 307), incorporated into its analysis of fee sharing an analysis of the District of Columbia's unique rule permitting the use of intermediaries. While the rule no longer permits the use of intermediaries, the reasoning of these opinions with respect to fee sharing remains sound.

[10] The rule change only addressed nonprofit organizations that qualify under section 501(c)(3); Opinion 307 continues to apply with respect to government referral services.

Second, a client may want to hire a lawyer to represent it as to a discrete stage in the litigation – one that presents a pure question of law that would not involve the lawyer in any factual issues. For example, Lawyer has been asked to represent Client who is interested in filing a petition for certiorari with the United States Supreme Court to challenge a decision of the court of appeals on the grounds that the appellate court lacked jurisdiction over the particular claim. Lawyer and her firm did not represent Client at trial, where Client had filed suit against Company. Some years earlier, other lawyers in Lawyer's firm had defended Company in litigation involving some of the same facts as the current litigation. Lawyer proposes to limit the scope of her representation of Client to preparing a petition for certiorari, merits briefs, and oral argument in the Supreme Court to raise a narrow question of appellate jurisdiction. The scope of her representation would be limited to the Supreme Court proceedings; she would not represent Client should the matter be remanded or, for that matter, should there be any settlement discussions or other proceedings relating to the underlying litigation. Other lawyers represented Client in the lower-court proceedings and would remain involved with the case. Lawyer believes that the issues to be presented at this stage of the proceedings are distinct matters of federal law and that nothing that Lawyer's colleagues might have learned in the prior litigation would be relevant or useful to the legal arguments presented to the Supreme Court. Assuming Client is willing to consent to the circumscribed scope of Lawyer's representation, would it be permissible for Lawyer to represent Client in this matter, consistent with her obligations under the Rules of Professional Conduct?

Background

The application of the "substantial relationship" test is one of the most difficult and contentious issues that a lawyer must face when considering whether he or she may represent a client whose interests are adverse to those of a former client. On one hand, by limiting the scope of prohibited matters to those that are the same as or substantially related to the matter in which the lawyer represented the former client, D.C. Rule 1.9 makes clear that it does not intend to prohibit all representations that may be adverse to the interest of a former client. In other words, there are clearly some matters—those that are neither the same as nor substantially related to the prior matter—that a lawyer may take on even if doing so requires the advancement of interests that are adverse to those of a former client. This clearly reflects a policy judgment that clients ought generally to be free to engage the lawyers of their choice. On the other hand, D.C. Rule 1.9 also reflects the judgment that a lawyer should not be permitted (without the former client's informed consent) to take on a matter adverse to the interests of the former client when doing so would put the lawyer in a position of using knowledge obtained in the prior representation against the interests of the former client.

D.C. Rule 1.9 provides that "[a] lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent." According to a new comment that became effective in 2007, matters are "substantially related" for purposes of this rule > if they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or if there otherwise is a substantial risk that confidential factual information as would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter. . . A conclusion about the possession of such information may be based on the nature of the services the lawyer provided the former client and information that would in ordinary practice be learned by a lawyer providing such services."

D.C. Rule 1.9, Comment [3] (emphasis added).

The commentary to D.C. Rule 1.9 expressly incorporates by reference District of Columbia and federal case law on the substantial-relatedness test, see, e.g., Brown v. District of Columbia Board of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37 (D.C. 1984) (en banc); T.C. Theatre Corp. v. Warner Brothers Pictures, 113 F. Supp. 265 (S.D.N.Y. 1953). The restrictions imposed by D.C. Rule 1.9 are grounded in the obligations imposed by D.C. Rule 1.6 to protect client confidences and secrets. See D.C. Ethics Op. 239 (1993). Commentators agree that the function of the substantial-relationship test is to protect client confidences. See Charles W. Wolfram, Former-Client Conflicts, 10 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 677, 685-89 (1997). According to Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr. and W. William Hodes, "most modern authority holds that 'substantial relationship' is itself essentially a shorthand for not abusing the former client's confidences." The Law of Lawyering § 13.5 (Aspen 3d ed. 2000).[1]

The leading case in the District of Columbia regarding the substantial-relationship test is Brown v. District of Columbia Board of Zoning Adjustment. The Brown case involved a series of transactions concerning the same parties,

[1] The Restatement notes that a legal position taken in representing a former client ordinarily is not considered to be a substantially related matter unless the underlying facts are also related. See Restatement (THIRD) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 132 cmt. D (2007). Thus, for example, a lawyer can argue that a statute is constitutional on behalf of one client and is unconstitutional in representing a subsequent client in a case not involving the former client.

the same property, and similar objectives. Petitioners moved to disqualify two former D.C. Corporation Counsel attorneys who had represented the District of Columbia in connection with issues involving the property during their government service. The Brown opinion heavily relied on the analysis in Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. Gulf Oil Corp., 588 F.2d 221, 225 (7th Cir. 1978). According to Westinghouse, two matters will be substantially related when confidential client information provided to counsel in a prior matter "is relevant to the issues raised in the litigation pending against the former client."[2] Id. at 225. Moreover, when evidence demonstrates that counsel may have had access to information that might be relevant or useful in the second case, "[r]ebuttal evidence must therefore focus on 'the scope of the legal representation' involved in each matter and not on the actual receipt of. . . information." Id. at 224 (cited with approval in Brown, 486 A.2d at 50).

In Brown, the factual overlap between the transactions was sufficient for the court to conclude that the moving party had established a prima facie case for disqualification, shifting the burden of rebutting the inference to the former Corporation Counsel attorneys and their law firm. The court ultimately held that the former government attorneys successfully rebutted the inference by demonstrating that none of the information presented in the earlier proceedings would have benefited the property owner in the current proceeding. Thus, the court affirmed the finding of the Board of Zoning Appeals that disqualification was not required.

There are two additional decisions by courts in the District of Columbia that are relevant, and both of them involve former government officials. In In re Sofaer, 728 A.2d 625 (D.C. 1999), the respondent was disciplined for representing the government of Libya in a matter in which he participated as Legal Advisor of the State Department. The respondent claimed that the substantial-relationship test did not apply because of the limited scope of the current representation. The court addressed that argument in the following terms:

> Respondent insists that he stayed clear of that overlap by restricting the terms of his agreement to represent Libya so as to "assum[e] Libya's culpability for the [Pan Am 103] bombing." A lawyer may, of course, limit the objectives of a representation with client consent. Rule 1.2(c). But respondent's retainer agreement exemplifies why, in our view, limiting the private representation rarely will succeed in avoiding the convergence addressed by Rule 1.11(a). While stating that "[the firm's] efforts will not include substantial activities as litigators but rather would be limited to activities associated with agreed upon measures, including consensual dispositions," the agreement emphasized that "[m]easures will be taken only with your [i.e., Libya's] prior consent, and without admission of liability" (emphasis added). The proposed activities included "investigating the facts and legal proceedings, preparing legal analyses, providing legal advice and proposing legal steps to deal with" the "ongoing civil and criminal disputes and litigation" stemming from the destruction of Pan Am 103—all clearly features of a comprehensive attorney-client relationship. We do not question the sincerity of respondent's belief that the representation could be insulated, factually and ethically, from the investigation and diplomatic efforts of which he had been part. The "substantially related" test by its terms, however, is meant to induce a former government lawyer considering a representation to err well on the side of caution. Respondent did not do so.

Id. at 628.

In United States v. Philip Morris Inc., 312 F. Supp. 2d 27 (D.D.C. 2004), the Government had brought a fraud and RICO suit against nine cigarette manufacturing companies and two tobacco trade associations. A former Department of Justice attorney, who had provided legal advice to the FDA and HHS during the Youth Tobacco rulemaking proceeding and then participated on behalf of the government in defending the regulation in court, filed a motion to intervene on behalf of an Australian affiliate of British American Tobacco in the fraud and RICO case. In ruling on the government's motion for disqualification, the court was persuaded that information obtained by the former government attorney in the FDA litigation would assist him in developing strategy and arguments to rebut the Government's claims, and the court refused to accept that the risk of misusing Government information was nonexistent. Id. at 42–43. Instead, citing the Brown decision, the court said that any case involving close questions about whether particular confidences would be pertinent require disqualification of former government lawyers. Id. at 45.[3]

Discussion

The D.C. Rules generally permit a lawyer, with the informed consent of the client, to "limit the objective of the representation." See Rule 1.2(c).[4] We have expressly recognized "that a client may, if fully informed and freely consenting, contract for limited service arrangements with a legal services provider." D.C. Ethics Op. 330 (2005). "The objectives or scope of services provided by the lawyer may be limited by agreement with the client or by terms under which the lawyer's services are made available to the client. For example, a retainer may be for a specifically defined purpose." Rule 1.2, Comment [4]. The Westinghouse and Brown opinions both recognize that the scope of representation provided to a client is a critical factor in determining whether two matters are substantially related.

In discussing joint representation of clients, Comment [4] to D.C. Rule 1.7 explains that lawyers may limit their representation to avoid adversity, such as by agreeing to represent multiple clients in the liability phase of a case, but not in the [2] As applied to a former government attorney, the Brown court broadened the test and deemed two matters to be substantially related if the confidential information of the former client was relevant or useful in the current representation. Brown, 486 A.2d at 49.

[3] Although not directly relevant, Laker Airways Limited v. Pan American World Airways, 103 F.R.D. 22, 38–42 (D.D.C. 1984), contains a useful discussion of the applicability of the substantial-relationship test under the predecessor of D.C. Rule 1.9. In Laker Airways, Judge Greene concluded that there was not a substantial relationship between a lawyer's representation of an airline on matters concerning the general antitrust immunity of the International Air Transport Association (IATA) and the same lawyer's later antitrust suit against the same airline for conspiring at an IATA conference to engage in illegal price fixing. Although both representations "involve[d] IATA, its organization, operation and activities," Judge Greene held that these facts were mere "resemblances" that were "general and superficial" and insufficient to satisfy the substantial-relationship test. Id. at 40.

[4] Similarly, the ABA's Model Rule 1.2(c) provides that "[a] lawyer may limit the scope of the representation if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances and the client gives informed consent." Cf. D.C. Rule 1.2 cmt. 5 ("An agreement concerning the scope of representation must accord with the Rules of Professional Conduct and other law. Thus, the client may not be asked to agree to representation so limited in scope as to violate Rule 1.1, or to surrender the right to terminate the lawyer's services or the right to settle litigation that the lawyer might wish to continue."). Moreover, as required by D.C. Rule 1.4(b), a lawyer must explain to the client the benefits and drawbacks of the limited scope relationship so that the client has sufficient information to make an informed decision regarding the representation. Cf. ABA Comm. On Ethics and Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 07-447 (2007).

damages phase. Other ethics committees and authorities have acknowledged that limiting the scope of representation may eliminate adversity, such that a lawyer can continue representing a client whose position is otherwise adverse to a former client. See ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Responsibility 51:221 ("Adversity may sometimes be avoided by limiting the scope of the current representation to avoid clashing with a former client's interests, as long as the current client gives informed consent."); Wolfram, supra, at 736; see also New York City Bar Op. 2001-3 (explaining that a lawyer may be able to avoid adversity by limiting the representation to certain claims or by helping the client find other representation for issues in a case that would cause a conflict).[5] The Restatement likewise suggests that "the lawyer may limit the scope of representation of a later client so as to avoid representation substantially related to that undertaken for a previous client." Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers at § 132 cmt. E (2007). The Restatement illustrates this comment with an example in which a lawyer agrees to restrict the scope of representation of Client B so that confidential information obtained from Client A in a prior representation would not be relevant to the subsequent representation. With that limitation, the representation of Client B would not be adverse.

Both of the categories discussed below present an example of how a lawyer may avoid creating a conflict of interest under D.C. Rule 1.9 by participating in a discrete aspect of a particular matter.[6] However, it is critical to note that these examples present a rather idealized set of circumstances. The fact that a conflict of interest may potentially be avoided does not, of course, mean that such conflicts can actually be avoided under a specific set of facts that a lawyer may actually face. We shall, therefore, endeavor to identify below which facts are important in determining whether a conflict under D.C. Rule 1.9 can actually be avoided.

A. Limiting Participation by Representing a Client Only on a Discrete Legal Issue

Our first category involves a lawyer who is hired only to represent a client on a discrete legal question. Our example involves Lawyer, whom Client would like to hire on the question of defending Client's patent against claims by the defendant Company that the patent had not been properly assigned to Client in advance of Client's bringing suit. Because Lawyer's law firm had previously represented Company in a different case involving infringement claims based on the same underlying technology, Lawyer has sought to limit the scope of her representation so that she represents Client only on the assignment question. Client would be separately represented by other counsel on the claims that Company has infringed Client's patent.[7]

To the extent that Lawyer's participation in the lawsuit can genuinely be limited to the assignment issues, Lawyer's participation in the lawsuit would not violate D.C. Rule 1.9. The matter on which Lawyer represents Client is not substantially related to the matter on which Lawyer's law firm had previously represented Company. We caution, however, that Lawyer must ensure that her participation in the case never extends to the patent infringement issues. Indeed, it would be essential to maintain wholly separate litigation teams to handle the two sides of this case. Such a structure is likely to be unusual, and Lawyer would be expected to explain all of this prior to obtaining Client's consent. But if Client is prepared to accept the costs and inefficiencies that such a rigid and artificial division would require—and assuming, of course, that Lawyer can provide competent representation under these conditions—such a limited representation would not run afoul of D.C. Rule 1.9.

B. Limiting Participation by Representing a Client Only at a Discrete Stage of Litigation

The second category of ways in which the scope of representation may be limited involves a lawyer's participation at a discrete stage in litigation. Client has sought to hire Lawyer for her expertise in Supreme Court litigation against Company where the only issue is a pure question of law that does not depend on the underlying factual record for resolution. Lawyer's law firm had previously represented Company in a matter that would be considered substantially related to the underlying litigation in this case. In other words, confidential information that would normally have been obtained by lawyers at Lawyer's law firm would have been relevant or useful to counsel for Client at trial or in assessing the value and wisdom of a settlement. So, without Company's consent, neither Lawyer nor her law firm could have represented Client at trial. But the question is whether the proposed limitations on the scope of the representation at this late stage in the litigation are sufficient to rebut the presumption that these two, factually related matters are, in fact, "substantially related" to one another within the meaning of D.C. Rule 1.9.

Lawyer and Client have agreed that Lawyer's engagement is limited to raising a question of federal jurisdiction in challenging the lower court's decision. This is a pure legal issue that was never part of the prior representation provided by Lawyer's firm to Company. Given the limited scope of Lawyer's representation, there is no basis to conclude that confidential information of Company that is imputed to Lawyer would be relevant to or useful in Lawyer's representation of Client.[8] Because the limitations on the scope of Lawyer's representation have eliminated virtually any risk that Company's confidential information would be used by Lawyer, we conclude that the two matters are not substantially related to one another and that D.C. Rule 1.9 does not, therefore, apply.[9]

[5] New York City Bar Op. 2001-3 ("[T]he scope of a lawyer's representation of a client may be limited in order to avoid a conflict that might otherwise result with a present or former client, provided that the client whose engagement is limited consents to the limitation after full disclosure and the limitation on the representation does not render the lawyer's counsel inadequate or diminish the zeal of the representation. An attorney whose representation has been limited, however, must be mindful of her duty of loyalty to both clients. Where the portion of the engagement to be carved out is discrete and limited in scope, such a limitation may well resolve the conflict presented.").

[6] Although we identify and discuss two specific examples of how a lawyer may limit the scope of representation to avoid creating a conflict of interest under D.C. Rule 1.9, we do not mean to suggest that these are the only two ways in which this issue may arise.

[7] We do not address here the separate issues that could arise when a lawyer's past work (or the past work of others in the lawyer's firm) becomes an issue in litigation between the lawyer's client and a third party and the lawyer is asked to represent the client in such litigation. Such a representation may raise issues under D.C. Rule 1.7(b)(4) implicating the lawyer's own business or personal interests as well as under D.C. Rule 3.7 concerning the lawyer's obligations as a potential witness.

[8] Although we have been assuming that the confidential information would not be relevant or useful in Lawyer's representation, it would certainly be advisable for the other lawyers in Lawyer's firm who were privy to such information from the prior case to avoid any involvement in the litigation before the Supreme Court. Although not required under our rules, such precautions would certainly make it easier for Lawyer to prove, for example, that no confidences or secrets were, in fact, disclosed or used in violation of D.C. Rule 1.6.

[9] Our conclusion here does not apply to discrete stages of the same matter. In other words, if

However, we note that even in litigation before the Supreme Court on what appears to be a purely legal issue, confidential factual information may turn out to be useful to a lawyer. Supreme Court cases are sometimes about narrow procedural questions—e.g., whether a case must be heard in state court rather than federal court—or about discrete, threshold legal issues—e.g., whether a particular statute gives a plaintiff standing to sue. But, at other times, the cases are about whether a particular party is entitled to prevail on the facts as presented and developed at trial. Even if such facts are "frozen" by the time the case reaches the Supreme Court, where a lawyer has (or is presumed to have) relevant information about the underlying facts from a prior representation of the adverse party, D.C. Rule 1.9 is likely triggered even if her representation were limited to the Supreme Court stage of the litigation. In other words, whether or not a lawyer may avoid a conflict under D.C. Rule 1.9 by limiting her participation to a discrete stage in the litigation will depend, at least in part, on the nature of the legal question that she is asked to present. The confidential information in the hands of other lawyers in Lawyer's firm, which is imputed to Lawyer and must therefore be presumed to be in Lawyer's possession, could well prove significant in the way she argues the case. In such situations, the matters would indeed be substantially related, and her representation would be improper unless the former client consents. But there are certainly those cases that turn on discrete, interlocutory questions of law that have nothing to do with the underlying merits of the case, and we believe that a lawyer's limiting the scope of her representation to such issues would likely not present a problem under D.C. Rule 1.9. We are mindful of the Court of Appeals' admonition in In re Sofaer, that even if a lawyer sincerely believes that his or her representation "could be insulated, factually and ethically," from the earlier representation, the belief might be mistaken. In that case, "[t]he 'substantially related' test by its terms,. . . is meant to induce a. . . lawyer considering a representation to err well on the side of caution." 728 A.2d at 628.

* * * * *

Even if it is permissible generally to restrict a representation to avoid substantial overlap with a prior representation, it may not be possible in a particular case. Private lawyers, like former government lawyers, should "err well on the side of caution." Id.[10] We have considered two different categories in which a lawyer may avoid the applicability of D.C. Rule 1.9—by agreeing only to represent a client as to a discrete legal issue and by agreeing to represent a client with respect to a discrete stage of the litigation. While we recognize that these categories can, under appropriate conditions, allow for lawyers to represent clients without violating D.C. Rule 1.9, we also appreciate that it may prove very difficult for lawyers to do so in fact. Where confidential information from the prior representation could be useful in or relevant to the new representation—however it may be limited or circumscribed—then the substantial-relationship test is satisfied, and the new representation may not proceed without the consent of the former client.

Inquiry No. 07-03-22
Published: February 2008

Opinion 344

Conflicts of Interest for Lawyers Engaged in Lobbying Activities That Are Not Deemed to Involve the Practice of Law

• The District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct regulate "lobbying activity" by lawyers who practice law in the District of Columbia. The conflicts rules for lobbying matters are as follows:

- Rule 1.7(a) prohibits one lawyer or law firm from advancing opposing positions in the same lobbying matter. This conflict cannot be waived.
- Lobbying representations are not subject to Rule 1.7(b)(1) because such representations are not "matters involving a specific party or parties," a phrase which excludes lobbying, rulemaking and other matters of general government policy.
- Rules 1.7(b)(2), (b)(3) and (b)(4) prohibit lobbying representations if:
  - The proposed representation is likely to be adversely affected by another representation;
  - Another representation is likely to be adversely affected by the proposed representation; or
  - The lawyer-lobbyist's professional judgment reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party, or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.
- Typically apparent in "punch-pulling" situations where the lawyer's zealousness in one representation may arguably be compromised by representations of other clients or by other interests of the lawyer, these conflicts can be waived in some circumstances through informed consent from the affected clients. See Rule 1.7(c).

Because nonlawyers may engage in lobbying activity, lawyers and their associates may remove such activities from the conflicts provisions of the Rules of Professional Conduct through strict compliance with the regulations of D.C. Rule 5.7 for "law-related services." To do so, however, the lobbying client must receive clear notice that the services are not legal services and that the usual protections accompanying a client–lawyer relationship do not apply.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.0(h) (Terminology: Definition of "Matter")

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)

• Rule 1.7 (Conflicts of Interest: General)

• Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification General Rule)

• Rule 1.11 (Successive Government and Private or Other Employment)

• Rule 5.3 (Responsibilities Regard-

Lawyer's law firm had represented Company at trial in the same case (as opposed to having represented Company in an entirely separate matter), Lawyer could not argue that she is free to represent the other side against Company in the Supreme Court on the grounds that the issues before the Court are entirely distinct from those on which Lawyer's colleagues had represented Company at trial. In such a circumstance, we believe that a lawyer who switches sides in the same case (albeit at a later stage where the issues are different) triggers the prohibitions of D.C. Rule 1.9, regardless of how a lawyer might limit the scope of representation in the subsequent stage of the matter.

[10] We do not intend this Opinion to address the application of the substantially related test to the specific situation of former government lawyers under D.C. Rule 1.11(a). Although we acknowledge that D.C. Rules 1.9 and 1.11 use the same terms to describe the relationship between former and current matters, cases involving the disqualification of former government lawyers also raise concerns about the possible misuse of information obtained under government authority and about actions taken to enhance the government lawyer's private sector employment prospects. See Brown, 486 A.2d at 43, cited with approval Philip Morris, 312 F. Supp. 2d at 38. In light of these and other concerns unique to the former government lawyer context, we leave for another day the question whether former government lawyers may limit the scope of their subsequent representation and thereby avoid a conflict of interest under D.C. Rule 1.11(a).

ing Nonlawyer Assistants)
• Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)
• Rule 5.7 (Responsibilities Regarding Law-Related Services)

Inquiry

The Committee on Unauthorized Practice of Law of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals (the "UPL Committee") recently issued an opinion concluding that "U.S. legislative lobbying does not constitute the practice of law under Rule 49, and Rule 49 does not require individuals engaged in such lobbying to be members of the D.C. Bar." Unauthorized Practice of Law Opinion 19-07, Applicability of Rule 49 to U.S. Legislative Lobbying (Dec. 17, 2007) [hereinafter the "UPL Opinion"]. In the wake of that opinion, the Legal Ethics Committee has received an inquiry about the obligations of a lawyer-lobbyist who is a member of the D.C. Bar. The inquirer asked whether a lawyer has a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7 when she lobbies Congress in favor of a special tax break for her Client X even though she knows the break will directly disadvantage the lawyer's other client, Client Y.

The specific holding of the UPL Opinion was that "U.S. legislative lobbying does not constitute the practice of law within the meaning of Rule 49(b)." For purposes of its opinion, the UPL Committee defined the phrase "U.S. legislative lobbying" in a way that "does not necessarily include all activities" related to congressional matters.[1] The UPL Opinion is narrowly drawn—activities outside the scope of this definition may constitute the practice of law.[2]

Having defined an area that does not involve the practice of law, the UPL Opinion confirms that nonlawyers may establish offices in the District of Columbia for the purpose of "U.S. legislative lobbying." Similarly, lawyers licensed in other jurisdictions, but not in the District of Columbia, may act as "U.S. legislative lobbyists" from offices in the District of Columbia. UPL Opinion, at 3-4.

Non-D.C. lawyers lobbying from the offices of law firms in the District of Columbia "must make clear that they are not engaged in the general practice of law in the District of Columbia." Id. at 4. This is so because Rule 49 prohibits persons not licensed in D.C. to "hold [themselves] out" as being authorized to practice law in D.C.[3] As the UPL Opinion notes, "[i]dentifying an individual as a lawyer in a D.C. law firm generally implies that the individual is authorized to practice law in the District of Columbia." UPL Opinion at 4. Consistent with the approach used for several other limited practice exceptions to Rule 49, the UPL Opinion suggests certain disclaimers and notices on business cards, websites and correspondence that will avoid any impermissible holding out. Id. at 4-5.

The UPL Committee specifically declined to address "whether or to what extent (a) legislative lobbyists may be subject to the professional obligations of lawyers or (b) communications between lobbyists and clients may be protected by the attorney–client privilege." UPL Opinion at 6. Like the UPL Committee, we also decline to address the applicability of the attorney–client privilege to communications between clients and lawyer-lobbyists.[4]

The immediate question before us is how Rule 1.7 on conflicts of interest applies to cases in which a lawyer undertakes a lobbying activity as a legal representation. The principles stated in this Opinion regarding conflicts of interest apply to lobbying activities related to both legislative matters and executive branch rulemaking matters. Implicit in the immediate question is the applicability of Rule 1.7 to lobbying services that do not themselves involve the practice of law but are provided by lawyers or nonlawyers affiliated with law firms.

Although the inquiry before us involves only lobbying before Congress, the established understanding of the phrase "involving a particular party or parties" means that the principles discussed in this opinion also apply to conflict-of-interest questions faced by lawyers who lobby other legislative bodies, or who lobby administrative agencies or executive branch officials on legislation, rulemaking or other matters of general policy. The Rules of Professional Conduct do not distinguish between lobbying at the federal level and lobbying at the state or local level.

Discussion

At one level, the inquiry asks whether lawyer conduct rules apply when nonlegal lobbying services are performed. As discussed in Part I below, the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct regulate "lobbying activity" when undertaken by lawyers. Specific conflict-of-interest rules apply to such activities. Part II discusses the ability of lawyers and law

[1] According to the UPL Committee,

> [t]his Opinion uses the term "U.S. legislative lobbying" to refer to any activities to influence, through contacts with members of Congress and their staffs, the passage or defeat of any legislation by the U.S. Congress, as well as other congressional actions such as ratification of treaties and confirmation of nominees. Such activities may include, but are not limited to: oral, written, and electronic communications with members of Congress, congressional committees, and congressional staff with regard to the formulation, modification, or adoption of federal legislation; preparation and planning activities, research, and other background work in support of such contacts; and development of legislative strategy and tactics. The term does not necessarily include all activities that have a relationship with congressional actions. For example, advising a client about how legislative testimony might affect pending or prospective criminal or civil litigation before a court may constitute the practice of law.

UPL Opinion at 1-2 (emphasis added). The UPL Opinion also "does not address lobbying of the executive branches of the U.S. or D.C. governments, including federal and D.C. departments and administrative agencies." Id. at 7 (noting that unauthorized practice of law questions respecting such representations are addressed in subsections (c)(2) and (c)(5) of Rule 49).

[2] While the UPL Opinion does not address whether individuals "may use the District of Columbia as a base for lobbying legislative bodies other than the U.S. Congress," it notes that "some of the principles addressed in this Opinion may apply in that context." UPL Opinion at 8.

[3] Holding out, for purposes of Rule 49, means:

> to indicate in any manner to any other person that one is competent, authorized, or available to practice law from an office or location in the District of Columbia. Among the characterizations which give such an indication are "Esq.," "lawyer," "attorney at law," "counselor at law," "contract lawyer," "trial or legal advocate," legal representative," "legal advocate," and "judge."

Rule 49(b)(4).

[4] The applicability of the attorney–client privilege is a question of law outside the scope of our jurisdiction. Lawyer-lobbyists should be aware, however, that there is case law to the effect that the attorney-client privilege does not apply to communications between a client and a lawyer who is acting solely or primarily as a lobbyist. See, e.g., In re Grand Jury Subpoenas Dated March 9, 2001, 179 F. Supp. 2d 270, 285 & 289-91 (S.D.N.Y. 2001) (noting, however, that "the inquiry is fact-specific"). The lawyer's ethical obligation to preserve client "confidences and secrets" is broader than the attorney-client privilege. Under Rule 1.6(b), lawyers must also protect unprivileged "secrets," which the rules define as "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental to the client."

firms to take certain steps to avoid the application of those conflict rules to lobbying and other "law-related services" under the District of Columbia's new Rule 5.7. Absent strict compliance with the requirements of Rule 5.7, the conflicts rules will apply to lobbying activities by D.C. lawyers, law firms, and their lobbying associates, partners and affiliates.

I. Prohibited Conflicts of Interest in Lobbying Activities Governed by the Rules of Professional Conduct

The Rules of Professional Conduct regulate a lawyer's "lobbying activity." Rule 1.0(h) defines "matter" to > mean[ ] any litigation, administrative proceeding, lobbying activity, application, claim, investigation, arrest, charge or accusation, the drafting of a contract, a negotiation, estate or family relations practice issue, or any other representation, except as expressly limited in a particular rule.

(emphasis added).[5] The last clause of this definition is critical because, as discussed below, lobbying matters are effectively excluded from the operation of one of the prohibitions of Rule 1.7, specifically subsection (b)(1). But lobbying matters remain subject to the rest of the prohibitions, specifically subsections (a), (b)(2), (b)(3) and (b)(4) of Rule 1.7.

Rule 1.7 governs conflicts among current clients of the lawyer or law firm. It divides such conflicts into two broad categories, those that may be waived and those that cannot be waived. Rule 1.7(a) defines a situation in which a proposed representation is absolutely prohibited, even if all potentially affected clients are willing to consent. Rule 1.7(b) defines four situations in which a representation is only conditionally prohibited. Representations governed by Rule 1.7(b) may be undertaken if each potentially affected client provides informed consent and the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each client. See Rule 1.7(c).

A. Rule 1.7(a)—Representation Absolutely Prohibited

Rule 1.7(a) provides that "a lawyer shall not advance two or more adverse positions in the same matter." This prohibition cannot be waived by the affected clients. It applies to lobbying activities by virtue of the underlying definition of "matter." Indeed, the Peters Committee, which recommended the current formulation of the rules on these issues, specifically concluded that lobbying opposite sides of the same issue should be prohibited:

> [T]he Committee rejected the concept that lobbying should be totally excluded from the reach of Rule 1.7 and expressly included lobbying in the definition of "matter" proposed in the Terminology section of the Rules. As a result, Rule 1.7(a) applies to lobbying activities and prevents a lawyer from lobbying for one position for one client in the same matter in which the lawyer (or the lawyer's firm, see Rule 1.10(a)) is lobbying for a conflicting position on behalf of a second client.

Peters Report at 18. Although ABA Model Rule 1.7 and D.C. Rule 1.7 "state the position differently, both rules prohibit the lawyer from advancing two adverse positions in the same matter or proceeding, even with the client's consent. [D.C.] Rule 1.7(a) states the position succinctly: 'A lawyer shall not advance two or more adverse positions in the same matter.'"[6]

The pending inquiry before the Committee does not involve Rule 1.7(a) because the lawyer-lobbyist has not been asked to advocate opposite sides of the same lobbying issue. Instead, she has been asked to pursue a tax break for Client X even though she knows that the tax break will directly disadvantage another client (Client Y) whom the lawyer (or the firm) is not representing in that particular lobbying matter.

B. Rule 1.7(b)—Representation Conditionally Prohibited

Rule 1.7(b) defines four conflicts situations in which a representation is prohibited unless each potentially affected client gives informed consent and the other requirements of Rule 1.7(c) are satisfied. As discussed below, the first of the four does not apply to lobbying matters. The remaining three do.

1. Rule 1.7(b)(1)—Adversity to Another Client in a Matter Involving a Specific Party or Parties

Rule 1.7(b)(1) provides:

> [A] lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if . . . that matter involves a specific party or parties and a position to be taken by that client in that matter is adverse to a position taken or to be taken by another client in the same matter even though that client is unrepresented or represented by a different lawyer.

Rule 1.7(b)(1) (emphasis added).

The inquirer did not say whether the lawyer expects the other client to lobby against the tax break she will be seeking for the first client. If the other client's active participation were expected in the lobbying matter, the representation of the first client would involve the lawyer taking a position known to be adverse to another client's position in the same matter.

However, that alone is not enough to create a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(1) because of the limitation of that rule to "matter[s] involv[ing] a specific party or parties." That phrase is a term of art, which, for the reasons discussed below, has the effect of removing lobbying representations from the operation of Rule 1.7(b)(1).

Part (a) explains why the limitation of Rule 1.7(b)(1) to "matter[s] involv[ing] a specific party or parties" effectively excludes lobbying representations. Part (b) summarizes the history of revisions that led to the current rule, a history which confirms the conclusion in Part (a).

a. Meaning of Phrase "Matter Involving a Specific Party or Parties"

The key to the analysis is the meaning of the phrase "matter involv[ing] a specific party or parties." The phrase appears in only two places in the Rules of Professional Conduct: Rule 1.7(b)(1) and Rule 1.11, which deals with the ability of a lawyer to represent clients after leaving government service for private practice. As discussed in Part (i) below, the phrase has a black-letter law meaning for purposes of Rule 1.11, a meaning that preceded incorporation of the phrase into Rule 1.7(b)(1) and that excludes lobbying matters from the conflicts rule. Under established principles of statutory and

---

[5] The D.C. Court of Appeals added this definition to the Rules in November 1996, after receiving and considering a number of recommendations from the Bar. See Proposed Amendments to the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct (as adopted by the Board of Governors March 8, 1994) [hereinafter "Peters Report"]. As discussed in more detail below, one purpose of the recommended changes was to revise and clarify the rules on conflicts of interest in the lobbying context. See id. at 3-4 & 17-18.

[6] William V. Luneburg & Thomas M. Susman, The Lobbying Manual: A Complete Guide to Federal Law Governing Lawyers & Lobbyists § 27-3.6.2.1, at 501 (3d Ed. 2005) (providing the following example of a "nonconsentable" conflict in the lobbying context: "Handgun Control, Inc. calls to retain you to lobby for an extension of the assault weapon ban; the NRA calls the next day to hire you to lobby against an extension.") regulatory construction, the phrase must have the same meaning in each rule where it appears, as discussed in Part (ii). While there is some arguably inconsistent language in one of the comments to Rule 1.7, the text of the rules controls over the comments, as discussed in Part (iii).

(i.) Meaning of the Phrase "Matter Involving a Specific Party or Parties" in Rule 1.11

Rule 1.11(g) confines the operation of the rule to a "matter involving a specific party or parties." "'Matter' is defined in paragraph (g) so as to encompass only matters that are particular to a specific party or parties. The making of rules of general applicability and the establishment of general policy will ordinarily not be a 'matter' within the meaning of Rule 1.11." Rule 1.11, Comment [3] (emphasis added).

This interpretation comes from the well-established understanding of the meaning of an analogous phrase in 18 U.S.C. § 207, which imposes certain restrictions on the work that may be performed by former government employees and officials after they leave government service. Some of those restrictions apply only to a "matter . . . involv[ing] a specific party or specific parties." 18 U.S.C. § 207(a)(1)(C) & (a)(2)(C). "Legislation or rulemaking of general applicability and the formulation of general policies, standards or objectives, or other matters of general applicability are not particular matters involving specific parties." Post-Employment Conflict of Interest Restrictions, 73 Fed. Reg. 36,168, at 36,193 (June 25, 2008) (to be codified at 5 C.F.R. § 2641.201(h)(2)) [hereinafter "Federal Post-Employment Conflict of Interest Restrictions"].[7]

In Opinion 297, we considered whether a former government lawyer's participation in a negotiated rulemaking precluded him from subsequent representations involving those rules. We concluded that, because the former government lawyer's work on a negotiated rulemaking did not involve a particular party or parties, "successive representation is not per se prohibited by Rule 1.11(a) and (g) where the initial representation is in connection with a rulemaking of general applicability." D.C. Ethics Op. 297 (2000).

(ii.) The Phrase "Matter Involving a Specific Party or Parties" Must Have the Same Meaning in Rule 1.7(b)(1) As It Has in Rule 1.11

The phrase "matter involving a specific party or parties" cannot have one meaning in Rule 1.11 and a different meaning in Rule 1.7(b)(1). As a general principle of construction, "a particular term should be assumed to have a consistent definition throughout a statute." Dupont Circle Citizens Ass'n v. District of Columbia Board of Zoning Adjustment, 749 A.2d 1248, 1263 n.12 (D.C. 2000) (citing Carey v. Crane Serv. Co., Inc., 457 A.2d 1102, 1108 (D.C.1983)). Application of that principle compels the conclusion that Rule 1.7(b)(1) excludes legislative lobbying matters.

Moreover, the phrase had a clear meaning in the context of former government lawyers long before it was ever added to Rule 1.7. Where the lawmaker "borrows terms of art in which are accumulated the legal tradition and meanings of centuries of practice, it presumably knows and adopts the cluster of ideas that were attached to each borrowed word in the body of learning from which it was taken." 1618 Twenty-First Street Tenants' Ass'n v. Phillips Collection, 829 A.2d 201, 202 (D.C. 2003) (quoting Bates v. District of Columbia Bd. Of Elections & Ethics, 625 A.2d 891, 894 (D.C. 1993)) (additional citations omitted).

Applying those principles here, the phrase "matter involv[ing] a specific party or parties" must be given the same meaning for purposes of Rule 1.7(b)(1) as it has for Rule 1.11 and the progenitor of Rule 1.11, 18 U.S.C. § 207. Given the well-established meaning of that phrase for purposes of Rule 1.11 and 18 U.S.C. § 207, Rule 1.7(b)(1) does not apply to lobbying representations involving legislation, rulemaking or other matters of general policy.

(iii.) The Text of Rule 1.7(b)(1) Controls Over Any Inconsistent Language in the Comments to Rule 1.7.

The analysis thus far has focused only on the text of Rule 1.7(b)(1), Rule 1.11, and the established meaning of the phrase "matter involving a specific party or parties" as used in Rule 1.11 and its predecessors. Rule 1.7 has a comment which, if read in isolation, could suggest a greater duty under Rule 1.7(b)(1) when the lawyer knows or has some way of discovering that another client is likely to oppose or disagree with the result being sought through the lawyer's lobbying efforts.[8]

[7] This final rule release replaces a similar rule which provided that a matter involving a specific party or specific parties "typically involves a specific proceeding affecting the legal rights of the parties or an isolatable transaction or related set of transactions between identifiable parties. Rulemaking, legislation, the formulation of general policy, standards or objectives, or other action of general application is not such a matter. 5 C.F.R. § 2637.201(c)(1) (2007) (emphasis added). See also Laker Airways Ltd. vs. Pan American World Airways, 103 F.R.D. 22, 34 (D.D.C. 1984) ("In short, a government attorney may participate in legislative or other policy-making activity without precluding his subsequent representation of private parties affected by such rules or policies"). There is authority "that certain rulemakings, although rare, may be so focused on the rights of specifically identified parties as to fall within the ambit of section 207(a) even though most rulemaking proceedings are of general applicability beyond the scope of [that section]." Federal Post-Employment Conflict of Interest Restrictions, 73 Fed. Reg. at 36,176 (citations omitted) (emphasis added). But cf. id. at 36,193 (to be codified at 5 C.F.R. § 2641.201(h)(2), Example 5) (giving an example where even a rulemaking that has an immediate effect on only three or four companies nevertheless constitutes a rulemaking of general applicability). Private relief legislation may also involve specific parties. See Office of Government Ethics Advisory Opinions 83 x 7 and 06 x 9.

[8] Comment [19] to Rule 1.7 provides as follows:

Lawyer's Duty to Make Inquiries to Determine Potential Conflicts

[19] The scope of and parties to a "matter" are typically apparent in on-the-record adversary proceedings or other proceedings in which a written record of the identity and the position of the parties exists. In Rule 1.7(b)(1), the phrase "matter involving a specific party or parties" refers to such situations. In other situations, however, it may not be clear to a lawyer whether the representation of one client is adverse to the interests of another client. For example, a lawyer may represent a client only with respect to one or a few of the client's areas of interest. Other lawyers, or non-lawyers (such as lobbyists), or employees of the client (such as government relations personnel) may be representing that client on many issues whose scope and content are unknown to the lawyer. Clients often have many representatives acting for them, including multiple law firms, nonlawyer lobbyists, and client employees. A lawyer retained for a limited purpose may not be aware of the full range of a client's other interests or positions on issues. Except in matters involving a specific party or parties, a lawyer is not required to inquire of a client concerning the full range of that client's interests in issues, unless it is clear to the lawyer that there is a potential for adversity between the interests of clients of the lawyer. Where lawyers are associated in a firm within the meaning of Rule 1.10(a), the rule stated in the preceding sentence must be applied to all lawyers and all clients in the firm. Unless a lawyer is aware that representing one client involves seeking a result to which another client is opposed, Rule 1.7 is not violated by a representation that eventuates in the lawyer's unwittingly taking a position for one client adverse to the interests of another client. The test to be applied here is one of reasonableness and may turn on whether the lawyer has an effective conflict checking system in place.

Such a reading cannot be reconciled with the limitation of Rule 1.7(b)(1) to a "matter involv[ing] a specific party or parties" because that phrase takes lobbying matters and other matters of general policy out of the rule. The use of the word "party" was intended to limit the scope of Rule 1.7(b)(1) to those situations that involve particular clients participating in a pending or threatened adjudicative proceeding, a negotiation of a contract, or other discrete and isolatable transactions between identifiable and specific persons.[9] To the extent that the comment suggests otherwise, the language of the rule must control. As explained in Paragraph [6] of the Scope section of the Rules, "[t]he Comments are intended as guides to interpretation, but the text of each Rule is controlling."

Thus, whether the lawyer knows or has a way of knowing that other clients may have different views of the lobbying issue is irrelevant for purpose of Rule 1.7(b)(1) because Rule 1.7(b)(1) does not regulate lobbying matters or other matters of general policy.

b. The Legislative History of Rule 1.7(b)(1) Confirms That the Court of Appeals Adopted a Bright Line Test to Eliminate Substantial Uncertainties That Lawyer-Lobbyists Would Otherwise Face

When the District of Columbia Bar recommended the initial adoption of Rule 1.7, it rejected the ABA's Model Rule 1.7. As explained by the Bar Committee's report:

> [T]he ABA draft . . . is so confusingly organized and ambiguously worded that it gives little guidance to lawyers trying to understand it or conform to it. Although the ABA drafters state in their notes that their draft is intended to codify standards that have evolved in application of the preexisting disciplinary rule and the "appearance of impropriety" test, those standards are not self-evident from a reading of the proposed language. Instead, members of the Bar would be forced to parse ambiguous phraseology and even perform research concerning case law and D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee interpretations before they could get a clear idea of what this basic rule means.

Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct and Related Comments, Showing the Language Proposed by the American Bar Association, Changes Recommended by the District of Columbia Bar Model Rules of Professional Conduct Committee, and Changes Recommended by the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia Bar at 67 (Nov. 19, 1986) [hereinafter the "Jordan Report"].

Both the Jordan Committee and its successor, the Peters Committee, devoted extensive resources to consideration of what the rules should be in the context of lobbying, where the potentially affected or interested players are not readily apparent at the outset, and where the active players and positions shift and change over time. It was at the Peters Committee's recommendation that, in November of 1996, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals adopted the current general definition of "matter," which includes "lobbying activity . . . except as expressly limited in a particular rule," and the current formulation of Rule 1.7(b)(1), which applies only to a "matter involv[ing] a specific party or parties."

The Peters Committee explained that it had "attempted to fashion in amended Rule 1.7 detailed, 'black letter' guidance to the Bar regarding conflicts of interest." Peters Report at 11. The Committee limited Rule 1.7(b)(1) to matters involving specific parties because "it is not practical—and may well harm the interests of a new client—for a lawyer asked to represent that client in lobbying activities to take affirmative steps to obtain disclosure from other clients as to whether they have (or will have) an adverse position in the matter." Peters Report at 18.

> Accordingly, the Committee has limited the obligations set out in Rule 1.7(b)(l) to situations involving "a specific party or parties." Because situations that may arise under Rule 1.7(b)(l) are numerous, the Committee has not attempted to define those matters that involve "a specific party or parties," but has left that definition to case-by-case development.

Id.

This bright line rule eliminates the need for lawyer-lobbyists to look to Rule 1.7(b)(1) for guidance on conflicts in lobbying matters. However, they must still consider potential conflicts under subsections (b)(2), (b)(3) and (b)(4). Such conflicts may exist when they know that another client strenuously objects to or will be seriously harmed by a lobbying result they are hired to pursue.

2. Rule 1.7(b)(2), (b)(3) and (b)(4)—Waivable Conflicts Rules That Do Apply to Lobbying Matters

Rules 1.7(b)(2), (b)(3) and (b)(4) do apply to lobbying activities because, unlike Rule 1.7(b)(1), they contain no language that clearly limits their scope to adjudications and other discrete and isolatable transactions between identifiable persons. Rules 1.7(b)(2) and (b)(3) are mirror images of each other. Under the former, a lawyer may not represent a client with respect to a matter (including "lobbying activity" under Rule 1.0(h)) if "such representation will be or is likely to be adversely affected by representation of another client." Under the latter, the lawyer may not undertake the representation if "representation of another client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by such representation."

Rule 1.7(b)(4) looks beyond the potential effects of one client representation on another client representation. It asks if "the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interest."

Collectively, these three rules all apply to circumstances in which an objective observer would doubt the lawyer's incentive to be a zealous advocate. For that reason, they are often referred to as the "punch-pulling" conflicts rules because the lawyer might be tempted to "pull her punches" on behalf of one client so as not to harm the interests of another. D.C. Ethics Op. 309 (2001). Accord D.C. Ethics Op. 317 n.6 (2002).[10]

The Peters Report specifically identified "punch-pulling" as a potential obstacle to a lobbying representation:

---

[9] As expressed in the recent amendment of the federal regulations, "only those particular matters that involve a specific party or parties fall within the prohibition of section 207(a)(1). Such a matter typically involves a specific proceeding affecting the legal rights of the parties or an isolatable transaction or related set of transactions between identified parties, such as a specific contract, grant, license, product approval application, enforcement action, administrative adjudication, or court case." Federal Post-Employment Conflict of Interest Restrictions, 73 Fed. Reg. at 36,193 (to be codified at 5 C.F.R. § 2641.201(h)(1)).

[10] Comment [7] to Rule 1.7 explains:

> The underlying premise is that disclosure and informed consent are required before assuming a representation if there is any reason to doubt the lawyer's ability to provide wholehearted and zealous representation of a client or if a client might reasonably consider the representation of its interests to be adversely affected by the lawyer's assumption of the other representation in question. Although the lawyer must be satisfied that the representation can be wholeheartedly and zealously undertaken, if an objective observer would have any reasonable doubt on that issue, the client has a right to disclosure of all relevant considerations and the opportunity to be the judge of its own interests.

> [W]hile the Committee believed it appropriate to narrow Rule 1.7(b)(1), the Committee recommends no change to Rules 1.7(b)(2) through 1.7(b)(4). Rule 1.7(b)(1) implements a general duty of loyalty and, where it applies, prohibits representation whether or not that representation would in fact have any adverse impact on another client. The remainder of Rule 1.7(b), however, defines situations where the representation of a client would likely be compromised by representation of another client. If, for example, a lawyer knows that there is a risk that he or she would "pull punches" for client A in a lobbying matter to avoid angering large client B represented solely in a litigation matter, then representation of client A is not proper whether or not client B will appear in the lobbying matter.

Peters Report at 18.

The inquiry before the Committee does not supply enough information to determine whether a "punch-pulling" issue exists here. Certainly, the lawyer should consider discussing with her lobbying client (Client X) the fact that she knows her other client (Client Y) will be harmed by the tax credit to be sought in the lobbying. If the lawyer-lobbyist perceives a basis for a concern that her zealousness on Client X's behalf might be impaired by her knowledge of Client Y's position, Rule 1.7(c) requires her to satisfy herself that she can provide competent and diligent representation to X in these circumstances, and to obtain an informed consent from X, the client whose representation might be affected by Y's expected involvement. In some cases, Y's consent might also be required because of a potential adverse effect of the proposed lobbying representation on the ongoing representation of Y.[11]

3. Imputation of Conflicts of Interest

Under Rule 1.10, while lawyers are associated in a law firm, none of them may knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be precluded from doing so by Rule 1.7. This rule imputing each lawyer's conflicts to all other lawyers in the firm applies to lobbying representations and lobbyists employed by a law firm. However, a conflict will not be imputed when "the prohibition of the individual lawyer's representation is based on an interest of the lawyer described in Rule 1.7(b)(4) and that interest does not present a significant risk of adversely affecting the representation of the client by the remaining lawyers in the firm." Rule 1.10(a)(1).

II. Avoiding Application of the Conflict Provisions to Lobbying and Other "Law-Related Services"

Lawyers and law firms must take steps to assure that the nonlawyers associated with them abide by the Rules of Professional Conduct.[12] Moreover, lawyers themselves are governed by some of the Rules of Professional Conduct even when they act in a nonlawyer capacity.[13] Because clients who procure legal services are entitled to certain protections that do not typically apply to the provision of nonlegal services (such as confidentiality and avoidance of conflicts), the rules effectively require the lawyer to abide by all of the Rules of Professional Conduct, including the conflicts rules, when the client may reasonably believe that legal services are involved. Rule 5.7 addresses these issues for lawyer-lobbyists and their staff by setting forth a lawyer's "Responsibilities Regarding Law-Related Services."[14]

Despite the name, "law-related services" are not legal services. They are not legal services because they "are not prohibited as unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer." Rule 5.7 (b). Such services are deemed to be "law-related" because they "might reasonably be performed in conjunction with and in substance are related to the provision of legal services." Id.

The comments to Rule 5.7 identify "legislative lobbying" as a "law-related service." Rule 5.7, Comment [9]. Indeed, the reference to "legislative lobbying" in the comments to Rule 5.7 played a central role in the UPL Committee's conclusion that U.S. legislative lobbying does not involve the practice of law. See UPL Opinion at 3.[15]

When a lawyer or law firm provides both legal and nonlegal services, there is a risk that the client will be confused about the protections to which the client is entitled as part of the services. "The recipient of the law-related services may expect, for example, that the protection of client confidences, prohibitions against representation of persons with conflicting interests, and obligations of a lawyer to maintain professional independence apply to the provision of law-related services" when such is not the case. Rule 5.7, Comment [1].

To protect such expectations, Rule 5.7(a)(1) requires lawyers to abide by all of the Rules of Professional Conduct when the "law-related services" are provided "by the lawyer in circumstances that are not distinct from the lawyer's provision of legal services to clients." Rule 5.7(a)(2) requires application of all of the Rules of Professional Conduct if the services are provided "in other circumstances by an entity controlled by the lawyer individually or with others if the lawyer fails to take reasonable measures to assure that [the recipient of the services] knows that the services are not legal services and that the protections of the client-lawyer relationship do not exist." (emphasis added).

"The burden is upon the lawyer to show that the lawyer has taken responsible measures under the circumstances to communicate the desired understanding." Rule 5.7, Comment [7]. "A sophisticated user of law-related services, such as a [11] While the notion of "punch-pulling" captures most of the circumstances regulated by Rules 1.7(b)(2) through (4), there may be others as well. One of these is a situation involving an "issue" or "positional conflict," such that the lawyer's effectiveness in a matter being handled for one client would be adversely affected by the result being sought on behalf of another client as, "for example, when a decision favoring one client will create a precedent likely to seriously weaken the position being taken on behalf of the other client." Rule 1.7, Comment [13]; D.C. Ethics Op. 265 (1996). Nothing in the pending inquiry suggests that the proposed lobbying representation seeking a tax credit implicates any positional conflict issues.

---

[12] See Rule 5.1 (Responsibilities of Partners, Managers, and Supervisory Lawyers); Rule 5.3 (Responsibilities Regarding Nonlawyer Assistants); Rule 5.4(b) (requiring—as part of the District of Columbia's unique rule allowing nonlawyer partners in law firms—that the nonlawyers abide by the Rules of Professional Conduct).

[13] For example, Rule 8.4(c) makes it professional misconduct to "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation." Under that rule, "[a] lawyer is held to a high standard of honesty, no matter what role the lawyer is filling, acting as lawyer, testifying as a witness in a proceeding, handling fiduciary responsibilities, or conducting the private affairs of everyday life." In re Jackson, 650 A.2d 675, 677 (D.C. 1994).

[14] Rule 5.7 was added to the District of Columbia's Rules of Professional Conduct in 2007.

[15] We do not address whether and to what extent lobbying services other than "U.S. legislative lobbying"—as that phrase is used in the UPL Opinion—may qualify for treatment as a "law-related service" for purposes of Rule 5.7. Since the definition of "law-related service" requires a determination that the service is "not prohibited as the unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer," an essential predicate issue is outside the scope of our jurisdiction. See supra notes 1 & 2.

[16] See also Rule 5.7, Comment [8] ("Under some circumstances the legal and law-related services may be so closely entwined that they cannot publicly held corporation, may require a lesser explanation than someone unaccustomed to making distinctions between legal services and law-related services, such as an individual. . . ." Id.[16] When the lawyer has not severed the connection in the client's mind between the "legal" and "nonlegal" services, "the lawyer must take special care to heed the proscriptions of the Rules addressing conflict of interest. . . ." Id., Comment [10] (emphasis added).

One book describes Model Rule 5.7 (the text of which is identical to D.C. Rule 5.7) as a way of "opting out" of the Rules of Professional Conduct for lobbying matters.[17] It warns that, "[f]or the lawyer-lobbyist who practices in a traditional law firm setting and provides lobbying services to his clients in that setting, it seems clear that the Model Rules would apply to that lawyer's lobbying activities."[18] We agree that the burden falls on the lawyer-lobbyist to show that she has taken reasonable measures under the circumstances to communicate to the client that she is not acting as the client's lawyer.[19] "The lawyer must also take 'special care' to keep the provision of any legal services separate from the law-related services, in order to minimize the risk of confusing the client."[20]

Conclusion

Most of the conflict rules apply to lawyer-lobbyists engaged in lobbying. Lawyer-lobbyists in the District of Columbia who hold themselves out as lawyers may not advance opposing positions in the same lobbying matter even with consents from all of their lobbying clients. Moreover, the lawyer-lobbyist must also ensure that she is not placing herself in a position where she might have to pull her punches on behalf of one client so as to protect the interests of another. Such conflicts can be waived with informed consent from the affected clients, provided that the lawyer reasonably believes that he or she can provide competent and diligent representation. Absent special circumstances, all of these restrictions also apply to other lobbyists in the same law firm, even if those other lobbyists are not themselves lawyers.

Lawyer-lobbyists are not, however, generally subject to Rule 1.7(b)(1) in the conduct of lobbying activities. This rule is confined to "matter[s] involv[ing] a specific party or parties," a phrase that excludes lobbying, rulemaking and other matters of general government policy. As a result, Rule 1.7(b)(1) does not prohibit a lawyer-lobbyist from advancing a position in a lobbying matter that may be opposed in that same lobbying matter by another client of the lawyer-lobbyist (or of the lawyer-lobbyist's law firm) where the other client is unrepresented in the lobbying matter or is represented by a different lobbyist who is not associated with the lawyer-lobbyist's firm.

Finally, Rule 5.7 provides guidance for lawyers and law firms who wish to establish a law-related lobbying practice that is not governed by the conflicts provisions of the Rules of Professional Conduct. To do so, however, the lobbying client must receive clear notice that the services are not legal services and that the usual protections accompanying a client-lawyer relationship do not apply.

Inquiry No. 07-12-21

Published: July 2008

Opinion 345

Reimbursement of Interest Charges Incurred When a Lawyer Uses the Firm's Line of Credit to Advance the Costs of the Representation

• A lawyer who uses the firm's line of credit to advance to a client the costs of the representation will incur interest charges from the bank in doing so. The lawyer may pass these costs along to the client, so long as the client has been fully informed in advance of these charges, the client has agreed to pay them, the costs are reasonable, and the lawyer maintains a separate accounting of the interest charges incurred for that client. Finally, the costs of the line of credit must be directly attributable to the representation of that client; in other words, the lawyer may not pass on to individual clients the costs of maintaining a line of credit used to fund the firm's general overhead expenses.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.5 (Fees)
- Rule 1.8(d)

Inquiry

In a personal injury case, costs are incurred for copying, for ordering deposition transcripts, for court costs, for expert witnesses, and for similar disbursements related to the prosecution of the case. The firm representing a party is contemplating using the firm's line of credit to pay for such costs, but it will have to pay the bank interest for doing so. The firm has inquired whether it may pass on to the client at the end of the case the charges for the interest incurred.

Discussion

There are two alternatives to this proposed arrangement: either the client will have to pay for these disbursements as they are incurred or the firm will have to absorb these additional costs, likely passing them on to all clients through increases in fees. If the client must pay these expenses, the client may have to borrow funds to do so, in which case the client would pay interest charges directly. Rule 1.8(d) allows lawyers to advance the costs of litigation to clients, but they are not required to do so. Thus, neither of these alternatives is required by the Rules.

If a lawyer uses his or her credit line to operate a law office or to fund normal operating expenses, the lawyer cannot pass along the interest incurred to do so to individual clients. However, requiring a client to pay for the costs incurred in prosecuting his or her case is clearly allowed by the Rules. Comment [2] to D.C. Rule 1.5 specifies that a lawyer may seek payment from the client for expenses including filing fees, copying costs, and transcript costs. D.C. Rule 1.5(b) provides that when a lawyer has not regularly represented a client, these expenses "shall be communicated to the client, in writing, before or within a reasonable time after commencing the representation." By setting forth the charges for which the lawyer or his or her firm will seek payment by the client, the lawyer provides the client with a clear understanding of the lawyer's costs and allows for discussion of these terms at the outset of the attorney–client relationship.

Neither the Rules nor the Comments specifically mention reimbursement of

---

be distinguished from each other, and the requirement of disclosure and consultation imposed by paragraph (a)(2) of the rule cannot be met. In such a case a lawyer will be responsible for assuring that both the lawyer's conduct and, to the extent required by Rule 5.3, that of nonlawyer employees in the distinct entity that the lawyer controls complies in all respects with the Rules of Professional Conduct.").

[17] Luneburg & Susman, supra note 6, § 27-2.3.2, at 490. The cited edition of the book predates the adoption in 2007 of Rule 5.7 by the District of Columbia, a later event that supersedes some of the analysis in the current edition of the book. See id. § 27-2.3.3, at 491.

[18] Id. at 490.

[19] Id. at 491.

[20] Id.

interest costs. Some threshold concerns about seeking reimbursement of these charges from clients are not implicated here. For example, the inquirer has already specified that the firm will not be making a profit on the advancement of the payments for costs incurred. Rather, it will seek only to recover the costs of the interest the bank will charge the firm for using the firm's line of credit to cover them.

This inquiry raises competing interests. On the one hand, allowing lawyers to pass on the carrying costs of such charges to individual clients ensures that the firm's other clients are not paying these charges through increased fees. On the other hand, since many firms and lawyers maintain lines of credit to support their practices, it is not appropriate for some of a lawyer's clients to bear indirectly certain overhead expenses that appropriately should be absorbed by the lawyer or spread fairly among all the lawyer's clients.

Because a lawyer may only charge the client the amount of interest directly attributable to that client's case, the lawyer must maintain detailed accounts of the amount of any advance and the interest charged by the lender and attributable to the client's costs. Although not required by the Rules, a lawyer may wish to maintain a line of credit for the advancement of such costs that is separate and apart from the line of credit on which the lawyer regularly draws for purposes of paying overhead expenses.

In addition, any interest charged to the client must be reasonable, and the lawyer "will have the burden of establishing the reasonableness" of such charges. Moreover, it is clearly improper for a lawyer to pass onto the client any late fees or account maintenance costs that result from the lawyer's inefficient or imprudent financial management of the line of credit.

Finally, any fee agreement with a client that would include interest costs should be made at the beginning of the representation. In Opinion 310, the Committee reviewed the question whether a lawyer could charge interest on its fees if the client did not pay them promptly. See D.C. Ethics Op. 310 (2002). The Committee noted that the payment of interest resulted in charges only to the client directly affected and thus allowed the lawyer to avoid "upward fee pressures" caused by spreading the additional costs associated with late payment of fees to all of his or her clients. In that Opinion, the Committee noted that changing the fee agreement in an ongoing representation in order to include these charges is subject to "strict scrutiny" because of the possibility of "overreaching" by the lawyer. Id. (citing Chase v. Gilbert, 499 A.2d 1203, 1209 (D.C. 1985)) ("What may constitute overreaching in particular circumstances is of course dependent on such factors as the resources and sophistication of the client, the presence or absence of such external factors as a favorable litigation schedule that would be lost if the client had to change counsel, and so on."). So, wherever possible, the lawyer should specify at the outset of the representation that, should it be necessary for the lawyer to draw on a line of credit to pay for litigation expenses, the client is responsible for the applicable interest charges.

Published: July 2008

Opinion No. 346

The Required Elements for Triggering a Duty of Confidentiality to a Prospective Client

• When a lawyer, with whom a prospective client has consulted, receives permission from the prospective client to speak with other counsel who the lawyer believes may be better suited to handle the case, any client information conveyed by the first lawyer during such a discussion with the second lawyer should be treated by the second lawyer as confidential, even though he never speaks directly with the prospective client.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)

• Rule 1.18 (Duties to Prospective Client)

Inquiry

A would-be client comes to Lawyer A to speak with her about taking on his case. After listening to the prospective client's story, Lawyer A determines that she is not in a position to be of assistance. However, Lawyer A believes that a different lawyer would be better suited to meet the prospective client's needs. Lawyer A asks the prospective client whether he would like her to call Lawyer B on his behalf to discuss the possibility of Lawyer B taking on the representation, and the prospective client says "yes." Lawyer A calls Lawyer B, who works at a different firm, and explains the person's predicament. After hearing the story from Lawyer A, Lawyer B determines that he has a conflict of interest and cannot represent the person. The question is whether Lawyer B has a duty to safeguard the information that Lawyer A communicated to him.

D.C. Rule 1.18, which became effective February 2007, defines a lawyer's obligations to a person with whom a lawyer discusses the possibility of representation, but who does not become the lawyer's client. The rule recognizes a new category of persons, "prospective clients," and states that "[e]ven when no client–lawyer relationship ensues, a lawyer who has had discussions with a prospective client shall not use or reveal information learned in the consultation, except as permitted by Rule 1.6." (Emphasis added). The uncertainty in this inquiry arises because Lawyer B never had direct "discussions with a prospective client." His only discussions were with Lawyer A.

Discussion

We analyze this inquiry under two alternate theories: (1) That the duty of confidentiality to would-be clients exists in Rule 1.6 and, therefore, is not dependent on the definition of a "prospective client" in Rule 1.18; and (2) the requirement of a discussion in Rule 1.18 is met because Lawyer A is an agent of the prospective client. We believe that under both theories, Lawyer B owes a duty of confidentiality.[1]

1. Confidentiality to Would-Be Clients Under Rule 1.6

ABA Model Rule 1.18 was adopted in 2002 as part of the ABA Ethics 2000 project. D.C. Rule 1.18(a), which is identical to Model Rule 1.18(a), provides: "A person who discusses with a lawyer the possibility of forming a client–lawyer relationship with respect to a matter is a prospective client." The confidentiality component of the rule (as distinct from its provision relating to conflicts of interest) was intended to codify the existing obligation of a lawyer under Model Rule 1.6 to a person with whom the lawyer had a preliminary consultation of some sort, but who never entered into an attorney–client relationship.[2] Indeed, ABA Ethics Opinion No. 90-358, written 12 years before

[1] Under either theory, the substance of the duty of confidentiality is governed by Rule 1.6.

[2] What is substantively new in Model Rule 1.18 is that a lawyer's duties to prospective clients with respect to conflicts of interest are defined. Before the new rule, courts were left to determine whether one or more consultations created an attorney–client relationship or no relationship at all. See the adoption of Rule 1.18, states:

> Information imparted from a would-be client seeking legal representation is protected from revelation or use under Model Rule 1.6 even though the lawyer does not undertake representation of or perform work for the would-be client.

Similarly, Comment [9] to D.C. Rule 1.6 recognizes this obligation under D.C. Rule 1.6. The Comment states:

> Principles of substantive law external to these Rules determine whether a client–lawyer relationship exists. Although most of the duties flowing from the client–lawyer relationship attach only after the client has requested the lawyer to render legal services and the lawyer has agreed to do so, the duty of confidentiality imposed by this rule attaches when the lawyer agrees to consider whether a client–lawyer relationship shall be established. Other duties of a lawyer to a prospective client are set forth in Rule 1.18. (Emphasis added.)

See also Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 15.

Because the duty of confidentiality owed to persons who do not become clients exists in Rule 1.6 and in Rule 1.18, we need not rely solely on the language of Rule 1.18, which requires a discussion between a person and a lawyer. Comment [9] to D.C. Rule 1.6 clarifies that the duty of confidentiality is triggered "when [a] lawyer agrees to consider whether a client-lawyer relationship shall be established."[3]

The Committee concludes, therefore, that a duty of confidentiality is owed by the second lawyer under Rule 1.6, notwithstanding the language of Rule 1.18, because the second lawyer presumably agreed to consider the possibility of a client–lawyer relationship when he spoke with the first lawyer.

2. Communications From Agents of Clients

Alternatively, we assume for purposes of further analysis that the requirement of a discussion with the would-be client, as stated in Rule 1.18(a), must be met in order for the duty of confidentiality to attach. Under that assumption, the requirement would be met if the first lawyer was considered to be the agent of the would-be client in speaking with the second lawyer.

In assessing the confidentiality of communications with clients in connection with the attorney–client privilege, courts have often recognized that clients sometimes speak to their lawyer through agents.[4] This can include interpreters, family members, and business agents, provided that under the circumstances, the agent is someone who the client trusts to maintain the confidentiality of the communications. This concept is recognized in the Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers § 70(f). Under that section, the Restatement addresses the circumstances under which a person can speak to a lawyer as a client's agent and have the communication fall within the attorney–client privilege. That section states:

> A client's agent for communication. A person is a confidential agent for communication if the person's participation is reasonably necessary to facilitate the client's communication with a lawyer or another privileged person and if the client reasonably believes that the person will hold the communication in confidence. Factors that may be relevant in determining whether a third person is an agent for communication include the customary relationship between the client and the asserted agent, the nature of the communication, and the client's need for the third person's presence to communicate effectively with the lawyer or to understand and act upon the lawyer's advice.

The Restatement provides three illustrations: (1) A client is arrested and barred from speaking to his counsel and so asks his friend to convey a message to his lawyer; (2) a client does not speak English and uses an interpreter to speak to the lawyer; and (3) a client uses his personal secretary to provide information to his lawyer.

In In Re Lindsay, 158 F.3d 1263, cert. denied, 525 U.S. 996 (1998), the D.C. Circuit addressed whether Deputy White House Counsel Bruce Lindsay acted as President Clinton's agent in speaking with the President's private counsel regarding the president's personal legal issues. The court did not decide whether the use of an agent as intermediary need be "reasonably necessary" in order to retain the privilege because it found that by adding his own legal analysis, Mr. Lindsay could not be deemed a mere intermediary. In rejecting the privilege under these circumstances, the court reasoned that "the attorney–client privilege must be 'strictly confined within the narrowest possible limits consistent with the logic of its principle.'" Id. at 1281 (quoting In Re Sealed Case, 676 F.2d 793, 807 n.44 (D.C. Cir. 1982)) (quoting In Re Grand Jury Investigation, 599 F.2d 1224, 1235 (3d Cir. 1979)).

We believe that the intermediary principle applies to a lawyer's ethical obligation of confidentiality under Rule 1.6 and Rule 1.18 as well, but without the same need to so strictly limit its applicability. The reason for the distinction is that in the context of attorney–client privilege, as with any evidentiary privilege, there is the important countervailing demand from a party in a legal proceeding for evidence which may be relevant. Unless applying an exception under Rule 1.6 (c), (d), and (e), a lawyer's duty of confidentiality, on the other hand, should be broadly interpreted in order to ensure that client expectations are met. See Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr. and W. William Hodes, The Law of Lawyering § 9.7 (3d ed.) stating:

> Because the ethical obligation of confidentiality is broader [than the attorney-client privilege], lawyers ordinarily should operate on the presumption that essentially no unfavorable client information may be disclosed without the client's consent.

Because the first lawyer was an agent of the prospective client, the second lawyer must treat the discussion with the first lawyer as confidential under Rule 1.18.

Conclusion

When a prospective client consents to having a lawyer speak to a second lawyer on his behalf regarding the possibility of establishing an attorney–client relationship, the second lawyer has an obligation under Rules 1.6 and 1.18 to treat the communication as confidential, even if the second lawyer never speaks directly with the prospective client.

Given the importance of maintaining confidentiality of any information received by the first lawyer, it is advis-

---

Derrickson v. Derrickson, 541 A.2d 149 (D.C. 1988), in which the court, in ruling on a motion to disqualify a party's counsel, had to determine whether a single consultation of about one hour, taking place eight years earlier and which the lawyer contended he had no recollection of, created a lawyer–client relationship. The court found no attorney–client relationship and, therefore, no conflict of interest.

[3] Whether that formulation also triggers the conflict of interest features of Rule 1.18(c) is a separate question not addressed in this Opinion.

[4] The more common situation of nonlawyers who are assisting the lawyer serving as the lawyer's agent in receiving confidential communications from a client is also a related but separate issue, not addressed in this Opinion.

able that the first lawyer disclose at the outset of the conversation with the second lawyer that the purpose of the discussion is to consider taking on a new case for someone, and to limit initial disclosures to the essential facts until it can be determined whether the second lawyer has a conflict of interest.

Published: February 2009

Opinion 347

Reverse Contingent Fees

• A reverse contingent fee is a fee that is based upon the difference between the amount a third party demands from a lawyer's client, and the amount ultimately obtained from the client, whether by settlement or judgment. The Rules of Professional Conduct (Rules) do not prohibit reverse contingent fees, and a fee arrangement of this nature may align the lawyer's and client's interests more closely than hourly or fixed fee arrangements. Like all fees, reverse contingent fees must be reasonable. Beyond the requirement of reasonableness, entering into a reverse contingent fee arrangement places increased burdens of disclosure on the lawyer in order to obtain informed consent to such a fee arrangement. The lawyer is in a better position to assess the likely outcome of a dispute than a client is, and the lawyer must fully and fairly communicate that assessment to the client in any discussion concerning a reverse contingent fee. In addition, a lawyer should take particular care in setting the percentage of the reverse contingent fee, because unlike contingent fees based upon a client's recovery, there is little established practice upon which a client and lawyer can rely. Finally, as with other Rule provisions, the degree and nature of the disclosure required of the lawyer and the ensuing scrutiny of the fee arrangement may vary based upon the experience and sophistication of the client.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.5 (Fees)

Inquiry

The inquiry is whether, and under what circumstances, a reverse contingent fee i.e., a fee computed based upon the savings to a client, rather than the client's recovery, comports with the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Background and Discussion

Rule 1.5 governs the fees charged by lawyers. Rule 1.5(a) mandates that fees be reasonable and sets forth eight factors to be considered in assessing the reasonableness of a fee. Reasonableness is assessed based on the facts and circumstances of the representation, as they exist both at the beginning and the end of the representation. "A fee that looked to be reasonable at the outset of the representation may have become excessive as measured by the outcome of the client's case." Contingent Fees, ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Conduct, 41:901, at 18 (2004).

Rule 1.5 discusses when contingent fees are and are not permissible, but it does not directly address "reverse contingent fees." Rule 1.5(c) allows fees "contingent upon the outcome of the matter for which service is rendered." Comment [6] to the Rule states that "[g]enerally, contingent fees are permissible in all civil cases." Contingent fee agreements must be in writing and must "state the method by which the fee is to be determined, including the percentage or percentages that shall accrue to the lawyer." Comment [7] to Rule 1.5 provides a caution with regard to domestic relations cases: "[c]ontingent fees in domestic relations cases, while rarely justified, are not prohibited by Rule 1.5." Such fees in domestic relations matters are "permitted in order that lawyers may provide representation to clients who might not otherwise be able to afford to contract for the payment of fees on a noncontingent basis." The only outright prohibition of contingent fees in Rule 1.5 is limited to representations of defendants in criminal cases.[1]

Rule 1.5 appears to contemplate only the standard contingent fee arrangement (i.e., where a recovery is generated for the client) rather than a reverse contingent fee. Rule 1.5(c) provides that a contingent fee agreement must address "expenses to be deducted from the recovery." (emphasis added). Comment [8] requires a lawyer to "provide the client with a written statement at the conclusion of a contingent fee matter, stating the outcome of the matter and explaining the computation of any remittance made to the client." (emphasis added).

We have addressed contingent fees in a number of prior Opinions.[2] None of these prior Opinions discuss reverse contingent fees. Like Rule 1.5, these Opinions consider the typical contingent fee where the lawyer is "'produc[ing] a res with which to pay the fee.'" D.C. Ethics Op. 262 (1995) (quoting Code of Professional Responsibility Ethical Consideration 2-20, which discussed the basis for prohibiting contingent fees in criminal representations).

Outside of the District of Columbia, reverse contingent fees have been addressed by a number of jurisdictions. In Formal Opinion 93-373 (1993), the ABA concluded that "[t]he Model Rules do not prohibit 'reverse' contingent fee agreements for representations of defendants in civil cases where the contingency rests on the amount of money, if any, saved the client, provided the amount saved is reasonably determinable, the fee is reasonable in amount under the circumstances, and the client's agreement to the fee arrangement is fully informed."

The ABA identified several significant differences between typical, recovery-based contingent fees and reverse contingent fees. First, while the setting of percentages in typical contingent fee cases is susceptible to abuse or overreaching by the lawyer, the "profession's long experience with straight contingent fees and the active regulation by the courts and the legislatures" have "pretty well established" the "range of reasonable percentages." For reverse contingent fees, reasonableness "will not be so readily determinable." The legal profession "has not built up a long term common experience with the concept. The fact that straight contingent fees typically range from 25% to 33% does not necessarily mean that the same percentage is reasonably applied to the potential savings of a defendant." Second, even if a fair percentage can be set, reverse contingency fees have the added complication of calculating the amount saved the client. A plaintiff's demand may be overstated or not specifically enumerated; thus, "the amount demanded cannot automatically be the number from which saving resulting from a judgment or settlement can reasonably be calculated." ABA Formal Op. 93-373 (1993).

[1] Substantive law may restrict those matters in which a reverse contingency fee is permitted. See, e.g., 31 C.F.R. § 10.27 (IRS regulation prohibiting reverse contingent fee for preparation of a tax return but permitting such fee under other circumstances). This opinion does not purport to address any additional conditions or restrictions imposed by substantive law on reverse contingent fees.

[2] D.C. Ethics Ops. 29 (1977) (Change in Contingent Fee Arrangement In Course of Representation); 37 (1977) (Provisions of Contingent Fee Retainer Agreements With Respect to Payment of a Fee in the Event of Discharge or Withdrawal of the Attorney); 42 (1977) (Written Retainer Agreement Based on Combination of Contingent Fee Plus Time Charges); 115 (1982) (Propriety of Contingent Fees In Non-Litigation Matters); 161 (1985) (Contingency Fees in Child Support Cases); 208 (1989) (Calculation of Attorneys Fees in Structured Settlements); 262 (1995) (Application of Rule 1.5(d) to Receipt of a Contingent Fee in a Writ of Error Coram Nobis Proceeding).

While not leading it to conclude that reverse contingency fee arrangements were unethical, the ABA determined that the above considerations require that the lawyer exercise greater care and consultation than in the typical "straight" contingency fee case. A lawyer must "fairly evaluate the plaintiff's claim and set a reasonable number as the amount from which the plaintiff's recovery will be subtracted to determine the defendant's savings." The lawyer has the burden of "demonstrating fairness in this process," a burden that is significantly greater when negotiating with an unsophisticated client than it is when dealing with, for instance, an organization represented by an experienced in-house counsel.

The cases and other authorities considering reverse contingency fees are generally consistent with the ABA's approach. In Ethics Opinion E-359 (1993), the Kentucky Bar Association stated that it is permissible for a defense lawyer to charge a reverse contingent fee in a civil case but noted that the lawyer bears "the burden of proving that the method of computing the charge, and the amount of the fee, are reasonable and rational under the circumstances." In Ethics Opinion 98-03 (1998), the Iowa Supreme Court Board of Professional Ethics and Conduct approved a reverse contingent fee because the damages sought from the lawyer's client were liquidated and readily determinable. See also Pennsylvania Bar Association Committee on Legal Ethics and Professional Responsibility Informal Opinion 92-76 (1992) (approving use of reverse contingent fee in tax appeal). In Wunschel Law Firm v. Clabaugh, 291 N.W.2d 331 (Iowa 1980), the court invalidated a reverse contingent fee because it was based upon the plaintiff's damages demand in a defamation suit. While noting "nothing in the nature of [a contingent fee] contract limits its use to employment by plaintiffs," it rejected "a contingent defense fee predicated on a percentage of the amount saved under the prayer in defending an unliquidated tort claim." Id. at 333.

The case of Brown & Sturm v. Frederick Road L.P., 768 A.2d 62 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 2001) illustrates the potential for abuse in reverse contingent fee cases. In that case, the underlying representation concerned the value of a family farm. The clients requested an hourly fee arrangement but the lawyers insisted on a reverse contingency fee. The Internal Revenue Service (IRS) assessed the property at $60 million. While negotiating the fee agreement with their clients (the individuals who had inherited the farm), the lawyers knew that the IRS assessment was inflated, "more than double any other contemporaneous appraisal of the property." Id. at 76. The attorneys concealed from their clients appraisals that depicted "a more realistic worst-case market value" and entered into a reverse contingent fee contract with their clients based upon the inflated $60 million appraisal. The underlying litigation with the IRS was settled prior to trial, based on a $20 million valuation. Under the fee agreement, the attorneys claimed a $40 million "savings" and charged the clients $4.8 million in fees. The Court of Special Appeals upheld findings that the attorneys' failure to disclose to their clients what they knew about the property's net worth made their fee agreement unenforceable. The court also upheld a finding that the fee "was unreasonable because it bore little relation to time, labor, novelty and risk of the legal problem." Id. at 81.

Conclusion

Consistent with ABA Formal Opinion 93-373 and other authorities discussed above, we conclude that reverse contingency fee agreements are not unethical. Indeed, in the appropriate instance, such arrangements "may be in the best interests of the clients." ABA Formal Opinion 93-373 (1993). Unlike a typical fixed fee or hourly arrangement, under a reverse contingency arrangement, the lawyer could "receive no fee if not successful in saving the client money." Id. Like any other fee, a reverse contingent fee must be reasonable, as judged both at the outset and the conclusion of the representation. A reverse contingent fee arrangement must also be reflected in a written fee agreement under Rule 1.5(c), and such fee agreement must state the "method by which the fee is to be determined."

The key components of a reverse contingency fee arrangement are (a) the selection of the sum or amount from which a client's savings are computed and (b) the percentage to be applied to such savings to produce the lawyer's fee. The selection of the former should be the product of full disclosure by the lawyer and informed consent by the client. The lawyer may not suggest a number based upon an assessment of the matter or experience in the particular type of dispute that is not disclosed to the client. A lawyer whose experience and knowledge provide insight into the range of results that are typically achieved in a particular type of matter must share such insight with the client. The amount demanded by an adversary may not be taken alone as the basis for a reverse contingent fee. Following such a course would be highly problematic. Instead, to the extent a demand is used by an attorney as the basis for a contingent fee, the lawyer should perform his or her own independent analysis and thoroughly discuss the matter with the client.

The percentage to be applied to the savings obtained by the lawyer must similarly be the product of full disclosure by the lawyer and informed consent by the client. Unlike typical contingent fee arrangements, there are no established norms concerning the appropriate percentages for a lawyer to use. It is beyond the expertise of this Committee to opine about the percentages, or range of percentages, that might be appropriate. To support the reasonableness of a particular percentage, the lawyer should consider discussing with the client the likely range of fees under hourly or fixed fee arrangements as compared to the range of fees that might result from a reverse contingent fee arrangement.

The lawyer should summarize for the client, preferably in writing, the analysis underlying the sum or amount from which a client's savings are computed and the percentage to be applied to produce the lawyer's fee. Particularly when it is the lawyer and not the client who suggests the reverse contingent fee, a prudent lawyer will recognize that a writing will facilitate review of the reasonableness of the fee and of the client's informed consent to the fee arrangement. A lawyer may also find it advisable to document any offer to accept a fixed or hourly fee arrangement as an alternative to a reverse contingency fee arrangement.

The sophistication and experience of the client is an important factor to be considered by the lawyer in discussing and reaching a reverse contingent fee arrangement. The type of discussion and disclosure that are required when the client is a sophisticated in-house attorney for a large corporation is different from those required when the client is unsophisticated and is not being advised by independent counsel. See Comment [2] to Rule 1.0 (assessing adequacy of disclosure to obtain informed consent in light of client's sophistication in legal matters). To the extent that a reverse contingent fee arrangement is with a sophisticated client, who has the benefit of independent legal advice and who provides the lawyer with suggested figures and percentages to base the fee arrangement upon, many of the above disclosures and discussions may not be necessary. On the other hand, with respect to an unsophisticated client, the lawyer should be assured before proceeding with the representation that the client has a full understanding of the amount from which the client's savings would be computed and the percentage to be applied to that amount to produce the lawyer's fee.

The partial dissent of our colleagues reflects a disagreement over the relatively narrow issue of whether a lawyer violates Rule 1.5 by failing to provide the client a writing that sets forth the lawyer's analysis or explanation of the components of a reverse contingent fee. Our view is that such a writing is preferable, but not required. The partial dissent concludes that Rule 1.5(c) mandates a writing containing such analysis or explanation. In reaching a different conclusion than our colleagues, we are mindful that our role is to interpret the Rules as we find them, not to revise them as if we were starting anew.

We believe that a writing containing the lawyer's analysis of the sum or amount from which the savings are to be computed and the percentage to be applied to such sum or amount is not required by Rule 1.5 for three reasons. First, as outlined previously in this opinion, Rule 1.5 was not drafted with reverse contingent fees in mind. The Rule speaks of "expenses to be deducted from the recovery" and "remittance[s] made to the client." Rule 1.5(c) & Comment [8]. We find no indication that reverse contingent fees were contemplated by the drafters of Rule 1.5.

Second, we do not believe that Rule 1.5(c)'s requirement that the "method" by which a contingent fee is to be determined be set forth in writing mandates anything more than providing the arithmetic components of the reverse contingent fee. "Method" is a "means" or a "manner of procedure," especially, according to one dictionary, "a regular and systematic way of accomplishing anything."[3] The term does not mean an explanation of how or why one decided to employ that particular method or process. The method used to calculate the relationship between the sides of a right triangle and its hypotenuse is the Pythagorean theorem. How Pythagoras arrived at that method is another matter.

Finally, Rule 1.5(c) speaks of the method "by which the fee is to be determined…" (emphasis added). In other words, the phrase refers to something that is going to happen in the future, i.e., how the fee will be calculated in the future when the case is resolved. Future-looking language does not encompass something that has already occurred. It cannot include the analysis that the lawyer went through in the past in order to propose a particular fee arrangement.

Partially Dissenting Opinion

While we agree with most of the Committee's opinion, we disagree on one small but significant point, namely what must go into the written fee agreement establishing a reverse contingent fee. On this point, we dissent because we believe that the Committee's opinion does not adequately protect unsophisticated clients. Adequate protection requires that the written agreement state not only the percentage the lawyer will receive of the amount saved, and the baseline value against which savings are calculated, but also the lawyer's analysis of how he or she came up with the baseline. The opinion correctly notes that, typically, the baseline cannot simply be the amount demanded in the adversary's complaint, which is likely to be inflated. Rather, it represents an analysis and estimate of the client's exposure.[4] We believe that Rule 1.5(c) requires a written explanation, however brief, of how the lawyer and client arrived at such estimate. By contrast, the Committee's opinion requires an oral explanation to the client, but makes the writing optional.

First, let us note common ground with the Committee's opinion. A reverse contingency fee may be to the client's advantage, and we agree with the Committee that the Rules of Professional Conduct permit reverse contingency fees. We also agree that the Rules require the lawyer to explain the reverse contingent fee thoroughly enough to obtain the client's informed consent to the arrangement. As the opinion notes, this oral explanation must include both a discussion of the applicable percentage used to compute the fee and the lawyer's analysis of the baseline value of the case against which savings are calculated. The point of contention lies in a single sentence, and in fact a single word. The opinion states, "The lawyer should summarize for the client, preferably in writing, the analysis underlying the sum or amount from which a client's savings are computed and the percentage to be applied to produce the lawyer's fee." (emphasis added). The word "preferably" means that the lawyer is not strictly required to put his or her oral analysis of the baseline value into writing. We disagree, and would not weaken Rule 1.5(c)'s writing requirement by making this analysis optional.

In a "straight" contingent fee, there is no uncertainty about the amount to which the percentage is applied: the res is what it is. In the reverse contingent fee, however, the baseline value is inherently indeterminate. We do not mean merely that it can never be better than a rough ballpark estimate of the client's exposure, which might turn out to be completely wrong. The inevitable uncertainty of the estimate should be clear—if not, it is the lawyer's job to make it clear—and it is a risk that both lawyer and client assume when they agree to a reverse contingent fee.[5] The additional problem is knowing what the lawyer is trying to estimate. Is the lawyer estimating the settlement value of the case, or the unlikely worst-case scenario if it goes to trial and they lose badly, or the most likely trial outcome? These may be many thousands of dollars apart. The Committee's opinion correctly notes that the lawyer has to explain to the client, at least orally, "the analysis underlying…the sum or amount from which a client's savings are computed." Surely, that includes explaining the measure of exposure the lawyer is using. At the bare minimum, therefore, the lawyer has to tell the client whether the proposed baseline value represents an estimate of the worst-case scenario, the most likely outcome, or something entirely different. Otherwise, the client might agree to a high baseline that really represents an unlikely worst case, without understanding how unlikely it is. A lawyer who withholds that information has not met the minimum disclosure requirement under Rule 1.4(b). The client might wind up paying an inflated fee under a misapprehension that an improbable million-dollar judgment against him is really a significant risk.

[3] The American Heritage Directory of the English Language 857 (3d ed. 1993).

[4] It is possible that the proposed baseline does not represent an estimate of potential exposure at all, but is simply an arbitrary number. In effect, the lawyer makes a sporting proposition to the client: "If I can save you money below $X, I get Y% of it; if I cannot, you owe me nothing." Whether a fee agreement that, in effect, sets the lawyer's fee by a game of chance can be "reasonable" under Rule 1.5(a) is a question that we do not address here. We simply assume that the baseline value of the case represents a ballpark estimate of the client's exposure.

[5] The lawyer's risk is that the case is shakier and more difficult than she had anticipated, so that she puts in many hours for a small fee because she is unable to save much money below the agreed-upon baseline. The client's risk is the opposite: the case turns out to be unexpectedly easy, it settles for a small amount of money, and the client pays a large fee for very few lawyer hours.

Complicated information like this is hard to take in for an unsophisticated client. If the lawyer does not put it in writing, unsophisticated clients will have to trust their memory of a conversation about something out of their ordinary experience. Six months or two years later, a client with doubts about the bill will have nothing to talk over with the lawyer except that memory. If worst comes to worst and the client wants to challenge the reasonableness of the fee, he has nothing beyond his memory, and his possibly garbled understanding of what the lawyer told him many moons ago, to go on. That is unfair to the unsophisticated client. It puts that client at a disadvantage.

We believe that both the letter and the policy of Rule 1.5(c) require putting the analysis leading to the baseline in writing.

The text of Rule 1.5(c) is clear:

> "A contingent fee agreement shall be in writing and shall state the method by which the fee is to be determined, including the percentage or percentages that shall accrue to the lawyer in the event of settlement, trial, or appeal, litigation, other expenses to be deducted from the recovery, whether such expenses are to be deducted before or after the contingent fee is calculated, and whether the client will be liable for expenses regardless of the outcome of the matter." (emphasis added).

In a straight contingent fee, the Rule is traditionally understood to require only that the terms of the agreement be in writing. But the Rule does not actually say that. It says to put the "method by which the fee is to be determined" in writing. In a straight contingent fee, which has a hundred-year-old tradition, the "method" does not need more explanation than specifying the percentages and how the expenses are handled. That is not true with the reverse contingent fee. The reverse contingent fee is a relatively unfamiliar device. It has two variables that are both "soft" and unsettled by tradition: the percentage and the baseline.

If Rule 1.5(c) really meant that the percentage and expense arrangements are the only things that have to go in the fee agreement, it would have omitted the words "…the method by which the fee is to be determined, including…." We take it that those words are not surplus. The plain meaning of the Rule is that the written agreement must include the percentage and the expense arrangements, but not that those are the only items needed to state the method by which the fee is to be determined. An unfamiliar fee arrangement calls for more information in writing. The question is what this "more" includes, in a species of contingent fee that the Rule's drafters never thought about.

The Committee relies on the dictionary definition of "method" and the grammar of the phrase "method by which the fee is to be determined." We are skeptical that any substantive conclusions can be derived this way.[6] From the dictionary we learn that a "method" involves regularity. We agree. The first step of this regular method consists of estimating (or guesstimating) the client's exposure, either at trial or in the settlement process, in order to set the baseline. Whether or not that first step must go into the written agreement cannot be learned from the dictionary.

Neither does anything come from noticing that the phrase "is to be determined" is in the future tense. To be sure, if an reverse contingent fee specifies that "the fee will be X% of the money saved under $2 million," that is indeed a method by which the fee is to be determined. But so is "the fee will be X% of the money saved under $2 million, which represents Attorney's estimate of likely settlement" or "…which represents Attorney's estimate of potential liability in a jury trial." Grammar alone does not make the latter sentences any less a statement of the "method by which the fee is to be determined" than the first sentence. The issue dividing us from the Committee is not a verbal one.

In our view, when semantics and custom do not settle the scope of an ambiguous Rule, it helps to look at the practical point of the Rule. The practical point of imposing a writing requirement on lawyers is to protect clients by creating something objective that an impartial reviewer can examine to settle disagreements between the lawyer and the client.[7] Such a disagreement can be over the numerical terms of the agreement ("Forty percent? You told me thirty-three!"). But it can also be over the reasonableness of the agreement. In a straight contingency fee that specifies only the percentage and the handling of expenses, custom will enable prudent lawyers to evaluate whether the fee is reasonable.[8] A reviewing body knows that 33 percent is a reasonable contingency fee for many typical cases, and it knows that 80 percent is not.

In the reverse contingent fee, however, simply seeing a number like "$2 million" is not enough to know if the lawyer has proposed a reasonable baseline. Cases of this sort may typically settle for a quarter that amount. But $2 million could be a reasonable worst-case estimate of the client's exposure in the unlikely event that settlement fails and the case goes to trial. Neither way of arriving at the baseline is inherently unreasonable. The same number—$2 million in this example—can be a reasonable guesstimate of worst-case exposure to liability at trial and an absurdly inflated guesstimate of the settlement range. Without knowing what the number represents, a reviewing body would be unable to declare that the agreement has violated Rule 1.5(a)'s requirement that the fee "shall be reasonable." Ergo, the client loses.

It may well be that reverse contingent fees will mostly be proposed by sophisticated clients who understand quite well—maybe better than the lawyer—how to value cases. An insurer, for example, has extensive data on the settlement value of automobile collision cases. That insurer might well propose a flat fee with an reverse contingent fee "bonus" to defense counsel who can beat the averages. In such cases, we agree with the Committee's opinion: when the client proposes the terms of a reverse contingent fee, the written agreement need say nothing beyond noting that fact. That satisfies the letter of the Rule. But when the lawyer proposes a reverse contingent fee and a baseline for calculating it, a written agreement that includes the baseline value but not even a hint of the method the lawyer used to arrive at that baseline violates the Rule and under-protects clients. The Brown & Sturm case that the opinion discusses shows that lawyer overreaching in a reverse contingent fee is not merely a hypothetical danger to clients.[9]

[6] The dictionary definition of "method" is especially unhelpful. A method is a "manner" or "procedure." The same dictionary defines a "procedure" as a "manner" or "set of…methods." The American Heritage College Dictionary 1090 (1993). It likewise defines a "manner" as "a way of doing something," noting that in this sense the word is a synonym for "method." Id. at 825. The word "way," unsurprisingly, is defined as a "manner or method." Id. at 1527. A closed circle of synonyms chasing each other's tails tells us nothing.

[7] Obviously, written agreements protect lawyers too. Presumably, the Court of Appeals does not impose enforceable disciplinary rules to make sure that lawyers protect themselves.

[8] Rule 1.5(a)(3) makes "the fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services" a criterion of reasonableness.

Joseph Brent, PhD
Steven Ebbin, PhD
David Luban, PhD

Published: March 2009

Opinion No. 348

Accepting Credit Cards for Payment of Legal Fees

• A lawyer may accept credit cards from a client for payment of fees, including unearned fees (commonly referred to as a retainer or advance fees), so long as the lawyer ensures that she complies with applicable District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, including ensuring that she does not enter into a merchant agreement with the credit card company that violates the Rules.

Applicable Rules

• 1.5 Fees
• 1.4(b) Communications
• 1.6 Confidentiality of Information
• 1.15 Safekeeping Property
• 1.16 Declining or Terminating Representation
• 7.1 Communications Concerning Lawyer's Services

Inquiry

A lawyer inquired whether she may accept a credit card as payment for unearned (advance) fees from a client. This inquiry prompted the Committee to consider the broader question of the acceptance of credit cards to pay earned as well as advance fees.

Discussion

The District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct (Rules) do not address the issue of accepting credit cards for payment of legal fees. The issue, however, was addressed by our Committee in Opinion 23 (1976), as an interpretation of District of Columbia Code of Professional Responsibility, the predecessor of the Rules. Opinion 23 dealt only with the issue of accepting credit cards for payment for services rendered (earned fees), not the issue raised by this inquiry. Moreover, Opinion 23 was modeled after and relied upon ABA Formal Opinion 338 (1974), which the ABA has since withdrawn.

In light of the adoption of the Rules, opinions by courts and our Committee that expanded the permissible scope of advertising, and the evolution in the use of credit cards, the Committee withdraws Opinion 23 and examines anew the conditions under which a lawyer may accept credit cards for payment of fees and expenses, including as payment for advance (unearned) fees.

I. Accepting Credit Cards Generally

In Opinion 23, this Committee grudgingly approved accepting credit cards for payment of fees, but implied that the use of credit cards should be discouraged and limited. Today, credit cards are recognized as useful in facilitating the ability of many persons to obtain legal services at the time the services are needed and to pay for those services on a schedule that comports with their budgets. In addition, accepting credit card payment of fees provides lawyers with assurance that they will be paid for their services and obviates the need for them to expend time and money pursuing clients who do not pay on time.[1]

Many jurisdictions now recognize the benefits of accepting credit cards for the payment of legal services.[2] While the evolution of the use and acceptance of credit cards in society led many jurisdictions to approve the use of credit cards to pay for legal services, accepting credit cards for payment of legal services involves the participation of a third party—the credit card company—in the payment process and, therefore, raises concerns generally not present in the typical attorney-client fee arrangement. Thus, we must examine the ethical restrictions faced by lawyers as a result of the requirements credit card companies impose on lawyers as "merchants."[3]

The rights and duties of lawyers as merchants, of clients as cardholders, and of credit card companies as card issuers are contractual in nature. Each party contracts with the other independently, so there are three separate contracts to be considered. See Gregory E. Maggs, Regulating Electronic Commerce, 50 Am. J. Comp. L. 665, 678 (2002). While credit card merchant contracts applicable to lawyers may contain similar terms and conditions, there may well be as many differences as there are similarities among the form contracts used by credit card companies. Discussing the nuances of various agreements is beyond the scope of this opinion.[4]

We emphasize, however, that, because of the unique arrangements (where the lawyer and the client each has a contract with the credit card company that imposes different rights and responsibilities) and the ethical obligations imposed on lawyers by our Rules, it is imperative that lawyers (i) know and follow the Rules, (ii) know the specifics of their merchant agreements, and (iii) ensure that those agreements comply with the letter and the spirit of the Rules. In that regard, a central tenet that undergirds every successful lawyer-client relationship is communication. Clearly communicating with clients about the unique features and challenges involved in accepting credit cards for payment of fees will help lawyers avoid some of the ethical pitfalls that could attend this type of payment arrangement.[5] Rule 1.4(b) also requires lawyers to explain matters necessary to [1] Cf., D.C. Ethics Op. 310 (2002) (discussing considerations involved in attorney–client fee agreements and noting certain factors may have a positive impact on the formation of lawyer–client relationships).

[2] E.g., California Bar Formal Op. 2007-172 (2007); Colorado Formal Ethics Op. 99 (1997); Michigan Ethics Op. R.I. 168 (1963); Utah State Bar Ethics Advisory Op. 97-06 (1997).

[3] Lawyers who accept credit cards for payment of legal services are "merchants," as that term iscommonly used in contracts credit card companies use with business entities. The specifics of the "merchant agreement" (which sets forth the terms on which credit card companies will pay merchants who accept credit cards for payment) between the lawyers and the credit card companies may differ from other merchant agreements because the rules governing the lawyer–client relationship differ from those governing other business entities and their customers.

[4] In section III of this Opinion, we discuss some of the more salient requirements and prohibitions contained in credit card merchant contracts applicable to lawyers.

[5] Rule 1.5(b) requires that, when a lawyer has not regularly represented a client, the lawyer shall communicate in writing the basis or rate of the fee and the expenses for which the client will be responsible. The lawyer should also comply with Rule 7.1 when communicating with the client about accepting credit cards (e.g., disclose all facts necessary to ensure that the client is not misled concerning the lawyer's services).

[9] Brown & Sturm v. Frederick Road L.P., 768 A.2d 62 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 2001).

permit their clients to make informed decisions concerning their representation, which includes the consequences of paying by credit card.

II. Issues Presented in Accepting Credit Cards as Payment

A. Maintaining a Client's Confidences and Secrets

Rule 1.6(a)(1) provides that, "Except when permitted under paragraph (c), (d), or (e), a lawyer shall not knowingly reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client." Rule 1.6(e)(1) provides that, "A lawyer may use or reveal client confidences or secrets with the informed consent of the client."

Lawyers should advise clients that certain information, that may include "confidences or secrets," such as the client's identity, automatically will be revealed to the credit card company in credit card transactions. See Colorado Formal Ethics Op. 99 (1997) ("A lawyer cannot assume that a client who is paying a bill by credit card has impliedly authorized the attorney to disclose otherwise confidential information"). Where a client informs a lawyer that he wishes the fact of being represented to remain confidential, or a lawyer has reason to believe he does, the lawyer should be especially vigilant in informing the client that the use of credit cards involves the disclosure of some confidential information, and of the kind of information that is likely to be disclosed. See Id.

A credit card company may require a lawyer to provide information about the nature of services, with the amount of detail required determined by the particular credit card company. Therefore, a lawyer should make every effort to enter into an agreement with a credit card company that will allow her to provide generic descriptions of services rendered. Generic descriptions recommended by other jurisdictions include: "for professional services rendered," California Bar Formal Op. 2007-172 (2007); "services and expenses," or "fees and expenses," Colorado Formal Ethics Op. 99 (1997); "services and expenses" or "consultation," Michigan Ethics Op. R.I. 168 (1963). If this level of generality cannot be accomplished, the lawyer must inform the client and obtain his informed consent to whatever disclosures the credit card company requires the lawyer to make.[6]

A more troubling confidentiality problem is the requirement by some credit card companies that the lawyer cooperate with them in the event there is a dispute between the client and the company. The lawyer should first seek to enter into an agreement with a credit card company that relieves her of any obligation to cooperate with the company in the event of a dispute between the credit card company and the client. If that is not possible, the lawyer is obligated to inform the client of the ramifications of the lawyer cooperating with the credit card company in any dispute between the company and the cardholder, and to obtain the client's informed consent that he still wants to pay by using a credit card. In the event a dispute develops and the credit card company seeks the lawyer's cooperation, the lawyer must comply with Rule 1.6.[7] See generally Michigan Ethics Op. R.I. 344 (2008) (examining whether a lawyer may accept credit cards for payment of advance fees and discussing special concerns with respect to Rule 1.6).

B. Treatment of Fees Charged by Credit Card Companies for Processing Payment

Credit card issuers generally debit a merchant (here the lawyer) a percentage of the cardholder's (here the client's) payment as its fee for processing the payment. This practice raises the issue of how the lawyer may treat the credit card fee vis-à-vis her invoices for her services (i.e., whether to pass the fee on to the client or to absorb it as a cost of doing business).

Nothing in our Rules prohibits a lawyer from increasing her fee for legal services to cover any additional cost incurred in accepting credit cards. The only limitation imposed by the Rules is that the fee must be "reasonable." Rule 1.5(a). Among the factors to be considered in determining whether a fee is reasonable are "the limitations imposed by the client or by the circumstances." A client's need to procure legal services from a lawyer whom the client believes is qualified to meet his needs and a client's decision that using a credit card to pay for the services is the best means of obtaining those services are limitations or circumstances within Rule 1.5. We thus believe a lawyer properly may pass on to the client the fees charged by credit card companies for processing payment.[8]

In Opinion 310, this Committee examined the propriety of a lawyer charging interest when a client fails to pay timely and is instructive in assessing the propriety of passing on to clients the additional costs incurred in accepting credit cards. Recognizing that a lawyer must somehow account for the additional cost of clients who do not pay or who pay late, the Committee stated, "[I]f the lawyer can focus the lawyer's additional costs of dealing with clients who do not pay or pay timely on those clients themselves, that allows the lawyer to avoid attempting to spread those additional costs among all of the lawyer's clients." D.C. Ethics Op. 310 (2001).

We believe Opinion 345 also supports our view that a lawyer who incurs an additional cost for accepting credit cards may pass those costs on to the client who charged the legal services. In Opinion 345, this Committee recognized that a lawyer who incurs interest charges from her bank when she has used the firm's line of credit to advance to a client the costs of the representation may pass those costs along to the client. D.C. Ethics Op. 345 (2008). Just as the lawyer who passed on the interest charges assessed against her was not making a profit, the lawyer who passes on the fee that the credit card company charges for processing payments is not making a profit.[9]

Before passing on such fees, however, the lawyer must comply with Rule 1.5(b) by explaining to the client that the fee charged by the credit card company will be charged to the client as an expense. To guard against later misunderstanding, the Committee suggests that the lawyer go further and obtain the client's "informed consent" to being charged an additional amount to recapture the fees that the lawyer must pay the credit card company.[10]

[6] As defined in Rule 1.0(e), "'Informed consent' denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct."

[7] It is difficult to imagine that a lawyer would voluntarily cooperate with a credit card company if there is a dispute between the company and the client, absent a provision in the merchant contract that requires the lawyer to do so. A lawyer must resist any effort by a credit card company to compel her to disclose client confidences or secrets protected by Rule 1.6. Absent the client's informed consent, a contractual requirement of cooperation cannot trump the lawyer's obligation of confidentiality.

[8] An alternative way of accomplishing the same result might be to offer a discount to clients who pay cash or by check.

[9] At least one other jurisdiction considering this issue has found that the fees charged by the credit card company "are legitimate costs that the attorney may pass on to the client." Utah State Bar Ethics Advisory Op. No. 97-06 (1997).

[10] In the context of credit card use, this means the lawyer would explain to the client that the client's use of a credit card will increase the lawyer's fees by the exact percentage the credit card charges for a fee (e.g., if the client's bill is $5,000 and the credit card company charges three percent (3 percent), the client must pay $5,150).

We conclude that there is no ethical bar to lawyers passing on the credit card processing fees to their clients,[11] however, we note that as a matter of good business practice, lawyers may wish to follow the practice of other merchants and absorb the costs. See Utah State Bar Ethics Advisory Op. No. 97-06 (1997). In Michigan, lawyers are required to absorb these costs. Michigan Ethics Op. R.I. 168 (1963); compare California Bar Formal Op. 2007-172 (2007) (lawyer may "ethically absorb the service charge debited by the credit card issuer").

C. Advertising and Promoting the Acceptance of Credit Cards

When the ABA first considered use of credit cards–and in our now withdrawn Opinion 23–there was considerable discussion of the lawyer's ability to advocate and advertise the use of credit cards. Although these concerns now seem outmoded, we discuss them briefly.

Over the years, the Rules were changed to recognize the evolution in the legal profession with respect to lawyer advertising. Decades ago, it was recognized that advertising does not inherently bring dishonor to the profession and that prohibitions on all advertising conflicted with antitrust laws and the First Amendment. Rule 7.1 allows advertising so long as the lawyer does not use false or misleading statements. Stating that "the interest in expanding public information about legal services ought to prevail over considerations of tradition," Comment [2] to Rule 7.1 recognizes the dual benefits of advertising: it promotes the lawyer's active quest for clients, while at the same time, fulfills the public's need to know about legal services. Comment [3] to Rule 7.1 expressly states that the Rule permits public dissemination of information about "payment and credit arrangements."

Another issue is whether a lawyer may advocate the client's use of credit cards or just accept the cards passively. There is nothing in the Rules that explicitly prohibits a lawyer from encouraging a client to use a credit card for payment of legal services. Although we can foresee circumstances when encouraging a client in dire financial straits to pay by credit card might not be in the client's best interests, a lawyer is generally not a financial advisor. Unless the scope of the lawyer's representation includes such advice, in which case Rule 2.1 might be implicated, the client is responsible for evaluating his ability to pay the lawyer's fee and for deciding how to do so. Compare Utah State Bar Ethics Advisory Op. 97-06 (1997) (noting that, while nothing in Utah's Rules explicitly requires an attorney to discourage the use of credit cards for payment, economic factors of a client's situation could require the attorney to advise that client not use a credit card).

III. Issues Presented by Accepting Credit Cards for the Payment of Advance Fees and Expenses

Opinions from other jurisdictions generally conclude that a lawyer may accept credit cards for the payment of advance fees. See California Bar Formal Op. 2007-172 (2007); Colorado Formal Ethics Op. 99 (1997); Massachusetts Bar Ethics Op. 78 -11 (1978); Michigan Op. R.I. 344 (2008); North Carolina Formal Ethics Op. 97-9 (1998); Oregon Ethics Op. 2005-172 (2005). Contra Arizona Ethics Op. 08-01 (2008) ("Use of credit cards for payment of advance fees or expected costs is not ethically permissible in Arizona for several reasons"). With the exception of California, which has no requirement that lawyers deposit advances into trust accounts, these other jurisdictions require that the advance payments—whether paid in cash, by check, or by credit card—be deposited into the lawyer's trust account, as opposed to her operating account.

We find there is nothing in the D.C. Rules that prohibits a lawyer from using a credit card for unearned legal fees and expenses (advance fees), provided that the use of a credit card does not jeopardize the security of entrusted funds.

A. Depositing Advance Fees Into Trust Accounts

Rule 1.15(d) provides, "Advances of unearned fees and unincurred costs shall be treated as property of the client pursuant to paragraph (a) until earned or incurred unless the client gives informed consent to a different arrangement."

As we noted above, the law governing credit card transactions is contractual in nature, and the details of merchant agreements vary depending on the credit card company. While we cannot detail or discuss all the provisions of every agreement, many agreements include some or all of the following requirements and prohibitions:

- Requirement that reimbursement of unused fees must be credited to the user's card and not paid by cash or check;
- Requirement that the cardholder (client) have "chargeback" rights pending resolution of a dispute (i.e., the credit card company has the right to access the lawyer's account to debit funds previously deposited into that account and charge it back to the cardholder);
- Provision that in disputes, no "chargeback" is made, but the client would not be charged until the matter is resolved (both parties would have an opportunity to submit evidence and have the matter resolved by the company's dispute resolution section);
- Prohibition on charging for services before services are rendered;[12]
- Requirement that payments made to the lawyer by the credit card company be made through an approved Settlement Account.

Before accepting credit cards for an advance fee, the lawyer must have a complete and detailed understanding of the agreement imposed on her by credit card companies. In many cases it may prove impossible for the lawyer to deposit advance fees paid by credit card into trust accounts and adhere to the terms of the agreement. Funds in trust accounts belong to the clients, not to the lawyer. As such, they cannot be attached by the lawyer's creditors. But because many credit card agreements permit the credit card company to invade the merchant's bank account and charge back monies already paid the merchant if the customer disputes a bill, there is a danger that funds deposited in a lawyer's trust account might be "clawed back." Under some circumstances this could result in a situation where there are insufficient funds in the account.

For example, suppose a lawyer deposits an advance fee of $50,000 into her trust account and, as the fee is earned, transfers $40,000 to her operating account. If the client lodges a protest with the credit card company challenging the lawyer's right to payment, the credit card company, under its standard merchant [11] It may be that the lawyer's agreement with the credit card company addresses whether the fees can be passed on. This is a matter of contract, which we do not address.

[12] If the merchant agreement provides that services must have been rendered prior to the submission of charges, the lawyer may not accept a credit card as a payment of a retainer or advance. See Colorado Bar Formal Ethics Op. 99 (1997). The Colorado Opinion provides a much more detailed discussion of the nuances of merchant's agreements.

agreement, might invade the lawyer's trust account, and claw back the entire $50,000, pending resolution of the dispute. This would mean that the lawyer had insufficient funds in her account to cover her obligations to other clients whose funds she is holding. In some circumstances, it could even result in the account being overdrawn.

Because the Committee does not and cannot know the details of all contractual arrangements between lawyers and credit card companies, we cannot conclude that credit cards can never be used to pay advance fees into trust accounts. But if a credit card is used in this fashion, the lawyers must ensure that under no circumstances can the credit card company invade her trust account. If that possibility exists, a credit card may not be used. Moreover, the lawyer must understand all the provisions of her agreement with the credit card company to ensure that entrusted client funds are safe and secure. Absent that assurance, a credit card may not be used to advance entrusted funds.

B. Consent to Deposit Advance Fees in Operating Accounts

Rule 1.15(d) permits the deposit of advance fees into a lawyer's operating account provided that the client provides informed consent. Such fees are treated as the lawyer's property, although she has the obligation to and must have the wherewithal to repay them promptly if she does not earn them. To ensure that the consent provided by a client is "informed consent," the lawyer must explain that, unlike fees deposited in a trust account, these fees can be attached by the lawyer's creditors because legally they are the lawyer's property. Moreover, the provisions of the agreement with the credit card company may raise other issues if credit cards are used to pay advance fees into an operating account, which the lawyer must not only understand, but explain to her client.[13]

A lawyer who deposits credit card advance payments into an operating account potentially faces a dilemma with respect to charge-backs. An example may help explain the potential dilemma. Clients A and B retain Lawyer for unrelated legal work. Both are required to pay a substantial advance. Client B pays his advance by check and grants Lawyer permission to deposit the advance into her operating account. Client A chooses to pay the advance by credit card, and also grants Lawyer permission to deposit the advance into her operating account. Client A's credit card company has a policy of withdrawing money from merchants when the cardholder has a dispute with a merchant, pending resolution of the dispute.

Nine months into the relationship, Client A disputes his bill from Lawyer and contacts the credit card company to complain. The credit card company immediately invades Lawyer's operating account and withdraws the entire disputed amount, which is substantially all of the advance. Meanwhile, Lawyer has concluded service to Client B successfully and owes Client B a refund, which she promptly makes by issuing Client B a check drawn on the operating account. The charge-back by the credit card company has left Lawyer without sufficient funds to cover the check to Client B. Were this insufficiency of funds to occur in a trust account, the lawyer would face charges of misappropriations. Even if the lawyer technically has not misused Client B's funds because funds in the operating account are not "entrusted," she still has an obligation to refund unearned fees. Having insufficient funds in her operating account might jeopardize obligations to Client B.

As the foregoing example makes clear, even if advance funds may be deposited into a lawyer's operating account and thus are not impermissibly commingled, the lawyer must employ the necessary safeguards, including accounting procedures, to ensure that she remains in full compliance with all ethical rules. A lawyer may substantially eliminate the likelihood of a charge of misusing a client's funds if she follows a strict practice of billing clients only after the services have been rendered and withdrawing funds only after the dispute period (most cardholders typically have 120 days from the date of a transaction within which to dispute a charge). See Kentucky Ethics Op. E-426 (2007) (suggesting that a lawyer "could avoid the ethical implications of a chargeback by delaying disbursements until after the time a chargeback could occur").

C. Refunding Unearned Fees

Irrespective of whether a client consents to the lawyer depositing the advance into an operating account, Rule 1.16(d) requires that the lawyer return to the client any unearned or unused portion of advanced legal fees and costs at the termination of the lawyer's services. Specifically, Rule 1.16(d) provides, as pertinent, "In connection with any termination of representation, a lawyer shall take timely steps to the extent reasonably practicable to protect a client's interests, such as… refunding any advance payment of fee or expense that has not been earned or incurred."

Accepting credit cards for the payment of unearned fees imposes on a lawyer the obligation to know whether her merchant contract with the credit card company requires her to refund any unearned funds to the client directly, or whether she may leave the charge on the credit card and return the fees to the client by cash or check. If the credit card company requires crediting the refund to the account, the lawyer must explain this in writing before accepting the credit card for payment. See Rule 1.5(b) (requiring that "the basis or rate of the fee, the scope of the lawyer's representation, and the expenses for which the client will be responsible shall be communicated to the client, in writing, before or within a reasonable time after commencing representation"). See also Rule 7.1.

IV. Conclusion

Credit cards are an acceptable method of paying legal fees provided that the client understands and consents to whatever disclosures to the credit card company are required by the merchant agreement. The client must also be informed of the actual cost of using the credit card if the lawyer intends to recapture from her client the fees she must pay to the credit card company. While credit cards may also be used to pay advance fees or retainers, this may be done only if it does not endanger entrusted client funds and only if the lawyer thoroughly understands the merchant agreement and arranges her affairs so that she has the ability to meet her obligation to refund unearned fees.

Published: March 2009

[13] While a discussion of substantive law is beyond the scope of this Opinion, any lawyer who chooses to accept a credit card for payment of legal fees must be knowledgeable about and comply with federal and state consumer credit laws, such as the Truth in Lending Act (15 U.S.C. § 1666i); Regulation Z (12 C.F.R. § 226.12); and the District of Columbia Consumer Protection Procedures Act, (D.C. Code 29-3901, et seq.)

Opinion 349

Conflicts of Interest for Lawyers Associated with Screened Lawyers Who Participated in a Joint Defense Group

Joint defense agreements do not create "former client" conflicts under Rule 1.9 because members of a joint defense group do not become the lawyer's "clients" by virtue of such agreements. However, a lawyer who participates in a joint defense agreement may acquire contractual and fiduciary obligations to the members of the joint defense group who were not the lawyer's clients. Such obligations can give rise to a personally disqualifying conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4) to the extent that they materially limit the lawyer's ability to prosecute or defend a substantially related matter adverse to a joint defense group member.

Under Rule 1.10(a)(1), such conflicts are not automatically imputed to other lawyers in the lawyer's firm. If the lawyer has moved to a new firm since handling the joint defense group matter, other lawyers at the new firm could undertake a substantially related matter adverse to a joint defense group member, provided that the personally disqualified lawyer is timely screened from the new representation. The analysis is more difficult if the lawyer has remained at the same firm. If that firm wishes to undertake a related matter adverse to a member of the joint defense group, the firm must consider: (i) whether the entire firm is bound by a joint defense agreement that one of its lawyers signed while affiliated with the firm; and (ii) if not, whether the lawyers who would be handling the new matter might have been exposed to confidential information from the joint defense group matter while that matter was being handled by others in the same firm.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General)
- Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification General Rule)

Inquiry

The District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules") provide clear guidance to a lawyer who is considering taking on a representation that would be adverse to a former client of that lawyer or of another lawyer in the same law firm. The Committee has received multiple inquiries about whether and to what extent the Rules apply to representations adverse to members of a joint defense group who were never clients of the lawyer or law firm. In this opinion, the Committee considers two variations of the following scenario:

Lawyer A represented an individual in a criminal investigation focused on the individual's employer ("Employer") and others. Lawyer A executed a joint defense agreement with the other subjects of the investigation, including Employer, arising out of a common interest. Lawyer A subsequently received confidential information relating to the investigation from Employer and participated in meetings with Employer's counsel to discuss joint strategy and other work product. Lawyer A ultimately resolved the individual client's matter with the government, and the representation terminated.

Scenario #1—New Firm: After Lawyer A resolved the criminal matter on behalf of the individual, he left his original law firm and joined a new law firm ("New Firm"). Client X approaches New Firm about suing Employer for damages arising out of the conduct that gave rise to the criminal investigation. New Firm proposes to screen A from the representation. Lawyer A is the only lawyer at New Firm who participated in the joint defense agreement. Because that representation was completed before Lawyer A joined New Firm, there are no other lawyers at New Firm who represented the individual employee in the criminal investigation. Would this representation violate the Rules, in particular, Rules 1.6, 1.9, and 1.10?

Scenario #2—Same Firm: Lawyer A does not change law firms. After the resolution of the criminal matter, Client X approaches Lawyer A's law firm ("Firm") about suing Employer for damages arising out of the conduct that gave rise to the criminal investigation. Because the joint defense agreement that Lawyer A signed with Employer required A to keep confidential all information as well as work product shared by Employer, Firm proposes to screen Lawyer A and all the lawyers with whom he worked on the criminal investigation from participating in the lawsuit to be filed by Client X. Assuming that an effective screen is imposed, would Firm's representation of Client X against Employer violate of any of the Rules, in particular Rules 1.6, 1.9, and 1.10?

Analysis

In the District of Columbia, the Rules do not mention joint defense agreements. Certain decisions in other jurisdictions have disqualified lawyers from matters adverse to members of a joint defense group because of the past membership in the joint defense group of another lawyer in the same firm. See, e.g., All American Semiconductor, Inc. v. Hynix Semiconductor, Inc., 2009-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) ¶ 76,465 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 18, 2008), order clarified by 2009-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) ¶ 76,501 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 5, 2009); In re Gabapentin Patent Litig. 407 F. Supp. 2d 607 (D.N.J. 2005), reconsideration denied, 432 F. Supp. 2d 461 (D.N.J. 2006); National Medical Enterprises, Inc. v. Godbey, 924 S.W.2d 123 (Tex. 1996).1 Those cases relied upon the obligations that a lawyer owes a former client under the rules of other jurisdictions. In approaching these questions in the District of Columbia, one must distinguish between obligations imposed by the Rules and obligations arising under other law, such as the law of contracts or principles of fiduciary duty. This Committee's jurisdiction is limited to questions arising under the Rules.

A. Background.

1. Duties to Former Clients.

Without a former client's consent, a law firm may not represent others in suing the former client in matters that are the same as or substantially related to the matter in which the firm represented the former client. Rule 1.9 prohibits the lawyer who represented the former client from representing anyone against the former client in the same or in a substantially related matter.[2] Rule

[1] In the Gabapentin Patent Litigation case, for example, a law firm was disqualified from litigation despite the screening of two lateral attorneys who joined the firm during the litigation. The firm had obtained a consent from the laterals' former client. However, the firm was disqualified because it did not obtain separate consents from the other members of the joint defense group in which the laterals had participated. Finding "a fiduciary and implied attorney-client relationship between" the two laterals and the other members of the joint defense group, the court held that the other members of the joint defense group were, "by implication, [the laterals'] 'former clients'. . . ." 407 F. Supp. 2d at 615. The law firm was disqualified because the court concluded that the two laterals were personally disqualified under New Jersey's Rule 1.9, and that conflict was imputed to other lawyers in the same firm under New Jersey's Rule 1.10. Id. Under those rules, screening without a consent was not available to cure the conflict. Id. at 615-16.

[2] Rule 1.9 provides: "A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not there-

1.10(a) imputes that conflict to all other lawyers in the same law firm, even if those other lawyers had nothing to do with the representation of the former client.[3] When a lawyer joins a new firm, however, conflicts are imputed to the other lawyers in the firm only if the lawyer had "in fact acquired information protected by Rule 1.6 [confidentiality of information] that is material to the matter." Rule 1.10(b).[4] Although the Rules recognize the concept of a screen[5]—and require use of screens in certain circumstances—a screen alone does not resolve an imputed former client conflict under Rules 1.9 and 1.10. See D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 279 (1998).

2. Joint Defense Agreements Generally.

Joint defense agreements are entered into by parties who, by choice or by necessity given applicable conflict of interest rules, have separate counsel in the matter but have some common interests. They may be used in both criminal and civil matters. They may be written or unwritten. This Committee is not opining on the validity or intricacies of joint defense agreements, but sets forth here a brief background on such agreements as context for the application of the Rules to the questions presented.

A joint defense agreement (also known as a common interest agreement) is a way for clients and their lawyers to share privileged information with third parties without waiving otherwise applicable privileges.

> The joint defense privilege, often referred to as the common interest rule, is an extension of the attorney-client privilege that protects from forced disclosure communications between two or more parties and/or their respective counsel if they are participating in a joint defense agreement. It permits a client to disclose information to her attorney in the presence of joint parties and their counsel without waiving the attorney-client privilege and is intended to preclude joint parties and their attorneys from disclosing confidential information learned as a consequence of the joint defense without permission.

United States v. Hsia, 81 F. Supp. 2d 7, 16 (D.D.C. 2000) (citations omitted). "It protects communications between the parties where they are 'part of an ongoing and joint effort to set up a common defense strategy' in connection with actual or prospective litigation." Minebea Co. v. Papst, 228 F.R.D. 13, 15 (D.D.C. 2005) (citations omitted). "[T]he rule applies not only to communications subject to the attorney-client privilege, but also to communications protected by the work-product doctrine." Id. at 16 (quoting In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 902 F.2d 244, 249 (4th Cir. 1990)). "Although occasionally termed a privilege itself, the common interest doctrine is really an exception to the rule that no privilege attaches to communications between a client and an attorney in the presence of a third person." United States v. BDO Seidman, LLP, 492 F.3d 806, 815 (7th Cir. 2007).

As with any contract or other agreement, the precise terms of a joint defense agreement depend on the agreement itself. Some forms of joint defense agreement define in great detail the rights and obligations that each member of the joint defense group is assuming with respect to every other member of the group. For example, the joint defense agreement might specifically disclaim any attorney-client relationship with the members of the joint defense group who are not the participating lawyer's client. It might also provide a specific waiver to allow use of confidential joint defense information to cross-examine and impeach a member of the joint defense group who becomes a witness for the adversary after abandoning the joint defense through, e.g., a guilty plea or settlement agreement.

One form of joint defense agreement that does both provides as follows:

> Nothing contained herein shall be deemed to create an attorney-client relationship between any attorney and anyone other than the client of that attorney and the fact that any attorney has entered this Agreement shall not be used as a basis for seeking to disqualify any counsel from representing any other party in this or any other proceeding; and no attorney who has entered into this Agreement shall be disqualified from examining or cross-examining any client who testifies at any proceeding, whether under a grant of immunity or otherwise, because of such attorney's participation in this Agreement; and the signatories and their clients further agree that a signatory attorney examining or cross-examining any client who testifies at any proceeding, whether under a grant of immunity or otherwise, may use any Defense Material or other information contributed by such client during the joint defense; and it is herein represented that each undersigned counsel to this Agreement has specifically advised his or her respective client of this clause and that such client has agreed to its provisions.

United States v. Stepney, 246 F. Supp. 2d 1069, 1085 (N.D. Cal. 2003) (quoting Joint Defense Agreement, Am. Law Institute-Am. Bar Ass'n, Trial Evidence in the Federal Courts: Problems and Solutions, at 35 (1999)).

Indeed, the Stepney court recommended use of such a waiver in a criminal case after holding that a joint defense agreement which purported to create "a general duty of loyalty to all participating defendants" was "unacceptable" and supported by "neither precedent nor sound policy." 464 F. Supp. 2d at 1084-85.[6] The court found that "[a] duty of loyalty after represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent."

[3] Rule 1.10(a) provides:

> While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rules 1.7 or 1.9, unless:
>
> (1) the prohibition of the individual lawyer's representation is based on an interest of the lawyer described in Rule 1.7(b)(4) and that interest does not present a significant risk of adversely affecting the representation of the client by the remaining lawyers in the firm; or
>
> (2) the representation is permitted by Rules 1.11 [successive government and private employment], 1.12 [former arbitrator], or 1.18 [duties to prospective client].

[4] Rule 1.10(b) provides: "When a lawyer becomes associated with a firm, the firm may not knowingly represent a person in a matter which is the same as, or substantially related to, a matter with respect to which the lawyer had previously represented a client whose interests are materially adverse to that person and about whom the lawyer has in fact acquired information protected by Rule 1.6 that is material to the matter. The firm is not disqualified if the lawyer participated in a previous representation or acquired information under the circumstances covered by Rule 1.6(h) or Rule 1.18."

[5] See Rule 1.0(l) (defining "screened").

[6] See also Stepney at 1079-80 ("Joint defense agreements are not contracts which create whatever rights the signatories chose, but are written notice of defendants' invocation of privileges set forth in common law. Joint defense agreements therefore cannot extend greater protections than the legal privileges on which they rest. A joint defense agreement which purports to do so does not accurately set forth the protections which would be given to defendants who sign. In the present case, unless the joint defense privilege recognized in this Circuit imposes a duty of loyalty on attorneys who are parties to a joint defense agreement, the duty of loyalty set forth in the proposed agreement would have no effect other than misinforming defendants of the actual scope of their rights.") (footnote omitted).

between parties to a joint defense agreement would create a minefield of potential conflicts." Id. at 1083. Such conflicts would include:

- The inability to cross-examine at trial co-defendants who participated in the joint defense group but later decided to cooperate with the adversary and testify on its behalf.[7]
- The inability to "cross-examine a defendant who testified on his own behalf." Id.
- The inability "to put on a defense that in any way conflicted with the defenses of the other defendants participating in a joint defense agreement." Id.
- The inability to "shift blame to other defendants or introduce any evidence which undercut their defenses." Id.

As illustrated by the above, "a joint defense agreement that imposes a duty of loyalty to all members of the joint defense agreement eliminates the utility of employing separate counsel for each defendant and (for purposes of conflict analysis) effectively creates a situation in which all signing defendants are represented jointly by a team of all signing attorneys." Stepney at 1083. Such a situation is ethically impermissible in some circumstances, including those presented to the Stepney court. See id. at 1083-1084 ("The court certainly could not permit joint representation of defendants with such disjointed interests as those in the present case.") (citing Fed. R. Crim. P. 44(c)(2)).

Just as a joint defense agreement may contain a specific waiver to allow cross-examination and impeachment of a defecting joint defense group member, it might also provide specific agreed-upon ground rules to address situations in which:

- Other lawyers in a participating attorney's law firm are asked to represent clients in matters adverse to one or more non-client members of the joint defense group, including matters that are substantially related to the joint defense matter.
- A participating lawyer moves to another law firm which has, or is later asked to undertake, representations adverse to one or more members of the joint defense group that are substantially related to the joint defense matter.

The parties could agree, for example, that other attorneys at any law firm that the participating attorney might later join shall not be precluded by virtue of the attorney's past participation in the joint defense group from undertaking, or continuing to handle, potentially related matters adverse to one or more non-client members of the joint defense group, provided that the lawyer in question does not personally participate in the representation and is timely screened from it. Such an understanding would provide certainty and avoid potential issues under the rules of professional conduct in most jurisdictions by providing advance consent to the extent that a consent might be deemed to be required under the applicable rules.[8]

B. Joint Defense Agreements and the Rules.

In the District of Columbia, Rule 1.9 addresses only conflicts that involve a "former client" of the lawyer. By its own terms, Rule 1.9 creates no obligations with respect to a person or entity who never was a client.[9] Case law in the District of Columbia requires a showing "that an attorney-client relationship formerly existed" in order for the Rule to apply. Derrickson v. Derrickson, 541 A.2d 149, 152 (D.C. 1988). Because a non-client member of a joint defense group is not a "client"—and in many cases could not be a client under the applicable conflicts rules—Rule 1.9 does not preclude adversity to non-client joint defense group members. In the absence of a prohibited "former client" conflict under Rule 1.9, there is nothing to impute to other lawyers at the same firm under Rule 1.10(a).

Similarly Rule 1.10(b) speaks only to a situation in which a lawyer moves from one firm to another after having represented a "client" at the first firm. Nothing in the text of that rule prohibits other lawyers at the new firm from being adverse to a person or entity their new colleague never represented.

Nor does Rule 1.6 create any confidentiality obligations to non-clients that are enforceable through discipline under the Rules. The only obligations that Rule 1.6 imposes involve "a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client." A joint defense agreement does not make the parties "clients" of the participating lawyers. Indeed the raison d'être for a joint defense agreement is to share privileged information with non-clients.

Even though non-client members of a joint defense group are not "clients" or "former clients," they are "third parties" to whom an individual attorney may owe an obligation under a joint defense agreement. Such an obligation can give rise to a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7.

Rule 1.7(b)(4) addresses conflicts involving third parties:

> [A] lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if . . . the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests. (emphasis added).

Under this Rule, a lawyer's confidentiality responsibilities to a non-client member of a joint defense group may preclude the lawyer from undertaking a representation adverse to the member in a substantially related matter that implicates the confidential information. The lawyer will be personally disqualified from such a matter unless the lawyer can secure a release from the obligation.[10]

[7] See id. at 1083 ("Should any defendant that signed the agreement decide to cooperate with the government and testify in the prosecution's case-in-chief, an attorney for a non-cooperating defendant would be put in the position of cross-examining a witness to whom she owed a duty of loyalty on behalf of her own client, to whom she also would owe a duty of loyalty. This would create a conflict of interest which would require withdrawal. . . . [T]he existence of a duty of loyalty would require that the attorneys for all noncooperating defendants withdraw from the case in the event that any one participating defendant decided to testify for the government.").

[8] In some jurisdictions, consents must be in writing or confirmed in writing. See, e.g. ABA Model Rules 1.7(b)(4) and 1.9(a). While the D.C. Rules do not require that waivers be in writing (see Rule 1.7 cmt. 28), this Committee has recommended "that—for the protection of lawyers as well as clients—advance waivers be written." D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 309 (2001).

[9] See also ABA Formal Opinion 95-395, Obligations of a Lawyer Who Formerly Represented a Client in Connection with a Joint Defense Consortium (1995) (while a lawyer "would almost surely have a fiduciary obligation to the other members of the consortium . . . [h]e would not, however, owe an ethical obligation to them, for there is simply no provision of the Model Rules imposing such an obligation.").

[10] Conflicts arising under Rule 1.7(b) can be waived if "(1) each potentially affected client provides informed consent . . .; and (2) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected clients." Rule 1.7(c). In this context, of course, the non-client joint defense group member is not an "affected client" whose consent is required under 1.7(c). However, law independent of the Rules may require the lawyer to get a release of some kind before the lawyer may begin a representation that would otherwise be prohibited by the joint defense agreement. If the terms of that release impose any material limitations on the lawyer's rep-

Unlike other conflicts under Rules 1.7 and 1.9, a Rule 1.7(b)(4) conflict is not necessarily imputed to other lawyers in the same law firm. Rule 1.10(a)(1) takes such conflicts out of the general imputation rule:

> (a) While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rules 1.7 or 1.9, unless: (1) the prohibition of the individual lawyer's representation is based on an interest of the lawyer described in Rule 1.7(b)(4) and that interest does not present a significant risk of adversely affecting the representation of the client by the remaining lawyers in the firm . . . .

Thus, a joint defense agreement obligation to a non-client will be treated as an individual lawyer's obligation to a third party. That obligation is not imputed to other lawyers in the firm as long as the individual lawyer's interest does not present a significant risk of adversely affecting the representation of the client by the other lawyers in the firm. In most circumstances, deployment of a timely and effective screen will eliminate the risk that an individual lawyer's obligations under a joint defense agreement will adversely affect the client's representation by other lawyers in the firm.[11]

C. Application to the Pending Inquiry.

Both scenarios presented to the Committee for analysis involve a law firm being asked to represent Client X in related litigation against a non-client participant (Employer) in a joint defense agreement to which one of the firm's current lawyers, Lawyer A, had been a party. We assume the litigation will not involve or adversely affect the employee—Lawyer A's former client from the criminal investigation.[12] Lawyer A has confidential information from Employer that the joint defense agreement precludes him from sharing or using on another's behalf against Employer. The law firm seeking to represent X in the litigation against Employer plans to screen the lawyer from the representation.

The only difference between the two scenarios is that, in the first scenario, Lawyer A has changed law firms since handling the criminal matter. New Firm has been asked to represent X in the litigation and New Firm's only connection with the past criminal representation is that it is now associated with the lawyer who handled it at a previous firm. In the second scenario, by contrast, the law firm that is being asked to represent Client X against Employer is the same firm that Lawyer A was associated with during the representation of the employee in the criminal matter.

1. The Screened Lawyer Is At a New Firm, Which Has Been Asked to Handle the Related Matter Against the Joint Defense Group Member.

In the first scenario, New Firm should not be precluded from representing Client X in the litigation against Employer under Rules 1.7(b)(4) and 1.10(a)(1). While we assume Lawyer A at New Firm has relevant confidential information of Employer that cannot be shared with others because of the joint defense agreement, a timely and effective screen assures that Lawyer A will not violate the lawyer's own personal obligations under the joint defense agreement, and that others in New Firm will not be tainted by exposure to confidential information that cannot be used or disclosed. This is a situation in which there would not appear to be any "significant risk of adversely affecting the representation of the client by the remaining lawyers in" New Firm, so Lawyer A's personal disqualification would not be imputed to others in the firm. New Firm does not need a consent from Employer because Employer never was Lawyer A's client. Thus, Rule 1.9 does not apply to Lawyer A, and there is no Rule 1.9 conflict to impute to other lawyers in New Firm under Rule 1.10(a). Similarly, Employer's never-client status as to A means that the New Firm does not have an imputed conflict under Rule 1.10(b), which applies only to matters involving a lateral attorney's past representation of a "client."

2. The Screened Lawyer Has Stayed at the Same Firm, Which Now Has Been Asked to Handle the Related Matter Against the Joint Defense Group Member.

When Lawyer A stays at the same firm, the analysis under Rule 1.9 is the same as it was when he changed firms: Lawyer A has no conflict under Rule 1.9 because Employer was never Lawyer A's client. There is no Rule 1.9 conflict to impute to other lawyers in the same firm under Rule 1.10. However, Lawyer A will have a personally disqualifying conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4) if his obligations to third parties under the joint defense agreement will, or reasonably may, adversely affect his professional judgment on behalf of a client in a matter adverse to a joint defense group member.

As discussed above, an individual lawyer's joint defense agreement conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4) is imputed to other lawyers in the same law firm only if the personally disqualified lawyer's obligations under the joint defense agreement "present[] a significant risk of adversely affecting the representation of the client by the remaining lawyers in the firm" Rule 1.10(a)(1). The analysis of whether this will occur in the second scenario (where the lawyer stayed at the same firm) is complicated by two issues: (i) the possibility that the firm itself is bound by the joint defense agreement that one of its lawyers signed during an affiliation with the firm; and (ii) the practical difficulty of establishing a retroactive screen.

Putting aside the signing lawyer's individual obligations under a joint defense agreement, the lawyer's firm would need to consider carefully whether the firm and its other lawyers had any confidentiality or other relevant obligations under an agreement signed by a firm lawyer during the lawyer's practice with the firm. That analysis cannot be done in the abstract without reference to the terms of a specific agreement. However, it is unlikely that a firm could allow lawyers who had not participated in the prior representation to search the firm's files respecting that representation for information that would be useful in the case resentation of the client in the proposed matter—such as prohibiting the lawyer from using on the client's behalf relevant confidential information of which the lawyer is aware—Rule 1.7(c) will require an informed consent from the client in the matter. If the terms of the release place too many restrictions on the lawyer's proposed representation, the lawyer will not be able to satisfy the Rule 1.7(c)(2) requirement that he or she "reasonably believe[ ] that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation . . . ." In such event, the lawyer would have to decline the representation.

---

[11] Strictly speaking, a screen is not necessary if the personally disqualified lawyer avoids participation in the new matter and does not reveal any confidential information about the prior matter to the lawyer's colleagues, thereby fulfilling the lawyer's own obligations under the joint defense agreement. However, use of a screen is prudent to remind the personally disqualified lawyer of his obligations, to alert the involved lawyers to the existence of the issue, and to confirm their commitment to take extra care in the screened lawyer's presence.

[12] If the litigation did involve or adversely affect the lawyer's former client, the lawyer and the firm would be required to conduct an analysis under Rule 1.9 to determine whether the new matter could be accepted. Such adversity to the former client could exist if the representation of the new client exposed the former client to claims by other members of the joint defense group based on an alleged breach of the joint defense agreement. See also ABA Formal Opinion 95-395, supra.

against the joint defense group participant. Moreover, to the extent that information obtained pursuant to a joint defense agreement is protected under Rule 1.6, the firm and its other lawyers would be precluded from using that information for the advantage of another client, unless the former client's consent has been obtained or certain other Rule 1.6 exceptions apply.

In addition, the original firm's own involvement in the criminal investigation—through the then-and still-associated lawyer and any other firm attorneys or staff who participated in the representation – would raise questions about the timeliness and effectiveness of any screen it might erect to block the attorneys who planned to handle the substantially related litigation against Employer from exposure to confidential information arising from the earlier matter. While the firm could take steps to prevent future discussions of the past matter with the litigators on the new matter, it would also need to be sure that none of them was exposed to information about the case in the past, when there might not have been any reason to take extra steps to keep them from hearing about or discussing the criminal matter that was being handled by others in that firm.

Thus, in this scenario, the law firm likely would be precluded from undertaking the representation unless the law firm could conclude: (i) it and its other lawyers are not bound by the joint defense agreement; and (ii) none of the other lawyers had been exposed to any confidential information relating to the joint defense agreement.

This is an issue that could have been clarified by the terms of the joint defense agreement. The law firm in this scenario would have more options if the joint defense agreement provided that:

> (1) Screens would be erected within the firm so that only the participating lawyer and certain other named individuals associated with the firm would have access to confidential joint defense information; and
> (2) Nothing in the joint defense agreement would preclude screened lawyers in the firm from undertaking litigation and other matters adverse to non-client members of the joint defense group, including matters that might be deemed to be substantially related to the matter that is the subject of the joint defense agreement.

We acknowledge that it may be difficult in many circumstances to get potential joint defense group members to agree to such an approach.

Conclusion

Under the D.C. Rules, joint defense agreements with non-clients do not create "former client" conflicts for lawyers as to those non-clients under Rule 1.9. Joint defense agreements may create obligations to a third party, however, that will cause the individual participating lawyer to have a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4) in a proposed new matter adverse to the joint defense group member. However, such conflicts are imputed to other lawyers in the same law firm only if the personally disqualified lawyer's obligations under the joint defense agreement "present a significant risk of adversely affecting the representation of the client by the remaining lawyers in the law firm." Rule 1.10(a)(1). Where the joint defense group matter was handled by the personally disqualified lawyer while at a different law firm, the lawyer's new firm may avoid any imputed disqualification by screening the lawyer from the new matter. When the personally disqualified lawyer remains at the same law firm, however, other lawyers at that firm who are considering undertaking the new matter adverse to the joint defense group member likely will face a disqualifying conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4) unless it is clear that: (i) none of them has any obligations under the joint defense agreement signed by another lawyer in the same firm; and (ii) none of them was exposed to confidential information about the past representation.

Inquiry No. 09-02-12
Published: September 2009

Opinion 350

Whether A Lawyer Is Obliged To Surrender To A Former Client Work-Product Procured Through The Former Client's Factual Misrepresentations

A lawyer who drafted a brief and affidavit in reliance upon fraudulent factual misrepresentations made by a former client has no duty under Rule 1.16(d) to surrender these documents to the client. Rule 1.2 prevents a lawyer from assisting a client in conduct that the lawyer knows is fraudulent. Such conduct includes assisting a client in drafting or delivering documents that the lawyer knows are fraudulent. The lawyer may: (1) if practicable and effective, redact all portions of the documents containing misrepresentations and surrender to the client only the redacted documents; (2) if redaction is impractical or ineffective, refuse to produce the entire document to the client; or (3) if the client consents or Rule 1.6(d) is applicable, turn over the unredacted document(s) to the former client's successor counsel with full disclosure as to the fraud contained in the document(s). The lawyer should also write the client demanding the immediate destruction or return of all prior drafts of documents containing the misrepresentations and directing the client not to file such documents with the court.

Applicable Rules

- 1.0(f) Definition of Terms
- 1.2(e) Assisting Wrongful Conduct by Client
- 1.6(d) Confidentiality
- 1.16(d) Termination of Representation
- 3.3(a) Candor to Tribunal

Inquiry

After drafting a brief and affidavit which included various material factual representations asserted by the client, a lawyer discovered that those representations were false and, refusing to file such fraudulent documents with the court, the lawyer withdrew from the representation. The former client now demands that the lawyer surrender these documents, but the lawyer has reason to believe, though not actual knowledge, that the former client intends to file the brief and affidavit in going forward with the case. The client did not owe the lawyer any outstanding legal fees at the time the lawyer terminated the representation.

Discussion

Pursuant to Rule 1.16(d):

> In connection with any termination of representation, a lawyer shall take timely steps to the extent reasonably practicable to protect a client's interests, such as . . . surrendering papers and property to which the client is entitled. . . .[1]

The Legal Ethics Committee has consistently determined that under the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, the entire file belongs to the client and must be surrendered to the client upon termination of the representation, unless the client has agreed otherwise or unless the lawyer is permitted by

[1] Emphasis added.

Rule 1.8(i) to retain unpaid attorney work product.[2] Here the Committee is presented, however, with the narrow question of whether a former client is entitled to a lawyer's work product containing fraudulent misrepresentations or omissions. We conclude that he is not.

The lawyer's duty to remove misrepresentations before surrendering the documents arises under Rule 1.2(e), which prohibits the lawyer from assisting a client "in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent." Particularly instructive is Comment [7], which provides that "the lawyer is required to avoid assisting the client, for example, by drafting or delivering documents that the lawyer knows are fraudulent."

Additionally, Rule 3.3(a)(1) prohibits a lawyer from "knowingly mak[ing] a false statement of fact or law to a tribunal . . .;" Rule 3.3(a)(2) prohibits a lawyer from "knowingly . . . assist[ing] a client to engage in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent . . ." (emphasis added); and Rule 3.3(a)(4) prohibits a lawyer from "offer[ing] evidence that the lawyer knows to be false." We conclude that a lawyer who knows that the former client's representations are false and has good reason to believe that the former client (whether through another lawyer or pro se) intends to file the brief and affidavit containing such misrepresentations would violate Rule 3.3 by surrendering such documents to the former client.[3]

Rather than decline to produce the entire document to the former client, the lawyer may, where practicable and effective, opt to redact all factual misrepresentations of which he knows—and all legal analysis and discussion which rely upon or incorporate such misrepresentations—and surrender only such redacted affidavit and brief. An effective redaction is where the lawyer excises sufficient material, including context where necessary, such that the client cannot simply re-insert the fraudulent facts or misrepresentations and file the brief essentially unchanged from its original fraudulent form.[4]

Even where a lawyer acts with utmost diligence to either withhold the entire document or surrender only a carefully redacted version to the client, there nonetheless remains the potential for the former client to use the lawyer's past services to perpetrate a fraud upon the tribunal. For this reason, the lawyer should also transmit a letter to the former client demanding that the former client immediately destroy or return all prior drafts of documents containing or making use of the misrepresentations and directing the client not to file the brief and affidavit, or an earlier draft thereof.[5]

In the event that the former client attempts to perpetrate a fraud upon the tribunal by filing the fraudulently obtained documents or by forwarding the documents to successor counsel for use on the client's behalf, and if substantial injury to another's financial interests or property are reasonably certain to result from the former client's fraud, then Rule 1.6(d) permits the original lawyer to make disclosure of the fraud to successor counsel or the tribunal, regardless of client consent. Specifically, Rule 1.6(d) provides:

> When a client has used or is using a lawyer's services to further a crime or fraud, the lawyer may reveal client confidences and secrets, to the extent reasonably necessary:
>
> (1) to prevent the client from committing the crime or fraud if it is reasonably certain to result in substantial injury to the financial interests or property of another; or
>
> (2) to prevent, mitigate, or rectify substantial injury to the financial interests or property of another that is reasonably certain to result or has resulted from the client's commission of the crime or fraud.

As such, disclosure is permitted, and not mandated, in those circumstances where substantial injury to a third party's financial interests or property is reasonably certain to result from the former client's fraud, and any disclosure under this rule must be limited to that which is reasonably necessary to prevent, mitigate, or rectify the substantial injury. Alternatively, counsel may disclose the fraud to successor counsel, without concern for 1.6(d)'s limiting factor of reasonably certain substantial injury, if counsel obtains his former client's consent to do so.

Conclusion

Rule 1.16(d) does not require a lawyer to surrender to a former client a brief and affidavit that were fraudulently procured through the client's factual misrepresentations. Rather, the lawyer should (1) if practicable and effective, redact the sections of the documents containing factual and legal misrepresentations and surrender only those portions of the documents not containing misrepresentations to the former client, (2) if not practicable or effective, withhold the documents in their entirety, or (3) if the client consents or Rule 1.6(d) is applicable, turn the unredacted document(s) over to the former client's successor counsel with full disclosure of the fraud contained in the document(s).

---

[2] See Legal Ethics Opinion 250 (Duty to Turn Over Files of Former Client to New Lawyer When Unpaid Fees are Outstanding.); Legal Ethics Opinions 286 (Former Client Files) and Legal Ethics Opinion 333 (Surrendering Entire Client File Upon Termination Of Representation). Rule 1.16(d) references Rule 1.8(i), which permits a lawyer—in very limited circumstances—to retain his or her work product after the termination of the representation where the client failed to pay for such work product. In this case, however, there were no outstanding legal fees owed by the client to the lawyer at the time the lawyer terminated the representation.

[3] We recognize that having "good reason to believe" a fact is different from having actual knowledge of it. See Rule 1.0(f) (defines "knowingly" and "knows" as "actual knowledge of the fact in question," which "may be inferred from the circumstances.") While, in the instant case, the lawyer lacks actual knowledge that the former client intends to use the work product in question, the lawyer does have actual knowledge that the client fraudulently procured the lawyer's work product. Under these circumstances, the lawyer's actual knowledge of his client's fraud, taken together with his reasonable belief that the client intends to file the documents, requires that the lawyer refuse to surrender the unredacted documents to the client.

[4] This can be facilitated, for example, by "cutting and pasting" the documents to excise the misrepresentations or by drawing lines in indelible ink through the misrepresentations. The lawyer should also indicate in the redacted document in some clear fashion that the redactions are being made to prevent fraud. The Committee recognizes that distinguishing those portions of the document that the client may otherwise be entitled to receive from those that are predicated on information that is found to be fraudulent, may not always be easy and requires some amount of professional discretion. Arguably, delivering remaining portions of documents that appear to be truthful, but later turn out to also contain misrepresentations may present some risk that the lawyer may be deemed liable for that information he "should have known" was false. However, we think such a standard is too broad and does not have a basis in the language of the rules. Whether redaction of a document is effective rests in the good faith judgment of the lawyer.

[5] Were the lawyer to discover that the client filed an earlier draft of the fraudulent documents, the lawyer may reveal the client's misrepresentations "to prevent the client from committing the crime or fraud if it is reasonably certain to result in substantial injury to the financial interests or property of another" or "to prevent, mitigate or rectify substantial injury to the financial interests or property of another that is reasonably certain to result or has resulted from the client's commission of the crime or fraud." See Rule 1.6(d). A lawyer's duty to take prompt remedial measures pursuant to Rule 3.3(d) to correct a fraud perpetrated upon the tribunal does not apply here because a lawyer's obligation to remediate ends with the lawyer's withdrawal from representation. See Comment [12] to Rule 3.3.

Opinion 351

Sharing Legal Fees with Clients

In the particular circumstances presented, the payments to clients contemplated by the inquiries below do not violate Rule 5.4(a)'s prohibition against sharing legal fees with nonlawyers.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.5(a) (Fees)
- Rule 1.8(d) (Conflict of Interest: Specific Rules)
- Rule 1.15(b) (Safekeeping Property)
- Rule 5.4(a) (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)

Inquiry

The Legal Ethics Committee ("Committee") has been asked whether two proposed payments by lawyers to their clients violate the fee-sharing prohibition of Rule 5.4(a) of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules").

Scenario One: Plaintiff and Lawyer A have a contingent fee agreement under which Lawyer is to receive one-third of any recovery.[1] Plaintiff is offered a $90,000 settlement by Defendant, but Defendant insists that the settlement agreement designate $60,000 as attorney fees and $30,000 as compensatory damages. (The Plaintiff's claim arises under a "fee-shifting" statute that provides for attorney fees.) As contemplated by her agreement with Plaintiff, Lawyer A wants to retain only $30,000 in attorney's fees (one-third) and allocate the other $30,000 (of designated "attorney fees") to Plaintiff. Plaintiff, therefore, would end up with $60,000 of the $90,000 settlement payment, as contemplated by the contingent fee agreement made by Plaintiff and Lawyer A at the beginning of the engagement.

Scenario Two: Pro bono Lawyer B receives attorney fees under a fee-shifting statute and wants to give the awarded fees to his client ("Client"), who is an individual. Lawyer B has not made an advance commitment to pay Client the attorney fee or any other sum.

[1] Scenario One offers no explanation for Defendant's proposed allocation of the settlement amount. We express no view on the propriety of Defendant's proposed designation of $60,000 of the settlement amount as "attorney fees" and $30,000 as "compensatory damages," or the propriety of any acquiescence by Plaintiff or Lawyer A in that designation.

Discussion

"A lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer." D.C. Rule 5.4(a). One of the five exceptions to this prohibition is relevant to, but not dispositive of, Scenario Two:

> (5) A lawyer may share legal fees, whether awarded by a tribunal or received in settlement of a matter, with a nonprofit organization that employed, retained, or recommended employment of the lawyer in the matter and that qualifies under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code.

The prohibition is intended "to protect the lawyer's professional independence of judgment." Comment [1] to D.C. Rule 5.4; accord Comment [1] to ABA Model Rule 5.4; Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers § 10, cmt. b (2000) ("Restatement"). Other authorities have spoken of the need to ensure that the lawyer will control the litigation, the deterrence of solicitation by nonlawyer intermediaries, and the protection of clients from unreasonably high fees. Emmons, Williams, Mires & Leech v. California State Bar, 6 Cal. App. 3d 565, 573-74, 86 Cal. Rptr. 367, 372 (Ct. App. 1970); ABA Formal Op. 87-355 (1987); ABA Informal Op. 86-1519 (1986).

A Restatement comment on the prohibition focuses on the situation where the nonlawyer is entitled to share the lawyer's fees—a situation that does not obtain in either scenario set out above:

> A person entitled to share a lawyer's fees is likely to attempt to influence the lawyer's activities so as to maximize those fees. That could lead to inadequate legal services. The Section should be construed so as to prevent nonlawyer control over lawyers' services, not to implement other goals such as preventing new and useful ways of providing legal services or making sure that nonlawyers do not profit indirectly from legal services in circumstances and under arrangements presenting no significant risk of harm to clients or third persons.

Restatement § 10, cmt. b (emphasis added). Moreover, this Committee has counseled against an unduly broad reading of Rule 5.4(a), D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Op. 233 (1993), and the Virginia Bar's ethics committee has said that "application of Rule 5.4(a) must move beyond a literal application of language of the provision to include also consideration of the foundational purpose for that provision." Va. Legal Ethics Op. 1783 (2003); see Emmons, Williams, Mires & Leech, 6 Cal. App. 3d at 575, 86 Cal. Rptr. at 373 (focusing on "policy objectives" of the rule).

Most federal fee-shifting laws make attorney fee awards the property of the client, rather than of the lawyer. Central States, Southeast and Southwest Areas Pension Fund v. Central Cartage Co., 76 F.3d 114, 116 (7th Cir. 1996) (Easterbrook, J.); see, e.g., Evans v. Jeff D., 475 U.S. 717, 730 (1986) (Civil Rights Attorney's Fee Awards Act of 1976, 42 U.S.C. § 1988); Venegas v. Mitchell, 495 U.S. 82, 87 (1990) (same).[2] Some federal fee-shifting statutes, though, envisage awards to the lawyer, e.g., Rodriguez v. Taylor, 569 F.2d 1231, 1245 (3rd Cir. 1977) (Age Discrimination in Employment Act), and some state laws do the same, e.g., Flannery v. Prentice, 28 P.3d 860, 862 (Cal. 2001) (California Fair Employment and Housing Act).[3] Awards made to the client, of course, do not implicate Rule 5.4(a). See Central States, 76 F.3d at 116 (where statutory fees are client's property, their contractual allocation between client and lawyer does not raise a fee-splitting issue).

We do not think that either proposed payment would constitute a prohibited sharing of legal fees. In Scenario One, the "fee" for purposes of Rule 5.4(a) is the amount agreed upon in advance between Plaintiff and Lawyer A. It is not the sum designated in the settlement agreement as "attorney fees." This is so even if the applicable fee-shifting statute assigns ownership of such funds to the lawyer. The fact of the advance agreement ensures that the proposed payment would not interfere with the lawyer's independence of judgment or contravene the other rationales for the prohibition that are noted above. Indeed, a failure by Lawyer A to give Plaintiff $60,000 of the $90,000 settlement amount would violate the contingent fee agreement, see Venegas, 495 U.S. 82 (lawyer and client may agree to a fee that exceeds the amount ultimately awarded under 42 U.S.C. § 1988); Va. Legal Ethics Op. 1783 (2003) (sustaining payment to client of portion of "fee" received from adverse party that exceeds fee contractually agreed upon between lawyer and client), might constitute an improper withholding of client funds in violation of Rule 1.15(b), see In re Haar, 667 A.2d 1350 (D.C. 1995), and—given that $60,000 represents two-thirds of the settlement amount—might constitute an unreasonable fee in violation of Rule 1.5(a).

[2] The Supreme Court soon will consider whether Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA) fee awards belong to the lawyer or the client. Compare Ratliff v. Astrue, 540 F.3d 800 (8th Cir. 2008) (EAJA awards are made to attorney, not client), cert. granted, 174 L. Ed. 2d 631, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 5148, 78 U.S.L.W. 3169 (No. 08-1322) (Sept. 30, 2009), and Marre v. United States, 117 F.3d 297, 304 (5th Cir. 1997) (same), with Stephens v. Astrue, 565 F.3d 131 (4th Cir. 2009) (EAJA awards are made to client), and Reeves v. Astrue, 526 F.3d 732 (11th Cir. 2008) (same). The Court's decision in Ratliff should not affect the conclusions of this opinion. If EAJA fees are the property of the client, there presumably is no issue under Rule 5.4(a). If the award is the property of the lawyer, this opinion presumably will apply in respect of EAJA awards in the same way it applies to awards under other fee-shifting statutes.

[3] Flannery indicates that its rule can be varied by "an enforceable agreement to the contrary" between lawyer and client. Flannery, 28 P.3d at 862.

In Scenario Two, we assume that the fee award to which the inquiry refers is the property of Lawyer B rather than Client. Otherwise there presumably would be no issue under Rule 5.4(a). See Central States, 76 F.3d at 116; Turner v. Secretary of the Air Force, 944 F.2d 804, 808 (11th Cir. 1991) (court's award of statutory attorney fees to client does not violate prohibition on attorney's splitting fees with client). Also, we understand that there has been no advance commitment by Lawyer B to pay Client an amount equal to Lawyer B's fee or, for that matter, any amount. Accordingly, we think the proposed payment is not the sharing of a fee but an ex gratia payment.[4] See National Treasury Employees Union v. U.S. Dep't of the Treasury, 656 F.2d 848, 853-54 (D.C. Cir. 1981) (noting that lawyers are not prohibited from donating their fees to charity or to their employers); Jordan v. United States Dep't of Justice, 691 F.2d 514, 516 n. 14 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (same).

Finally, neither scenario implicates Rule 1.8(d)'s prohibition on advancing or guaranteeing financial assistance. This is because there is no indication in either instance that the lawyer promised, let alone made or guaranteed, any such payment while the litigation was pending.

This Committee's charter limits it to addressing whether the proposed payments violate the D.C. Rules. D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Comm. R. A–1, C–4. We accordingly do not address such issues as the tax consequences of the proposed payments.

Conclusion

Accordingly, in the specific circumstances presented by these inquiries, neither proposed payment by a lawyer to the client would violate the fee-sharing prohibition of D.C. Rule 5.4(a).

Adopted: November 2009

Opinion 352

Professional Responsibility Duties for Temporary Contract Lawyers and the Firms that Hire Them

The imputation of a temporary contract lawyer's individual conflicts to a hiring firm under D.C. Rule 1.10 depends on the nature and extent of the lawyer's relationship with the firm and the extent of the temporary lawyer's access to the firm's confidential client information. A temporary contract lawyer who works with the same firm sporadically on a few different projects, or on a single project for a longer period of time, would not be "associated with" the hiring firm if the firm does not have or otherwise create the impression that the temporary contract lawyer has a continuing relationship with the firm, and the firm institutes appropriate safeguards to ensure that the temporary contract lawyer does not have access to the firm's confidential client information except for the specific matter or matters on which he is working.

In addition, the temporary contract lawyer and the hiring firm must protect the confidentiality of all client information, and the firm must take appropriate steps to avoid obtaining the confidences and secrets the temporary contract lawyer learned during his former employment.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.9 (Duties to Former Clients)
- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification: General Rule)
- Rule 4.4 (Respect for Rights of Third Persons)

Inquiry

The Committee has received an inquiry from a temporary contract lawyer who works for Law Firm A, which is representing a party in a multi-party case. The project the temporary contract attorney was hired to perform ends, and Law Firm A terminates the contract. The litigation of the case continues. Law Firm B, a firm representing another party adverse to the party Law Firm A represents in the same or a substantially related case, wants to hire the temporary contract lawyer to perform work on an unrelated matter.[1]

The temporary contract lawyer would work solely on a single matter for Law Firm B, performing tasks such as digesting transcripts and reviewing discovery documents for responsiveness and privilege. The temporary contract lawyer works through a number of temporary service agencies that have an arrangement under which Law Firm B pays for the temporary contract lawyer's services.

The temporary contract lawyer might work for Law Firm B at a satellite office, essentially a warehouse resembling a call center, but with computer terminals instead of telephones. Alternatively, the temporary contract lawyer might work in a conference room or other utility space onsite at Law Firm B set up specifically for the project that is segregated from the rest of the firm's premises. The documents pertaining to the temporary contract lawyer's assignment would be accessed electronically by a secure line restricted to review of the documents only for the single unrelated matter. On the basis of these facts, the temporary contract lawyer asks whether his individual conflicts would be imputed to Law Firm B under D.C. Rule 1.10(b).

The Committee also recognizes that because of the imputation provisions of D.C. Rule 1.10(b), temporary contract lawyers often may have difficulty surviving a firm's conflict review process because they frequently move from one law firm to another and repeatedly go through the conflicts review process. As a result, their ability to find work may be significantly restricted. Therefore, we also provide some general guidance regarding the circumstances when a temporary contract lawyer may be "associated with" a hiring firm, and his conflicts accordingly imputed to the firm.

[4] Given the express, specific exception in Rule 5.4(a)(5) for payments to certain charitable organizations, though, we think the proposed payment would be prohibited by Rule 5.4(a) had it been agreed upon between Lawyer B and Client, an individual, or promised by Lawyer B, in advance. This is because a limited express exception ordinarily means that other, similar potential exceptions are not granted. The relevant legal maxim is expressio unius est exclusio alterius (i.e., the expression of one thing implies the exclusion of others).

[1] The temporary contract lawyer is personally prohibited from working on the same or substantially related matter for an adverse party under D.C. Rule 1.9, unless the former client consents. See D.C. Rule 1.9 ("A lawyer who has previously represented a client in a matter shall not represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent.").

Discussion

In Opinion 284, the Committee defined a "temporary lawyer" as:

> one who is not a partner and who is employed by a practitioner or a law firm to work on either a specific project or matter or for a fixed or otherwise limited period of time. If the relationship is expected to last indefinitely, regardless of whether it actually does, the [lawyer is not considered to be a temporary lawyer].

D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 284 (1998). The Committee noted that part-time lawyers who work exclusively with one firm for an indefinite period of time are not temporary lawyers. The Committee pointed out that a "temporary lawyer may be hired directly or through an employment agency for a fee, and may be paid directly by the law firm or by the agency." Id. The Committee also recognized that there is wide array of employment arrangements between hiring firms and temporary contract lawyers. Id. As a result, whether a temporary contract lawyer is "associated with" a firm will depend on the facts and circumstances of each situation.

D.C. Rule 1.10(b) governs the imputation of conflicts for lawyers moving from one firm to another. The rule provides in relevant part:

> When a lawyer becomes associated with a firm, the firm may not knowingly represent a person in a matter which is the same as, or substantially related to, a matter with respect to which the lawyer had previously represented a client whose interests are materially adverse to that person and about whom the lawyer in fact acquired information protected by Rule 1.6 that is material to the matter.

Thus, typically, if a lawyer leaves one law firm to work at another law firm, the lawyer's new firm would be prohibited from representing a client with interests materially adverse to those of the lawyer's former client in the same or substantially related matter if the lawyer has material confidential information about the matter. See D.C. Rule 1.10, cmt. [17] ("[U]nder paragraph (b), if a lawyer left one firm for another, the new affiliation would preclude the lawyer's new firm from continuing to represent clients with interests materially adverse to those of the lawyer's former clients in the same or substantially related matters."); D.C. Rule 1.10, cmt. [15] ("The provisions of paragraphs (b) and (c) which refer to possession of protected information operate to disqualify the firm only when the lawyer involved has actual knowledge of information protected by Rule 1.6."); D.C. Rule 1.6 ("Except when permitted under paragraph (c), (d), or (e), a lawyer shall not knowingly: (1) reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client; (2) use a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client to the disadvantage of the client; (3) use a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client for the advantage of the lawyer or of a third person.")[2]

D.C. Rule 1.10(b) applies only when a lawyer is "associated with a firm." Comment [1] to D.C. Rule 1.10 provides guidance regarding when lawyers are associated in a firm:

> [T]wo practitioners who share office space and occasionally consult or assist each other ordinarily would not be regarded as constituting a firm. However, if they present themselves to the public in a way suggesting that they are a firm or conduct themselves as a firm, they should be regarded as a firm for purposes of the Rules. The terms of any formal agreement between associated lawyers are relevant in determining whether they are a firm, as is the fact that they have mutual access to confidential information concerning the clients they serve.

D.C. Rule 1.10, cmt. [1].

The Committee previously has considered whether a contract lawyer would be associated with a firm under D.C. Rule 1.10(a)[3] where a law firm sought to hire a former firm lawyer on a contract basis to assist in providing legal services to some of the firm's clients. See D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 255 (1995). In that situation, the former lawyer was not included on the firm's letterhead or in other listings of the firm's lawyers. The firm screened the lawyer from confidential information about firm clients on matters in which he was not employed as an independent contractor. Id. In addition, the firm's promotional materials and letters to clients that mentioned his availability would make clear that he was available to work on specific matters on a case-by-case basis and that he was not going to have a continuing relationship with the firm. Id. Based on these facts, the Committee concluded that:

> [T]he association of a lawyer with a firm on an ad hoc, case-by-case basis does not create that kind of continuing relationship, triggering imputation under Section 1.10 of the individual lawyer's disqualifications to the firm–except with respect to the individual matters on which the lawyer is associated with the firm–so long as the firm does not create the impression among its clients or the public at large that such a continuing relationship exists.

Id.

The Committee also has addressed whether attorneys who share office space and/or services are associated in a firm under D.C. Rule 1.10. See D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 303 (2001). The Committee opined that attorneys participating in such arrangements must take all steps reasonably necessary to protect the confidentiality of their individual client information and the independence of their respective practices. Id. The Committee added that any sharing arrangements should be structured to avoid creating the impression that the attorneys are affiliated with one another. Id. The Committee concluded that office- and/or service–sharing arrangements could create imputed conflicts for the participating attorneys, but noted that any particular situation would have to be evaluated on a case-by-case basis.Id.

As the comment to Rule 1.10 and our prior opinions suggest, whether a temporary contract attorney is "associated with" a hiring firm will depend on the scope of the attorney's relationship with the firm, the length of the attorney's service to the firm, and the potential for his exposure to the firm's confidential client information. The analysis is not affected by whether the hiring firm or a contracting agency directly pays the temporary contract lawyer.

In the specific situation presented by this inquiry, the temporary contract lawyer does not have a past or ongoing association with Law Firm B. Law Firm

[2] The clients may waive a firm's disqualification under D.C. Rule 1.10. See D.C. Rule 1.10(d) ("A disqualification prescribed by this rule may be waived by the affected client under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7.").

[3] D.C. Rule 1.10(a) provides that: "While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rules 1.7 or 1.9, unless: (1) the prohibition of the individual lawyer's representation is based on an interest of the lawyer described in Rule 1.7(b)(4) and that interest does not present a significant risk of adversly affecting the representation of the client by the remaining lawyers in the firm; or (2) the representation is permitted by Rules 1.11, 1.12, or 1.18."

B hired him to work on one project of limited duration. He will work in a separate location away from the firm's office space or in a segregated area within the firm. His electronic access to the firm and the confidential information of its clients is confined to the specific project on which he is working. We think that in this circumstance the temporary contract lawyer would not be "associated with" the hiring firm (Law Firm B), and thus, his conflicts would not be imputed to Law Firm B under D.C. Rule 1.10(b). Accordingly, the hiring firm must conduct a conflict check only for the matters on which the temporary contract lawyer will be working for the firm.

On the other hand, a temporary contract lawyer who is located in a firm's office space, works simultaneously on multiple projects for the firm, is listed on the firm's website or other directories, and has access to the firm's e-mail system and electronic documents would be "associated with" the contracting firm.

In contrast, a temporary contract lawyer who works intermittently with the same firm on a small number of projects or on one long-term assignment would not be "associated with" the contracting firm so long as the firm does not have an ongoing relationship with the temporary contract lawyer. The contracting firm also must avoid creating the impression that the temporary contract lawyer is "associated with" the firm by listing him on the firm's letterhead, website or other directories, permitting him to use the firm's business cards, or introducing him to clients and others as a long-term member of the firm. In addition, the firm must take all appropriate steps to ensure that the temporary contract lawyer has access only to the confidential client information for the matter on which he is working.[4]

In circumstances where a temporary contract lawyer is not "associated with" the hiring firm, the temporary contract lawyer and the hiring firm still have professional responsibility obligations. The temporary contract lawyer must preserve any confidential client information learned during his prior employment. See D.C. Rule 1.6(g) ("The lawyer's obligation to preserve the client's confidences and secrets continues after termination of the lawyer's employment."); D.C. Rule 1.10, cmt. [16] ("Independent of the question of disqualification of a firm, a lawyer changing professional association has a continuing duty to preserve confidentiality of information about a client formerly represented. See Rule 1.6.").

The law firm must institute safeguards to prevent the improper disclosure or misuse of the firm's confidential client information, including talking with the temporary contract lawyer about his duty to avoid obtaining such information and executing a confidentiality agreement memorializing this understanding. See D.C. Rule 4.4(a) ("In representing a client . . . a lawyer shall not knowingly use methods of obtaining evidence that violate the legal rights of . . . a [third] person."). If the temporary contract lawyer is located in the firm's office space, the firm must take extra precautions to ensure that the temporary contract lawyer will not have access to the firm's confidential client information. The firm should locate the temporary contract lawyer in a place that is plainly designated for the temporary contract lawyer so that firm personnel will not leave confidential information in that space. Other safeguards might include securing file cabinets and storage areas containing confidential client files, notifying attorneys and staff not to discuss the firm's cases with the temporary contract lawyer, instructing attorneys and staff about their obligations to preserve the confidential information of the firm's clients and maintaining appropriate oversight over firm employees to ensure that they comply with these obligations. See, e.g. D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 279 (1998) (discussing elements of an effective screen to avoid imputed conflicts).

The hiring firm also must take steps to avoid obtaining any confidential client information the temporary contract attorney learned during his former employment. See D.C. Rule 4.4(a); D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 285 (1998) (Rule 4.4 prohibits attorneys in law firms that hire former government employees with confidential government information from inducing the employee to disclose privileged or statutorily protected information); D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 227 (1992) (opining that firm must not exploit any confidences or secrets paralegal obtained during her former employment).

Conclusion

Whether a temporary contract attorney is "associated with" the hiring firm pursuant to D.C. Rule 1.10(b) is a fact-bound inquiry and will depend on the scope and nature of the temporary contract attorney's relationship with the firm and the potential for his exposure to the confidences and secrets of the firm's clients for matters on which he is not working. When a temporary contract lawyer works on a single project for a firm, is physically segregated from the firm's office space, and has no access to the confidential information of the firm's other clients, he would not be associated with the contracting firm, and his conflicts would not be imputed under D.C. Rule 1.10(b).

The temporary contract lawyer and the hiring firm must preserve any confidential client information, and the firm should employ appropriate prophylactic measures to secure such information. The hiring firm also should take appropriate steps to protect the confidential information the temporary contract lawyer learned during his prior employment.

Opinion 353

Whether a lawyer representing a client with diminished capacity can seek the appointment of a substitute surrogate decision-maker when the current surrogate decision-maker is making decisions for the client against the advice of the lawyer

A lawyer representing an incapacitated person with a surrogate decision-maker should ordinarily look to the client's chosen surrogate decision-maker for decisions on behalf of the client and accord the surrogate decision-maker's choices the same weight as those of a client when the client is unable to express, or does not express, a contrary view. A lawyer may not substitute her judgment for the judgment of the surrogate decision-maker when the surrogate decision-maker is acting within the scope of the power afforded to her by law, was selected by the incapacitated person before becoming incapacitated, and is not engaged in conduct creating a risk of substantial harm or acting in a manner that would otherwise require a lawyer to withdraw from representation of a client acting in the same manner. If the surrogate decision-maker is engaged in conduct creating a risk of substantial harm or acting in a manner that would otherwise require a lawyer to withdraw from representation of a client acting in the same manner, then the lawyer may take protective action including seeking a substitute decision-maker. The lawyer may not withdraw because a withdrawal will substantially harm the client and no grounds for a prejudicial withdrawal under Rule 1.16(b) exist.

[4] Some firms may not have off-site space for temporary contract lawyers, and the firm's premises may not be equipped to accommodate a segregated space for them. In this instance, a hiring firm may avoid imputation of the temporary contract lawyer's conflicts only if the firm can demonstrate that alternative physical arrangements were not feasible, and it employs the prophylactic measures discussed in this opinion or their functional equivalent.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- Rule 1.14 (Client with Diminished Capacity)
- Rule 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation)

The Inquiry

A lawyer has requested guidance for resolving the following dilemma: the lawyer was hired by a durable power of attorney agent (POA agent) to represent an elderly incapacitated individual in a foreclosure suit involving that individual's residence.[1] The client is unable to communicate. The POA agent is the client's granddaughter as well as the client's primary caregiver. The client selected her granddaughter to be her POA agent before the client became incapacitated. The lawyer filed suit on the client's behalf alleging that the mortgage was an unconscionable, predatory home loan. The mortgage company is defending against the suit claiming the mortgage was fair, the family knew about the terms, and the family, including the POA agent, spent the money on themselves. According to the inquirer the family denies the allegations but the allegations have tainted the litigation. To improve the atmospherics and maintain the focus of the litigation on the nature of the loan, the lawyer asked the POA agent to resign in favor of an independent agent to present a "clean" agent to the court. The POA agent refused. The lawyer asks if he can or must withdraw based on the POA agent's alleged bad acts or whether he may pursue a substitute guardianship in spite of the POA agent's refusal to step down.

The question of pursuing a substitute guardian under these circumstances is one for which there is no clear answer. Instead a lawyer in this situation must engage in reasonable deliberation employing the framework provided by Rule 1.14. The lawyer could use information derived from the allegations made by the defendants to present to the court an ex parte request for a substitute guardian for the limited purpose of pursuing the foreclosure litigation. Alternatively, the lawyer could pursue the litigation with the current POA agent in place. As we discuss below, the choice between the two options depends on a reasoned assessment of the risks attendant to proceeding with the current POA agent weighed against the previously expressed wishes of the incapacitated person when she selected her POA agent.[2]

Discussion

The D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct regulate most aspects of the attorney-client relationship. Most duties imposed run from attorneys to clients. In its simplest form, a legally competent client hires a lawyer or firm to perform a distinct legal task. In such instances, it is easy to identify the client, and the client has no difficulty communicating with the attorney and making decisions regarding the representation.

Rule 1.14 addresses circumstances, such as those presented by this inquiry, when this paradigm breaks down. The Rule does so by creating a framework for modifying the ordinary relationship. In the first instance, the Rule directs that a "lawyer shall, as far as reasonably possible, maintain a typical client-lawyer relationship with the client" when "a client's capacity to make adequately considered decisions in connection with a representation is diminished." D.C. Rule 1.14(a). As explained in the treatise The Law of Lawyering

> Rule 1.14(a) establishes a preference for maintaining client-lawyer relationships that are normal 'as far as reasonably possible.' At some point, however, the ability of a disabled client to communicate or to take action is so limited that assigning that person the role of 'client' is a mere formality . . . . At that point, Rule 1.14(b) permits a lawyer to seek guidance from a guardian or to take other 'protective action.'

Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr. & W. William Hodes, The Law of Lawyering, 18-4.1 (3rd ed. Supp. 2004-2).

Rule 1.14 does not specifically address the role of the surrogate decision-maker. The comments to the Rule, however, state that "[i]f a surrogate decision-maker has already been appointed for the client, the lawyer should ordinarily look to that person for decisions on behalf of the client. . .[but] the lawyer should consult with the represented person to the maximum extent possible, as indicated in comment [2] above." D.C. Rule 1.14, Comment [4].

Comment [2] instructs that

> [t]he fact that a client suffers a disability does not diminish the lawyer's obligation to treat the client with attention and respect. Even if the person has a surrogate decision-maker, the lawyer should as far as possible accord the represented person the status of client, particularly in maintaining communication. "Surrogate decision-maker" denotes an individual or entity appointed by a court or otherwise authorized by law to make important decisions on behalf of an individual who lacks capacity to make decisions in one or more significant areas of his or her life.

D.C. Rule 1.14, Comment [2]. Thus, as here, when a client who has a POA agent is incapable of communicating with the lawyer, the lawyer would "ordinarily" look to the POA agent for all decisions made by a client.

The question of whether to seek a change in the POA agent for purposes of [1] We assume that the only client of the lawyer in this matter is the incapacitated person. In this instance, it is possible, absent clear instructions to the contrary, that the POA agent may believe she is also a client. The POA agent is not a lawyer and although the retainer agreement identifies the incapacitated person as the client, the verified complaint and discovery responses are signed and/or sworn to by the POA agent; the POA agent has been told that her communications with the lawyer are confidential; the communications between the POA agent and the lawyer have been treated as confidential by opposing parties; the POA agent lives in the residence that is the subject of the litigation; and the POA agent initiated the representation and signed the retainer on behalf of the client who is the owner of the home. If there is an attorney-client relationship with the POA agent as well as with the incapacitated person, a different analysis would apply and the rules governing conflicts would have to be analyzed. Because "[p]rinciples of substantive law external to [the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct] determine whether a client-lawyer relationship exists" we do not assess whether the POA agent is also a client of the lawyer. D.C. Rule 1.6 Comment [9].

[2] For purposes of this opinion, we make several assumptions that shape the analysis. First, we assume that the POA agent has the legal authority under District of Columbia law to make the decisions discussed in this opinion for the client. See D.C. Code § 21-2001 et seq. (Guardianship, Protective Proceedings and Durable Power of Attorney). Second, we assume that the client is entirely unable to communicate her desires. Third, we assume that there is no other source of information about the client's desires with respect to the house or the litigation to prevent the foreclosure. For example, that she had not previously written out her desires about her home. And, finally, we assume as noted above that the only client of the lawyer in this matter is the incapacitated person.

pursuing this litigation is a decision for which, under a normal attorney-client relationship, the attorney must defer to the client. Rule 1.2 requires that a lawyer "abide by a client's decisions concerning the objectives of representation . . . and shall consult with the client as to the means by which they are to be pursued." D.C. Rule 1.2(a). Comment [1] to D.C. Rule 1.2 addresses the distinction between the objective and means:

> A clear distinction between objectives and means sometimes cannot be drawn, and in many cases the client-lawyer relationship partakes of a joint undertaking. In questions of means, the lawyer should assume responsibility for technical and legal tactical issues, but should defer to the client regarding such questions as the expense to be incurred and concern for third persons who might be adversely affected.

D.C. Rule 1.2, Comment [1]. Though characterized by the inquirer as a means to advance the foreclosure litigation, replacing the POA agent is an objective of representation, as well as a means to advancing the foreclosure suit. As a means it is closer to "such questions as the expense to be incurred and concern for third persons who might be adversely affected" than it is to "technical and legal strategy." Thus in this circumstance the lawyer would typically "defer to the client," which, under these facts, means "ordinarily" looking to the POA agent for the decision.[3]

We are presented with the question of whether a disagreement between the lawyer and the surrogate decision-maker on a matter that is for the client to decide is an extraordinary circumstance in which the lawyer should not abide by the surrogate decision-maker's wishes on behalf of a client with diminished capacity. The tenor of Rule 1.14 and the comments to the Rule make clear that the drafters envisioned extraordinary circumstances as those in which the client disagrees with the surrogate decision-maker and may have the capacity to make decisions on the particular issue in dispute.[4] That is not the circumstance presented here.

Rule 1.14 and the comments also address the ability of a lawyer to take protective action for a client with diminished capacity who does not have a POA agent. Rule 1.14 permits protective action "when the lawyer reasonably believes that the client has diminished capacity" and "is at risk of substantial physical, financial or other harm unless action is taken . . ." D.C. Rule 1.14 (b). If this threshold is met, the lawyer may "consult[] with individuals or entities that have the ability to take action to protect the client and, in appropriate cases, seek the appointment of a surrogate decision-maker." Id. Neither the Rule nor the comments explicitly address the circumstance here, namely that there is a surrogate decision-maker who is acting within her authorized power but refuses to follow the advice of counsel.

The tension presented by this inquiry is described in The Law of Lawyering.

> When the three-way relationship is functioning properly, the guardian can be thought of as the "primary client", as described in §2,7, while the impaired person—or perhaps the best interests of the impaired person—becomes the "derivative" client. The lawyer functions appropriately by assisting the primary client in carrying out his "objectives," which the law assumes will usually be in the best interests of the disabled person. When the person's disability is so severe that there is not even an ability to formulate or communicate ideas, the lawyer should realize that the guardian is no more capable of ascertaining the person's best interests than is the lawyer, but neither is he any less able to do so. In this context the "best interest" of the disabled person is an abstraction, and the lawyer has no special ability to second-guess on behalf of the derivative client.
>
> On the other hand, there may be cases in which it is obvious where the disabled person's best interests lie, and that the guardian is acting contrary to them. In such cases (a conservator looting his ward's estate is the most obvious example), the lawyer may have a duty to act adversely to one client in order to serve the other, as in other situations involving primary and derivative clients.

Hazard & Hodes, The Law of Lawyering, 18-16 (emphasis in the original).

Is failing to follow the advice of the attorney in this circumstance obviously contrary to the incapacitated person's interests such that the lawyer can take action counter to the POA agent's direction? We think the answer comes from the guidance provided in Rule 1.14 for taking protective action.

> When the lawyer reasonably believes that the client has diminished capacity, is at risk of substantial physical, financial or other harm unless action is taken and cannot adequately act in the client's own interest, the lawyer may take reasonably necessary protective action, including consulting with individuals or entities that have the ability to take action to protect the client and, in appropriate cases, seeking the appointment of a surrogate decision-maker.

D.C. Rule 1.14(b).

It could be argued that the POA agent has a conflict of interest with the client with respect to this decision and should remove herself as the surrogate decision-maker. On the other hand, the POA agent is the client's granddaughter. She lives with her grandmother. She has an interest in winning the litigation. She is the primary caregiver. The client selected her as the POA agent before the client became incapacitated. Maintaining her role as the POA agent is consistent with "respecting the client's family and social connections" and with "the wishes and values of the client to the extent known." D.C. Rule 1.14, Comment [5].[5] Although the surrogate decision-maker is not completely disinterested, this is not an instance of a conservator looting her ward's estate.

In this instance, while the inquirer expressed some concerns about the POA's past conduct, nothing in the inquiry suggests that the POA agent is currently engaged in criminal conduct, intends to engage in criminal conduct, or intends to use the lawyer's services to engage in criminal conduct or perpetrate a fraud on the court. Nor is there any indication that the POA agent is currently failing to provide ongoing care to the client, or failing to pursue any legal recourse to prevent the foreclosure. As explained below, if any of these circumstances was present, the lawyer would be permitted to take protective action, including seeking a substitute decision-maker.

[3] For clients with diminished capacity, Rule 1.2 directs a lawyer to Rule 1.14 – "In a case in which the client appears to be suffering mental disability, the lawyer's duty to abide by the client's decisions is to be guided by reference to D.C. Rule 1.14" (D.C. Rule 1.2 Comment [2]) – which in turn directs a lawyer to the surrogate decision-maker.

[4] This opinion does not address circumstances in which the client can communicate his desires and those desires conflict with the direction being given by the POA agent. An analysis of a dispute between the client and the POA agent requires assessing the specific authority of the surrogate decision maker, see D.C. Code § 21-2001 et seq. (Guardianship, Protective Proceedings and Durable Power of Attorney), and assessing the capacity of the client to make the decisions in question, see comment [1] to Rule 1.14, (minors, the elderly, and the mentally ill "often [have] the ability to understand, deliberate upon, and reach conclusions about matters affecting the client's own well-being."). When a client with diminished capacity can communicate his desires, Rule 1.14 directs the lawyer to maintain a "typical client-attorney relationship" and thus may require that the lawyer advocate against the direction of the POA agent or seek a substitute agent. D.C. Rule 1.14(a).

[5] The District of Columbia's Guardianship Act also gives preference to the incapacitated person's choice. "Unless lack of qualification or other good cause dictates, the court shall appoint a guardian in accordance with the incapacitated individual's current stated wishes or his or her most recent nomination in a durable power of attorney." D.C. Code § 21-2043(b). See also D.C. Code § 21-2057 (a) (1) and (2) (appointment of a conservator).

Thus, neither the POA agent's interest nor allegations of past bad conduct requires protective action by the lawyer. Instead, the determination of whether protective action is permitted comes down to one of reasoned judgment about the impact of the POA agent's decision not to withdraw and her ongoing presence in the litigation.

If the difference between the lawyer's recommended course of action for withdrawal and the course preferred by the POA agent does not rise to the circumstance that would allow a lawyer to take protective action on behalf of a client if the disagreement was between the lawyer and a client with diminished capacity, then it is not permissible for a lawyer to take action against the directive of the client's surrogate decision-maker. Thus, if the ongoing presence of the POA agent in the litigation does not create a risk of substantial harm, the lawyer cannot seek a new surrogate decision-maker.

On the other hand if, in the lawyer's judgment, the failure to secure a "clean agent" presents a substantial risk that the client will lose her residence, then protective action can be taken. That action should be narrowly fashioned.[6] In the instant case, the information used to pursue a new surrogate should be limited to the allegations made by the defendant and the scope of the substitute guardianship should be limited to the instant litigation.

The inquiry also asked if withdrawing from the matter was required or an available option. According to the inquirer, withdrawal at this stage in the litigation will likely result in the residence being lost. Withdrawal that would harm the client is only permitted in five enumerated circumstances:

> [A] lawyer may withdraw from representing a client if withdrawal can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the interests of the client, or if:
>
> (1) The client persists in a course of action involving the lawyer's services that the lawyer reasonably believes is criminal or fraudulent;
>
> (2) The client has used the lawyer's services to perpetrate a crime or fraud;
>
> (3) The client fails substantially to fulfill an obligation to the lawyer regarding the lawyer's services and has been given reasonable warning that the lawyer will withdraw unless the obligation is fulfilled;
>
> (4) The representation will result in an unreasonable financial burden on the lawyer or obdurate or vexatious conduct on the part of the client has rendered the representation unreasonably difficult;
>
> (5) The lawyer believes in good faith, in a proceeding before a tribunal, that the tribunal will find the existence of other good cause for withdrawal.

D.C. Rule 1.16(b).

None of these circumstances are present here. Further, it is difficult to imagine a circumstance under which permissive withdrawal causing substantial harm would be appropriate when representing a client with diminished capacity. Instead, if the client or the POA agent were to engage in the conduct described in Rule 1.16(b) that would ordinarily cause a lawyer to withdraw, that is a circumstance under which the lawyer should take protective action pursuant to Rule 1.14. This could include seeking the appointment of a surrogate decision-maker if the client does not have one, or seeking a substitute surrogate decision-maker where the client does have one.

Conclusion

Representation of incapacitated clients can be difficult. The Rule guiding the attorney-client relationship with clients with diminished capacity is permissive and a rule of reason. "When the lawyer reasonably believes that the client . . . is at risk . . . the lawyer may take reasonably necessary protective action . . . ." D.C. Rule 1.14 (b). These cases will turn on the specific circumstances and the reasonableness of the decisions made by the lawyer.

In this opinion, we address a narrow set of facts—a severely incapacitated client, a previously selected surrogate decision-maker acting within the scope of the power afforded to her by law, and a disagreement about one part of the litigation. In this instance, the lawyer should look to the surrogate decision-maker unless the surrogate decision-maker's choice creates a risk of substantial physical, financial, or other harm to the incapacitated person.

Opinion 354

Providing Financial Assistance to Immigration Clients Through Lawyer's Execution of Affidavit of Support on Form I-864 as a Joint Sponsor

Lawyers in immigration matters may not execute an Affidavit of Support (U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services Form I-864) on the immigrant's behalf as a joint-sponsor while continuing to represent the immigrant in the matter. Typically, a person who signs an Affidavit of Support agrees to support the immigrant at an annual income that is not less than 125 percent of the federal poverty level so that the immigrant will not become a public charge. The ensuing contractual obligations continue for years after the immigrant is admitted on the basis of the Affidavit of Support. The Affidavit of Support is a guarantee of financial assistance to a client. Such guarantees are generally prohibited by Rule 1.8(d). Because the obligations continue long after the completion of the immigration proceeding, the undertaking does not fit within the narrow safe harbor of Rule 1.8(d)(2), which allows, but does not require, financial support strictly necessary to sustain the client during a proceeding. An Affidavit of Support undertaking by a lawyer to a client is also fraught with peril under Rule 1.7(b)(4) (conflicts of interest). Thus, a lawyer who wishes to serve as a joint sponsor for an immigration client by executing an Affidavit of Support on the immigrant's behalf must withdraw from the representation of that client before doing so.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- Rule 1.8(d) (Conflict of Interest: Advancing or Guaranteeing Financial Assistance to Client)
- Rule 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation)

[6] Comments [5] and [7] to Rule 1.14 address protective action and make clear that while the evaluation of the circumstances "is entrusted to the professional judgment of the lawyer," the actions taken should be the "least restrictive form of intervention" and should be guided by "the wishes and values of the client to the extent known, the client's best interest, the goals of intruding into the client's decision-making autonomy to the least extent feasible, maximizing client capacities and respecting the client's family and social connections."

Inquiry

In many immigration matters, federal law requires a U.S. relative who files an immigrant petition on behalf of an alien relative to sign an enforceable contract under which the sponsor agrees to maintain the sponsored immigrant at an annual income that is not less than 125 percent of the federal poverty line. That contract takes the form of an "Affidavit of Support" on U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services ("USCIS") Form I-864, which also requires extensive financial disclosures to establish that the signer has the means to satisfy the obligations it imposes. If the U.S. relative does not have a sufficient level of income or assets, he or she may seek a joint sponsor to sign an Affidavit of Support on behalf of the intending immigrant. Those obligations assumed by the sponsor (the U.S. relative) or the joint sponsor (another person signing a Form I-864) may last for up to ten years and may be enforced against the sponsor(s) by the immigrant, by the federal government, by any state or political subdivision of a state, or by any other entity that provides any means-tested public benefit. By signing the Affidavit of Support, the sponsor and the joint sponsor also agree to submit to the jurisdiction of any federal or state court for the purpose of enforcing those obligations. We have been asked whether the Rules of Professional Conduct permit a lawyer who is representing the prospective immigrant in the immigration matter to sign an Affidavit of Support as a co-sponsor in support of the client's application, thereby undertaking significant and long-term financial obligations to the client.

Analysis

Under federal law, prospective immigrants who are "likely at any time to become public charges" are "inadmissible." 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(4)(2010). USCIS thus requires proof that intending immigrants will not require public support. For family-based and certain employment-based immigration applications, the required showing is made through the filing of an "Affidavit of Support" by one or more persons who are sponsoring the immigrant. 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(4)(C)(ii), 1182(a)(4)(D), 1183(a)(2010).[1]

The Affidavit of Support[2] is an enforceable contract in which the signing sponsor "agrees to provide support to maintain the sponsored alien at an annual income that is not less than 125 percent of the Federal poverty line during the period in which the affidavit is enforceable." 8 U.S.C. § 1183(a)(1)(A).[3] This is a significant financial obligation, as illustrated by the following chart on USICS Form I-864P based on the 2009 Poverty Guidelines for the 48 Contiguous States and the District of Columbia:

Sponsor's Household Size	100% of Poverty Guidelines For sponsors on active duty in the U.S. Armed forces who are petitioning for their spouse or child	125% of Poverty Line For all other sponsors
2	14,570	$18,212
3	18,310	$22,887
4	22,050	$27,562
5	25,790	$32,237
6	29,530	$36,912
7	33,270	$41,587
8	37,010	$46,262
	add $3,740 for each additional person	Add $5,675 for each additional person

http://www.uscis.gov/files/form/i-864p.pdf (last visited January 7, 2010).[4]

The obligation "is legally enforceable against the sponsor by the sponsored alien, the Federal Government, any State (or any political subdivision of such State), or by any other entity that provides any means-tested public benefit." 8 U.S.C. § 1183(a)(1)(B). By signing the form, the sponsor also agrees to submit to the jurisdiction of "any federal or state court" for the purpose of enforcement of the obligations. 8 U.S.C. § 1183(a)(1)(C). Immigrants have successfully sued their sponsors to enforce these obligations.[5]

The sponsor must provide detailed information about the sponsor's own finances to show that he or she has the means to satisfy the support obligations. Should the immigrant ever apply for any means-tested public benefits, the sponsor's finances will be considered in determining whether the immigrant qualifies for the support. The same requirements apply to a joint sponsor who signs an Affidavit of Support on behalf of an intending immigrant.

The affidavit becomes enforceable against the sponsor(s) when the immigrant is admitted to the United States pursuant to the requested change in status. It expires only when the immigrant (1) becomes a U.S. citizen; (2) dies or permanently departs from the United States; or (3) is credited 40 quarters (or ten years) of work for Social Security purposes.[6]

Typically, the immigrant's sponsor is a spouse or another close relative (e.g., a parent or sibling) who can submit an immigrant petition on behalf of the intending immigrant. However, if that sponsor lacks the financial means to make the necessary showing, a "joint sponsor" may be enlisted to undertake the required support obligation. Our Committee has been asked whether the lawyer who is representing the immigrant with respect to the requested change of status from non-immigrant to U.S. permanent resident ("green card") status may also act as the immigrant's joint sponsor by executing an Affidavit of Support on the immigrant's behalf.

We assume that a lawyer would consider doing so only in extraordinary circumstances. The lawyer's own financial resources limit the lawyer's ability to do this. Moreover, each outstanding Affidavit of Support executed by the lawyer further limits the lawyer's ability to sponsor others for immigration to the United States, including the lawyer's own family members. Liability under the affidavit years after its signing could adversely affect the lawyer's ongoing ability to provide for the lawyer's personal and family needs.

Historically, lawyer conduct rules in many jurisdictions either prohibited or placed strict limitations on a lawyer's ability to provide or guarantee financial

[1] This Committee does not opine on questions of law outside of the Rules of Professional Conduct. The ethical question presented in this inquiry, however, demands a contextual understanding of certain requirements that arise under substantive immigration law. The accompanying discussion of immigration law reflects the Committee's understanding of relevant law for the sole purpose of analyzing the issues presented under the Rules of Professional Conduct.

[2] The form and its instructions are available at http://www.uscis.gov/files/form/i-864.pdf.

[3] Sponsors who are on active duty in the U.S. military and who are sponsoring a spouse or minor child need only show the ability to support at 100% of the federal poverty guidelines. However, the accommodation does not apply to joint or substitute sponsors.

[4] According to the instructions to Form I-864, the "household size" includes the signing sponsor, any spouse, any dependent children under the age of 21, any other dependents listed on the sponsor's most recent federal include tax return, all persons being sponsored in the affidavit of support, and any immigrants previously sponsored through an affidavit of support whom the signing sponsor is still obligated to support.

[5] See, e.g., Younis v. Farooqi, 597 Supp. 2d 552 (D. Md. 2009) (awarding summary judgment to immigrant in her Form I-864-based claim against her former husband).

[6] According to the form's instructions, "intending immigrants may be able to secure credit for work performed by a spouse during marriage and by their parent(s) while the immigrants were under 18 years of age."

assistance to a client.[7] The Affidavit of Support's guarantee to support the client at 125 percent of the federal poverty level is difficult to reconcile with such rules.

The District of Columbia has been more permissive in this area than some other jurisdictions. Rule 1.8(d) provides as follows:

> While representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation or administrative proceedings, a lawyer shall not advance or guarantee financial assistance to the client, except that a lawyer may pay or otherwise provide:
>
> (1) The expenses of litigation or administrative proceedings, including court costs, expenses of investigation, expenses or medical examination, costs of obtaining and presenting evidence; and
>
> (2) Other financial assistance which is reasonably necessary to permit the client to institute or maintain the litigation or administrative proceedings.

Comment [9] to Rule 1.8 explains the rule's history and its intended scope:

> Historically, under the Code of Professional Responsibility, lawyers could only advance the costs of litigation. The client remained ultimately responsible, and was required to pay such costs even if the client lost the case. That rule was modified by this court in 1980 in an amendment to DR 5-103(B) that eliminated the requirement that the client remain ultimately liable for costs of litigation, even if the litigation was unsuccessful. The provisions of Rule 1.8(d) embrace the result of the 1980 modification, but go further by providing that a lawyer may also pay certain expenses of a client that are not litigation expenses. Thus, under Rule 1.8(d), a lawyer may pay medical or living expenses of a client to the extent necessary to permit the client to continue the litigation. The payment of these additional expenses is limited to those strictly necessary to sustain the client during the litigation, such as medical expenses and minimum living expenses. The purpose of permitting such payments is to avoid situations in which a client is compelled by exigent financial circumstances to settle a claim on unfavorable terms in order to receive the immediate proceeds of settlement. This provision does not permit lawyers to "bid" for clients by offering financial payments beyond those minimum payments necessary to sustain the client until the litigation is completed. Regardless of the types of payments involved, assuming such payments are proper under Rule 1.8(d), client reimbursement of the lawyer is not required. However, no lawyer is required to pay litigation or other costs to a client. The rule merely permits such payments to be made without requiring reimbursement by the client.

The District of Columbia's approach is more permissive than that of some other jurisdictions because it allows, but does not require, minimum payments necessary to sustain the client during the litigation or administrative proceeding.[8] Jurisdictions with more restrictive rules have disciplined lawyers for violations despite assertions that the payments were motivated by humanitarian concerns. See, e.g., Mississippi Bar v. Shaw, 919 So. 2d 51 (Miss. 2005); Mississippi Bar v. Attorney HH, 671 So. 2d 1293 (Miss. 1996); Shea v. Virginia State Bar, 236 Va. 442, 374 S.E.2d 63 (Va. 1988).[9]

While more permissive than similar rules elsewhere, the District of Columbia's Rule 1.8(d) does have limits. The Affidavit of Support is a guarantee of financial assistance to the client. Rule 1.8(d) thus prohibits its execution by the client's lawyer unless the undertaking fits within one of the two exceptions at Rule 1.8(d)(1) and (d)(2). The exception at 1.8(d)(1) is not available because the Affidavit of Support does not involve the expenses of litigation or administrative proceedings.

Nor do the substantial and long-lasting support obligations imposed by the Affidavit of Support fit within the narrow confines of the Rule 1.8(d)(2) exception for "other financial assistance which is reasonably necessary to permit the client to institute or maintain the litigation or administrative proceeding." This exception is limited to payments which are "strictly necessary to sustain the client during the litigation, such as medical expenses and minimum living expenses." Rule 1.8 cmt. [9]. Its purpose "is to avoid situations in which a client is compelled by exigent financial circumstances to settle a claim on unfavorable terms in order to receive the immediate proceeds of settlement." Id. It does not extend to offering "financial payments beyond those . . . necessary to sustain the client until the litigation is completed." Id.

The Affidavit of Support requires the sponsor to guarantee financial assistance to the immigrant for years after a change of status is granted. Because the guarantee extends far beyond the duration of the subject matter of the representation—the immigration application—the Rule 1.8(d)(2) exception does not apply. A financial guarantee that extends long after a proceeding does not meet the during-the-proceeding limitation that the comments to Rule 1.8 make clear.[10]

Moreover, such an undertaking to a client is fraught with peril under another provision of the Rules of Professional Conduct: A lawyer has a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(4) if "[t]he lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests." The significant financial obligations imposed by the Affidavit of Support can create exactly the kind of conflict

[7] For example, DR 5-103(B) of the ABA's former Model Code of Professional Responsibility provided that "[w]hile representing a client in connection with contemplated or pending litigation, a lawyer shall not advance or guarantee financial assistance to his client, except that a lawyer may advance or guarantee the expenses of litigation, including court costs, expenses of investigation, expenses of medical examination, and costs of obtaining and presenting evidence, provided the client remains ultimately liable for such expenses."

[8] Accord Louisiana State Bar Ass'n v. Edwins, 329 So. 2d 437, 446 (La. 1976)("If an impoverished person is unable to secure subsistence from some source during disability, he may be deprived of the only effective means by which he can wait out the necessary delays that result from litigation to enforce his cause of action. He may, for reasons of economic necessity and physical need, be forced to settle his claim for an inadequate amount. We do not believe any bar disciplinary rule can or should contemplate depriving poor people from access to the court so as effectively to assert their claim."

[9] "There is an unmistakable undercurrent in Shea's argument to the effect that DR 5-103(B) is not really that important. The suggestion is that it prevents attorneys from being helpful and compassionate to clients who find themselves in dire financial straits during the course of litigation. The question which lurks below the surface of Shea's argument is this: Why can't a lawyer help a client who needs financial help so long as the client pays the money back from the proceeds of the litigation? The short answer to that question is that the disciplinary rule says that such conduct is improper. The broader answer is that the rule in question is intended and designed to maintain the independent judgment of counsel in the representation of clients." Shea, 236 Va. at 444-45, 374 S.E.2d at 64.

[10] The Affidavit of Support's financial guarantees are extraordinary in both their magnitude and duration. The fact that a particular financial commitment or guarantee by the lawyer might extend briefly beyond the duration of a litigation or administrative proceeding does not necessarily render that commitment or guarantee impermissible under Rule 1.8(d). For example, a lawyer whose impoverished client needs housing while awaiting a trial in three months could justify paying for a six-month lease on the client's behalf if no shorter term lease is available at a reasonable price.

addressed by this rule. A lawyer who has second thoughts or a change in financial circumstances, for example, may have an incentive to sabotage the client's immigration application so that the lawyer's support obligations never can take effect.

In addition, the circumstances that lead a lawyer to consider undertaking such extraordinary obligations on behalf of a particular client may suggest the presence of a different kind of personal interest conflict. Most rational lawyers would not—and financially, could not–undertake obligations like those imposed by the Affidavit of Support for any client. The fact that a lawyer would consider such an extraordinary undertaking for a particular, special client should cause the lawyer to question whether he or she can maintain the professional distance necessary to represent the client effectively and dispassionately.[11]

While conflicts under Rule 1.7(b)(4) can be waived under certain circumstances,[12] the enforceability of such a waiver from an individual immigration client in these circumstances is doubtful. See generally Rule 1.7 cmts. [28]-[29] (addressing elements of informed consent).

The Committee recognizes that a sponsor's execution of an Affidavit of Support on behalf of an intending immigrant is an act of extraordinary generosity and selflessness. This opinion should not be read to prohibit lawyers from engaging in such acts where their financial means and their relationships with particular immigrants enable and incline them to do so. Where a lawyer wishes to do so for a client in an immigration matter, however, the lawyer must first withdraw from that representation[13] and refer the client to other counsel. See Rule 1.16(a)(1).[14]

The other counsel to whom the matter is referred must not be in the same firm as the withdrawing lawyer. Under Rule 1.8(j), "while lawyers are associated in a firm, a prohibition [under Rule 1.8(d)] that applies to any one of them shall apply to all of them." This means that an individual attorney's disqualification on financial-support-to-client grounds is imputed to all other attorneys in the same law firm.[15]

This opinion does not address the situation in which the lawyer is also married or closely related to the intending immigrant, acting as the immigrant's primary sponsor, and required by law to execute an Affidavit of Support on the immigrant's behalf. Although we have not been asked to—and do not—reach a conclusion on that question, we note that, in other contexts, the Rules of Professional Conduct permit lawyers to provide services for close family members that would be prohibited for unrelated clients. See Rule 1.8(b).[16]

Conclusion

The District of Columbia's Rules of Professional Conduct do not permit a lawyer to execute an Affidavit of Support (USCIS Form I-864) as a joint sponsor on behalf of an immigration client. Lawyers who wish to sponsor an immigrant client by executing such an affidavit must withdraw from the representation before doing so.

Inquiry No. 09-09-22
Published: March 2010

Opinion 355

Legal Ethics Opinion 355 is currently being revised. Please contact ethics@dcbar.org if you have any questions."

[11] For an extreme example of a personal interest conflict of this nature, see the discussion of sexual relations between lawyer and client at Comments [37] and [38] to Rule 1.7.

[12] Rule 1.7(c) provides that such conflicts can be waived if:

> (1) Each potentially affected client provides informed consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation; and
>
> (2) The lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client.

[13] To avoid a violation of Rule 1.8(d), the lawyer must withdraw from the immigration matter as well as from any other representations of the client with respect to contemplated or pending litigation or administrative proceedings. In addition, withdrawal from representations of the client in matters that do not involve litigation or administrative proceedings may be required to avoid a violation of Rule 1.7(b)(4).

[14] Rule 1.16(a)(1) provides that "[e]xcept as stated in paragraph (c), a lawyer shall not represent a client or, where representation has commenced, shall withdraw from the representation of a client if: . . . the representation will result in violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct or other law. . . ." Rule 1.16(c) requires lawyers to comply with applicable law regarding notice to or permission of a tribunal when terminating a representation before that tribunal.

[15] Rule 1.10(a)(1) provides a separate imputation rule for conflicts arising only under Rule 1.7(b)(4). Such conflicts are imputed to other lawyers in the same firm unless the particular lawyer's disqualifying interest "does not present a significant risk of adversely affecting the representation of the client by the remaining lawyers in the firm." We need not consider whether that exemption from imputation might ever be satisfied in this context because Rule 1.8(j) does not contain a similar provision.

[16] Rule 1.8(b) prohibits lawyers from preparing wills or other instruments that give the lawyer (or a relative of the lawyer) any substantial gift from a client "except where the client is related to the donee." For the purposes of this rule, "related persons include a spouse, child, grandchild, parent, grandparent or other relative or individual with whom the lawyer or the client maintains a close familial relationship."

Legal Ethics Opinion 355 is currently being revised. Please contact ethics@dcbar.org if you have any questions.

Legal Ethics Opinion 355 is currently being revised. Please contact ethics@dcbar.org if you have any questions.

Legal Ethics Opinion 355 is currently being revised. Please contact ethics@dcbar.org if you have any questions.

Opinion No.356

Absence of Conflict of Interest When Lawyer Cannot Identify Affected Clients and Nature of Conflict; Applicability of "Thrust Upon" Exception Where Lawyer Cannot Seek Informed Consent.

Where a lawyer considers representing a client in a specific and discrete matter, and, at the commencement of that matter, knows that an identifiable second client, whether unrepresented or represented by separate counsel, will take a position

---

Court in Mance then goes on to analyze the disclosures made by the respondent and reviews the contents of the "conversation" between the respondent and the complainant. See id. at 1207. The result, in our view, is an ambiguity that does not overcome the Rules drafters' decision not to include a writing requirement in Rule 1.15(e).

adverse to the potential client, Rule 1.7(b)(1) requires the lawyer to disclose the conflict of interest and seek the informed consent of all potentially affected clients before undertaking the representation of the potential client. If the lawyer cannot identify the nature of the conflict or a specific client or clients who will take such an adverse position, however, there is no conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(1) and the lawyer may undertake the representation of the potential client without seeking the consent of another client or clients.

Where a lawyer is engaged in the confidential representation of a client and a second client thrusts a conflict of interest upon the lawyer that was not reasonably foreseeable, under Rule 1.7(b)(1), the lawyer's obligation to maintain confidentiality prevents her from obtaining informed consent of the second client under Rule 1.7(d), but she need not withdraw from the representation of the first client, unless there is also a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(2)-(4).

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)

Inquiry

The Committee has received an inquiry from a lawyer practicing in a highly specialized industry. One of her current clients, Client A, sought her advice in connection with its proposed acquisition of Company X. The transaction was subject to regulatory approval, and Client A, which is a foreign company, anticipated that its bid would generate scrutiny and opposition from the business and political communities. As a consequence, Client A asked the lawyer to keep the proposed bid confidential until the bid was formally announced.

The lawyer recognized that it was possible—and even likely—that one or more of her other industry clients might also bid to acquire Company X. The lawyer also believed that once Client A's bid became public, one or more of her other clients might intervene to oppose regulatory approval of Client A's bid. Importantly, the lawyer asserts that her industry experience was the only basis for her assumption that other industry companies might seek to acquire Company X or oppose Client A's bid, although she could not identify which of her clients, if any, might take either position.

As the inquiring lawyer explains, only a few lawyers practice in this specialized industry and those lawyers routinely represent multiple industry clients. Thus, if she had declined to represent Client A, other industry lawyers likely would confront similar dilemmas. Accordingly, the lawyer agreed to represent Client A in connection with its proposed transaction and worked intensely for several weeks to prepare its bid. Shortly before Client A was to announce its bid, another of the lawyer's industry clients, Client B, announced that it would submit a bid to acquire Company X. Client B uses the inquiring lawyer's services in other unrelated matters, but retained a different lawyer to represent it in connection with this proposed acquisition. Once Client A's bid is made public, Clients A and B will either compete directly for the right to acquire Company X, intervene with the regulator to prevent one another from obtaining regulatory approval for their respective bids, or both.

The inquiring lawyer believes that Client A lacks sufficient time to retain another lawyer, given the timing necessary for Client A to submit a successful bid. Further, the lawyer's representation of Client A remains confidential because Client A's bid has not yet been made public. Accordingly, she cannot disclose her representation of Client A to Client B.

The lawyer has submitted two inquiries to this Committee. First, the lawyer asks whether her agreement to represent Client A violated Rule 1.7(b)(1) of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules"). With respect to her second inquiry, the lawyer notes that although Client B's announcement of a competing bid creates a conflict of interest that can be waived by the informed consent of Clients A and B, the confidential nature of her representation of Client A prevents her from seeking such consent from Client B. The lawyer asks whether the Rules therefore require her to withdraw from her representation of Client A or whether she can continue to represent Client A without seeking Client B's informed consent.

Discussion

I. Absence of Conflict of Interest When Lawyer Cannot Identify Affected Clients and Nature of Conflict.

The first inquiry is whether a lawyer may undertake the representation of a client in a specific matter when the lawyer has reason to believe that another client will take a position adverse to that client in that matter, but cannot identify the nature of the conflict or the specific clients who might be affected.

Rule 1.7 aims to safeguard the duty of loyalty to one's client. To that end, Rule 1.7(b)(1) directs that:

> Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if:
>
> (1) that matter involves a specific party or parties and a position to be taken by that client in that matter is adverse to a position taken or to be taken by another client in the same matter even though that client is unrepresented or represented by a different lawyer.

The Rules provide an exception to this prohibition, however, when "each potentially affected client provides informed consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation" and the lawyer reasonably believes that she can provide competent and diligent representation to each potentially affected client. D.C. Rule 1.7(c). Absent such disclosure and informed consent, the lawyer may not undertake the proposed representation.

Generally, the application of Rule 1.7(b)(1) is straightforward. The present inquiry, however, requires us to assess a lawyer's obligations when the proposed representation of one client (Client A) may lead to taking a position adverse to another client, but the lawyer cannot identify the nature of the conflict or all potentially affected clients. We conclude that under those circumstances, there is no conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(1) and the lawyer may undertake the representation of Client A.

Rule 1.7(b)(1) does not explicitly address this question, but the text of the rule suggests that to be prohibited, a conflict must be clear, specific and not based on mere speculation. To obtain consent to a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(1), a lawyer must disclose to each potentially affected client "the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation." D.C. Rule 1.7(c) (1). The first part of this rule – i.e., that the lawyer must disclose the conflict to each potentially affected client – assumes that the lawyer can, in fact, identify a specific client before she has an obligation to disclose the conflict and obtain informed consent from the appropriate parties. The second part of the rule – i.e., that the lawyer must disclose the existence and nature of the conflict and adverse consequences – assumes that the lawyer knows, or reasonably should know, that a specific client will, in fact, take a position adverse to another specific client before any obligation to disclose is triggered. We therefore read Rule 1.7(b)(1) to prohibit only those representations in which the lawyer can identify (i) the nature of the conflict and (ii) the specific client or clients who might be affected.

That the inquiring lawyer's speculation was ultimately proven correct does not alter our reading of the rule or the basis for our conclusion. In the present inquiry, the lawyer's industry experience was the only basis for her belief that other industry companies—including, perhaps, one of her clients—might seek to acquire Company X. (For purposes of this opinion, we accept and rely upon the inquiring lawyer's representation that her belief that one or more of her other clients might also bid to acquire Company X was not based on confidential information from any of her clients but solely on her industry expertise and experience.) The sophisticated industry lawyer may have a more nuanced, specific and detailed view of potential conflicts than the outside objective observer. But Rule 1.7(b)(1)'s prohibition cannot depend upon whether a lawyer's speculation about specific industry events, which are often based on unpredictable business judgments, is proven correct. Such expertise and instinct may serve clients well in transactional negotiations and litigation strategy, but it does not inform the test of what constitutes a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(1).

A lawyer's obligations under Rule 1.7(b)(1) are clear when specific, identifiable clients take or will take adverse positions in a specific matter, but the lawyer's representation of one client is confidential. Where a lawyer's "obligation to one or another client . . . precludes making such full disclosure to [a potential new client]" to obtain a waiver, "that fact alone precludes undertaking [a new] representation." D.C. Rule 1.7, cmt. [27]; see D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 309 (2001) (noting, in the context of advance waivers, that "if the lawyer cannot disclose the adversity to one client because of her duty to maintain the confidentiality of another party's information, the lawyer cannot seek a waiver and hence may not accept the second representation"); D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 276, n. 5 (1997) (noting that situations may arise in which the lawyer's confidentiality obligations preclude disclosure of relevant results of a conflicts check to the parties to a mediation and finding that in such cases, "the lawyer/mediator would have no choice but to resolve the problem by withdrawing as mediator without further comment").[1]

But the mere possibility, or even likelihood, of adversity between two clients does not create a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(1). "A conflict of interest is involved if there is a substantial risk that the lawyer's representation of the client would be materially and adversely affected by the lawyer's . . . duties to another current client . . . ." Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 121 (2000). As the Restatement notes, however, "[t]here is no conflict of interest . . . unless there is a 'substantial risk' that a material adverse effect will occur. . . . The standard requires more than a mere possibility of adverse effect." Id. cmt. c(iii).[2] Cf. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 265 (concluding, in context of positional conflicts under Rules 1.7(b)(2) – (4), that "[t]he mere possibility that a result in one representation will affect the outcome of another is not enough to trigger a conflict as to which waiver must be sought"). Simply put, if the lawyer cannot know which clients to talk to and what conflicts to disclose, then there is no conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(1).

Our reading of Rule 1.7(b)(1) is also in accord with our policy of protecting the ability of clients to obtain lawyers of their own choosing. See, e.g., D.C. Legal Ethics Ops. 241; 181 ("[W]e are hesitant to announce views that . . . prevent or unduly hinder clients from obtaining legal representation from attorneys of their own choosing who may have formed new associations."); D.C. Rule 5.6, cmt. [1] (noting that "[a]n agreement restricting the right of partners or associates to practice after leaving a firm not only limits their professional autonomy but also limits the freedom of clients to choose a lawyer"). In a specialized industry served by few lawyers, those lawyers will often represent multiple business competitors. Such representations increase the likelihood that a lawyer may undertake a representation for one client that later turns out to be adverse to plans of another client that had not been disclosed or perhaps not even formulated when the representation began. Sophisticated clients retaining their counsel of choice may be aware that such issues are likely to arise and, nevertheless, accept the risks of such issues in exchange for the benefits of her expertise. We do not read the rules to discourage that freedom of choice by clients. Accord D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 181.

The inquiring lawyer in this case did not obtain advance waivers from either Client A or B. As a general matter, it would have been prudent to do so, although her failure to do so did not violate the Rules. Where lawyers anticipate frequent conflicts between their clients, it is advisable to seek advance waivers. See D.C. Rule 1.7, cmts. [31] – [32]. Such waivers are particularly apt in a specialized industry, generally populated by sophisticated clients. See D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 309 (2001); see also Lauren Nicole Morgan, Note, Finding Their Niche: Advance Conflicts Waivers Facilitate Industry-Based Lawyering, 21 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 963, 980 (2008) (noting public policy considerations favoring the use of prospective waivers).

II. Applicability of "Thrust-Upon" Exception When Lawyer Cannot Obtain Informed Consent.

The second inquiry is whether the lawyer must withdraw from the representation of Client A if the confidential nature of that representation precludes her from seeking the informed consent of Client B. In addressing this question, we assume that the conflict of interest at issue was not reasonably foreseeable, as explicitly required by Rule 1.7(d).

Rule 1.7(c) articulates an exception to the prohibition in Rule 1.7(b)(1) if a lawyer has obtained the informed consent of each potentially affected client after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the conflict. See D.C. Rule 1.7 & cmt. [27]. In the present case, however, the lawyer cannot disclose the conflict

[1] The inquiring lawyer must, of course, consider any other prohibitions to undertaking the representation, including the prohibitions in Rule 1.7(b)(2)–(4).

[2] "In the modern view, a conflict of interest exists whenever the attorney-client relationship or the quality of the representation is 'at risk,' even if no substantive impropriety—such as a breach of confidentiality or less than zealous representation—in fact eventuates. The law of lawyering then proceeds by assessing the risk and providing an appropriate response." Geoffrey A. Hazard, Jr. & W. William Hodes, The Law of Lawyering § 10.4 (3d ed. 2001) (emphasis in original). See also Monroe H. Freedman & Abbe Smith, Understanding Lawyers' Ethics at 269 (3d ed. 2004) (noting that "the term conflict of interest refers to a situation where there is a reasonable possibility that you will not be able to fulfill all of the legitimate demands on your time, attention, and loyalty") (emphasis in original).

because her representation of Client A must remain confidential until after Client A has announced its bid. Rule 1.6 governs the confidentiality of a client's information, and identifies limited exceptions to the "fundamental principle . . . that the lawyer holds inviolate the client's secrets and confidences." See D.C. Rule 1.6, cmt. [4]. For purposes of this opinion, we assume that none of these exceptions applies and so the lawyer is prohibited from disclosing the fact of her representation of Client A.

Rule 1.7(d) addresses situations in which a lawyer represents multiple clients in unrelated matters and an unforeseen adversity—commonly referred to as a "thrust-upon" conflict—arises between the clients. The rule states:

> If a conflict not reasonably foreseeable at the outset of representation arises under paragraph (b)(1) after the representation commences, and is not waived under paragraph (c), a lawyer need not withdraw from any representation unless the conflict also arises under paragraphs (b)(2), (b)(3), or (b)(4).

D.C. Rule 1.7(d).

For the inquiring lawyer, the principle of confidentiality prohibits disclosure of her representation of Client A, but without full disclosure, she cannot obtain informed consent to continue that representation. See D.C. Rules 1.6, 1.7(c). Under these circumstances, does Rule 1.7(d) require the lawyer to withdraw from the representation of Client A? We conclude that it does not. Where a conflict is thrust upon a lawyer, pursuant to Rule 1.7(d), and the confidential nature of a representation precludes the lawyer from seeking informed consent for that representation pursuant to Rule 1.7(c), the lawyer need not withdraw from the representation at issue unless the conflict also arises under Rule 1.7(b)(2)-(4).

The structure of Rule 1.7(d) informs our reading of the rule. The key requirement in that Rule is that the thrust-upon conflict was "not reasonably foreseeable at the outset of the representation." D.C. Rule 1.7(d). This element, set forth in the first phrase of Rule 1.7(d), establishes a predicate for application of the thrust-upon exception. If this predicate has been established, the lawyer must make a full disclosure to each potentially affected client, but the clients' waiver of the thrust-upon conflict is not determinative. Even if Client B (who has created the thrust-upon conflict) will not waive the conflict, Rule 1.7(d) does not require the lawyer to withdraw from the representation. The structure of Rule 1.7(d) therefore reflects that although the lawyer generally must seek the informed consent of the second client (Client B, in this case), the result of her efforts – i.e., whether the second client (Client B) agrees to waive the conflict – does not, standing alone, preclude her continued representation of the first client (Client A). In our view, this approach reflects a considered policy judgment underlying Rule 1.7(d). Consistent with that policy, we believe that Rule 1.7(d) does not require withdrawal where a lawyer cannot seek the second client's waiver.

"The Rules of Professional Conduct . . . are rules of reason," D.C. Rules, Scope [1], and we employ a "common sense" approach to questions concerning the professional conduct of lawyers. See D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 272 (1997); AmSouth Bank v. Drummond Company, Inc., 589 So.2d 715 (Ala. 1991). Rule 1.7(d) provides that the lawyer need not withdraw from any representation if the thrust-upon conflict "is not waived." A common sense reading of the phrase "is not waived" necessarily includes those circumstances in which the conflict is not waived because a waiver cannot be sought without violation of the Rules. Our conclusion assumes that the inquiring lawyer does not have a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(2) – (4). If there is a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(2) – (4), however, the thrust-upon exception does not apply and the lawyer must withdraw from at least one of the representations. See D.C. Rule 1.7(d).[3]

Published: November 2010

Opinion 357

Former Client Records Maintained in Electronic Form

The question presented is whether a lawyer who maintains some or all of a former client's records solely in electronic form must provide the former client with paper copies of such records if requested by the former client and, if so, whether the lawyer may charge the former client for providing the files in paper form.

As a general matter, there is no ethical prohibition against maintaining client records solely in electronic form, although there are some restrictions as to particular types of documents. Lawyers and clients may enter into reasonable agreements addressing how the client's files will be maintained, how copies will be provided to the client if requested, and who will bear what costs associated with providing the files in a particular form; entering into such agreements is prudent and can help avoid misunderstandings. Assuming no such agreement was entered into prior to the termination of the relationship, however, a lawyer must comply with a reasonable request to convert electronic records to paper form. In most circumstances, a former client should bear the cost of converting to paper form any records that were properly maintained in electronic form. However, the lawyer may be required to bear the cost if (1) neither the former client nor substitute counsel (if any) can access the electronic records without undue cost or burden; and (2) the former client's need for the records in paper form outweighs the burden on the lawyer of furnishing paper copies. Whether (1) a request for electronic files to be converted to paper form is reasonable and (2) the former client's need for the files in paper form outweighs the lawyer's burden of providing them (such that the lawyer should bear the cost) should be considered both from the standpoint of a reasonable client and a reasonable lawyer and should take into account the technological sophistication and resources of the former client.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.4(a)—Communication
- Rule 1.6(a)(1) and (f)—Confidentiality of Information
- Rule 1.15(c)—Safekeeping Property
- Rule 1.16(d)—Declining or Terminating Representation

Inquiry

After the termination of a lawyer's representation of a client, the former client requested that the lawyer deliver to the former client all of the former client's files. The lawyer stated that the files were maintained solely in electronic form and offered to deliver them to the former client in electronic form on a CD-ROM. The former client responded by requesting that the lawyer produce the files in paper form, with the lawyer bearing the cost of converting the files from electronic to paper form. The lawyer asks whether (a) he must convert the electron-

[3] In this regard, we emphasize that throughout her representation of Client A, the lawyer has an ongoing obligation not to disclose or use Client B's confidential information. See D.C. Rule 1.6. If the preservation of that confidentiality would adversely affect her representation of Client A, she cannot continue the representation of Client A unless Client A consents. See D.C. Rule 1.7(b)(2) – (4).

ic files to paper form; and (b) if so, whether the lawyer must bear the cost of converting the files to paper form.

Discussion

1. Maintenance of Client Records in Electronic Form

Lawyers and clients may enter into reasonable agreements addressing how the client's files will be maintained, how copies will be provided to the client if requested, and who will bear what costs associated with providing the files in a particular form. For example, a lawyer may require that a client seeking representation consent, as a condition of the representation, to the lawyer's maintenance of his or her records solely in electronic form, so long as this method of maintaining the files would not result in foreseeable prejudice to the client. See Virginia Ethics Opinion 1818 (Sept. 30, 2005). (A prospective client, of course, is free to seek out counsel who does not impose such a requirement.) As with other aspects of the lawyer-client relationship, it is prudent to address such issues in advance where possible in order to avoid later misunderstandings and disputes.

The inquiry here, however, does not state how the lawyer's files came to be in electronic form only, or whether this was the result of any discussions or agreement with the former client. Accordingly, we begin with some discussion of the use of electronic records for current and former clients. We see nothing in the ethics rules that prohibits establishing and maintaining most types of client records in electronic form. While the rules contemplate that lawyers will establish and maintain appropriate files relating to the representation of a client, the rules do not prescribe the form in which files must be kept. See, e.g., D.C. Rules 1.8(i), 1.16(d).

Indeed, it is common today for lawyers to maintain many records relating to a client representation solely in electronic form. By way of example:

- Emails and attachments: Much communication between lawyers and clients and between lawyers and opposing counsel takes place by email. Emails and attachments to emails may or may not be printed out for a paper file.
- Pleadings: Many courts now require that pleadings be filed electronically, usually in PDF format, and lawyers may maintain the pleadings file in electronic form. A lawyer may draft a pleading electronically in a word processing program, convert it to PDF, and file it without ever printing out the pleading. Similarly, a lawyer served with a pleading electronically may elect to save it solely in electronic form.
- Document production: It is very common for documents produced in litigation to be provided solely in electronic form, commonly in PDF format or as .tif images. A lawyer receiving documents produced in electronic form may review them electronically as well. Similarly, many corporate clients gathering documents for possible production in response to document requests will provide such documents to their lawyers in electronic form, after which the lawyers may review the documents in electronic form for possible responsiveness to the requests.
- Databases: Particularly in cases involving large volumes of documents, it is common for electronic databases to be created containing information about those documents. Lawyers may run searches and generate reports based on those searches, but it would be unusual for the entire contents of such a database to be printed out in hard copy form.

Use of electronic records can reduce costs for lawyers and clients through reduced file maintenance and storage costs and through the increased efficiency that may result from being able to access the records electronically rather than through physical access. Clients may maintain their own records solely in electronic form as well, and some clients require their lawyers to provide them with pleadings and other documents in electronic form wherever possible.

Electronic client records are also sometimes created when the records are initially received or created in paper form, but the paper files are later converted to electronic form, typically by scanning them. Such conversion raises the question whether the paper documents may be destroyed or discarded after the electronic versions are created. Initially, we note that certain types of documents should not be destroyed. For example,

- A lawyer must retain in paper form a client's intrinsically valuable, original paper documents, such as securities, negotiable instruments, deeds, settlement agreements, and wills. See D.C. Rule 1.15(a) (client property other than funds "shall be identified as such and appropriately safeguarded"); D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 283 (1998) (stating that "it would be unethical for a lawyer to destroy valuables contained in a client file" and identifying "securities, negotiable instruments, deeds, settlement agreements, and wills" as property "that has intrinsic value or directly affects valuable rights").[1]
- "A lawyer should use care not to destroy any document which the lawyer has a legal obligation to preserve." Id.
- "A lawyer should use care not to destroy or discard original documents provided by the client when they are not otherwise filed or recorded in the public records." Id.
- A lawyer should preserve the original paper document if an electronic version of the document would fail to "protect the [current or former] client's interests." D.C. Rule 1.16(d).
- Paper documents that the client has provided to the lawyer should not be destroyed unless the current or former client does not want the documents returned and consents to their destruction.[2] See D.C. Rule 1.4(a) – Communication ("A lawyer shall keep a client reasonably informed about the status of a matter").[3] However, such documents should not be destroyed if they fall in one of the first four categories of documents set forth above.

Subject to the above exceptions, a lawyer may convert a client's file into electronic form and destroy the paper files if he has reasonably concluded that the paper version is not needed for his

[1] As noted in D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 283 (1998), if a former client cannot be located, the lawyer may be able to turn valuable property over to a third party in certain circumstances.

[2] Consent is generally not required if the representation of the client terminated more than five years earlier and the former client either cannot be found or refuses to respond to requests for instructions on disposition of the files. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 283 (1998). See id. for further guidance on specific categories of documents that must be retained or may be destroyed.

[3] It would also be prudent for a lawyer to consult with the client before making a decision to destroy large quantities of paper documents received from other sources (e.g., documents produced by another party in discovery) that the lawyer has converted to electronic form.

ongoing representation of a current client.[4] The lawyer should bear in mind that if he or she does destroy paper files, he may in some cases, absent agreement with the client to the contrary, be required in the future to provide the electronic records in paper form at the client's request and possibly at the lawyer's expense, as discussed further below.

Lawyers who maintain client records solely in electronic form should take reasonable steps (1) to ensure the continued availability of the electronic records in an accessible form during the period for which they must be retained[5] and (2) to guard against the risk of unauthorized disclosure of client information. See D.C. Rule 1.6(a)(1); see also D.C. Rule 1.6(f) ("A lawyer shall exercise reasonable care to prevent the lawyer's employees, associates, and others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidences or secrets of a client.").

2. A Lawyer's Obligations Regarding Providing a Former Client with Records Maintained Solely in Electronic Form

A lawyer is ethically obligated, upon reasonable request, to provide a former client with the former client's files. See D.C. Rule 1.15(c) ("Except as stated in this rule or otherwise permitted by law or by agreement, a lawyer shall promptly deliver to the client or third person any funds or other property that the client or third person is entitled to receive . . . ."); D.C. Rule 1.16 ("In connection with any termination of representation, a lawyer shall take timely steps to the extent reasonably practicable to protect a client's interests, such as . . . surrendering papers and property to which the client is entitled . . . .") (emphasis added). See generally D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 283 (1998). As discussed above, client files often include electronic records, so the duty to provide the former client's files will often extend to electronic records. (When turning over electronic records, care must be taken to avoid providing documents or metadata that would reveal confidences of a different client.[6]) The inquiry here relates to the lawyer's obligation when some or all of the former client's files are maintained solely in electronic form and the former client requests that they be provided in paper form. Specifically, must the lawyer provide such records in paper form, and if so, who must pay for the conversion to paper?[7]

As noted earlier, lawyers and clients may enter into reasonable agreements regarding issues such as how records will be kept, how copies may be provided to the client, and who will pay the costs of converting electronic records if the client seeks to get them in paper form. The inquiry here, however, suggests that there was no such agreement between the inquirer and the former client.

In the absence of an agreement, whether the lawyer must provide the electronic records in paper form depends on whether the request for the paper version is reasonable. In general, such requests will be reasonable, though there will doubtless be instances where it would impose an unreasonable burden on the lawyer, even if the former client is willing to pay for the conversion to paper form.

If the request to provide the electronic records in paper form is reasonable, the issue of who should pay for the conversion to paper form depends on the facts and circumstances, and the answer may vary for different categories of records. In most cases, if the records were properly maintained in electronic form, but the former client has requested the records in paper form, the former client should bear the cost of converting the records to paper form. This is particularly so with respect to records that are "not necessary to protect [the] client's interests," as to which the former client should bear the cost of conversion. See D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 283 (1998). With respect to other types of electronic records, the lawyer should bear the cost of providing the records in paper form if (1) neither the former client nor substitute counsel (if any) can access the electronic records without undue cost or burden; and (2) the former client's need for the records in paper form outweighs the burden on the lawyer of furnishing paper copies.[8]

Whether (1) a request for electronic files to be converted to paper form is reasonable and (2) the former client's need for the files in paper form outweighs the lawyer's burden of providing them (such that the lawyer should bear the cost) should be considered from the standpoint of both a reasonable client and a reasonable lawyer. The technological sophistication and resources of the client should also be taken into account.[9] It is not possible to provide a bright line test, but the analysis can be illustrated with some examples:

- In litigation, 25 million pages of documents were produced to the lawyer in electronic form by another party. The electronic records are a standard format, such as .tif. The lawyer never received the documents in paper form. Although the lawyer printed some documents for specific purposes (such as for use as exhibits), the lawyer had no occasion to print the entire set of documents in paper form. The former client requests that the lawyer print all of the documents in paper form. The costs of printing would be substantial. In addition, printing all of the documents would require substantial time of the lawyer's staff and would be extremely disruptive to the operations of the lawyer's office. The former client's request is not reasonable, even if the former

[4] Opinions in several other jurisdictions have similarly concluded that, with certain exceptions, a lawyer may convert paper documents to electronic form and maintain the client's file solely in electronic form without requiring client consent. See Missouri Ethics Opinion 127 (May 19, 2009); Maine Ethics Opinion 183 (Jan. 2004); New Jersey Ethics Opinion (April 24, 2006).

[5] See generally D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 283 (1998) for guidance on the requirements for maintaining files relating to former clients.

[6] It is common for lawyers to draft documents for one client by using, as a starting point, documents prepared for another client. When a lawyer turns over a former client's file to the former client, the lawyer must take reasonable steps to make sure that any such material prepared for a different client or that would reveal confidences or secrets of a different client are first removed from the file. In the case of electronic records, the lawyer must also take reasonable steps to make sure that no metadata is being provided that would reveal confidences or secrets of a different client. See generally D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 341 (2007) (discussing other issues relating to metadata).

[7] The inquirer does not mention any unpaid fees. Accordingly, we do not address any issues with respect to exercise of a retaining lien under Rule 1.8(i). See D.C. Legal Ethics Ops. 230 (1994), 250 (1992), 333 (2005).

[8] Similar principles would apply to a request from a former client to convert electronic records from one electronic format to another. If the request is reasonable, the lawyer should convert the records, but in most cases the former client should pay the cost of doing so unless the burden analysis dictates otherwise.

[9] See Arizona Ethics Opinion 07-02 (June 2007) ("A lawyer who has chosen to store his or her client files digitally cannot simply hand a disk or other storage medium to a client without confirming that the client is able to read the digitized images. If the client does not have either the technological knowledge or access to a computer on which to display the electronic images, or if the client has hired substitute counsel who is in the same position as the client, the original lawyer may need to provide paper copies of the documents.") client offers to pay for the costs of printing. Rather, it would be sufficient for the lawyer to provide a copy of the documents in electronic form to the former client,[10] after which the former client could arrange and pay for printing if the former client so desired.

- The lawyer created an extensive database containing information relating to millions of pages of documents produced in litigation. The lawyer generated certain reports from the database in paper form, but never had any reason to print the entire database in paper form. The database was created using proprietary software developed for the lawyer's firm. The former client requests that the database be provided in paper form. As with the other examples, there is no agreement between the lawyer and the former client with respect to converting electronic records to paper form or with respect to converting electronic records from one electronic format to another. Because the database is only accessible with proprietary software, the lawyer offers to convert it to a format that can be used with non-proprietary database software, at the lawyer's expense. Because the database is voluminous and the former client would have the ability to access it in a non-proprietary format, the lawyer need not provide the database in paper form.
- The former client is an individual who has not retained substitute counsel because she intends to represent herself pro se in a pending proceeding in which a hearing is scheduled in the near future. The former client needs the lawyer's file to represent herself but has no access to a computer. The lawyer's electronic file, if printed, would consist of several hundred pages. Under these circumstances, the former client's need for the paper copies is significant and the burden on the lawyer to provide the records in paper form appears to be minimal. Therefore, the lawyer should bear the cost of providing the file to the former client in paper form.[11]
- The lawyer has provided the former client with the client's file in electronic form. The former client has a computer and printer, but does not have the software necessary to view the lawyer's electronic records. The former client has a significant need for the records. The lawyer offers to provide the former client with the necessary software at the lawyer's expense. The former client is capable of installing the software, and the former client's computer is capable of running the software. Under these circumstances, the lawyer is not obligated to pay the cost of converting the any of the electronic records to paper form.

Even if the lawyer must bear the cost of converting the electronic records to paper form, however, the lawyer may charge the former client for the reasonable time and labor expense associated with locating and reviewing the electronic records where such time and expense results from special instructions or requests from the former client. See D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 283 (1998) ("review of the files is being undertaken for the benefit of the client and, like other forms of client services, may be compensated by a reasonable fee").[12]

In circumstances where the lawyer is permitted to charge the former client either for time and expense associated with either converting electronic records to paper form at the former client's request or for time and expense associated with locating, reviewing, and preparing records in accordance with the former client's instructions, the lawyer should inform the former client in advance that the former client will be charged and explain the basis on which the former client will be charged.

Conclusion

Lawyers may maintain many types of client records solely in electronic form, but need to be aware of restrictions as to particular types of documents. Lawyers and clients may agree to reasonable provisions relating to electronic records and requests for conversion to paper form. Absent such an agreement, a lawyer must comply with a reasonable request by a former client to provide electronic records in paper form. In most cases, the former client should bear the cost of converting to paper form any records that were properly maintained in electronic form, but in certain circumstances the lawyer may be required to bear the cost.

Published: December 2010

Opinion No. 358

Subpoenaing Witness When Lawyer for Congressional Committee Has Been Advised that Witness Will Decline to Answer Any Questions on Claim of Privilege; Legal Ethics Opinion 31 Revisited.

D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 31 (1977) concluded that it was a violation of the former Code of Professional Responsibility for a congressional staff lawyer to require a witness to appear before a congressional committee when the committee has been informed that the witness will invoke the self-incrimination privilege as to all substantive questions "and the sole effect of the summons will be to pillory the witness." The committee declines a request to vacate Opinion 31 but notes that under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, as under the former Code of Professional Responsibility, a violation occurs only where the summons serves no substantial purpose "other than to embarrass, delay, or burden" the witness.

[10] It is common in litigation for the court to enter a protective order restricting use and disclosure of documents produced in discovery that contain confidential business information or are sensitive for other reasons. Sometimes such orders allow only counsel and experts to see the confidential documents and do not permit lawyers to share the documents with their clients. In addition, such orders often require that the adverse party's documents be returned or destroyed when the litigation has ended. For purposes of this opinion, we assume that there are no such restrictions on the lawyer's ability to provide documents to the former client.

[11] The District of Columbia Court of Appeals recently addressed the timeliness of a lawyer's response to a former immigration client's request for his file. Although the lawyer delayed only five days in providing the file, the Court found this delay to violate Rule 1.16(d) under the circumstances, because "the five-day delay represented a significant proportion of the thirty days respondent's client had to appeal his deportation order." In re Thai, 987 A.2d 428, 430 (2009). Moreover, during the five-day delay, the former lawyer "repeatedly denied requests for the files and actively obstructed the efforts of his former client and the successor attorney to obtain the file." Id. The Court reiterated its prior statements that "a 'client should not have to ask twice' for his file," that "the client is owed an 'immediate return' of his file 'no matter how meager,'" and that "Rule 1.16(d) 'unambiguously requires an attorney to surrender a client's file upon termination of the representation.'" Id. at 430-31 (citations omitted).

[12] Wisconsin Legal Ethics Opinion E-00-03 (2003) advises that, although a lawyer must provide electronic documents to a client at the lawyer's expense (which is minimal), "a lawyer may charge a client for staff and professional time necessarily incurred to search databases to identify files that contain documents that may fall within the client's request."

Applicable Rules

- Rule 3.4—Fairness to Opposing Party and Counsel
- Rule 3.5—Impartiality and Decorum of the Tribunal
- Rule 3.8—Special Responsibilities of a Prosecutor
- Rule 4.4—Respect for Rights of Third Person
- Rule 5.2—Subordinate Lawyers
- Rule 8.4—Misconduct

Inquiry

The Request

The Legal Ethics Committee ("Committee") has received a request ("Request") to vacate Legal Ethics Opinion No. 31 ("Opinion 31" or "the Opinion"), which the Committee rendered in 1977 under the former D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility ("D.C. Code"). The Request explains that witnesses subpoenaed to appear before congressional committees have on occasion interpreted Opinion 31 as concluding that compelling the public appearance of a witness who had declared that he would assert his self-incrimination privilege in response to all questions constituted a per se violation of the D.C. Code. Based on this interpretation, some witnesses have refused to appear before Congress.

The Request asserts that various legal authorities "establish that there are legitimate reasons for a congressional committee and its staff to summon a witness even when the witness indicates in advance an intent to invoke the Fifth Amendment privilege." Among these, according to the Request, are the committee's right to evaluate the privilege assertion, the possibility that the witness will waive or not assert the privilege, the possibility that the committee will agree to hear the witness in executive session, and the possibility that the committee will immunize the witness's testimony under 18 U.S.C. § 6005.

The Request also states that Opinion 31 did not take into account the Supreme Court's 1976 decision in Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308 (1976), which the Request asserts permits the finder of fact in a civil proceeding to draw an adverse inference from a witness's invocation of the privilege.[1] According to the Request, this law "make[s] absolutely clear that, given the inferences that can appropriately be drawn in civil contexts from a refusal to testify [on self-incrimination grounds], there are legitimate reasons for attorneys for congressional committees to call witnesses even if it appears such witnesses plan to assert the Fifth Amendment privilege." The Request concedes that calling a witness solely to harass or embarrass that person "is not appropriate."

Finally, the Request notes that the Opinion was decided under the now-superseded D.C. Code and states that—

> [a]lthough the ethical considerations against calling a witness solely to harass remain [under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct], Opinion No. 31's apparent assumption that there can be no legitimate purpose for calling a witness who has indicated he or she will assert the Fifth Amendment privilege simply cannot stand in light of the clear legal authority set forth above.

D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion No. 31

In Opinion 31, the Committee described the inquiry before it as follows:

> We have been asked to advise whether it is proper for a congressional committee whose chairman, staff and several members are attorneys to require a witness who is a "target" of a pending grand jury investigation to appear at televised hearings to be questioned when the committee has been notified in advance that the witness will exercise his constitutional privilege not to answer any questions.

Op. 31. The Opinion began its analysis by conceding that "[i]t is not per se improper . . . to cause a witness to be summoned in furtherance of a legitimate legislative function of Congress, even though the resultant attending publicity will be damaging to the witness' reputation and possibly prejudicial to him in a future criminal trial." Id. (emphasis added). The Opinion continued, however, that "the inquiring power of a congressional committee is limited to obtaining information in aid of Congress' legislative function" and that "[t]here is no congressional power to expose for the sake of exposure." Id.

Acknowledging that this Committee's jurisdiction is confined to rendering opinions on the applicability of the ethics rules to the conduct of staff attorneys acting in their capacities as attorneys, the Opinion stated that "the inquiry before us poses the issue whether it is ethical to summon a witness [before a congressional committee] when it is known in advance that no information will be obtained and the sole effect of the summons will be to pillory the witness." Op. 31 (emphasis added).

The Opinion discussed rulings and standards to the effect that calling a witness in a criminal proceeding, when it is known that the witness will invoke, across the board, his privilege against self-incrimination, constitutes prosecutorial misconduct.[2] Analogizing to those authorities, the Opinion concluded that such conduct by a lawyer for a congressional committee "appears to be in conflict with at least the spirit of" D.C. Disciplinary Rule ("DR") 7-106(C)(2). That rule barred a lawyer from asking a witness before a tribunal any question "that [the lawyer] has no reasonable basis to believe is relevant to the case and that is intended to degrade a witness." D.C. Code DR 7-106(C)(2) (superseded 1991). The Opinion concluded that although a congressional committee arguably is not a "tribunal," the principle that an attorney should not ask a witness questions that are "intended to degrade" him was applicable and that a question to which the inquiring lawyer knows the response will be the witness's invocation of his privilege against self-incrimination is by definition irrelevant. Id.

Opinion 31 also considered whether such conduct would constitute "conduct . . . prejudicial to the administration of justice," in violation of D.C. Code DR 1-102(A)(5). A majority of the committee concluded that "the language of this standard is too vague to permit its application as a disciplinary rule," Opinion 31 n. 3, though a few months later, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals upheld the rule against a claim of unconstitutional vagueness, In re Keiler, 380 A.2d 119, 126 (D.C. 1977).[3]

[1] The Request cites Rad Services v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 808 F. 2d 271, 275-77 (3d Cir. 1986), Brink's Inc. v. City of New York, 717 F.2d 700, 707-10 (2d Cir. 1983), and In re Vitamin Antitrust Litigation, 120 F. Supp. 2d 58, 68 (D.D.C. 2000), as progeny of Baxter.

[2] United States v. Coppola, 479 F.2d 1153, 1160 (10th Cir. 1973); San Fratello v. United States, 340 F.2d 560, 564 (4 Cir. 1965); United States v. Tucker, 267 F.2d 212, 215 (3d Cir. 1959); see ABA Project on Standards for Criminal Justice ¶ 5.7(c) (unprofessional to call witness under such circumstances "for the purpose of impressing upon the jury the fact of the claim of privilege").

[3] The Opinion also concluded that such conduct violated several D.C. Ethical Considerations ("ECs"). These were D.C. EC 7-10, which called upon lawyers to treat persons involved in the legal process with consideration and to avoid inflicting needless harm, D.C. EC 7-14, which exhorted government lawyers not to harass parties, and D.C. EC 7-25, which said that a lawyer should not ask a witness a question "solely for the purpose of harassing or embarrassing him." Under the D.C. Code, the Ethical Considerations were "aspirational in character," whereas the Disciplinary Rules were mandatory. D.C. Code Preliminary Statement. The

Discussion

The D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules" or "Rules") superseded the D.C. Code effective January 1, 1991.[4] Several provisions of the Rules are relevant to the issue presented by the Request.

Rule 4.4(a) states that "a lawyer shall not use means that have no substantial purpose other than to embarrass, delay, or burden a third person." The comments observe that it is not possible to catalog all the third-party rights that the rule might implicate. D.C. Rule 4.4, cmt. [1].

Rule 8.4(d) prohibits a lawyer from "engag[ing] in conduct that seriously interferes with the administration of justice." Comment [2] states that this prohibition is intended to include conduct proscribed by the similarly worded provision of the D.C. Code, which was DR 1-102(A)(5).[5] Comment [3] to Rule 8.4, which was among the 2007 amendments to the Rules, states that "offensive, abusive, or harassing conduct that seriously interferes with the administration of justice" violates Rule 8.4(d). Moreover, at least one ethics opinion issued under the D.C. Rules admonishes lawyers not to harass opponents. D.C. Op. 258 n. 4 (1995).[6]

Filing a frivolous lawsuit violates Rule 4.4, Attorney Grievance Comm'n v. Richardson, 712 A.2d 525 (Md. 1998), and Rule 8.4(d), Iowa Supreme Court Bd. of Prof'l Ethics & Conduct v. Ronwin, 557 N.W.2d 515 (Iowa 1996). Unjustified personal attacks on opponents violate both rules. In re Golden, 496 S.E.2d 619 (S.C. 1998); In re Vincenti, 704 A.2d 927 (N.J. 1998). Moreover, the misuse of official authority by a prosecutor—a position akin to counsel for an investigative congressional committee—violates Rule 8.4(d). In re Christoff, 690 N.E. 2d 1135 (Ind. 1997).

Finally, a violation of Rule 8.4(d) "does not have to be affiliated specifically with the judicial decision-making process; the conduct simply must bear on the administration of justice." In re Mason, 736 A.2d 1019, 1023 (D.C. 1999). Moreover, "'conduct that is prejudicial to the administration of justice' can be equated to 'conduct unbecoming a member of the bar.'" Id. (quoting In re Solerwitz, 575 A.2d 287, 292 (D.C. 1990)); see In re Keiler, 380 A.2d 119 (D.C. 1977) (finding violation of predecessor to Rule 8.4(d) where lawyer conducted sham arbitration proceeding).

Opinion 31 does not establish a per se rule that compelling a witness to testify before a congressional committee when it is known in advance that the witness will invoke the Fifth Amendment privilege violates the ethics rules. Opinion 31 provides that an attorney violates the ethics rules only when he knows that summoning a witness to appear (1) will provide no information to the committee and (2) is intended merely to degrade a witness. Specifically, the Opinion states that the issue is "whether it is ethical to summon a witness when it is known in advance that no information will be obtained and the sole effect of the summons will be to pillory the witness." The Opinion further notes that "DR 7-106(C)(2) prohibits only questions that the lawyer has no reasonable basis to believe are relevant and that are 'intended to degrade' as well." Op. 31 (emphasis added).

The Request has not persuaded us that the revised Rules of Professional Conduct, or other governing law, require us to vacate the Opinion. First, the Request concedes the critical point that calling a witness solely to harass or embarrass that person is not appropriate. We agree and conclude, as we did in Opinion 31, that such conduct violates the Rules.

Second, the Request suggests that the Opinion assumes that there can be no legitimate purpose for calling a witness before Congress when it is known that the witness will assert the privilege. We do not read Opinion 31 as making that assumption. The Opinion asserts that where an attorney has some question whether the witness will assert the privilege, there is no need to test that claim of privilege in public and the claim can be resolved by calling the witness in executive session. We do not read the Opinion to mean, however, that the only legitimate purpose for calling a witness is to determine whether he will assert the privilege.

Third, the Request relies heavily on the Supreme Court's decision in Baxter, which held that an adverse inference properly may be drawn from an inmate's silence at his disciplinary proceedings. Baxter, 425 U.S. at 320. Baxter and its progeny allow fact-finders to draw an adverse inference in civil proceedings from the invocation of the Fifth Amendment privilege. It is not clear, though, how that rule alters the threshold ethical question presented in Opinion 31. The Request asserts that this case law undermines "Opinion No. 31's apparent assumption that there can be no legitimate purpose for calling a witness who has indicated he or she will assert the Fifth Amendment privilege." As explained above, however, that assertion is based on a misreading of the Opinion. Only where the sole purpose of proceeding is to degrade the witness is there a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Opinion 31 correctly asserted that when an attorney causes a witness to be called for the sole purpose of harassing or degrading that witness, that attorney violates our rules. See Rules 4.4, 8.4(d). Similarly, a lawyer would violate Rule 8.4(d) by engaging in abuse or harassment of the witness. Further, such conduct by a staff lawyer might constitute assisting another in violating the rules. See D.C. Rule 8.4(a). In addition to par-

---

Code added, though, that an agency applying the Disciplinary Rules "may find interpretive guidance in the basic principles embodied in the Canons and in the objectives reflected in the Ethical Considerations." Id. The D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, which superseded the D.C. Code in 1991, do not contain "aspirational" guidelines akin to the Code's Ethical Considerations.

[4] There have been a number of subsequent changes to the D.C. Rules but aside from the new comment [3] to Rule 8.4, which took effect February 1, 2007, none is material to this opinion.

[5] As noted above, when this committee issued Opinion 31, a majority of the members found the language of the predecessor provision "too vague to permit its application as a disciplinary rule," D.C. Ethics Op. 31 n. 3 (citing D.C. Code DR 1-102(A)(5)), but the D.C. Court of Appeals subsequently upheld the cited Code provision against a vagueness challenge, see In re Keiler, 380 A.2d at 126.

[6] Instructive, though not literally applicable, are Rules 3.4, 3.5, and 3.8. Rule 3.4(e), whose predecessor rule Opinion 31 applied by analogy to the conduct at issue here, prohibits a lawyer from, "[i]n trial, allud[ing] to any matter that the lawyer does not reasonably believe is relevant." Rule 3.5(d) prohibits a lawyer from engaging in "conduct intended to disrupt any proceeding of a tribunal." A congressional committee ordinarily is not a "tribunal" because it is not adjudicatory in character. See D.C. Rule 1.0(n) (defining "tribunal"). Such a committee might be a tribunal, though, when deliberating and voting on whether to recommend to its house of Congress that a witness be cited for contempt of Congress. See id.

Comment [2] to Rule 3.8, which sets forth special responsibilities of prosecutors, permits public release of an indictment but condemns—> extrajudicial comment by a prosecutor that serves unnecessarily to heighten public condemnation of the accused without a legitimate law enforcement purpose before the criminal process has taken its course. When that happens, even if the ultimate trial is not prejudiced, the accused may be subjected to unfair and unnecessary condemnation before the trial takes place. Accordingly, a prosecutor should use special care to avoid publicity, such as through televised press conferences, which would unnecessarily heighten condemnation of the accused.

ticipation in the hearing itself, such related activities as preparing subpoenas also could subject a lawyer to sanctions, though we note that Rule 5.2 protects a subordinate lawyer who acts at the direction of a supervising attorney so long as there is a reasonable argument that calling the witness is permitted by the Rules. See D.C. Rule 5.2 & com. [2].[7]

Conclusion

The Request correctly observes that there may be legitimate reasons for a congressional committee to summon a witness who expresses an intention to assert her privilege against self-incrimination. Because the Opinion is consistent with that fact and because the Rules of Professional Conduct are violated only if there is no substantial purpose in calling a witness other than embarrassment, burden, or delay, we decline to vacate Opinion 31.

Published: January 2011

Opinion No. 359

Disposition of Missing Client's Trust Account Monies in the District of Columbia

Following reasonable but unsuccessful efforts to locate a missing client or former client, a lawyer should presume the missing client's trust account monies abandoned and, if the circumstances fall within D.C.'s Unclaimed Property Act, must dispose of the property as directed by that statute.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6—Confidentiality of Information
- Rule 1.14—Client with Diminished Capacity
- Rule 1.15—Safekeeping Property

Inquiry

The D.C. Bar's Legal Ethics Helpline regularly receives calls from lawyers seeking to learn what they can and should do with client trust account monies when the client's whereabouts are unknown. Often, the lawyer is retiring from legal practice, his or her firm is closing, or he or she otherwise wants to close an outstanding trust account, but cannot locate the client.

Discussion

The inquiry raises questions that relate to both D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct 1.15 and the D.C. Unclaimed Property Act.

D.C. Rule 1.15

A central tenet in legal ethics is that a lawyer must safeguard property of clients and third parties that is in the lawyer's possession as a result of a representation. D.C. Rule 1.15(a) specifically requires that a lawyer hold property of a client (or a third person), including intangible property, separate and apart from the lawyer's own funds, in a trust account, and Comment [1] instructs that a lawyer should exercise the care of "a professional fiduciary" in managing client funds. Rule 1.15(c) requires that when a lawyer receives funds in which a client or third party has an interest the lawyer must promptly 1) notify the client or third party; and 2) deliver to the client or third person any funds or other property that the client or third person is entitled to receive except as stated in this Rule or otherwise permitted by law or by agreement with the client. Rule 1.15 is silent, however, on the specific issue of what is required or permitted if a lawyer is unable to locate a client, but is nonetheless in possession of trust funds belonging to the missing client.[1]

D.C. Unclaimed Property Act

While the Committee does not opine on questions of law outside of the Rules of Professional Conduct, we set forth our understanding of the D.C. Unclaimed Property Act for the purpose of analyzing the issues presented under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. Section 103(a) of the District of Columbia Unclaimed Property Act provides that:

> All intangible personal property …, including any income …, that is held or owing in the ordinary course of the holder's business and has remained unclaimed by the owner for more than 3 years after it became payable or distributable is presumed abandoned.[2]

The Act by its terms applies to intangible personal property owned by individuals whose last known address is in the District of Columbia or where the holder is domiciled[3] in the District.[4]

---

[7] We express no opinion on the propriety of a witness invoking an opinion of this committee as a basis for refusing to comply with a congressional subpoena.

[1] Rule 1.15(d) addresses the situation when a lawyer is in possession of property in which an interest is claimed by "two or more persons to each of whom the lawyer may have an obligation." In Legal Ethics Opinion 293, the Committee clarifies that an obligation under Rule 1.15(d) arises when a third party has a "just claim" to the property that the lawyer has a duty under applicable law to protect against wrongful interference by the lawyer's client. In such circumstances, under Rule 1.15(d), the disputed funds must be kept separate by the lawyer until there is "an accounting and severance of interests in the property."

The Committee doubts that Rule 1.15(d) is implicated in the current inquiry. As an initial matter, the lawyer here is not protecting the funds from wrongful interference of the client; indeed, the District's interest arises only in the absence of the client. Significantly, the interest claimed by the District is one of "custodian" and not creditor. Surrendering the property to the District is not fundamentally adverse to the interests of the client, who even years later, pursuant to the Act, can reclaim the property from the District and indeed the District is legally obligated to return such funds. A lawyer's duty of loyalty to the client is therefore not compromised in following the Act's directives. Such a duty is the underlying rationale for Rule 1.15(d)'s directive to the lawyer to merely "preserve" disputed funds and not to unilaterally assume to "arbitrate a dispute" between a client and a third party. (See D.C. LEO 293). Even if Rule 1.15(d) were to apply, the Act "by operation of law" constitutes a severance of the interests in the property by deeming the property "presumed abandoned." We think, the lawyer, commits no ethical violation in complying with the Act. Of final import is the recognition that as custodian of the missing client's funds, the lawyer effectively transfers his or her fiduciary obligation to safeguard the property to the District as required by law.

[2] D.C. Code sec. 41-103(a). Section 41-103, by its terms, applies to intangible property. Though the Act is entitled "Unclaimed Property," its "Purpose" section speaks of "personal property" and not just "intangible personal property" (sec. 41-101), and its reporting section refers to "property, tangible or intangible, presumed abandoned" (sec. 41-117), the reference to "tangible" property appears to be limited to property contained within safe-deposit boxes or other "safekeeping repositories." Underscoring the Act's focus on intangible property, its "Definitions" section defines "property" as an "interest in or right in an intangible property." (sec. 41-102(16A))

D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 283, "Disposition of Closed Client Files," should be consulted on questions of what can be done with tangible property, such as client files, under analogous circumstances. Opinion 283 noted that lawyers could invoke state law procedures for unclaimed property, where applicable, but also pointed out that "[t]he availability of such procedures is a matter of state law." As with intangible property, lawyers need to determine for themselves under what circumstances tangible property is subject to the unclaimed property laws of one or more jurisdictions.

[3] "Domicile" is defined under D.C.'s Unclaimed Property Act as an individual's principal place of business. D.C. Code sec. 41-102(6)(B). Accordingly, there may be choice of law issues involved here. The Committee notes that most jurisdictions have an unclaimed property act and that a lawyer will want to check his or her jurisdiction's act.

[4] See D.C. Code sec. 41-104. Lawyers should be aware that if the last known address of the owner of Section 41-117 of the Act provides that "[e]very person holding funds or other property … presumed abandoned under this chapter shall report to the Mayor with respect to the property …"[5] The Act further provides that "the holder of property presumed abandoned shall send written notice to the owner, not more than 120 days or less than 60 days before filing the report, stating that the holder is in possession of property subject to this chapter."[6] Section 41-119 requires that the holder of the abandoned property transfer such property to the Mayor upon the filing of the report required by section 41-117. After the funds are transferred, D.C. Code sec. 41-132 mandates that the lawyer is obliged to maintain "a record of the name and address of the owner for 10 years after the date the property may have become reportable." The Act contains no exemption for lawyers.

Applying Rule 1.15 and the Unclaimed Property Act to the present inquiry, this Committee concludes that a lawyer must make reasonable efforts to locate a missing client whose last known address is in the District or where the lawyer's principal place of business is in the District to return that client's trust account monies. Reasonable efforts to locate a missing client might include using available internet technologies and on-line directories, sending a certified letter with return receipt requested to the client's last known address, contacting friends or relatives, or posting a notice in a newspaper of general circulation in the vicinity of the last known address of the property owner.

Under Rule 1.15, such efforts should take place promptly after the funds become due to the client. Rule 1.15(c) states "a lawyer shall promptly deliver to the client or third person any funds or other property that the client or third person is entitled to receive." Typically, unused funds from the client held in trust to pay legal fees and costs are due and payable to the client when the representation concludes.[7] Funds received in settlement from a third party are typically due the client when received by the lawyer. Accordingly, the lawyer presumably has already attempted to locate the client. Prior to reporting the property as abandoned to the Mayor and tendering the property to the Mayor's custody, however, the lawyer should undertake renewed efforts to locate the client and tender the property to the client. Indeed, under the Act, the lawyer is required to send written notice to the missing client "not more than 120 days or less than 60 days" before the transfer of the missing client's monies to the Mayor.[8]

Given the mandatory nature of the Act's directive and the absence of an exemption for lawyers under the Act, we conclude that a lawyer does not violate Rule 1.15 if the lawyer files the report required by the Act and similarly transfers a missing client's funds that are deemed to be abandoned to the Mayor's Office, when the monies have been unclaimed by a client for "more than 3 years after [they] became payable or distributable."[9] Our conclusion is limited and rests upon our reading of the plain language of the Act. We do not mean to foreclose a lawyer from challenging the application of the Act to a particular scenario or even the Act's general applicability to lawyers. Cf. D.C. Rule 3.4(c) (no ethics violation if lawyer disobeys obligation to a tribunal with "an open refusal based on an assertion that no valid obligation exists").

Our conclusion that a lawyer has a duty to transfer a missing client's funds that are deemed to be abandoned to the Mayor is supported by the D.C. Court of Appeals' recent decision in Bergman v. District of Columbia, holding that the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct do not trump a duly enacted D.C. statute,[10] such as the D.C. Unclaimed Property Act, especially where, as in the present case, the D.C. statute is mandatory in nature, and the D.C. professional responsibility rules are silent on the issue. Indeed, we note that substantial fines can be assessed for failure to transfer abandoned property to the Mayor under these circumstances – up to $25,000 plus 25% of the value of the abandoned property.[11]

D.C. Rule 1.6

We note that the Act can implicate client confidentiality under D.C. Rule 1.6 because the requirement to transfer a missing client's funds to the Mayor's office and provide identifying information for same involves disclosure of the client's identity.[12] Of course, Rule 1.6(e)(2)(A) contains an exception for disclosures required by law. In matters where the information is required under D.C. Code 41-117, the lawyer should take care to craft the disclosure in such a way as to minimize disclosure of Rule 1.6 information.[13] the intangible property is in another state that also has an unclaimed property act, then that state's unclaimed property act may apply. See D.C. Code Sec 41-104(4).

---

[5] D.C. Code sec. 41-117(a).

[6] D.C. Code sec. 41-117(e)(1).

7 D.C. Rule 1.16(d).

[8] D.C. Code sec. 41-117(e)(1). The Mayor is obligated to "cause notice to be published at least once each week for 2 consecutive weeks in a newspaper of general circulation in the District," D.C. Code sec. 41-118(a), and, if the value of the abandoned property is $50 or more, to "mail a notice to each person having an address listed who appears to be entitled to property of a value of $50 or more presumed abandoned under this chapter." D.C. Code sec. 41-118(d).

[9] D.C. Code sec. 41-103.

[10] 986 A.2d 1208, 1230 (D.C. 2010).

[11] D.C. Code sec. 41-135. More specifically, section 41-135 provides:

> (a) Any person who fails to pay or deliver property within the time prescribed by this chapter shall be required to pay interest at the rate of 1½% per month or fraction of a month on the property or value of the property from the date the property should have been paid or delivered.
>
> (b) Except as otherwise provided in subsection (c) of this section, a holder who fails to report, pay, or deliver property within the time prescribed under this chapter, or fails to perform other duties imposed by this chapter, shall pay to the Mayor, in addition to the interest as provided in subsection (a) of this section, a civil penalty of $200 for each day the report, payment, or delivery is withheld, or the duty is not performed, up to a maximum of $10,000.
>
> (c) A holder who willfully fails to report, pay, or deliver property within the time prescribed under this chapter, or fails to perform other duties imposed by this chapter, shall pay to the Mayor, in addition to the interest as provided in subsection (a) of this section, a civil penalty of $1000 for each day the report, payment, or delivery is withheld, or the duty is not performed, up to a maxim [sic] of $25,000, plus 25% of the value of any property that should have been paid or delivered.

[12] See D.C. Code sec. 41-117.

[13] We note that the Act's confidentiality provision, section 41-131, states:

> Any information or records required to be furnished to the Mayor as provided in this chapter shall be confidential and shall not be disclosed to any person except the person who furnished the same to the Mayor and except as provided in sections 41-118 (notice of abandoned property) and 41-123 (deposit of funds) or as may be necessary in the proper administration of this chapter alone.

The Act potentially implicates client confidentiality under Rule 1.6 because the Act's requirement to transfer a missing client's funds to the Mayor's office and provide identifying information for same involves disclosure of the client's identity. We rec-

***

Finally, we note the possibility that the missing client might have been a minor at the time of the representation and that he or she might not learn of the trust account monies until reaching the age of majority. Pursuant to Rule 1.14 regarding clients with diminished capacity (here, by age), the lawyer should consider moving the relevant court for a protective order authorizing the continued safekeeping of the missing client's trust account monies until three years after the client has reached the age of majority, drawing on the Act's three-year period for deeming property abandoned.

Conclusion

A lawyer who is in possession of funds (or other intangible personal property) belonging to a client who cannot be located, and whose last known address is in the District of Columbia (or where the lawyer is domiciled in the District), must exhaust reasonable efforts to locate the client as described more particularly above. Thereafter, it is not a violation of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct for a lawyer in such circumstances to report to the Mayor and transfer client funds that are deemed to be abandoned as required by the D.C. Unclaimed Property Act.

Published: June 2011

Opinion No. 360

Contact With Non-Party Treating Physician Witness

The principal question presented is whether a lawyer may ask his or her client's treating physician not to have ex parte communications with opposing counsel in a medical malpractice case where legal restrictions on such communications based on privacy laws and/or physician-patient privilege have been removed.

Under D.C. Rule 3.4(f), the lawyer may inform his or her client's treating physician that the treating physician has no obligation to speak with opposing counsel and that the treating physician may decline to speak to opposing counsel without the lawyer also present. To the extent that privacy laws or applicable privileges may restrict the scope of information that the treating physician may disclose, the lawyer may also demand that the physician comply with confidentiality obligations that have not been removed and may state his or her client's position as to the scope of information that may be legally disclosed. The lawyer may not, however, request or instruct the physician not to have communications with opposing counsel or request or instruct that any communications take place only if the lawyer is present.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 3.4(a), (f)—Fairness to Opposing Party and Counsel
- Rule 4.4(a)—Respect for Rights of Third Persons
- Rule 4.3—Dealing with Unrepresented Person

Inquiry

The Committee has received an inquiry from a lawyer who handles medical malpractice cases. In at least one case, the court has entered a qualified protective order which the lawyer describes as lifting restrictions on ex parte communications between defense counsel and the plaintiff's treating physician under the Health Insurance Portability and Accessibility Act (HIPAA). In such a situation, the plaintiff's counsel would prefer that the treating physician not have ex parte communications with defense counsel. The lawyer asks three questions about the information or requests the plaintiff's counsel may ethically convey to the client's physician. First, may the plaintiff's counsel request that the physician decline to speak with defense counsel? Second, if the answer to the first question is negative, may the plaintiff's counsel inform the treating physician that he or she is not required to speak with defense counsel if the physician does not want to? Third, may plaintiff's counsel request that the physician decline to speak with defense counsel unless plaintiff's counsel is also present?

Discussion

The question presented is primarily governed by Rule 3.4(f) of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. Before addressing the applicability of Rule 3.4(f), however, we address briefly a threshold issue. Because the person who would be providing information is a treating physician, there is an initial issue regarding whether defense counsel's communications with the treating physician are restricted by Rule 4.4(a), which prohibits a lawyer from "knowingly us[ing] methods of obtaining evidence that violate the legal rights of [a third] person." Comment [1] to Rule 4.4(a) states that the lawyer's responsibility to a client > does not imply that a lawyer may disregard the rights of third persons. It is impractical to catalogue all such rights, but they include legal restrictions on methods of obtaining evidence from third persons and unwarranted intrusions into privileged relationships, such as the client-lawyer relationship.

Such rights would also include legal protections applicable to the physician-patient relationship arising from privacy laws or any applicable physician-patient privilege.[1] Thus, Rule 4.4(a) would prohibit defense counsel from asking the treating physician questions eliciting information that would be privileged or otherwise legally protected.

In the scenario presented, we assume that any absolute bars to the treating-physician's disclosure to defendant's counsel of medical information relating to the plaintiff have been removed as a result of the qualified protective order referred to by the inquiring lawyer and/or by waivers of privilege resulting from the institution of the malpractice litigation. At the same time, however, we assume that there still may be legal restrictions ognize that there are situations in which the client's name and/or the fact that the client consulted a particular attorney could be a client confidence. See, e.g. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 312 (2002); Conn. Ethics Op. 99-35 (1999) (lawyer participating in referral program that offers services to bankruptcy clients and pays lawyer for each referral must obtain client consent before disclosing client's name to program); Ill. Ethics Op. 97-1 (lawyer may provide bank with names of clients as potential bank customers only with clients' consent).

Rule 1.6(e) permits disclosure of confidential information when required by law. In this situation, disclosing a client's name is permissible because it is required by the Act. (Our conclusion might differ if another state's unclaimed property act applied.) Nevertheless, a lawyer may consider advising his or her client that his or her identity may be divulged when the lawyer has to report it to the Mayor's office.

[1] The Committee does not opine on legal issues, but offers the following two examples of potential legal restrictions. First, under federal law, privacy rules under the Health Insurance Portability and Accessibility Act (HIPAA) generally prevent the unauthorized disclosure of "protected health information" of a patient, which is defined broadly. 45 C.F.R. § 160.103 (2011). Second, the District of Columbia has codified a physician-patient privilege, and a physician may not be permitted to disclose confidential patient information without the patient's consent, depending on the circumstances of a given case and a plaintiff's potential waiver of the privilege by placing her physical condition at issue in litigation. See D.C. Code § 14-307; Street v. Hedgepath, 607 A.2d 1238, 1246 (D.C. 1992).

that would preclude the physician from disclosing information unrelated to the litigation.[2]

Based on those assumptions, we now turn to the application of Rule 3.4(f), which provides as follows:

> A lawyer shall not:
> (f) Request a person other than a client to refrain from voluntarily giving relevant information to another party unless:
> (1) The person is a relative or an employee or other agent of a client; and
> (2) The lawyer reasonably believes that the person's interests will not be adversely affected by refraining from giving such information.

The first issue is whether the treating physician falls within any of the exceptions in Rule 3.4(f), which are limited to the lawyer's client, a client's relative, and a client's employee or other agent. Comment [9] to Rule 3.4 explains that "[p]aragraph (f) permits a lawyer to advise employees of a client to refrain from giving information to another party, for the employees may identify their interests with those of the client." None of these exceptions would apply here. There is no indication that the treating physician is a relative or employee of the plaintiff; nor are any facts presented that would establish an agency relationship between the client and the physician.[3]

Accordingly, other than the possible legal restrictions on the scope of what the treating physician may disclose (an issue discussed further below), the treating physician is no different from any other witness who is neither a client nor a relative, employee, or other agent of a client, and the answer to the inquiring lawyer's first question is clear. Rule 3.4(f) prohibits plaintiff's counsel from requesting that the physician decline to speak with defense counsel.

As to the second question, although plaintiff's counsel may not request that the treating physician not communicate with opposing counsel, it is permissible for plaintiff's counsel to inform the treating physician that he or she is not required to speak with defense counsel if the physician does not want to do so. See Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers § 116 cmt. e (2000) ("A lawyer may inform any person of the right not to be interviewed by any other party . . . .").

The third question is whether plaintiff's counsel may request that the treating physician not communicate with defendant's counsel unless plaintiff's counsel is also present. In other words, plaintiff's counsel would not be seeking to preclude communications entirely, but would be requesting that a condition be attached to any such communications – i.e., that they only occur if plaintiff's counsel is present. We conclude that, although plaintiff's counsel may inform the treating physician of the right to insist on the presence of plaintiff's counsel during any communications with defendant's counsel, plaintiff's counsel may not request that the physician communicate with defendant's counsel only if plaintiff's counsel is present. Although Rule 3.4(f) expressly prohibits only a request "to refrain from voluntarily giving relevant information to another party," it would be inconsistent with the intent of the rule to permit a lawyer to request that conditions be imposed on communications with opposing counsel that could discourage the witness from allowing the communication. Comments to Section 116(4) of the Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers, which is generally similar to Rule 3.4(f), support this conclusion:

> A lawyer may inform any person of the right not to be interviewed by any other party, but a lawyer may not request that a person exercise that right or attempt otherwise to induce noncooperation, except as permitted under Subsection (4).[4] A lawyer may also advise of the right to insist on conditions, such as that the lawyer or the person's own lawyer be present during any interview or that the interview be recorded.

Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers § 116 cmt. e (2000). See also D.C. Rule 3.4(a) ("A lawyer shall not: (a) obstruct another party's access to evidence or alter, destroy, or conceal evidence, or counsel or assist another person to do so, if the lawyer reasonably should know that the evidence is or may be the subject of discovery or subpoena in any pending or imminent proceeding . . . .").

We recognize that allowing lawyers to inform witnesses that they have no obligation to speak with opposing counsel, or that they can insist on the presence of other counsel as a condition, may result in a decision by the witness not to speak with opposing counsel. That possible result, however, is consistent with the intent of Rule 3.4(f), which is to allow the witness to make that decision based on what the witness perceives to be in his or her best interest. On the other hand, Rule 3.4(f) does not permit the lawyer to request that the witness make a particular decision.

We believe our conclusion is also consistent with and supported by Gregory v. United States, 369 F.2d 185 (D.C. Cir. 1966). In Gregory, the prosecutor in a capital case acknowledged that "I instructed all the witnesses that they were free to speak to anyone they like. However, it was my advice that they not speak to anyone about the case unless I was present." Id. at 187. The court held that this conduct deprived defendant of a fair trial. Id. at 189; see also id. at 188 ("we know of nothing in the law which gives the prosecutor the right to interfere with the preparation of the defense by effectively denying defense counsel access to the witnesses except in his presence"). Gregory was decided primarily on the basis of criminal law and procedure in the context of a capital case and long before the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct went into effect in 1991, so it has no direct applicability to the question before the Committee; however, our conclusion would preclude the same conduct that the Gregory holding precludes.[5]

---

[2] Lawyers involved in a case such as that presented by the inquiry will need to determine the extent to which there may be legal restrictions on a witness's disclosure of information and the extent to which any such restrictions may have been waived, removed by court order, or otherwise lifted. Such legal issues are beyond the scope of this opinion.

[3] We do not rule out the possibility that in a particular case, a treating physician may have become an agent of his or her patient for particular purposes, but we have found no basis for treating the physician-patient relationship as an agency relationship as a general matter for purposes of Rule 3.4(f). See Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 116 cmt. e (2000) (implying that physicians generally do not fall within any of the exceptions to Section 116, which includes an exception for agents of the client).

[4] Section 116(4) states as follows: "A lawyer may not request a person to refrain from voluntarily giving relevant testimony or information to another party, unless: (a) the person is the lawyer's client in the matter; or (b) (i) the person is not the lawyer's client but is a relative or employee or other agent of the lawyer or the lawyer's client, and (ii) the lawyer reasonably believes compliance will not materially and adversely affect the person's interests." Section 116(4) of the Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers.

[5] We also note that there was some discussion of Gregory in the context of Rule 3.4(f) when the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct were being developed. The D.C. Court of Appeals asked Robert E. Jordan, III, Chair of the D.C. Bar Model Rules of Professional Conduct Committee that was responsible for the original version of these rules, to review the comments submitted on the proposed rules in 1988. He responded as follows to one of the comments on proposed Rule 3.4(f):

There are several other issues raised by the scenario presented by the inquiry. First, if (as assumed) there are still some legal limits on the scope of information that the treating physician may disclose to defendant's counsel based on privacy laws and/or applicable privileges (notwithstanding the fact that legal impediments to the disclosure of certain information have been removed), it is proper for plaintiff's counsel to demand that the treating physician comply with legal confidentiality obligations and to inform the treating physician of plaintiff's position regarding the extent of those obligations. Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers § 116 cmt. e (2000) ("A lawyer may properly demand that a person who is not otherwise excepted from the Subsection observe a legal obligation of confidentiality to the lawyer's client. For example, a physician or member of the clergy who is considered to be an independent contractor may nonetheless owe a legal duty of confidentiality to the client, which the client's lawyer may properly insist that the person observe."). Second, as noted earlier, defendant's counsel should not solicit information the disclosure of which remains restricted. See D.C. Rule 4.4(a). Third, counsel for both sides should comply with Rule 4.3 in dealing with unrepresented persons.[6] See generally D.C. Ethics Opinion No. 287 (discussing Rules 4.3 and 4.4 in the context of ex parte contact with former employees of party-opponents).[7]

Conclusion

Under Rule 3.4(f), a lawyer may not request the client's treating physician to refrain from having ex parte communications with opposing counsel where legal impediments to such communications have been removed. The lawyer may, however, inform the physician that the physician has no obligation to speak with opposing counsel and that the physician may insist on the lawyer being present. The lawyer may also demand that the physician comply with any confidentiality obligations still in effect and may state his or her client's position regarding the scope of information that may be legally disclosed.

Published August 2011

Opinion No. 361

Lawyer's Acceptance of Compensation From Non-Lawyer Entity for Referring Client to Such Entity; Opinion 245 Overruled in Part

A lawyer who refers a client to a non-lawyer service provider such as a financial services firm may accept compensation from the provider for the referral so long as the criteria of Rule 1.7(c) and, if applicable, Rules 1.8(a) and 5.7 are satisfied. Those criteria are exacting, however, and the arrangement may be beyond the lawyer's malpractice coverage even if permitted by the Rules.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.7—Conflict of Interest: General
- Rule 1.8(a)—Conflict of Interest: Specific Rules
- Rule 5.7—Responsibilities Regarding Law-Related Services

Inquiry

The committee has been asked whether a lawyer who refers her client to a non-lawyer service provider[1] may accept compensation from the provider or potential partner for such a referral. Although this issue can arise in various contexts, the particular scenario presented is whether a lawyer may refer her client to a financial services firm in exchange for a referral fee. The inquirer advises that the referral arrangement would be disclosed to the client in writing and is permissible under the federal securities laws.[2]

Discussion

The foregoing scenario offers one of the many contexts in which fee-for-referral situations can arise. Variables include whether the transaction with the other entity will involve "law-related services" (e.g., title insurance for a real estate purchase versus the purchase of an automobile), whether the lawyer's representation of the client is related to the client's transaction with the other entity, whether the lawyer represents the other entity in unrelated matters, and whether the lawyer owns or controls the other entity.

For the reasons set out below, we believe that the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules" or "D.C. Rules") permit such arrangements if certain criteria are satisfied. We caution, however, that the prerequisites for such an arrangement are exacting and that even when permitted by the Rules, the arrangement

---

The Courts/Lawyers Section expresses concern that Rule 3.4(f), as written, does not reflect the limitation imposed on lawyers representing the government in a criminal case by Gregory v. United States, 125 U.S. App. D.C. 140, 369 F.2d 185 (1966), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 865 (1969). That decision concludes that it is improper for the government to interfere with defense efforts to obtain information, and the Section expresses concern that Rule 3.4(f) might be read as permitting a prosecutor to request that government employees such as investigative personnel or medical examiners not speak to defense counsel.

I doubt that government prosecutors would take the ethics rule as freeing them from such obligations as Gregory imposes, and I would not agree that a specific black letter addition be made to deal with the perceived problem. Furthermore, if any such addition were made, it should be to Rule 3.8, which lays out special rules applicable to prosecutors.

I suggest that the problem perceived by the Section can be remedied by adding to the Comment paragraph 10 the following:

Paragraph (f) does not alter any limitations, imposed upon prosecutors in criminal cases by judicial decisions or other law, with respect to impeding access to government employees who may have information relevant to defending against criminal charges.

If the Court wishes to deal with this problem, I recommend this solution.

Analysis of Comments Submitted to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals in Response to the Court's Order of September 1, 1988 (May 3, 1989), at 66-67. The D.C. Court of Appeals did not make any changes to the text of proposed Rule 3.4(f) or proposed comment [10] (now comment [9]) in response to the referenced comments.

[6] Rule 4.3 states:

(a) In dealing on behalf of a client with a person who is not represented by counsel, a lawyer shall not:

(1) give advice to the unrepresented person other than the advice to secure counsel, if the interests of such person are or have a reasonable possiblity of being in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client; or

(2) state or imply to unrepresented persons whose interests are not in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client that the lawyer is disinterested.

(b) When the lawyer knows or reasonable should know that the unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to correct the misunderstanding.

[7] We assume from the inquiry that the treating physician is not represented by counsel and that Rule 4.2 is therefore not implicated.

[1] This opinion does not address compensation for referrals between lawyers, which is governed by Rule 1.5(e), or payments to non-lawyers for referring potential clients to lawyers, which are governed by Rules 5.4 and 7.1.

[2] This committee does not opine on compliance with legal requirements, such as those under the Investment Advisers Act of 1940, 15 U.S.C. §§ 80b-1 through 80b-21 (2006), and its District of Columbia analog, the Securities Act of 2000, D.C. Code §§ 31-5601.1 through 5608.04 (2001), aside from those imposed by the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

may fall outside the coverage of the lawyer's professional malpractice insurance.

Rules 1.7 and 1.8, which govern conflicts of interest, and Rule 5.7, which deals with the provision of law-related services, are relevant to this inquiry. No reported decision of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals or the District of Columbia Superior Court appears to have addressed this issue since the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct took effect in January 1991.[3] This committee addressed the issue in a 1993 opinion (Opinion No. 245) but an intervening change in the Rules makes reconsideration in order.

The 1993 inquiry was whether a company offering services as a registered agent for corporations could pay commissions to lawyers who referred their clients to the company. Following a brief discussion that cited Rule 1.7(b)(4) of the D.C. Rules and several ethics opinions from this and other jurisdictions, the opinion concluded that—> a lawyer may not retain a referral fee or commission from a third party for referring legal clients. Any payment offered to the lawyer for referral of a client's business must be disclosed to the client. The client must consent to the payment, and the payment must be turned over to the client directly or as a credit to the bill for legal services. A lawyer's judgment in referring a client for services from third parties must be based on assessment of the quality of the third party's services and fairness of the price, not on a potential financial benefit to the lawyer.

D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 245 (1993) ("Opinion 245"). Most of the precepts set forth in the above quotation—notably, those respecting disclosure, consent, and impairment of the lawyer's independent professional judgment—apply with equal force today. Under the current D.C. Rules, however, such a fee need not be turned over to the client if—

- the client—following full disclosure as contemplated in Rule 1.7(c)(1)—gives his informed consent (as contemplated in Rules 1.7(c)(1) and 1.0(e)) to retention of the fee by the lawyer; and
- notwithstanding the lawyer's personal conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4), "the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to [the] client," as required by Rule 1.7(c)(2); and
- the requisites of Rule 1.8(a), which governs business transactions between lawyer and client, are satisfied; and
- if Rule 5.7, which addresses the provision of "law-related services," applies, the requisites of that rule are satisfied.

Rule 1.7. Rule 1.7 is the general rule relating to conflicts of interest and waivers of such conflicts. One type of conflict arises when "the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests." D.C. Rule 1.7(b)(4).

This type of conflict can be waived if (A) the client "provides informed consent" "after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation" and (B) "the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to [the] client." Rule 1.7(c).

Opinion 245 was issued in 1993. In 1995, the Court of Appeals promulgated rules revisions that included a new comment to Rule 1.7:[4]

> [36] Lawyers, either alone or through firms, may have interests in enterprises that do not practice law but that, in some or all of their work, become involved with lawyers or their clients either by assisting the lawyer in providing legal services or by providing related services to the client. Examples of such enterprises are accounting firms, consultants, real estate brokerages, and the like. The existence of such interests raises several questions under [Rule 1.7]. First, a lawyer's recommendation, as part of legal advice, that the client obtain the services of an enterprise in which the lawyer has an interest implicates paragraph 1.7(b)(4). The lawyer should not make a recommendation unless able to conclude that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will not be adversely affected. Even then, the lawyer should not make such a recommendation without full disclosure to the client so that the client can make a fully informed choice. Such disclosure should include the nature and substance of the lawyer's or the firm's interest in the related enterprise, alternative sources for the non-legal services in question, and sufficient information so that the client understands that the related enterprise's services are not legal services and that the client's relationship to the related enterprise will not be that of a client to attorney. * * * Third, the lawyer should be aware that the relationship of a related enterprise to its own customer may create a significant interest in the lawyer in the continuation of that relationship. The substantiality of such an interest may be enough to require the lawyer to decline a proffered client representation that would conflict with that interest; at least Rule 1.7(b)(4) and (c) may require the prospective client to be informed and to give informed consent before the representation could be undertaken. Fourth, a lawyer's interest in a related enterprise that may also serve the lawyer's clients creates a situation in which the lawyer must take unusual care to fashion the relationship among lawyer, client, and related enterprise to assure that the [client's] confidences and secrets are properly preserved pursuant to Rule 1.6 to the maximum extent possible.

D.C. Rule 1.7, cmt. [36]. Comment [36] makes clear that a lawyer's profit-motivated financial or managerial involvement with another entity to which she refers clients is not per se prohibited but is subject to the waiver provisions of Rule 1.7(c).

We view the instant inquiry—in which the other entity pays a commission to the referring lawyer—as an example of the type of lawyer interest described in comment [36] and hence as not per se prohibited by the Rules. Instead, an arrangement for such a referral fee or commission is subject to the waiver provisions of Rule 1.7(c). To exemplify, we do not believe the Court of Appeals intended to permit waiver for a referral to an accounting firm owned by the referring lawyer but to forbid waiver, even with full disclosure to and informed consent by the client, for a referring lawyer's receipt of a $100 gift card from a court reporting service.

[3] A 2007 Court of Appeals decision stated that a lawyer referring a client to a non-lawyer entity owned by the lawyer must comply with the requirements of Rule 1.8(a), which governs business transactions between lawyer and client. In re Brown, 930 A.2d 249 (D.C. 2007), aff'g 2006 D.C. Super. LEXIS 5 (D.C. Super. Ct. Feb. 22, 2006) (Adm. No. 1374-03). Perforce the Rules permit a lawyer to refer a client to a non-lawyer entity in which the lawyer has less than a complete ownership interest.

[4] The comment originally was promulgated as comment [25] but currently is comment [36].

Accordingly, Opinion 245 is overruled insofar as it erects a per se bar to the receipt of compensation by a lawyer for referring her client to a non-lawyer entity. We emphasize, though, that the requirements of "[d]isclosure and consent are not mere formalities," D.C. Rule 1.7 cmt. [27], that "the lawyer bears the burden of proof that informed consent was secured," id. cmt. [28], and that a waiver is ineffective unless "the lawyer reasonably believes"—i.e., the test is objective—"that he or she will be able to provide competent and diligent representation" despite the conflict, id. cmt. [30]; accord D.C. Rule 1.7(c)(2). The disclosure should include the fact that the lawyer stands to benefit from the referral, the amount and manner[5] of the benefit, that other providers of the services might do so more capably, at a lower cost or both, and that the fact of the benefit conceivably could affect the lawyer's independent professional judgment. See Ariz. Ethics Op. 05-01 (2005) (requiring disclosure of amount and manner of benefit); Calif. Formal Op. 1995-140 (1995) (requiring disclosure that better and less costly services may be available elsewhere). Moreover, "the form of disclosure sufficient for more sophisticated business clients may not be sufficient to permit less sophisticated clients to provide informed consent." D.C. Rule 1.7, cmt. [28]; accord Phila. Bar Ass'n, Joint Ethics Op. 2000-100 (2000). Finally, the quantum of the benefit to the lawyer is a factor in whether the lawyer reasonably can conclude that the arrangement will not affect adversely the lawyer's ability to provide competent and diligent representation. See D.C. Rule 1.7, cmt. [30] (noting that "it is doubtful that a lawyer could [so conclude] where the lawyer's individual interests make it likely that the lawyer will be adversely situated to the client with respect to the subject-matter of the legal representation"); Phila. Bar Ass'n, Joint Ethics Op. 2000-100 (2000); Utah Ethics Advisory Op. 99-07 (1999) (noting difficulty, under Rule 1.8, of satisfying requirement that lawyer's judgment not be affected); Wisc. Ethics Op. E-00-04 (2000) (stating that disclosure requirements of Rule 1.8 can be satisfied only if benefit to lawyer not unduly substantial).

[5] By "manner," we include whether the fee is a one-time or recurring payment. See, e.g., Phila, Bar Ass'n, Joint Ethics Op. 2000-100 (2000) (requiring that the client be advised of this fact).

The disclosures mandated in connection with a request to waive a lawyer's conflict under Rule 1.7 are not required to be in writing. The same is true for the client's informed consent. D.C. Rule 1.7(c) & cmt. [28]. The comments note, however, that "[i]t is ordinarily prudent for the lawyer to provide at least a written summary of the considerations disclosed and to request and receive a written informed consent." D.C. Rule 1.7, cmt. [28].

Rule 1.8. The D.C. Rules impose special waiver requirements when a lawyer enters into a business transaction with a client. The transaction must be "fair and reasonable to the client" and must be fully disclosed in writing "in a manner which can be reasonably understood by the client." D.C. Rule 1.8(a). The disclosure should, "[w]hen necessary, [include] the material risks of the transaction, including any risk presented by the lawyer's involvement, and the existence of reasonably available alternatives and, where appropriate, should explain that the client may wish to seek the advice of independent counsel. D.C. Rule 1.8, cmt. [2]. Also, the client must be accorded a reasonable chance to obtain independent legal advice and the client must give informed written consent to the transaction. D.C. Rule 1.8(a). A lawyer-client transaction is subject to this rule even if unrelated to the legal representation but—> the risk to a client is greatest when the client expects the lawyer to represent the client in the transaction itself or when the lawyer's financial interest otherwise poses a significant risk that the lawyer's representation of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's financial interest in the transaction.

D.C. Rule 1.8, cmts. [1], [3]; accord N.J. Ethics Op. 688 (2000). Moreover, "[t]he rule applies to lawyers engaged in the sale of goods or services related to the practice of law, for example, the sale of title insurance or investment services to the existing clients of the lawyer's legal practice." Id. cmt. [1].

The D.C. Rules provide expressly that Rule 1.8(a) applies if the other entity is controlled by the lawyer—a criterion that includes the lawyer's ability to direct the entity's operation. D.C. Rule 5.7, cmts. [4], [5]; see In re Brown, 930 A.2d 249 (D.C. 2007) (applying Rule 1.8(a) where real estate brokerage handling sale of decedent's property was wholly owned by lawyer for personal representative).

No published opinion of the D.C. Court of Appeals, nor the D.C. Rules, nor any of our previous opinions (including Opinion 245) addresses whether Rule 1.8(a) (or its predecessor under the D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility, Disciplinary Rule 5-104(A)) applies where the lawyer does not control or have an ownership interest in the other entity but, as here, stands to profit directly from the referral. Most other jurisdictions that have addressed the question, though, have concluded that Rule 1.8(a) does apply in such circumstances. See, e.g., Ariz. Ethics Op. 05-01 (2005) (rule applies; noting "heavy burden" of demonstrating compliance); Calif. Formal Op. 1995-140 (1995) (rule applies); Conn. Ethics Op. 94-25 (1994) (same); Ill. State Bar Ass'n Op. 97-04 (1998) (same); Ky. Ethics Op. E-390 (1996) (rule applies but difficult to satisfy informed consent requirement); Mich. Op. RI-317 (2000) (rule applies); N.J. Ethics Op. 688 (2000) (same); Ohio Op. 2000-1 (2000) (rule applies); Phila. Bar Ass'n, Joint Ethics Op. 2000-100 (2000) (rule applies); Va. Legal Ethics Op. 1564 (rev. 1995) (same); Utah Ethics Advisory Op. 99-07 (1999) (same; noting difficulty of satisfying requirement that lawyer's judgment not be affected); Wisc. Ethics Op. E-00-04 (2000) (rule applies but can be satisfied only if benefit not unduly substantial); see also Mo. Informal Advisory Op. 960124 (n.d.) (disapproving arrangement without referring to rule on business transactions with clients); N.Y. State Bar Ass'n Op. 682 (1996) (same); Vt. Advisory Ethics Op. 1998-08 (1998) (same).

Although numerous, these opinions offer little in the way of reasoning. We think that a somewhat more nuanced approach is in order. Rule 1.8(a) applies where there is a "business transaction" between lawyer and client. Where the lawyer has an ownership interest or management role in the other entity, such a transaction is present and the lawyer accordingly must comply with Rule 1.8(a) as well as with Rule 1.7(c). Where the lawyer has no such interest or role in the other entity, however, there is no "business transaction" between the lawyer and her client even if the lawyer is to receive a commission or similar benefit from the other entity. In that circumstance, Rule 1.7(c) applies but Rule 1.8(a) does not.

The waiver requirements under D.C. Rule 1.8(a) are outlined above. Lawyers preparing disclosures contemplated by this rule also may wish to take note of the following opinions from other jurisdictions. The Illinois ethics opinion cited above states that full disclosure should include "informing the client . . . that the lawyer would not be involved in any way to protect the client's interest but would continue to receive a portion of the advisor's fee." Ill. Advisory Op. 97-04 (1998). Michigan cautions that where the lawyer has an ongoing, as opposed to a one-time, interest in the fees paid to the advisory firm, disclosure "should include . . . that the lawyer cannot render legal advice to the client if disputes or differences arise between the advisory firm and the client." Mich. Op, RI-317 (2000). Wisconsin advises the lawyer to disclose "such factors as relative cost; suitability to the client's needs; and the competence, character, and reputation of the person to whom the lawyer refers the client." Wisc. Ethics Op. E-00-04 (2000).

Rule 5.7. The D.C. Rules expressly address the responsibilities of a lawyer when "law-related services" are provided by an entity "controlled by the lawyer individually or with others" in circumstances that are distinct from the lawyer's provision of legal services to her client. D.C. Rule 5.7(a)(2). "Law-related services" are those "that might reasonably be performed in conjunction with and in substance are related to the provision of legal services, and that are not prohibited as unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer." D.C. Rule 5.7(b). Examples include "providing title insurance, financial planning, accounting, trust services, real estate counseling, legislative lobbying, economic analysis, social work, psychological counseling, tax preparation, and patent, medical or environmental consulting." Rule 5.7, cmt. [9].

The facts before us are insufficient to determine whether this rule, which was added in February 2007, applies to the instant inquiry. For example, the rule does not apply if the lawyer lacks "the ability to direct [the] operation" of the non-lawyer entity to which she refers her client, Rule 5.7, cmt. [4], nor does it apply if the services provided by the non-lawyer entity are unrelated to the provision of legal services. The inquiry does not indicate whether the lawyer has a controlling, ownership, or management interest in the non-lawyer entity, nor does it indicate the relationship, if any, between the services being provided by the lawyer and those to be provided by the non-lawyer entity. As to the latter criterion, it is one thing if the lawyer is defending the client against a reckless driving charge and the referral is to an entity that would manage the assets of the client's business, but quite another if the lawyer represents the client in an inheritance matter and the referral is to an entity that would manage the inherited assets.

If Rule 5.7 does apply, however, the lawyer will be subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct in respect of the services provided by the non-lawyer entity unless the lawyer takes "reasonable measures to assure that [the client] knows that the services are not legal services and that the protections of the client-lawyer relationship do not exist." Rule 5.7(a)(2). The communication should be made before the client enters into an agreement for the law-related services, Rule 5.7 cmt. [6], and the burden is on the lawyer to show compliance with the notification requirement, id. cmt. [7].

Malpractice coverage. Although we do not opine on legal questions arising other than under the Rules of Professional Conduct, we offer a final caveat: Compliance with the D.C. Rules aside, a "business enterprise exclusion" is a standard feature of lawyers' professional liability insurance policies, American Guarantee & Liab. Ins. Co. v. Timothy S. Keiter, P.A., 360 F.3d 13, 16 (1st Cir. 2004), and courts have interpreted this exclusion broadly, e.g., Minnesota Lawyers Mut. Ins. Co. v. Antonelli, Terry, Stout & Kraus, LLP, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 122836, *28 (E.D. Va. Nov. 18, 2010) (Civil No. 1:08-CV-1020) (holding that exclusion extends not only to claims "arising from" lawyer's other business but also claims "relating to" such business). One purpose of the exclusion is "to avoid the circumstance where an insured so intermingles his business relationships with his law practice that an insurance carrier incurs additional risk of having to cover the insured for legal malpractice claims relating to the conduct of business, rather than solely out of the professional practice." Id. at 17 (quoting Jeffer v Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co. of Pittsburgh, Pa., 703 A.2d 316, 322 (N.J. Super. 1997).) One application of the exclusion is where a lawyer has an interest in a business that becomes involved in the services the lawyer is providing to her client. E.g., Darwin Nat'l Assurance Co. v. Hellyer, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60592 (N.D. Ill. June 7, 2011) (No. 10 C 50224). "[T]he [insurance] policy makes it clear that it will not extend coverage to an insured sued for professional malpractice outside of legal matters conducted between the firm and its clients." Jeffer, 703 A.2d at 322. The upshot is that even where the D.C. Rules permit a lawyer to accept a commission from the non-lawyer entity to which she refers a client, the lawyer's malpractice insurance might not cover a claim that relates to the referral or to the services rendered by the other entity, particularly where the lawyer has a financial interest involving the other entity. Ill. Advisory Op. 97-04 (1998).[6]

Conclusion

If the criteria of Rule 1.7(c) and, if applicable, Rules 1.8(a) and 5.7 are satisfied, a lawyer who refers a client to a non-lawyer service provider such as a financial services firm[7] may accept compensation from the provider for such a referral. The prerequisites for such an arrangement are exacting, however, and the arrangement may be outside the coverage of the lawyer's professional malpractice insurance even if permitted by the Rules.

Published November, 2011

Opinion No. 362

Non-lawyer Ownership of Discovery Service Vendors

Summary

Discovery service vendors, such as e-discovery vendors, cannot both practice law within the District of Columbia and be partially or entirely owned by passive non-lawyer investors consistent withD.C. Rule 5.4(b). This Committee's jurisdiction does not include the definition of the practice of law, but the Committee on Unauthorized Practice of Law has recently issued a detailed opinion explaining what activities by these vendors constitute the practice of law.

The Rules of Professional Conduct do not reach non-lawyer owners of discovery service organizations; they are not subject to bar discipline. The Rules do reach lawyers who co-own or manage such vendors with or on behalf of non-lawyer passive investors. The Rules also could reach lawyer employees of such vendors who know of facts that constitute a violation of Rule 5.4(b) or lawyers who, with similar knowledge, retain such vendors.

[6] We do not mean to suggest that the simple act of referring a client to a non-lawyer service provider, where the lawyer receives no economic benefit from the referral, is beyond the scope of standard legal malpractice coverage.

[7] As noted above, this opinion does not address compensation for referrals between lawyers, which is governed by Rule 1.5(e), or payments to non-lawyers for referring potential clients to lawyers, which are governed by Rules 5.4 and 7.1.

In addition, lawyers who own, manage, work for or retain a discovery service vendor that engages in the practice of law in the District of Columbia and has passive non-lawyer investment may violate the prohibition in Rule 5.5(b) against assisting others in the unauthorized practice of law.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 5.2—Subordinate Lawyers
- Rule 5.4(b)—Professional Independence of a Lawyer
- Rule 5.5(b)—Unauthorized Practice
- Rule 5.7—Law Related Services
- Rule 8.4(a)—Misconduct

Inquiry

Discovery service vendors have become an increasingly important part of the legal marketplace. They can provide an efficient and effective way for clients and lawyers to handle the complex and expensive process of discovery (electronic and otherwise), providing technical expertise, facilities and trained personnel at rates that often are less than those charged by lawyers and law firms for similar services. When such organizations operate in conformity with the ethical mandates discussed herein, they may present a viable alternative to traditional marketplace offerings.

The Committee has received an inquiry from a lawyer familiar with the services provided by discovery service vendors to lawyers and clients. The inquirer states that these vendors provide temporary attorneys, manage the services of software providers, and supervise the review and production of documents in their own review centers. The inquirer asserts that some such vendors are owned and operated entirely by attorneys, others are partly owned by attorneys, and the remainder are owned and controlled by corporations and other non-attorneys. The inquirer asks whether these vendors are operating consistent with Rule 5.4's prohibition on passive investment in law firms. Although the inquirer did not raise Rule 5.5's prohibition on engaging or assisting in the unauthorized practice of law or Rule 5.7's discussion of the provision by lawyers of law related services, we consider those issues as well.

Discussion

The threshold question is whether the discovery service vendors are, in fact, engaged in the practice of law. The practice of law is not defined in the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct. See Comment [2] to Rule 5.5 ("The definition of the practice of law is established by law and varies from one jurisdiction to another.").

A. The UPL Committee's Opinion Addressing Discovery Service Vendors

District of Columbia Court of Appeals Rule 49 ("Rule 49") governs who may practice law within the District of Columbia. The District of Columbia Committee on Unauthorized Practice of Law (the "UPL Committee") has recently examined when e-discovery companies or discovery service vendors are engaged in the practice of law in the District of Columbia and therefore subject to Rule 49. We accept, as we must, the conclusions of the UPL Committee and its Opinion, described in more detail below.

In its Opinion 21-12, issued January 12, 2012, the UPL Committee reviewed the activities of discovery service vendors.[1] It noted that "some companies offer not only attorneys to staff document review projects, but also offer the physical space where the document review will take place, computers for conducting the review, and servers for hosting the documents to be reviewed." Op. 21-12 at 4. Additionally, some vendors offer other services ranging from "e-discovery consulting to database management to the eventual production of documents." Id. Some vendors describe their services as "'one-stop shopping, comprehensive review and project management, [and] fully managed document review.'" Id. (also noting descriptions of "soup-to-nuts document project from process to production" and "comprehensive project planning, on-site review team supervision, privilege log preparation, e-vendor selection and more"). Finally, some vendors also tout the qualifications of the lawyers they employ (e.g., describing them as "seasoned litigators"), or promote the vendor's expertise in various areas of the law such as intellectual property, patent litigation, class action lawsuits, and mergers and acquisitions. Id. at 5.

[1] The full text of the UPL Committee's opinion can be found at http://www.dccourts.gov/internet/appellate/unauthcommittee/main_jsf.

Opinion 21-12 provides guidance to allow discovery service companies to promote and provide services without falling afoul of Rule 49. First, the UPL Committee concluded that Rule 49 covers discovery service companies that are located in, use an address in, or otherwise conduct activities in the District of Columbia. In addition, Rule 49 covers those entities that "advertise themselves as available to assist with discovery projects in the District." Id. at 7.

Second, the UPL Committee, reiterating prior guidance from its Opinion 6-99, concluded that discovery service companies could handle "the administrative aspects of hiring and supervising a document review attorney" without violating Rule 49.[2] However, "the final selection of attorneys to staff a document review project must be made by a member of the D.C. Bar with an attorney-client relationship [and] the attorney's legal work must be directed or supervised by a D.C. Bar member who represents the client." Id. at 8. The "discovery services company may not . . . attempt to supervise the document review attorney['s legal work]." Id.

Third, the UPL Committee stated that "[t]o avoid running afoul of the holding out prohibition, discovery services companies must avoid" terms such as "document review" or "the discovery process" or other broad statements, such as "soup-to-nuts" or "end-to-end" services, implying that "a company can manage the entire document review or discovery process." Id. at 9. The UPL Committee also stated that any vendor making "such broad statements . . . at a minimum must include a prominent disclaimer stating that the company is not authorized to practice law or provide legal services in the District of Columbia and that the services offered by the company are limited to the non-legal, administrative aspects of document review and discovery projects." Id. Statements about the legal expertise of staff must be accompanied by a similar disclaimer. Id.

B. Rule 5.4: Non-Lawyer Ownership and Discovery Service Companies.

Rule 5.4(b) permits non-lawyer ownership of law firms under certain conditions. The entity in which the interest is held by the non-lawyer must have "as its sole purpose" the provision of legal services. Rule 5.4(b)(1). The non-lawyer owners must undertake to abide by the Rules of Professional Conduct. Rule 5.4(b)(2). The lawyers in the organization must accept supervisory authority over the non-lawyer as provided by Rule 5.1. Rule 5.4(b)(3). All of these conditions must be set forth in writing. Rule 5.4(b)(4).

[2] The administrative matters "could include interviewing individuals to create roster of attorneys available...providing the lawyer's working space and equipment, ensuring that he or she works a regular day and works at an acceptable pace, providing salary and benefits, and similar supervisory activities that do not require the application of professional legal judgment." Id. at 8.

Rule 5.4(b) does not allow for passive investment in law firms or the like by "a corporation, investment banking firm, an investor or any other person or entity" that seeks to "entitle itself to all or any portion of the income or profits of a law firm or similar organization." Comment [8] to Rule 5.4. To hold an interest in a law firm, a non-lawyer must be "an individual performing professional services within the law firm or other organization." Id.; see also Rule 5.4(b) (limiting non-lawyers who may own an interest in a law firm to those "who perform[] professional services which assist the organization in providing legal services to clients").

As stated above, we are bound by the conclusions stated in the UPL Committee's Opinion 21-12 regarding those activities that do or do not constitute the practice of law. To the extent that discovery service vendors observe the limits on their work and related promotional activities set forth in that opinion, such vendors are not practicing law and the provisions of Rule 5.4(b) therefore do not apply.[3] To the extent, however, that the discovery service organization is, in fact, engaged in the practice of law as set forth in Opinion 21-12, passive ownership of that organization violates Rule 5.4(b).[4] Of course, the Rules of Professional Conduct only reach the conduct of lawyers, not corporations or non-lawyer investors. As a result, D.C. Bar admitted lawyers may not practice law within the District of Columbia or hold themselves out as able to do so for discovery service organizations when such organizations have passive non-lawyer investors. Under such circumstances, a D.C. Bar admitted lawyer cannot, consistent with Rule 5.4(b), share ownership in or participate in the management of a discovery service organization with non-lawyer passive investors.[5]

We do not find a basis to conclude that lawyer employees of a discovery service organization, whose sole or principal function is document review, have a duty to investigate how the organization promotes itself or whether the organization has passive non-lawyer ownership. However, where such a lawyer employee knows that the discovery service organization is (a) practicing law within the District of Columbia or holding itself out as prepared to do so and (b) owned, in whole or in part, by non-lawyer passive investors, such lawyer's continued work for that entity may be inconsistent with Rule 5.4(b). See also Rule 8.4(a) ("It is professional misconduct for a lawyer to violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through the acts of another.") (emphasis added). Under the Rules, the term knows "denotes actual knowledge of the fact in question." The definition also states, however, that "[a] person's knowledge may be inferred from the circumstances." Rule 1.0(f).

Note, however, that whether an entity, either in a particular matter or generally, is practicing law is an issue that often may be unclear. Under Rule 5.2(b), subordinate lawyers do not violate the Rules of Professional Conduct when they "act[] in accordance with a supervisory lawyer's reasonable resolution of an arguable question of professional duty."[6] "Although a lawyer is not relieved of responsibility for a violation by the fact that the lawyer acted at the direction of a supervisor, that fact may be relevant in determining whether a lawyer had the knowledge required to render conduct a violation of the Rules." Comment [1] to Rule 5.2.

As we stated in Opinion 358, Rule 5.2 "protects a subordinate lawyer who acts at the direction of a supervising attorney so long as there is a reasonable argument that" the actions at issue are "permitted by the Rules."[7] In this regard, it may be prudent for the management of a discovery services organization to explain to its employees, preferably in writing, how its operations are consistent with the restrictions on the practice of law by non-lawyers and on the prohibition of passive non-lawyer ownership of entities that do practice law. Such a statement, when issued in good faith by a supervisory lawyer, can fulfill the requirements of the safe harbor described in Rule 5.2(b). Of course, if the subordinate lawyer knows that the statement issued by the discovery organization is or has become materially inaccurate, such lawyer may no longer come within the safe harbor of Rule 5.2(b).

Finally, a lawyer who is contracting for discovery services on behalf of a client can similarly risk falling afoul of Rule 5.4(b) if the lawyer knows that the discovery services organization has passive non-lawyer ownership. See Rule 8.4(a) (prohibiting a lawyer from "knowingly assist[ing] or induc[ing]" another lawyer to violate the Rules). A D.C. Bar admitted lawyer who retains a discovery organization with passive non-lawyer ownership and abdicates to that organization responsibilities that include the practice of law, without appropriate supervision or oversight, violates Rule 5.4(b). For example, a lawyer who simply gives a group of documents and a discovery request to a discovery service vendor and asks the vendor to select and organize responsive documents, produce a privilege log, and [3] If a lawyer is involved in the provision of discovery services that do not constitute the practice of law, the lawyer may still be required to comply with the provisions of Rule 5.7. Discovery services that are not legal services are likely "law related services" under Rule 5.7. As a result, a lawyer providing such services would be subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct with respect to such services unless the lawyer took steps to inform the person or entity obtaining the law related services that the "protections of the client-lawyer relationship do not exist." See Rule 5.7(a)(2).

[4] A discovery services organization could practice law and still have a non-lawyer owner if such owner were an active participant in the business and made the certifications required by Rule 5.4(b)(4).

[5] A recent opinion of the New York State Bar Association concluded that New York's version of Rule 5.4 prohibits New York-admitted lawyers from practicing law in New York as employees of a United Kingdom entity that included non-lawyers in supervisory and ownership positions. NYSBA Ethics Opinion 911 (March 2012). Although New York's version of Rule 5.4 differs from that of the District of Columbia, and does not permit non-lawyer ownership of any kind, the New York opinion nevertheless supports our broader conclusion that a lawyer cannot practice law with an entity that is constituted in a manner not authorized by Rule 5.4.

[6] Rule 5.2 states in full:

"(a) A lawyer is bound by the Rules of Professional Conduct notwithstanding that the lawyer acted at the direction of another person.

(b) A subordinate lawyer does not violate the Rules of Professional Conduct if that lawyer acts in accordance with a supervisory lawyer's resolution of an arguable question of professional duty."

[7] D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 358 (2011); See also Comment [2] to Scope Note ("The Rules presuppose that disciplinary assessment of a lawyer's conduct will be made on the basis of facts and circumstances as they existed at the time of conduct in question and in recognition of the fact that a lawyer often has to act upon uncertain or incomplete evidence of the situation. Moreover, the Rules presupposes that whether or not discipline should be imposed for a violation, and the severity of the sanction, depend on all of the circumstances, such as willfulness and seriousness of the violation, extenuating factors and whether there have been previous violations.") prepare the response to the request itself may put the discovery service organization in the position of practicing law under Opinion 21-12. Under such circumstances, instead of the broad delegation of work and responsibility described above, the lawyer hiring the discovery service vendor should ensure that the services being provided for that lawyer will not extend to the practice of law as outlined in Opinion 21-12. That is, the lawyer seeking to retain a discovery services organization should satisfy herself that the organization will not be engaged in the practice of law with respect to the matter for which the lawyer seeks to hire the organization. Alternatively, a lawyer seeking legal services from a discovery services organization could assure herself that such organization either is owned and controlled solely by lawyers or does not engage in the practice of law.

C. Rule 5.5: Discovery Services Organizations and Unauthorized Practice of Law

Rule 5.5(a) prohibits a lawyer from "practicing law in a jurisdiction where doing so violates the regulation of the legal profession in that jurisdiction." Rule 5.5(b) prohibits assistance to a "person who is not a member of the Bar in the performance of activity that constitutes the unauthorized practice of law." Comment [1] to Rule 5.5 indicates that these prohibitions "concern[] the unauthorized practice of law by District of Columbia Bar members in other jurisdictions and assistance by District of Columbia Bar members in the unauthorized practice of law by lawyers not admitted in this jurisdiction or by non-lawyers."

A lawyer who works for, partially owns, or engages a discovery service organization with passive non-lawyer ownership may be assisting another "person" or "non-lawyer" in the unauthorized practice of law. Although "person" is not defined in the Rules, Rule 49 defines the term to include entities. See D.C. Ct. App. Rule 49(a) (1). Moreover, Rules 4.1 through 4.4 use the term "person" or "third person" in ways that include entities as well as individuals. For example, it would be anomalous to conclude that Rule 4.4(a)'s prohibition on the use of "means that have no substantial purpose other than to embarrass, delay or burden a third person," applies only to individuals. The same logic applies to the provisions of Rule 4.3.[8] See generally D.C. Code § 45-604 ("The word 'person' shall be held to apply to partnerships and corporations unless such construction would be unreasonable....")

Conclusion

If discovery service organizations follow the guidelines set forth in the UPL Committee Opinion 21-12 and do not practice law, the activities of such organizations and the lawyers who work for them are consistent with the restrictions on non-lawyer ownership stated in Rule 5.4(b). However, the combination of the practice of law in the District of Columbia and passive non-lawyer ownership is not consistent with Rule 5.4(b). The noncompliance with the limitations on entities owned in part by non-lawyers should be particularly evident to those lawyers who create, own, and manage such organizations in conjunction with passive investors, but also may be evident to those lawyers who work at such organizations or the lawyers who engage such organizations. Lawyers in any of these circumstances should understand how Rule 5.4(b)'s requirements, and Opinion 21-12's definition of the practice of law may affect their ability to own, manage, work for, or retain such an entity. Finally, a lawyer who partially owns a discovery service vendor with passive non-lawyer ownership engaged in the practice of law in the District of Columbia assists in the unauthorized practice of law in violation of Rule 5.5(b). Lawyers who knowingly work for or retain such an entity may also violate Rule 5.5(b).

Published June 2012

Opinion No. 363

In-House Lawyer's Disclosure or Use of Employer/Client's Confidences or Secrets in Claim Against Employer/Client for Employment Discrimination or Retaliatory Discharge

An in-house lawyer may not disclose or use her employer/client's confidences or secrets in support of the lawyer's claim against the employer/client for employment discrimination or retaliatory discharge unless expressly authorized by Rule 1.6. If the employer/client puts the lawyer's conduct in issue, however (e.g., by lodging an affirmative defense or a counterclaim), the lawyer may disclose or use the employer's confidences or secrets insofar as reasonably necessary to respond to the employer/client's contention. An in-house lawyer is not prohibited from bringing such a claim against her employer/client merely because the employer/client may find it necessary or helpful to disclose its confidences or secrets in defending against the lawyer's claim.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information

Inquiry

The committee has been asked whether an in-house lawyer may disclose or use her employer/client's confidences or secrets in a claim against the employer/client for employment discrimination or retaliatory discharge. The inquirer also asks whether an employer/client's perceived need to use its confidences or secrets in defending against such a claim limits the in-house lawyer's right to bring the claim.

Discussion

Claim by in-house lawyer

As a general matter, an employee in the District of Columbia may pursue a claim against her employer for prohibited discrimination, see, e.g., 42 U.S.C. § 2000e—2000e-17 (2006) (Title VII of 1964 Civil Rights Act); D.C. Code § 2-1401.1—2-1404.04 (2001) (DC Human Rights Act), or retaliatory discharge, Carl v. Children's Hospital, 702 A.2d 159 (D.C. 1997) (en banc); Liberatore v. Melville Corp., 168 F.3d 1326 (D.C. Cir. 1999).[1] We know of no District of Columbia decisions on whether such a cause of action is available to an in-house counsel[2] but assume arguendo that such a lawyer possesses such a right. We address here whether the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules")

[8] Rules 4.1 and 4.2 specifically define "person" or "third person" to include entities. See Comment [1] to Rule 4.1 and Rule 4.2(c). The failure to repeat a similar definition in Rules 4.3, 4.4, and 5.5 does not appear to have been by design or otherwise to have been intended to distinguish the meaning of the term as between different Rules.

[1] This committee does not opine on laws or regulations aside from the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules"). It may discuss such law, however, where appropriate to put its opinions in context.

[2] See Wallace v. Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, 715 A.2d 873, 883-86 (D.C. 1998) (assuming that retaliatory discharge of lawyer by law firm can give rise to cause of action against firm).

prohibit an in-house counsel from disclosing or using the employer/client's confidences or secrets in furtherance of such a claim.[3]

With certain exceptions, a D.C. Bar member may not knowingly reveal, or use to the lawyer's advantage or the client's disadvantage, a "confidence or secret" of the lawyer's client. D.C. Rule 1.6(a). In this context, "confidences" are information protected by the attorney-client privilege, while "secrets" are "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client." D.C. Rule 1.6(b). "Secrets" include information gained from third parties that otherwise comes within this definition. D.C. Rule 1.6 cmt. [8]. The prohibitions of Rule 1.6 continue after termination of the lawyer-client relationship. D.C. Rule 1.6(g).

A lawyer may reveal or use client confidences or secrets in some circumstances. Among these is—> to the extent reasonably necessary to establish a defense to a criminal charge, disciplinary charge, or civil claim, formally instituted against the lawyer, based upon conduct in which the client was involved, or to the extent reasonably necessary to respond to specific allegations by the client concerning the lawyer's representation of the client.

D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3) (emphasis added). Read literally, this provision is limited to defensive use of client information. It does not authorize offensive use of client confidences or secrets by the lawyer in the context of a lawyer-client controversy. Another exception in Rule 1.6 permits a lawyer to use or reveal such information offensively, but only "to the minimum extent necessary in an action instituted by the lawyer to establish or collect the lawyer's fee." D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(5) (emphasis added).

The former D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility ("D.C. Code") took a similar approach, permitting a lawyer to disclose a client's confidences or secrets where "necessary to establish or collect his fee or to defend himself . . . against an accusation of wrongful conduct." D.C. Code, Disciplinary Rule 4-101(C)(4) (emphasis added).

The history of D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3) further demonstrates its availability solely for defensive purposes. The American Bar Association's Model Rules of Professional Conduct ("Model Rules") were adopted in 1983. As their name implies, the Model Rules are recommendations. General Dynamics Corp. v. Superior Court , 876 P.2d 487, 503 n. 6 (Calif. 1994). They have the force of law in a given jurisdiction only if adopted by that jurisdiction's bar governance authority—typically the highest court.

The District of Columbia Court of Appeals ("Court of Appeals") has disciplinary and regulatory authority over the D.C. Bar. D.C. Code § 11-2501 (2001). Soon after the ABA promulgated the Model Rules, the D.C. Bar, with the approval of the Court of Appeals, established a special committee, the Model Rules of Professional Conduct Committee ("Jordan Committee"), to review the Model Rules and make suitable recommendations to the D.C. Bar Board of Governors.

In contrast to the D.C. Rules, the Model Rules permit a lawyer, in a controversy with her client, to reveal information relating to representation offensively as well as defensively—> to establish a claim or defense on behalf of the lawyer in a controversy between the lawyer and the client, to establish a defense to a criminal charge or civil claim against the lawyer based upon conduct in which the client was involved, or to respond to allegations in any proceeding concerning the lawyer's representation of the client.

Model Rule 1.6(b)(5) (emphasis added); ABA Formal Op. 01-424 (Sept. 22, 2001) (approving offensive use of information in in-house lawyer's action against client/employer for wrongful discharge).[4] Unlike the D.C. Rules, see D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(5), the Model Rules do not expressly authorize disclosure in an action for a lawyer's fee. Such an action is subsumed, however, within the first clause of Model Rule 1.6(b)(5).

The Jordan Committee discussed Model Rule 1.6(b)(5) on several occasions. The issue as framed by the committee, though, was not whether to permit generalized use of client confidences and secrets in lawyers' claims against clients but whether even to permit suits to collect fees.[5] The Jordan Committee's minutes reflect the removal of the first clause of the model rule provision quoted above but aside from the discussion on whether suits for fees should be permitted, do not reflect the reasoning behind the removal.[6]

The Bar Board of Governors transmitted its recommendations to the D.C. Court of Appeals in November 1986. Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct and Related Comments, Showing the Language Proposed by the American Bar Association, Changes Recommended by the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct Committee, and Changes Recommended by the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia Bar (Nov. 19, 1986) ("Yellow Book"). The Yellow Book discussed various elements of what now are D.C. Rules 1.6(e)(3) and 1.6(e)(5) but did not explain the reasons for retaining the D.C. Code approach of limiting a lawyer's offensive use of client confidences and secrets to fee collection actions.

In March 1990, the Court of Appeals adopted what now are D.C. Rules 1.6(e)(3) and 1.6(e)(5), as proposed by the Board of Governors.[7] Subsequent D.C. Bar reviews of the D.C. Rules in the early 1990s and in 2001-05 did not recommend changes,[8] and the two provisions remain in force as originally adopted. As noted above, we are unaware of any relevant D.C. judicial decisions—either on the issue presented by the inquiry or on whether any particular [3] Two D.C. Court of Appeals decisions involving lawyers' actions against their former law firms for retaliatory discharge do not address disclosure of confidences or secrets of the law firms or the firms' clients. Umana v. Swidler & Berlin, Chartered, 745 A.2d 334 (D.C. 2000); Wallace, 715 A.2d 873.

[4] The former ABA Model Code of Professional Responsibility, like the former D.C. Code, limited permissible revelations to those necessary to collect a lawyer's fee. Spratley v. State Farm Mut. Automobile Ins. Co., 78 P.3d 603, 608 (Utah 2003) (citing ABA Annotated Model Rules of Professional Conduct 68 (5th ed. 2003)). By comparison, the Model Rule "'enlarges the [Model Code] exception to include disclosure of information relating to claims by the lawyer other than for the lawyer's fee; for example, recovery of property from the client.'" Id. (quoting ABA Annotated Model Rules of Professional Conduct 68 (5th ed. 2003) (emphasis in original); accord Burkhart v. Semitool, Inc., 5 P.3d 1031, 1041 (Mont. 2000).

[5] Jordan Committee Minutes (July 10, 1984; Nov. 17, 1984).

[6] Id. (As noted herein, the former D.C. Code permitted only defensive use of such information except in the fee collection context).

[7] The rules took effect January 1, 1991.

[8] E.g., D.C. Bar Rules of Professional Conduct Review Committee, Proposed Amendments to the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, Report and Recommendations 30 (Jan. 31, 2005) ("The Committee . . . saw no compelling policy reasons to change any of the disclosure options currently included in [Rule 1.6]").

cause of action might overcome or preempt the prohibitions of D.C. Rule 1.6(a).

Thus, the legislative and judicial history of the provisions is consistent with their text. Taken together, these guideposts compel the conclusion that an in-house lawyer may not reveal or use employer/client secrets or confidences offensively in making a claim for employment discrimination or retaliatory discharge—unless, of course, such disclosures are authorized by another exception to D.C. Rule 1.6 (e.g., the crime/fraud exceptions in subsection (d)).

Employer/client's defense against in-house lawyer's claim

On the second branch of the inquiry, we see nothing in the D.C. Rules that would limit an in-house lawyer's right to bring a discrimination or retaliation claim against her employer/client because that defendant might perceive a need to reveal its secrets or confidences in order to defend against the claim. As many decisions have noted, courts do not lack tools to protect such information from inordinate disclosure.[9]

Moreover, if the employer/client calls the lawyer's conduct into question in the context of such a lawsuit, the lawyer may disclose the employer/client's confidences and secrets as a defensive matter—but only "to the extent reasonably necessary" to respond to the employer/client's allegations. D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3).

Conclusions

A D.C. Bar member may not reveal or use the confidences or secrets of her employer/client in connection with the lawyer's offensive lawsuit against that client, other than in an action for the lawyer's fee[10] and then only "to the minimum extent necessary." D.C. Rules 1.6(e)(3), 1.6(e)(5).

We express no opinion on whether there may be instances where a statute or case law dealing with employment discrimination or retaliatory discharge overcomes the prohibitions of D.C. Rule 1.6(a).[11] The D.C. Rule, however, does not provide for such preemption within its four corners and the District of Columbia courts have yet to rule on the issue.[12]

A lawyer may disclose such information defensively, however, "to the extent reasonably necessary" to respond to specific allegations by the client or to defend against a civil claim. D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3). The former context could include responding to affirmative defenses to a discrimination or retaliatory discharge action; the latter could include responding to a client counterclaim in such a lawsuit.[13] D.C. Rule 1.6 cmt. [25]. Moreover, other exceptions in Rule 1.6, such as the crime-fraud exceptions of subsection (d), might be available in appropriate instances. Nothing in the D.C. Rules limits an in-house lawyer's right to bring such a claim because the client/employer might perceive a need to reveal its secrets or confidences in order to defend against the claim.

We are mindful of the important public policy that encourages redress in cases of employment discrimination and retaliatory discharge. We note, however, that this committee's jurisdiction is limited to interpreting the D.C. Rules—which are promulgated by the Court of Appeals—as we find them. Whether Rule 1.6(e)(3) is overcome in such a case or, if not, should be revised to permit a lawyer to reveal or use employer/client confidences or secrets offensively in such a case, necessarily remains a matter for the courts.

Published October 2012

Opinion No. 364

Confidentiality Obligations When Former Client Makes Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim

When a former client challenges a criminal conviction or sentence on the grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel ("IAC"), D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3) permits the lawyer to disclose client confidences and secrets only insofar as reasonably necessary to respond to the client's specific allegations about the lawyer's representation. Where appropriate, the lawyer should take steps, such as seeking a judicial protective order or entering into an agreement with the prosecutor, to limit the use of such disclosures to the IAC proceeding.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)

Inquiry

This Committee has been asked what a lawyer may and may not do when a former client asserts a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel under the District of Columbia's Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules" or "Rules") in light of an opinion on the same subject issued by the American Bar Association's Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility. This opinion specifically addresses to what extent and under what circumstances D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3) permits a lawyer to disclose information protected by D.C. Rule 1.6 ("protected information") to the prosecutor defending the IAC claim or to others?

[9] E.g., Van Asdale v. International Game Technology, 577 F.3d 989, 995-96 (9th Cir. 2009); Crews v. Buckman Lab. Int'l, Inc., 78 S.W.3d 852, 864 (Tenn. 2002); Spratley v. State Farm Mut. Automobile Ins. Co., 78 P.3d 603, 609-10 (Utah 2003); Burkhart v. Semitool, Inc., 5 P.3d 1031, 1041-42 (Mont. 2000).

[10] We do not think that an in-house lawyer's salary constitutes a "fee" within the meaning of Rule 1.6(e)(5). See O'Brien v. Stolt-Nielsen Transp. Group, Ltd., 838 A.2d 1076, 1084, 1086 (Conn. Super. 2003) (by implication).

[11] See, e.g., Van Asdale v. International Game Technology, 577 F.3d 989 (9th Cir. 2009) (Sarbanes-Oxley whistleblower provision preempts attorney-client privilege); Willy v. Administrative Review Bd., U.S. Dep't of Labor, 423 F.3d 483 (5th Cir. 2005) (same; whistleblower provisions of federal environmental laws); Kachmar v. Sungard Data Sys., Inc., 109 F.3d 173 (3rd Cir. 1997) (same; title VII of Civil Rights Act of 1964); Stinneford v. Spiegel Inc., 845 F. Supp. 1243 (N.D. Ill. 1994) (same; Age Discrimination in Employment Act); Rand v. CF Indus., Inc., 797 F. Supp. 643 (N.D. Ill. 1992) (same); Crews v. Buckman Lab. Int'l, Inc., 78 S.W.3d 852 (Tenn. 2002) (same; common-law retaliatory discharge).

[12] A lawyer who believes she has a cause of action against her former employer/client that might overcome the strictures of Rule 1.6(e)(3), but does not want to risk violating Rule 1.6(a), presumably could file a bare-bones complaint that does not disclose protected information and then seek a ruling that her cause of action overcomes the Rule 1.6 restriction against disclosure. If she obtained a favorable ruling from the court, she then could file an appropriate amended complaint.

[13] The requirement that disclosure be limited to what is "reasonably necessary" to respond to an allegation of impropriety, D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3), is one of proportionality. Thus, an employer/client's discharge letter to the in-house lawyer that makes what the lawyer believes are inaccurate assertions about the lawyer's conduct quite possibly would not justify the filing of a lawsuit, available to the public, that reveals client/employer confidences or secrets; filing a complaint under seal might be a different story. See D.C. Rule 1.6 cmt. [23] ("[D]isclosure should be no greater than . . . necessary to vindicate innocence [and] should be made in a manner that limits access to the information to . . . persons having a need to know it, and appropriate protective orders or other arrangements should be sought by the lawyer to the fullest extent practicable"); Eckhaus v. Alfa-Laval, Inc., 764 F. Supp. 34 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) (negative internal performance review not a sufficient basis for revealing employer/client information in ensuing slander action).

In July 2010, the American Bar Association's Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility issued Formal Ethics Opinion No. 10-456, entitled "Disclosure of Information to Prosecutor When Lawyer's Former Client Brings Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim," which analyzed the "self-defense exception" in the ABA's Model Rule of Professional Conduct 1.6 to address "whether a criminal defense lawyer whose former client claims that the lawyer provided constitutionally ineffective assistance of counsel may, without the former client's informed consent, disclose confidential information to government lawyers prior to any proceedings on the defendant's claim in order to help the prosecution establish that the lawyer's representation was competent." Applying the Model Rules, that opinion concluded that although a—> lawyer may have a reasonable need to disclose relevant client information in a judicial proceeding to prevent harm to the lawyer that may result from a finding of ineffective assistance of counsel . . . , it is highly unlikely that a disclosure in response to a prosecution request, prior to a court-supervised response by way of testimony or otherwise, will be justifiable.

The D.C. Rules differ from the ABA Model Rules. Importantly, the Model Rule allows disclosure of protected information only in the context of an actual or contemplated proceeding, while the D.C. Rule allows such disclosure (assuming its requisites otherwise are satisfied) regardless of whether a proceeding is pending or even contemplated. Compare Model Rule 1.6(b)(5) with D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3). As discussed further below, the committee disagrees with the ABA's conclusion that "it is highly unlikely that a disclosure in response to a prosecution request, prior to a court-supervised response by way of testimony or otherwise, will be justifiable."

Analysis

An IAC claim pits a lawyer's broad confidentiality obligation to a former client[1] against the lawyer's limited right of self-defense. The target of the IAC claim is not the lawyer personally but the constitutionality of a criminal conviction or sentence in a case where the lawyer represented the defendant. An IAC claim differs from a criminal charge, disciplinary charge, or civil claim filed directly against the lawyer because the lawyer is not a party to the proceeding. In an IAC claim, the lawyer is a mere witness, albeit an important one who might have an independent professional interest in responding to the allegations made in the IAC claim.

To prevail on an IAC claim, a former client must prove that the lawyer's performance was deficient (i.e., that "counsel made errors so serious that counsel was not functioning as the 'counsel' guaranteed the defendant by the Sixth Amendment") and that the deficient performance prejudiced the defense (i.e., that "counsel's errors were so serious as to deprive the defendant of a fair trial, a trial whose result is reliable."). Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 687 (1984).

Given the waiver of attorney-client privilege that typically accompanies the assertion of an IAC claim, it is tempting to assume that the ethical confidentiality obligation under Rule 1.6 is also waived. However, such an assumption erroneously conflates the lawyer's ethical obligation under the Rules of Professional Conduct with the attorney-client privilege under the rules of evidence.

Under D.C. Rule 1.6, protected information includes not only information within the attorney-client privilege ("confidences," in the parlance of the rule) but also "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client" ("secrets," in the parlance of the rule). Rule 1.6(b). Thus, even if there is no enforceable privilege, Rule 1.6 precludes the lawyer from voluntarily revealing protected information other than in accordance with an explicit exception to Rule 1.6. Moreover, even if the confidentiality obligation under Rule 1.6 were congruent with the evidentiary attorney-client privilege, the effective scope of any privilege waiver is not always clear.[2]

D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3) will allow lawyers to reveal some protected information in response to an IAC claim in some instances. Under that rule, however, the lawyer's discretion to voluntarily reveal information is limited to the extent to which the disclosure is "reasonably necessary to respond to specific allegations by the [former] client concerning the lawyer's representation of the client" D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3) (emphasis added). "Reasonably" means "the conduct of a reasonably prudent and competent lawyer." Rule 1.0(j).

The fact that a successful IAC claim may result in a new trial or sentencing for the original underlying charge or offense further complicates the analysis. In assessing what can reasonably be disclosed without seeking a protective order or reaching an agreement with the prosecutor limiting the disclosure and use of the protected information to the IAC proceeding, the lawyer should consider the extent to which information provided in response to the IAC claim could help convict the former client in a new trial.

What can or should be done in a particular case will depend on the specific facts of that case. Extreme facts illustrate the pressure points in an analysis that ultimately turns on reasonableness:

1. Suppose a former client brings an IAC claim attacking his conviction for a robbery in the Georgetown neighborhood. The former client alleges that the lawyer failed to interview and subpoena potential witness X, whose testimony, the former client alleges, would have contradicted a key element of the prosecution's robbery case. The lawyer's case file contains protected information about the lawyer's handling of issues relating to X, but it also contains protected information tying the former client to an unsolved murder in the Capitol Hill neighborhood. Assume initially that the murder has nothing to do with X or the robbery.

In such a scenario, the lawyer would violate Rule 1.6 by sharing with prosecutors or others information about the murder. Because the information tying the former client to the murder is not relevant to the specific allegations of IAC, the self-defense exception does not authorize its disclosure. Moreover, even if unprivileged,[3] disclosure of information implicating a former client in a murder would

[1] An IAC claim typically is made by a former client of the accused lawyer. If the lawyer is still representing the client, the resulting conflict of interest likely will require the lawyer to withdraw from the representation. In re Ponds, 888 A.2d 234, 239 (D.C. 2005) (applying Maryland Rules of Professional Conduct pursuant to choice of law provisions of D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(1)).

[2] This opinion uses the phrase "protected information" to describe the information protected from voluntary disclosure by Rule 1.6. Other short-hand phrases were considered but rejected because of a risk of confusion with the "confidence" and "secret" concepts so carefully defined by Rule 1.6.

[3] The incriminating information might have come to the lawyer directly from the former client in a communication protected by the attorney-client privilege. However, the lawyer might also have obtained the information in communications with third parties to which the attorney-client privilege be "embarrassing" and "detrimental" to the former client, thereby falling within the Rule 1.6 definition of a "secret" that the lawyer cannot reveal voluntarily.

2. At the other end of the spectrum, consider a former client's IAC claim that the lawyer failed to file an appeal despite the client's instruction to do so. The client pleaded guilty but now alleges that the sentence he received was too harsh and should have been appealed. If true, the lawyer's failure to file a client-requested appeal breached an important duty to a client. The lawyer is the only witness who can rebut or confirm the allegation, which is both serious and specific. The lawyer's account is that the former client never directed her to file an appeal. Further, the lawyer would say she told the former client that there was no basis for such an appeal because the sentence was the one to which the client had agreed as part of the plea bargain. The lawyer also has a confirming letter sent to the former client stating, "per our conversation today, I will not be filing an appeal in your case." Such disclosure relates solely to the former client's IAC allegation of a clear breach of duty. Thus, as discussed below, the Committee does not believe that a lawyer in this situation must await a court order compelling the lawyer to reveal confidential information about the appeal. Nor must the lawyer seek a protective order confining use of the information to the IAC proceeding because the disclosure does not implicate the former client in uncharged criminal activity, and will have no foreseeable adverse effects on any retrial or resentencing if the conviction or sentence is reversed.

3. In some cases, the appropriate response may be no response because the allegations simply will not be believed by anyone who reads them. Imagine a sealed juvenile proceeding in which the record will be known only to the judge and the involved lawyers. The former client makes an IAC claim founded on unsubstantiated and palpably incredible allegations of a vast and sinister conspiracy between prosecution and defense lawyers. The accused lawyer knows that the presiding judge, before whom she appears on a regular basis, is going to recognize the allegations for what they are, namely the product of a troubled mind. In that situation, there may be no response that is reasonably necessary to respond to the allegations in the IAC claim.

4. A slight variation in the facts of the first hypothetical can be used to create a difficult case in the middle. As before, the former client challenging the robbery conviction alleges that the lawyer committed IAC by failing to call witness X. In fact, the lawyer had two reasons for not calling witness X. First, X's expected testimony as to the robbery was cumulative of that given by other defense witnesses. In other words, the testimony that X could give as to the robbery would not add materially to what was already in the record and the lawyer was concerned that the court might exclude it for that reason. Second, the lawyer feared that a vigorous cross-examination into X's relationship with the client might lead prosecutors to evidence implicating the client in the uncharged and unrelated murder.

How can this lawyer explain why she did not call X without (1) misleading the court and prosecutors by suggesting that there was only one reason for not calling X or (2) implicating the former client in an uncharged murder unrelated to the robbery conviction at issue in the IAC proceeding? Should the former client be given an opportunity to reconsider pursuing an IAC claim that opens the door to disclosures in this area? Is it prudent for a lawyer in this situation to voluntarily respond to prosecutor's requests for information without court approval? If compelled to respond, should the lawyer seek a protective order so that the information she provides cannot be used against the client in other proceedings? We address these specific questions below.

Disclosure questions in the IAC context are necessarily fact-bound, and careful reflection may reveal them to be more complicated than they first appear. Further complicating a lawyer's analysis is the emotional reaction that the lawyer may have upon learning that a former client has accused her of IAC. Feelings of anger and betrayal may impede an objective analysis of these issues.

This opinion offers a framework for the analysis, beginning with a brief review of the law governing IAC claims in Part A below. Part B summarizes the lawyer's typical role as a witness in an IAC claim. Part C reviews the ABA's analysis of IAC disclosure issues under the Model Rules of Professional Conduct. Part D analyzes the relevant provisions of the District of Columbia Rules, which differ from the Model Rules in significant respects.

A. Using an Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim to Overturn a Criminal Conviction or Sentence on Sixth Amendment Grounds.[4]

A criminal defendant's constitutional right to counsel, see U.S. Const., amend. VI, "is the right to the effective assistance of counsel," Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 686 (1984) (quoting McMann v. Richardson, 397 U.S. 759, 771 n. 14 (1970)). A conviction or sentence may be reversed if the defendant can show that her lawyer provided "ineffective assistance of counsel." Strickland imposes a two-pronged test for ineffective assistance.

"First, the defendant must show that counsel's performance was deficient. This requires showing that counsel made errors so serious that counsel was not functioning as the 'counsel' guaranteed the defendant by the Sixth Amendment." Strickland, 466 U.S. at 687. The court's review of the lawyer's performance "must be highly deferential," with "counsel . . . strongly presumed to have rendered adequate assistance and made all significant decisions in the exercise of reasonable professional judgment." Id. at 689-90. "The question is whether an attorney's representation amounted to incompetence under prevailing professional norms, not whether it deviated from best practices or most common custom." Harrington v. Richter, 131 S. Ct. 770, 778 (2011).

A showing of incompetence alone does not require that the underlying conviction or sentence be vacated: "Second, the defendant must show that the deficient performance prejudiced the defense. This requires showing that counsel's errors were so serious as to deprive the defendant of a fair trial, a trial whose result is reliable." Strickland, 466 U.S. at 687. The defendant "must show that there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different. A reasonable probability is a probability sufficient to undermine did not apply. Such information might still be protected by the work product doctrine. Even in the absence of an enforceable evidentiary privilege, however, the information would still be protected from voluntary disclosure by the broader confidentiality obligation imposed by Rule 1.6.

[4] Although this Committee does not opine on questions of law outside the Rules of Professional Conduct, ethical issues rarely arise in a vacuum. Here, as in many cases, the ethics analysis benefits from an understanding of the legal context in which the question arises. The accompanying discussion of ineffective assistance of counsel jurisprudence under the Sixth Amendment reflects the Committee's understanding of relevant law.

confidence in the outcome." Id. at 694.

In this jurisdiction, "[t]here is a presumption in favor of holding [an evidentiary] hearing" on an IAC claim "that requires an inquiry into matters outside of the record" but the trial court may rule without a hearing "[w]here the existing record provides an adequate basis for disposing of the motion." Ready v. United States, 620 A.2d 233, 234 (D.C. 1993) (citation omitted); see also Lanton v. United States, 779 A.2d 895 (D.C. 2001) (reversing denial of IAC claim and remanding for a hearing). In the District of Columbia courts, "a hearing is unnecessary when the motion consists of (1) vague and conclusory allegations, (2) palpably incredible claims, or (3) allegations that would merit no relief even if true." Ready, 620 A.2d at 234.

B. Former Counsel as Witness to Conduct at Issue in IAC Claim.

When an IAC claim is filed, the lawyer becomes a witness respecting the former client's allegations about the representation:

> Where the defendant's allegations of fact, if credited, would support a finding of ineffective assistance, the court is required to obtain testimony from the attorney, either to support the former client's claim or to undermine it, and (if there is a conflict in the testimony of the movant and his former attorney) to make any needed credibility findings.

Douglas v. United States, 2011 WL 335861, at *1 (S.D.N.Y. Jan 28, 2011).

Attorney-client privilege often prevents lawyers from disclosing information that prosecutors and others would deem relevant. For example, a client's confession to a lawyer of involvement with a past crime would be relevant to an investigation of that crime. Attorney-client privilege, however, would normally preclude lawyers from revealing – or being forced to reveal – that confession to prosecutors or others. See, e.g. In re Public Defender Service, 831 A.2d 890, 906 (D.C. 2003). A client's assertion of an IAC claim, though, generally waives the attorney-client privilege.[5] The waiver allows a court to compel an attorney to testify about the otherwise privileged information that the client has placed in issue.

When an IAC claim is filed, prosecutors may want information from the defense lawyer to help them respond to the claim.[6] Anecdotal evidence suggests that different defense lawyers react differently to prosecutors' requests for information. At one end of the spectrum are lawyers who are angered by the claim and eager to beat it back. Attorneys have a reputational interest in having IAC claims defeated. E.g., SEC v. Forma, 117 F.R.D. 515, 524-25 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). They may also fear future civil claims by the former client.[7]

At the other end of the spectrum are attorneys who police themselves for potential IAC issues. When such lawyers or their supervisors spot such an issue, they withdraw, refer the client to other counsel, and cooperate with the new counsel. If new counsel tells them that the client objects to any voluntary disclosure to prosecutors, they do not disclose until a court requires them to do so.

Between those extremes are understandably concerned lawyers who do not want to jeopardize their licenses, their reputations, or their ability to continue doing defense work but who may not want to assist the prosecution against a former client. Court-appointed lawyers under the Criminal Justice Act may be especially uncomfortable because their livelihoods depend on continued appointments by the court that will be considering the IAC claim.

In many places, informal practices developed within the prosecution and defense bars prior to the issuance of ABA Ethics Opinion 10-456. The following was common in at least one jurisdiction:

> Because the need for the attorney's testimony was patent and the waiver of privilege plain, it has become the practice for attorneys to supply the required testimony (in the form of an affidavit or declaration, which qualifies as testimony and so perfectly acceptable) without obtaining express written consent from the former client. Formal consent was deemed unnecessary because the client had waived the privilege simply by making the motion. Additionally, some attorneys have given their testimony without being formally ordered to do so by a court, knowing that the waiver would be given effect and that a court order was guaranteed to issue. In most instances, the testimony was solicited by and given to the prosecutor's office that originally indicted and prosecuted the defendant, since it is the prosecutor that assembles the record in opposition to the [28 U.S.C.] § 2255 motion.

Douglas v. United States, 2011 WL 335861, at *1.

C. ABA Ethics Opinion 10-456, Disclosure of Information to Prosecutor When Lawyer's Former Client Brings Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim.

The ABA Opinion addresses whether and the conditions under which a defense lawyer may disclose confidential information to prosecutors in the wake of an IAC claim by the lawyer's former client. The last sentence of the opinion concludes that "it will be extremely difficult for defense counsel to conclude that there is a reasonable need in self-defense to disclose client confidences to a prosecutor outside any court-supervised setting."

The ABA Opinion states that a client's waiver of privilege by bringing an IAC claim "has the legal effect of forgoing the right to bar disclosure of the client's prior confidential communications in a judicial or similar proceeding. Standing alone, however, that does not constitute 'informed consent' to the lawyer's voluntary disclosure of client information outside such a proceeding." Id. Thus, a client might agree that the lawyer could testify at an adjudicatory hearing "to the extent the court requires but not agree that the former lawyer voluntarily may disclose the same client confidences to the opposite party prior to the proceeding." Id. at 2-3.

Although Model Rule 1.6(b)(5) has several provisions allowing lawyers to reveal confidential information to defend themselves in certain situations,[8] the only

[5] Eldridge v. United States, 618 A.2d 690, 693 n. 3 (D.C. 1992); Doughty v. United States, 574 A.2d 1342, 1343 (D.C. 1990); see also Bittaker v. Woodford, 331 F.3d 715, 722 (9th Cir. 2003); *United States v. Wiggin*s, 184 F. Supp. 673, 677-78 (D.D.C. 1960).

[6] The former client or any new defense lawyer for the former client will also want information from the lawyer about the conduct at issue in the IAC claim. That lawyer may, after all, end up becoming a witness for the former client and give testimony that helps the former client's allegations of IAC. The analysis that governs the lawyer's ability to talk to the former client or the former client's new counsel is quite different from the analysis that governs the lawyer's ability to share information about the representation with prosecutors.

[7] In some cases, the rejection of a post-conviction IAC claim may collaterally estop a later malpractice claim against the attorney for the same alleged conduct. Johnson v. Sullivan, 748 F. Supp. 2d 1, 9-12 (D.D.C. 2010); Smith v. Public Defender Serv., 686 A.2d 210, 211-12 (D.C. 1996). But see Brown v. Jonz, 572 A.2d 455, 457 n.7 (D.C. 1990).

[8] Model Rule 1.6(b)(5) provides that "[a] lawyer may reveal information relating to the representation of a client to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary . . . to establish a claim or defense on behalf of the lawyer in a controversy between the lawyer and the client, to establish a one that the ABA Opinion found potentially relevant to an IAC claim was that allowing disclosure "to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary . . . to respond to allegations in any proceeding concerning the lawyer's representation of the client."[9] The ABA Opinion states that "the exception is a limited one." Id. at 3. "A lawyer may act in self-defense under [the exception] only to defend against charges that imminently threaten the lawyer or the lawyer's associate or agent with serious consequences." Id. (quoting Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 64 cmt. c (2000)) (emphasis added by ABA Ethics Committee).

The ABA Opinion states that this provision might be read to apply to an IAC claim seeking to set aside a criminal conviction. Id. However—> a lawyer may respond to allegations only insofar as the lawyer reasonably believes it is necessary to do so. It is not enough that the lawyer genuinely believes the particular disclosure is necessary; the lawyer's belief must be objectively reasonable. The Comment explaining Rule 1.6(b)(5) cautions lawyers to take steps to limit "access to the information to the tribunal or other persons having a need to know it" and to seek "appropriate protective orders or other arrangements … to the fullest extent practicable." [Model Rule 1.6 cmt. 14.] Judicial decisions addressing the necessity for disclosure under the self-defense exception to the attorney-client privilege recognize that when there is a legitimate need for the lawyer to present a defense, the lawyer may not disclose all information relating to the representation, but only particular information that reasonably must be disclosed to avoid adverse legal consequences. These limitations are equally applicable to Rule 1.6(b)(5).

>
> Permitting disclosure of client confidential information outside court-supervised proceedings undermines important interests protected by the confidentiality rule. Because the extent of trial counsel's disclosure to the prosecution would be unsupervised by the court, there would be a risk that trial counsel would disclose information that could not ultimately be disclosed in the adjudicative proceeding. Disclosure of such information might prejudice the defendant in the event of a retrial. Further, allowing criminal defense lawyers voluntarily to assist law enforcement authorities by providing them with protected client information might potentially chill some future defendants from fully confiding in their lawyers.
>
> Against this background, it is highly unlikely that a disclosure in response to a prosecution request, prior to a court-supervised response by way of testimony or otherwise, will be justifiable. . . .

Id. at 4-5 (emphasis in original, footnotes and most citations omitted).

D. Confidentiality Under D.C. Rule 1.6.

District of Columbia lawyers have an ethical duty of confidentiality under Rule 1.6 that is separate from, and broader than, the attorney-client privilege under the law of evidence. See Adams v. Franklin, 924 A.2d 993, 999 n. 6 (D.C. 2007). D.C. Rule 1.6 commands that "except when permitted under paragraph (c), (d), or (e), a lawyer shall not knowingly . . . reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client." A "confidence" is "information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law," while a "secret" is "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental to the client." Rule 1.6(b).[10] "These definitions and comment [6] to Rule 1.6 make it clear that the lawyer's ethical duty to preserve a client's confidences and secrets is broader than the attorney-client privilege." Adams, 924 A.2d at 996-97.

The ethical obligation is broader than the privilege because a protected "secret" under Rule 1.6 is, by definition, not subject to the attorney client privilege. Thus, it is not sufficient for a lawyer to conclude that information she wants to disclose is outside the attorney-client privilege. The lawyer will still violate the ethical confidentiality obligation if she voluntarily reveals a "secret" other than in accordance with an exception in subsection (c), (d), or (e) of Rule 1.6. Information gained in the professional relationship that the former client does not want revealed or that would be embarrassing or detrimental to the client is a protected "secret" even if it is not subject to any enforceable evidentiary privilege.

This expansive confidentiality obligation "[t]ouch[es] the very soul of lawyering." In re Gonzalez, 773 A.2d 1026, 1030 (D.C. 2001) (quoting Fred Weber, Inc. v. Shell Oil Co., 566 F.2d 602, 607 (8th Cir. 1977)). "Disclosure of client confidences is 'contrary to the fundamental principle that an attorney owes a fiduciary duty to his client and must serve the client's interests with the utmost loyalty and devotion.'" Herbin v. Hoeffel, 806 A.2d 186, 197 (D.C. 2002) (quoting In re Gonzalez, 773 A.2d at 1031).

Violations of the confidentiality rule have consequences. The Court in In re Gonzalez sanctioned a lawyer for revealing too much in a motion to withdraw from representation of a difficult client.[11]

> We think it obvious that a public allegation by a client's own lawyer that the client deliberately lied to him would be "embarrassing" to the client and "would be likely to be detrimental" to her . . . . Indeed, it is difficult to understand how a reasonable person could conclude otherwise.

In re Gonzalez, 773 A.2d at 1030.[12]

Even had the disclosure been justified, the court noted, the lawyer "could have submitted his documentation in camera, . . . [with] appropriate redactions of the material most potentially damaging to his clients (e.g., his allegations that [the client] had misrepresented facts to him and his suggestion . . . that a demand of $90,000 by the plaintiffs in the underlying litigation might be reasonable)." Id. at 1032. A few years after Gonzalez was defense to a criminal charge or civil claim against the lawyer based upon conduct in which the client was involved, or to respond to allegations in any proceeding concerning the lawyer's representation of the client."

---

[9] The ABA Opinion found that the other two clauses of Model Rule 1.6(b)(5) did not apply. As to the first clause, an IAC claim is not a legal "controversy" between the lawyer and the client. ABA Opinion, at 3-4. As to the second, an IAC claim is neither a "criminal charge" nor a "civil claim" against which the lawyer must defend. Id. at 4.

[10] This is one area where D.C. Rule 1.6 differs from Model Rule 1.6. The former requires confidentiality as to any "confidence" or "secret," while the latter compels confidentiality as to "information relating to the representation of a client." In the IAC context, however, this appears to be a distinction without a difference.

[11] The Committee has not found any cases or bar opinions holding that a defense attorney relying on the self-defense exception disclosed more than was reasonably necessary in response to an IAC claim. This, of course, does not mean that such overly broad disclosures do not occur or that they will go unsanctioned if they do.

[12] Because the lawyer's conduct was before a Virginia court, the D.C. Court of Appeals was applying Virginia's confidentiality rule. See D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(1) (choice of law rule). Virginia's confidentiality rule, however, shared the "confidences and secrets" approach of D.C. Rule 1.6. In re Gonzalez, 773 A.2d at 1029.

decided, the Court of Appeals sanctioned another lawyer for saying too much while withdrawing from the representation of a another difficult client. In re Ponds, 876 A.2d 636 (D.C. 2005).

D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3) contains two exceptions that allow lawyers to reveal certain confidential client information in order to defend themselves. Client confidences and secrets may be disclosed:

(1) "to the extent reasonably necessary to establish a defense to a criminal charge, disciplinary charge, or civil claim, formally instituted against the lawyer, based upon conduct in which the client was involved," or

(2) "to the extent reasonably necessary to respond to specific allegations by the client concerning the lawyer's representation of the client."

The first exception does not apply to an IAC claim because such a matter is not "a criminal charge, disciplinary charge, or civil claim formally instituted against the lawyer." The target of the ineffective assistance claim is the defendant's criminal conviction rather than the lawyer personally. The lawyer is not a party to the proceeding in which the claim is made.

The second exception does apply to an IAC claim.[13] This exception allows a lawyer to reveal protected information "to the extent reasonably necessary to respond to specific allegations by the client concerning the lawyer's representation of the client." One court has said that information is "reasonably necessary" if it would "seem likely to provide significant assistance" to the lawyer's response. First Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Oppenheim, Appel, Dixon & Co., 110 F.R.D. 557, 567 (S.D.N.Y. 1986).

The use of the second exception is circumscribed in three ways. First, voluntary disclosure can be made only "to the extent reasonably necessary to respond" to the allegations. "Reasonably" in this context "denotes the conduct of a reasonably prudent and competent lawyer." D.C. Rule 1.0(j). This is an objective test; the lawyer's subjective belief is not relevant to the inquiry.

The analysis of what is reasonably necessary to respond to any particular IAC claim will depend on the facts and circumstances surrounding the claim. As with any proposed disclosure of confidential information, a lawyer will want to carefully consider (1) whether to disclose, and (2) how much to disclose. The resolution of both questions may depend on, among other things, the nature of the claim and the content of the lawyer's file. Because the exception is permissive, not mandatory, the lawyer may choose not to respond because, for example, the lawyer may think the disclosure may harm the client, the prosecutor already has the information necessary to respond to the claim, and the disposition of the IAC claim solely on "lack of prejudice" grounds will sufficiently protect the lawyer from reputational or other harm that might arise from the specific allegations of deficient performance.

The lawyer also may consider whether it is necessary to respond outside the IAC proceeding (in addition to responding within that proceeding) in order to protect her reputation or other interests. Unlike the Model Rule, D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3) authorizes lawyers to respond to a client's "specific allegations" concerning the lawyer's representation even if those allegations are not made in a "proceeding." As the "Jordan Committee" report recommending adoption of the current rules noted, "public allegations concerning the lawyer's representation of the client may be responded to publicly if they have been made 'by the client,' even if those charges have not been instituted formally. Thus, the client (but no one else) can waive the client's right to confidentiality by opening the issue to public discussion." Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct and Related Comments Showing the Language Proposed by the American Bar Association, Changes Recommended by the D.C. Bar Model Rules of Professional Conduct Committee, and Changes Recommended by the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia Bar, at 53, ¶ 44 (Nov. 19, 1986).

Second, "[t]he requirement . . . that there be 'specific' charges of misconduct by the client precludes the lawyer from disclosing confidences or secrets in response to general criticism by a client; an example of such a general criticism would be an assertion by the client that the lawyer 'did a poor job' of representing the client." Rule 1.6 cmt. [25]. As a matter of substantive law, general criticisms lack the specificity necessary to state a viable IAC claim. See, e.g., Ready v. United States, 620 A.2d at 234 ("vague and conclusory" allegations insufficient). More fundamentally, however, D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3) precludes former defense lawyers from responding because "general" allegations are outside the scope of the only potentially applicable self-defense exception.

Third, comment [25][14] cautions that—> disclosure should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes is necessary to vindicate innocence, the disclosure should be made in a manner that limits access to the information to the tribunal or other persons having a need to know it, and appropriate protective orders or other arrangements should be sought by the lawyer to the fullest extent practicable.

The Restatement describes the operative concept as one of "proportionate and restrained use." Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 64 cmt. (e) (2000). "The lawyer must reasonably believe that options short of use or disclosure have been exhausted or will be unavailing or that invoking them would substantially prejudice the lawyer's position in the controversy. Id.

Courts in other jurisdictions have endorsed the use of protective orders in order to prevent, for example, prosecutors from using information obtained during the adjudication of the IAC claim in a subsequent prosecution. In 2003, the Ninth Circuit affirmed a protective order precluding use of privileged attorney-client materials obtained in discovery for any purpose other than litigating the instant federal habeas petition.

> If a prisoner is successful in persuading a federal court to grant the writ, the court should aim to restore him to the position he would have occupied, had the first trial been constitutionally error-free. Giving the prosecution the advantage of obtaining the defense case file—and possibly even forcing the first lawyer to testify against the client during the second trial—would assuredly not put the parties back at the same starting gate.

Bittaker v. Woodford, 331 F.3d 715, 722-23 (9th Cir. 2003) (en banc); accord United States v. Nicholson, 611 F.3d 191,

[13] The permissive disclosure exception in D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3) differs from its Model Rule counterpart in three respects. D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3) applies only to "specific" allegations, and only when made "by the client." By contrast, Model Rule 1.6(b)(5) does not condition disclosure on the allegations being "specific," and does not require that the "allegations" come from the lawyer's client. Finally, D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3), unlike Model Rule 1.6(b)(5), does not require that the disclosure be made in the context of a "proceeding."

[14] Comment [25] to D.C. Rule 1.6 is somewhat confusing because it conflates the two exceptions of subsection (e)(3). For example, the first sentence discusses "specific allegations," a phrase that appears only in the second exception, and "establish[ing] a defense," a phrase that appears only in the first exception. In any event, it is "the text of each Rule [that] is controlling"; the comments are only "guides to interpretation." D.C. Rules, Scope [6].

216-217 (4th Cir. 2010) (applying Bittaker to preclude use at resentencing of privileged material revealed in connection with the successful IAC claim).[15]

In the first hypothetical above, for example, a client convicted of robbery has alleged that the lawyer failed to interview and subpoena a key witness named X. The lawyer's case file has information about X. It also has information from the client that links the client to an uncharged murder that is unrelated to the robbery conviction that the client is attacking with the IAC Claim. Obviously, disclosure of the incriminating evidence as to the murder is not required to vindicate the lawyer's handling of matters involving witness X. That alone takes the murder evidence outside the second self-defense exception of Rule 1.6(e)(3).

The self-defense exception in Rule 1.6(e)(3) does not require defense lawyers to share information with prosecutors when an IAC claim is filed. Instead it gives lawyers discretion ("may use or reveal") to share information voluntarily, but only "to the extent reasonably necessary to respond to specific allegations by the client concerning the lawyer's representation of the client." Moreover, even where disclosure of protected information is authorized, the defense lawyer should seek to protect the information against use against the former client in other contexts to the fullest extent practicable. D.C. Rule 1.6, cmt. [25]; accord Nicholson, 611 F.3d 191; Bittaker, 331 F.3d 715. In the context of an IAC proceeding, a lawyer can seek this protection from the tribunal hearing the case, through a litigated motion or a so-ordered stipulation between counsel. Alternatively, the lawyer might make the disclosure extrajudicially after obtaining the prosecutor's binding written agreement that the government will not use the information in other contexts. The former lawyer also could work with the former client or the former client's new counsel in deciding how to proceed.

Further, there is case law that a client can prevent the disclosure of protected information by abandoning the claim that would otherwise waive the privilege. Bittaker, 331 F.3d at 721. To the extent that the IAC claim seems likely to lead to the prosecution's discovery of information incriminating the former client in other matters, a call to the client's new defense lawyer may lead to an abandonment of the IAC claim without the need for any disclosure to prosecutors. See Dunlap v. United States, 2011 WL 2693915, at *3 (D.S.C. July 12, 2011) (ordering the IAC petitioner to choose between (1) preserving the attorney-client privilege by abandoning or withdrawing the IAC claims, or (2) continuing to pursue the IAC claims and waiving privilege, so as to require his former counsel to respond to the allegations via an affidavit and, potentially, in live testimony if an evidentiary hearing takes place).[16]

The ABA Opinion concluded that "it is highly unlikely that a disclosure in response to a prosecution request, prior to a court-supervised response by way of testimony or otherwise, will be justifiable." Although we view the ABA's approach as providing a safe harbor within which a defense attorney's conduct cannot reasonably be questioned later, we do not share the Opinion's view that extrajudicial disclosure rarely will be justifiable. Under D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3), a former defense lawyer may share information with prosecutors "to the extent reasonably necessary to respond to specific allegations by the client concerning the lawyer's representation of the client." The text of the rule does not require a court order to make the disclosures that the rule permits. Lawyers who are uncertain about whether disclosure of confidential information falls within the exception, however, should consider seeking a ruling from the court on the applicability of the exception. Obtaining such review will be prudent in close cases.

In the second hypothetical, the former client files an IAC claim alleging that the lawyer violated the client's direction to file an appeal from the fact that the sentence was too long. There, the lawyer may choose to share with prosecutors the reason no appeal was filed: that, in fact, the client never instructed the lawyer to file the appeal; that the lawyer had discussed the possibility of an appeal with the client and the lawyer told the client there was no basis for doing so because the client had received the sentence he agreed to in the plea bargain; and that the lawyer also had sent the client a one-sentence letter stating, "per our conversation today, I will not be filing an appeal in your case."

The defense lawyer here may correctly conclude that sharing this information and the "no appeal" letter with the prosecutor is reasonably necessary to respond to the IAC claims because:

- The alleged failure to follow client's instruction to file an appeal, if true, involves professional misconduct by the lawyer.
- The lawyer is the only witness who can confirm or rebut the client's allegation that he told the lawyer to file the appeal.[17]
- The potential disclosure relates only to the former client's specific allegations about the failure to file an appeal.
- No other portion of the file will be disclosed to prosecutors.

The lawyer is not required to await a subpoena or court order before disclosing information to the prosecutor, for the D.C. Rule contemplates disclosure under the second exception in paragraph (e)(3) even where no proceeding is under way or even contemplated.[18] Moreover, the lawyer does not need to seek a protective order or an agreement with the prosecutors limiting use and disclosure of the protected information to the IAC proceeding because the reasons for not filing the appeal will have no foreseeable impact on the former client in any other proceeding.

In the third hypothetical, the former client's allegations are so outrageous, farfetched, and unsubstantiated that the lawyer is certain that neither the judge nor any rational reader will believe them. The ethically correct initial response to such a claim might well be no response at all.[19] That initial assessment can, of course, be revisited later if the allegations gain some unexpected traction. If the court surprises the lawyer by ordering an [15] Accord Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers §64 cmt. (e) (2000) ("When feasible, the lawyer must also invoke protective orders, submissions under seal, and similar procedures to limit the extent to which the information is disseminated.").

[16] Dunlap warned the petitioner "that withdrawing the pending § 2255 motion may foreclose his ability to pursue these same claims at a later date as it is a possibility that a future § 2255 could be considered untimely or successive in nature." Id. (citing 28 U.S.C. § 2255(f) & (h).

[17] The fact that the information may be available elsewhere does not necessarily preclude disclosure by the lawyer. The criterion in all instances is whether disclosure is "reasonably necessary to respond to specific allegations by the client concerning the lawyer's representation of the client." D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3).

[18] See supra note 13.

[19] "The concept of necessity precludes disclosure in responding to casual charges, such as comments not likely to be taken seriously by others." Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 64 cmt. (e) (2000).

evidentiary hearing, for example, the lawyer would want to reconsider whether and how much to respond.

The fourth hypothetical is more difficult. In that hypothetical, the lawyer declined to call witness X in the robbery trial because (1) X's testimony was cumulative of that provided by other witnesses, and (2) the expected cross-examination of X with respect to her relationship with the client was likely to lead prosecutors to evidence of the former client's involvement in an unsolved murder.

The fact that X's testimony was cumulative of that provided by others may itself be dispositive of the IAC claim.[20] In this case, however, the lawyer cannot truthfully suggest that this was her only reason for not calling X. An answer that goes into the other reason will implicate the former client in a crime unrelated to the conviction being attacked through the IAC claim. A suggestion that there was another reason may lead prosecutors down a path that will cause collateral harm to the former client in a later proceeding unconnected with the IAC claim.[21] For that reason alone, the lawyer may choose not to disclose the information pursuant to the self-defense exception.

Cognizant of the fact that the District of Columbia has disciplined lawyers for disclosing protected information in the context of a judicial proceeding but outside the limits of a Rule 1.6 exception, e.g., In re Ponds, 876 A.2d 636 (D.C. 2005) (withdrawal motion); In re Gonzalez, 773 A.2d 1026 (D.C. 2001) (same), the lawyer who finds herself in this situation may well find it prudent to seek the court's guidance. The lawyer may also want to seek a protective order to confine the use of any disclosed information to the IAC proceeding.

Although the District of Columbia's self-defense exception does not require a court order, in close cases—particularly where, as in an IAC proceeding, a tribunal is readily available—the lawyer may find it prudent to seek a judicial determination of the limits of the exception.[22] We urge careful and dispassionate thought.[23] Lawyers who react quickly to an IAC claim may later find themselves facing discipline for having said too much too soon.

Conclusion

D.C. Rule 1.6(e)(3) permits a defense lawyer whose conduct has been placed in issue by a former client's ineffective assistance of counsel claim to make, without judicial approval or supervision, such disclosures of information protected by Rule 1.6 as are reasonably necessary to respond to the client's specific allegations about the lawyer's performance. Even so, a lawyer should reflect before making disclosures of protected information to prosecutors, courts, or others. A lawyer's confidentiality obligations to her former client are broader than the attorney-client privilege. Although the former client's claim likely waives the evidentiary privilege, that alone does not eliminate the broader confidentiality obligation owed under Rule 1.6. Nor does the limited "self-defense" exception to confidentiality in Rule 1.6(e)(3) open the door to unlimited disclosures to prosecutors, courts or others of protected information. The rule allows a lawyer to disclose protected information only to the extent "reasonably necessary" to respond to "specific allegations" by the former client. Reasonableness is a fact-bound issue about which others may later disagree. Lawyers who are uncertain about the permissibility of disclosing protected information in response to an IAC claim should consider seeking independent advice or judicial approval of the disclosure.

Published January 2013

Opinion 365

Conflict of Interest Analysis for Government Agency Lawyer Defending Agency from Furlough-Related Employment Complaints While Pursuing Her Own Furlough-Related Employment Complaint

Can a government lawyer represent an agency employer in defending the agency from furlough-related complaints brought by other agency employees when the lawyer was also furloughed and is pursuing her own complaint in which the allegations are substantially similar to those in the complaint she is defending? Under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, a lawyer has a conflict of interest in a matter when "[t]he lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests." Rule 1.7(b)(4). Such a conflict plainly exists in this situation. However, so-called individual interest conflicts like this one can be waived under Rule 1.7(c) if:

(1) Each potentially affected client provides informed consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible

[20] If that were all that there was—e.g., that the lawyer chose not to call X because X's testimony would be duplicative of the testimony of other witnesses—disclosure of that reasoning might well be within the self-defense exception in many IAC cases.

[21] The former client's IAC claim will, of course, be harmed by any contrary response by the accused lawyer. Rule 1.6(e)(3) permits such harm to the former client by authorizing the lawyer to respond to the claim. However, cases like Bittaker v. Woodford and United States v. Nicholson take steps to prevent collateral harm to the client by confining use of the disclosed information to the IAC proceeding itself and by prohibiting use of that information against the former client in any subsequent retrial if the IAC claim is successful. Comment [25] to Rule 1.6 urging lawyers to seek "appropriate protective orders or other arrangements . . . to the fullest extent practicable" also seems directed at the prevention or mitigation of collateral harm. It should be noted, however, that the District of Columbia's Rule 1.6(e)(3) allows a lawyer in appropriate cases to respond to specific allegations by a former client even if those allegations are not made in the context of a pending or threatened proceeding. If it really is reasonably necessary for the lawyer to make a public response to a specific public allegation by a former client, protective orders or similar arrangements may not be available or practicable. In that situation, the possibility of harm to the client, collateral or otherwise, cannot preclude a self-defense disclosure otherwise authorized by Rule 1.6(e)(3).

[22] The confidentiality obligation imposed by Rule 1.6 applies equally to disclosures made to the court. Lawyers need to remember that in deciding what to say to the court while seeking a judicial determination.

[23] The most important thing is to stop and think before making any disclosures. In Nesse v. Shaw Pittman, a lawyer's attempt to use the self-defense exception to justify an exchange of information with opposing counsel was undermined by the court's finding of "absolutely no indication that [the lawyer] was aware of that exception and explicitly relied upon it when he spoke to [opposing counsel]." 202 F.R.D. 344, 355 (D.D.C. 2001). "Given the [the lawyer's] vulnerable position, and the demand for information to be used against his former client, the first thing he should have done upon hearing from [opposing counsel] was to seek independent advice. Accepting [the law firm's] post hoc rationalization of his behavior now is the surest way to discourage lawyers from seeking such advice; lawyers would be encouraged to make disclosures to their former client's opponents without getting independent advice as to whether to do it in the hope that, after the disclosure, a second lawyer will come up with an ethical justification that never occurred to them in the first place." Id. That case did not involve an IAC claim. This Committee does not believe that independent professional advice is required before a lawyer who is accused of IAC can disclose responsive information to prosecutors. The lawyer needs to recognize the issue and think it through.

adverse consequences of such representation; and

(2) The lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client.

The only affected client here is the agency. The agency's informed consent to the conflicted lawyer's representation notwithstanding her individual interest conflict would satisfy the requirements of the first paragraph. But client consent alone is not enough. Under the second paragraph, the lawyer must also reasonably believe that she can provide competent and diligent representation to the agency in the matter despite her personal interest, and her belief must be objectively reasonable under the circumstances. That may be a difficult standard to meet when the lawyer is pursuing her own challenge to the furlough while being asked to defend the agency against substantially similar challenges by other affected agency employees.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest)
- Rule 5.1 (Responsibilities of Partners, Managers, and Supervisory Lawyers)
- Rule 5.2 (Subordinate Lawyers)

Inquiry

As has been widely reported, automatic cuts to the federal government's budget – the so-called "sequester" – are requiring federal agencies to find ways to reduce their costs of operation. One way to reduce costs is to furlough government employees. The Committee has received a number of inquiries from government lawyers about their obligations under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct when asked to work on sequester-related furlough disputes that may affect them personally. The inquirers are lawyers in the federal government whose normal responsibilities include defending their agencies against employment-related complaints brought by agency employees. These lawyers are themselves agency employees, each of whom has the right to challenge agency employment actions, including furloughs, that affect them personally. When multiple employees file complaints, we understand that each employee's complaint is handled separately in an administrative proceeding or litigation that involves only the agency and the individual employee as parties.

Employment-related complaints normally turn on the specific facts relating to the particular employee. Even when a single action such as a furlough affects a group of employees, complaints brought by individual members of that group may be factually distinguishable from each other. For example, a complaint by an employee who met certain filing deadlines would be distinguishable from an otherwise identical one brought by an employee who failed to meet the deadline. Different individuals may choose to challenge the decision affecting them in different ways. Accordingly, as discussed further below, whether an attorney may have a conflict of interest in defending the agency against a furlough complaint while pursuing her own furlough complaint against the agency will depend on the similarity between the allegations in the attorney's complaint and the complaint she is defending, and on whether the outcome of the complaint the lawyer is defending will have a persuasive or binding effect on her own complaint. The specific rules that govern furloughs, including employees' notice and appeal rights, depend on the nature and length of the furlough. See generally 5 C.F.R. pt. 351, Reduction in Force; 5 C.F.R. pt. 752, Adverse Actions.

To crystalize these issues for discussion, we will hypothesize a situation involving all the following elements:

1. One agency's implementation of the sequester resulted in a decision to furlough a specific group of employees, including agency lawyers who normally defend the agency against employment-related complaints.
2. An agency lawyer normally charged with defending the agency in such matters has filed a complaint challenging her own furlough.
3. Her personal complaint about her furlough is pending and unresolved when she is asked to defend the agency against furlough-related complaints filed by one or more other members of that furloughed group, the allegations of which are substantially similar to those in her own complaint. The resolution of one of the complaints may have a persuasive or binding effect on the other complaints.
4. The agency assigning her to defend against the other complaints knows that the lawyer is challenging her own furlough but still wants (and, perhaps, needs) that lawyer to defend against the substantially similar complaints brought by other members of the furloughed group.

Do the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct permit the agency lawyer to represent her agency client in defending the agency from those furlough-related complaints in this situation?[1]

Analysis

Rule 1.7 of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct groups conflicts of interest into two categories: (1) those that can be waived under some circumstances, and (2) those that can never be waived even if all affected clients consent. Rule 1.7(a) defines the non-waivable conflict: "A lawyer shall not advance two or more adverse positions in the same matter." Rule 1.7(b) defines four types of conflicts that can be waived under circumstances set out in Rule 1.7(c). As discussed more fully below, the inquiry under consideration does not involve a non-waivable conflict under Rule 1.7(a) but an individual interest conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4). However, whether that conflict can be waived under Rule 1.7(c) is a difficult question to which the answer will vary depending upon the facts of each individual situation.

1. Rule 1.7(a).

Although agency employer is asking the lawyer to defend her agency against furlough-related complaints by other agency employees at the same time that the lawyer is pursuing her own furlough-related complaint against her agency employer, there would be no violation of Rule 1.7(a) because each employee's furlough challenge is a separate matter within the meaning of the rule.[2] Because they are separate matters, the lawyer would

[1] This situation also involves questions under a separate body of law governing conflicts of interest for federal government employees generally. See generally 5 C.F.R. pt. 2635, Standards of Ethical Conduct for Employees of the Executive Branch. Such matters and any other requirements of substantive law are outside the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, and we lack authority and expertise to express any views on them. We note that lawyers are required to understand and comply with the requirements of any applicable substantive law as well as the requirements of the Rules of Professional Conduct.

[2] We note that Rule 1.7(a) speaks of advancing adverse positions in "the same matter" while Rule 1.7(b)(1) speaks of conflicts between clients in a "matter" that "involves a specific party or parties." D.C. Rule 1.0(h) defines "matter" to mean "any litigation, administrative proceeding, lobbying activity, application, claim, investigation, arrest, charge or accusation, the drafting of a contract, a negotiation, estate or family relations practice issue, or any other representation, except as expressly limited in a particular rule." The meaning and effect of the limiting clause in Rule 1.7(b)(1) is discussed at not be advancing "two or more adverse positions in the same matter." Accordingly, this situation would not give rise to a non-waivable conflict under Rule 1.7(a).[3]

2. Rule 1.7(b).

Rule 1.7(b) defines four conflict situations that can be waived under circumstances defined by Rule 1.7(c).[4] The fourth specifically addresses situations in which the lawyer's individual interests may adversely affect the lawyer's representation of a client:

> (b) Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if:
>
> * * *
>
> (4) The lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.

This rule generally applies to a lawyer who is asked to defend an agency's furlough of other agency employees while the lawyer is pursuing her own challenge to the same furlough.[5] A lawyer who is pursuing her own furlough complaint against the agency might be motivated to pull her punches in defending against substantially similar complaints brought by other agency employees, especially if the lawyer's advocacy on behalf of the agency may detrimentally affect her own case. Thus, under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, the lawyer cannot represent the agency in defending against others' furlough complaints "[e]xcept as permitted by paragraph (c)" of Rule 1.7.

3. Rule 1.7(c).

Individual interest conflicts under Rule 1.7(b)(4) can be waived under the conditions set forth in Rule 1.7(c):

> A lawyer may represent a client with respect to a matter in the circumstances described in paragraph (b) above if
>
> (1) Each potentially affected client provides informed consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation; and
>
> (2) The lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client.

The phrase "informed consent" in the first paragraph means "the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct." Rule 1.0(e).

Our hypothetical assumes that the lawyer's employer – her agency client – has given informed consent to her representation of the agency in defending against other employees' furlough complaints while the lawyer pursues her own, substantially similar furlough complaint against the agency. In short, we assume that the agency has considered the lawyer's potentially conflicting personal motivations and decided that it still wants the lawyer to defend it from substantially similar furlough complaints filed by others. Such a consent would satisfy Rule 1.7(c)(1).[6]

Under Rule 1.7(c)(2), however, the client's consent alone is not enough to waive the conflict. In addition, in order to undertake a representation, the lawyer must "reasonably believe[] that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client." That is, the lawyer must hold such a belief and that belief must be reasonable under an objective standard. Under Rule 1.0(j), "'reasonable' or 'reasonably' when used in relation to conduct by a lawyer denotes the conduct of a reasonably prudent and competent lawyer."

As we recognized in another opinion:

> [T]he prohibition of Rule 1.7(b)(4) . . . is one which is highly dependent on the circumstances of the representation and the lawyer's own circumstances. In this Opinion, we can do no more than identify the conflict of interest considerations, and leave it to the inquirer to determine whether the particular circumstances of his representation of his client are such that his judgment "will be or reasonably may be adversely affected" by the fee arrangement. The test to be applied is an objective one, that is, whether a lawyer's judgment "will be or reasonably may be adversely affected" by certain circumstances is determined by the position of a reasonable lawyer under the circumstances.

D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 300 (2000).

In a later opinion, we raised concerns under Rule 1.7(b)(4) about an arrangement in which "success" in representing the client in an immigration matter would trigger extensive and long-lasting financial support obligations from the lawyer to the immigration client:

> The significant financial obligations imposed by the Affidavit of Support can create exactly the kind of conflict addressed by this rule. A lawyer who has second thoughts or a change in financial circumstances, for example, may have an incentive to sabotage the client's immigration application so that the lawyer's support obligations never can take effect.

D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 354 (2010).

The ABA's Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility considered personal interest conflicts in the context of a situation in which the lawyer is asked to post bail for a client. ABA Formal Ethics Opinion 04-432 (2004). Analyzing Model Rule 1.7(a)(2),[7] length in D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 344 (2008). Although the word "matter" in Rule 1.7(a) is not confined to matters involving specific parties, the only reading of Rule 1.7(a) that makes sense in the context of the current inquiry is one that treats each employee's individual challenge to a furlough decision affecting that employee as a separate "matter."

[3] As explained in the comments to the rule, "[i]nstitutional interests in preserving confidence in the adversary process and in the administration of justice preclude permitting a lawyer to represent adverse positions in the same matter. For that reason, paragraph (a) prohibits such conflicting representations, with or without client consent." Rule 1.7 cmt. [2].

[4] The first three paragraphs involve lawyers with two or more clients. Rule 1.7(b)(1) addresses a situation in which one client asks the lawyer to represent it in a matter that involves and is adverse to another client. Rules 1.7(b)(2) and (b)(3) deal with situations in which the representation of one client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by the lawyer's representation of another client. These three subsections do not apply here because the agency lawyers have only one client, their agency employer.

[5] See Rule 1.7 cmt. [11] ("The lawyer's own interests should not be permitted to have an adverse effect on representation of a client.").

[6] A government agency that employs lawyers is a sophisticated consumer of legal services from whom it is easier to get an effective waiver of certain conflicts than from less sophisticated clients. See Rule 1.7 cmt. [28] ("Lawyers should . . . recognize that the form of disclosure sufficient for more sophisticated business clients may not be sufficient to permit less sophisticated clients to provide informed consent."); D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 354 (2010) ("While conflicts under Rule 1.7(b)(4) can be waived under certain circumstances, the enforceability of such a waiver from an individual immigration client in these circumstances is doubtful.").

[7] Model Rule 1.7(a)(2) defines several conflict situations, including one in which "there is a significant risk that the representation of one or more that opinion concluded that the lawyer could post bail for the client "only in those rare circumstances in which there is no significant risk that [the lawyer's] representation of the client will be materially limited by her personal interest in recovering the amount advanced."[8]

In our view, the reasonable belief requirement of Rule 1.7(c)(2) is a difficult obstacle to surmount if the lawyer is asked to defend the agency against a furlough complaint with allegations that are substantially similar to the allegations she has raised in her own furlough complaint against the agency. The level of difficulty increases with the similarity of the allegations in the complaints. In other words, the obstacle becomes harder to surmount as the allegations converge towards sameness. The difficulty is compounded if an agency or court decision resolving one complaint will have a binding effect, or may have a persuasive effect, on the resolution of the other complaint. At the other end of the scale, it is less likely that Rule 1.7(c)(2) will present an obstacle to the lawyer's representation when there is no factual or legal overlap between the lawyer's own furlough-related complaint and the complaints of others against which the agency has asked the lawyer to defend.

Although we can identify a framework for the analysis of these issues generally, the answer in any particular situation will depend on the allegations, the lawyer involved, and the procedural context of the complaint. If the lawyer does not believe that she can provide "competent and diligent representation to" her agency client in the furlough matters while pursuing her own furlough complaint – or if the hypothetical "reasonably prudent and competent lawyer" in her situation would not believe that she could – she may not undertake the representation of the agency client in such matters even if the agency is prepared to waive the conflict. Rule 1.7(c)(2).

4. Rules 5.1 and 5.2, Supervising and Supervised Lawyers.

This inquiry also raises issues for agency lawyers who supervise furloughed lawyers. Supervisors and managers who are lawyers can be held professionally responsible for their subordinates' conduct. Rule 5.1(a) requires lawyers who possess "managerial authority in a law firm or government agency" to "make reasonable efforts to ensure that the firm has in effect measures giving reasonable assurance that all lawyers in the firm or agency conform to the Rules of Professional Conduct." Rule 5.1(b) requires a lawyer who has "direct supervisory authority over another lawyer" to "make reasonable efforts to ensure that the other lawyer conforms to the Rules of Professional Conduct." Rule 5.1(c)(1) provides that a lawyer "shall be responsible for another lawyer's violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct" if the lawyer "orders or with knowledge of the specific conduct, ratifies the conduct involved."[9]

In turn, a subordinate lawyer is responsible for complying with the professional conduct rules even if a supervisor or other person directs her to engage in prohibited conduct. See Rule 5.2(a) ("A lawyer is bound by the Rules of Professional Conduct notwithstanding that the lawyer acted at the direction of another person"). However, a subordinate lawyer does not violate the professional conduct rules "if that lawyer acts in accordance with a supervisory lawyer's reasonable resolution of an arguable question of professional duty." Rule 5.2(b).

Conclusion

We recognize that an agency lawyer would be placed in a difficult situation if her full-time employer, the agency, asked her to defend the agency against furlough-related complaints that raise allegations substantially similar to the allegations the lawyer is raising in her own complaint, even where the agency waived any individual interest conflict relating to the lawyer's representation. Under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, the client's consent is necessary but not sufficient to enable a lawyer to undertake certain kinds of matters. Clients cannot waive their right to have a lawyer who reasonably believes she can provide competent and diligent representation. Moreover, supervisory lawyers must make reasonable efforts to ensure that their subordinate lawyers comply with the professional conduct rules. Lawyers have an affirmative obligation not to undertake matters that they do not reasonably believe they can handle competently and diligently. We suggest that agencies and their lawyers work together to resolve the ethical issues addressed in this opinion.

Published April 2013

Opinion 366

Ethical Issues that Commonly Arise in Private Adoption Matters

Lawyers who represent clients, whether birth parents or prospective adoptive parents, in private or independent adoption proceedings in the District of Columbia must ensure their conduct conforms to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. Private adoptions frequently give rise to a number of significant ethical obligations, not the least of which are duties arising under conflict of interest rules, that the lawyer must squarely address with his or her client or clients, often at the onset of the representation. In many instances, a lawyer will be required to obtain the informed consent of one or more clients, and in some circumstances that of former clients, regarding certain aspects of the representation, in order to commence or continue representation. Private adoption practitioners should be particularly mindful of ethical duties attendant to communications with unrepresented persons, as well as duties of confidentiality owed to both current and former clients.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.0(e) – Informed Consent
- Rule 1.3 – Diligence and Zeal
- Rule 1.4 – Communication
- Rule 1.6 – Confidentiality of Information clients will be materially limited by . . . a personal interest of the lawyer."

[8] The ABA opinion lists several examples of "unusual situations" in which the bond-posting lawyer might conclude that continuing representation is permissible:

> The amount involved may, for example, be negligible and of little or no consequence to the lawyer. There may be situations in which a lawyer who is a friend of the family of the client may expect that the family will indemnify her from loss when she has posted bond for the client in exigent circumstances. The lawyer could commit to herself, or even agree in writing to the client, that she would not exercise her right of legal recourse against the client. Yet again, circumstances may be such that the lawyer reasonably believes that there is little or no risk that the client will fail to appear.

[9] In addition, Rule 5.2(c)(2) provides that a lawyer shall be responsible for another lawyer's violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct if "[t]he lawyer has direct supervisory authority over the other lawyer or is a partner or has comparable managerial authority in the law firm or government agency in which the other lawyer practices, and knows or reasonably should know of the conduct at a time when its consequences can be avoided or mitigated but fails to take reasonable remedial action."

- Rule 1.7 – Conflict of Interest: General
- Rule 1.8(e) – Conflict of Interest: Specific Rules
- Rule 1.9 – Conflict of Interest: Former Client
- Rule 4.3 – Dealing with Unrepresented Person
- Rule 5.4 – Professional Independence of a Lawyer

Inquiry

The Committee has been asked to provide guidance to the Bar on ethical considerations that commonly arise in "private adoptions," which are also referred to as "independent adoptions." For purposes of this opinion, these terms describe an adoption in which the birth parents have neither voluntarily relinquished their parental rights to an authorized public or private "child-placing agency"[1] nor had their parental rights involuntarily terminated.[2] These latter types of adoptions are outside the scope of this opinion.

A private adoption may present a number of issues that implicate the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules"), including: (1) accepting legal fees from a third party (typically, for representing the birth parent(s) from the person(s) seeking to adopt); (2) engaging in reciprocal client referrals among other adoption practitioners; (3) jointly representing both birth parents; (4) communicating with an unrepresented party (often an unrepresented birth parent, while either representing the prospective adoptive parent(s) or while representing the other birth parent, concerning the decision or procedures to place a child for adoption or to relinquish parental rights); and/or (5) representing a client in an adoption proceeding opposite a former client from a previous adoption proceeding. Before discussing the application of the ethics rules, we briefly describe the statutes and Superior Court procedural rules that govern private adoption proceedings in the District of Columbia.[3]

Background

Private adoption proceedings are initiated in the Superior Court's Family Division by a petition filed by person(s) seeking to adopt ("adoptive parent(s)" or "petitioner(s)").[4] The court may grant an adoption petition only after determining that "the adoption will be in the best interest of the prospective adoptee."[5] Resolution of this ultimate question requires the court to decide (1) whether "the prospective adoptee is physically, mentally, and otherwise suitable for adoption by the petitioner"; and (2) whether "the petitioner is fit and able to give the prospective adoptee a proper home and education."[6] To assist the court in assessing the petitioner's fitness, a "licensed child-placing agency" will conduct an investigation and report its findings.[7] The Committee is advised that in private adoptions the prospective adoptive parents typically retain the entity that will perform the study and pay its fees.

Consent to the adoption is required "from both [birth] parents, if they are both alive";[8] the "minority of a natural parent is not a bar to that parent's consent to adoption."[9] The court may appoint an attorney to represent "a parent or guardian whose consent is required … if the individual is financially unable to obtain adequate representation."[10] More commonly, however, the adoptive parents will pay the legal fees for a lawyer to represent each birth parent that desires representation. The Committee is informed that due to the relatively small number of lawyers regularly engaged in adoption practice, the same lawyers will often be facing each other, either having been retained by the petitioner or in representing a birth parent through referral from the petitioner's lawyer.

Consent to the adoption must also be obtained "from the prospective adoptee if he or she is fourteen years of age or older."[11] District of Columbia law does not provide a prospective adoptee with appointed counsel, even when the prospective adoptee's consent is required. The court has public funds available, but is not required by either statute or Superior Court Rule, to appoint a guardian ad litem ("GAL"), who is "charged with the representation of the child's best interest." Notwithstanding that every prospective adoptee, irrespective of age, is deemed a party to the proceeding under Super. Ct. Adoption Rule 17(a), if the court does not appoint a GAL for a prospective adoptee, there may be no lawyer – indeed, no person – involved in the proceeding who is specifically charged with "representation of the child's best interest."[12]

[1] Such adoptions are typically referred to as "agency adoptions." In agency adoptions, the birth parents "relinquish parental rights" to a "licensed child-placing agency" for purposes of having the agency place the adoptee with adoptive parents; by statute "the agency is vested with parental rights and may consent to the adoption of the child pursuant to the statutes regulating adoption procedure." D.C. Code § 4-1406(a)(1). The relinquishment of parental rights to a child-placing agency prior to the adoption is governed by statute. See D.C. Code §§ 4-1401, et seq.

[2] See D.C. Code § 16-2320(a)(6)(termination following a finding of neglect). Although lawyers may be involved in the representation of a birth parent or an adoptee in the termination of parental rights proceedings, lawyers ordinarily are not involved in the ensuing adoption proceedings that will follow if a court terminates parental rights.

[3] This Committee does not opine on questions of law outside of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. The ethical questions presented in this inquiry, however, demand a contextual understanding of the statutory and procedural framework and of certain requirements that arise under substantive adoption law. The accompanying discussion of the statutes and court rules that govern adoptions in the District of Columbia reflects the Committee's understanding of relevant law for the sole purpose of analyzing the issues presented under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

[4] D.C. Code § 16-305.

[5] Id. § 16-309(b)(3); see, e.g., In re E.D.R., 772 A.2d 1156 (D.C. 2001).

[6] Id.§§ 16-309(b)(1)-(2).

[7] Id. § 16-307; Super. Ct. Adoption Rule 7(d). The Committee is informed that adoptive parents usually retain one of the licensed child-placing agencies that engage in agency adoptions to perform the requisite home study.

[8] D.C. Code § 16-304(b)(2)(A). Section 16-304(d), however, establishes two exceptions to the statutory consent requirement to cover instances when a birth parent, after notice of the adoption petition, either (1) cannot be located; or (2) has abandoned the prospective adoptee and voluntarily failed to contribute to his support for a period of at least six months. In addition, under D.C. Code § 16-304(e) the court may grant an adoption petition when it finds "after a hearing, that the consent or consents are withheld contrary to the best interest of the child."

[9] Id. § 16-304(c).

[10] Id. § 16-316(a). The reference in the statute to "a guardian" as a potential recipient of appointed counsel "if the individual is financially unable to obtain adequate representation" is to a person in whose custody the prospective adoptee has been placed, not a guardian ad litem, who is always a lawyer.

[11] Id. § 16-304(b)(1).

[12] Id. § 16-316(b). For a prospective adoptee "fourteen years of age or older," whose consent, like that of the birth parents, is required for the adoption to go forward, he or she will have no one to consult with in evaluating and interpreting the home study and in deciding whether to consent to the adoption if the court decides not to appoint a GAL. As we discuss below, an attorney who represents a birth parent does not – and cannot, consistent with D.C. Rule 1.7, simultaneously represent a prospective adoptee who is too young to give informed consent to joint representation. Additionally, we note that except in certain narrowly defined circumstances, an attorney who represents a birth

Consent and the resulting adoption have significant consequences for a consenting birth parent and an adoptee whose independent consent must be obtained: "A party who formally gives his consent to the proposed adoption … waives the requirement of notice" of the adoption proceedings in Superior Court;[13] and, pursuant to Super. Ct. Adoption Rule 17(a), the consenting person is no longer deemed a "party" to the adoption proceedings. Once a person consents to the adoption, that consent "may be revoked or withdrawn only after a judicial determination that the consent was not voluntarily given. The person moving to revoke or withdraw consent has the burden to establish that the consent was not voluntarily given."[14] The adoption effects a complete termination of birth parents' parental rights.[15]

As explained above, the law does not require the court to provide a prospective adoptee with legal representation in a private adoption proceeding, notwithstanding that the consequences of the proceeding are surely no less significant for the adoptee than for the birth parents, who are statutorily entitled to counsel. Although the proper administration of adoption proceedings is not a subject on which the Committee opines, the Committee recognizes, and discusses more fully in this opinion, that the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct constrain lawyers representing other parties in the adoption proceeding from apprising the court of adverse information that may potentially affect the court's decision of whether "the adoption will be in the best interest of the prospective adoptee." The absence of a lawyer for the prospective adoptee may, in some instances result in the court's being unaware of such information.

The Committee is aware that the law mandates appointment of a GAL in child neglect proceedings. In Opinion 295, the Committee noted the Court of Appeals' decision holding that "a child's GAL occupies a 'dual role' as neutral fact-finder for the judge and as zealous advocate on behalf of the child's best interests." See S.S. v. D.M., 597 A.2d 870, 875 (1991).[16] Even though a GAL's precise function in a private adoption would differ from that of a GAL in a neglect proceeding, the appointment of a GAL could assist the court in determining whether placement of the prospective adoptee with the petitioner is in the adoptee's "best interests."

Discussion

Informed Consent

The concept of "informed consent" is central to a number of circumstances that confront practitioners in private adoption matters.[17] Because many ethical issues that arise in private adoptions require a lawyer to obtain the informed consent of one or more clients or former clients, it is critical that lawyers understand the terminology. To avoid the possibility of confusion in the discussion that follows, we note at the outset that the "informed consent" requirement under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct is wholly distinct from the statutory "consent to adoption" required by D.C. Code § 16-304(b)(2)(A).[18]

Rule 1.0(e) states that "'Informed consent' denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct." Comment [2] addresses the content of a lawyer's communication to the (prospective) client in order to ensure that the client's consent to a proposed arrangement or action is "informed."

> The lawyer must make reasonable efforts to ensure that the client or other person possesses information reasonably adequate to make an informed decision. Ordinarily, this will require communication that includes [1] a disclosure of the facts and circumstances giving rise to the situation, [2] any explanation reasonably necessary to inform the client or other person of the material advantages and disadvantages of the proposed course of conduct, and [3] a discussion of the client's or other person's options and alternatives. See Rule 1.0 Comment [2]

In addition to imposing these affirmative obligations of disclosure, explanation, and discussion, "[o]btaining informed consent will usually require an affirmative response by the client or other person."[19] We emphasize that "a lawyer may not assume consent from a client's or other person's silence."[20]

Finally, the comments to Rule 1.0(e) further explain that "[i]n determining whether the information and explanation provided are reasonably adequate, relevant factors include whether the client or other person is experienced in legal matters generally and in making decisions of the type involved." Thus, information sufficient to allow one person to give informed consent may not be sufficient for another. This opinion discusses the practical application and requirements for obtaining informed consent in the context of specific issues that may arise in these types of representations.

Representing Birth Parents When Legal Fees are Paid by Party Seeking to Adopt

It is a common practice for the lawyer who represents the person(s) filing the adoption petition to recommend a lawyer or lawyers to represent either or both of the birth parents and for the petitioner to parent cannot, in the absence of the informed consent of that client, apprise the court of adverse information that may potentially affect the court's decision whether "the adoption will be in the best interest of the prospective adoptee."

[13] Id. § 16-306(b). A lawyer who undertakes to obtain a client's consent to the adoption must explain and ensure the client appreciates the consequences of giving that consent. See D.C. Rule 1.4(b).

[14] Super. Ct. Adoption Rule 70(a).

[15] D.C. Code § 16-312(a).

[16] D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 295 (Restriction on Communications by a Lawyer Acting as Guardian Ad Litem in a Child Abuse and Neglect Proceeding) (2000).

[17] The concept of informed consent is independent from, and in addition to, a lawyer's general duty of communication arising under Rule 1.4. Rule 1.4(b) requires that "[a] lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation." The comments to Rule 1.4 clarify that "[t]he lawyer must be particularly careful to ensure that decisions of the client are made only after the client has been informed of all relevant considerations" and that "[t]he lawyer must initiate and maintain the consultative and decision-making process if the client does not do so and must ensure that the ongoing process is thorough and complete." See D.C. Rule 1.4 Comments [2] and [3].

[18] See note 8 and the text accompanying notes13-15, supra, for a discussion of the consent requirement and the consequences of giving consent to the adoption.

[19] D.C. Rule 1.0, Comment [3].

[20] Id. Although Comment [3] to Rule 1.0 notes that "[a] number of D.C. Rules require that a person's consent be in writing," neither Rule 1.8(e)(1) nor Rule 1.7(c)(1) requires that a client's informed consent be memorialized by a writing. Nonetheless, this Committee has consistently advised that an attorney consider memorializing the disclosures to the client and the client's informed consent to the attorney's proposed action even where the D.C. Rules do not require the client's written consent. In this opinion we identify the prudential considerations that favor obtaining written consent when representing a person about to relinquish parental rights.

pay the fees for the birth parents' lawyer(s). A lawyer who accepts such referrals under these conditions must comply with Rules 1.8(e) and 5.4(c).

Rule 1.8(e) states:

> A lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless: (1) The client gives informed consent after consultation; (2) There is no interference with the lawyer's independence of professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and (3) Information relating to representation of a client is protected as required by D.C. Rule 1.6.

Rule 5.4(c) parallels Rule 1.8(e)(2) and states:

> A lawyer shall not permit a person who recommends, employs, or pays the lawyer to render legal services for another to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services.

Comment [10] to Rule 1.8 notes that "third-party payers frequently have interests that differ from those of the client, including interests in minimizing the amount spent on the representation and in learning how the representation is progressing." Because of this potential disparity in interests, "lawyers are prohibited from accepting or continuing such representations unless the lawyer determines that there will be no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment and there is informed consent from the client." Rules 1.8(e)(2) and 5.4(c) require that the lawyer not permit the adoptive parents (or the attorney representing the adoptive parents) to "direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment" in advising her birth parent client regarding the adoption or otherwise "interfere" in the relationship with the client.

Even when a lawyer is satisfied that she can maintain the independent judgment required by Rules 1.8(e)(2) and 5.4(c), Rule 1.8(e)(1) prohibits acceptance of fees from a third party unless the client gives informed consent to the arrangement. Thus, at a minimum "[p]aragraph (e) requires disclosure of the fact that the lawyer's services are being paid for by a third party."[21] For a client's consent to be "informed," however, there must be "a discussion of the client's ... options and alternatives" and an "explanation ... of material advantages and disadvantages of the proposed course of conduct."[22] An indigent birth parent must be informed that court-appointed counsel is available under D.C. Code § 16-316(a) as an alternative to accepting a lawyer whose fees are paid for by the adoptive parents; although the lawyer is free to fairly state her opinion regarding the advantages of not having a court-appointed lawyer, the client must be told that she has a choice and be provided with sufficient information to make that choice intelligently.

The representation and fee arrangement must also conform to the requirements of Rule 1.7 concerning conflict of interest,[23] which prohibits representation of a client "if … [t]he lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by ... the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests."[24] Under Rule 1.7(b)(4), a conflict of interest exists if there is a significant risk that the lawyer's representation will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own interest in the fee arrangement.[25]

Whether the fee arrangement creates such a risk is an objective determination: Would an "objective observer" have a "reasonable doubt" that the representation can be "wholeheartedly and zealously" undertaken?[26] If such an objective reasonable doubt exists, a lawyer must comply with the waiver and informed consent mandates of Rule 1.7(c)(1) and (2) before commencing representation.

Finally, Rule 1.8(e)(3) provides that a lawyer whose representation of a birth parent will be paid for by the adoptive parents must comply with the confidentiality provisions of Rule 1.6, which prohibit a lawyer from "revealing" a client "confidence or secret" and from using a confidence or secret "to the disadvantage of the client" or "for the advantage of the lawyer or of a third person."[27]

Reciprocal Referrals Among Private Adoption Attorneys

As noted earlier, the Committee understands that in private adoption practice, as in a number of other practice areas, there are informal groups of lawyers who engage in reciprocal referrals; that is, a lawyer who represents the adoptive parents in one matter will refer the birth parent(s) to a colleague, who may reciprocate when the roles are reversed. The Committee emphasizes that the D.C. Rules do not prohibit such relationships among lawyers; indeed, the Committee recognizes that they are inevitable and may inure to a client's benefit. Nonetheless, such relationships can contribute to a "reasonable doubt" in the mind of an "objective observer" whether a lawyer's financial interest in continuing to receive referrals from colleagues could interfere with the lawyer's "wholehearted and zealous" representation of a client in the event that the client takes a position that is not the one preferred by the client of the lawyer who made the referral.

Because one of the principles underlying Rules 1.7(b) and (c) is that "the client as well as the lawyer must have the opportunity to judge and be satisfied that [wholehearted and zealous] representation can be provided,"[28] a prudent lawyer will, in most cases, treat a representation that stems from a "reciprocal referral relationship" as raising a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4) and will disclose "the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation,"[29] so that the client can consider the issue and provide the informed consent needed for the lawyer to undertake the representation.

In discussing this matter (and all matters that require the client's informed consent to a proposed action) with the prospective client, a lawyer who proposes to represent a birth parent must consider the prospective client's age (perhaps a minor), sophistication in legal matters (often minimal), and the stress presented by the client's circumstances of relinquishing parental rights. The lawyer must tailor the substance and delivery of the disclosure to ensure that the client appreciates the decision she is making.[30]

[21] D.C. Rule 1.8, Comment [10].

[22] D.C. Rule 1.0, Comment [2].

[23] D.C. Rule 1.8, Comment [10].

[24] D.C. Rule 1.7(b)(4).

[25] D.C. Rule 1.8, Comment [11].

[26] D.C. Rule 1.7, Comment [7].

[27] D.C. Rule 1.6(a)(1)-(3); D.C. Rule 1.8(e)(3) and Comment [10].

[28] D.C. Rule 1.7, Comment 7 ("The client has a right to disclosure of all relevant considerations and the opportunity to be the judge of its own interests.").

[29] D.C. Rule 1.7(c)(1).

[30] Comment [11] to D.C. Rule 1.8 recognizes that in some circumstances, for example, where the prospective client is experienced in obtaining legal services, disclosure of the "the fact of the payment and the identity of the third-party payer" may be sufficient to satisfy D.C. Rule 1.8(e). However, in dealing with a birth parent (particularly one who has not reached the age of majority) who is about to place a child for adoption and is unable to afford counsel, the lawyer should assume that a more

Representation of More than One Birth Parent

Because the consent of both birth parents is required (absent involuntary termination of either's parental rights), each may want legal representation in deciding whether to consent to the adoption or, if consent is withheld, in mounting an opposition.[31] As we stated in Opinion 296, although the D.C. Rules do not prohibit joint representation, "[a] necessary predicate to a decision to undertake joint representation is an initial determination that the interests of the joint clients can be pursued without conflict."[32] We also cautioned, however, that a lawyer who is considering undertaking joint representation must keep in mind that "[n]o matter how consistent the apparent interests of clients in a joint representation may appear at the onset … [joint representation] poses inherent risks of future conflicts of interest."[33] Moreover, a lawyer "should be mindful that if the common representation fails because the potentially adverse interests cannot be reconciled, the result can be additional cost, embarrassment and recrimination."[34]

Absolute Prohibition of Representation: Adverse Interests Between Birth Parents

Turning first to the prohibition in Rule 1.7(a) against "advanc[ing] two or more adverse positions in the same matter," lawyers must remember that this prohibition prohibits joint representation not only when there are conflicting opinions regarding any aspect of the prospective adoption but also when the birth parents seek representation in order to resolve their disagreement(s). In Opinion 243, we concluded that Rule 1.7(a) did not permit "the joint representation of a divorcing husband and wife who seek assistance in resolving their disagreement as to the terms of the dissolution of their marriage." The Committee stated: "We believe that such joint representation would place too great a strain on the fundamental duty of loyalty to individual clients that undergirds our ethical rules."[35] Our reasoning in that opinion applies with equal force to a lawyer's prospective joint representation of birth parents when the lawyer is aware that they have adverse positions on matters involved in the adoption proceeding.

Conditional Prohibition: Informed Consent to Joint Representation

When birth parents seek joint representation and there is no such adversity in their positions regarding the adoption, a lawyer must, nonetheless, consult "with each client concerning the implications of the common representation and obtain[] each client's [informed] consent"[36] to the joint representation before agreeing to undertake it. We take this opportunity to review relevant provisions of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct in the context of joint representations to ensure that lawyers' consultations with their prospective clients address fully "the implications of the common representation" and that clients who consent to joint representation have been adequately informed of the actual and potential consequences of the decision.

As we stated in Opinion 296, "[a] joint representation in and of itself does not alter the lawyer's ethical duties ["of loyalty and confidentiality," as well as "the duty to inform"] to each client, including the duty to protect each client's confidences."(emphasis added). That opinion described the "delicate balance" a lawyer must maintain in fulfilling her obligations to each client under both Rule 1.4 (Communication) and Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information), and cautioned that "[i]f the balance cannot be maintained, the common representation is improper."[37] We reiterate here this critical point: "In a common representation, the lawyer is still required both to keep each client adequately informed and to maintain confidentiality of information relating to the representation …."[38]

Specifically, Rule 1.4 requires a lawyer to "keep a client reasonably informed about the status of a matter and promptly comply with reasonable requests for information" and to "explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation."[39] This means that "[a] client is entitled to whatever information the client wishes about all aspects of the subject matter of the representation unless the client expressly consents not to have certain information passed on."[40] On the other hand, Rule 1.6 requires that a lawyer not: "(1) reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client; (2) use a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client to the disadvantage of the client; or (3) use a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client for the advantage of the lawyer or of a third person."

Comment [16] to Rule 1.6 addresses the tension that joint representation creates between a lawyer's obligation to maintain client confidentiality and her obligation to keep a client fully informed:

> As to the duty of confidentiality, continued common representation will almost certainly be inadequate if one client asks the lawyer not to disclose to the other client information relevant to the common representation. This is so because the lawyer has an equal duty of loyalty to each client, and each client has the right to be informed of anything bearing on the representation that might affect that client's interests and the right to expect that the lawyer will use that information to that client's benefit. See D.C. Rule 1.4 (emphasis added).[41]

fulsome explanation of the relationship with the referring lawyer is required in order to obtain the prospective client's informed consent to the representation under such circumstances. Cf. D.C. Rule 1.0, Comment [2] ("In determining whether the information and explanation provided are reasonably adequate, relevant factors include whether the client or other person is experienced in legal matters generally and in making decisions of the type involved.").

[31] With respect to the unwed natural father, if he "grasps an opportunity … to develop a relationship with his offspring … and accepts some measure of responsibility for the child's future," he has a constitutional right to participate in the adoption proceedings. Lehr v. Robertson, 463 U.S. 248, 261-62 (1983).

[32] D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 296 (Joint Representation: Confidentiality of Information)(2000). Although LEO 296 was adopted before the 2007 D.C. Rules Amendments, its discussion of "the difficult ethical issues under D.C. Rule 1.7(b)(2) and (b)(3) posed by joint representations of any kind" is unaffected by the subsequent elimination of former D.C. Rule 2.2, which addressed the lawyer's role as intermediary, or the amendments to D.C. Rule 1.6(d), regarding a lawyer's revealing a client's confidences and secrets "[w]hen a client has used or is using a lawyer's services to further a crime or fraud."

[33] Id.

[34] D.C. Rule 1.7, Comment [14].

[35] D.C. LEO 243.

[36] D.C. LEO 296, discussing former Rule 2.2. The joint representation concerns identified in former Rule 2.2 and discussed in LEO 296 are captured in Comments [14]-[18] to Rule 1.7(b).

[37] D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 296 (2000).

[38] Id.

[39] D.C. Rule 1.4(a) and (b).

[40] D.C. Rule 1.4, Comment [2] (emphasis added).

[41] As the Committee stated in Opinion 327, Rule 1.6(d)(1) permits a lawyer to reveal a client's confidence or secret when the client has provided informed consent to such disclosure. The Committee went on to point out that "[w]here the disclosing client has unambiguously consented to further

In the context of joint representation of birth parents,[42] the consultation regarding "the implications of the common representation" must include a discussion of the following points. First, the prospective clients must be made aware of the risk that a future disagreement between them could result in the lawyer having to withdraw from both representations, and that each would have to then find a new lawyer, which in most circumstances will delay the final resolution of the adoption proceeding and require additional expenditures of their time. Second, the lawyer must ensure that each prospective client understands that "[w]ith regard to the attorney-client privilege, the prevailing D.C. rule is that, as between commonly represented clients, the privilege does not attach."[43] Third, as we said in Opinion 327, it is essential that the lawyer "carefully explain to all clients in a joint representation that, when they agree that any relevant or material information may be shared with one another, they cannot expect that any relevant or material confidential information they may subsequently reveal to the lawyer will be kept from the other co-clients," and that the lawyer "may have to withdraw from any or all representations if one client later objects to continued common representation or sharing of such information."[44]

Lawyers must also advise each client that there are alternatives to joint representation. As noted, separate court-appointed counsel is available for each indigent birth parent. In addition, the Committee has been advised that adoptive parents will often fund separate legal counsel for each birth parent if requested to do so. Informed consent requires that lawyers explain to the prospective client(s) the benefits of separate counsel. This may include explaining that there are mechanisms available that enable separate lawyers to share such information as each client agrees to share while protecting confidences and secrets and maintaining each person's attorney-client privilege.

Although Rule 1.7 does not impose a requirement that either the lawyer's explanations or the client's decision concerning joint representation be in writing, the Committee noted in Opinion 296 that former Rule 2.2 imposed a writing requirement and the reasons for the requirement:

> Comment [2] to Rule 2.2 underscores that the explanation of risks and consent must be in writing because "the potential for confusion is so great." A written explanation requires the lawyer to "focus specifically on those risks" and educates the client to "risks that many clients may not otherwise comprehend."[45]

After pointing out that the reasons for the writing requirement in Rule 2.2 applied equally to "joint representations of any kind," we concluded:

> The best practice is clearly to advise clients at the outset of a representation of the potential for ethical conflicts ahead. Written disclosure of potential effects of joint representation and written consent can substantially mitigate, if not eliminate, the ethical tensions inherent in common representation.[46]

Communication with an Unrepresented Birth Parent

The Committee has been advised that lawyers who practice adoption law confront with some regularity two circumstances that involve communication with an unrepresented person. We understand that it is not uncommon for a birth mother to decline the opportunity to consult with an attorney before executing the statutory consent form that terminates her parental rights.[47] Because someone has to obtain the executed form for the adoption to proceed, the Committee understands that the task of obtaining the requisite consent often falls to the attorney who represents the prospective adoptive parents. Another situation that arises involves communications between an unrepresented birth parent and a lawyer who represents one of the other parties, usually the lawyer who represents the other birth parent.

Both scenarios are governed by Rule 4.3 (Communication with an Unrepresented Person). Rule 4.3(a)(1) prohibits "giving advice to the unrepresented person other than the advice to secure counsel, if the interests of such person are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client" (emphasis added). In addition, Rule 4.3(a)(2) provides that a lawyer may not "state or imply to unrepresented persons whose interests are not in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client that the lawyer is disinterested."

Although an adoptive parent's lawyer tasked with obtaining an unrepresented birth parent's consent to the adoption may subjectively believe that there is no conflict between the interests of the unrepresented birth parent and the lawyer's client, obtaining a birth parent's formal consent is the essential step in a proceeding that will result, if the court grants the adoption petition, in the transfer of parental rights from the unrepresented birth parent to the lawyer's client(s). Under these circumstances, a prudent lawyer will treat the birth parent as someone whose interests "are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client."

Therefore, the lawyer must make clear that she represents the prospective adoptive parent(s), that the lawyer's role is to assist the adoptive parent(s) in adopting the birth parent's child, and that the purpose of her communicating with the birth parent is to obtain the birth parent's consent to the adoption, which, if granted, will terminate the birth parent's parental rights. We emphasize that when the lawyer who represents the adoptive parent(s) is meeting with an unrepresented birth parent for this purpose, the lawyer may not advise the unrepresented birth parent on any matter. If the birth parent poses a question that requires other than an objective answer (e.g., what happens next, who is the judge assigned to the matter), the adoptive parents' lawyer must limit her response to advising the birth parent that he or she may want to talk with a lawyer and the available options for obtaining one.

---

disclosure [of a confidence or secret otherwise protected by Rule 1.6], a lawyer's duty of loyalty to and the duty to communicate with the non-disclosing client tips the balance in favor of disclosure. Indeed, in light of the disclosing client's consent, there is nothing left on the other side of the balance."

[42] As we noted previously in the discussion of the required disclosures concerning payment of fees by third parties (see notes 22-31 and accompanying text, supra), the substance of the disclosures will vary depending upon the context of the representation, the ages of the prospective clients, and their experience and sophistication in legal matters.

[43] D.C. Rule 1.7, Comment [15].

[44] D.C. Rule 1.7, Comment [16].

[45] D.C. LEO 296, quoting former D.C. Rule 2.2, Comment [2].

[46] Id.

[47] While we have not received similar information regarding birth fathers, we will assume that there is some percentage of them who take the same position. As we noted previously, supra note 13, once a birth parent executes a formal consent to adoption, that person is no longer a "party" to the adoption proceedings and waives notice of future proceedings. Thus, a birth parent who declines the opportunity to consult with counsel prior to formally consenting to the adoption is effectively waiving the right to have legal representation in connection with the adoption.

In the second scenario, in which a lawyer who represents one birth parent is communicating with the other, unrepresented birth parent, if the purpose of the communication is to obtain the consent of the unrepresented birth parent to the adoption, our previous analysis leads to the same result: A lawyer is limited to identifying herself, identifying her client, and stating the reason for the communication. The lawyer may not counsel the unrepresented birth parent on the wisdom of giving consent, may answer questions only of the type described above, and, in response to other questions, must limit her response to advising the birth parent that he or she may want to talk with a lawyer and the available options for obtaining one. If the communication is for any purpose other than obtaining the unrepresented person's consent to the adoption, and if the lawyer has no reason to believe that the birth parents have adverse interests or positions in regard to the adoption, there is arguably greater leeway for the lawyer to conclude that the unrepresented parent's interests do not conflict with those of the lawyer's client. However, the prudent practice is for the lawyer to limit her "advice" to a suggestion that the unrepresented person may wish to obtain counsel.

Separate Representation of Prospective Adoptee

A lawyer who represents a birth parent does not and cannot also represent the prospective adoptee. Because the interests of a birth parent and the prospective adoptee could differ with respect to material matters, for example, the relevance of information pertaining to the suitability of the adoptive parents or another issue that may affect whether the adoption is in the prospective adoptee's best interest, joint representation raises a conflict under Rules 1.7(b)(2), (3) and (4) which, under Rule 1.7(c)(1), would require each client's informed consent before the attorney could undertake the joint representation. When the prospective adoptee is a newborn or very young child, obtaining such informed consent is, of course, a practical impossibility.

Furthermore, when the potential joint representation involves a birth parent and an unrepresented minor adoptee of any age, the inherent uncertainty of whether the prospective adoptee has voluntarily given her informed consent to the joint representation as well as the concerns discussed herein with respect to the joint representation of birth parents,[48] which are particularly acute in this context, make joint representation of a birth parent and a prospective adoptee rarely, if ever, permissible.

Duty of Confidentiality Revisited

A lawyer who represents a birth parent or an adoptive parent may fundamentally disagree with the client on whether certain information potentially relevant to the court's "best interests of the prospective adoptee" mandate should be brought to the court's attention. However, absent a circumstance that gives rise to one of the limited exceptions under Rule 1.6, a lawyer representing a party in an adoption may not apprise the court of information that the lawyer believes is relevant to the court's approval of the petition without first obtaining informed consent from his or her client.

As discussed extensively above, a lawyer has duties of confidentiality under Rule 1.6 that would prohibit a lawyer's voluntary use or revelation of client confidences or secrets except in narrowly defined circumstances.[49] Rule 1.6(b) very broadly defines "confidence" as "information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law," and "secret" as "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client."

As such, if a lawyer becomes aware of information that may cause the lawyer, but not the lawyer's client, to question whether the prospective adoption is "in the best interest of the prospective adoptee," duties of confidentiality will typically foreclose the lawyer's bringing that information to the court, as such information is clearly a client "secret."[50] The lawyer must abide by the client's decision regardless of the lawyer's disagreement. However, in a particularly unpalatable circumstance, a lawyer may seek to withdraw from the representation, but only if that can be done without "material adverse effect on the interests of the client," or if other another independent reason to withdraw exists under Rule 1.16.

Representing a Client in an Adoption Opposite a Former Client from a Previous Adoption

The Committee is informed that lawyers for whom adoption law is a primary or exclusive practice area are sometimes on the opposite side of an adoption proceeding from a former client in a previous adoption that did not involve the lawyer's current client. This situation is governed by Rule 1.9, which states:

> A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent.

"Matters are 'substantially related' for purposes of this D.C. Rule if they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or if there otherwise is a substantial risk that confidential factual information as would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter."[51]

It would be difficult to conceive of an adoption proceeding in which an attorney did not obtain "confidential factual information" about his client; in many instances, there is a substantial risk that such information could "materially advance" the position of the lawyer's new adoption client.[52] Therefore, Rule 1.9 requires informed consent of the former client to the subsequent representation if the interests of the former and the current client are "materially adverse."

Prudence suggests, however, that even when the interests of the former and current clients cannot reasonably be deemed "materially adverse," – that is, for example, both persons are on record independently as in favor the court's granting the adoption petition in the latter proceeding

[48] See notes 31-46 and accompanying text.

[49] See D.C. Rule 1.6 (a).

[50] See note 12, supra, in which the Committee notes its concerns when there is no GAL appointed to represent a prospective adoptee. Presumably, in this circumstance the court engages in particularly close questioning of the agency that has evaluated the suitability of the prospective adoptive parents.

[51] D.C. Rule 1.9, Comment [3] (emphasis added).

[52] For example, a lawyer who previously represented the birth mother may have learned information about personal habits of the former client of which the new client (the adoptive parents) are unaware that could adversely affect the healthy development of the prospective adoptee, and which, if known, could cause the adoptive parents to withdraw the adoption petition. On the other hand, a lawyer who represents a birth parent and has represented the prospective adoptive parents in a previous adoption (or any matter in which she has learned confidential information) may have learned information about that party's financial situation or home life that might be relevant to the new client's assessment of the petitioner's suitability.

– a lawyer will obtain the former client's informed consent before agreeing to represent a person on the other side of the subsequent proceeding.

In Opinion 309, the Committee considered "whether advance waivers of conflicts of interest are permissible and, if so, whether there are requirements for such waivers additional to, or different from, those prescribed by Rules 1.7 and 1.9 for waivers generally." Only one small portion of Opinion 309—a footnote—is relevant to the instant discussion. In the footnote, the Committee was careful to distinguish between a waiver of conflict of interest for purposes of representation and a waiver of confidentiality by the former client:

> Waivers permitting the adverse use or disclosure of confidential information, see D.C. Rule 1.6(c)-(d), may not be implied from waivers of conflicts of interest. Because of their considerable potential for mischief, waivers of confidentiality require particular scrutiny and may be invalid even when granted by sophisticated clients with counsel (in-house or outside) independent of the lawyer seeking the waiver.[53]

Accordingly, a former client's "current" waiver of a representational conflict under Rule 1.9 does not permit a lawyer to disclose or use for the benefit of the current client confidential information obtained about the former client during the former representation. Moreover, as noted in Opinion 309, any separate waiver by the former client of confidentiality under Rule 1.6 would be subject to "particular scrutiny" and might be found to be invalid. Accordingly, it may not be possible for the attorney to obtain an effective waiver of confidentiality from the former client that would permit the attorney to make use of the former client's confidential information to advance the position of the attorney's new adoption client.

If that confidential information were such that the current client would reasonably be entitled to know it under Rule 1.4 and have her lawyer use it in fulfilling the lawyer's obligations of diligence and zeal to the current client under Rule 1.3, the lawyer would need to obtain the current client's informed consent to having the information withheld. But if the lawyer is unable to disclose to the current client the former client's confidential information, the lawyer will likely be unable to obtain the current client's informed consent to the lawyer not using or revealing the information. See Comment [27] to Rule 1.7(b) ("If a lawyer's obligation to one or another client or to others or some other consideration precludes making such full disclosure to all affected parties, that fact alone precludes undertaking the representation at issue."). Accordingly, prudence suggests that a lawyer should be extremely cautious in considering whether to undertake to represent a new client in a private adoption adverse to a former client.[54]

Conclusion

Lawyers engaged in private adoptions must ensure that they adhere to the mandates of the D.C. Rules, specifically those governing conflicts of interest, and that they make sufficient disclosures and explanations to obtain prospective client(s)' informed consent where the rules make that a prerequisite to undertaking a representation.

A lawyer for a birth parent may accept payment of legal fees from the adoptive parent(s) only after disclosing information – including information about any reciprocal referral relationship with the adoptive parents' lawyer – necessary to obtain the informed consent for this arrangement from the lawyer's client. Furthermore, a lawyer who accepts fees from the adoptive parents for representation of a birth parent must ensure that the fee arrangement does not affect her independent judgment in the representation of the client and must not disclose the confidences and secrets of her client without the informed consent of her client.

A lawyer may not represent both birth parents when the lawyer is aware at the outset that they differ in their positions in regard to the proposed adoption; nor may a lawyer engage in such joint representation for the purpose of helping birth parents to resolve any such disagreement. In circumstances in which the birth parents agree that the adoption petition should be granted, a lawyer must consider that there is an inherent tension that arises in a joint representation in fulfilling her obligations under both Rule 1.4 and Rule 1.6; she must explain these obligations and the potential consequences should differences between the clients' respective positions later arise; and she must obtain each client's informed consent to the joint representation.

A lawyer who represents only one birth parent may not give legal advice to the other birth parent. Likewise, a lawyer who represents the adoptive parents and is charged with obtaining the consent to adoption from an unrepresented birth parent may not give legal advice to that birth parent. In both circumstances, if the unrepresented person poses questions to the lawyer, the lawyer should restrict her advice to a recommendation to obtain counsel and the potential mechanisms for accomplishing this.

A lawyer who seeks to obtain a birth parent-client's written consent to the adoption must ensure that the client understands the consequences of such consent, including that it terminates both the client's involvement in the adoption proceedings and the client's parental rights. A lawyer who represents a birth parent does not and cannot jointly represent the prospective adoptee.[55]

Except in rare circumstances where an exception to Rule 1.6 applies, a lawyer must obtain the client's informed consent before disclosing to the court information obtained in the course of the representation that could contribute to the court's deciding that the adoption is not "in the best interests of the prospective adoptee." If the client declines to permit such disclosure, the lawyer must abide by the client's decision.

A lawyer who has represented either a birth parent or an adoptive parent in an adoption proceeding may represent a different, adverse client in a subsequent adoption proceeding involving the former client only if the lawyer obtains the informed consent of the former client to the subsequent representation. Because the waiver of conflicts of interest would not constitute a waiver of the former client's confidentiality protections under Rule 1.6, and considering the potential risks to the lawyer's ability to meet obligations that might arise under Rules 1.3 and 1.4 to the new client, prudence suggests that a lawyer should be extremely cautious in considering whether to undertake to represent a party in a private adoption in which a former client from a previous private adoption is on the other side.

Published January 2014

[53] D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 309 (Advanced Waivers of Conflict of Interest)(2001), note 10 (citations omitted; emphasis added).

[54] A lawyer asked by the court to serve as a GAL for a prospective adoptee in a proceeding involving a former client should be disinclined to accept such an appointment for the same reasons.

[55] As we have observed, because there is no entitlement to legal representation by an adoptee in a private adoption proceeding, it is this Committee's understanding that unless a lawyer or GAL is appointed by the court, there is no one charged specifically with advocating on behalf of the adoptee. In those circumstances, the court's determination about whether the adoption is in the best interests of the child will be based on the home study of the independent agency, and any other evidence that may be introduced.

Opinion 367

Representation of Client by Lawyer Seeking Employment with Entity or Person Adverse to Client, or Adversary's Lawyer; Clarification of Opinion 210

When a lawyer is seeking employment with an entity or person adverse to his client,[1] or with the adversary's lawyer, a conflict of interest may arise under Rule 1.7(b)(4) if the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be, or reasonably may be, adversely affected by the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests (for purposes of this Opinion, a lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests are collectively referred to as a "personal interest conflict"). Both subjective and objective tests must be applied to determine whether a personal interest conflict exists.

There is no "bright line" test for determining the point during the employment process when a personal interest conflict arises, and that point may vary. There are a number of factors to consider in determining whether a personal interest conflict exists, including whether the individual lawyer is materially and actively involved in representing the client and, if so, whether the lawyer's interest in the prospective employer is targeted and specific, and/or has been communicated to, and reciprocated by, the prospective employer.

Where the prospective employer is affiliated with, but separate and distinct from, the entity adverse to the job-seeking lawyer's client, there may be no personal interest conflict in the first instance, because the adversary and the prospective employer may be separate entities for conflicts purposes.

If a personal interest conflict arises, there are three possible courses of action that may be available to the individual lawyer, each of which is subject to applicable requirements of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct: (a) disclosing to the client the existence and nature of the personal interest conflict and the possible adverse consequences of the lawyer's representation of the client and obtaining the client's informed consent to the representation; (b) withdrawing from the representation; or, (c) discontinuing seeking employment with the client's adversary or the adversary's lawyer until all pending matters relating to that potential new employment have been completed.

The personal interest conflict of an individual lawyer in a law firm, nonprofit, or corporate legal department is not imputed to the other lawyers in the law firm, nonprofit, or corporate legal department, so long as the personal interest conflict does not present a significant risk of adversely affecting the representation of the client by such other lawyers. The imputation rule does not apply to a government agency.

A subordinate lawyer who discusses a potential personal interest conflict with his supervisory lawyer, and acts in accordance with the supervisory lawyer's reasonable determination of whether the subordinate lawyer has a personal interest conflict and follows the supervisory lawyer's recommended course of action, will not be held professionally responsible even if it is subsequently determined that the supervisory lawyer's determination of whether there was a personal interest conflict, and/or the recommended course of action, were incorrect under the Rules.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.0(c) – Terminology
- Rule 1.3 – Diligence and Zeal
- Rule 1.4 - Communication
- Rule 1.6 - Confidentiality of Information
- Rule 1.7 - Conflict of Interest: General
- Rule 1.10 - Imputed Disqualification: General Rule
- Rule 1.16 - Declining or Terminating Representation
- Rule 5.1 - Responsibilities of Partners, Managers, and Supervisory Lawyers
- Rule 5.2 - Subordinate Lawyers

Inquiries

The Committee has received numerous inquiries with respect to the ethical requirements applicable to a lawyer seeking employment with an entity or person adverse to his client, or with the adversary's lawyer. Prospective employers may include a law firm, a government agency, a nonprofit, or a corporate legal department. Specifically, these inquiries seek guidance on when a personal interest conflict arises in the employment process and, if a personal interest conflict arises, the courses of action available to the lawyer.

Background

In D.C. Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 210 ("Representation of Criminal Defendants by Attorney Seeking Position as Assistant U.S. Attorney") (1990), the Committee concluded that a lawyer who is primarily employed in criminal defense work against the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia ("USAO-DC") may continue to represent criminal defense clients, and accept new criminal defense clients, while seeking a position with the USAO-DC, only if each of her criminal defense clients consents to the representation notwithstanding the conflict of interest with full disclosure of the possible disadvantages that may result if the lawyer must withdraw to start employment with the USAO-DC.[2] The Opinion concluded that a lawyer should disclose the prospective employment to the client and obtain the client's consent when the lawyer takes the "first active step" in seeking such employment.[3] Opinion 210 states that this "first active step" may occur when the lawyer calls to discuss or inquire about procedures for submitting an application, and certainly occurs when the lawyer submits a resume.[4]

The Committee affirms Opinion 210 on its particular facts. Since Opinion 210 was issued, however, the legal marketplace has become increasingly mobile, with lawyers at every experience level frequently migrating among government agencies, law firms, nonprofits, and corporate legal departments. Concomitantly, the inquiries the Committee has received in the 24 years since Opinion 210 was issued have presented a variety of factual scenarios not contemplated by Opinion 210. Accordingly, the Committee believes

[1] The terms "adverse" and "adversary" are not intended to be limiting. A personal interest conflict could arise even if the prospective employer is not "adverse" in the strict legal sense. In other words, a lawyer seeking employment with a co-plaintiff or co-defendant, or any entity in a similar position in a transactional matter, or with a lawyer representing such co-plaintiff, co-defendant or entity may have a personal interest conflict.

[2] Opinion 210 was decided under DR 5-101(A), whose substance now is contained in Rule 1.7, and DR 7-101(A), whose substance now is contained in Rule 1.3.

[3] The conflict of interest issues discussed in Opinion 210 also raise issues regarding the constitutional right of a defendant to the effective assistance of counsel. Those issues, however, are beyond the scope of this Opinion.

[4] Four members of the Committee concurred in Opinion 210, but emphasized the narrow reach of the Opinion and stated that in other circumstances the lawyer should withhold or delay the employment application altogether until the conflict is removed.

Opinion 210 might be applied in an overly broad manner to factual scenarios that are distinguishable from the scenario presented therein and thus believes that a clarification of Opinion 210 is in order.

Analysis

In clarifying Opinion 210, a number of questions arise:

(1) When does a personal interest conflict arise for an individual lawyer seeking employment with an entity or person adverse to the lawyer's client, or with the adversary's lawyer?

(2) If the prospective employer is affiliated with or related to, but separate and distinct from, the entity adverse to the lawyer's client, is there a personal interest conflict?

(3) If a personal interest conflict arises, what are the lawyer's possible courses of action?

(4) If an individual lawyer has a personal interest conflict, is that personal interest conflict imputed to the other lawyers in his law firm, government agency, nonprofit, or corporate legal department?

(5) What are the ethical duties of a subordinate lawyer and a supervisory lawyer in a law firm, nonprofit, corporate legal department, or government agency when the subordinate lawyer has a potential personal interest conflict?

We emphasize that this Opinion addresses only the potential conflicts that arise during the period of time while the lawyer remains in his current employment and is pursuing possible new employment. Additional considerations need to be addressed to determine whether the individual lawyer may accept the new employment and begin work at the new employer; in some cases the lawyer may be precluded from doing so if the lawyer cannot obtain consents from the affected clients. See, e.g., Rules 1.6, 1.9, 1.10(b), 1.11; Opinions 273, 312.

Discussion

(1) When Does a Personal Interest Conflict Arise During the Employment Process?

Rule 1.7(b)(4) provides that a personal interest conflict arises when:

> "the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interest in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or professional interest." [Emphasis supplied.]

The disjunctive phrase emphasized above suggests that a personal interest conflict arises even if the lawyer's judgment will not be adversely affected, if the lawyer's judgment reasonably may be adversely affected. Comment [11] to Rule 1.7 cites Opinion 210 and states "when a lawyer has discussions concerning possible employment with an opponent of the lawyer's client, or with a law firm representing the opponent, such discussion could[5] adversely affect the lawyer's representation of the client." [Emphasis supplied.]

There are two tests under Rule 1.7(b)(4) for determining whether the lawyer's professional judgment might reasonably be adversely affected in the context of a lawyer's seeking employment with an entity or person adverse to the lawyer's client, or the adversary's lawyer: (a) the lawyer's subjective perception of whether a conflict of interest may exist, and (b) an objective observer's perception of whether a conflict of interest may exist.

(a) Subjective Test

Opinion 210 states that the lawyer's own subjective perception of the relationship between his personal interest and the client's interest determines whether a personal interest conflict exists. The lawyer must ask himself a number of questions. Would he be tempted to "pull punches" in representing the client to enhance his prospects with, or at least not jeopardize his chances with, the prospective employer? Would the lawyer's actions in the matter have an impact on the prospective employer's decision to hire him? Would the outcome of the matter have an effect on any compensation or other benefits the lawyer would receive from the prospective employer? The lawyer might ask himself these and any number of other questions, depending upon the facts of the particular search for employment. If the answer to any of these questions is "yes," the lawyer's subjective determination that his professional judgment on behalf of the client will be, or reasonably may be, adversely affected, gives rise to a personal interest conflict.

(b) Objective Test

In addition to the subjective test, Rule 1.7(b)(4) contains an objective test: whether the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client "reasonably may be adversely affected" by the lawyer's personal interest. Comment [7] to Rule 1.7 provides that, even if the lawyer believes that the representation can be wholeheartedly and zealously undertaken, if an objective observer would have reasonable doubt on that issue, the client has a right to disclosure of all relevant considerations and the opportunity to be the judge of its own interests. The underlying premise is that if there is reason to doubt the lawyer's ability to provide the client with wholehearted and zealous representation, the lawyer must disclose the possible conflict to his client and obtain the client's informed consent to the lawyer's representation notwithstanding the conflict of interest. Thus, even if the lawyer determines that his own personal interests in obtaining employment will not impair his zealous representation of the client, if an objective observer reasonably would doubt that determination, then the lawyer must disclose the possible conflict to the client [Opinion 210] and obtain the client's consent to the continued representation notwithstanding the personal interest conflict.

(c) Existence of Personal Interest Conflict

Whether a personal interest conflict exists typically will depend upon the specific facts. A lawyer may be actively involved in a matter and interact regularly with the adversary or the adversary's lawyer, or the lawyer may work behind the scenes and have no contact with the adversary or the adversary's lawyer. A lawyer may make cold calls to multiple prospective employers, or blanket multiple prospective employers with form letters and resumes, without a specific target in mind. The lawyer may consult a legal recruiting firm that takes similar action. These prospective employers may or may not include an entity adverse to the lawyer's client, or the adversary's lawyer. The prospective employers, including the adverse entity or its lawyer, may or may not respond, or may respond that they are not interested in pursuing employment with the lawyer. Conversely, a prospective employer, including the adverse entity or its lawyer, may seek out the lawyer, and the lawyer may or may not respond, or may respond that he is not interested in pursuing employment with the prospective employer. The lawyer's resume may be sent to government agencies, corporate legal departments, or non-profits that are affiliated with, but separate and distinct from, the client's adversary.

[5] We reject the view that any step towards changing employment by a lawyer ipso facto adversely affects the client. For example, simply contemplating alternative employment would not constitute a personal interest conflict.

Accordingly, the Committee believes that a nuanced test for determining the existence of a personal interest conflict is appropriate. Although we appreciate the desirability of a "bright line" test for determining the existence of a personal interest conflict, no such test can adequately accommodate all of the scenarios that might arise. The key question is whether the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be, or reasonably may be, adversely affected. We set forth below two criteria to consider in determining whether a personal interest conflict exists when a lawyer is seeking employment with an entity or person adverse to his client, or the adversary's lawyer. If the first criterion (material and active role in representing the client) is met, then the lawyer should consider the second criterion (targeted, communicated and reciprocated interest) as well.

(i) The Lawyer's Role in Representing the Client

The first criterion in determining whether a lawyer has a personal interest conflict in seeking employment with an entity or person adverse to his client, or the adversary's lawyer, is whether the lawyer has a material and active role in representing the client.

Factors to consider in determining whether the lawyer has a "material" role in the matter include whether the lawyer has contact with the client regarding the matter, has contact with the adversary or the adversary's lawyer in the course of representing the client in the matter, and/or is working on the substance of the matter. If none of these factors is present, the lawyer's role in the matter would likely not be material, and his professional judgment on behalf of the client would likely not be adversely affected such that a personal interest conflict would arise. In that case, the lawyer would not have to consider the extent to which his interest in the adversary or the adversary's lawyer is targeted, communicated and/or reciprocated under (ii), below, because his non-material role in the matter would not give rise to a personal interest conflict.

If any of these factors is present, the lawyer's role in the matter would likely be material, and his professional judgment on behalf of the client would likely be adversely affected such that a personal interest conflict likely would arise, if the lawyer continues to have an active role in the matter. In that case, the lawyer would have to consider the extent to which his interest in the adversary or the adversary's lawyer is targeted, communicated and/or reciprocated under (ii), below, because his material role in the matter likely would give rise to a personal interest conflict.

For purposes of this analysis, a lawyer should generally be considered to have an active role in a matter if the matter remains pending and the lawyer is either currently working on the matter or expects to be undertaking work on the matter in the future. If a matter has concluded and has been closed by the firm with notice to the client, then no firm lawyer who worked on the matter would be considered to have an active role at that time. In addition, a lawyer who worked on a discrete part of a matter that remains pending, but whose work is concluded with no expectation of future work on the matter, would no longer be considered to have an active role. For example, the lawyer may have had a limited role in one part of a transaction, which part is now concluded, although other lawyers in the firm are continuing to represent the client in other parts of the transaction.

On the other hand, if a pending matter is currently dormant, a lawyer who expects to work on the matter when action is required in the future would likely be considered to have an active role in the matter. For example, a case may have been fully litigated and awaiting the decision of the trial court; although there is no current action to be taken in the matter, a lawyer would nonetheless likely be considered to have a current active role in the case if the lawyer expects to be involved in action to be taken in the future, such as a possible appeal of the court's decision. Under such circumstances, in our view the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client could be, both subjectively and objectively judged,[6] adversely affected by the pursuit of employment with an adversary or the adversary's counsel. This is particularly so where the lawyer has no control over the timing of events (such as a trial court decision) that may require the lawyer's immediate attention when they occur.

In that regard, we differ with Formal Opinion 96-400 (1996) ("Job Negotiations with Adverse Firm or Party") ("ABA Opinion 96-400"),[7] in which the American Bar Association Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility (the "ABA Committee") considered the nature and extent of the lawyer's role in representing the client. The ABA Committee concluded that if a case has been fully litigated, and the lawyer is just awaiting the decision of the appellate court and presently has no action to take or consider, there would be no personal interest conflict unless and until a point comes when the lawyer should consider some further action on the client's behalf. We depart from ABA Opinion 96-400 in concluding that a lawyer's involvement in a pending but currently dormant matter may give rise to a personal interest conflict. Again, the situations in which a lawyer may have a personal interest conflict in seeking employment with an adversary or an adversary's lawyer are not amenable to a "bright line" test.

(ii) Extent to which Lawyer's Interest in Adversary or Adversary's Lawyer is Targeted, Communicated and/or Reciprocated

Assuming a lawyer has a material and active role in a matter, the second criterion in determining whether a lawyer has a personal interest conflict in seeking employment with an entity or person adverse to his client, or the adversary's lawyer, is the extent to which the lawyer's interest in the prospective employer is targeted, communicated and/or reciprocated. See ABA Opinion 96-400 (opining that one of the factors in determining whether a personal interest conflict exists is the extent to which the lawyer's interest in the prospective employer is concrete, and has been communicated and reciprocated).

In Formal Opinion 1991-1 (1991) ("Refusing Employment When the Interests of the Lawyer may Impair Independent Professional Judgment") ("NYCBA

[6] We reiterate that both the subjective and objective tests under Rule 1.7(b)(4) discussed above apply to these determinations.

[7] In its July 2011 newsletter, the ABA noted that ABA Opinion 96-400 was issued prior to the 2002 amendments to the Model Rules, including Rule 1.7 and Rule 1.10. Comment [10] to Model Rule 1.7, one of the 2002 amendments, is in effect a codification of ABA Opinion 96-400.

Opinion 1991-1") the New York City Bar Association Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics (the "NYCBA Committee") focused on these criteria in considering when a personal interest conflict exists when a lawyer is seeking employment with an entity or person adverse to his client or the adversary's lawyer. The NYCBA Committee concluded that this would occur — > in any case no later than when an offer of conflicting employment is extended to the lawyer, which offer is not promptly declined. Therefore, disclosure would always be necessary at least where an offer of future employment is outstanding and being considered (or has been accepted). This rule, however, is not sufficient. Although disclosure at the point an offer is extended would protect against certain of the types of conflicts identified above, it is not sufficient as to others. In particular, it does not deal at all with the potential conflicting influences that may arise in connection with the process of securing the offer of employment. Therefore, the Committee notes that, in many cases, the disclosure obligations may arise as soon as the lawyer either (i) has taken clear affirmative steps to seek to obtain specific conflicting employment (e.g., applied for such a position) or (ii) is seriously considering the pursuit of such employment in response to some expression of interest by the potential employer.

The NYCBA Committee was not prepared, however, to opine that in all cases a personal interest conflict would arise at these earlier identified points in the process. Neither is this Committee.

In our view, a personal interest conflict may arise at various points during the employment process. Assuming a lawyer has a material and active role in a matter, a personal interest conflict may arise when the lawyer's interest in the prospective employer, both subjectively and objectively judged,[8] is targeted and specific, and has been communicated to the prospective employer, such as when a lawyer sends a targeted resume directly to an entity or person adverse to his client or the adversary's lawyer.[9] In another situation, where a lawyer sends blanket form letters and resumes to multiple potential employers, a personal interest may not arise until a potential employer expresses specific interest in the lawyer. If in response to such blanket form letters and resumes, the employer sends a non-targeted and general response (e.g., a notification that the application has been received and nothing more), a personal interest conflict may not arise at that time. Assuming a lawyer has a material and active role in a matter, a personal interest conflict arises if the lawyer participates in substantive discussion of his experience, clients, or business potential, or the terms of employment, with the prospective employer. A personal interest conflict is clearly present where there is an outstanding offer of employment that the lawyer is considering or has accepted.

At bottom, the lawyer must examine each situation carefully to determine whether, given all of the facts subjectively and objectively judged, the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by his interest in potential employment with the adversary or the adversary's lawyer.

(iii) Opinion 210

Opinion 210 provides an example of how an application of these criteria could give rise to a personal interest conflict. The attorney who submitted the inquiry in Opinion 210 was a sole practitioner who primarily represented criminal defendants in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia against the USAO-DC and was applying to the USAO-DC for employment. As a sole practitioner she would have had primary responsibility for all of her cases and would have had direct personal interactions with the lawyers in the Office to which she was applying. Therefore, submitting a resume was sufficient to give rise to a personal interest conflict. This is quite different from an employment search where a transactional lawyer who is not materially and actively involved in a transaction submits broadcast resumes to many potential employers, who happen to include an adversary in a transaction, or that adversary's counsel.

(2) Prospective Employer Affiliated with, or Related to, but Separate and Distinct from, Entity or Person Adverse to the Lawyer's Client

If a lawyer is seeking employment with a nonprofit, corporate legal department, or government agency, that entity may be affiliated with, but separate and distinct from, the entity that is adverse to his client. For example, a nonprofit or corporation may be a subsidiary or affiliate of a parent corporation, but the subsidiary or affiliate may not be wholly owned by the parent, the two companies may have separate legal departments, and the two companies may have separate officers, directors, offices, and business activities. A government agency may have separate bureaus, offices, or components all within the same agency. The two entities may conduct separate hiring processes.

More specifically, Rule 1.6(k) provides that the client of a government lawyer is the agency that employs the lawyer, unless expressly provided to the contrary by appropriate law, regulation, or order. Comment [38] to Rule 1.6 provides that the term "agency" includes, inter alia, executive and independent departments and agencies, special commissions, committees of the legislature, agencies of the legislative branch such as the Government Accountability Office, and the courts to the extent that they employ lawyers (e.g., staff counsel) to counsel them. The employing agency has been designated the "client" under this Rule to provide a commonly understood and easily determinable point for identifying the government "client." Thus, to determine when a personal interest conflict may arise in seeking employment with a government entity it is necessary to examine a government agency's particular rules, regulations, and orders.

If the employer is separate and distinct, the lawyer would likely not have a personal interest conflict in seeking employment unless the lawyer believes he could not provide competent and diligent representation to the affected client. For example, in Opinion 210 we considered whether a lawyer could continue to seek and accept new clients whom the District of Columbia Corporation Counsel's Office[10] was prosecuting while her application for employment with the USAO-DC was pending. We concluded that this question did not present a situation in which there is or may be a conflict of interest between the lawyer's interests and her client's interests. The lawyer could not reasonably be concerned about jeopardizing her employment prospects with the USAO-DC's Office, which is part of the Department of Justice, a federal Executive Branch agency, while zealously defending a criminal client prosecuted by the District of Columbia Corporation Counsel's Office, a District of Columbia agency. Therefore, DR 5-101, the predecessor to Rule 1.7(b)(4), did not apply. Although a client in a criminal matter may prefer that his lawyer be completely "defense oriented" and not consider becoming a prosecutor with any employer while defending him, this preference does not mean that a personal interest conflict exists.

[8] We reiterate that both the subjective and objective tests under Rule 1.7(b)(4) discussed above apply to these determinations.

[9] Because there is no "bright line" test, there conceivably may be factual scenarios where a personal interest conflict could exist without the lawyer communicating his interest in employment to the prospective employer.

[10] This office is now the District of Columbia Office of the Attorney General.

As discussed below, there may be factual scenarios, however, where there might be a personal interest conflict even if the prospective employer is separate and distinct from the client's adversary.

(a) District of Columbia Government Agencies

In D.C. Bar Opinion 268 (1996) ("Conflict of Interest Where Private Lawyers Provide Volunteer Legal Assistance to the D.C. Corporation Counsel; Reconsideration of Opinion 92"), the Committee concluded that a lawyer may give volunteer legal assistance to the D.C. Corporation counsel and simultaneously continue to represent private clients against the City and its agencies. We recognized that the City government client is not always the City as a whole, but may be more narrowly defined as one of the City's constituent agencies. Therefore, a personal interest conflict does not arise where the lawyer is not opposing his own City government client, but some other agency of the City. Although Opinion 268 did not address the issue of a lawyer seeking employment with a City agency that is adverse to his client, it provides some guidance concerning when a lawyer may have a personal interest conflict in seeking employment with the D.C. government. If the lawyer is litigating against one agency of the D.C. government, but applies to another section of the D.C. government, he may not have a personal interest conflict because the agency and the other section are not the same adversary for conflict of interest purposes.

(b) Federal Government Agencies

Federal statutory and regulatory provisions that apply to lawyers (among others) who are employed by federal agencies may provide some guidance as to when a federal government entity with which a lawyer is seeking employment may be considered to be separate and distinct from another such entity that is adverse to the lawyer's client in a pending matter. Although the Committee does not opine on legal matters, these federal statutes and regulations may assist lawyers in determining whether they have a personal interest conflict when seeking employment with the federal government.[11]

18 U.S.C. § 207 contains the seven federal statutory restrictions that may limit lawyers' activities after they leave federal government service (or after they leave certain senior positions in the federal government). The U.S. Office of Government Ethics ("OGE") has published guidance, at 5 C.F.R. pt. 2641, concerning all seven of the restrictions in § 207, as well as all the exceptions in the statute. 5 C.F.R. § 2641.302, entitled "Separate Agency Components," provides that, for purposes of 18 U.S.C. § 207(c) only (senior employees), the Director of OGE may designate agency "components" that are distinct and separate from the "parent" agency and from each other. Absent such designation, the representational bar of § 207(c) extends to the whole of the agency in which the senior employee served. The list of designated components is published and periodically updated.[12]

Although these statutory and regulatory provisions do not apply to lawyers seeking federal government employment, they may provide some guidance concerning when a lawyer may have a personal interest conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4) in seeking employment with a particular federal government agency or component thereof. The lawyer seeking employment with a federal government agency may consider whether one component of a federal government agency is expressly designated by OGE as separate from another component of that federal government agency, and, even if it is not so designated, may consider as guidance the enumerated criteria in determining whether he may have a personal interest conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4). If the different components of the federal government agency are separate and distinct entities under the statutes and regulations for conflict of interest purposes, the lawyer may not have a personal interest conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4).

(c) Corporate or Nonprofit Legal Department

With respect to corporate or nonprofit clients, Comment [21] to Rule 1.7 recognizes the presumption that the lawyer who represents a corporation, partnership, trade association, or other organization-type client is deemed to represent the specific entity and not its subsidiaries, affiliates, or "other constituents."[13]

Thus, when a lawyer seeks employment with the legal department of a corporation that is a subsidiary or an affiliate of a corporation that is adverse to his client, and the adverse corporation has its own separate legal department and is otherwise separate from the subsidiary or affiliate, as a general rule, and absent other circumstances, the two entities usually would not be considered the same entity for conflicts purposes, and the lawyer likely would not have a personal interest conflict in seeking employment with a subsidiary or affiliate of a corporation that is adverse to the lawyer's client. This conclusion is consistent with Opinion 268 and Opinion 210 because the lawyer's client is not adverse to his prospective employer, but to a separate and distinct subsidiary or affiliate of his prospective employer.

(3) Three Possible Courses of Action to Resolve a Personal Interest Conflict

There are three possible courses of action available to a lawyer with a per-

[11] Moreover, a federal government lawyer seeking employment with a person or entity adverse to the federal government, or the adversary's lawyer, is subject to conflict of interest provisions under federal statutes and regulations (e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 207, 208 and 5 C.F.R. pt. 2635, Subpart F) in addition to Rule 1.7(b)(4). As noted, the Committee does not opine on legal matters. Accordingly, the applicability of, and compliance with, these federal statutes and regulations are beyond the scope of this Opinion. Government lawyers seeking new employment, however, are alerted to the fact that they must consider both sets of conflict of interest provisions.

[12] 5 C.F.R. § 2641.302 sets forth the following criteria for designating an agency component to be "separate": (1) the component is created by statute or a statutory reference indicating that it exercises functions which are distinct and separate; (2) the component exercises distinct and separate subject matter or geographical jurisdiction; (3) the degree of supervision exercised by the parent over the component is minimal; (4) the component exercises responsibilities that cut across organizational lines within the parent; (5) the size of the component in absolute terms is significant; and (6) the size of the component in relation to other agencies or bureaus within the parent is significant.

[13] This presumption can be rebutted under Comment [23] if the organizational affiliates are deemed to be "alter egos" by analyzing a number of factors. For example, if the affiliates have a unified corporate legal department, they may be considered the same entity for conflicts purposes. For purposes of this Opinion, we assume that the presumption is not rebutted.

sonal interest conflict: (a) disclosing to the client the existence and nature of the personal interest conflict and the possible adverse consequences of the lawyer's representation of the client and obtaining the client's informed consent to the representation notwithstanding the personal interest conflict under Rule 1.7(c)(1), provided Rule 1.7(c)(2) permits this course of action; (b) withdrawing from the representation under Rule 1.16(a) or Rule 1.16(b), if applicable; or, (c) discontinuing seeking employment with the client's adversary or the adversary's lawyer until all pending matters relating to that potential new employment have been completed.

(a) Disclosure of Personal Interest Conflict to Client and Client Consent to Representation

Rule 1.7(c)(1) allows a lawyer who has a personal interest conflict arising out of his seeking employment with an entity or person adverse to his client, or with the adversary's lawyer, to represent the client notwithstanding the personal interest conflict if the client provides informed consent to such continued representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation.

However, as is the case with Rule 1.7(b)(4), Rule 1.7(c)(2) applies both a subjective test and an objective test before the personal interest conflict can be waived: "the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client." Thus, disclosing the conflict to the client and obtaining the client's consent are not options under Rule 1.7(c)(1) unless, both subjectively and objectively judged, the lawyer can provide competent and diligent representation to the client notwithstanding the personal interest conflict.[14]

If the lawyer already has been representing the client while operating under a personal interest conflict because he is seeking prospective employment with a person or entity adverse to his client, or the adversary's lawyer, he may ask the client for retroactive consent to his representation under Rule 1.7(c) notwithstanding his personal interest conflict.[15]

Although Rule 1.7(c)(1) does not require that the client's consent be memorialized in writing, it would be prudent to obtain either current or retroactive consent in writing from the client.

(b) Withdrawal from Representation of Client

In some circumstances, the individual lawyer may resolve a personal interest conflict by withdrawing from the representation of the client under Rule 1.16(a)(1), which requires a lawyer to withdraw from representation of the client if the representation will result in a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Alternatively, even if the Rules of Professional Conduct would not be violated, withdrawal could be made under Rule 1.16(b) if withdrawal can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the interests of the client.[16]

If the rules of the cognizant tribunal so require, under Rule 1.16(c), the lawyer must obtain the permission of the tribunal to withdraw and, if ordered by the tribunal, must continue the representation notwithstanding good cause for withdrawal.

(c) Discontinuation of the Prospective Employment Process

The third course of action is discontinuing seeking employment with the client's adversary or the adversary's lawyer until all pending matters relating to that potential new employment have been completed. Even after he stops seeking this potential new employment, the lawyer still will need to consider whether the lawyer has an ongoing interest in pursuing such employment in the future that is of such a nature that it will, or reasonably may, adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client.

(4) Imputation of Personal Interest Conflict

D.C. Rule 1.10(a)(1) provides that an individual lawyer's conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(4) is not imputed to other lawyers in his current "firm" if that personal interest conflict does not present a significant risk of adversely affecting the representation of the client by the remaining lawyers in the firm.[17] Accordingly, a personal interest conflict of a lawyer in a firm who is seeking employment with an entity that is adverse to one of the firm's clients, or the adversary's lawyer, is not imputed to other lawyers in the firm, assuming his personal interest conflict will not adversely affect the representation of the client by the other lawyers in the firm.

For purposes of imputation of conflicts, Rule 1.0(c) and Rule 1.10 define the term "firm" to include law firms, nonprofits, and corporate legal departments, but not government agencies. Thus, even in those limited situations where a Rule 1.7(b)(4) personal interest conflict may be imputable to a "firm," there would be no such imputation if the conflict involves a lawyer employed by a government agency.

(5) Duties of Subordinate and Supervisory Lawyers When Subordinate Has a Personal Interest Conflict

(a) Subordinate Lawyer

If the lawyer seeking employment with an entity or person adverse to his client, or the adversary's lawyer, is a "subordinate lawyer" within the meaning of Rule 5.2(b), and is supervised by a "supervisory lawyer" within the meaning of Rule 5.1 (see below), the supervisory lawyer may attempt to determine whether the subordinate lawyer has a personal interest conflict and, if so, what the appropriate course of action is for the subordinate [14] In addition to the requirements of Rule 1.7(c)(2), a lawyer considering this issue should examine his obligations under Rule 1.3(a) (Diligence and Zeal) and Rule 1.4(a) (Communication) and Comment [5] under the Scope section of the Rules. Ultimately, however, the rule of interpretation expressed in Comment [5] and Rule 1.3 and Rule 1.4 do not supplant, amend, enlarge or extend the requirements of Rule 1.7(c)(2).

[15] See, e.g., Interstate Properties v. Pyramid Company of Utica, 547 F. Supp. 178 (S.D.N.Y 1982); In re Evans, 902 A.2d 56 (D.C. 2006); Griva v. Davidson, 637 A.2d 830 (D.C. 1994); Jesse v. Danforth, 486 N.W.2d 63 (Wis. 1992). As a general proposition, the Restatement (2d) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 21(4) states: "A client may ratify an act of a lawyer that was not previously authorized."

[16] If the lawyer withdraws from the representation, he must comply with the requirements of Rule 1.16(d) to protect the client's interests. After withdrawal, he must also consider his ethical duties under Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information), Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest; Former Client) and Rule 1.11 (Successive Government and Private or Other Employment).

[17] Comment [8] to D.C. Rule 1.10 differs from its ABA Model Rule 1.10 counterpart (comment [3] to ABA Model Rule 1.10) in that the D.C. Comment [8] expressly states (referring to Opinion 210), "nor would representation by the firm be precluded merely because one of its lawyers is seeking possible employment with an opponent (e.g. U.S. Attorney's Office) or with a law firm representing the opponent of a firm client." There is no similar language in its ABA Model Rule 1.10 counterpart (comment [3] to ABA Model Rule 1.10).

lawyer. Under Rule 5.2(a), generally a lawyer violates the Rules of Professional Conduct even if he acts at the direction of another person. However, under Rule 5.2(b), a subordinate lawyer is not responsible for a violation of Rule 1.7(b)(4) if he acts in accordance with a supervisory lawyer's reasonable resolution of an arguable question of professional duty. Accordingly, if a subordinate lawyer discusses a potential personal interest conflict with his supervisory lawyer, and acts in accordance with the supervisory lawyer's reasonable determination of whether the subordinate lawyer has a personal interest conflict and follows the supervisory lawyer's recommended course of action, the subordinate lawyer will not be held professionally responsible even if it is subsequently determined that the supervisory lawyer's determination of whether there was a personal interest conflict, and/or the recommended course of action, were incorrect under the Rules.

(b) Supervisory Lawyer

Rule 5.1(a) provides that a partner in a "firm" or "law firm," and a lawyer who individually or together with other lawyers possesses comparable managerial authority in a law firm or government agency, shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the firm or government agency has in effect measures providing reasonable assurance that all lawyers in the firm or government agency conform to the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Rule 5.1(b) provides that a lawyer having direct supervisory authority over another lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the other lawyer conforms to the Rules of Professional Conduct. Comment [1] to Rule 5.1 states that both Rule 5.1(a) and Rule 5.1(b) apply to members of a law firm, lawyers having comparable managerial authority in a nonprofit, corporate legal department, or government agency, and to lawyers who have intermediate managerial responsibilities in those entities.

Rule 5.1(c)(2) sets forth general principles for the imputation to a supervisory lawyer of liability for a subordinate lawyer's violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct. If the supervisory lawyer knows or reasonably should know of the violation at a time when its consequences can be avoided or mitigated but fails to take reasonable remedial action, the subordinate lawyer's violation is imputed to the supervisory lawyer. Thus, if the supervisory lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the subordinate lawyer has a personal interest conflict and fails to take appropriate action, the supervisory lawyer may be responsible for the subordinate lawyer's violation of Rule 1.7(b)(4).

A supervisory lawyer may take a variety of actions where a subordinate lawyer is seeking employment with an adversary or an adversary's lawyer. Depending upon the facts, a supervisory lawyer might reasonably determine that there is a personal interest conflict and disclose the subordinate lawyer's prospective employment to the client and seek the client's consent to the subordinate lawyer's continued representation of the client notwithstanding the personal interest conflict. A supervisory lawyer might choose to relieve the subordinate lawyer of any responsibility for working on that client's matter and have other lawyers in the law firm, nonprofit, corporate legal department, or government agency continue to represent the client.[18] Under a different set of facts, a supervisory lawyer might reasonably determine that the subordinate lawyer does not have a personal interest conflict, and thus the supervisory lawyer would not be required to disclose the subordinate lawyer's prospective employment to the client and obtain the client's consent. The supervisory lawyer, nevertheless, may still decide to relieve the subordinate lawyer of any responsibility for working on that client's matter to avoid the possibility that the subordinate lawyer's role in the matter will develop into one that would give rise to a personal interest conflict.

Conclusion

When a lawyer is seeking employment with a person or entity adverse to his client, or the adversary's lawyer, the existence of a personal interest conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4) is not susceptible to a "bright line" test. The lawyer must determine, using both subjective and objective tests, whether the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will, or reasonably may, be adversely affected. Factors to consider include whether the lawyer is materially and actively involved in representing the client and, if so, whether the lawyer's interest in the prospective employer is targeted and specific and/or whether the prospective employer has reciprocated the lawyer's interest. If the lawyer has a personal interest conflict there are three courses of action that may be available, each of which is subject to the applicable requirements of the Rules: disclosing the personal interest conflict and obtaining the client's consent to continued representation; withdrawing from the representation, if possible; or, discontinuing seeking employment with the client's adversary or the adversary's lawyer until all pending matters relating to that potential new employment have been completed.

[18] The Committee recognizes the difficult position created for the subordinate lawyer who has a personal interest conflict and is faced with the choice of informing the supervisory lawyer of possible alternative employment, and risking negative internal consequences with the current employer, or improperly not disclosing the personal interest conflict. The Committee is sensitive to the difficult position created for the subordinate lawyer by this decision but is unable to propose a "safe harbor" for the subordinate lawyer. The Rules of Professional Conduct Review Committee is alerted to the need to consider a viable means for subordinate lawyers to address the personal interest conflict issue without jeopardizing continued satisfactory employment with the current employer.

Published July 2014

Opinion 368

Lawyer Employment Agreements—Restrictions on Departing Lawyer Who Competes with Former Firm

A law firm may not provide for or impose liquidated damages on a lawyer who, after departure, competes with the firm. A firm and a departing lawyer may have liability to one another, though, for work done before the lawyer's departure. Also, a firm may not restrict a departed lawyer's subsequent professional association or affiliation with partners or employees of the firm, except insofar as such activity is subject to legal limitations outside the Rules of Professional Conduct. Whether a choice of law provision in a partnership or employment agreement can avoid application of the D.C. Rule governing lawyer departures usually will depend on the location where the departing lawyer principally practiced.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 5.6(a) - Restrictions on Right to Practice
- Rule 8.5(b)(2) – Disciplinary Authority; Choice of Law
- Rule 8.4 - Misconduct

Inquiry

The committee has received a number of inquiries along the following lines and has concluded that a discussion of these issues will be of interest to the Bar.

1. Whether a law firm may provide for or impose liquidated damages on a lawyer who, after departure, competes with the firm.
2. Whether a law firm may provide for or impose a financial penalty on a departing lawyer who associates professionally with anyone who was a partner or employee (lawyer or non-lawyer) at the firm.
3. Whether, where at least one lawyer at a law firm is admitted to practice in both the District of Columbia and another jurisdiction, the firm may insert a choice of law provision in a partnership, employment, or other agreement in order to avoid applying Rule 5.6(a) of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct in favor of a rule of the other jurisdiction that addresses the same subject matter but yields a different result.

Analysis

For the reasons set out below, the committee answers the first two inquiries in the negative. Our answer to the third inquiry is somewhat more complex.

The D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules") provide:

> "A lawyer shall not participate in offering or making:
>
> (a) A partnership, shareholders, operating, employment, or other similar type of agreement that restricts the rights of a lawyer to practice after termination of the relationship, except an agreement concerning benefits upon retirement."[1]

D.C. Rule 5.6.[2]

Because they limit a client's freedom in choosing a lawyer and a lawyer's professional autonomy, provisions in partnership, employment, and other agreements that expressly or impliedly restrict a lawyer's practice are prohibited. Neuman v. Akman, 715 A.2d 127, 130-31 (D.C. 1998) (citing D.C. Rule 5.6, cmt. [1]); accord Cohen v. Lord, Day & Lord, 550 N.E.2d 410, 411 (N.Y. 1989);[3] Stevens v. Rooks Pitts and Poust, 682 N.E.2d 1125, 1132 (Ill. App. 1997);[4] D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 325 (2004); D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 241 (1993); D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 122 (1983).[5] The prohibition extends not only to absolute bars upon competition with the former firm but also, at least in some circumstances, to "[r]estrictions . . . that impose a substantial financial penalty on a lawyer who competes after leaving the firm." D.C. Rule 5.6 cmt. [2];[6] accord Cohen, 550 N.E.2d at 411; Stevens, 682 N.E.2d 1125; D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 325 (2004); D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 241 (1993); D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 194 (1988); D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 65 (1979).[7]

Liquidated damages

The first inquiry addresses whether a law firm may provide for or impose liquidated damages on a lawyer who, after departure, competes with that firm. Liquidated damages, unlike actual damages, are fixed in advance of a breach rather than afterward. They are viewed by the D.C. Court of Appeals "with a gimlet eye" and will be sustained only if "'not . . . disproportionate to the level of [actual] damages reasonably foreseeable at the time of the making of the contract.'"[8] District Cablevision Limited Partnership v. Bassin, 828 A.2d 714, 723 (D.C. 2003) (quoting Council v. Hogan, 566 A.2d 1070, 1092 (D.C. 1989)); accord Ashcraft & Gerel v. Coady, 244 F.3d 948, 954-55 (D.C. Cir. 2001).[9] Moreover—> when a contract specifies a single sum in damages for any and all breaches even though it is apparent that all are not of the same gravity, the specification is not a reasonable effort to estimate damages; and when in addition the fixed sum greatly exceeds the actual damages likely to be inflicted by a minor breach, its character as [an impermissible] penalty becomes unmistakable.

District Cablevision, 828 A.2d at 723 (quoting Lake River Corp. v. Carborundum Co., 769 F.2d 1284, 1290 (7th Cir. 1985)); accord Jacob v. Norris, McLaughlin & Marcus, 607 A.2d 142, 151 (N.J. 1992); cf. Ashcraft & Gerel, 244 F.3d at 955 (upholding liquidated damages clause where amount was not fixed but increased over time to reflect lawyer's increasing value to law firm).

As we read D.C. Rule 5.6(a), Neuman and other case law, and our own previous opinions, a departing lawyer may not be subjected to liquidated damages because she subsequently competes with her former firm. She and the firm may be responsible to one another for the value of work completed before she leaves the firm. See D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 194 (1988) (disapproving agreement that deprived departing lawyer of part of unrealized accounts if lawyer competed within 12 months). This applies notably in the case of contingent fee cases. Compensation for such matters might not be received or even owed until long after her departure, and a portion of that compensation might be attributable to work done at the former firm prior to her departure. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 221 (1991); accord In re Thelen LLP, 20 N.E.3d 264, 271 (N.Y. 2014) (stating that former firm is enti-

[1] This opinion does not address the rule's exception for "benefits upon retirement."

[2] This rule, promulgated in 1991, is substantively indistinguishable from DR 2-108(A) of the former D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility. See Neuman, 715 A.2d at 130 n. 5.

[3] Although Cohen was decided under New York law, the New York rule is similar to ours and the D.C. Court of Appeals has characterized Cohen as "perhaps the leading case interpreting Rule 5.6(a) or its equivalent." Neuman, 715 A.2d at 132.

[4] Stevens applied Illinois law. The D.C. Court of Appeals noted in Neuman, however, that given the similarity of D.C. Rule 5.6 to Model Rule 5.6 and analogous rules of other jurisdictions, it had "freely consulted the various sources we have found that construe those codes." Neuman, 715 A.2d at 130 n. 5. For this reason, it is appropriate to take note of decisions elsewhere that interpret similar rules.

5 D.C. Legal Ethics Opinions 1 through 209 were issued under the former D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility. Because the prohibition in D.C. Rule 5.6(a) substantively is the same as former D.C. DR 2-108(A), see note 2, supra, and none of this committee's earlier opinions interpreting DR 2-108(A) has been expressly or impliedly overruled, we consider those opinions as well as those decided under the D.C. Rules.

[6] Comment 2, which was added to the D.C. Rules in 2006, does not have a counterpart in the comments to Model Rule 5.6. The D.C. Rules define "substantial" as denoting "a material matter of clear and weighty importance." D.C. Rule 1.0(m).

[7] Some jurisdictions permit "reasonable" financial assessments against former partners who compete with the firm if such assessments accurately reflect the reduction in the firm's value due to the departure. E.g., Howard v. Babcock, 863 P.2d 150 (Calif. 1993); Jacob v. Norris, McLaughlin & Marcus, 607 A.2d 142, 151-52 (N.J. 1992). This is distinctly the minority rule, however. Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 13 rptr. n. b. (2000); Ellen J. Bennett, Elizabeth J. Cohen & Martin Whittaker, Annotated Model Rules of Professional Conduct 489 (7th ed. 2011).

[8] This committee does not opine on legal questions outside the D.C. Rules but often must discuss its understanding of such issues in order to provide context for its views on the D.C. Rules.

[9] In a different context, the sales article of the D.C. Commercial Code permits liquidated damages "only at an amount which is reasonable in the light of the anticipated or actual harm caused by the breach, the difficulties of proof of loss, and the inconvenience or nonfeasibility of otherwise obtaining an adequate remedy. A term fixing unreasonably large liquidated damages is void as a penalty." D.C. Code § 28:2-718 (2014).

tled to an accounting for value of contingent fee case as of the lawyer's departure date). A 1990 D.C. Court of Appeals decision held that contingent fee matters are part of the partnership property. Beckman v. Farmer, 579 A.2d 618 (D.C. 1990). Farmer was a law firm dissolution matter that did not involve a penalty for post-departure competition, so the opinion did not discuss the penalty-for-competition issue. Id.[10]

By contrast, we believe that an agreement imposing substantial damages—actual or liquidated—attributable to or because of work done by the departing lawyer (or her new firm) in competition with the former firm after she relocates would violate Rule 5.6(a). D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 65 (1979); see Stevens, 682 N.E.2d at 1131-32. But cf. Robinson v. Nussbaum, 11 F. Supp. 2d 1 (D.D.C. 1997) (holding that hourly matters are partnership property but not addressing post-departure competition penalties).[11]

In 1979 this committee considered a liquidated damages provision that a lawyer's post-departure work "for a client of the firm during a two-year period following . . . termination" would render the departing lawyer liable to his former firm for "40% of his net billings to such clients . . . during the said two year period." D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 65 (1979). The committee concluded that the provision violated the predecessor of D.C. Rule 5.6(a). Id. A later opinion disapproved a clause that imposed liquidated damages of $150,000 for any breach of an agreement's suite of post-employment restrictions. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 181 (1987).[12]

In Thelen, the New York Court of Appeals decided that hourly fee matters are not law firm property. In re Thelen LLP, 20 N.E.3d 264. This opinion does not address that particular issue but the Thelen court pointed out several policy considerations that are relevant here. First and most important, many a departing lawyer would be compelled to inform clients who wish to follow her that she can't afford to continue representing them. That would constitute—> a major inconvenience for the clients and a practical restriction on a client's right to choose counsel. Or, more likely, these attorneys would simply find it difficult to secure a position in a new law firm because any profits from their work for existing clients would be due their old law firm, not their new employers.

>
> * * *
>
> Additionally, clients might worry that their hourly fee matters are not getting as much attention as they deserve if the [new] law firm is prevented from profiting from its work on them.

Id. at 273. Second, such a rule would allow the departed lawyer's former partners "to profit from work they do not perform, all at the expense of a [the departed lawyer and her] new firm," thus creating a windfall for the former firm. Id.

Similar considerations underlie Rule 5.6(a). Thus, regardless of whether a liquidated damages provision passes muster under contract principles, it is grounds for professional discipline if it runs afoul of the limitations set out above.[13]

Restrictions upon post-departure association with personnel of former firm

The second inquiry is whether a law firm may penalize a lawyer financially for entering into an agreement or association with an individual who was a partner or employee (lawyer or non-lawyer) with the former firm.

In 1987 this committee reviewed an agreement we described as "perpetually prohibiting any interference" by a departed lawyer "with the firm's relationships with its lawyer/employees." D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 181 (1987). The committee opined that by interfering with the right of association among attorneys, the provision indirectly restricted the departing attorney's right to practice law and hence violated the predecessor of Rule 5.6(a). Id. (citing ABA Informal Op. 1417 (1978)); accord Jacob, 607 A.2d at 152-54. We see no reason to alter this conclusion and accordingly reaffirm Opinion 181.[14] As is the case in respect of damages for post-departure competition, any penalty must be substantial to trigger the prohibition of Rule 5.6(a). D.C. Rule 5.6, cmt. [2].

This is not to say that a departing lawyer has an unlimited right to solicit firm partners or employees, particularly before she departs. We have noted that although this issue is "primarily, if not entirely," a function of "law other than ethics law, such as the common law of interference with business relations and fiduciary obligations," there could be extreme instances where deception and dishonesty by the departing lawyer might constitute "dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation" in violation of Rule 8.4(c). D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 273 (1997).

Choice of Law

The final inquiry is whether, where the departing lawyer also is admitted to practice in another jurisdiction,[15] a choice of law provision in a partnership or other agreement may avoid the application of D.C. Rule 5.6(a) in favor of a rule of the other jurisdiction that yields a different result. By way of example, a minority of jurisdictions permit the imposition of a financial penalty on a competing former [10] We know of no D.C. appellate rulings on the issue of post-departure compensation for hourly fee matters, and this opinion does not address that issue.

[11] This committee cannot opine on whether an agreement that violates D.C. Rule 5.6(a) can be enforced as a matter of contract law. Rule C-4, Rules of the District of Columbia Bar Legal Ethics Committee (1995); accord D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 65 (1979) (declining to address enforceability of agreement that violated predecessor of Rule 5.6(a)); see also N.Y.C. Bar Ass'n Formal Op. 1999-03 (1999) (same). The D.C. Court of Appeals does not appear to have ruled on the enforceability issue. A 1994 U.S. District Court ruling in D.C. held such a provision unenforceable. Shainis v. Baraff, Koerner, Olender & Hochberg, P.C., 1994 U.S. Dist. Lexis 21971 (Civil Action No. 93-2253 (NHJ)) (July 18, 1994). Case law elsewhere is divided. Compare Feldman v. Minars, 658 N.Y.S.2d 614, 617 (App. Div. 1997) (enforcing agreement even though it violated Rule 5.6(b)), with Denburg v. Parker Chapin Flattau & Klimpl, 624 N.E.2d 995 (N.Y. 1993) (holding unenforceable a provision that violated Rule 5.6(a)), Stevens, 682 N.E.2d at 1131-32 (same), Jacob, 607 A.2d at 155 (same), and Cohen, 550 N.E.2d 410 (same).

[12] Ashcraft & Gerel, which upheld a departing lawyer's contractual liability for liquidated damages, is not to the contrary. D.C. Rule 5.6 "is inapplicable," said the court, "because the liquidated damages were not linked to [the departing lawyer's] decision to compete with the firm" and hence were "readily distinguishable from a contract not to compete." Ashcraft & Gerel, 244 F.3d at 955. Moreover, Ashcraft & Gerel, which applied District of Columbia law, was decided in 2001. In 2006, the D.C. Court of Appeals added comment 2, which expressly includes "substantial financial penalt[ies]" in the prohibition of D.C. Rule 5.6(a). Given that subsequent change in D.C. law, it is conceivable that Ashcraft & Gerel would be decided differently were it to arise today.

[13] Again, we express no view on whether such a clause may be enforceable in the context of the underlying contract dispute. See supra n. 11.

[14] Opinion 181 also involved a liquidated damages clause—one that the committee described as "truly oppressive." The opinion added that "[t]he in terrorem effect of this sword of Damocles hanging over the head of a departing lawyer is not to be underestimated." D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 181 (1987).

[15] For the sake of simplicity, we assume that only one other jurisdiction is involved. The basic principles outlined here also apply if more than one other jurisdiction is involved.

lawyer, so long as the penalty reasonably reflects the loss in the value of the law firm occasioned by the departure. See supra n. 7 and authorities cited therein.

A lawyer admitted to practice here is subject to the District's disciplinary authority regardless of where the questioned conduct occurs. D.C. Rule 8.5(a). Moreover, "[a] lawyer may be subject to the disciplinary authority of both this jurisdiction and another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted for the same conduct." Id.[16] Where multiple jurisdictions are involved, however, and the conduct is not in connection with a matter pending before a tribunal—> the rules to be applied [by the D.C. disciplinary authorities] shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(2) (emphasis added). The intent of this rule is that "any particular conduct of an attorney shall be subject to only one set of rules of professional conduct" and that the process of determining which set applies be "as straightforward as possible." D.C. Rule 8.5 cmt. [3].

Although they antedate choice-of-law provisions in the Model Rules[17] and state ethics codes, several rulings from outside the District of Columbia are instructive. A 1991 ABA opinion, for example, addressed the fact that the District permits ownership and management of law firms by non-lawyers, while every other American jurisdiction prohibits such arrangements. ABA Formal Op. 91-360 (1991) ("ABA Opinion"). "[W]hat ethical rule should govern," the ABA committee asked, "when lawyers are partners in a law firm that, as permitted by the D.C. rule, includes nonlawyer partners, but are also members of the bar of another jurisdiction [State X] whose rules forbid such partnerships?" Id. The ABA committee concluded that if the lawyer admitted in D.C. and in State X is practicing in a D.C.-located firm with nonlawyer partners, State X should not discipline her for such conduct. Id. On the other hand, State X should be able to discipline the lawyer if she were to practice in State X as a partner of the D.C.-located firm. Id.;[18] accord Mich. Op. RI-225 (1995); see In re Overboe, 745 N.W.2d 852, 861-62 (Minn. 2008) (applying South Dakota rules to conduct of lawyer admitted there and in Minnesota where lawyer's office and trust account were in South Dakota and funds involved were those of South Dakota clients).

The ABA Opinion cited several state ethics opinions in support of its conclsions. ABA Opinion n. 13. A 1984 Michigan opinion had responded to a Michigan Bar member, also admitted in California, who practiced in the latter jurisdiction but not the former. Mich. Ethics Op. CI-929 (1984). The inquirer asked whether he could employ a foreign lawyer in his California law office. Id. The opinion stated that "[t]o the extent that California would permit the contemplated conduct, the attorney would not be in violation of the Michigan Code of Professional Responsibility." Id.

The ABA Opinion also cited a 1986 Maryland opinion that addressed a situation where a lawyer licensed in Maryland and specially admitted to appear in a District of Columbia litigation learned that he had introduced the client's forged documents into evidence in connection with the litigation. Md. State Bar Ass'n, Comm. on Ethics, Op. 86-28 (1986). Maryland's rules required disclosure; D.C.'s prohibited it. Id. The Maryland opinion stated that—

> [w]here a Maryland attorney is acting in a foreign jurisdiction in accordance with that jurisdiction's Code of Professional Responsibility, it is the opinion of this committee that his conduct is ethical per se. While the Maryland Code of Professional Responsibility may impose different or more stringent requirements on its attorneys, it does not require its attorneys to behave in a manner that is inconsistent or at variance with the code of conduct prescribed by another jurisdiction when practicing there.

Id. Although the Maryland opinion addressed conduct in connection with a proceeding before a tribunal, see Model Rule 8.5(b)(1), the ABA Opinion nonetheless found Maryland's rationale instructive in a Rule 8.5(b)(2) setting like that presented in this opinion.

More recently, a New York State Bar Association opinion has set out useful criteria for determining where a lawyer "principally practices" and where the "predominant effect" of a lawyer's conduct is felt. N.Y.S. Bar Ass'n Ethics Op. 1027 (2014) ("New York Opinion").[19] On the former point, the factors cited in the New York Opinion are—

> (a) the number of calendar days the lawyer spends working in each jurisdiction, (b) the number of hours the lawyer bills in each jurisdiction, (c) the location of the clients the lawyer serves, (d) the activities the lawyer performs in each jurisdiction (e.g., legal work for clients vs. administrative work for the law firm), and (e) special circumstances (such as a recent move, an extended illness, or a natural disaster).

Id. (citing Roy D. Simon, Simon's New York Rules of Professional Conduct Annotated 1915-17 (2014)). The New York Opinion adds that "[g]iven the increase in law practice over the Internet, and the corresponding decrease in the importance of a lawyer's physical location, the jurisdiction in which a lawyer 'principally practices' . . . is becoming less certain." Id.

"[N]o simple formula is available to determine where the 'predominant effect' will occur," either. Id. "Factors to consider include such things as (a) where the clients reside, and where they work; (b) where any payments will be deposited; (c) where any contract will be performed; and (d) where any new or expanded business will operate." Id.

We conclude that D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(2) supplies the answer to this inquiry and does so consistently with the ABA Opinion. For the departing lawyer and lawyers in her former firm who are located in the District of Columbia, it makes no difference whether the "principally practices" or the "predominant effect" prong of the rule applies. As to the first prong, they principally practice here. As for the second prong—predominant effect—recall that Rule 5.6(a) seeks to protect lawyers' autonomy and clients' right to choose a [16] Note that ABA Model Rule 8.5(b) differs from D.C. Rule 8.5(b) in several respects. Among them is the fact that under the Model Rule, a lawyer may be subject to rules of a jurisdiction where the lawyer is not admitted to practice. ABA Model Rule 8.5.

[17] The 1983 initial version of the ABA Model Rules was silent on the issue. Its comments merely directed readers to "principles of conflict of laws" and "applicable rules of choice of law." ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 8.5 cmts. 2, 3 (1983). Current D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(2) follows the 1993 amendment to Model Rule 8.5(b). See id. Rule 8.5(b) (1993).

[18] The ABA Opinion added that a lawyer admitted in D.C. and State X ethically could be a partner in both the D.C. firm and a State X firm, but only if the State X practice "was conducted through another firm that was both fiscally and managerially separate from and independent of the D.C. firm." ABA Opinion n. 12.

[19] The New York version of Rule 8.5(b)(2) is substantively indistinguishable from D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(2).

lawyer . D.C. Rule 5.6 cmt. [1]. The predominant effect of a provision penalizing such a lawyer for post-departure competition falls upon a lawyer who is located in D.C. For that reason, the predominant effect prong renders members of the D.C. Bar in the firm subject to the D.C. version of Rule 5.6(a) regardless of where they principally practice.[20]

Where the departing lawyer is admitted in D.C. but located in a jurisdiction that permits a penalty for post-departure competition, it also doesn't matter which prong of D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(2) applies. The departing lawyer principally practices in the other jurisdiction, and the predominant effect of the penalty provision falls upon that lawyer. Hence in that case, the other jurisdiction's version of Rule 5.6(a) would apply to the departing D.C. Bar member and the D.C. Bar members in her former firm. In such a case, D.C. should not penalize those lawyers for acting in accordance with the other jurisdiction's rule.

Conclusion

We conclude, then, that a law firm may not provide for or impose liquidated damages on a lawyer who, after departure, competes with the firm. The firm and the lawyer may have liability to one another, though, for work done before the lawyer's departure. Also, a firm may not restrict a departed lawyer's subsequent professional association or affiliation with partners or employees of the firm, except insofar as such activity is subject to legal limitations outside the Rules of Professional Conduct. Finally, whether a choice of law provision in a partnership or employment agreement can avoid application of the D.C. Rule governing lawyer departures usually will depend on the location where the departing lawyer principally practiced.

Published February 2015

Opinion 369

Sharing of Legal Fees With a Lawyer Referral Service

A lawyer may remit a percentage of fees earned on a matter referred to her by the inquiring "lawyer referral service" only if such fees (1) are derived from litigation matters, as set out in Rule 5.4(a)(5) of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, or (2) are "usual fees" of such a service within the meaning of comment [6] to Rule 7.1.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 5.4 - Professional Independence of Lawyer
- Rule 7.1 – Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services

Inquiry

The committee has been asked whether the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules" or "Rules") permit certain payments to a lawyer referral service ("Service"). The Service would direct prospective low-income clients to a network of lawyers willing to work for such clients at modest rates. For each client referred to a network lawyer by the Service, the lawyer would remit to the Service a flat "referral" payment ("Flat Payment") of approximately $200. Should the representation proceed beyond the initial consultation, the network lawyer would further remit to the Service fifteen percent of any fees earned through the representation ("Percentage Payment"). The arrangement would apply to all types of legal representation and would not be limited to litigation matters. The Service is or will be qualified as exempt from federal income taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code.[1]

The Service undertakes to "provide quality assurance and accountability" through a dispute resolution panel. The inquiry does not state whether the Service is open to all D.C. Bar members, whether it requires all participating lawyers to have reasonably adequate malpractice insurance, or whether it will refer cases to lawyers who own, operate, or are employed by the Service.

For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that (1) the D.C. Rules permit the payment of the Flat Payment and (2) the Percentage Payment is permitted only if within Rule 5.4(a)(5) or comment [6] to Rule 7.1.

Analysis

D.C. Rule 7.1 provides that "[a] lawyer shall not give anything of value to a person (other than the lawyer's partner or employee) for recommending the lawyer's services through in-person contact." D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(2). The comments to that rule, however, state that "a lawyer may participate in lawyer referral programs and pay the usual fees charged by such programs." D.C. Rule 7.1, cmt. [6] (emphasis added).

Rule 5.4(a) provides that a lawyer may not share legal fees with a non-lawyer. The purpose of this rule is "to protect the lawyer's professional independence of judgment." D.C. Rule 5.4, cmt. [1].

In 1989, this committee opined that a non-profit public interest legal services project could receive a percentage (one sixth) of fees paid to attorneys to whom the project referred clients and who agreed to charge reduced fees. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 201 (1989). Noting that then-applicable Disciplinary Rule 2-103(C) of the D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility expressly permitted "the usual and reasonable fees or dues charged by a lawyer referral service," we found that the Percentage Payment was reasonable and, based upon a survey of referral arrangements in other jurisdictions, usual as well. Id. In reaching this conclusion, the committee noted that the Project's referral service was "operated for the benefit of the public" and that it was designed "not . . . to procure financial benefit or legal work for a lawyer as a private practitioner" but "to make affordable legal services available to a needy population that might not otherwise be able to retain legal assistance." Id. The opinion added that the arrangement "would apparently also be proper" under Rule 7.1 of the proposed D.C. Rules, which was then pending before the D.C. Court of Appeals, but made no mention of Rule 5.4 of the proposed D.C. Rules. Id. The arrangement, said the committee, "does not impair or control the independent professional judgment of referral attorneys, nor subject them to conflicting interests or divided loyalties." Id.[2]

In 1998, we concluded that although Rule 7.1(b)(5), which subsequently was removed from the D.C. Rules, permitted

[20] The "predominant effect" prong is to be applied narrowly, see D.C. Rule 8.5 cmt. [4]; N.Y.S. Bar Ass'n Ethics Op. 1027 (2014), but we conclude that this fact pattern triggers it.

[1] Section 501(c)(3) exempts "[c]orporations, and any community chest, fund, or foundation, organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, testing for public safety, literary, or educational purposes . . . no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual, no substantial part of the activities of which is carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting, to influence legislation . . . and which does not participate in, or intervene in (including the publishing or distributing of statements), any political campaign on behalf of (or in opposition to) any candidate for public office." I.R.C. § 501(c)(3) (2015).

[2] A 1993 opinion observed that the prohibition on fee-sharing was motivated in part by concern "that nonlawyers might control the activities of lawyers and interfere with the lawyers' independent professional judgment." D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 233 (1993).

a lawyer to pay a non-lawyer for referring business to the lawyer, "a payment to a nonlawyer for the referral of business, tied to the amount of revenue received by the lawyer from the referred business" violated Rule 5.4(a) and was not permitted. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 286 (1998). Opinion 286 applied generally to referrals and, unlike Opinion 201, was not limited to payments to nonprofit organizations.

In 2001, we opined that D.C. Rule 5.4 was not violated by a lawyer's participation in a federal General Services Administration (GSA) program that engaged lawyers to represent federal agencies and that required such lawyers to pay GSA one percent of fees received from such agencies. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 307 (2001). The fees were used to fund GSA's operation of the program. Id. We noted that comment [6] to Rule 7.1 "distinguishes between a 'recognized or established agency or organization' offering a 'lawyer referral program,' to which a lawyer may 'pay the usual fees charged by such programs,' on the one hand, and 'payments to intermediaries to recommend the lawyer's services' . . . on the other." Id. The concern about the latter type of arrangement, we said, was grounded in the desire to "prevent[] nonlawyer intermediaries from using their power over lawyers who rely on them for business referrals to influence those lawyers' 'professional independence of judgment.'" Id. (citing D.C. Rule 5.4, cmt. [1]). The opinion described the former type of referral arrangements—arrangements that "do not compromise lawyers' independence" and involve recognized or established agencies or organizations—as a "positive development," but recognized that the D.C. Rules "are less clear than they could be on this issue." Id.; see D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 329 (2005) (noting that the policy considerations underlying the Rule 5.4(a) prohibition are "whether a proposed arrangement would interfere with a lawyer's independent judgment" and "whether refusing to permit the arrangement would result in fewer legal resources being available for those in need of them").

As of 2005, then, Rule 5.4(a), comment [6] to Rule 7.1, and Opinions 201, 286, and 307 permitted fees to be divided with a non-lawyer on a percentage basis only where the non-lawyer was a lawyer referral service. At that time, there were four exceptions to the prohibition of Rule 5.4. None related to the inquiry at hand. In 2005, however, an additional exception was recommended by the D.C. Bar. See D.C. Bar Rules of Professional Conduct Review Committee, Proposed Amendments to the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct: Final Report and Recommendations 174-77 (2005) ("Wortham Report"). This exception was adopted by the D.C. Court of Appeals, effective February 1, 2007, and provides that—> a lawyer may share legal fees, whether awarded by a tribunal or received in settlement of a matter, with a nonprofit organization that employed, retained, or recommended employment of the lawyer in the matter and that qualifies under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code.

D.C. Rule 5.4(a)(5). The fees covered by this exception, namely those "awarded by a tribunal or received in settlement of a matter," are limited to those "recovered from the opposing party" in a "case[]," D.C. Rule 5.4, cmt. [11], and accordingly are limited to fees arising from litigation.

The comment adopted along with Rule 5.4(a)(5) recognizes that an arrangement within that subparagraph may involve fee-splitting but states that "the prospect . . . does not inherently compromise the lawyer's professional independence . . . . A lawyer who has agreed to share legal fees with such an organization remains obligated to exercise professional judgment solely in the client's best interests." D.C. Rule 5.4, cmt. [11]. The comment further notes that unlike the corresponding Model Rules provision, the D.C. Rule "is not limited to sharing of fees awarded by a court because that restriction would significantly interfere with settlement of cases, without significantly advancing the purpose of the exception." Id.

The question, then, is whether the adoption of Rule 5.4(a)(5) was intended to repeal, sub silentio, the exception for the "usual fees" of a "lawyer referral service" that are recognized by comment [6] of Rule 7.1 and by Opinions 201, 286, and 307. We think not.

There was no provision like subparagraph (a)(5) in the D.C. Rules before 2007 and no counterpart in the D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility, which was in force prior to January 1, 1991.[3] Importantly, the discussions in the Wortham Report of proposed subparagraph (a)(5) and of Rule 7.1 do not suggest that adoption of the former would repeal or even narrow the latter's existing approval of the payment of "usual fees" to lawyer referral programs. See Wortham Report at 174-77, 190-95.

Although Rule 5.4(a)(5) is narrower than comment [6] to Rule 7.1 in the sense that it is limited to fees derived from litigation matters, it is broader in that it applies not only to lawyer referral programs but to any non-profit organization. Moreover, Rule 5.4(a)(5) covers not only payments to the referring organization from outside lawyers but also from lawyers who are employed or retained directly by the organization. By contrast, comment [6] to Rule 7.1 contemplates only payments by lawyers to whom matters are referred by a lawyer referral service, and then only the "usual fees" of such a service.

The Flat Payment from the lawyer to the Service would not depend upon the amount of fees paid by the client to the lawyer. Hence the Flat Payment is not a sharing of legal fees and does not violate Rule 5.4(a). D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 342 (2007); D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 286 (1998).[4] The Percentage Payment is a percentage of the fees earned by the lawyer for the representation. As such, it is permissible only if it either comes within subparagraph (a)(5) of Rule 5.4 or is a "usual fee[]" charged by a "lawyer referral program," as noted in comment [6] to Rule 7.1.

To the extent that matters referred by the Service are not litigation matters, the Percentage Payment is not authorized by Rule 5.4(a)(5). This eliminates subparagraph (a)(5) as a potential basis for Percentage Payments outside the litigation context.

Therefore, the Percentage Payment is permissible only if it satisfies the requirements of comment [6] to Rule 7.1. That in turn leads to two inquiries—whether the Service is a "lawyer referral service" and, if so, whether the Percentage Payment is a "usual fee" of such an operation.

The 2007 revision of the D.C. Rules eliminated comment [6]'s references to "recognized or established agency or organization" and "organized legal referral program," but we do not believe that a change in substance was intended. The deletion reflected the Wortham Report's recommendation, which ultimately was adopted by the D.C. Court of Appeals, to eliminate the rule that permitted payment to anyone—including individuals and for-profit entities—in exchange for referrals. See Wortham Report 190-95. By implication, only the types of referral programs mentioned in the first sentence of this paragraph remain permissible under the post-2007 D.C. Rules.

[3] A similar provision, limited to division of court-awarded fees, was recommended by the ABA's Ethics 2000 Commission and was added to the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct in 2002. See ABA Model Rule 5.4(a)(4) (2015).

[4] We assume without deciding that at approximately $200, the Flat Payment would be reasonable within the meaning of the Rules. See D.C. Rule 1.5(a).

Is the Service such a program? The D.C. Rules do not include express criteria for making that determination. The Model Rules do offer such criteria, however, and we agree with the considerations underlying Model Rule 7.2(b)(2), which is analogous to comment [6] to D.C. Rule 7.1. Model Rule 7.2 allows a lawyer to pay the "usual charges" of "a not-for-profit . . . lawyer referral service." ABA Model Rule 7.2(b)(2) (2015). A comment describes lawyer referral services as "consumer-oriented organizations that provide unbiased referrals to lawyers with appropriate experience in the subject matter of the representation and afford other client protections, such as complaint procedures or malpractice insurance requirements." Id. cmt. [6].

The comment goes on to cite approvingly an ABA standard requiring that such services "not make referrals to lawyers who own, operate or are employed by the referral service." Id.

We conclude that the Service will constitute a "lawyer referral service" within the meaning of comment [6] to D.C. Rule 7.1 if the Service—

- is generally open to D.C. Bar members who agree to its reduced-fee prerequisite, see ABA Model Rule 7.2, cmt. [6];
- takes reasonable steps to ensure that lawyers to whom matters are referred are competent to handle such matters, see D.C. Rule 1.1;
- does not interfere with the lawyers' professional independence of judgment;
- requires only reasonable referral fees (a criterion that is met by its current fifteen percent requirement), see D.C. Rule 1.5(a);
- requires that all lawyers in its network have reasonably adequate malpractice insurance see ABA Model Rule 7.2, cmt. [6];
- has a neutral dispute resolution mechanism, see id.; and
- does not refer matters to lawyers who own, operate, manage, or are employed by the Service, see id.

The second question is whether the Percentage Payment is a "usual fee." Opinion 201 concluded that a non-profit public interest legal services project could receive a percentage (one sixth) of fees paid to attorneys to whom the project referred clients and who had agreed to charge reduced fees. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 201 (1989); see D.C. Legal Ethics Ops. 286 (1998) and 307 (2001). Here, the percentage proposed to be remitted to the Service is fifteen percent, which of course is less than one sixth. Moreover, the Service is a 501(c)(3) entity. As noted in the D.C. Rules, see D.C. Rule 5.4(a), cmt. [1], and numerous prior opinions of this committee, see, e.g., D.C. Legal Ethics Ops. 201 (1989), 286 (1998), 307 (2001), and 329 (2005), such entities are unlikely to impair or control the independent professional judgment of the attorneys to whom referrals are made.

Thus, we conclude that the Percentage Payment is a usual fee within the meaning of comment [6] to D.C. Rule 7.1.

Conclusion

Accordingly, we conclude that the D.C. Rules permit a lawyer to remit to the Service the Flat Payment and, if the Percentage Payment is within Rule 5.4(a)(5) or comment [6] to Rule 7.1, the Percentage Payment as well.

Published July 2015

Opinion 370

Social Media I: Marketing and Personal Use

Introduction

Social media and social networking websites are online communities that allow users to share information, messages, and other content, including photographs and videos. The Committee defines social media as follows:

> Social media include any electronic platform through which people may communicate or interact in a public, semi-private or private way. Through blogs, public and private chat rooms, listservs, other online locations, social networks and websites such as Facebook, LinkedIn, Instagram, Twitter, Yelp, Angie's List, Avvo and Lawyers.com, users of social media can share information, messages, e-mail, instant messages, photographs, video, voice or videoconferencing content.[1] This definition includes social networks, public and private chat rooms, listservs, and other online locations where attorneys communicate with the public, other attorneys, or clients. Varying degrees of privacy may exist in these online communities as users may have the ability to limit who may see their posted content and who may post content to their pages.[2]

Increasingly, attorneys are using social media for business and personal reasons. The Committee wants to raise awareness of the benefits and pitfalls of the use of social media within the practice of law and to emphasize that the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") apply to attorneys in the District of Columbia (the "District") who use, or may use, social media for business or personal reasons.[3] This Opinion applies to all attorneys who use social media, regardless of practice area or employer and applies regardless of whether the attorney engages in advertising or client communications via social media. The Committee notes that any social media presence, even a personal

[1] "Content" means any communications, whether for personal or business purposes, disseminated through websites, social media sites, blogs, chat rooms, listservs, instant messaging, or other internet presences, and any attachments or links related thereto.

[2] The Merriam-Webster Dictionary defines "social media" as "forms of electronic communication … through which users create online communities to share information, ideas, personal messages, and other content…." More specifically to the legal profession, the New York State Bar Association Committee on Professional Ethics, in its Formal Opinion No. 2012-2 (May 30, 2012), stated:

> We understand "social media" to be services or websites people join voluntarily in order to interact, communicate, or stay in touch with a group of users, sometimes called a "network." Most such services allow users to create personal profiles, and some allow users to post pictures and messages about their daily lives.

[3] We have previously addressed issues related to attorneys' participation in certain kinds of internet and electronic communications, but have not yet addressed the broader uses of social media. In Opinion 316, we concluded that attorneys could take part in online chat rooms and similar arrangements through which they could engage in communications in real time or nearly real time, with internet users seeking legal information. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 316 (2002). In Opinion 281, we addressed issues related to the use of unencrypted electronic mail. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 281 (1998). In Opinion 302, we stated that lawyers could use websites to advertise for plaintiffs for class action lawsuits and use websites that offer opportunities to bid competitively on legal projects. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 302 (2000).

page, could be considered advertising or marketing, and lawyers are cautioned to consider the Rules applicable to attorney advertising, even if not explicitly discussed below. Lawyers reviewing this Opinion may also wish to review Opinion 371 (Social Media II), which addresses use of social media by lawyers in providing legal services.

Social networking websites provide an online community for people to share daily activities, their interests in various topics, or to increase their circle of personal or business acquaintances. There are sites with primarily business purposes, some that are primarily for personal use and some that offer a variety of different uses. According to the 2014 ABA Legal Technology Survey, among attorneys and law firms, in addition to blogs, LinkedIn, Facebook and Twitter are among the more widely used social networks.[4] On these sites, members create online "profiles," which may include biographical data, pictures and other information that they wish to post. These services permit members to locate and invite other members of the network into their personal networks (to "connect" or "friend" them) or to invite the friends or contacts of others to connect with them.

Members of these online social networking communities communicate in a number of ways, publicly or privately. Members of these online social networking communities may have the ability, in many instances, to control who may see their posted content, or who may post content to their pages. Varying degrees of privacy exist. These privacy settings allow users to restrict or limit access of information to certain groups, such as "friends," "connections" or the "public."

Social media sites, postings or activities that mention, promote or highlight a lawyer or a law firm are subject to and must comply with the Rules.[5] Attorneys who choose to use social media must adhere to the Rules in the same way that they would if using more traditional forms of communication.

The Rules, as well as previous Opinions of this Committee, apply to a number of different social media or social networking activities that an attorney or law firm may be engaged in, including:

1. Connecting and communicating with clients, former clients or other lawyers on social networking sites;
2. Writing about an attorney's own cases on social media sites, blogs or other internet-publishing based websites;
3. Commenting on or responding to online reviews or comments;
4. Self-identification by attorneys of their own "specialties," "skills" and "expertise" on social media sites;
5. Reviewing third-party endorsements received by attorneys on their personal or law firm pages; and,
6. Making endorsements of other attorneys on social networking sites.

The Committee concludes that, generally, each of the activities identified above are permissible under the Rules; but not without caution, as discussed in greater detail below. Consistent with our mandate, we consider only the applicability of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. Given that social media does not stop at state boundaries, we remind members of the District of Columbia Bar that their social media presence may be subject to regulation in other jurisdictions, either because the District applies another state's rules through its choice-of-law rule,[6] or because other states assert jurisdiction over attorney conduct without regard to whether the attorney is admitted in other states.[7]

Lawyers must be aware of the ethical rules regarding social media in the principal jurisdiction where they practice, consistent with Rule 8.5. However, adherence to the ethical rules in the jurisdiction of one's principal practice may not insulate an attorney from discipline. There is considerable variation in choice of law rules across jurisdictions. We specifically wish to caution lawyers that the disciplinary rules of other jurisdictions, including our neighboring jurisdictions of Maryland and Virginia, allow for the imposition of discipline upon attorneys who are not admitted in that jurisdiction, if the lawyer provides or offers to provide any legal services in the jurisdiction. ABA Model Rule 8.5(b)(2) provides a limited safe harbor to this provision, by stating that "[a] lawyer shall not be subject to discipline if the lawyer's conduct conforms to the rules of a jurisdiction in which the lawyer reasonably believes the predominant effect of the lawyer's conduct will occur." We note, however, that not every state has adopted this safe harbor. This Committee undertook a detailed evaluation of choice of law rules in non-judicial proceedings in Opinion 311.[8]

We explicitly note that this Opinion is limited to the use of social media as a communications device. This Opinion does not address issues related to the ethical use of social media in litigation or other proceedings, or with regard to issues related to advising clients on the use of social media. Those issues are addressed in Opinion 371 (Social Media II).

[4] www.americanbar.org/publications/techreport/2014/blogging-and-social-media.html (last visited Oct. 26, 2016).

[5] The Committee further notes that even social media profiles that are used exclusively for personal purposes might be viewed by clients or other third parties, and that information contained on those social media websites may be subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct. The Rules extend to purely private conduct of a lawyer, in areas such as truthfulness and compliance with the law. See Rule 8.4.

[6] In accordance with D.C. Rule 8.5(b), the Office of Disciplinary Counsel will apply the rules of another jurisdiction to an attorney's conduct in two circumstances:

> (1) For conduct in connection with a matter pending before a tribunal, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the jurisdiction in which the tribunal sits, unless the rules of the tribunal provide otherwise, and
>
> (2) For any other conduct,
>
> > (ii) If the lawyer is licensed to practice in this and another jurisdiction, the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

Note that, in contrast to ABA Model Rule 8.5 (see infra note 7), D.C. Rule 8.5 does not provide for jurisdiction over attorneys not admitted to practice in the District and does not apply the rules of another jurisdiction unless the attorney is either practicing before a tribunal in another jurisdiction, or is licensed to practice in another jurisdiction.

[7] In contrast to D.C. Rule 8.5 (discussed supra in note 6), ABA Model Rule 8.5(a) states that "[a] lawyer not admitted in this jurisdiction is also subject to the disciplinary authority of this jurisdiction if the lawyer provides or offers to provide any legal services in this jurisdiction." Moreover, ABA Model Rule 8.5(b)(2) states that for conduct not in connection with a matter pending before a tribunal, the rules to be applied are "the rules of the jurisdiction in which the lawyer's conduct occurred, or, if the predominant effect of the conduct is in a different jurisdiction, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to the conduct." Accordingly, Model Rule 8.5(b)(2), unlike D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(2), may result in the application of rules of jurisdictions to which the lawyer is not admitted.

[8] D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 311 (2002). The revisions to Rule 8.5(b)(1) that became effective on February 1, 2007 have modified Opinion 311 to the extent that the Opinion now applies more broadly to conduct in connection with a "matter pending before a tribunal" rather than only in connection with a "proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice." These revisions, however, do not change this Committee's analysis in Opinion 311 as to "other conduct" under Rule 8.5(b)(2).

Applicable Rules

The Rules that are potentially implicated by social media include:

- Rule 1.1 (Competence)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General)
- Rule 1.18 (Duties to Prospective Client)
- Rule 3.3 (Candor to Tribunal)
- Rule 5.1 (Responsibilities of Partners, Managers, and Supervisory Lawyers)
- Rule 5.3 (Responsibilities Regarding Non-Lawyer Assistants)
- Rule 7.1 (Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services)
- Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)
- Rule 8.5 (Disciplinary Authority; Choice of Law)

Discussion

I. Social Media in General

The guiding principle for lawyers with regard to the use of any social network site is that they must be conversant in how the site works. Lawyers must understand the functionality of the social networking site, including its privacy policies. Lawyers must understand the manner in which postings on social media sites are made and whether such postings are public or private. Indeed, comment [6] to Rule 1.1 (Competence) provides:

> To maintain the requisite knowledge and skill, a lawyer should keep abreast of changes in the law and its practice, and engage in such continuing study and education as may be necessary to maintain competence.

As discussed in more detail herein, lawyers must be cognizant of the benefits and risks of the use of social media and their postings on social media sites. Social networking sites, and social media in general, make it easier to blur the distinctions between communications that are business and those that are personal. Communications via social media are inherently less formal than more traditional or established forms of communication. Lawyers and law firm employees must be reminded of the need to maintain confidentiality with regard to clients and client matters in all communications. It is recommended that all law firms have a policy in place regarding employees' use of social networks. Lawyers in law firms have an ethical duty to supervise subordinate lawyers and non-lawyer staff to ensure that their conduct complies with the applicable Rules, including the duty of confidentiality. See Rules 5.1 and 5.3.

Content contained on a lawyer's social media pages must be truthful and not misleading. Statements on social media could expose an attorney to charges of dishonesty under Rule 8.4 or lack of candor under Rule 3.3, if the social media statements conflict with statements made to courts, clients or other third parties, including employers. Similarly, statements on social media could expose a lawyer to civil liability for defamation, libel or other torts.

II. Permissible Uses of Social Media

A. Attorneys may connect with and communicate with clients, former clients or other lawyers on social networking sites, but not without caution.

There are no provisions of the Rules that preclude a lawyer from participating in social media or other online activities. However, if an attorney connects with, or otherwise communicates with clients on social networking sites, then the attorney must continue to adhere to the Rules and maintain an appropriate relationship with clients. Lawyers must also be aware that, if they are connected to clients or former clients on social media, then content made by others and then placed on the attorney's page and content made by the attorney may be viewed by these clients and former clients. Attorneys should be mindful of their obligations under Rule 1.6 to maintain client confidences and secrets.

Some social networking sites, like Facebook, offer users the option to restrict what some people may see on a user's page. These options also allow a user to determine who may post content publicly on the lawyer's page. It is advisable for lawyers to periodically review these settings and adjust them as needed to manage the content appearing publicly on the lawyer's social media pages. Attorneys should be aware of changes to the policies of the sites that they utilize, as privacy policies are frequently changed and networks may globally apply changes, pursuant to the updated policies.

i. Avoiding the formation of an inadvertent attorney-client relationship

As we opined in Opinion 316, it is permissible for lawyers to participate in online chat rooms and similar arrangements through which attorneys could engage in real time, or nearly real time communications with internet users. However, that permission was caveated with the caution to avoid the provision of specific legal advice in order to prevent the formation of an attorney-client relationship. In Opinion 302, we provided "best practices" guidance on internet communications, with the intent of avoiding the inadvertent formation of an attorney-client relationship. One of the suggested "best practices" included the use of a prominent disclaimer. Id. However, we have reiterated "that even the use of a disclaimer may not prevent the formation of an attorney-client relationship if the parties' subsequent conduct is inconsistent with the disclaimer." D.C. Ethics Op. 316.

These same principles are applicable to the use of social media. Disclaimers are advisable on social media sites, especially if the lawyer is posting legal content or if the lawyer may be engaged in sending or receiving messages from "friends," whether those friends are other attorneys, family or unknown visitors to the lawyer's social media page, when those messages relate, or may relate, to legal issues.[9]

Rule 1.18 imposes a duty of confidentiality with regard to a prospective client, who is defined in Rule 1.18(a) as "a person who discusses … the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship with respect to a matter." However, comment [2] to Rule 1.18 notes that "[a] person who communicates information unilaterally to a lawyer, without any reasonable expectation that the lawyer is willing to discuss the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship, is not a 'prospective client' within the meaning of [the Rule]." The guidance of Rule 1.18 is of particular importance in social networking, where lawyers may self-identify themselves as attorneys and where, most likely, those "connected" to the lawyer will be aware that the user is an attorney; however, without more, the mere knowledge that a friend is an attorney does not give rise to a reasonable expectation that interactions with that attorney would create a prospective or actual client relationship, or its attendant duty of confidentiality.

[9] As we discussed in Opinion 302, in the District of Columbia, the question of what conduct gives rise to an attorney-client relationship is a matter of substantive law. Neither a retainer nor a formal agreement is required in order to establish an attorney-client relationship in the District of Columbia. See, e.g. In re Lieber, 442 A.2d 153 (D.C. 1982) (attorney-client relationship formed where attorney failed to indicate lack of consent to accept a court appointed client after receiving notification of appointment by mail). Further, even casual legal advice can give rise to an attorney-client relationship if the putative client relies upon it. See, e.g., Togstad v. Vesely, Otto, Miller & Keffe, 291 N.W.2d 686 (Minn. 1980) (finding an attorney-client relationship where the attorney stated that he did not think a prospective client had a cause of action but would discuss it with his partner, did not call prospective client back, and prospective client relied on attorney's assessment and did not continue to seek legal representation).

ii. Avoiding the creation of conflicts of interest

Consideration must also be given to avoid the acquisition of uninvited information through social media sites that could create actual or perceived conflicts of interest for the lawyer or the lawyer's firm. Caution should be exercised when stating positions on issues, as those stated positions could be adverse to an interest of a client, thus inadvertently creating a conflict. Rule 1.7(b)(4) states that an attorney shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if "the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by . . . the lawyer's own financial, business, property or personal interests," unless the conflict is resolved in accordance with Rule 1.7(c). Content of social media posts made by attorneys may contain evidence of such conflicts.

Moreover, online communications and interactions with people who are unknown to the lawyer may unintentionally cause the development of relationships with persons or parties who may have interests that are adverse to those of existing clients.

iii. Protecting client confidences and secrets

Protecting client information is of the utmost importance when using social media. Most attorneys are aware of the importance of protecting attorney-client communications, attorney work-product or other privileged information. The obligation to protect this information extends beyond the termination of the attorney-client relationship.

Rule 1.6 distinguishes between information that is "confidential" and that which is a "secret," and requires attorneys to protect both kinds of information. In the District of Columbia,

> "Confidence" refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law. "Secret" refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client.

Rule 1.6(b). Comment [8] to Rule 1.6 makes clear that the Rule potentially applies to all information gained in the course of the professional relationship, and exists without regard to the nature or source of the information, or the fact that others share the knowledge.

No less critical are considerations of the level of confidentiality available on the social media sites themselves. If an attorney uses social media to communicate with potential or actual clients or co-counsel, then careful attention must be paid to issues of privacy and confidentiality. It is critically important that lawyers review the policies of the social media sites that they frequent, particularly policies related to data collection. Privacy settings on social media are not the equivalent of a guarantee of confidentiality.

Particular consideration must be given to the issue of maintaining and protecting the confidentiality of communications on social networking sites.[10] Messaging and electronic mail services provided by social networking sites may lack safeguards sufficient for communicating with clients or prospective clients. Moreover, the messaging and electronic mail services provided by these sites should not be assumed to be confidential or private. Therefore, when appropriate, clients or potential clients should be advised by lawyers of the existence of more secure means of communicating confidential, privileged, sensitive or otherwise protected information. Messages with clients that are sent or received via social networks must be treated with the same degree of reasonable care as messages sent or received via electronic mail or other traditional means of communication. Social media sites may not permanently retain messages or other communications; therefore care should be taken to preserve these communications outside of the social media site, in order to ensure that the communications are maintained as part of the client file. It is advisable that communications regarding on-going representations or pending legal matters be made through secured office e-mail, and not through social media sites.

Certain social media sites collect information about the people and groups that the user is connected to and the interactions with that group or person. The information collected is gathered from both the lawyer and the person communicating with the lawyer and can include content, information and frequency of contact.[11] These sites also collect information about uses of their partner products and/or websites, allowing the social media service to collect and integrate information about its users, which can be used for targeted advertising and/or research purposes.[12] Thus, depending on the intended use of the social media site, it is advisable for a lawyer to give careful consideration to which social media sites, if any, may be more appropriate for business-related uses or for communications with potential or actual clients.

When inviting others to view a lawyer's social media site, or profile, a lawyer must be mindful of the ethical restrictions relating to solicitations and other communications. Most social networking sites require an e-mail address from the user as part of the registration process. Then, once the social networking site is accessed by a lawyer, the site may access the entire address book (or contacts list) of the user. Aside from any data collection purposes, this access allows the social media site to suggest potential connections with people the lawyer may know who are already members of the social network, to send requests or other invitations to have these contacts connect with the lawyer on that social network, or to invite non-members of the social network to join it and connect with the lawyer.

However, in many instances, the people contained in a lawyer's address book or contact list are a blend of personal and professional contacts. Contact lists frequently include clients, opposing counsel, judges and others whom it may be impermissible, inappropriate or potentially embarrassing to have as a connection on a social networking site. The connection services provided by many social networks can be a good marketing and networking tool, but for attorneys, these connection services could potentially identify clients or divulge other information that a lawyer might not want an adversary or a member of the judiciary to see or information that the lawyer is obligated to protect from disclosure. Accordingly, great caution should be exercised whenever a social networking

[10] See also D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 281.

[11] An example is contained in Facebook's data policy. (https://www.facebook.com/about/privacy/) (last visited Oct. 26, 2016).

[12] Miller, C., The Plus in Google Plus? It's Mostly for Google, Feb. 14, 2014 http://www.nytimes.com/2014/02/15/technology/the-plus-in-google-plus-its-mostly-for-google.html?_r=0 (last visited Oct. 26, 2016).

site requests permission to access e-mail contacts or to send e-mail to the people in the lawyer's address book or contact list and care should be taken to avoid inadvertently agreeing to allow a third-party service access to a lawyer's address book or contacts.

B. Attorneys may write about their own cases on social media sites, blogs or other internet-based publications, with the informed consent of their clients.

The scope of the protections provided in Rule 1.6 militates in favor of prudence when it comes to disclosing information regarding clients and cases. While lawyers may ethically write about their cases on social media, lawyers must take care not to disclose confidential or secret client information in social media posts. Rule 1.6(e)(1) states that a lawyer may use a client's confidences and secrets for the lawyer's own benefit or that of a third party only after the attorney has obtained the client's informed consent to the use in question. Because Rule 1.6 extends to even information that may be known to other people, the prudent lawyer will obtain client consent before sharing any information regarding a representation or disclosing the identity of a client. Even if the attorney is reasonably sure that the information being disclosed would not be subject to Rule 1.6, it is prudent to obtain explicit informed client consent before making such posts. With or without client consent, attorneys should exercise good judgment and great caution in determining the appropriateness of such posts. Consideration should be given to the identity of the client and the sensitivity of the subject matter, even if the client is not overtly identified. It is advisable that the attorney share a draft of the proposed post or blog entry with the client, so there can be no miscommunication regarding the nature of the content that the attorney wishes to make public. It is also advisable, should the client agree that the content may be made public, that the attorney obtain that client consent in a written form.

Consideration must also be given to ensure that such disclosures on social media are compliant with Rule 7.1. Rule 7.1 governs all communications about a lawyer's services, including advertising. These Rules extend to online writings, whether on social media, a blog or other internet-based publication, regarding a lawyer's own cases. Such communications are subject to the Rules because they have the capacity to mislead by creating the unjustified expectation that similar results can be obtained for others. Care must be taken to avoid material misrepresentations of law or fact, or the omission of facts necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading. Accordingly, social media posts regarding a lawyer's own cases should contain a prominent disclaimer making clear that past results are not a guarantee that similar results can be obtained for others.

Law firms that have blogs or social media sites or that allow their lawyers to maintain their own legal blogs or social media pages should take appropriate steps to ensure that such content is compliant with the Rules, consistent with the duties set forth in Rule 5.1. Non-attorney employees who create content for their own or their employers' social media sites should be educated regarding the protection of client information and, if appropriate, be supervised by their employing law firm or lawyer, as required by Rule 5.3.[13]

As noted above, all social media postings for law firms or lawyers, including blogs, should contain disclaimers and privacy statements sufficient to convey to prospective clients and visitors that the social media posts are not intended to convey legal advice and do not create an attorney-client relationship.

C. Attorneys may, with caution, respond to comments or online reviews from clients.

The ability for clients to place reviews and opinions of the services provided by their counsel on the internet can present challenges for attorneys. An attorney must monitor his or her own social networking websites, verify the accuracy of information posted by others on the site, and correct or remove inaccurate information displayed on their social media page(s). As set forth in comment [1] to Rule 7.1, client reviews that may be contained on social media posts or webpages must be reviewed for compliance with Rule 7.1(a) to ensure that they do not create the "unjustified expectation that similar results can be obtained for others."[14]

Attorneys may respond to negative online reviews or comments from clients. However, Rule 1.6 does not provide complete safe harbor for the disclosure of client confidences in response to a negative internet review or opinion. Rule 1.6(e) states that:

> A lawyer may use or reveal client confidences or secrets:
>
> (3) to the extent reasonably necessary to establish a defense to a criminal charge, disciplinary charge, or civil claim, formally instituted against the lawyer, based upon conduct in which the client was involved, or to the extent reasonably necessary to respond to specific allegations by the client concerning the lawyer's representation of the client [emphasis added].

Thus, the lawyer's ability to reveal confidences under Rule 1.6(e)(3) is limited to only "specific" allegations by the client concerning the lawyer's representation of the client. Comment [25] to Rule 1.6 specifically excludes general criticisms of an attorney from the kinds of allegations to which an attorney may respond using information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6. However, even when the lawyer is operating within the scope of the Rule 1.6(e)(3) exception, the comments to Rule 1.6 caution that disclosures should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes are necessary. There is no exception in Rule 1.6 that allows an attorney to disclose client confidences or secrets in response to specific or general allegations regarding an attorney's conduct contained in an online review from a third party, such as opposing counsel or a non-client.[15]

Other jurisdictions have taken a more restrictive view of responding to comments or reviews on lawyer-rating websites. For example, the New York State Bar Association Committee on Professional Ethics, in its Opinion 1032 (2014), held that "[a] lawyer may not disclose confidential client information solely to respond to a former client's criticism of the lawyer posted on a [lawyer-rating website]." The New York analysis turned on the language contained in New York's Rule 1.6, which requires "accusations," rather than allegations, in order to trigger the "self-defense" exception of N.Y. Rule 1.6. Attorneys licensed in the District of Columbia who are admitted to practice in multiple jurisdictions are cautioned that they may be subject to the disciplinary authority of both this jurisdiction and another jurisdiction where the lawyer is admitted for the same conduct. Under the District's choice of law rule, Rule 8.5(b)(2)(ii), > the rules to be applied shall be the rules of the admitting jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices; provided, however, that if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, the rules of that jurisdiction shall be applied to that conduct.

[13] See, e.g., Gene Shipp, Bar Counsel: 20/20: The Future of the Rules of Professional Conduct, WASHINGTON LAWYER (June 2013), sharing the example that our world is changing so fast that "a high-profile celebrity, who comes to your office on a highly confidential matter and graciously pauses to allow a picture with your receptionist, may be unhappy with your staff's violation of Rule 1.6 when their picture appears on the Internet even before you have had a chance to say hello."

[14] The Committee does not distinguish between client comments that are solicited and those that are unsolicited. Rule 7.1 governs all communications about a lawyer's services.

[15] Although beyond the scope of this Opinion, the Committee notes that the Rule 1.6(e)(3) exception allows an attorney to respond to wrongs alleged by a third party, but only if the third party has formally instituted a civil, criminal or disciplinary action against the lawyer. See comments [23] and [24] to Rule 1.6.

See notes 6 and 7, infra.[16]

We recognize that there are limitations on the control that any individual can assert over his or her presence on the internet. That is why we recognize that an attorney's ethical obligations to review and regulate content on social media extends only to those social media sites or webpages for which the attorney maintains control of the content, such as the ability to delete posted content, block users from posting, or block users from viewing. However, notwithstanding the scope of the attorney's affirmative obligations, it is highly advisable for attorneys to be aware of content regarding them on the internet.

D. An attorney or law firm may identify "specialties," "skills" and "expertise" on social media, provided that the representations are not false or misleading.

Many social media sites, like LinkedIn, allow attorneys to identify skills and areas of practice. The District of Columbia does not prohibit statements regarding specialization or expertise. Accordingly, District of Columbia attorneys are ethically permitted to identify their skills, expertise and areas of practice, subject to Rule 7.1(a).[17]

As we previously opined in Opinion 249, "Rule 7.1(a) permits truthful claims of lawyer specialization so long as they can be substantiated." Rule 7.1(a) states that an attorney is prohibited from making a "false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services." The relevant comment [1] to this Rule states that "[i]t is especially important that statements about a lawyer or the lawyer's services be accurate, since many members of the public lack detailed knowledge of legal matters." Accordingly, we conclude that social media profiles or pages that include statements by the attorney setting forth an attorney's skills, areas of specialization or expertise are subject to Rule 7.1(a) and, therefore, cannot be false or misleading.

E. Attorneys must review their social media presence for accuracy.

Consistent with the goals of networking, marketing and making connections, some social networking sites permit members of the site to recommend fellow members or to endorse a fellow member's skills. Users may also request that others endorse the lawyer for specified skills that the lawyer has indicated he or she possesses. LinkedIn and other sites also allow clients or others to submit written reviews or recommendations of the lawyer. Other legal-specific social networking sites focus exclusively on endorsements or recommendations. It is our view that a lawyer is ethically permitted, with caution, to recommend other attorneys, and to accept endorsements, written reviews and recommendations, subject to the Rules.

As noted above, it is our opinion that lawyers in the District of Columbia have a duty to monitor their social network sites. If a lawyer controls or maintains the content contained on a social media page, then the lawyer has an affirmative obligation to review the content on that page. A lawyer must remove endorsements, recommendations or other content that are false or misleading. Lawyers are advised that it is appropriate to reject or refuse endorsements from people who lack the knowledge necessary for making the recommendation. It would be misleading for an attorney to display recommendations or endorsements of skills that are received from people who do not have a factual basis to evaluate the lawyer's skills. Lawyers must reject or refuse endorsements that indicate that the lawyer possesses skills or expertise that the lawyer does not possess. It would be misleading for an attorney to display a recommendation that contained incorrect information. The operative questions asked by the lawyer when reviewing endorsements or recommendations received on their social media pages should be whether the person making the endorsement knows the lawyer and whether the person can fairly comment on the lawyer's skills.

We recommend that lawyers who are using social media sites that allow for the review of posts, recommendations or endorsements prior to publication avail themselves of the settings that allow review and approval of such information before it is publicized on the lawyer's social media page. Some sites, like LinkedIn, provide settings that allow the user to review and approve endorsements that are received before the endorsements are posted publicly. Users may also choose to keep endorsements hidden so that they are not seen by others.[18] Other social networking sites, like Facebook, allow users to adjust their privacy settings to require user approval before certain content, such as photos, can be displayed on a user's home page. Some social media sites allow users to adjust their privacy settings to require approval before a user can be "tagged," a practice that allows content on another person's page to be displayed on the user's page.

[16] Other jurisdictions have sanctioned attorneys for disclosures of client confidences or secrets on social media or other websites. In 2013, the Hearing Board of the Illinois Attorney Registration and Disciplinary Commission held, in the Matter of Betty Tsamis, that it was a violation of Rule 1.6(a) for an attorney to respond to an unfavorable review on the legal referral website AVVO with a response that revealed confidential information about the client's case. In Tsamis, the attorney first requested that the client remove the posting from the website, which is also a permissible response in the District of Columbia. The client responded that he would remove the post, but only if the attorney returned his files and refunded his fees. Thereafter, AVVO removed the posting from its online client reviews. The client then posted a second negative client review to the same website, which the attorney responded to, disclosing client information. The Hearing Board found that the response exceeded what was necessary to respond to the client's accusations and a reprimand was recommended.

[17] Prudent attorneys should consider the most restrictive rules applicable to them when using self-promotional features on social media. We note that other jurisdictions, like New York, do not permit lawyers to identify themselves as "specialists" unless they have been certified as such by an appropriate organization. They are, however, permitted to detail their skills and experience. See N.Y. Cnty. Lawyers Ass'n Comm. on Prof'l Ethics, Op. 748 (Mar. 10, 2015).

[18] Lawyers are advised to review the guidance provided by other jurisdictions in which they are admitted to practice regarding the use of endorsements or the skills and expertise sections in a LinkedIn profile. See, e.g., Maryland State Bar Ass'n, Comm. on Ethics, Ethics Docket No. 2014-05; Philadelphia Bar Ass'n, Prof'l Guidance Comm., Op. 2012-8 (Nov. 2012); South Carolina Ethics Advisory Comm., Op. 09-10; see also note 17.

It is suggested that lawyers, particularly those who do not frequently monitor their social media pages, those who may not know everyone in their networks well, or those who wish to have an added layer of protection, utilize these heightened privacy settings. Aside from the potential ethical issues discussed herein, there are many good reasons for a lawyer to want to maintain a higher level of control over what content others may place on a lawyer's social media page(s).

It is permissible under the Rules for a lawyer to make an endorsement or recommendation of another attorney on a social networking site, provided that the endorsement or recommendation is not false or misleading. Such endorsements and recommendations must be based upon the belief that the recipient of the endorsement does in fact possess said skills or legal acumen. Rule 8.4(c) prohibits an attorney from being dishonest, or engaging in fraud, deceit or misrepresentation. Therefore, a lawyer must only provide an endorsement or recommendation of someone on social media that the endorsing lawyer believes to be justified.

Rule 8.4(a) states that it is misconduct for a lawyer to violate or to attempt to violate ethics rules through the acts of others. Thus, clients and colleagues cannot say things about the lawyer that the lawyer cannot say. The lawyer's obligation to monitor, review and correct content on social media sites for which they maintain control exists regardless of whether the information was posted by the attorney, a client or a third party.

We reiterate that, for websites or social media sites where the attorney does not have editorial control over content or the postings of others, we do not believe that the Rules impose an affirmative duty on a lawyer to monitor the content of the sites; however, under certain circumstances, it may be appropriate for the attorney to request that the poster remove the content, to request that the social networking site remove the content, or for the attorney to post a curative response addressing the inaccurate content.

V. Conclusion

Social media is a constantly changing area of technology. Social media can be an effective tool for providing information to the public, for networking and for communications. However, using such tools requires that the lawyer maintain and update his or her social media pages or profiles in order to ensure that information is accurate and adequately protected.

Accordingly, this Committee concludes that a lawyer who chooses to maintain a presence on social media, for personal or professional reasons, must take affirmative steps to remain competent regarding the technology being used and to ensure compliance with the applicable Rules of Professional Conduct.

The world of social media is a nascent area that continues to change as new technology is introduced into the marketplace. Best practices and ethical guidelines will, as a result, continue to evolve to keep pace with such developments.

Published November 2016

Opinion 371

Social Media II: Use of Social Media in Providing Legal Services

Introduction

Information posted on social media and use of social media in the substantive practice of law raise multiple issues under the Rules of Professional Conduct in all practice areas. This Opinion provides the Committee's guidance about advice and conduct by lawyers related to social media in the provision of legal services, including whether certain advice and conduct are required, permitted, or prohibited by the Rules. The Opinion also identifies issues for lawyers to spot as they provide legal services. Opinion 370 (Social Media I) addresses lawyers' use of social media in marketing and personal use.

The Committee defines social media as follows:

> Social media include any electronic platform through which people may communicate or interact in a public, semi-private, or private way. Through blogs, public and private chat rooms, listservs, other online locations, social networks, and websites such as Facebook, LinkedIn, Instagram, Twitter, Yelp, Angie's List, Avvo, and Lawyers.com, users of social media can share information, messages, e-mail, instant messages, photographs, video, voice, or videoconferencing content.[1] This definition includes social networks, public and private chat rooms, listservs, and other online locations where attorneys communicate with the public, other attorneys, or clients. Varying degrees of privacy exist in these online communities as users may have the ability to limit who may see their posted content and who may post content to their pages.[2]

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.1 (Competence)
- Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.4 (Communication)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 3.1 (Meritorious Claims and Contentions)
- Rule 3.3 (Candor to Tribunal)
- Rule 3.4 (Fairness to Opposing Party and Counsel)
- Rule 3.5 (Impartiality and Decorum of the Tribunal)
- Rule 3.6 (Trial Publicity)
- Rule 3.8 (Special Responsibilities of a Prosecutor) Rule 4.1 (Truthfulness in Statements to Others)
- Rule 4.2 (Communication Between Lawyer and Person Represented by Counsel)
- Rule 4.3 (Dealing with Unrepresented Person)
- Rule 4.4 (Respect for Rights of Third Persons)
- Rule 5.1 (Responsibilities of Partners, Managers, and Supervisory Lawyers)
- Rule 5.3 (Responsibilities Regarding Nonlawyer Assistants)
- Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

I. Understanding Social Media

Because the practice of law involves use or potential use of social media in many ways, competent representation under Rule 1.1[3] requires a lawyer to understand how social media work and

[1] "Content" means any communication, whether for personal or business purposes, disseminated through websites, social media sites, blogs, chat rooms, listservs, instant messaging, or other internet presences, and any attachments or links related thereto.

[2] The Merriam-Webster Dictionary defines "social media" as "forms of electronic communication … through which users create online communities to share information, ideas, personal messages, and other content…." More specifically to the legal profession, the New York State Bar Association Committee on Professional Ethics, in its Formal Opinion No. 2012-2 (May 30, 2012), stated:

> We understand "social media" to be services or websites people join voluntarily in order to interact, communicate, or stay in touch with a group of users, sometimes called a "network." Most such services allow users to create personal profiles, and some allow users to post pictures and messages about their daily lives.

[3] Rule 1.1(a) states:
A lawyer shall provide competent representation to a client. Competent representation requires the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness, and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation.

how they can be used to represent a client zealously and diligently[4] under Rule 1.3.[5] Recognizing the pervasive use of social media in modern society, lawyers must at least consider whether and how social media may benefit or harm client matters in a variety of circumstances. We do not advise that every legal representation requires a lawyer to use social media. What is required is the ability to exercise informed professional judgment reasonably necessary to carry out the representation. Such understanding can be acquired and exercised with the assistance of other lawyers and staff.[6]

We agree with ABA Comment [8] to Model Rule 1.1 that to be competent "a lawyer should keep abreast of changes in the law and its practice, including the benefits and risks associated with relevant technology." Although the District's Comments to Rule 1.1 do not specifically reference technology, competent representation always requires the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness, and preparation reasonably necessary to carry out the representation. Because of society's embrace of technology, a lawyer's ignorance or disregard of it, including social media, presents a risk of ethical misconduct.

Similarly, the requirement of D.C. Rule 1.3(b)(1) to "seek the lawful objectives of a client through reasonably available means" may require that a lawyer utilize social media if it would assist zealous and diligent representation. In using social media for representation, however, a lawyer must at all times stay within the "bounds of the law,"[7] including for example the general prohibition on misrepresentation by pretexting and the duty of truthfulness discussed in this and other Opinions.[8]

II. Communication with Clients

The duty to maintain client confidences under Rule 1.6,[9] the duty to provide competent representation under Rule 1.1, and the duty to communicate with clients under Rule 1.4[10] are all implicated by lawyer-client social media communication. Because social media communication often is public or semi-public, confidentiality of lawyer-client communication is an important concern.

Protecting the confidentiality of lawyer-client communication under Rule 1.6 requires a lawyer to understand in particular how non-clients can access client social media communication and postings.[11] For example, social media sites usually have a range of privacy settings, and clients may give others access to content posted behind private settings. In addition, site privacy settings can unexpectedly change with new terms and conditions imposed by the site host. Rules 1.1, 1.4 and 1.6 may require[12] that a lawyer advise clients about how non-client access to posted information about legal matters risks inappropriate disclosure of the information, waiver of the attorney-client privilege, and loss of litigation work-product protection.[13] See, e.g., Lenz v. Universal Music Corp., in which the plaintiff "made comments in emails and electronic 'chats' with friends, [and] postings on her blog," which comments disclosed her discussions with counsel. [14] The Court held that the emails and chats waived the attorney-client privilege regarding the matters discussed.

A lawyer should consider reaching agreement with clients about how their attorney-client communication will occur, including whether or not social media should ever be used for such communication because of the confidentiality risks. Agreements about these subjects could be included in engagement letters.

III. Social Media as Sources of Information about Cases or Matters

Social media have become sources of relevant information in litigation and other adversarial proceedings, as well as in a broad array of transactional and advisory practices, including regulatory work.

A. Client Social Media

Rules 1.1 and 1.3 require a lawyer to consider the potential risks and benefits that client social media could have on litigation, regulatory, and transactional matters undertaken by the lawyer, and Rule 1.4 requires a lawyer to discuss such risks and benefits with clients.[15]

1. Review by Client's Lawyer

Competent and zealous representation under Rules 1.1 and 1.3 may require lawyer review of client social media postings relevant to client matters.[16] In litigation, client social media postings could be inconsistent with claims, defenses, pleadings, filings, or litigation/regulatory positions. For example, if a client initiated an action claiming serious injuries, the client's social media profile could disclose activity inconsistent with the injuries alleged.[17] A lawyer must address

---

[4] See, e.g., N.Y. State Bar Ass'n Social Media Comm., Social Media Ethics Guidelines of the Commercial and Federal Litigation Section (2015) ("NYSBA Guidelines"); American Bar Ass'n Standing Comm. on Ethics & Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 466 (2014) ("ABA Op. 466"); N.C. State Bar, Formal Ethics Op. 2014-5 (revised 2015) ("N.C. Op. 2014-5"); Pa. Bar Ass'n, Formal Op. 2014-300 ("Pa. Op. 2014-300"). See generally D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Op. 281 (1998) (noting in an early internet-related opinion about confidentiality risks from e-mail communication that it was important to understand how e-mails actually traveled over the internet).

[5] Rule 1.3(a) states:
A lawyer shall represent a client zealously and diligently within the bounds of the law.

[6] See MODEL RULES OF PROF'L CONDUCT r. 1.1 cmt. 2 (AM. BAR ASS'N 2014).

[7] See supra note 5.

[8] See generally D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 323 (2004) and other Opinions addressing application of D.C. Rule 8.4(c).

[9] Rule 1.6(a) and (b) states in part:
(a) Except when permitted under paragraph (c), (d), or (e), a lawyer shall not knowingly:
(1)[R]eveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client; . . . .
(b) "Confidence" refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law, and "secret" refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client.

[10] Rule 1.4(a) and (b) states:
(a) A lawyer shall keep a client reasonably informed about the status of a matter and promptly comply with reasonable requests for information.
(b) A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation.

[11] See supra note 4.

[12] In this Opinion the terms "may require" and "may need to" mean that whether the referenced Rules would establish a requirement in any given matter will depend on circumstances such as the scope of a lawyer's representation and the nature of the matter. At the same time, the term reflects the Committee's view that the referenced issue should be given serious consideration and could constitute a requirement. The term "should" has the meaning established in the first paragraph of the Scope page of the Rules. See Comment 3 to Rule 1.4.

[13] See, e.g., NYSBA Guidelines; Pa. Op. 2014-300.

[14] Lenz v. Universal Music Corp., No. 5:07-CV-03783 JF (PVT), 2010 WL 4789099, at *1 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 17, 2010).

[15] See generally NYSBA Guidelines; N.Y. Cty. Lawyers' Ass'n, Ethics Op. 745 (2013) ("NYCLA Op. 745").

[16] See, e.g., Pa. Op. 2014-300.

[17] See, e.g., McMillen v. Hummingbird Speedway, Inc., No. 113-2010 CD, 2010 WL 4403285 2010 Pa. Dist. & Cnty. Dec. LEXIS 270, at *1, any such known inconsistencies before submitting court or agency filings to ensure that claims and positions are meritorious under Rule 3.1, which requires a non-frivolous basis in law and fact,[18] and that misrepresentations are not made to courts or agencies[19] in violation of Rules 3.3 and 8.4.[20]

Client social media also can present risks and benefits for transactions and regulatory compliance. For example, review of client social media for their consistency with representations, warranties, covenants, conditions, restrictions, and other terms or proposed terms of agreements could be important because inconsistency could create rights or remedies for counterparties. Similarly, competent and zealous representation under Rules 1.1 and 1.3 in regulatory matters may require ensuring that representations to agencies are consistent with social media postings and that advice to clients takes such postings into account.

2. Review by Adversaries

In litigation and adversarial regulatory matters, social media postings without privacy settings are subject to investigation. Lawyers can and do look at the public social media postings of their opponents, witnesses, and other relevant parties, and as discussed below, may even have an ethical obligation to do so. Postings with privacy settings on client social media are subject to formal discovery and subpoenas.[21] To provide competent advice, a lawyer should understand that privacy settings do not create any expectation of confidentiality to establish privilege or work-product protection against discovery and subpoenas.[22]

3. Document Preservation

Because social media postings are subject to discovery and subpoenas, a lawyer may need to include social media in advice and instructions to clients about litigation holds, document preservation, and document collection.[23] A lawyer also may need to determine whether under applicable law, which varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, clients may modify their social media presence once litigation or regulatory proceedings are anticipated. For example, are clients permitted to change privacy settings or to remove information altogether from social media postings? Such analysis may need to include consideration of obstruction statutes, spoliation law,[24] and procedural rules applicable to criminal and regulatory investigations and cases; procedural rules and spoliation law in civil cases; and the duty under Rule 3.4(a) not to "[o]bstruct another party's access to evidence or alter, destroy, or conceal evidence, or counsel or assist another person to do so. . . ."[25] Before any lawyer-counseled or lawyer-assisted removal or change in content of client social media, at a minimum, an accurate copy of such social media should be made and preserved, consistent with Rule 3.4(a).[26]

Transactional and regulatory representation also can include advice about adjusting client social media. In the absence of unlawful activity or anticipation of litigation or adversary proceedings, that advice may not be constrained by spoliation or obstruction of justice considerations. In order to comply with Rule 1.1, however, a lawyer should not advise a client to make fraudulent or unlawful adjustments; nor should a lawyer participate in such activity or in misrepresentations or material omissions in violation of Rules 1.2(e),[27] 4.1,[28] or 8.4(c).

4. Substantive Regulatory Risks

In regulatory practice, competent and zealous representation also may require advice about whether social media postings or use violate statutory or rule-based limits on public statements or marketing. The Securities and Exchange Commission, Federal Trade Commission, Consumer Product Safety Commission, Food and Drug Administration, and other federal, state, and local agencies have promulgated such limits or guidelines. For example, in April 2013 the SEC Division of Enforcement applied Regulation FD and *13 (Pa. Ct. Com. Pl., Jefferson Cty. Sept. 9, 2010) (plaintiff alleged substantial injures, including "possible permanent impairment," yet public Facebook postings showed him taking several trips, indicating he had exaggerated his injuries).

[18] Rule 3.1 states in part:
A lawyer shall not bring or defend a proceeding, or assert or controvert an issue therein, unless there is a basis in law and fact for doing so that is not frivolous, which includes a good-faith argument for an extension, modification, or reversal of existing law.

[19] See, e.g., NYCLA Op. 745; see also NYSBA Guidelines.

[20] Rule 3.3(a)(1) states:
(a) A lawyer shall not knowingly:
Make a false statement of fact or law to a tribunal or fail to correct a false statement of material fact or law previously made to the tribunal by the lawyer, unless correction would require disclosure of information that is prohibited by Rule 1.6.

Rule 8.4(c) states:
It is professional misconduct for a lawyer to:
(c)Engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation.

[21] See, e.g., Robinson v. Jones Lang LaSalle Ams., Inc., No. 3:12-cv-00127-PK, 2012 WL 3763545, at *1 (D. Or. Aug. 29, 2012) ("I see no principled reason to articulate different standards for the discoverability of communications through email, text message, or social media platforms."); Loporcaro v. City of New York, 950 N.Y.S.2d 723 (Sup. Ct., Richmond Cty. 2012) (unpublished table decision), 2012 WL 1231021, at *7 ("Clearly, our present discovery statutes do not allow that the contents of such [social media] accounts should be treated differently from the rules applied to any other discovery material. . . .").

[22] See, e.g., Tompkins v. Detroit Metro. Airport, 278 F.R.D. 387, 388 (E.D. Mich. 2012) ("[M]aterial posted on a 'private' Facebook page, that is accessible to a selected group of recipients but not available for viewing by the general public, is generally not privileged, nor is it protected by common law or civil law notions of privacy."); see also Mailhoit v. Home Depot U.S.A., Inc., 285 F.R.D. 566, 570 (C.D. Cal. 2012); Davenport v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins., No. 3:11-cv-632, 2012 WL 555759, at *1 (M.D. Fla. Feb. 21, 2012) (stating that generally social media content "is neither privileged nor protected by any right of privacy"); Patterson v. Turner Constr. Co., 931 N.Y.S.2d 311, 312 (App. Div. 2011).

[23] See, e.g., Pa. Op. 2014-300.

[24] See, e.g., Gatto v. United Air Lines, Inc., No. 10-cv-1090-ES-SCM, 2013 WL 1285285, at *3, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41909, at *10 (D.N.J. Mar. 25, 2013); Torres v. Lexington Ins., 237 F.R.D. 533 (D.P.R. 2006); Lester v. Allied Concrete Co., 83 Va. Cir. 308 (2011), aff'd in part, rev'd in part?, 285 Va. 295 (2013).

[25] D.C. Rule 3.4. See, e.g., NYSBA Guidelines; Pa. Op. 2014-300; N.C. Op. 2014-5; Phila. Bar Ass'n Prof'l Guidance Comm., Op. 2014-5.

[26] See, e.g., Pa. Op. 2014-300. Because adjusting privacy settings does not alter the content of social media postings, Rule 3.4(a) does not require content preservation before such adjustment. Id.

[27] Rule 1.2(e) states:
(e) A lawyer shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent, but a lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client and may counsel or assist a client to make a good-faith effort to determine the validity, scope, meaning, or application of the law.

[28] Rule 4.1 states:
In the course of representing a client, a lawyer shall not knowingly:
(a) Make a false statement of material fact or law to a third person; or
(b) Fail to disclose a material fact to a third person when disclosure is necessary to avoid assisting a criminal or fraudulent act by a client, unless disclosure is prohibited by Rule 1.6.

the Commission's 2008 Guidance to the use of social media.[29] Communications about initial public offerings pose regulatory risk, and those risks apply fully to issuer social media.[30] Inadequately disclosed interactive internet downloads may constitute unfair or deceptive acts or practices in violation of Section 5(a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act.[31] Other agencies have published guidelines, such as a Guidance on social media issued by the Federal Financial Institutions Examination Council.[32]

B. Social Media of Adverse Parties, Counsel, and Experts

Competent and zealous representation under Rules 1.1 and 1.3 may require investigation of potentially relevant social media postings of adverse parties and their counsel, other agents, and experts.[33] In litigation, discovery requests should expressly include social media as sources, and discovery responses should not overlook them. Transactional practice may require review of social media both informally by investigation and formally by including social media in due diligence requests. In conducting such investigations, a lawyer should take into consideration that some social media networks automatically provide information to registered users or members about persons who access their information.[34] This is sometimes referred to as a digital footprint.

1. Media of Represented Persons

Rule 4.2[35] generally forbids communicating with represented persons without the consent of their counsel. The Rule applies to some aspects of social media investigation. A lawyer's review of a represented person's public social media postings does not violate the Rule because no communication occurs. On the other hand, requesting access to information protected by privacy settings, such as making a "friend" request to a represented person, does constitute a communication that is covered by the Rule.[36]

2. Media of Unrepresented Persons

Rule 4.3[37] governs lawyer contacts with unrepresented persons, including when they are adverse parties. This Rule also applies to social media investigation. As with Rule 4.2, review of public postings of an unrepresented person does not implicate the Rule because it does not constitute a communication. On the other hand, requesting access to information protected by privacy settings would trigger the requirements of Rule 4.3(b). Rules 4.1 and 8.4(c) also apply to such social media communication. To comply with these three Rules, in social media communication with unrepresented persons, lawyers should identify themselves, state that they are lawyers, and identify whom they represent and the matter.[38]

3. Pretexting

Rules 4.1 and 8.4 generally preclude pretexting or other misrepresentation during review of social media by a lawyer or his or her agents, including requesting access to information protected by privacy settings.[39] Unannounced review of publicly available sites usually does not involve pretexting or misrepresentation.[40]

4. Document Preservation

Competent and zealous representation under Rules 1.1 and 1.3 may require imposing on adversaries reasonable litigation holds that cover social media and pursuing spoliation remedies of adversaries who have not preserved relevant social media as required by law.[41]

5. Inadvertent Disclosure

If an investigation of social media reveals inadvertent disclosure of privileged or work product protected information, a lawyer should consider whether Rule 4.4[42] or other law, rules, or orders apply.[43] This is consistent with the responsibility of a lawyer to refrain from

---

[29] See Report of Investigation Pursuant to Section 21(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934: Netflix, Inc., and Reed Hastings Exchange Act, Release No. 69279, 105 SEC Docket 4327 (Apr. 2, 2013) (interpreting Commission Guidance on the Use of Company Web Sites, Exchange Act Release No. 58288 (Aug. 7, 2008)).

[30] See id. at 5 ("[I]ssuer communications through social media channels require careful Regulation FD analysis comparable to communications through more traditional channels [and] the principles outlined in the 2008 Guidance . . . apply with equal force to corporate disclosures made through social media channels.").

[31] Complaint and Decision and Order, In Re. Sears Holdings Mgmt. Corp., FTC No. C-4264 (Aug. 31, 2009).

[32] Social Media: Consumer Compliance Risk Management Guidance, 78 Fed. Reg. 76,297 (Dec. 17, 2013).

[33] See id.; see also NYCLA Op. 745.

[34] See, e.g., NYSBA Guidelines; Ass'n of the Bar of the City of N.Y. Comm. on Prof'l Ethics, Formal Op. 2012-2 ("N.Y.C. Op. 2012-2"); see also N.Y. Cty. Lawyers' Ass'n Comm. On Prof'l Ethics, Formal Ethics Op. 743 (2011) ("NYCLA Op. 743").

[35] Rule 4.2(a) states:

(a) During the course of representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a person known to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other person or is authorized by law or a court order to do so.

[36] See, e.g., N.Y. State Bar Ass'n Comm. on Prof'l Ethics, Op. 843 (2010); see also Colo. Bar Ass'n Ethics Comm., Formal Op. 127 (2015) ("Colo. Op. 127"); Ore. State Bar, Formal Op. 2013-189 ("Ore. Op. 2013-189"); San Diego Cty. Bar Ass'n Legal Ethics Comm., Op. 2011-2 ("SDCBA Op. 2011-2").

[37] Rule 4.3(a)(2) and (b) states:

(a) In dealing on behalf of a client with a person who is not represented by counsel, a lawyer shall not. . . .:

(2) State or imply to unrepresented persons whose interests are not in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client that the lawyer is disinterested.

(b) When the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to correct the misunderstanding.

[38] See, e.g., Mass Bar Ass'n, Ethics Op. 2014-5; N.H. Bar Ass'n Ethics Comm., Advisory Op. 2012-13/05; see generally D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Op. 321 (2003). But see SDCBA Op. 2011-; N.Y.C. Bar Ass'n Prof'l Ethics Comm., Formal Op. 2010-02; Colo. Op. 127; Ore. Op. 2013-189; Phila. Bar Ass'n Prof'l Guidance Comm., Op. 2009-02; Pa. Op. 2014-300.

[39] See, e.g., SDCBA Op. 2011-2; see also Colo. Op. 127; Phila. Bar Ass'n Prof'l Guidance Comm., Op. 2009-02; Ore. Op. 2013-189; N.Y.C. Op. 2010-02. See generally D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Op. 323 (2004) (misrepresentation by government lawyers); Hope C. Todd, Speaking of Ethics: Lies, Damn Lies: Pretexting and D.C. Rule 8.4(c), WASHINGTON LAWYER (Jan. 2015).

[40] The Committee does not express a view about whether pretexting can arise from site publication of terms and conditions for public access.

[41] See, e.g., Margaret DiBianca, Discovery and Preservation of Social Media Evidence, Bus. L. Today (Am. Bar Ass'n Jan. 2014) (noting "social media content should be included in litigation-hold notices").

[42] Rule 4.4(b) states:

(b) A lawyer who receives a writing relating to the representation of a client and knows, before [reading] the writing, that it has been inadvertently sent, shall not examine the writing, but shall notify the sending party and abide by the instructions of the sending party regarding the return or destruction of the writing.

[43] See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Op. 256 (1995).

seeking information that is protected by the attorney-client privilege of another party.[44]

6. Trial Evidence and Service of Process

At the time of social media investigation or later, competent and zealous representation under Rules 1.1 and 1.3 may require consideration of how social media information will be authenticated and presented as evidence at trials or hearings.[45]

In some jurisdictions, social media also may be used to effect alternative service on opposing parties.[46]

C. Social Media of Fact Witnesses and Other Sources of Facts

All of the above considerations about investigation and use of social media of adverse parties apply to non-party sources of facts, including witnesses.

D. Social Media of Jurors

Competent and zealous representation under Rules 1.1 and 1.3 may require investigation of relevant information from social media sites of jurors or potential jurors to discover bias or other relevant information for jury selection.[47]

Accessing public social media sites of jurors or potential jurors is not prohibited by Rule 3.5 as long as there is no communication by the lawyer with the juror in violation of Rule 3.5(b),[48] and as long as such access does not violate other applicable Rules of Professional Conduct.[49] As noted above, some social media networks automatically provide information to registered users or members about persons who access their information. In the Committee's view, such notification does not constitute a communication between the lawyer and the juror or prospective juror.

Ex parte communication with jurors or potential jurors is prohibited by Rule 3.5(b).[50] Because requesting access to a juror's or potential juror's private media sites involves communication with the juror, such requests would violate the Rule.[51] In addition, if a court or judge forbids access to the social media of jurors and potential jurors, then a violation of a court rule or order could raise questions under Rule 3.4(c).[52]

Review of juror or potential juror social media could reveal misconduct by the juror or others. Whether and how such misconduct must or should be disclosed to a court is beyond the scope of the Rules of Professional Conduct, except to the extent that the review has revealed information clearly establishing that a fraud has been perpetrated upon the tribunal[53] under Rule 3.3(d).[54]

E. Social Media of Judges, Arbitrators, and Regulators

Social media of judges, arbitrators, regulators, and agencies could contain information relevant to cases and other matters in which a lawyer provides representation.

To the extent not prevented by court, agency, or professional responsibility rules, competent and zealous representation under Rules 1.1 and 1.3 may require investigation of relevant information from social media sites of decision-makers. For example, to formulate regulatory advice, a lawyer may need to review public social media of agencies and their decision-makers, while avoiding inappropriate ex parte communication, pretexting not authorized by law, and influence prohibited by law.

As with social media of jurors, lawyer review of public social media of judges, arbitrators, regulators, and other neutrals does not constitute communication and therefore is not an ex parte contact in violation of Rule 3.5, even if it occurs during the pendency of a case or matter.

The ABA and several ethics opinions have opined that judges can participate in social media, and a lawyer can be a "friend" of judges on social media sites, as long as the contacts comply with the Code of Judicial Conduct; do not undermine the judges' independence, integrity, or impartiality; and do not create an appearance of impropriety.[55] D.C. Rule 3.5(a)[56] prohibits seeking to influence a judge or other official by means prohibited by law.

When no case or proceeding involving a lawyer is pending, Rule 3.5 does not forbid the lawyer from becoming a "friend" of judges, arbitrators, regulators, or other neutrals. Nor does it forbid public or private social media communication with such persons, as long as Rule 3.5(a) is not violated.[57] When a case or matter is pending before a decision-maker, the prohibition of ex parte communication in Rule 3.5(b) applies to all communication, including by social media.[58] In such a circumstance a lawyer should consider [44] See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Op. 287 (1998) ("[A] lawyer may not solicit information . . . that is reasonably known or which reasonably should be known to the lawyer to be protected from disclosure by statute or by an established evidentiary privilege.").

---

[45] See generally, e.g., Lorraine v. Markel Am. Ins., 241 F.R.D. 534 (D. Md. 2007) (Grimm, M.J.) (addressing evidence rules applicable to social media and other internet evidence).

[46] See, e.g., Baidoo v. Blood-Dzraku, 5 N.Y.S. 3d 709, (Sup. Ct., N.Y. Cty., 2015) and cases cited therein from the Southern District of New York, the Eastern District of Virginia and the Supreme Court of Richmond County, New York allowing alternative service by Facebook; and from the Southern District of New York, the Eastern District of Missouri, and the Supreme Court of Oklahoma not allowing such service. See generally Christopher M. Finke, Internet Service Provided: The Movement Towards Service of Process Via Social Media, U. Balt. L. Rev.: Issues To Watch (Nov. 12, 2015), ubaltlawreview.org/2015/11/12/the-movement-towards-service-of-process-via-social-media.

[47] For example, some courts encourage pretrial investigation of jurors to uncover juror conduct before trials begin. See, e.g., Johnson v. McCullough, 306 S.W.3d 551 (Mo. 2010) (en banc) (per curiam).

[48] See, e.g., NYSBA Guidelines; ABA Op. 466; Pa. Op. 2014-300; NYCLA Op. 743; Ore. Op. 2013-189.

[49] Accord, e.g., ABA Op. 466; Pa. Op. 2014-300. But see NYSBA Guidelines; NYCLA Op. 743; N.Y.C. Op. 2010-2.

[50] Rule 3.5(b) states:
A lawyer shall not:
(b) Communicate ex parte with [a judge or juror] during the proceeding unless authorized to do so by law or court order.

[51] See, e.g., NYSBA Guidelines; ABA Op. 466; Pa. Op. 2014-300; Ore. Op. 2013-189; NYCLA Op. 743.

[52] Rule 3.4(c) states:
A lawyer shall not:
(c) Knowingly disobey an obligation under the rules of a tribunal except for an open refusal based on an assertion that no valid obligation exists.

[53] See, e.g., ABA Op. 466; NYCLA Op. 743.

[54] Rule 3.3(d) states:
(d) A lawyer who receives information clearly establishing that a fraud has been perpetrated upon [a] tribunal shall promptly take reasonable remedial measures, including disclosure to the tribunal to the extent disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(d).

[55] American Bar Ass'n Standing Comm. on Ethics & Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 462 (2013) ("ABA Op. 462"); accord N.C. State Bar, Formal Ethics Opinion 2014-8 ("N.C. Op. 2014-8") (as long as no communication occurs during the pendency of a lawyer's case before the judge); Pa. Op. 2014-300 (as long as the purpose is not to influence the judge and no ex parte communication occurs).

[56] Rule 3.5(a) states:
A lawyer shall not:
(a) Seek to influence a judge, juror, prospective juror, or other official by means prohibited by law.

[57] See id.; Pa. Op. 2014-300.

[58] See, e.g., NYSBA Guidelines; ABA Op. 462; N.C. Op. 2014-8; see also Youkers v. State, 400 S.W.3d 200, 206 (Tex. App. 2013) ("[W]hile the internet and social media websites create new venues for communications, our analysis should not change because an ex parte communication occurs online or offline.").

whether to remove, at least temporarily, the decision-maker as a "friend" or other connection on social media.

F. Lawyer Social Media

Many lawyers and law firms have social media accounts to facilitate review of the internet presence of clients and others as discussed above. In addition, lawyers also use social media sites to comment on legal issues, cases, and matters. Although such social media postings, including about litigation, are not necessarily prohibited, the Rules impose some constraints. See Opinion 370, which addresses lawyers' use of social media for their own marketing and other purposes.

As with all communications by a lawyer, Rule 1.6 prohibits disclosure in social media postings of client confidences or secrets unless expressly or impliedly authorized by the client or unless another specific exception is provided by the Rules. When a client consents to social media posting related to a matter, the lawyer should be careful not to disclose, without specific client consent, attorney-client privileged information. Purposeful disclosure of privileged information could result in a subject matter waiver, and even inadvertent disclosure could result in waiver of particular communications.[59] Such care also should be taken regarding identification, financial, health, and other sensitive personal information. In addition, social media postings should not violate protective orders or confidentiality agreements.

Regarding trials and other adversary proceedings, Rule 3.6[60] prohibits statements by a lawyer, on social media or otherwise, that the lawyer knows or reasonably should know will create a serious and imminent threat of material prejudice to a proceeding. As noted above, Rule 3.5 forbids communications seeking to influence a judge, juror, prospective juror or other official by means prohibited by law or to disrupt any proceeding or tribunal. Rule 3.8(f)[61] prohibits statements by prosecutors that heighten condemnation of the accused and do not serve a legitimate law enforcement purpose.[62] All of these Rules apply to social media postings by a lawyer.

IV. Supervision of Lawyers and Staff

Under Rules 5.1[63] and 5.3,[64] a lawyer should take reasonable measures to ensure that any social media investigation or posting by subordinate lawyers and staff—including personal posting—conforms to the Rules of Professional Conduct, including protection of confidential client information.

V. Conclusion

Social media, like other technology applicable to the practice of law, will continue to change. The principles explained in this Opinion should be applied to such change to ensure continuing compliance with the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Published November 2016

Opinion 372

Ethical Considerations in Law Firm Dissolutions

Introduction and Scope

Numerous ethical obligations attach to both a law firm and its members in connection with the process of the dissolution of the firm. These obligations include, without limitation, the obligation to continue to competently, zealously and diligently represent and communicate with clients during the dissolution process; the obligation of the members of the firm, after consultation, to notify clients of the dissolution and provide clients with options under such notice; the obligation to facilitate the choice of new counsel by clients of the dissolving firm; and, the obligation to properly dispose of client files, funds and other property. As used in this Opinion, the term "dissolution" means the process of terminating the law firm's existence as a legal entity. Since dissolution of a law firm is a process and not a single event, the term is not limited to the legal or technical action which is required to terminate the existence of the firm as a legal entity under corporate, partnership, bankruptcy or other applicable law. Certain ethical obligations may apply at various points during the dissolution process itself and other ethical obligations may continue to apply after the firm has been dissolved. These ethical obligations may attach either when dissolution of the firm has been agreed to by its members or, absent such agreement, is nonetheless reasonably foreseeable. This Opinion does not address the departure of members of the firm in and of itself, even in significant numbers, absent an expectation that the firm itself will at some reasonably foreseeable time in the future be dissolved.[1]

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.1 (Competence)
- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.4 (Communication)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest; General)
- Rule 1.8(i) (Conflict of Interest; Specific Rules)
- Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest; Former Client)
- Rule 1.15 (Safekeeping Property)
- Rule 1.16(d) (Declining or Terminating Representation)
- Rule 5.1 (Responsibilities of Partners, Managers, and Supervisory Lawyers)
- Rule 5.4(b) (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)
- Rule 5.6(a) (Restrictions on Right to Practice)
- Rule 7.1 (Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services)
- Rule 8.4(c) (Misconduct)

[59] See, e.g., NYSBA Guidelines; D.C. Op. 256.

[60] Rule 3.6 states:
A lawyer engaged in a case being tried to a judge or jury shall not make an extrajudicial statement that the lawyer knows or reasonably should know will be disseminated by means of mass public communication and will create a serious and imminent threat of material prejudice to the proceeding.

[61] Rule 3.8(f) states:
(f) The prosecutor in a criminal case shall not:
Except for statements which are necessary to inform the public of the nature and extent of the prosecutor's action and which serve a legitimate law enforcement purpose, make extrajudicial comments which serve to heighten condemnation of the accused.

[62] See, e.g., United States v. Bowen, 799 F.3d 336 (5th Cir. 2015).

[63] Rule 5.1(b) states:
(b) A lawyer having direct supervisory authority over another lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the other lawyer conforms to the Rules of Professional Conduct.

[64] Rules 5.3(b) states:
With respect to a nonlawyer employed or retained by or associated with a lawyer:
(b) A lawyer having direct supervisory authority over the nonlawyer shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the person's conduct is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyer.

[1] Although the ethical considerations which arise in connection with the lateral movement of lawyers between law firms, as well as law firm mergers and acquisitions, overlap with the ethical considerations which arise in connection with law firm dissolution, this Opinion is limited to the latter. See D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 273 (1997).

Inquiry

The Committee has received numerous inquiries through the ethics helpline and otherwise related to the ethical considerations that arise in connection with law firm dissolution. Unlike jurisdictions which have a specific rule governing law firm dissolution, the D.C. ethical considerations that arise in connection with law firm dissolution are dispersed throughout the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. We believe that it will be helpful to members of the Bar to aggregate the ethical principles of the various applicable D.C. Rules and Opinions in one comprehensive opinion.[2]

Discussion

The paramount principle governing the ethical obligations of a law firm and its members in connection with the process of dissolving the firm is that the law firm and its members must continue to competently, zealously and diligently represent and communicate with the clients during the dissolution process. The Rules of Professional Conduct protect the interests of clients by codifying the responsibilities of the legal profession to the public. Thus, despite the many competing responsibilities and potential difficulties of lawyers during the dissolution process, the ethical duties to clients are paramount. The individual lawyers in the firm have an ethical duty to ensure that the matters for which they are responsible are properly handled with diligence and zeal – including completion of their matters if possible – during the dissolution of the firm.[3] Moreover, since engagement letters are typically contracts between the clients and the dissolving firm, and not the individual lawyers, the firm itself has a comparable ethical duty.[4]

The Dissolution Process

Consultation

When does the process of dissolution of a law firm begin? This question is not susceptible of a bright line test. There are myriad scenarios that lead to the ultimate decision to dissolve a firm. Numerous members of a firm may leave before the remaining partners decide to dissolve the firm. In the Committee's view, the test is: when is there a reasonable expectation that the firm will at some foreseeable time in the future cease to exist as a legal entity? This test may be met by both subjective and objective standards; i.e., the members of the firm may agree to dissolve, or, absent such agreement, a reasonable lawyer considering all of the facts and the conduct of the firm may conclude that dissolution is reasonably foreseeable.

The first step in the dissolution process might well be a decision by the members of the firm, after consultation in good faith, to dissolve the firm. However, we recognize that, in some dissolutions, such consensus and unanimity may be difficult or impossible. Thus, if good faith consultation is impossible or if the authorized members of the firm are unable to agree on dissolution, but there is a reasonable expectation that the firm will at some foreseeable time in the future cease to exist as a legal entity, then individual members of the firm should not be constrained from moving forward.

Notice to Clients

The next step in the dissolution process is to notify firm clients of the dissolution as soon as practicable.[5] Although the timing of notice of the firm's dissolution may not be susceptible of precise determination, the ethical mandate is that the notice to clients be timely. Specifically, if after the firm dissolves the lawyer will no longer represent the client, Rule 1.16 (d) requires the lawyer to "take timely steps to the extent reasonably practicable to protect the client's interests, including giving reasonable notice to the client, allowing time for the client to employ other counsel, surrendering papers and property to which the client is entitled, and refunding any advance payment of fees or expenses that has not been earned or incurred."[6] Even if the lawyer's continued representation beyond dissolution is anticipated or unknown, under Rule 1.4, the notice should be sent early enough so that, upon receipt by the client, the client has sufficient time to make an informed decision regarding the impact of the firm's dissolution on the client's matter(s) and the client's representation generally.[7]

ABA Formal Opinion 99-14 (1999) concludes that, once the members of a firm agree to dissolve, notification to the clients "can be accomplished by the [responsible] lawyer herself, the responsible members of the firm, or the lawyer and those members jointly." ABA Opinion 99-14 does, however, state that "far the better course to protect clients' interests is for the departing lawyer and her law firm to give joint notice of the lawyer's impending departure to all clients for whom the lawyer has performed significant professional services while at the firm, or at least notice to the current clients."

Florida Rule 4-5.8 and Virginia Rule 5.8 specifically govern the dissolution of a law firm in those jurisdictions. Under both jurisdictions' Rules, the lawyers of the dissolving firm may not unilaterally contact clients of the firm unless authorized members of the firm have conferred or attempted to confer and have been unable to agree on a method to provide notice to clients. If no method to provide notice to clients can be agreed upon, the unilateral notice from individual members of the dissolving firm must provide options to the clients that they may choose to be represented by any member of the dissolving firm, other lawyers, or other law firms. If a client of a dissolving law firm fails to advise the lawyers of the client's intention with respect to who is to provide future legal representation, the client is deemed to remain a client of the lawyer who is primarily responsible for representation of the client on behalf of the firm until the client advises otherwise.[8]

In the absence of a specific governing rule in the District of Columbia, and after reviewing the Virginia and Florida Rules, ABA Formal Opinion 99-14, and applicable authority in other jurisdictions, this Opinion provides guidance to members

[2] This Committee does not opine on questions of law outside of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. The ethical questions presented in this inquiry, however, may require consideration of the substantive law that may arise and apply in the context of law firm dissolution, including without limitation the law governing bankruptcy, partnerships, corporations and other business entities, contracts, agency, fiduciary duty, real or personal property, tort, trade secrets and unfair competition. Members of the dissolving firm, and the dissolving firm itself, should consider these as appropriate. Nor, for the most part, does this Opinion address the myriad practical, financial and business considerations related to law firm dissolution.

[3] Rules 1.1 and 1.3.

[4] Id.; see also Rule 5.1.

[5] See Opinion 273, in which we lay out in some detail the specifics of the required notice to clients with respect to lateral moves. The same principles should generally govern notice to clients with respect to law firm dissolution.

[6] Rule 1.16(d).

[7] Rule 1.4(a) and 1.4(b).

[8] See Florida Rule of Prof. Conduct 4-5.8 and Virginia Rule of Prof. Conduct 5.8. For purposes of the notice required by the Virginia Rule, "client" refers to clients for whose active matters the lawyer has primary responsibility. This excludes closed matters and includes associates as well as partners.

of the D.C. Bar on the best practices for law firm dissolution, including notice to clients.[9]

Joint notice by all members of the firm to the clients is preferred.[10] However, if members of the firm cannot agree to provide notice to the clients, or the terms thereof, then in our view an individual lawyer or group of lawyers in the firm may give unilateral notice to the clients. The lawyer in the firm who had the most significant contact with the particular client, if practicable, should give such unilateral notice. Only if this is not practicable should unilateral notice by other lawyers in the firm be given. This resolution addresses the tension between joint notice by members of the firm to clients about the firm's dissolution and solicitation of the clients by individual lawyers of the dissolving firm for their new firm(s) and also enables lawyers to fulfill their ethical obligations to timely communicate information necessary to allow clients to make informed decisions about their legal representations.

Whether the notice is given jointly by all of the authorized members of the dissolving law firm or unilaterally by individual lawyers in the dissolving law firm, it cannot contain false or misleading statements.[11] It should provide the options to the clients to choose representation by any member of the dissolving firm, representation by any other lawyer, or representation by any other law firm. The notice may not restrict any lawyer's right to practice.[12]

In the Committee's view, the notice should further provide that, if the client does not respond to the notice and choose any of these three options, the client shall be deemed to remain a client of the lawyer who has been primarily responsible for providing legal services to the client until the client advises otherwise. We appreciate that identifying the lawyer in the firm who is "primarily responsible" for providing legal services to the client is not always an easy endeavor and should be determined on a case-by-case basis depending upon the particular facts and circumstances of the representation. For example, a client's overall relationship partner may not be the lead litigation counsel in a particular litigation matter for the client; nonetheless, the lead litigation counsel may well be the lawyer "primarily responsible" for providing legal services to the client in that litigation matter.

Which Clients Receive Notice?

All clients affected by the firm's dissolution should be notified. This always includes current clients with active matters. In our view, as a general rule notice need not be given to all former clients whose matters have been closed. However, notice should be given to former clients even if their matters are inactive and their files are closed if the firm is holding files and other property for the presumptive five year period after a matter is closed or if the firm is holding files or other property of intrinsic value, such as an original will or stock certificates.[13] Such clients are clearly affected by the firm's dissolution and should be notified. (See "Client Files" and "Client Trust Funds and Other Property," below, with respect to the ethical requirements for the return of the clients' files, funds and other property.) Moreover, notice to former clients is certainly permissible, although not required.[14]

Options for Client to Choose Counsel under Notice

A key principle governing the ethical obligations of a law firm and its members in connection with the process of dissolving the firm is that the clients do not belong to either the law firm or its members. It is axiomatic that a client has the right to retain and discharge a lawyer at will.[15] When a law firm dissolves, therefore, the client may also discharge counsel and either hire new counsel or not. None of the individual members of the dissolving firm "own" the client. Nor does the dissolving law firm itself, as a separate legal entity, "own" the client.[16] It follows, therefore, that as a general rule a client's right to choose counsel may not be impaired by the dissolution of a law firm. The client may choose to continue to be represented by a member of the dissolving firm at her new firm or to be represented by another lawyer or by another firm.

There may be other facts and circumstances, however, which give rise to exceptions to the general rule that the client has the right to choose counsel, and require the consideration of alternatives. For example, a lawyer's former law firm is dissolving and she is joining another law firm. She represents a client at the former law firm who wishes her to continue the representation at the new law firm. However, the new law firm represents another client whose interests are adverse to those of her client, which creates a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7. The conflict of interest cannot be resolved by client consent or otherwise. The lawyer cannot continue to represent the client at the new firm if such representation will result in a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct or other law.[17] Thus, other ethical obligations may preclude the lawyer's ability to continue to represent her client, even if she and the client wish her to continue the representation.[18]

As another example, a lawyer's former law firm is dissolving and she is joining another law firm that does not have the support and resources with respect to the client's matters as were available at the dissolving firm. This could limit the lawyer's ability to adequately represent her client at the new law firm. This could raise an issue of competent representation under Rule 1.1.

Conversely, there may be situations where the lawyer from the dissolving

[9] This builds on the guidance provided in Opinion 273. However, we caution lawyers in dissolving firms that every notice should be tailored to the particular facts and circumstances surrounding the firm's dissolution, which can be quite varied. There is no "one size fits all" formula for notice to clients when a law firm dissolves.

[10] The ethics opinions of other jurisdictions vary as to whether joint notice, individual notice, or both, is required. See, e.g., Cal. Bar Ethics Op. No. 1985-86 (interpreting the California Rule to require both the departing lawyer and the law firm to provide notice to the client).

[11] Rules 7.1(a) and 8.4(c).

[12] Rule 5.6(a).

[13] See Rule 1.15(a), Rule 1.15(c), Rule 1.16(d), D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 283 (1998).

[14] For example, a lawyer who has had a long and deep relationship with a client, but who has no active matters and is currently holding no client files or other property, may nevertheless consider notifying the former client of her firm's dissolution, as the client may nonetheless view her as its lawyer.

[15] A client has the right to discharge the lawyer at any time, with or without cause, subject to liability for payment for the lawyer's services. Rule 1.16(a)(3); Rule 1.16, comment [4].

[16] In this respect, the Committee is aware of Restatement (3d) of the Law Governing Lawyers, §9(3), comment i, which suggests that clients belong to the law firm and not to the individual lawyer. The Committee disagrees with any characterization of clients as property of the law firm.

[17] Rule 1.16(a)(1).

[18] If a conflict of interest arises under Rule 1.7(b)(1) by virtue of dissolution of a lawyer's firm and her joining a new firm, and the clients do not consent under Rule 1.7(c), a lawyer should consider whether that conflict was or was not reasonably foreseeable under Rule 1.7(d), and thus whether she may or may not continue to represent the client under the "thrust upon" exception to the conflict rule.

firm wishes to withdraw from representation of her client, but there are limitations on her right to do so. As a general rule, a lawyer may withdraw from representing a client after her firm dissolves if the withdrawal can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the interests of the client.[19] However, the lawyer may be compelled to represent the client at her new firm. For example, the lawyer may notify a court, administrative agency or other tribunal that, upon dissolution of her law firm, she wishes to terminate representation of her client at her new firm, but that tribunal may order the lawyer to continue to represent her client.[20]

Thus, depending upon the specifics of the lawyer-client relationship and the particular facts and circumstances of each case, a lawyer in a dissolving firm should carefully consider whether she has an ethical obligation which precludes or limits her ability to continue to represent her client diligently, zealously and competently at her new firm.

A corollary to the client's right to choose counsel is the lawyer's right, after dissolution of her former law firm, to form, or move to, a new law firm. As a general rule, any agreement restricting the right of lawyers in a law firm to practice after the firm dissolves is unethical.[21] Such an agreement not only limits the lawyer's professional autonomy but also limits the freedom of clients to choose a lawyer.[22] A long line of Opinions of this Committee (most recently Opinion 368, Lawyer Employment Agreements – Restrictions on Departing Lawyer Who Competes with Former Firm (2015)) has disapproved various restrictions on the mobility of lawyers as a matter of public policy. Underlying each of these Opinions is the intent to preserve clients' access to lawyers who, because of their background and experience, might be the best available talent to represent them.[23] Of course, the ethical obligations discussed above which may limit the client's ability to choose counsel may also limit the lawyer's ability to choose a new law firm.

Notice to Third Parties

In addition to the client, notice must be given to certain third parties. Opposing counsel and the tribunal must be notified.[24] In addition, governmental agencies and other non-adjudicative administrative entities before which lawyers of the dissolving firm are appearing may require notification under their own rules and procedures, which are beyond the scope of this Opinion.[25]

Client Files

As an ethical matter, at the termination of a representation, upon request of the client, the lawyer must timely surrender the entire file.[26] Such files may be made available for the client to pick up, delivered to the client, delivered to the client's new (or continuing) counsel, destroyed, or delivered to some other person designated by the client. If the files are not necessary to protect the client's interests or otherwise needed for continued representation, the costs of delivery, storage and review of the files may be charged to the client.[27] The lawyer may make a copy of the files at his own cost.[28]

The question often arises as to whether such files may be withheld if the client has not fulfilled his obligation to pay the firm's earned fees and expenses. The District of Columbia permits lawyers to assert and enforce retaining liens against the property of clients for unpaid fees, as a matter of substantive law on which the ethics rules take no position.[29] Rule 1.8(i) provides a narrow exception to Rule 1.16(d): as to files, the lawyer may retain only that portion of the file which constitutes the lawyer's own work product if the client has not paid for the work. Even this narrow exception does not apply if the client has become unable to pay or if withholding the work product might irreparably harm the client's interest. Opinion 250 (1994) states that "retaining liens on client files are now strongly disfavored in the District of Columbia, that the work product exception permitting such liens should be construed narrowly, and that a lawyer should assert a retaining lien only where the exception is clearly applicable and where the lawyer's financial interests clearly outweigh the adversely affected interests of his former client." We stress that a lawyer who relies on the narrow exception of Rule 1.8(i) to withhold any part of a client file does so at his own peril.

For client files maintained solely in electronic form, see Opinion 357 (2010). Absent an agreement to the contrary, a lawyer must comply with a reasonable request by a client to convert electronic records into paper form. In most cases, the client should bear the cost of such conversion, but in certain circumstances the lawyer may be required to bear the cost.

As discussed above, client files are considered "other property" of the client under Rule 1.15(a). Under that Rule and Opinion 283, such files shall be retained for a period of five years after termination of the representation, and under Rule 1.15(c) shall be "promptly delivered" to the client upon direction.

Client Trust Funds and Other Property

Under Rule 1.15(a), client trust funds, including retainers, are to be held in separate trust accounts maintained in accordance with Rule 1.15(b), absent other agreement with the client.[30] Other client property is also to be held separately from the lawyer's own property. Under Rule 1.15(c), upon request by the client, the lawyer shall promptly "deliver" to the client any funds or other property that the client is entitled to receive. Under Rule 1.15(e), Rule 1.16(d) applies to require the return to the client of any unearned portion of advanced legal fees and unincurred costs upon termination of the lawyer's representation.

If, after reasonable but unsuccessful attempts to locate a missing client or a former client for whom a dissolving firm is holding trust funds or other property,

[19] Rule 1.16(b).

[20] Rule 1.16(c).

[21] Rule 5.6(a).

[22] Rule 5.6, comment [1].

[23] See, e.g., D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 335 (2006).

[24] Rule 1.16(c).

[25] As a practical matter notice of the firm's dissolution should also be given to mandatory state bar associations to which lawyers of the dissolving firm belong, other voluntary professional organizations of which it is a member, the firm's malpractice carrier, its accountant, taxing authorities, its bank and other creditors. The dissolving firm may also be required to file notice of dissolution with the D.C. Department of Consumer and Regulatory Affairs.

[26] See Rules 1.16(d) and 1.15(c); see also In re Thai, 987 A.2d 428, 430 (2009) and D.C. Legal Ethics Ops. 250 (1994), 283 (1998), 333 (2005) and 357 (2010). Opinion 333 reaffirms the District's "entire file" approach; i.e., the file includes copies of internal notes and memoranda reflecting the views, thoughts and strategies of the lawyer.

[27] Opinion 283.

[28] See D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 250 (1994).

[29] Rule 1.8, comments [16], [17], [18] and [19]

[30] Rule 1.15(b) clarifies trust funds which must be held in a D.C. IOLTA account. Rule 1.15(e) provides that "advances of unearned fees and unincurred costs shall be treated as property of the client pursuant to paragraph (a) until earned or incurred unless the client gives informed consent to a different arrangement."

the client cannot be located, the firm should consider the funds or other property abandoned and, if the circumstances fall within the District of Columbia's Unclaimed Property Act, dispose of the funds or property as directed by that statute.[31]

Information about the Firm

The dissolving law firm should review its website, firm listings and directories to ensure compliance with Rule 7.1. In light of the pending dissolution, no information can be contained therein which is false or misleading. A communication is false or misleading if either it contains a material misrepresentation of fact, or omission of a fact necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading, or it contains an assertion about the firm or its services that cannot be substantiated.[32] For example, the website should be updated for a transitional period to disclose the firm's dissolution, to provide contact information for the dissolved firm's former lawyers, and to inform clients how to obtain their files.

If the firm is going to use its firm name and letterhead during the transition period, the letterhead must be updated to accurately reflect the dissolution of the firm and the departure of the firm's lawyers.

Sole Practitioners

The Rules recognize the heightened risk to clients upon the dissolution of a solo practice, where such dissolution is due to the death, disappearance or disability of the sole practitioner. In order to protect the interests of a sole practitioner, and ensure continuity of representation of such clients, each sole practitioner should prepare a plan, in conformity with applicable rules, that designates another competent lawyer to review client files, notify each client that the lawyer is no longer engaged in the practice of law, and determine whether there is a need for immediate protective action.[33] The D.C. Bar Practice Management Advisory Service provides confidential consultation services and a checklist for closing a law office which may be particularly helpful to sole practitioners.[34]

If such a succession plan has not been prepared by a sole practitioner, there is a procedure for appointment of counsel by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, on motion of the Board on Professional Responsibility, if a sole practitioner dies, disappears, or is suspended for incapacity or disability and no partner, associate or other responsible attorney is capable of conducting the attorney's affairs.[35]

Dissolution of a Section 5.4(b) Law Firm

A unique issue in the District of Columbia arises upon the dissolution of a law firm that includes both lawyer partners and non-lawyer partners under Rule 5.4(b).

The partnership or other organizational document of the firm may specify the methodology to be followed when such a firm dissolves. In any event, the non-lawyer partners of the firm have ethical duties coextensive with those of the lawyer partners of the firm with respect to clients. Thus, the ethical duties of lawyers of dissolving firms discussed above would apply equally to non-lawyer partners of a Rule 5.4(b) firm.[36]

The non-lawyer partners of the firm and the lawyer partners of the firm have an initial duty to provide notice of the firm's dissolution to the other lawyers in the firm and thereafter to the clients. If good faith efforts to agree upon such a notice to the clients are unsuccessful, the individual lawyers and non-lawyers in the firm may unilaterally notify clients of the firm of the firm's dissolution, subject to the constraints discussed earlier in this Opinion.

If a Rule 5.4(b) firm dissolves and the lawyer partner who was providing legal services to the client in tandem with the non-lawyer partner's provision of non-legal services no longer wishes to provide legal services to the client, and there is no other lawyer who is capable of providing legal services to the client, the lawyer partner may have an ethical duty to continue to provide legal services to the client consistent with Rule 1.16 because the non-lawyer partner cannot provide legal services to the client.

Death, Incompetence or Disability of Lawyer

Where dissolution of a firm is incident to the death, disability or incompetence of a partner in the firm, so that the partner cannot give notice of dissolution to the clients, one of the surviving, competent lawyers should, in addition to any other ethical duties she may have, provide such notice to clients. This could include a partner, co-counsel, associate or otherwise affiliated lawyer.

Conclusion

A lawyer has numerous ethical obligations in connection with the dissolution of his law practice or a law firm of which he is a member. A lawyer must consider the obligations to continue to diligently represent and communicate with clients during the dissolution period, to notify clients of the dissolution, to facilitate the clients' choice of counsel, and to properly dispose of client files, funds or other property. There are additional considerations for the dissolution of Rule 5.4(b) firms and solo practices.

Published March 2017

Opinion 373

Court-ordered Representation of Clients in Criminal Domestic Violence Matters Who are Party to Parallel Civil Protection Order Proceedings

Inquiry

The D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee was informed that attorneys appointed pursuant to the District of Columbia's Criminal Justice Act, 11 D.C. Code, §§ 2601 et seq. (2012) (the "CJA"), often represent individual defendants in criminal domestic violence matters who are also respondents in parallel Civil Protection Order ("CPO") proceedings. Typically, these respondents appear in the CPO proceeding pro se because there exists no statutory entitlement to a CJA attorney in civil proceedings. Recognizing that criminal domestic violence matters and parallel CPO proceedings often share a common factual and legal nexus, CJA attorneys often attempt to guide their clients in the CPO hearings without entering an appearance in these matters or otherwise undertaking representation of the respondents in these civil proceedings.

[31] See Rule 1.15(c) and D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 359 (2011). Generally, such funds escheat to the Mayor.

[32] Rule 7.1(a).

[33] Rule 1.3, comment [5].

[34] http://www.dcbar.org/bar-resources/practice-management-advisory-service/

[35] D.C. App. R. XI, § 15(a).

[36] Rule 5.4(b)(2).

While refraining from entering an appearance in civil proceedings, CJA attorneys may nevertheless attempt to influence portions of these CPO hearings to protect the respondents' rights in the parallel criminal matters. These attempts often involve efforts by CJA attorneys to direct what their clients say or even speaking in court themselves at the CPO hearings.

These facts raise several questions: Are court-appointed CJA attorneys representing clients in criminal domestic violence matters ethically required to enter appearances in parallel CPO proceedings? Relatedly, do the Rules of Professional Conduct allow CJA attorneys—who choose not to enter appearances—to nevertheless guide or influence their clients in the parallel CPO proceedings?[1]

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.1(a) (Competence)
- Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- Rule 1.3(a) (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.4(b) (Communication)
- Rule 1.5(b) (Fees)
- Rule 4.2(a) (Communication between Lawyer and Person Represented by Counsel)

Factual Overview

A. Entitlement to Counsel Under the CJA

Indigent persons charged with criminal offenses under District of Columbia law are appointed counsel pursuant to the CJA. See 11 D.C. Code, §2601; Scott v. Illinois, 440 U.S. 367 (1979) (explaining that an indigent defendant in criminal proceedings has a right to counsel under the Sixth Amendment of the United States Constitution). The underlying purpose of the CJA is "to insure that persons charged with crimes in the District of Columbia, who are financially unable to obtain an adequate defense ... are provided with legal representation."[2] The CJA mandates appointment of counsel for any person charged with a felony, misdemeanor, or other offense involving the possibility of imprisonment in the District of Columbia who cannot afford representation.[3]

The CJA does not provide for appointment of counsel for defendants in civil proceedings, even those that may have a factual overlap with criminal matters in which a CJA attorney is appointed. While the CJA refers to "cases covered by this Act where the appointment of counsel is discretionary," it does not define such cases. 11 D.C. Code, § 2602.

The District of Columbia Court of Appeals establishes specific standards of performance for attorneys appointed pursuant to the CJA.[4] These obligations generally provide that a CJA attorney must "continue to represent the person throughout the proceedings, including disposition of the appeal and of any post-decision proceedings that appointed counsel may elect to initiate … Motions to withdraw are disfavored absent a true conflict between counsel and the client."[5] In addition, the Criminal Division of the Superior Court outlines practice standards to ensure CJA attorneys provide competent representation to individuals in criminal cases,[6] and recommends these lawyers "counsel[] clients concerning matters related to their case."[7]

B. The CPO and its Relationship with Associated Criminal Proceedings

The Domestic Violence Unit of the Superior Court handles misdemeanors in which the defendant and complainant have an intra-family relationship, as defined by the D.C. Intrafamily Offenses Act, D.C. Code §§ 16-1001 et seq. (2014). The Unit also handles requests for CPOs by victims of domestic violence. The CPO is a court order issued in a civil proceeding against the perpetrator of any domestic offense misdemeanor or felony. The CPO is issued when a judge determines that the respondent-perpetrator, more likely than not, committed a crime against the petitioner-victim. Among other things, the CPO prohibits the respondent-perpetrator from coming into physical proximity of the petitioner-victim.[8]

Violation of a Temporary Protection Order ("TPO") or final CPO constitutes criminal contempt, a misdemeanor punishable by a fine, imprisonment for not more than 180 days, or both.[9] Also, if the respondent-perpetrator committed a crime while violating the CPO, that conduct constitutes a separate offense which is separately punishable.

The domestic violence incident underlying the request for a CPO is often the subject of a related criminal proceeding. The District of Columbia has a mandatory arrest policy in cases of domestic violence.[10] The U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia will typically file criminal charges against a respondent-perpetrator if that individual was arrested for domestic violence. Criminal proceedings arising from the domestic violence incident can occur either before or after the hearing on a temporary protection order or final CPO.

The Public Defender Service for the District of Columbia recognizes that

[1] This Committee does not opine on questions of law outside of the Rules of Professional Conduct. The ethical questions presented in this inquiry, however, demand a contextual understanding of substantive domestic violence law and proceedings in which that law is applied. The accompanying discussion of criminal and civil domestic violence law reflects the Committee's understanding of relevant law for the sole purpose of analyzing the issues presented under the Rules of Professional Conduct.

[2] H.R. Rep. No. 93-1172, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess. 7 (1974).

[3] 11 D.C. Code, § 2601. The federal Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.SC. § 3006A (2016) (the "FCJA"), requires each federal District Court to establish a plan to furnish representation to indigent persons charged with federal crimes, noting that this plan may provide for representation of financially eligible persons involved in "ancillary matters appropriate to the proceedings [for which an FCJA attorney is required]." 18 U.SC. § 3006A(c). The United States Judicial Conference—the congressionally created policy-making arm of federal courts—has promulgated a comprehensive regulatory framework for administering the FCJA in its Guide to Judiciary Policy, Vol. 7, Part A (available online at http://www.uscourts.gov/rules-policies/judiciary-policies//criminal-justice-act-cja-guidelines) (last visited Sept. 15, 2016).

Section 210.20.30(c) of the Guide to Judiciary Policy provides that "[i]n determining whether representation in an ancillary matter is appropriate to the proceedings, the court should consider whether such representation is reasonably necessary … (2) to contribute in some significant way to the defense of the principal criminal charge; [or] (3) to aid in preparation for the trial or disposition of the principal criminal charge." No comparable District of Columbia guidance exists in connection with administration of its CJA.

[4] See D.C. Court of Appeals, Obligations of Counsel (2008) (http://www.dccourts.gov/internet/documents/cja_obligations.pdf).

[5] Id. at ¶ 4.

[6] Attorney Practice Standards for Criminal Defense Representation (2010) ["Practice Standards"]

[7] Practice Standards, B-2.

[8] See generally D.C. Intrafamily Offenses Act, D.C. Code §§ 16-1001—1059 (2014).

[9] See Rule 12, D.C. Superior Court Family Division Rules on Intra-Family Proceedings; see also D.C. Code § 16-1005(f). A TPO is a temporary measure—lasting up to fourteen (14) days—issued by a judicial officer to provide immediate protective relief enjoining the respondent from having contact with the petitioner until a hearing on the CPO. S*ee* D.C. Code § 16-1004.

[10] See District of Columbia Prevention of Domestic Violence Amendment Act of 1990, D.C. § 16-1031 et seq.

attorneys representing individual defendants in a criminal domestic violence matter may have involvement in a parallel CPO hearing:

> Defense attorneys representing clients charged in domestic violence cases may find themselves embroiled in litigation they did not expect. In addition to representing a client in a criminal case stemming from an intra-family offense, the attorney may need to represent that client in civil protection order litigation involving any number of family law issues, or in a criminal contempt trial.[11]

Typically, CPO hearings are set within two weeks of the petition requesting temporary relief, and this civil proceeding generally occurs before the related criminal trial.[12]

In Cloutterbuck v. Cloutterbuck, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals held that CPO proceedings are, by definition, civil in nature, and that indigent respondents in such proceedings are not entitled to counsel appointed under the CJA.[13] Recognizing that subsequent violation of an issued CPO could lead to imprisonment, the Cloutterbuck court nevertheless rejected application of the CJA to the CPO hearing: "We find that the possibility of imprisonment as a punishment for eventual violation of a CPO is too remote as of the time the order is entered to trigger a right to counsel. Furthermore, that outcome is contingent upon respondent's own subsequent behavior."[14]

Analysis

A. The Obligation to Provide Clearly Defined, Competent, and Zealous Representation

CJA attorneys are appointed by the court and the scope of representation is defined by that judicial appointment. Rules of Professional Conduct governing scope and competence provide guidance on the ethical obligations of CJA attorneys handling criminal domestic violence matters associated with parallel CPO proceedings.

When a lawyer establishes a new attorney-client relationship, Rule 1.5(b) requires, inter alia, that the lawyer communicate in writing the scope of representation to the client. Comment [4] to Rule 1.2 further explains that pursuant to such requirement it is also "generally prudent to explain in writing any limits on the objectives or scope of services."[15] Finally, Rule 1.4(b) also requires a lawyer to "explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation."

Read together, these provisions mandate that the CJA lawyer explain clearly to the client the scope of representation, specifying the particular proceeding in which the lawyer is representing the client. In addition, when the lawyer is aware that certain matters or proceedings are excluded from the scope of representation (either by agreement or through court appointment), the lawyer should inform the client accordingly.[16]

B. Competency in Criminal Domestic Violence Matters Associated with Parallel CPO Hearings

1. Relationship Between Domestic Violence Criminal Matters and Parallel CPO Hearings

Criminal domestic violence matters associated with parallel CPO hearings typically share a common factual and legal nexus. For example, testimony from the CPO hearing will likely involve the same facts and circumstances at issue in the criminal domestic violence matter; the criminal defendant's ability to invoke her Fifth Amendment rights in one proceeding may be influenced by how and whether she testifies in the other proceeding; both matters may share common discovery materials; and the disposition of the CPO proceeding could impact release status or plea negotiations in the criminal proceeding. For these reasons, the D.C. Public Defender Service notes that defense lawyers handling criminal domestic violence matters may find themselves "embroiled" in related civil litigation.[17]

Similarly, the D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee previously recognized the close nexus between criminal domestic violence matters and parallel CPO proceedings. In D.C. Ethics Opinion 263, the Committee concluded that a CPO modification proceeding and an associated criminal contempt matter constituted the same "matter" for purposes of applying the Rule 4.2 prohibition on communications with represented parties:

> While litigation may have many facets to it, those facets typically have at least some facts, evidence and legal principles in common. Activities or developments in one facet of a case rarely fail to have implications in others. That circumstance is well-illustrated in the Inquiry before us, where the core question in a CPO modification motion and in a criminal contempt motion is the same: what, if anything, did the respondent do in violation of the CPO.[18]

While Opinion 263 pertained to communications, its conclusions affirm the existence of a close factual and legal nexus between civil CPO hearings and associated criminal domestic violence matters. This nexus implicates standards of competent representation.

Rule 1.1(a) requires a lawyer to provide competent representation to a client and states that such "representation requires the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness, and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation." Comment [5] to Rule 1.1 explains that competence includes "adequate preparation and continuing attention to the needs of the representation to assure that there is no neglect of such needs." Rule 1.3(a) mandates that a "lawyer shall represent a client zealously and diligently within the bounds of law."

Elements of competent and zealous representation are fact-and matter-specific, involving contextual analysis of the governing legal regime and underlying details of specific cases. While there is no uniform standard to determine what constitutes competent or zealous representation in criminal domestic violence matters associated with parallel CPO hearings, the close legal and factual relationship between the two proceedings strongly suggests that CJA attorneys appointed in the criminal matter should remain mindful of and attentive to the parallel civil proceeding.

Thus, for example, the CJA attorney should seriously consider informing her client that developments in the civil proceeding may have case-dispositive implications for the client's criminal domestic violence matter. The CJA attorney should [11] Public Defender Service, Criminal Practice Institute Manual at 40.1 (2015) ["CPI Manual"] (emphasis added).The CPI Manual is issued by the Public Defender Service for the District of Columbia as a comprehensive primer on the criminal law in the District of Columbia.

[12] See CPI Manual at 40.12.

[13] 556 A.2d 1082 (D.C. 1989).

[14] Id. at 1084.

[15] Rule 1.2, Comment [4]

[16] See also D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 330 (July 2005)

[17] See CPI Manual at 40.1.

[18] D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 263 (January 1996).

also seriously consider advising her client on how evidence and testimony presented in the CPO hearing will likely have consequences in the criminal matter. Moreover, the CJA attorney should herself strongly consider the importance of attending the CPO hearing—even if she does not enter an appearance—so she might stay apprised of developments and remain available to offer guidance to her client, if the facts and circumstances of the individual case so require.[19] And, critically, as discussed above, the CJA attorney should explain to her client that her court-appointed representation extends only to the criminal matter, and not any associated CPO proceeding notwithstanding the common facts and circumstances underlying both.[20]

2. Propriety of Counseling a Client in the CPO Proceeding Without Entering an Appearance

If CJA counsel appointed to represent a defendant in a criminal proceeding determines that her participation in the parallel CPO proceeding is unnecessary, she should ensure the client is informed of this delineation. Moreover, the CJA counsel should remain vigilant that exclusion of the CPO matter does not bar the provision of competent client service.[21] However, even without entering an appearance in the parallel CPO proceeding, the CJA attorney may nevertheless provide guidance to her client in the civil matter.

In D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 330, the Committee concluded that the provision of unbundled legal services was ethically permissible under the D.C. Rules. (Generally, 'unbundling' refers to the separation of the legal tasks typically performed together into discrete components, only some of which the client contracts with the lawyer to provide.). The analytical underpinning of LEO 330 is that Rule 1.2 expressly provides that a lawyer and client may agree to the provision of legal services short of a full representation.[22] The context in which the limitations of the lawyer's services arise in this particular inquiry are distinct, however, because the limitations on the scope of the lawyer's representation are largely defined by the court's appointment of the CJA attorney in the criminal matter. That is to say, the lawyer has been appointed by the court to represent the client in the criminal matter only, and any duties the lawyer has in connection with the civil case arise solely from her obligation to provide competent, diligent, and zealous representation in the criminal matter. In this sense, the CJA attorney is neither limiting the scope of her representation in the criminal matter nor engaging in the provision of limited scope services in connection with the CPO. Rather, she is keeping abreast of other significant legal matters involving her client that may impact the matter in which she represents her client.

The Committee also considered, and rejected, the possibility that an attorney's presence at a CPO hearing when such attorney has not entered a formal appearance, but seems to be providing assistance to a litigant, could be considered "misleading" to the court. In Opinion 330, the Committee concluded that nothing in the D.C. Rules requires lawyers to notify the court of their involvement in a matter outside of entering an appearance, even when they are "ghostwriting" briefs and clients appear pro se in the matters in which the briefs are filed:

> After carefully examining the D.C. Rules and opinions from various jurisdictions, we conclude that nothing in the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct requires attorneys who assist pro se litigants in preparing court papers to place their names on these documents or otherwise disclose their involvement. . . . Some opponents of the practice of "ghostwriting" court documents, as it is frequently called, argue that the chief sin of this practice is that it misleads the court into thinking a litigant is proceeding without legal assistance and thus granting special solicitude to the litigant. This, however, is an issue for the courts to identify if they perceive a problem with the practice.

We reach a similar conclusion here. Although the court may well prefer the attorney to enter an appearance in the CPO proceeding, it is not unethical (by virtue of its being misleading) for an attorney to choose not to do so. Should the court inquire of the lawyer, the lawyer must respond that he or she represents the litigant in a related criminal matter.

• • • •

This opinion neither mandates nor discourages a CJA attorney appointed in a criminal domestic violence matter from entering an appearance in a parallel CPO proceeding. However, if the CJA attorney chooses not to enter an appearance in the CPO proceeding, she should explain clearly to her client that the CJA authorizes representation only in the criminal matter, and not any related civil proceeding such as the CPO hearing. In addition, the CJA attorney should seriously consider advising her client on the implications that testimony and evidence adduced in the civil proceeding might have on the criminal domestic violence matter. Moreover, the CJA attorney may well deem it necessary to attend the CPO hearing and provide guidance to her client to ensure competent representation in the criminal domestic violence matter.

Published June 2017

Opinion 374

Ethical Obligations Regarding Prospective Client Information

Introduction

A lawyer's ethical obligations to prospective clients are set forth in Rule 1.18 of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("the D.C. Rules"). On its face, [19] See Rule 1.1(a); Practice Standards, B-2 (recommending CJA attorneys counsel clients concerning matters related to their case).

[20] See D.C. Rule 1.4(b). As detailed above, in certain circumstances, zealous and competent representation may very well require CJA counsel to attend the CPO hearing and offer advice to her client during that hearing. While the D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee cannot address the compensation of CJA counsel for tasks involving the CPO hearing, the close legal and factual nexus between this civil proceeding and the criminal domestic violence matter strongly suggests that the D.C. Superior Court might consider authorizing payment for work closely associated with providing zealous and competent representation in a Court-appointed matter. Cf. Guide to Judiciary Policy, § 210.20.30(c) (explaining that, in connection with the FCJA, federal district courts should consider a variety of factors in determining whether to authorize compensation in matters ancillary to that for which counsel was appointed: "[T]he court should consider whether such representation is reasonably necessary (1) to protect a constitutional right; (2) to contribute to some significant way to the defense of the principal criminal charge; [or] (3) to aid in preparation for the trial or disposition of the principal criminal charge . . . ").

[21] See Rules 1.1, Rule 1.2, Comment [5], and D.C. Rule 1.5(b).

[22] See Rule 1.2(c).

[1] A "prospective client" is "[a] person who discusses with a lawyer the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship with respect to a matter." D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.18(a). As the commentary to Rule 1.18 explains, however, "[a] person who communicates information unilaterally to a lawyer, without any reasonable expectation that the lawyer is willing to discuss the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship, is not a 'prospective client' . . . ." D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.18 cmt. [3].

Rule 1.18 imposes only two obligations on a lawyer. First, regardless of whether a client-lawyer relationship ensues, Rule 1.18(b) prohibits "a lawyer who has had discussions with a prospective client" from "us[ing] or reveal[ing] information learned in the consultation, except as permitted by Rule 1.6." Because "the duty of confidentiality . . .attaches when the lawyer agrees to consider whether a client-lawyer relationship shall be established," a lawyer's obligations under Rule 1.6 also extend to information relating to a prospective client consultation—e.g., notes regarding the lawyer's mental impressions of the prospective client or matter, legal research, or other information obtained through subsequent investigation.[2] Second, Rules 1.18(c) and (d) prohibit a lawyer from "represent[ing] a client with interests materially adverse to those of a prospective client in the same or a substantially related matter if the lawyer received a confidence or secret from the prospective client," unless both the affected client and the prospective client have given informed consent.[3]

Where a prospective client elects not to retain the lawyer's services, or the lawyer is either unwilling or unable to represent the prospective client, two questions remain. First, what ethical obligation, if any, does a lawyer have to preserve either the information that the lawyer learned in the prospective client consultation or other information relating to the consultation? Second, what ethical obligation, if any, does a lawyer have to turn over such information to the prospective client, either at the time that the lawyer and/or prospective client decide not to form a client-lawyer relationship or thereafter?[4]

Until such time as a final decision is made regarding whether to form a client-lawyer relationship, a lawyer has an obligation under Rules 1.18 and 1.15 to safeguard property, including intangible property, entrusted to the lawyer by the prospective client. For example, in addition to tangible property, a prospective client may entrust a lawyer with certain intellectual property during a prospective client consultation that the lawyer must safeguard while evaluating whether to represent the prospective client. Once a final decision is made not to form a client-lawyer relationship, Rules 1.18 and 1.15 require the lawyer to return such property to the prospective client or otherwise dispose of it in accordance with the prospective client's instructions. In the absence of any substantive legal or contractual obligation to do so, however, the lawyer has no obligation to preserve or turn over to a prospective client information learned in or relating to a prospective client consultation—including the lawyer's notes or other research or information that the lawyer generates or obtains—in which the prospective client has no property interest.[5,6]

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General
- Rule 1.15 (Safekeeping Property)
- Rule 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation)
- Rule 1.18 (Duties to Prospective Clients)
- Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Discussion

A lawyer may obtain prospective client information from an initial consultation, subsequent investigation to determine whether the lawyer is willing and able to represent the prospective client, or both. As the commentary to Rule 1.18 explains:

> It is often necessary for a prospective client to reveal information to the lawyer during an initial consultation prior to the decision about formation of a client-lawyer relationship. The client may disclose such information as part of the process of determining whether the client wishes to form a client-lawyer relationship. The lawyer often must learn such information to determine whether there is a conflict of interest with an existing client and whether the matter is one that the lawyer is willing to undertake. . . .[7]

In addition, a lawyer may want to investigate the prospective client's claims or conduct preliminary legal research before forming a client-lawyer relationship. Rules 1.6 and 1.18 require a lawyer to protect the prospective client's confidences and secrets to the same extent that the lawyer must protect the confidences and secrets of a client.[8]

Under Rule 1.18(c), a lawyer or other lawyers in the lawyer's law firm may be prohibited from representing a client based on information that a prospective client has disclosed in a consultation.[9]

[2] See D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.6 cmt. [9] ("Although most of the duties flowing from the client-lawyer relationship attach only after the client has requested the lawyer to render legal services and the lawyer has agreed to do so, the duty of confidentiality imposed by this rule attaches when the lawyer agrees to consider whether a client-lawyer relationship shall be established.").

[3] If a lawyer is disqualified from representing a client under Rule 1.18(c), "no lawyer in a firm with which that lawyer is associated may knowingly undertake or continue representation in such a matter," unless "(1) both the affected client and the prospective client have given informed consent, or (2) the disqualified lawyer is timely screened from any participation in the matter." D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.18(c) & (d).

[4] The questions whether and at what point a lawyer and prospective client form a client-lawyer relationship are matters of substantive law beyond the scope of this opinion. When such a relationship is formed, however, a lawyer's ethical obligations to preserve and turn over information to the client are governed by Rules 1.16(d) and 1.8(i). See D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 333 (2005).

[5] The questions whether and to what extent a prospective client may have a property or other substantive legal interest in such information are beyond the scope of this opinion, as is the question whether any substantive legal obligation outside the Rules of Professional Conduct prohibits destruction of the information. Although this Committee does not opine on questions of law outside of the Rules of Professional Conduct, we are unaware of any authority holding that a prospective client has a property interest in a lawyer's notes or other research or information that the lawyer generates or obtains as the result of a prospective client consultation.

[6] We note that "an attorney's ethical duties to a client arise not from any contract but from the establishment of a fiduciary relationship between attorney and client." In re Ryan, 670 A.2d 375, 379 (D.C. 1996). Thus, where a lawyer and prospective client decide to form a client-lawyer relationship, the lawyer must satisfy the requirements of D.C. Rules 1.16(d) and 1.8(i), regardless of any contractual agreement. Cf. id. at 380 ("Because ethical responsibilities exist independently of contractual rights and duties, we hold that any supposed failure of a client to fulfill a retainer agreement is no defense to a disciplinary charge.").

[7] D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.18 cmt. [3].

[8] See D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.6 cmt. [9] ("Although most of the duties flowing from the client-lawyer relationship attach only after the client has requested the lawyer to render legal services and the lawyer has agreed to do so, the duty of confidentiality imposed by this rule attaches when the lawyer agrees to consider whether a client-lawyer relationship shall be established. . . ."); D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.18(b) & cmt. [3] ("Even when no client-lawyer relationship ensues, a lawyer who has had discussions with a prospective client shall not use or reveal information learned in the consultation, except as permitted by Rule 1.6. . . . Such information is generally protected by Rule 1.6, even if the client or lawyer decides not to proceed with the representation. . . . The duty to protect confidences and secrets exists regardless of how brief the initial conference may be. . . .").

[9] See D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.18(c) ("A lawyer subject to paragraph (b) shall not represent a client with interests materially adverse to those of a prospective client in the same or a substantially related matter if the lawyer received a confidence or secret from the prospective client, except as provided in paragraph (d). If a lawyer is disqualified from representation under this paragraph, no lawyer in a firm with which that lawyer is associated may knowingly undertake or continue representation in such a matter, except as provided in paragraph (d).").

To minimize the risk of disqualification, "a lawyer considering whether or not to undertake a new matter may limit the initial interview only to information that does not constitute a confidence or secret, if the lawyer can do so and still determine whether a conflict of interest or other reason for non-representation exists."[10] In addition, "[a] lawyer may condition conversations with a prospective client on the person's informed consent that no information disclosed during the consultation will prohibit the lawyer from representing a different client in the matter."[11] A lawyer and prospective client also may enter into an agreement in which the prospective client consents to the lawyer's subsequent disclosure and use of information learned in or related to the prospective client consultation.[12]

Where a prospective client "entrusts valuables or papers to the lawyer's care," the commentary to Rule 1.18 directs a lawyer to follow Rule 1.15.[13] Rule 1.15(a) requires a lawyer to "hold property of . . . third persons that is in the lawyer's possession in connection with a representation separate from the lawyer's own property" and to identify and safeguard such property.[14] Rule 1.15(c) generally requires the lawyer to "promptly deliver" and, upon request, "render a full accounting regarding such property" to the prospective client.[15] By its terms, however, Rule 1.15 does not require a lawyer to preserve or turn over documents or other information generated by or at the direction of the lawyer—including notes, legal research, or information obtained through subsequent investigation—unless the prospective client has a property interest in the information.[16]

Where a prospective client elects not to retain a lawyer's services, or the lawyer is either unwilling or unable to represent the prospective client, the D.C. Rules impose no obligation on the lawyer to preserve information learned in or related to the prospective client consultation in which a prospective client has no property interest. Similarly, a lawyer has no obligation under the D.C. Rules to turn over to a prospective client, either at the time that the lawyer and/or prospective client decide not to form a client-lawyer relationship or thereafter, information learned in or related to a prospective client consultation.

Rule 1.16(d) requires a lawyer, in connection with any termination of representation, to "take timely steps to the extent reasonably practicable to protect a client's interests, such as . . . surrendering papers and property to which the client is entitled." Where a prospective client elects not to retain a lawyer's services or the lawyer is either unwilling or unable to represent the prospective client, however, the prospective client is not a "client" and there is no representation to terminate. Accordingly, Rule 1.16(d) would not apply.

Conclusion

As the commentary to Rule 1.18 notes, "prospective clients should receive some but not all of the protection afforded clients."[17] Thus, although a lawyer must safeguard and return documents or other property entrusted to the lawyer by a prospective client while evaluating whether to form a client-lawyer relationship, absent a substantive legal or contractual obligation to do so, a lawyer has no obligation under the D.C. Rules to preserve or turn over to a prospective client information learned in or related to a prospective client consultation, when a client-lawyer relationship is not established.[18]

Published April 2018

Opinion 375

Ethical Considerations of Crowdfunding

Lawyers are generally free to represent clients who pay for legal services through crowdfunding. The ethical implications of crowdfunding a legal representation vary depending on the lawyer's level of involvement in the crowdfunding. When the client directs the crowdfunding and the lawyer is merely aware of it, the lawyer incurs no specific ethical obligations although the lawyer should consider potential risks associated with receipt of such funds and may counsel the client on the wisdom of publicly sharing confidential information. When the lawyer directs the crowdfunding, the lawyer must comply with the Rules governing a lawyer's receipt of money from third parties. Further, a lawyer who directs the crowdfunding should be cognizant of ethical obligations regarding fee agreements, communications with donors, and the management of the funds raised.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
  Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
  Rule 1.4 (Communication)
  Rule 1.5 (Fees)
  Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)

[10] See D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.18 (c) & cmt. [4].

[11] Id. at cmt. [5].

[12] See id. ("[T]he prospective client may also consent to the lawyer's subsequent use of information received from the prospective client.").

[13] D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.18 cmt. [9] ("For a lawyer's duties when a prospective client entrusts valuables or papers to the lawyer's care, see Rule 1.15.").

[14] See D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.15(a) ("A lawyer shall hold property of clients or third persons that is in the lawyer's possession in connection with a representation separate from the lawyer's own property. Funds of clients or third persons that are in the lawyer's possession (trust funds) shall be kept in one or more trust accounts maintained in accordance with paragraph (b). Other property shall be identified as such and appropriately safeguarded. Complete records of such account funds and other property shall be kept by the lawyer and shall be preserved for a period of five years after termination of the representation.").

[15] See D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.15(c) ("Except as stated in this rule or otherwise permitted by law or by agreement with the client, a lawyer shall promptly deliver to the client or third person any funds or other property that the client or third person is entitled to receive and, upon request by the client or third person, shall promptly render a full accounting regarding such property, subject to Rule 1.6.").

[16] A lawyer's failure to safeguard or return documents or other property that a prospective client entrusts to the lawyer also may implicate Rules 8.4(b) and (c). See D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 8.4(b) & (c) ("It is professional misconduct for a lawyer to . . . [c]ommit a criminal act that reflects adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness, or fitness as a lawyer in other respects; [or] [e]ngage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation.").

[17] D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.18 cmt. [1].

[18] A lawyer may choose to preserve information learned in or related to a prospective client consultation for a variety of reasons: for example, to assist the lawyer in detecting and avoiding future conflicts of interest; to defend against allegations that the lawyer violated Rule 1.6 and/or 1.18; or merely to maintain a positive relationship with prospective clients who later may need the information. If a lawyer chooses to do so, or to turn over such preserved information, however, the lawyer should be mindful of any potential conflicts of interest that may arise if the lawyer's possession or subsequent disclosure of the information could be detrimental to a current client. See D.C. R. Prof'l Conduct 1.7(b)(4) ("Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if . . . [t]he lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party . . . ."). In addition, as stated supra at n.5, the question of whether any substantive legal obligation outside the Rules of Professional Conduct prohibits destruction of prospective client information is beyond the scope of this opinion.

Rule 1.8 (Conflicts of Interest: Specific Rules)
Rule 1.15 (Safekeeping Property)
Rule 2.1 (Advisor)
Rule 4.1 (Truthfulness in Statements to Others)
Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)
Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Inquiry

The Committee has received numerous inquiries asking whether and how lawyers may ethically raise money (or accept money raised) via crowdfunding to pay for legal services for one or more clients. In general, crowdfunding is the process of raising money from third parties for the benefit of another. While the term is most often used to describe the practice of raising small amounts of money from numerous people through social media and other platforms, as used in this opinion, "crowdfunding" refers to the solicitation and acceptance of such funds to pay for someone else's legal representation.[1]

Crowdfunding may provide financial resources for individuals who might otherwise be unable to secure counsel. This opinion outlines the ethical considerations of crowdfunding and provides guidance about doing so consistent with the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules").

Crowdfunding is generally structured in one of two ways: 1) equity-based funding, in which the investor retains an ownership interest in either the recipient (here, the law firm or its client) or in future recoveries/earnings/profits of the firm or matter, or 2) donation-based funding, in which the donor receives no financial interest in the legal matter,[2] but may receive other incentives. This opinion focuses solely on donation-based funding and does not address equity-based funding, though some of the same ethical considerations apply.[3]

Analysis

The Committee notes, at the outset, that the ethical implications of crowdfunding a legal representation vary depending on the lawyer's level of involvement in the crowdfunding.

I. Lawyer's Receipt of Funds Raised by Client

There is nothing in the Rules prohibiting a lawyer from accepting funds from a client who has raised or is raising money through crowdfunding. It is not unusual for clients to rely on money collected from family or friends to pay for legal services. The practical reality that a client may, through social media or other platforms, cast a broad net and collect funds from acquaintances and strangers does not, standing alone, impose specific ethical obligations on a lawyer. However, because there may be heightened risk of fraud, money laundering, and other criminal activities in connection with any such exchange of funds, a lawyer should be cognizant of such risks and take reasonable precautions to avoid unwittingly engaging or assisting in unethical or illegal conduct.

For lawyers, ethical risk accompanies the legal risk. When illegal conduct of a client is suspected or known, specific ethical duties arise under the Rules.[4] For example, when a lawyer suspects or knows that a client has obtained funds to pay for the legal representation in a manner that is illegal or otherwise poses risk for the client, the lawyer has ethical obligations to counsel the client on such risks and/or the limits of what the lawyer is able to do for the client under the ethics rules and in light of the lawyer's own obligation to comply with the law.[5]

A lawyer should consider counseling his or her client regarding disclosures to third parties. Crowdfunding typically entails some level of disclosure to third parties about the predicate need for counsel. Because of their financial support, crowdfunding contributors may be interested in the status of or information about the client's matter. Due to the risk of waiver of the attorney-client privilege, or simply for strategic reasons, a lawyer who knows that a client is crowdfunding should provide the appropriate level of guidance to the client regarding disclosures to third parties, whether such disclosures occur on a social media platform or privately in discussions with friends and family.[6] In addition, depending on the circumstances, a lawyer may also consider discussing the wisdom of the client's funding choices under Rule 2.1, which provides that "[i]n rendering advice, a lawyer may refer not only to law but to other considerations such as moral, economic, social, and political factors, that may be relevant to the client's situation."

II. Crowdfunding by a Lawyer

A lawyer who undertakes or exerts control over the crowdfunding effort has specific ethical responsibilities under the Rules.

A. Lawyer's Acceptance of Fees from Third Parties

Whether a lawyer may accept compensation from third parties for legal fees is governed by the requirements of Rule 1.8(e). The Rule states that,

> A lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless:

[1] Some D.C. lawyers have expressed an interest in starting a general "benevolent fund" that would allow them to raise money for the purpose of providing legal representation to clients unable to pay the lawyers' fees. The Committee notes that lawyers who wish to engage in such fundraising along with the provision of legal services may need to do so through a separate nonprofit organization with the appropriate level of supervision and review by an independent board of advisors and in accordance with applicable law.

[2] The language used to describe crowdfunding arrangements varies. In this opinion, the Committee uses the term "donation-based funding" to describe arrangements in which contributors have no expectation of receiving any personal economic return in exchange for their financial contributions. While contributors may enjoy philanthropic good will and perhaps receive non-confidential information about the legal representation, they will not receive a financial interest in the matter or any recovery, nor will their donated funds be repaid absent express agreement (see part II D. Management of Funds).

[3] For a helpful summary of crowdfunding terminology and approaches, see N.Y. State Bar Ass'n Comm on Prof'l Ethics Formal Op. 1062 (2015).

[4] See, e.g., Rule 1.2(e) (prohibiting a lawyer from assisting a client in criminal or fraudulent conduct), Rule 8.4(b) (prohibiting a lawyer from engaging in criminal acts), and Rule 8.4(c) (prohibiting a lawyer from engaging in dishonest conduct). Lawyers must also be cognizant of their obligations under substantive law to avoid participating in or counseling their clients on activity that may constitute money-laundering. See American Bar Ass'n Standing Comm. on Ethics & Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 463 (2013). Similarly, crowdfunding does not alter a lawyer's professional responsibilities prohibiting the knowing acceptance of illegally obtained funds as payment for services. See "Houston, We Have a Problem: Clients Who Engage in Unlawful Conduct During Your Representation," Winter / Spring 2015 Edition of the ABA White Collar Crime Committee Newsletter, pages 1, 9-11, discussing ABA Model Rule 1.2(d) (ethical issues and other considerations when criminal proceeds are used to pay attorneys' fees).

[5] See Rule 1.2(e) (permitting a lawyer to "discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client" and to "counsel or assist a client to make a good-faith effort to determine the validity, scope, meaning, or application of the law") and Rule 1.4(b) (requiring a lawyer to "explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions about the representation").

[6] For further discussion of this topic, see D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 371(2016)(Social Media II: Use of Social Media in Providing Legal Services).

> (1) The client gives informed consent after consultation;
> (2) There is no interference with the lawyer's independence of professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and
> (3) Information relating to representation of a client is protected as required by Rule 1.6.

Thus, when a lawyer assists a client in crowdfunding a legal representation, each provision of Rule 1.8(e) must be met. With respect to Rule 1.8(e)(1), "informed consent" is a defined term under Rule 1.0(e), and "denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct."

Under Rule 1.8(e)(2), the lawyer must ensure there is no interference with the lawyer's independence of professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship. Rule 5.4(c) also prohibits a lawyer from allowing a person who pays the lawyer to provide legal services to a third party from "direct[ing] or regulat[ing] the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services." In the context of crowdfunding, a lawyer may not allow donors, whether family members or strangers, to exert undue influence with respect to the objectives of the representation or the legal strategies employed. This duty remains unchanged notwithstanding the social media and other connections that often accompany crowdfunding.

In addition to the guidance a lawyer provides to the client regarding disclosures to third parties (as discussed in part I), under Rule 1.8(e)(3) a lawyer is also prohibited from voluntarily sharing a client's confidential information with donors. Rule 1.6 provides that, in the absence of the client's informed consent or other enumerated exception, a lawyer shall not use or reveal a client's confidences or secrets. While lawyers should always be mindful of their duty of confidentiality, the informal nature of communications made through social media platforms warrants a reminder of this duty when using these platforms for crowdfunding.

B. Fee Agreements

Although it may be tempting to forgo a written engagement agreement in a crowdfunded representation that has the appearance of being "free" from the client's perspective, lawyers must meet the requirements of Rule 1.5 regarding fees. Specifically, Rule 1.5(b) requires that, "[w]hen the lawyer has not regularly represented the client, the basis or rate of the fee, the scope of the lawyer's representation, and the expenses for which the client will be responsible shall be communicated to the client, in writing, before or within a reasonable time after commencing the representation."[7] Even when a lawyer has regularly represented a client such that a written engagement agreement may not be required, crowdfunding can trigger areas of confusion that may not be present in a traditional client-self pay situation, such as ownership of excess crowdfunds raised and responsibility for payment if crowdfunds fall short of legal fees and expenses incurred. Accordingly, the Committee strongly encourages lawyers to have a written fee agreement for every representation involving crowdfunding by the lawyer.

C. Communications with Donors and Prospective Donors

A lawyer who conducts the crowdfunding on behalf of a client must ensure that the communications used to solicit the funds are truthful.[8] The level of detail and transparency required will depend on the circumstances but must take into account Rule 1.6 and any other confidentiality obligations. For instance, a lawyer should avoid providing specific information about how the funds will be used to effectuate the legal strategy. A lawyer's professional obligations to exercise his or her independent judgment and to zealously represent the client remain paramount, regardless of the source of the funds.[9] The Committee recommends informing contributors that their donated funds are nonrefundable, that they will not receive confidential information about the client's matter, and that they may not interfere with or otherwise exert control over the lawyer's work.

D. Management of Funds

The fact that crowdfunds come from sources other than the client does not alter the fact that they are client funds and must be treated as such consistent with the Rules.

Funds collected on behalf of a client by the lawyer through crowdfunding must be treated as advanced fees. Unless there is an agreement with the client under Rule 1.15(e), these funds must be placed in trust for the client, as required by Rules 1.15(a) and (b). The lawyer should invoice the client and transfer funds to the operating account only as fees are earned and expenses incurred, or as otherwise consistent with the guidance provided in D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 355.[10] A lawyer should monitor any fundraising activity that he or she controls, as a lawyer who solicits and receives excessive funds on behalf of his or her client may run the risk of violating one or more ethics rules.[11] To mitigate this risk, a lawyer should have a plan (approved by the client) to terminate crowdfunding when it appears that sufficient funds have been raised.

Although lawyers are generally able to seek informed consent, under Rule 1.15(e), to place unearned fees and expenses in a lawyer's or law firm's operating account rather than the trust account, the Committee recommends caution around this exception when crowdfunding. Crowdfunding increases the risk that a lawyer could be perceived as seeking an unreasonable fee under Rule 1.5(a).[12] This is in part because of the ease by which the amount of money in excess of what is required to fund the representation may be raised and in part because some clients may exercise less scrutiny over the lawyer's bills since the client is not personally, or at least not solely, responsible for payment. Placing crowdfunds in a trust account until the lawyer earns the fee or incurs the expense ensures that there is a clear delineation of lawyer funds and client funds.

---

[7] Comments [1] through [3] to Rule 1.5 further describe how a lawyer may fulfill his or her duties under Rule 1.5(b).

[8] See Rules 4.1 (Truthfulness in Statements to Others) and Rule 8.4(c) ("A lawyer should not engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation.).

[9] Rule 5.4(c) (see discussion supra Part II.A) and Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal).

[10] Rule 1.15 obligates lawyers to treat unearned fees and expenses, including "flat" or prepaid fees, as the property of the client until the money has been earned, unless a different arrangement is reached. See Rule 1.15(e). This analysis, which was promulgated by the D.C. Court of Appeals in In re Mance, 980 A.2d 1196 (2009), is outlined in D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 355 (2010).

[11] See, e.g., Rule 4.1 (Truthfulness in Statements to Others), Rule 8.4(c) (which prohibits a lawyer from engaging in dishonest or deceitful conduct) and Rule 1.5(a) (which prohibits a lawyer from seeking an unreasonable fee).

[12] The Philadelphia Bar Association Professional Guidance Committee highlighted the possibility of an unreasonable fee as a risk of crowdfunding a litigation. See Phila. Bar Ass'n Prof'l Guidance Comm., Op. 2015-6.

Crowdfunding may also increase the risk of disputed ownership of funds. For example, if a donor claims that he or she donated more money than intended, or directed it to the wrong recipient, a lawyer would mitigate his or her ethical risk by ensuring such funds remain in trust until they are earned.[13]

In the absence of an appropriate agreement, unearned crowdfunds are the property of the client and should be returned to the client upon the matter's conclusion or termination of the representation, unless the client directs the lawyer to do otherwise. A matter may conclude for any number of reasons, including a natural conclusion, the client's decision not to pursue the case, settlement or any other resolution, or because the attorney-client relationship terminates, and each has different implications for prepaid legal fees and expenses, including crowdfunds. Pursuant to Rule 1.5(b), this point should be addressed with clients in engagement agreements and may be included in disclosures to donors, subject to Rule 1.6.

A lawyer may suggest that the client donate excess crowdfunds to a charity of the client's choice. Ultimately, however, the lawyer must abide by the client's decision and/or an appropriate agreement regarding disposition of unearned crowdfunds.

The Committee believes it would be unethical for a lawyer personally to claim unearned crowdfunds at the conclusion of a representation. Unlike a contingency fee case, where a lawyer may on occasion obtain a "windfall" due to an unexpected early settlement or other turn of events (and runs an equal risk of earning nothing at all if an unfavorable outcome results), in this situation the lawyer incurs no equivalent risk. A lawyer who claims unearned fees at the conclusion of such a representation risks violating Rule 1.5(a).

Conclusion

Although the term crowdfunding is relatively new, payment by third parties for another's legal representation is not. The Rules apply to a lawyer's receipt and disposition of all funds received in connection with a client representation, regardless of their source.

Published November 2018

[13] Rule 1.15(d) requires a lawyer to keep disputed funds in trust.

Opinion 376

Mandatory Arbitration Provisions in Fee Agreements

Fee agreements containing mandatory arbitration provisions are "ordinary fee arrangements," and the requirements of Rule 1.8 which addresses business transactions between lawyers and clients do not apply. The standard for obtaining client consent to fee agreements containing mandatory arbitration provisions is set forth in Comment [13] to Rule 1.8, and Legal Ethics Opinions 211 and 218 are superseded by Comment [13] and this opinion.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- Rule 1.0(e) (Definition of "Informed Consent")
- Rule 1.4 (Communication)
- Rule 1.5 (Fees)
- Rule 1.8 (Conflict of Interest: Specific Rules)

Inquiry

The Committee has received an inquiry as to whether D.C. Legal Ethics Opinions 211 and 218 state the current requirements for a mandatory arbitration provision in a fee agreement to comply with the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, in light of the 2007 amendments to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, in particular Comments [1] and [13] to Rule 1.8 (hereinafter "Comment [1]" and "Comment [13]").[1]

Discussion

Legal Ethics Opinion 211 (Fee Agreements; Mandatory Arbitration Clauses) and Legal Ethics Opinion 218 (Retainer Agreement Providing for Mandatory Arbitration of Fee Disputes Is Not Unethical) were issued by the Committee in May 1990 and June 1991, respectively. In the more than twenty-five years since, the use of arbitration as a means for dispute resolution has proliferated, and this development, together with the 2007 amendments to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, have led the Committee to determine it is the appropriate time to revisit these opinions. A brief summary of these two prior opinions and the 2007 amendments to the Rules is set forth below.

A. Opinion 211

The retainer agreement at issue in Opinion 211 contained a provision requiring the firm and the client to arbitrate claims by the firm against its client for unpaid fees and claims against the firm for malpractice. In analyzing whether such mandatory arbitration provisions in fee agreements would be permitted, the Committee looked to Rule 1.8(a) and to D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 190 (Retainer Agreement Mandating Arbitration of Attorney-Client Disputes) (1988), which was issued prior to the promulgation of Rule 1.8. The Committee disagreed with the pre-Rule 1.8(a) conclusion in Opinion 190 that a lawyer could include a mandatory arbitration provision provided that the lawyer made full disclosure to the client of any rights the client may waive by agreeing to arbitration and that the lawyer must not create arbitration procedures that violated DR 6-102(A); Opinion 190 did not require the client to obtain advice from independent counsel.

In Opinion 211, the Committee determined that Opinion 190 was "incorrect in its belief that the complex nature of arbitration could be adequately disclosed to a lay client." In reaching this determination, the Committee was guided by its belief that it was "unrealistic" to expect that lawyers could provide their clients with sufficient information regarding arbitration so that the client could give his informed consent to a mandatory arbitration provision.

The Committee also relied on Rule 1.8(a), which requires independent review by counsel of any "business transaction" between a lawyer and a client. The Committee acknowledged, however, that a mandatory arbitration provision did not "precisely fit the language of Rule 1.8(a)." It also described mandatory arbitration provisions as "atypical" for fee agreements and on that basis determined that lawyers must bring attention to that provision at the time the fee agreement is entered into so it can be considered fully by the client. Ultimately, the Committee concluded that "mandatory arbitration agreements covering all disputes between lawyer and client are not permitted under either our prior Opinions

[1] Rule XIII of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals' Rules Governing the Bar ("Rules Governing the Bar") states that: "[a]n attorney subject to the disciplinary jurisdiction of this Court shall be deemed to have agreed to arbitrate disputes over fees for legal services and disbursements related thereto when such arbitration is requested by a present or former client…." The arbitration shall take place before the ACAB, unless the client and attorney agree otherwise. See Rule XIII of the Rules Governing the Bar.

or Rule 1.8(a) unless the client is in fact counseled by another attorney."

B. Opinion 218

Opinion 218 was issued by the Committee not long after Opinion 211 and also addressed mandatory arbitration clauses in fee agreements. Unlike Opinion 211, however, Opinion 218 was limited to fee disputes. The inquiry addressed in Opinion 218 was brought to the Committee by the Attorney-Client Arbitration Board ("ACAB"), an arbitration service provided by the D.C. Bar to its members and their clients to resolve solely disputes about legal fees. The ACAB inquired about the impact of Opinion 211 on fee agreements providing for mandatory arbitration of fee disputes before the ACAB.

The Committee distinguished the mandatory arbitration provisions in fee agreements under the ACAB rules from the arbitration provision at issue in Opinion 211. Unlike the possible AAA arbitration discussed in Opinion 211, the ACAB rules and procedures are relatively simple. The fees are low and the arbitrators are not compensated. In addition, the Committee determined that the ACAB staff was able to advise clients who were contemplating signing fee agreements with mandatory arbitration provisions about fee arbitration, its advantages and disadvantages, as well as its alternatives.

Based on these features of a fee arbitration before the ACAB, the Committee determined in Opinion 218 that a client could be adequately informed of the pros and cons of mandatory arbitration so that the client could make a decision about whether to enter into a fee agreement that contained a provision requiring mandatory arbitration under the ACAB's rules and procedures. The Committee required, however, that "the client be advised in writing that counseling and a copy of the ACAB's rules are available through the ACAB staff and further that the lawyer encourage the client to contact the ACAB for counseling and information prior to deciding whether to sign the agreement and that the client consent in writing to mandatory arbitration."

C. 2007 Amendments

The February 2007 amendments to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct added two comments to Rule 1.8 that directly impact Opinions 211 and 218. Comment [1] to Rule 1.8 states that paragraph (a) "does not apply to ordinary fee arrangements between client and lawyer, which are governed by Rule 1.5 . . . ." In addition, Comment [13] states: "Rule 1.8(g) does not, however, prohibit a lawyer from entering into an agreement with the client to arbitrate legal malpractice claims, to the extent that such agreement is valid and enforceable and the client is fully informed of the scope and effect of the agreement."

Analysis

For the reasons discussed below, the conclusions reached by the Committee in Opinions 211 and 218 are not consistent with amended Comments [1] and [13] to Rule 1.8. These comments, when applied to mandatory arbitration provisions in fee agreements, require the Committee to loosen the requirements set forth in Opinions 211 and 218.[2]

A. The Effect of Comment [13] on Opinions 211 and 218

Comment [13] speaks specifically to agreements to arbitrate legal malpractice claims and deems such agreements permissible provided that the client is "fully informed of the scope and effect of the agreement." This explanation is in conflict with the mandates of Opinion 211, which required much more, including that the client must in fact receive advice from independent counsel regarding the arbitration provision. Comment [13] recognizes the evolution and proliferation of arbitration as an alternative dispute resolution method that has occurred since the issuance of Opinion 211.[3] Because of this change, clients are now likely to be able to understand the "complex nature" of arbitration in a way they might not have been able to in the early nineties when arbitration was less common.

In light of Comment [13], the Committee determines that the more onerous requirements imposed by Opinion 211 are no longer required. The same is true for Opinion 218, which deals with a narrow subset of arbitration provisions – those limited to fee arbitrations before the ACAB. Comment [13] specifically addresses agreements to arbitrate legal malpractice claims, and it was arbitration agreements with this scope that caused the Committee great concern in Opinion 211. To the extent Comment [13] has rendered such agreements generally permissible as long as the client is "fully informed of the scope and effect of the agreement," more narrow agreements (i.e., those limited to the arbitration of fee disputes) should not have different, more burdensome requirements related to obtaining client consent.

B. Application of Comment [1] to Rule 1.8 to Fee Agreements Containing Mandatory Arbitration Provisions

Although the 2007 amendments to Comment [13] standing alone are enough to convince the Committee that agreements between lawyers and clients to arbitrate fee disputes do not fall within the scope of Rule 1.8(a), the 2007 amendments to Comment [1] of Rule 1.8 also lend support to such a conclusion.

Comment [1] explains that the purpose of the requirements of paragraph (a) is to prevent "the possibility of 'overreaching' when a lawyer participates in a "business, property or financial transaction with a client." However, Comment [1] now specifically states that the requirements of 1.8(a) "do not apply to ordinary fee arrangements between client and lawyer, which are governed by Rule 1.5…." The Comment also provides a specific example of a "non-ordinary fee arrangement" that would subject a lawyer to the requirements of 1.8(a), namely, "when a lawyer accepts an interest in a client's business or other non-monetary property as payment of all or some of the fee."

We conclude that fee arbitration provisions are ordinary fee arrangements within the meaning of Comment [1] to Rule 1.8(a). First, in the many intervening years since the Committee issued Opinion 211, the use of arbitration clauses in fee agreements has grown considerably, and the Committee's description in Opinion 211 of such clauses as "atypical" is no longer accurate. As the American Bar Association ("ABA") Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility noted as early as 2002: "The use of binding arbitration provisions in retainer agreements

[2] A lawyer's failure to comply with an obligation or prohibition imposed by a D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct is a basis for invoking the disciplinary process. See D.C. Rules, SCOPE [3]. The Comments to the D.C. Rules are promulgated by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. Although they do not add obligations to the Rules, they provide guidance for interpreting the Rules and practicing in compliance with them. Id. at [1]. Comment [13] was promulgated by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals after Opinions 211 and 218 were issued by this Committee. Comment [13] therefore controls the use of mandatory arbitration clauses in fee agreements, and the conflicting guidance offered in Opinions 211 and 218 must not be followed.

[3] See ABA Comm. on Ethics & Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 425 (2002).

has increased significantly in recent years." ABA Comm. on Ethics & Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 425 (2002). The increase in mandatory arbitration provisions in fee agreements reflects the overall trend towards greater reliance on arbitration to resolve commercial and other disputes.

Second, the example in Comment [1] of a non-ordinary fee arrangement, "when a lawyer accepts an interest in a client's business or other non-monetary property as payment of all or some of the fee" underscores the specific harm for which the protections of Rule 1.8(a) are deemed necessary: to ensure fairness to the client when the lawyer may be in a better position by virtue of legal skill and training to assess the value of a client's business or non-monetary property and therefore potentially take advantage of the client. As the Committee explains in D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 300 (Acceptance of Ownership Interest in Lieu of Legal Fees) (2000):

> We agree with the commentators who have written on the subject …that a stock-as-fees arrangement is subject to Rule of Professional Conduct 1.8(a), which governs certain transactions with or related to clients…. In many respects, Rule 1.8(a) codifies the well-established common law principle that a lawyer occupies a fiduciary position vis-à-vis his client, which means that all transactions between lawyer and client are suspect and must be fair to the client.

However, this specific concern is not present when a lawyer and client agree to arbitrate rather than litigate future fee disputes. So long as a client is fully informed of the extent and scope of such an agreement as required by Comment [13], and the client agrees to such a provision before any dispute arises, the selection of an arbitration forum as the setting in which fee disputes will be resolved does not give a lawyer any particular advantage over his or her client. Rather, it is part and parcel of any ordinary fee agreement.

As an ordinary fee arrangement, the requirements of Rule 1.8(a) do not apply (i.e., the client need not be given a reasonable opportunity to seek the advice of independent counsel or give informed consent in writing), and the further obligation imposed by Opinion 211, namely, that the client "is in fact counseled by another attorney," should no longer apply as well. This conclusion is wholly consistent with the Committee's analysis of the effect of Comment [13] on Opinions 211 and 218.[4]

Comment [13] makes clear that it is permissible for a lawyer and a client to agree to arbitrate legal malpractice claims provided that the "agreement is valid and enforceable" and the "client is fully informed of the scope and effect of the agreement." Comment [13] does not require that the client be given the reasonable opportunity to seek the advice of independent counsel or that the client give informed consent in writing as is required by Rule 1.8(a), let alone go as far as Opinion 211, to require that the client "in fact [be] counseled by another attorney."

Indeed, the only way to square Comment [13] and Comment [1] in the context of mandatory arbitration provisions in fee agreements is to conclude that such arbitration agreements are "ordinary" and Rule 1.8(a) does not apply. This result is also appropriate given the Committee's own recognition, when it relied on Rule 1.8(a) in reaching its conclusion in Opinion 211, that a mandatory arbitration provision did not "precisely fit the language of Rule 1.8(a)." This is particularly true in light of the clarifying amendments to Comments [1] and [13] that explain the meaning of the Rule.

C. The Requirement That The Client Be "Fully Informed"

Comment [13] to Rule 1.8 permits a lawyer and client to agree to arbitrate legal malpractice claims as long as the "client is fully informed of the scope and effect of the agreement." Although the phrase "fully informed" is not defined elsewhere in the comments to Rule 1.8, the definition of the term "Informed Consent" in Rule 1.0(e) is instructive. "'Informed Consent' denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated "adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct."

The definition of "Informed Consent" contains a description of the nature and extent of information that must be presented to a client in order to obtain that client's consent to a "proposed course of conduct." In the Committee's view, that description ably summarizes the information that must be shared with a client in order for that client to be "fully informed." Indeed, a fully informed client is the prerequisite to obtaining "Informed Consent." Therefore, Rule 1.0(e), along with Comment [13] to Rule 1.8, should guide a lawyer's communications to a client regarding a mandatory arbitration provision in a fee agreement. Put another way, in order for a client to be "fully informed" about the "scope and effect" of a mandatory arbitration provision, a lawyer should communicate "adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives" to entering into a fee agreement that contains such a provision.

For a client to appreciate the "scope and effect" of a mandatory arbitration provision, the lawyer must provide a client with sufficient information about the differences between litigation in the courts and arbitration proceedings. As a general matter, a discussion regarding at least the following differences between the two methods of dispute resolution is prudent: (1) the fees incurred; (2) the available discovery; (3) the right to a jury; and (4) the right to an appeal. As with the application of the informed consent standard, the scope of this discussion depends on the level of sophistication of the client.[5]

Conclusion

Legal Ethics Opinions 211 and 218 are superseded by Comments [1] and [13] to Rule 1.8 and this opinion. Mandatory fee agreements are ordinary fee arrangements and are thus not subject to the requirements of Rule 1.8(a). Comment [13] clarifies that mandatory arbitration provisions in fee agreements are permissible, provided that the requirements set forth in Comment [13] are met.

Published November 2018

[4] While the ethics rules no longer require that the client be advised in writing that the ACAB staff is available to provide counseling, the ACAB staff remains available to advise a lawyer's client who is contemplating signing a fee agreement with a mandatory provision about fee arbitration, its advantages and disadvantages, as well as its alternatives. Lawyers may continue to voluntarily provide information about this resource to a client.

[5] In December 2018, the D.C. Bar Board of Governors amended Section 8 of the ACAB Rules of Procedure. Section 8(b)(iii) now provides, "The ACAB will enforce an attorney/client agreement to arbitrate a fee dispute if the agreement: (1) is valid and enforceable, (2) is signed by all parties to the dispute, and (3) encompasses fee disputes in the scope of the disputes to be arbitrated. Further, the client must have been adequately informed of the scope and effect of a mandatory arbitration provision, consistent with D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 376 (copy attached). In this instance, the ACAB can compel a client to arbitrate a fee dispute filed by a lawyer…."

Opinion 377

Duties When A Lawyer is Impaired

Introduction

The District of Columbia Legal Ethics Committee has examined the ethical duties of partners; other managerial or supervisory lawyers and subordinate lawyers; and non-lawyer employees to take appropriate measures when they reasonably believe another lawyer in the same law firm or government agency is suffering from a significant impairment that poses a risk to clients.[1] A related question involves the duties owed to clients and the profession when an impaired lawyer leaves a law firm or government agency, particularly when the lawyer may continue to practice law, regardless of whether clients are, or may be, terminating their relationship with the firm in order to remain clients of the departing lawyer.[2]

This Opinion deals only with mental impairment, which may be a chronic or temporary condition arising out of or related to age, substance abuse, a physical or mental health condition or other circumstance affecting the lawyer. This Opinion supplements the guidance contained in Legal Ethics Opinion 246, with a specific focus on the issue of impaired lawyers, whose conduct may or may not trigger mandatory reporting obligations under the Rules, as discussed herein. This Opinion also relies, in part, upon ABA Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility Formal Opinion 03-429 (2003).

The impairment of a lawyer may fluctuate over time, regardless of its cause. However, if a lawyer's periods of impairment are on-going or have a likelihood of recurrence, then partners, or other lawyers with managerial or supervisory authority may have to conclude that the lawyer's ability to represent clients is materially impaired.

A range of ethics rules are implicated, including those setting forth the duties owed by lawyers to clients and the profession, and those addressing issues of supervising lawyers and non-lawyer employees. At the outset, and as discussed within this opinion, the Committee recognizes that there are tensions between ethical duties that arise under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") and requirements or prohibitions that may exist under the substantive law, specifically with respect to employee privacy and other rights. Lawyers and law firms must be cognizant of the legal landscape in which these difficult issues occur.[3]

Mental impairment may lead to an inability to competently represent a client as required by Rule 1.1, to complete tasks in a diligent and zealous manner as required by Rule 1.3, and to communicate with clients about their representation as required by Rule 1.4.

Rule 5.1 requires partners or other lawyers with managerial or supervisory authority to make reasonable efforts to ensure that all lawyers and those under their supervision comply with the applicable Rules and to ensure that their law firm or government agency has in effect measures giving reasonable assurance that all lawyers in the firm or agency conform to the Rules. These provisions require managerial or supervisory lawyers who reasonably believe or know that a lawyer is impaired to closely supervise the conduct of the impaired lawyer because of the risk of violations of the Rules and resulting harm to clients. Rule 5.2 may also apply to subordinate lawyers if they know of and ratify the conduct of the impaired lawyer.

Rule 8.3 requires a lawyer, regardless of managerial or supervisory authority, to report an impaired lawyer to the appropriate professional authorities including, but not limited to, the District of Columbia Office of Disciplinary Counsel,[4] if the impaired lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness to practice law, unless such disclosure would be prohibited under the duty of confidentiality owed to clients under Rule 1.6 or other law. See Footnote 3. Further, if the firm or government agency removes the impaired lawyer from a matter, it may have an obligation under Rule 1.4 to discuss with the client the change in staffing on the matter. The duty to discuss removal of government lawyers from a matter may be different because of government policies or regulations.

If the impaired lawyer resigns, is removed or otherwise leaves the law firm, the firm may have additional disclosure obligations under Rule 1.4 to clients who are considering whether to remain with the firm or to transfer their representation to the departing lawyer. However, the firm should be cautious to limit any disclosures to necessary information permissible to disclose under applicable law. The obligation to report misconduct under Rule 8.3 is not eliminated if the impaired lawyer leaves the firm.

Beyond the ethical obligations embodied in the D.C. Rules, a fundamental purpose of identifying and addressing lawyer impairment is to encourage individuals who are suffering from mental impairment to seek and obtain assistance and treatment. This purpose should not be forgotten as lawyers, firms and agencies seek to comply with the ethical mandates discussed herein.

Background on Impairment Issues in the Legal Profession:

In 2016, the ABA Commission on Lawyer Assistance Programs and the Hazelden Betty Ford Foundation published the results of national research on the issue of substance abuse and other mental health concerns among American lawyers. The study reported rates of substance abuse among lawyers that were far higher than those in other professions. The results also showed that the most common barrier for a lawyer seeking help was fear of others finding out and general concerns about confidentiality.

Roughly a quarter of the study participants identified their substance abuse

[1] Whether two or more lawyers constitute a "firm" or a "law firm" can depend on specific facts. See Rule 1.0(c). While the Rules exclude government agencies or other government entities within the definition of "firm" or "law firm," the Rules do not exempt lawyers practicing in a government agency or other government entity, who are otherwise subject to the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, from the ethical obligations set forth herein. See, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 530B.

[2] An additional question, dealing more broadly with obligations to report a lawyer that is not employed by the same law firm or agency, may be answered by reference to D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 246 (A Lawyer's Obligation to Report Another Lawyer's Misconduct) (1994). Lawyers that may be concerned about the impairment of lawyers outside their firm or agency over whom they do not have managerial or supervisory authority may nonetheless find the guidance within this Opinion instructive.

[3] This Opinion addresses only the ethical obligations of lawyers when faced with an impaired lawyer. There may also be legal obligations imposed under the District of Columbia Human Rights Act, the Americans with Disabilities Act, the Family Medical Leave Act, the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act or other state or federal laws that are beyond the scope of this Committee and this Opinion. There may also be fiduciary or contractual obligations imposed by partnership or employment agreements with an impaired lawyer. Further, as discussed in this Opinion, lawyers employed in government agencies may have obligations imposed by their department or agency with regard to reporting obligations.

[4] The duty to report is not limited to the District of Columbia Office of Disciplinary Counsel. If the reporting lawyer is aware that the impaired lawyer is also a member of other bars or another profession that is subject to professional regulation, then the duty to report may also extend to reporting to those other entities.

or mental health issues as having first started prior to law school. In August 2017, the National Task Force on Lawyer Well-Being, a commission comprised of lawyers, judges, academics and medical professionals, issued a report, The Path To Lawyer Well-Being: Practice Recommendations for Positive Change,[5] which addresses issues of substance abuse and impairment and provides recommendations and action plans for lawyers, law firms and other appropriate communities.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.1 (Compentence)
- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.4 (Communication)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation)
- Rule 5.1 (Responsibilities of Partners, Managers, and Supervisory Lawyers)
- Rule 5.2 (Subordinate Lawyers)
- Rule 5.3 (Responsibilities Regarding Nonlawyer Assistants)
- Rule 8.3 (Reporting Professional Midconduct)
- Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Discussion

This Opinion addresses three potential scenarios that impose obligations under the Rules with respect to a lawyer who is known by other lawyers or staff in the same law firm or government agency to be suffering from an impairment. First, the opinion addresses the obligations of partners and other managerial and supervisory lawyers to take steps to prevent an impaired lawyer from violating the Rules, to develop policies addressing impairment, and to create a firm or agency culture that allows subordinate lawyers and other personnel to report concerns regarding the impairment of a lawyer without reprisal. Second, it addresses the reporting obligations of a lawyer who knows that an impaired lawyer in the same firm or agency has violated the Rules. Third, it addresses the obligations of lawyers when an impaired lawyer leaves a firm.

The Committee agrees with ABA Formal Opinion 03-429 that, "[i]mpaired lawyers have the same obligations under the [Rules] as other lawyers. Simply stated, mental impairment does not lessen a lawyer's obligation to provide clients with competent representation." Importantly, Rule 1.16(a) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client or requires a lawyer to withdraw if "the lawyer's physical or mental condition materially impairs the lawyer's ability to represent the client."[6] Managerial and supervisory lawyers should be aware that an impaired lawyer may be unaware, or in denial, that the impairment has impacted the lawyer's ability to represent clients. If the impaired lawyer does not or will not take affirmative steps to mitigate the consequences of the impairment, then the lawyer's partners, managers, or supervisors are obligated under Rule 5.1 to take steps to ensure the lawyer's compliance with the Rules.

A. Duties of partners, managerial lawyers or supervisory lawyers who reasonably believe that another lawyer is or may suffer from significant impairment.

Rule 5.1(a) requires that partners and comparable managerial lawyers in a firm or government agency make reasonable efforts to ensure that the firm or agency has in effect measures giving reasonable assurance that all lawyers conform to the Rules. The Rule also requires partners and managerial lawyers to make reasonable efforts to establish internal procedures and policies designed to provide reasonable assurance that all lawyers will conform to the Rules of Professional Conduct. See Rule 5.1, Comments 1 & 2. Similarly, Rule 5.1 requires lawyers having direct supervisory authority over another lawyer to make reasonable efforts to ensure that the other lawyer's conduct conforms to the Rules of Professional Conduct. See Rule 5.1(b).[7]

What constitutes a "reasonable" effort or assurance is not defined, because the reasonableness of any measures will depend, in part, on the firm or agency's size, structure and the nature of its practice. See Rule 5.1, Comment 3. Measures should, however, include processes ensuring that the firm or agency can identify and address issues of impairment among its lawyers. Whether other measures such as a written policy or a reporting procedure are appropriate will depend, in part, on the factors set out in Comment 3. For example, a written policy might be unnecessary for a solo practitioner, although it may be appropriate for a solo practitioner to instruct or provide resources for office staff on addressing issues of potential impairment in the workplace.

The Committee does not believe that a written policy regarding impairment is required in order to comply with Rule 5.1. As noted above, whether a firm or agency is required under Rule 5.1 to have written policies or procedures to address impairment issues depends largely on the type and size of the firm or agency. However, even if a written policy is reasonably determined to be unnecessary, firms and agencies may want to have a written policy to provide consistency in the guidance available to lawyers and other firm or agency personnel. Firms and agencies should strongly consider implementing practices and procedures that encourage and support reporting of concerns or observed impairment to the appropriate firm or agency personnel. Such procedures may include establishing a reporting hotline, permitting anonymous reporting or designating a "neutral" firm or agency lawyer who does not supervise or manage subordinate lawyers or non-lawyer employees to receive reports. Such measures can encourage reporting by removing concerns regarding reprisal or retaliation against subordinate lawyers and non-lawyer employees. Firm and agency reporting procedures should strike the balance of encouraging reports without mandating reports from these subordinate lawyers and non-lawyer employees, except as may be required by Rule 8.3.

The firm or agency's ultimate ethical obligation is to protect the interests of its clients.[8] To accomplish this task, a firm or agency should consider the following steps appropriate when dealing with an impaired lawyer: (1) speaking with the impaired lawyer about the perceived

[5] https://www.americanbar.org/content/dam/aba/images/abanews/ThePathToLawyerWellBeingReportFINAL.pdf

[6] Rule 1.16(a)(2).

[7] Supervisory lawyers are "'lawyers who have supervisory authority over the work of other lawyers [and nonlawyers] in the office' regardless of their status in the organization. . . . 'Even if a lawyer is not a partner or other general manager, he or she may have direct supervisory authority over another lawyer. . . .' The key to responsibility under paragraph (b) is the relationship between the two lawyers in the matter. The supervisory lawyer 'need not be over the entirety of the second lawyer's practice. . . [Rule 5.1(b)] would apply to direct supervision in a particular case, or to one partner [or manager] who has been given supervisory authority over another partner [or manager's] work in a case or practice area.'" ABA Comm. on Ethics & Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 14-467 (Sept. 8, 2014) (quoting RONALD D. ROTUNDA & JOHN S. DZIENKOWSKI, LEGAL ETHICS: THE LAWYER'S DESKBOOK ON PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY § 5.1-2(b), at 1009 (2014); GEOFFREY C. HAZARD, W. WILLIAM HODES & PETER R. JARVIS, THE LAW OF LAWYERING § 42.3 (3d ed., Supp. 2010); first, third and fourth alterations in the original).

[8] See Rule 1.3.

impairment and need for remediation; (2) requiring the impaired lawyer to seek assistance or professional evaluation as a condition of continued employment; or (3) referring the lawyer to the Bar's confidential Lawyer Assistance Program. It may also be appropriate to provide the lawyer a list of firm-developed referrals or resources for education or assistance/consulting with outside mental-health professionals or other medical professionals. Depending on the circumstances, it may also be appropriate for the firm or government agency to consult with mental-health or medical professionals about the lawyer, prior to engaging in any remedial activities. To the extent such consultation is sought, the firm should ensure that its disclosures regarding the lawyer comply with applicable laws. See Footnote 3.

Firms and agencies should seek to create a culture of compliance that encourages reporting within the organization, including by lawyers and staff who do not have managerial or supervisory responsibilities. Although there is no provision in the Rules requiring subordinate lawyers to take steps to ensure that another lawyer's conduct complies with the Rules, Rule 5.2 requires subordinate lawyers to abide by all Rules, even when acting at the direction of others.[9] Subordinate lawyers should be reminded that (1) even when acting at the direction of another, a subordinate lawyer should not take actions that would ratify the misconduct of an impaired lawyer, and (2) if reporting is mandatory under Rule 8.3, then a subordinate lawyer's duties may be discharged only by a report to the Office of Disciplinary Counsel, as discussed below. Rule 5.3 imposes upon lawyers an obligation to ensure that non-lawyers employed by or otherwise associated with lawyers engage in conduct that is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyers.

If a managerial or supervisory lawyer in a law firm or agency receives a report from a lawyer or staff member, the managerial or supervisory lawyer must investigate and, if it appears that the report is meritorious, take appropriate measures to ensure that the impaired lawyer's conduct conforms to the Rules. If the firm or agency declines to take action, then the reporting lawyer should seek guidance as to the lawyer's professional responsibilities from the Bar's Legal Ethics Helpline or from appropriate legal ethics advisors within or outside the lawyer's organization.

If the firm or agency makes reasonable efforts to ensure compliance with the Rules, as set forth in Rule 5.1, then managerial and supervisory lawyers will not be ethically responsible for the impaired lawyer's violation of the Rules, unless they knew of the conduct at a time when its consequences could have been avoided or mitigated but failed to take reasonable remedial action. See Rule 5.1(c)(2).

To protect more directly the interests of the client, the firm or agency should consider whether the impaired lawyer has a duty to refrain from practicing or if the lawyer must withdraw from representation under Rule 1.16(a)(2). Depending on the circumstances, the firm or agency may determine that it is appropriate to limit the ability of the impaired lawyer to handle legal matters or to deal with clients. Depending on the nature of the lawyer's practice, and the effect the impairment has on the lawyer's abilities, it may be appropriate to change the lawyer's work environment or duties, such as removing the lawyer from trials or negotiations, and assigning tasks such as legal research or drafting. However, if the lawyer is performing any legal tasks, the firm or agency is responsible for supervising the work performed by the lawyer and the work product produced by the lawyer.

Rule 1.4 imposes a requirement that clients be reasonably informed of the status of a matter. Depending on the role that the impaired lawyer played on the legal team, the circumstances surrounding the removal of an impaired lawyer from the case may be material to the representation and therefore need to be disclosed, in order to allow the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation. Assuming disclosure does not violate substantive law, clients should be informed of sufficient facts about the lawyer's impairment to permit a reasonable client to decide whether and how to continue the representation and to make a decision about the client's matter. Comment 2 to Rule 1.4 states that the lawyer "must be particularly careful to ensure that decisions of the client are made only after the client has been informed of all relevant considerations. The lawyer must initiate and maintain the consultative and decision-making process if the client does not do so and must ensure that the ongoing process is thorough and complete." If it is determined that disclosures are required by Rule 1.4 and permissible under law, then lawyers should be careful to disclose only necessary and material information to the clients, balancing truthful disclosures with the impaired lawyer's privacy or other legal rights. It may not be appropriate, under the substantive law, to disclose any details regarding the nature (or suspected nature) of the impairment because, while it may be material to a client that a lawyer is being removed from the matter, the specific reasons for removal would likely not be material to the client's ability to make an informed decision with regard to its matter or its continuing relationship with the firm.[10]

B. Rule 8.3 Obligations to Report Violations of the Rules.

Rule 8.3 imposes a mandatory reporting obligation, under certain circumstances, on every lawyer with respect to other lawyers' violations of the Rules. As set forth in Rule 8.3(a):

> A lawyer who knows that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness, or fitness as a lawyer in other respects, shall inform the appropriate professional authority.

However, pursuant to Rule 8.3(c), "this rule does not require disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6 or other law." If reporting requires the disclosure of protected client information, the report may only be made with the client's informed consent.

Rule 8.3 does not distinguish among managerial, supervisory or subordinate lawyers with respect to their reporting obligations and requires reporting when there is knowledge that another lawyer has committed a violation of the rules that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer.[11]

[9] Rule 5.2(b) provides that "a subordinate lawyer does not violate the Rules of Professional Conduct if that lawyer acts in accordance with a supervisory lawyer's reasonable resolution of an arguable question of professional duty."

[10] Nothing in this Opinion should be interpreted to alter or diminish any obligation to make disclosures otherwise required under the Rules. For example, if the impaired lawyer committed malpractice or violated the standard of care in the representation, such conduct would have to be disclosed to the client under the Rules. Similarly, violations of the Rules may have to be reported to the Office of Disciplinary Counsel as set forth in Rule 8.3. The disclosure of such conduct, however, does not require the disclosure of the lawyer's personal information protected under the law.

[11] The Committee notes that the reporting obligation requires that a lawyer report actual knowledge of a Rule violation implicating the lawyer's honesty,

In Opinion 246, we adopted the four-part test established by other jurisdictions for determining whether the standard under Rule 8.3 is met. The duty to report is obligatory only if:

> (l) the reporting lawyer has actual knowledge of the violation;
>
> (2) reporting can be accomplished without disclosure of client confidences or secrets;[12]
>
> (3) the violation involves a disciplinary rule; and,
>
> (4) the violation raises a substantial question as to honesty, trustworthiness or fitness to practice law.

Government lawyers are advised to review department or agency guidance that may impose additional obligations before disclosing information protected by Rule 1.6, including an obligation to report allegations of misconduct internally for the purpose of reviewing the allegations and determining whether and what information should be disclosed in connection with a referral to the appropriate disciplinary authorities. See, e.g., Justice Manual §§ 1-4.300, 1-4.340.

If the duty to report is triggered under Rule 8.3, it is mandatory. Reliance on the expectation that another lawyer will make a report is insufficient to discharge duties under Rule 8.3. That said, a firm or agency may make a report on behalf of a lawyer or a group of lawyers who have a reporting obligation. In such instances, a single report submitted on behalf of one or more lawyers with an obligation to report will discharge the reporting obligation of each lawyer. Except as constrained by Rule 1.6, the lawyer's duty is to make a report to the appropriate professional authority. If the impaired lawyer is licensed to practice in the District of Columbia, the report must be made to the Office of Disciplinary Counsel. Even if the firm or agency determines that the impaired lawyer did not violate the Rules and that, therefore, there is no duty to report under Rule 8.3, or if obligations imposed by Rule 1.6 or other law prohibit reporting, it may still be appropriate to encourage the lawyer to seek the assistance of the D.C. Bar Lawyer Assistance Program in an effort to provide assistance and support to the impaired lawyer. In addition, the Lawyer Assistance Program may serve as a resource for law firms, government agencies and lawyers navigating an employee's impairment.

C. What is the duty of a managerial or supervisory lawyer when a lawyer with a significant impairment leaves the law firm?

In addition to any duty to report, managerial or supervisory lawyers may have a duty to any current client of the firm who is represented by the departing lawyer to ensure that the client has sufficient information to make an informed decision about continuing to be represented by the impaired lawyer.

The Committee believes that the approach adopted by the Philadelphia Bar Association in Philadelphia Bar Association Ethics Opinion 2000-12 is instructive. The Philadelphia Bar suggested taking a direct approach with the departing lawyer, urging the departing lawyer not to solicit the firm's clients or to indicate that the departing lawyer would handle their cases in any kind of substantive way.

However, if the departing impaired lawyer intends to solicit current firm clients to follow the lawyer to a new practice, then Rule 1.4(b) requires a managerial or supervisory lawyer to explain the situation to the clients to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the clients to make informed decisions regarding the representation, again assuming that the explanation is not prohibited by law. This obligation exists whether or not the firm had taken previous steps to protect the clients, including but not limited to supervising the impaired lawyer or removing the impaired lawyer from the matter and informing the clients of such removal.[13] In the end it remains the clients' decision whether to follow the departing lawyer to a new practice, to remain with their current firm, or to retain a new firm.

Any communication with firm clients should be carefully worded to convey only demonstrable facts about the lawyer's departure. Managerial and supervisory lawyers should be careful to disclose only necessary and material information to the clients, balancing truthful disclosures with the impaired lawyer's privacy rights under the substantive law. Law firms are advised to consult the substantive law regarding what may or may not be said. See Footnote 3. If disclosure of information relating to the circumstances surrounding the lawyer's departure is prohibited under substantive law, then no such disclosure may be compelled under the Rules. In this regard, the Committee believes that the existence of policies and procedures addressing the handling of issues of impairment within the law firm or government agency are helpful to demonstrating compliance with the Rules.

If a communication intended to request that the clients remain with the law firm will be sent by the law firm, then it should be drafted to avoid making false or misleading communications about the firm's services or any misrepresentations that violate Rule 8.4(c). The law firm should avoid any action that might be interpreted as an endorsement of the impaired lawyer or the lawyer's competence, such as sending a joint letter regarding the lawyer's departure from the firm, or other correspondence from the law firm that could be considered an endorsement of the services of the departing attorney. The law firm may, of course, send a letter to its clients encouraging them to remain with the firm, but cannot reasonably prevent the departing lawyer from independently doing the same, provided that such communications are consistent with the departing lawyer's ethical, legal or contractual obligations to the firm.[14] To the extent the guidance in this Opinion endorses the use of a separate letter from the law firm to the clients, the Committee notes that the circumstances regarding the departure of an impaired lawyer from a law firm are extraordinary and warrant a departure from advice previtrustworthiness or fitness to practice law; even if the violating lawyer is not affiliated or employed with the reporting lawyer. Rule 8.4(g) allows for voluntary reporting of conduct to Disciplinary Counsel, so long as there is no threat to seek criminal charges or disciplinary charges solely to obtain an advantage in a civil matter. A complaint or report filed in good faith cannot be said to have been filed solely for the purpose of gaining an advantage in a civil matter. See D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 220 (Threats to File Disciplinary Charges) (1991).

[12]Rule 8.3(c) was amended in 2007 to include a limitation on the duty to report when prohibited by "other law." Opinion 246 should now be read consistent with that amendment.

[13]The Committee envisions a possible scenario in which the impaired attorney's response to being confronted regarding the impairment is to leave the firm to practice elsewhere. In such cases, the firm may not have had the opportunity to remove the impaired lawyer from client matters, to take other protective measures, or to inform clients of the removal of the impaired lawyer from matters. As noted herein, however, the duty to address an issue of impairment, to communicate material information to a client or to mitigate harm may first arise long before the lawyer decides to leave the law firm.

[14]See D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 273 (Ethical Considerations for Lawyers Moving From One Private Law Firm to Another) (1997).

ously provided on the issue of departing lawyers.[15]

If an impaired lawyer leaves a firm and does not take firm clients, or the firm later learns that a former firm client has retained the impaired lawyer, then the law firm has no duty to supply those clients with facts about the impaired lawyer, as long as the firm avoids any action that might be interpreted as an endorsement of the services of the impaired lawyer or the lawyer's competence.

Conclusion

In circumstances where a law firm or government agency addresses the issue of an impaired lawyer, there is a crucial balancing between protecting the interests of the clients and properly discharging the law firm or government agency's obligations to protect the privacy of the lawyer under substantive law. Having appropriate policies and procedures designed to encourage reporting and to address issues of impairment within the law firm or government agency are important steps in ensuring that an impaired lawyer does not violate the Rules and that partners, and managerial and supervisory lawyers properly discharge their duties under the Rules.

Published October 2019

Opinion 378

Acceptance of Cryptocurrency as Payment for Legal Fees

It is not unethical for a lawyer to accept cryptocurrency in lieu of more traditional forms of payment, so long as the fee is reasonable. A lawyer who accepts cryptocurrency as an advance fee on services yet to be rendered, however, must ensure that the fee arrangement is reasonable, objectively fair to the client, and has been agreed to only after the client has been informed in writing of its implications and given the opportunity to seek independent counsel. Additionally, a lawyer who takes possession of a client's cryptocurrency, either as an advance fee or in settlement of a client's claims, must also take competent and reasonable security precautions to safeguard that property.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.1 (Competence)
- Rule 1.5 (Fees)
- Rule 1.8 (Conflice of Interest: Specific Rules)
- Rule 1.15 (Safekeeping Property)

Background

Cryptocurrency is a virtual asset—digital money—that exists only in electronic form. It is completely decentralized, meaning there is no controlling authority, and it is not issued by any government or backed by any tangible security or real estate. Instead, cryptography (mathematical algorithms that are used to encode and decode information) controls the creation of new "coins" of a particular cryptocurrency and secures and records transactions. The resulting data is maintained in a virtual transaction ledger called a "blockchain," which is distributed to every computer on that cryptocurrency's network. The blockchain is a continually-expanding chronological record of transactions; it is comprised of "blocks" of information that include the source of cryptocurrency being transacted, its destination, and a date/time stamp. The most well-known cryptocurrencies are Bitcoin and Ethereum, but there are thousands of others.

Cryptocurrency, once acquired, may be spent like currency or held as an investment asset, like gold. Its algorithmic existence is "stored" in digital "wallets" maintained by online platforms ("hot wallets") or offline on a computer's hard drive, a USB port, or even paper ("cold wallets"). A cryptocurrency wallet also stores private and public keys, which are strings of alphanumeric characters that enable their holder to receive or spend cryptocurrency. The public key is shared to allow others to send currency to a wallet. The private key allows its holder to access her wallet by writing in the public ledger, effectively spending the associated cryptocurrency.

The U.S. Internal Revenue Service (IRS) describes "virtual currency," i.e., cryptocurrency, as "a digital representation of value that functions as a medium of exchange, a unit of account, and/or a store of value."[1] Based on this definition, the IRS treats cryptocurrency as property rather than currency for U.S. federal tax purposes. And, despite having no physical existence and being "spendable" like money, cryptocurrency does seem similar to a commodity such as gold in that its exchange value is tied directly to market demand. But cryptocurrency as an asset is far more volatile than gold—one Bitcoin, for example, was worth $5,647.53 on September 19, 2017; $17,056.55 on December 11, 2017; $7,826.99 on February 5, 2018; $3,295.27 on December 10, 2018; and $10,241.35 on September 9, 2019.[2]

The nature of digital currency- as a new technology, a volatile alternative currency or asset, or client property- raises ethical challenges for lawyers that simply do not exist with fiat currency. But lawyers cannot hold back the tides of change even if they would like to, and cryptocurrency is increasingly accepted as a payment method by vendors and service providers, including lawyers.[3] Accordingly, the Committee provides this Opinion to assist lawyers who accept or even require payment of fees or settlement in cryptocurrency (or whose clients do) to meet their ethical obligations.

1. Reasonableness of the Fee Arrangement

Rule 1.5(a) states that "[a] lawyer's fee shall be reasonable." The rule includes a list of factors to be considered in determining the reasonableness of a fee, most of which concern the nature of the representation, the attorney's level of experience, and the client's needs and sophistication. Only two enumerated factors explicitly mention fees: whether the lawyer's fees are consistent with the customary rates charged in that locality for similar services,[4] and whether a fee is fixed or contingent.[5]

Rule 1.5(a) does not address terms of payment, and there is nothing in the "reasonableness" standard that prohibits [15] See D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 372 (Ethical Considerations in Law Firm Dissolutions) (2017) citing ABA Comm. on Ethics & Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 99-414 (1999).

[1] I.R.S. Notice 2014-21, I.R.B. 2014-16 (Apr. 14, 2014).

[2] Cryptocurrency's volatility is related to many factors, including the relatively limited adoption of digital currency, small market size, risk of security breaches, and lack of regulatory oversight and institutional investment. See https://www.blackwell-global.com/why-are-cryptocurrencies-so-volatile/ (last visited November 12, 2019).

[3] According to a November 2019 article, Quinn Emanuel Urquhart & Sullivan, Perkins Coie, Steptoe & Johnson LLP, Frost Brown Todd, and "a slew of smaller firms as well as solo practitioners have embraced the payment structure" of cryptocurrencies. Samantha Stokes, Quinn Emanuel Says Clients Can Pay In Bitcoin, available at https://www.law.com/americanlawyer/2019/11/05/quinn-emanuel-says-clients-can-pay-in-bitcoin/?slreturn=20200016135954.

[4] Rule 1.5(a)(3).

[5] Rule 1.5(a)(8).

lawyers from accepting potentially volatile assets as payment for fees; indeed, Comment 4 to Rule 1.5 states that "[a] lawyer may accept property . . . such as an ownership interest in an enterprise," as payment. Moreover, this Committee has previously acknowledged that a lawyer may accept an ownership interest in a client, including shares of corporate stock, as an advance payment on services to be rendered. See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion 300 (July 2000).[6]

Opinion 300 is particularly helpful in framing the reasonableness analysis applicable to digital currency. In that opinion, the Committee addressed the question of whether a lawyer could serve as part-time general counsel to a limited liability company in exchange for a 20% interest in the company and a share of future profits. We noted that "the pertinent question" was not "whether such a fee arrangement is ethical in principle; it clearly is. Rather, the question is whether a particular ownership-in-lieu-of-fees arrangement is 'reasonable,' which calls for an analysis of reasonableness factors similar to that we have described in prior opinions." Id. (emphasis added). We emphasized that a lawyer's disclosures and explanation of the risk of paying advance fees in stock would be particularly relevant, as we "had no doubt that reasonableness would be measured, at least in part, by the extent to which the client's acceptance of the fee arrangement was informed by its understanding of [the] financial implications." Id.

We conclude that payment of fees in cryptocurrency is more akin to payment in property than payment in fiat currency. The financial implications of paying for a lawyer's services in a cryptocurrency will vary depending on the fee arrangement. A client who receives a bill for services rendered and elects to immediately transfer bitcoins to an attorney's wallet can be certain of the value of the payment, while a client who pays a lawyer an advance for services to be performed cannot predict the value of that cryptocurrency in a week, much less a month or a year. Therefore, the reasonableness of a fee agreement involving cryptocurrency will depend not only on the terms of the fee agreement itself and whether or not payment is for services rendered or in advance, but also on whether and how well the lawyer explains the nature of a client's particularized financial risks, in light of both the agreed fee structure and the inherent volatility of cryptocurrency.

2. Acceptance of Cryptocurrency Under Rule 1.8(a)

We agree with the conclusion of the New York City Bar Association's Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics that an agreement to accept an advance retainer in cryptocurrency, or an agreement requiring a client to pay future earned fees in cryptocurrency, is subject to Rule of Professional Conduct 1.8(a) governing business transactions with clients.[7]

The D.C. rule, like the New York rule, reflects the fiduciary nature of the lawyer-client relationship.[8] It requires lawyers to ensure that all business dealings with clients are fundamentally fair, providing that:

> (a) A lawyer shall not enter into a business transaction with a client or knowingly acquire an ownership, possessory, security, or other pecuniary interest adverse to a client unless: (1) The transaction and terms on which the lawyer acquires the interest are fair and reasonable to the client and are fully disclosed and transmitted in writing to the client in a manner which can be reasonably understood by the client; (2) The client is given a reasonable opportunity to seek the advice of independent counsel in the transaction; and (3) The client consents in writing thereto.

Like the New York City Bar, we do not believe Rule 1.8(a) is implicated when a client opts to pay attorney's fees in cryptocurrency after receiving a bill, calculated in dollars, for fees already earned and costs incurred. An attorney may agree to accept the corresponding amount of cryptocurrency as a matter of client convenience without taking any special precautions beyond what is required by Rule 1.5 because this is a straightforward exchange involving no additional variables or special knowledge.

If, however, a lawyer and client agree that the client will provide cryptocurrency to be held by the lawyer as an advance fee against services to be performed, or if the lawyer's fees will be calculated in cryptocurrency (e.g., the client agrees to pay one Bitcoin per month), then the lawyer and client are entering into a potentially adverse pecuniary relationship under Rule 1.8. This is because any such agreement necessarily involves considerable uncertainty about the future value of the cryptocurrency at the time the fee will be earned or, in the case of settlement, at the time the payments to third parties and the client will be made.

Rule 1.8(a), like Rule 1.5(a), requires a lawyer to adequately disclose the terms and implications of the fee arrangement, which must be reasonable. But Rule 1.8(a) goes significantly further: a lawyer who enters into a business relationship with a client must provide to the client written disclosure of the terms of the agreement and a reasonable opportunity to confer with independent counsel, and must obtain from the client written, informed consent to the agreement. Additionally, Rule 1.8(a) adds an independent ethical obligation to ensure that the fee arrangement is not only reasonable, but also "fair" to the client.

But at what point in the engagement is fairness to be determined? This question is particularly important when assessing the fairness of an agreement to accept and hold a volatile asset like cryptocurrency—or stocks, or future profits, or foreign currency—as advance fees for services not yet rendered. Once again, Opinion 300, concerning accepting stocks or partial ownership of a client in lieu of fees, is instructive:

> Rule 1.8(a) and the commentary thereto are silent on how fairness is to be determined, and whether it is to be determined only by reference to facts and circumstances existing at the time the arrangement is accepted by the parties, or by reference to subsequent developments (for example, a huge appreciation in the value of the shares received as fees such that the lawyer is effectively compensated at 100-fold the reasonable value of his services). For ethics purposes (and not for purposes of assessing common law fiduciary duties), we believe that the "fairness" of the fee arrangement should be judged at the time of the engagement. In other words, if the fee arrangement is "fair and reasonable to the client" at the time of the [6] Indeed, Bar Associations across the country have long agreed that a lawyer may accept fees in stock or equity interest in a client so long as the lawyer ensures that the client fully understands the financial implications and the terms are objectively fair to the client. See ABA Op. 00-418 (July 7, 2000), "Acquiring Ownership in a Client in Connection with Performing Legal Services"); N.Y.C. Eth. Op. 2000-3.

[7] N.Y.C. Eth. Op. 2019-5.

[8] "Because a lawyer occupies a multifaceted position of trust with regard to the client . . . there is an ever present fiduciary responsibility that arches over every aspect of the lawyer-client relationship, including fees. Connelly v. Swick & Shapiro, P.C., 749 A.2d 1264, 1268 (D.C. 2000) (internal citations omitted).

> engagement, no ethical violation could occur if subsequent events, beyond the control of the lawyer, caused the fee to appear unfair or unreasonable.

Opinion 300 at fn 5; see also Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 126, comment e (2000) ("Fairness is determined based on facts that reasonably could be known at the time of the transaction, not as the facts later develop.")

Applying these principles, any fee arrangement that calculates fees in cryptocurrency, or that allows or requires a client to either provide an advance fee or accept a settlement payment from a third party in cryptocurrency, should be assessed for fairness at the time that it is agreed upon, based on the facts then available. For so long as the value of digital currency remains predictably volatile, this is a fact the lawyer must ensure that his or her client understands.

The information that must be disclosed to a particular client in writing under Rule 1.8(a) will, of course, vary. As a general matter, in addition to terms concerning billing rates and frequency, a lawyer accepting cryptocurrency should consider including a clear explanation of how the client will be billed (i.e. in dollars or cryptocurrency); whether and how frequently cryptocurrency held by the lawyer will be calculated in dollars, or otherwise trued-up or adjusted for accounting purposes and whether, upon that accounting, market increases and decreases in the value of the cryptocurrency triggers obligations by either party; whether the lawyer or the client will be responsible for cryptocurrency transfer fees (if any); which cryptocurrency exchange platform will be utilized to determine the value of cryptocurrency upon receipt and, in the case of advance fees, as the representation proceeds (i.e., as fees are earned) and upon its termination; and who will be responsible if cryptocurrency accepted by the lawyer in settlement of the client's claims loses value and cannot satisfy third party liens.[9]

3. Competently Safeguarding Cryptocurrency

Rule 1.15(a) requires, among other things, that a lawyer "appropriately safeguard" the property of clients and third parties.[10] Paragraph (e) addresses advance fees, and provides that "advances of unearned fees and unincurred costs shall be treated as property of the client pursuant to paragraph (a) until earned or incurred unless the client gives informed consent to a different arrangement," and, that, even if the client does consent to a different arrangement,[11] any unearned or unincurred portion of an advance fee must be returned upon termination of the lawyer's services. See also Rule 1.16(d).[12] These rules, of course, apply to all advance fees, regardless of how they are funded. But, as with issues related to valuation, safeguarding cryptocurrency raises unique challenges.

The first rule of professional conduct is that lawyers must provide competent representation to their clients. See Rule 1.1. Although the Comments to Rule 1.1 do not specifically reference technology, we agree with ABA Comment [8] to Model Rule 1.1 that, to be competent, "a lawyer should keep abreast of changes in the law and its practice, including the benefits and risks associated with relevant technology." Consistent with D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion 371, which addressed lawyers' use of social media, a lawyer must have the skill required to exercise reasonable professional judgment regarding the use of technology, including digital currency, within the lawyer's legal practice.

In the case of cryptocurrency, competence requires lawyers to understand and safeguard against the many ways cryptocurrency can be stolen or lost. Because blockchain transactions are unregulated, uninsured, anonymous, and irreversible, cryptocurrency is regularly targeted for digital fraud and theft. For example, cryptocurrency online wallets and exchange platforms may be fraudulent; legitimate wallets and platforms may be subject to security breaches; and private keys used to transfer cryptocurrency out of a person's wallet are vulnerable to network-based threats like hacking and malware if stored in a hot wallet (a device or system connected to the internet). Additionally, private keys that are stored in a cold wallet (hardware, offline software, or paper) can be irretrievably lost, in which case the associated digital currency is likely permanently inaccessible. Just as with fiat currency or any client property, a lawyer must use reasonable care to minimize the risk of loss.

Conclusion

We do not perceive any basis in the Rules of Professional Conduct for treating cryptocurrency as a uniquely unethical form of payment. Cryptocurrency is, ultimately, simply a relatively new means of transferring economic value, and the Rules are flexible enough to provide for the protection of clients' interests and property without rejecting advances in technologies. So long as the fee agreement between a lawyer and her client is objectively fair and reasonable (and otherwise complies with Rules 1.5 and 1.8), and the lawyer possesses the requisite knowledge to competently safeguard the client's digital currency, there is no prohibition against a lawyer accepting cryptocurrency from or on behalf of a client.

Published June 2020

Opinion 379

Attorneys' Charging Liens and Client Confidentiality

An attorney whose fees are secured by a charging lien against the client's future recovery in a matter may give notice of the existence of the charging lien to successor counsel or another likely holder of the property subject to the lien if the attorney's representation in the matter is terminated before there is a recovery. Absent the former client's consent, however, the notice must not contain information about the client's lack of resources, the client's past refusals to pay, or any other information gained in the professional relationship that would be embarrassing, or likely to be detrimental, to the client. Any further efforts to enforce the lien or collect the fees must

[9] The lawyer bears the burden of proving that the transaction was fair and the client was adequately informed, and ambiguities will be construed in favor of the client. See, e.g. In re Martin, 67 A.3d 1032, 1041 (D.C. 2013) ("[A]ny ambiguity in the [contingent fee] agreement would be interpreted against Martin, who drafted the agreement. See Capital City Mortg. Corp. v. Habana Vill. Art & Folklore, Inc., 747 A.2d 564, 567 (D.C. 2000) (stating that ambiguities in contracts will be 'construed strongly against the drafter.' ")); ABA Opinion 00-418.

[10] Rule 1.15(a) also requires that lawyers maintain trust funds to hold money belonging to clients or third parties. Because cryptocurrency has been designated by the IRS as property rather than money, and because it cannot be deposited into a trust fund without being converted to money, this requirement is not applicable.

[11] Any "different arrangement" must be fair to the client. "At a minimum, a lawyer must explain to the client 'the basis for this arrangement and . . . how [the client's] rights are protected by the arrangement.'" In re Mance, 980 A.2d 1196, 1207 (D.C. App. 2009), as amended (Oct. 29, 2009) (quoting In re Sather, 3 P.3d 403, 410 (Colo. 2000) (en banc)).

[12] See also In re Mance, id. at 1202.

comply with the Rules of Professional Conduct governing fee disputes between lawyers and clients. Disclosures of client confidences can be made only to the minimum extent necessary to collect the fees, and even then protective orders and filings in camera or under seal should be used to the maximum extent possible to protect client confidential information from exposure to third parties without a need to know.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.5 (Fees)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.8(i) (Lawyer Liens)
- Rule 1.15 (Safekeeping Property)
- Rule 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation)

Discussion

Historically, an attorney's toolkit to collect fees included two different kinds of liens: (1) a "retaining lien" against client files and other client property in the lawyer's possession, and (2) a "charging lien" against the proceeds of a claim that the lawyer pursued on the client's behalf when the lawyer and the client "contracted with the understanding that the attorney's charges were to be paid out of the judgment recovered." See generally Wolf v. Sherman, 682 A.2d 194, 197 (D.C. 1996). "A charging lien does not depend upon an agreement that the attorney shall have a lien upon the judgment; in fact, only in the absence (or inadequacy) of an express lien does the question of a possible equitable lien arise." Id. at 198. As discussed below, an attorney's ability to use a retaining lien was substantially circumscribed by the adoption of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct in 1991. However, no specific changes were made with respect to charging liens. The question presented to the Committee here is whether a discharged lawyer's confidentiality obligation to the former client under Rule 1.6 precludes the lawyer giving notice of the lien to the former client's successor counsel or another likely custodian of the funds or property subject to the lien. The answer is no.

A. Retaining Liens

Where authorized, a retaining lien empowers a terminated attorney to hold hostage the client's file and other property in the lawyer's possession until the bill is paid or, in some jurisdictions, until a court orders release of the file. Such an order may be conditioned on the client posting a bond to secure the terminated attorney's fee claim, or by imposing a charging lien on the eventual proceeds of the case. See, e.g., Security Credit Systems, Inc. v. Perfetto, 662 N.Y.S.2d 674 (N.Y. App. Div. 1997) (discussing New York practice).

The greater the client's need for the file, the more effective the retaining lien is in motivating the client to pay quickly. In order to prevent harm to the client, however, some jurisdictions limit or eliminate the ability of attorneys to use retaining liens in the circumstances where the lien would be most effective.

The District of Columbia is such a jurisdiction. Since 1991, when the Rules of Professional Conduct replaced the earlier Code of Professional Responsibility, two of the then-new rules have circumscribed the ability to enforce a retaining lien. Under Rule 1.8(i):

> A lawyer may acquire and enforce a lien granted by law to secure the lawyer's fees or expenses, but a lawyer shall not impose a lien upon any part of a client's files, except upon the lawyer's own work product, and then only to the extent that the work product has not been paid for. This work product exception shall not apply when the client has become unable to pay, or when withholding the lawyer's work product would present a significant risk to the client of irreparable harm.

Under Rule 1.16(d):

> In connection with any termination of representation, a lawyer shall take timely steps to the extent reasonably practicable to protect a client's interests, such as . . . surrendering papers and property to which the client is entitled. . . . The lawyer may retain papers relating to the client to the extent permitted by Rule 1.8(i).

As discussed in Legal Ethics Opinion 230, file materials that are not "work product" are not subject to any retaining lien. We concluded in that opinion that the inquiring attorney in that matter could not retain the originals of promissory notes and a letter of credit.

While the first sentence of Rule 1.8(i) holds out the possibility of a retaining lien as to the lawyer's own work product to the extent that the client has not paid for it, the second sentence takes that option away if the client is "unable to pay" or when withholding the work product "would present a significant risk to the client of irreparable harm." Rule 1.8(i). As a practical matter, this takes the assertion of a retaining lien off the table in situations where such a lien would be the most powerful.

This was a substantial change from practice prior to 1991 under the Code of Professional Responsibility. As several of our earlier opinions illustrate, the former Code was much more permissive of the use of retaining liens, although there were some limits. See generally D.C. Legal Ethics Opinions 59, 90, 103 & 107.

B. Charging Liens

Charging liens exist under common law in some jurisdictions and by statute in others. Case law in New York memorably describes that state's charging lien as "a device to protect counsel against 'the knavery of his client,' whereby through his effort, the attorney acquires an interest in the client's cause of action." Butler, Fitzgerald & Potter v. Sequa Corp., 250 F.3d 171, 177 (2d Cir. 2001) (quoting In re City of New York, 157 N.E.2d 587, 590 (N.Y. 1959)). "The lien is predicated on the idea that the attorney has by his skill and effort obtained the judgment, and hence 'should have a lien thereon for his compensation, in analogy to the lien which a mechanic has upon any article which he manufactures.'" Id. (quoting Williams v. Ingersoll, 89 N.Y. 508, 517 (1882)).

The charging lien in the District of Columbia is a creature of local common law:

> At common law an attorney had what is known as a charging lien on the judgment or decree obtained for his client for services rendered in procuring it to the extent of his taxable costs and expenses. In many of the United States an attorney's charging lien is created by statute, and is, of course, limited by its terms. In some of the states in which there is no statute the attorney's lien has been extended by court decision to cover reasonable compensation for his services, and in those jurisdictions it is held that such lien may be enforced by resort to equity.
>
> In the District of Columbia there is no statute, but the rule on the subject has been stated to be that it is an indispensable condition to the establishment of an attorney's lien on a particular fund — not in possession — that there should be a distinct appropriation of the fund by the client, or an agreement that the attorney should be paid out of it. This rule is now the established law in this jurisdiction.

Pink v. Farrington, 92 F.2d 465, 466 (D.C. Cir. 1937). Accord Wolf v. Sherman, 682 A.2d at 197 ("The District's rule on charging liens is narrower than the English common law rule.").

The lien may be asserted by giving notice to successor counsel or to others who are likely to have control of the encumbered property before it is distributed to the client. In D.C. Redevelopment Land Agency v. Dowdey, for example, prior counsel successfully enforced a charging lien against a government agency that condemned property that the lawyer had saved from foreclosure. 618 A.2d 153 (D.C. 1992). The original landowner in that case had retained the attorney to delay foreclosure until the property was condemned. The attorney's fee agreement entitled him to one-third of the property's equity value, e.g., the proceeds of the eventual condemnation to the landowner. Despite having had notice of the attorney's charging lien, the condemning authority paid the prior landowner without joining the attorney to the litigation that was intended to adjudicate entitlement to those proceeds. The court held that the condemning authority bore the risk of having to make a double payment in those circumstances under condemnation law. See id. at 162.[1]

C. Attorneys' Fee Issues When A Client Changes Counsel in the Middle of a Contingent Fee Representation.

"A client has a right to discharge a lawyer at any time, with or without cause, subject to liability for payment for the lawyer's services." Rule 1.16 cmt. [4]. However, "where a [terminated] lawyer has a valid lien covering undisputed amounts of property or money, the lawyer may continue to hold such property or money to the extent permitted by the substantive law governing the lien asserted." Rule 1.16 cmt. [11] (citing Rules 1.8 and 1.15(b)).

In contingent fee representations, a lawyer who is discharged without cause is generally entitled to a fee if the client ultimately prevails in the underlying matter. In the District of Columbia, the amount of that fee depends on how much work the lawyer did before being discharged. If the discharged attorney "had substantially performed" and was "at all times ready, able and willing to complete what remained to be done," "the attorney is entitled to the full amount of his fee" if the client subsequently recovers. Kaushiva v. Hutter, 454 A.2d 1373, 1375 (D.C. 1983) (citations omitted) However, "[w] here an attorney, before discharge, has performed only inconsequential services of little benefit to the client, even if these services were all that could have been expected of him, he may recover only in quantum meruit." In re Waller, 524 A.2d 748, 750 (D.C. 1987) (citing Friedman v. Harris, 81 U.S.App.D.C. 317, 318, 158 F.2d 187, 188 (1946) (attorney who had merely filed suit entitled only to quantum meruit)).[2]

The client's potential liability to predecessor counsel for any recovery in a contingent fee case is so well understood that successor counsel may have an affirmative obligation to warn the client about it in their initial negotiations about successor counsel's fee. Such was the conclusion of the American Bar Association's Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility in ABA Formal Opinion 487 (2019).

The ABA's conclusion focused on the requirements of Model Rules 1.5(b) and (c). Under the former, "the basis or rate of the fee and expenses for which the client will be responsible shall be communicated to the client, preferably in writing, before or within a reasonable time after commencing the representation." The latter authorizes contingent fees where not prohibited but requires contingent fee agreements to be in a writing "signed by the client" and to disclose a number of things, including "the method by which the fee is to be determined," "litigation and other expenses to be deducted from the recovery," "whether such expenses are to be deducted before or after the continent fee is calculated," percentages accruing to the lawyer in the event of settlement, trial or appeal, and "any expenses for which the client will be liable" even if not the prevailing party.

The ABA committee concluded that "[a] contingent fee agreement that fails to mention that some portion of the fee may be due to or claimed by the first counsel . . . is inconsistent with the requirements of Rule 1.5(b) and (c)." ABA Formal Opinion 487, at 2. The ABA highlighted the concern if this were to occur with the following illustration:

> Assume, for example, that a client retains a lawyer in a matter and enters into a written fee agreement in which the lawyer is entitled to one-third of any recovery. The client then decides to terminate the lawyer, without cause, and hires new counsel. The successor counsel takes the matter on the same terms as the predecessor counsel (one-third of any recovery) but the successor counsel's written fee agreement is silent on whether that one-third is in addition to or in lieu of the one-third specified in the predecessor counsel's fee agreement, and no such disclosure is made in a separate document provided to the client. In these circumstances, the client may not know whether the client must pay one or both lawyers or the amount of the fees owed. The client may be aware of the right to terminate a lawyer's representation at any time but may not be aware that termination does not necessarily extinguish an obligation to pay prior counsel for the value of the work performed – the quantum meruit claim – or in some cases a termination amount specified in the predecessor counsel's fee agreement. If the predecessor counsel was not terminated for cause, that lawyer may be entitled to payment for the fair value contributed to the case before being terminated. Under those circumstances, "a contingency client should be advised by the successor attorney of the existence and effect of the discharged attorney's claim for fees on the occurrence of the contingency as part of the terms and conditions of the employment by the successor attorney."

ABA Formal Opinion 487 at 3 (footnotes omitted).

[1] In some jurisdictions, charging liens are available in non-contingent fee matters in which the attorney is to be paid on an hourly basis without regard to whether the litigation is successful. See generally John C. Martin, Attorney Charging Liens: A Primer (2016), available at https://www.sfgh.com/siteFiles/News/Attorney%20Charging%20Liens.pdf. That appears not to be the case in the District of Columbia given the requirement of an express or implicit agreement with the client that the attorney is to be paid from the proceeds of the representation. Accordingly, the rest of this opinion will focus on contingent fee representations. We note, however, that the availability of a common law charging lien is irrelevant and unnecessary if the attorney's agreement with the client gives the attorney an express lien on any proceeds of the representation as security for the attorney's fee claim. See Wolf v. Sherman, 682 A.2d at 198 & 200-201. The existence and elements of a charging lien claim are, of course, questions of law beyond the purview of this Committee.

[2] However, "[a] client has the ultimate authority to control his affairs; thus, he may settle a claim regardless of his attorney's efforts to prosecute it." King & King, Chartered v. Harbert Int'l, Inc., 503 F.3d 153, 156 (D.C. Cir. 2007) (citing Barnes v. Quigley, 49 A.2d 467, 468 (D.C. 1946)). Similarly, there can be no quantum meruit compensation when the client chooses to discontinue a case because of his reasonable assessment that there is no chance of recovery. Id. at 157. "Otherwise, a contingent-fee client, convinced he had no chance of success, would have to continue his case just to avoid quantum meruit liability. Such a policy would encourage litigants to take unwarranted risks and prolong litigation simply to avoid paying attorney fees—a predicament that mocks the ideal of client control." Id.

D.C. Rules 1.5(b)[3] and (c)[4] differ in some respects from their counterparts in the Model Rules. On this issue, however, we believe that our Rule 1.5 also requires successor counsel in a contingent fee matter to alert the client that prior counsel may have a claim to a fee from any eventual recovery. Absent such disclosure, many clients would not fully understand the basis or rate of the fees for which they might ultimately be liable.

The ABA opinion also discussed certain obligations that successor counsel would have to prior counsel under the "Safekeeping Property" obligations of Rule 1.15:

> Where a disagreement persists between the predecessor counsel and the client, or predecessor counsel and successor counsel, about the amount of the predecessor counsel's fees from the proceeds obtained by the successor counsel, the successor counsel must comply with Rule 1.15 and substantive law in notifying predecessor counsel of the receipt of the funds and in deciding how to handle the funds. . . . If there is a dispute as to whether some or all of those funds should be paid to the predecessor counsel by the client but there is a claim to the proceeds by that counsel, the successor counsel must hold the disputed portion of the funds in a client trust account pursuant to Rule 1.15(e).

ABA Formal Opinion 487 at 6-7.

D.C. Rule 1.15 imposes similar obligations to the extent that successor counsel is aware of prior counsel's claim against funds recovered for the client:

> (a) A lawyer shall hold property of clients or third persons that is in the lawyer's possession in connection with a representation separate from the lawyer's own property. Funds of clients or third persons that are in the lawyer's possession (trust funds) shall be kept in one or more trust accounts maintained in accordance with paragraph (b). Other property shall be identified as such and appropriately safeguarded. Complete records of such account funds and other property shall be kept by the lawyer and shall be preserved for a period of five years after termination of the representation.
>
> * * *
>
> (c) Upon receiving funds or other property in which a client or third person has an interest, a lawyer shall promptly notify the client or third person. Except as stated in this rule or otherwise permitted by law or by agreement with the client, a lawyer shall promptly deliver to the client or third person any funds or other property that the client or third person is entitled to receive and, upon request by the client or third person, shall promptly render a full accounting regarding such property, subject to Rule 1.6.
>
> (d) When in the course of representation a lawyer is in possession of property in which interests are claimed by the lawyer and another person, or by two or more persons to each of whom the lawyer may have an obligation, the property shall be kept separate by the lawyer until there is an accounting and severance of interests in the property. If a dispute arises concerning the respective interests among persons claiming an interest in such property, the undisputed portion shall be distributed and the portion in dispute shall be kept separate by the lawyer until the dispute is resolved. Any funds in dispute shall be deposited in a separate account meeting the requirements of paragraph (a) and (b).

In Legal Ethics Opinion 293, we provided guidance on the disposition of the property of clients and others where ownership of that property is in dispute. We concluded:

> In certain situations, a lawyer is obligated to safeguard funds that come into the lawyer's possession where ownership interests are claimed by both the lawyer's client and a third party or parties. If the third party has a "just claim" to the property that the lawyer has a duty under applicable law to protect against wrongful interference by the lawyer's client, the lawyer must hold any disputed portion of the property until the dispute has been resolved.[5]

Legal Ethics Opinion 293.

We gave extensive guidance on what would and would not be a "just claim" that the lawyer needed to respect in considering distributions of funds:

> In general, a "just claim" that the lawyer must honor pursuant to Rule 1.15 is one that relates to the particular funds in the lawyer's possession, as opposed to merely being (or alleged to be) a general unsecured obligation of the client. The problems addressed by this opinion most commonly arise in the context of the disbursement of settlement funds or proceeds of a transaction, such as the sale of real estate. In those cases, several types of claims that frequently are received by lawyers are illustrative of "just claims" that would require the lawyer to give notice, make disbursement promptly where there is no dispute, and safeguard the funds in the event of a dispute until the dispute is resolved. These are:
>
> 1. an attachment or garnishment arising out of a money judgment against the client (or ordered judicially prior to judgment) and duly served upon the lawyer, regardless of whether the attachment or garnishment is related to the matter being handled by the lawyer…;
>
> 2. a statutory lien that applies to the proceeds of the suit being handled by the lawyer…;
>
> 3. a court order relating to the specific funds in the lawyer's possession…; and
>
> 4. a contractual agreement made by the client and joined in or ratified by the lawyer to pay certain funds in the possession of the lawyer (e.g., client expenses in consideration of the supplier's agreement to forebear collection action during the pendency of the lawsuit) to a third party, regardless of whether such an agreement arises

[3] "When the lawyer has not regularly represented the client, the basis or rate of the fee, the scope of the lawyer's representation, and the expenses for which the client will be responsible shall be communicated to the client, in writing, before or within a reasonable time after commencing the representation."

[4] "A fee may be contingent on the outcome of the matter for which the service is rendered, except in a matter in which a contingent fee is prohibited by paragraph (d) or other law. A contingent fee agreement shall be in writing and shall state the method by which the fee is to be determined, including the percentage or percentages that shall accrue to the lawyer in the event of settlement, trial, or appeal, litigation, other expenses to be deducted from the recovery, whether such expenses are to be deducted before or after the contingent fee is calculated, and whether the client will be liable for expenses regardless of the outcome of the matter. Upon conclusion of a contingent fee matter, the lawyer shall provide the client with a written statement stating the outcome of the matter, and if there is a recovery, showing the remittance to the client and the method of its determination."

[5] The source of the phrase "just claim" is Comment [8] to Rule 1.15:

> Third parties, such as a client's creditors, may have just claims against funds or other property in a lawyer's custody. A lawyer may have a duty under applicable law to protect such third-party claims against wrongful interference by the client, and accordingly may refuse to surrender the property to the client. However, a lawyer shall not unilaterally assume to arbitrate a dispute between a client and the third party.

> from the matter being handled by the lawyer….

Legal Ethics Opinion 293 (citations omitted).

"Where such a 'just claim' exists, the lawyer is ethically obliged to disregard her client's demand for the property. Thus, this rule concerning 'just claims' is an exception to the general principle of client loyalty." Id. (citations omitted).

We have no doubt that a charging lien is a "just claim" that successor counsel cannot ignore in disbursing the proceeds of the representation.[6] However, we noted in Opinion 293 that Rule 1.15 "does not apply to claims of which the lawyer lacks knowledge." The issue for this opinion is whether prior counsel's confidentiality obligation to the client precludes prior counsel from giving notice of the charging lien to successor counsel or other likely custodians of encumbered funds or property. The answer is no.

D. Confidentiality Obligations Generally in Matters Relating to Unpaid Fees and Terminations of Representations

Rule 1.6 defines a lawyer's confidentiality obligation to the lawyer's current and former clients. The obligation extends to both "confidences" and "secrets."

> "Confidence" refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law, and "secret" refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client.

Rule 1.6(b).

This rule is broader than the attorney-client privilege because it includes both privileged information (defined as a "confidence") and non-privileged information gained within the professional relationship that fits within the rule's definition of a "secret." While encompassing more than is covered by the evidentiary privilege, the confidentiality obligation in D.C. has outer limits. If some specific bit of information gained in the professional relationship is neither a "confidence" nor a "secret," the rule's confidentiality obligations do not apply to it.[7]

There is an exception to the confidentiality obligation for fee disputes: "A lawyer may use or reveal client confidences or secrets: . . . to the minimum extent necessary in an action instituted by the lawyer to establish or collect the lawyer's fee." Rule 1.6(e)(5). However, this exception is limited to "an action instituted by the lawyer" to collect or establish the fee. The client's mere refusal to pay does not trigger this confidentiality exception. Disclosure can only be made within the context of that "action."

Even when it applies, the fee dispute exception does not authorize unfettered use by the lawyer of every confidence and secret obtained from the delinquent client. Disclosures may be made in "the action" only "to the minimum extent necessary" to establish or collect the fee. As explained in the comments to Rule 1.6:

> Subparagraph (e)(5) permits a lawyer to reveal a client's confidences or secrets if this is necessary in an action to collect fees from the client. This aspect of the rule expresses the principle that the beneficiary of a fiduciary relationship may not exploit it to the detriment of the fiduciary. Subparagraph (e)(5) should be construed narrowly; it does not authorize broad, indiscriminate disclosure of secrets or confidences. The lawyer should evaluate the necessity for disclosure of information at each stage of the action. For example, in drafting the complaint in a fee collection suit, it would be necessary to reveal the "secrets" that the lawyer was retained by the client, that fees are due, and that the client has failed to pay those fees. Further disclosure of the client's secrets and confidences would be impermissible at the complaint stage. If possible, the lawyer should prevent even the disclosure of the client's identity through the use of John Doe pleadings.
>
> If the client's response to the lawyer's complaint raised issues implicating confidences or secrets, the lawyer would be permitted to disclose confidential or secret information pertinent to the client's claims or defenses. Even then, the rule would require that the lawyer's response be narrowly tailored to meet the client's specific allegations, with the minimum degree of disclosure sufficient to respond effectively. In addition, the lawyer should continue, throughout the action, to make every effort to avoid unnecessary disclosure of the client's confidences and secrets and to limit the disclosure to those having the need to know it. To this end the lawyer should seek appropriate protective orders and make any other arrangements that would minimize the risk of disclosure of the confidential information in question, including the utilization of in camera proceedings.

Rule 1.6 cmts. [26] & [27].

Lawyers may terminate representations of clients who do not pay their fees. Under Rule 1.16(b)(3), "a lawyer may withdraw from representing a client if . . . [t]he client fails substantially to fulfill an obligation to the lawyer regarding the lawyer's services and has been given reasonable warning that the lawyer will withdraw unless the obligation is fulfilled." If the matter is before a court or other tribunal, however, the tribunal's

[6] We understand that the engagement agreements of some lawyers include an explicit lien in the lawyer's favor on any proceeds of the representation to the extent that the lawyer's fees are not paid or otherwise secured. As noted above, an equitable charging lien is unnecessary when there is an express lien. See generally Wolf v. Sherman, 682 A.2d at 198 & 200-201. Such an express lien would also be a "just claim" for purposes of Rule 1.15 whether the lien claimant had agreed to work on an hourly fee, a flat fee, or a contingent fee.

[7] The "confidences" and "secrets" approach used in D.C. Rule 1.6 differs from Model Rule 1.6, which makes confidential "information relating to the representation of a client." The ABA's "confidentiality rule . . . applies not only to matters communicated in confidence by the client but also to all information relating to the representation, whatever its source." Model Rule 1.6 cmt. [3]. In the mid-1980s, when the District was considering whether to adopt the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, the District rejected the ABA approach as "broader than warranted" and recommended retention of Disciplinary Rule (DR) 4-101 approach from the District's then-controlling Code of Professional Responsibility. Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct and Related Comments Showing the Language Proposed by the American Bar Association, Changes Recommended by the District of Columbia Bar Model Rules of Professional Conduct Committee, and Changes Recommended by the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia Bar at 52, ¶ 38 (Nov. 19, 1986). DR 4-101 used the "confidences" and "secrets" formulation now reflected in D.C. Rule 1.6(b). A number of other jurisdictions also retained the confidences and secrets formulation of the confidentiality obligation or its functional equivalent. The rules in New York and Virginia, for example, deleted the defined terms "confidence" and "secret" but replaced them with the phrases that the Code of Professional Responsibility used to define those words. See New York Rule 1.6(a) (" 'Confidential information' consists of information gained during or relating to the representation of a client, whatever its source, that is (a) protected by the attorney-client privilege, (b) likely to be embarrassing or detrimental to the client if disclosed, or (c) information that the client has requested be kept confidential."); Virginia Rule 1.6(a) ("A lawyer shall not reveal information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law or other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or would be likely to be detrimental to the client…."). See also California Bus. & Prof. Code § 6068(e)(1) ("It is the duty of the attorney to do all of the following: . . . To maintain inviolate the confidence, and at every peril to himself or herself to preserve the secrets, of his or her client.").

permission to withdraw may also be required. Rule 1.16(c).

Rule 1.6 limits what a lawyer can say in a motion seeking to withdraw from a representation. Unlike "an action instituted by the lawyer" to collect a fee, there is no specific exception to Rule 1.6 for withdrawal motions. In In re Gonzalez, 773 A.2d 1026 (D.C. 2001), a lawyer was admonished for revealing too much in a motion to withdraw from a representation. Accord In re Ponds, 876 A.2d 636 (D.C. 2005). The lawyer in the Gonzalez case had made no attempt to keep sensitive client information away from opposing counsel and out of public filings. The court noted that:

> Gonzalez could have submitted his documentation in camera, and that he could also have made appropriate redactions of the material most potentially damaging to his clients (e.g., his allegations that A.A. had misrepresented facts to him and his suggestion, in one of the letters, that a demand of $90,000 by the plaintiffs in the underlying litigation might be reasonable).

773 A.2d at 1032.

ABA Formal Opinion 476 (2016) provides extensive guidance about confidentiality issues in withdrawal motions under the Model Rules. It concluded:

> In moving to withdraw as counsel in a civil proceeding based on a client's failure to pay fees, a lawyer must consider the duty of confidentiality under Rule 1.6 and seek to reconcile that duty with the court's need for sufficient information upon which to rule on the motion. Similarly, in entertaining such a motion, a judge should consider the right of the movant's client to confidentiality. This requires cooperation between lawyers and judges. If required by the court to support the motion with facts relating to the representation, a lawyer may, pursuant to Rule 1.6(b)(5), disclose only such confidential information as is reasonably necessary for the court to make an informed decision on the motion.

In finding that some limited disclosure was possible if steps to avoid such disclosure were unsuccessful, the ABA opinion relied on Model Rule 1.6(b)(5), which allows a lawyer to reveal client confidential information "to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary . . . to establish a claim or defense on behalf of the lawyer in a controversy between the lawyer and the client."

Although that section does not mention fee collection matters specifically, this is the part of Model Rule 1.6 that allows lawyers to use client confidential information in fee disputes with lawyers. In relying on that section to authorize some disclosures in the withdrawal context, the ABA opinion noted that "motions to withdraw based on a client's failure to pay fees are generally grounded in the same basic right of a lawyer to be paid pursuant to the terms of a fee agreement with a client." ABA Opinion 476, at 4.

E. Application of These Principles to Giving Notice of a Charging Lien

With that background, may an attorney seek to enforce his or her charging lien by giving notice of it to successor counsel or to another likely custodian of the funds or property to which the lien relates? We believe that the attorney may, for the reasons discussed below.

The District's confidentiality rule only applies to "confidences" and "secrets," as defined in Rule 1.6. Attorney fee agreements are not normally within the scope of the attorney-client privilege. See generally 1 Edna Selan Epstein, The Attorney-Client Privilege and the Work-Product Doctrine 131-40 (6th ed. 2017). Nor are billing statements, at least not when time entries containing privileged or confidential information are redacted. Id. at 157-62. The existence of the lien is certainly not a "confidence."

However, the existence of the lien would be a "secret" within the protections of Rule 1.6 if it were "information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client." Whether something is a "secret" for purposes of Rule 1.6 depends on the facts and circumstances in a particular matter.

However, the client has the power to make any information gained in the professional relationship a "secret" for purposes of Rule 1.6 by "request[ing]" that the information "be held inviolate." We will assume for purposes of this opinion that the client has invoked that power with respect to the information that would need to be included in the notice of a charging lien. Indeed, a sophisticated client might even attempt to use that power to avoid having to pay for prior counsel's services by:

- Ordering prior counsel not to tell others about his or her charging lien; and
- Ordering successor counsel not to inform prior counsel that the client prevailed and that there is a fund from which prior counsel might be able to seek a fee.

Such skullduggery will not stand. "The Rules of Professional Conduct are rules of reason. They should be interpreted with reference to the purposes of legal representation and of the law itself." Rules of Professional Conduct: Scope cmt. [1].

We previously concluded in Opinion 293 that lawyers must disregard client instructions to ignore "just claims" by third parties to funds in the lawyer's possession. "Where such a 'just claim' exists, the lawyer is ethically obliged to disregard her client's demand for the property. Thus, this rule concerning 'just claims' is an exception to the general principle of client loyalty."[8]

More precisely on point is California Legal Ethics Opinion 2008-175 answering the question "What are a successor attorney's ethical obligations when her client in a contingency fee matter instructs her not to notify prior counsel, who has a valid lien against the recovery, of the fact or the amount of a settlement?" In that opinion, a client (Client) retained an attorney (A) to pursue a legal malpractice claim on a one-third contingent fee basis. After an investigation uncovered potential problems with the claim, A recommended that Client authorize a $150,000 pre-suit settlement offer. Believing the claim to be worth much more, Client fired A and retained another attorney (B) without A's knowledge on a one-third contingent fee basis. Client did mention A's earlier involvement to B. Then things got complicated:

> After months of intensive litigation, Client settles his malpractice case against Former Attorney for $150,000. Attorney A is not aware that the legal malpractice case has been filed so he has not filed a notice of lien. On the defense side, no one is aware of Attorney A's lien as he was discharged prior to suit being filed. As a result, the settlement check is made payable solely to Client and Attorney B.
>
> Having learned of the terms of the original fee agreement between Client and Attorney A, Attorney B presents Client with an accounting showing $100,000 payable to Client and $50,000 in attorney's fees to be divided between Attorney B and Attorney A.

[8] D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 293 (2000).

> Client endorses the $150,000 check for deposit into Attorney B's Client Trust Account ("CTA"), demands the immediate payment of the $100,000 due him, and signs the accounting after adding the following handwritten statement: "I authorize the payment of $50,000 in attorneys' fees to Attorney B. I prohibit payment of any fee to Attorney A, and I prohibit Attorney B to disclose the fact or the amount of the settlement to Attorney A."

The California opinion concluded that, notwithstanding Client's instructions, Attorney B had to alert Attorney A of the fact and the amount of the settlement so that A could seek to enforce his charging lien as to up to one third of the recovery. Part of its analysis reflected an attorney's obligations to third party claimholders under California's equivalent of Rule 1.15. That analysis reached largely the same conclusions as our Opinion 293.

In order to permit that disclosure to Attorney A notwithstanding the client's instructions to the contrary, the California committee also had to find an exception to every California attorney's rigorous confidentiality obligation "to maintain inviolate the confidence, and at every peril to himself or herself to preserve the secrets, of his or her client." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 6060(e)(1). It found that exception in a California Supreme Court approved comment to then-California Rule 3-310 authorizing disclosure of client confidential information "as authorized or required by the State Bar Act, these Rules, or other law."

As explained below, the opinion found a "required by law" exception to confidentiality for the fact and the amount of the settlement, but also held that further disclosures potentially harmful to the client would be prohibited:

> Based upon the authorities cited in our discussion of [the trust account issue] above, we conclude that disclosure to Attorney A of the fact and amount of the settlement between Client and Former Attorney is both authorized and required under applicable ethical rules and case law.
>
> First, Attorney B is required by law to take affirmative steps to permit Attorney A to assert any claims he has pursuant to his valid lien against the $50,000 attorney's fee recovery. In this regard, Attorney B is required by law to disclose the fact and the amount of the settlement to Attorney A because, as a fiduciary to Attorney A, Attorney B has an affirmative duty to notify the lienholder of the settlement as well as an affirmative duty not to conceal material facts from Attorney A.
>
> Second, disclosure of the fact and amount of settlement to Attorney A is authorized by law. Attorney B cannot unilaterally decide what portion of the $50,000 total fee can be disbursed from trust to pay her own fee. Thus, without disclosure to Attorney A, Attorney B has no basis upon which to calculate and to remove from trust the portion of the fee she earned, leaving both attorneys uncompensated. In that regard, we note that under California law attorneys are expressly released from the duty to maintain client secrets in order to obtain compensation for services rendered.
>
> While Attorney B is both authorized and required to disclose the fact and the amount of the settlement, there is no justification for her to disclose to Attorney A, without Client's consent, privileged confidential information such as the Client's demand that the fact and the amount of the settlement be concealed from Attorney A. Thus, Attorney B must keep that statement confidential even though it could potentially work to Attorney B's advantage in negotiating with Attorney A over his quantum meruit claim.
>
> Once Attorney A has been notified of the settlement, both attorneys must remain mindful of their duty of confidentiality to Client in attempting to reach an accord, amicably or through legal process, on the proper allocation of fees. Moreover, should the attorneys resort to legal process to resolve any dispute over allocation of the fee, Attorney B should provide Client with notice and an opportunity to participate should Client so desire. In any legal proceeding, the presiding officer will be in a position to limit the disclosure of confidential information to the greatest extent possible.

California Opinion 2008-175, at 5-6 (citations omitted).

The D.C. Rules also have a "required by law" exception. Under Rule 1.6(e)(2)(A), "[a] lawyer may use or reveal client confidences or secrets . . . when permitted by these Rules or required by law or court order." While the adoption of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct in 1991 specifically limited rights that lawyers previously had with respect to retaining liens, as discussed above, none of the new rules purported to limit charging liens. Indeed, Rule 1.8(i) begins by authorizing a lawyer to "acquire and enforce a lien granted by law to secure the lawyer's fees or expenses." The remainder of that rule pares back the lawyer's prior rights with respect to retaining liens but does nothing to limit use of charging liens.

Given that historical background and our prior Opinion 293, we agree with the California opinion that client demands for secrecy cannot preclude all communications relating to the assertion and enforcement of charging liens. Thus:

- When the attorney with the charging lien reasonably believes it necessary to protect the lien to give notice of that lien to successor counsel or to another potential holder of the funds or property subject to the lien, that notice may be given even if the client objects to it.
- When successor counsel reasonably believes it necessary to give notice to prior counsel under our Opinion 293 respecting "just claims" by third parties to funds in the lawyer's possession, that notice must be given even if the client objects to it.

However, care should be taken before making any further disclosures. As in fee disputes between lawyer and client, disclosures should be made only "to the minimum extent necessary" to protect the lien claim. Rule 1.6(e)(5). See also In re Gonzalez, supra (respecting disclosures in a motion to withdraw from a representation). Moreover, > the lawyer should . . . make every effort to avoid unnecessary disclosure of the client's confidences and secrets and to limit the disclosure to those having the need to know it. To this end the lawyer should seek appropriate protective orders and make any other arrangements that would minimize the risk of disclosure of the confidential information in question, including the utilization of in camera proceedings.

Rule 1.6 cmt. [26].[9]

Conclusion

An attorney whose fees are secured by a charging lien against the client's future recovery in a matter may give notice of the existence of the charging lien to suc-

9The standards for proving a fee claim at trial are typically different than what would be required initially to assert a charging lien for that fee. As such, we would question the ethical propriety of serving copies of invoices upon an opposing counsel as part of a charging lien notification package cessor counsel or another likely holder of the property subject to the lien if the attorney's representation in the matter is terminated before there is a recovery. Absent the former client's consent, however, the notice must not contain information about the client's lack of resources, the client's past refusals to pay, or any other information gained in the professional relationship that would be embarrassing, or likely to be detrimental, to the client. Any further efforts to enforce the lien or collect the fees must comply with the rules governing fee disputes between lawyers and clients. Disclosures of client confidences can be made only to the minimum extent necessary to collect the fees, and even then protective orders and filings in camera or under seal should be used to the maximum extent possible to protect client confidential information from exposure to third parties without a need to know.

Published December 2020

Opinion 380

Conflict of Interest Issues Related to Witnesses

This Opinion examines certain recurring conflict of interest issues related to witnesses. Such issues can arise under D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct 1.7 and 1.9, and when they arise, Rule 1.10(a) can impute resulting conflicts within law firms, as that term is defined in Rule 1.0.

Section I outlines the practice scenarios in which these conflicts are most likely to arise: (A) issuing subpoenas to current or former clients; (B) advising current or former clients who are potential witnesses about Fifth Amendment rights; and (C) cross-examining current or former clients. Section II addresses the existence and resolution of unavoidable conflicts: (A) the creation of thrust-upon conflicts involving unforeseen witnesses and (B) the imputation of conflicts of interest across a firm. Section III offers practice suggestions for anticipating, identifying, preventing, and resolving conflicts of interest related to witnesses.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.0 (Terminology)
- Rule 1.1 (Competence)
- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification: General Rule)

Introduction

Conflicts under Rules 1.7 and 1.9 can arise from the many differing interests of clients and former clients who know, or may know, facts related to litigation. For example, such clients may prefer not to become witnesses and therefore not to be subpoenaed to testify. If they testify, they may prefer not to have their testimony challenged by cross-examination. Or they may prefer not to disclose certain information even though it is relevant to the litigation. Some witnesses may want to obtain an advantage from being witnesses. Some witnesses may want to avoid becoming targets in criminal prosecutions or parties in civil litigation.

The interests of client-witnesses can conflict with the interests of other clients, including clients currently involved in litigation. Litigation parties usually have interests in mustering all evidence in support of their cases, as well as in limiting or qualifying adverse evidence. Consequently, their lawyers may issue subpoenas and conduct cross-examinations. At the same time, both parties and witnesses have interests in obtaining counsel of their choice and in competent, diligent, and zealous representation by that counsel.[1]

Whether or not a witness-conflict arises, is imputed to an entire law firm, or is waivable by affected clients or former clients will depend on the facts and circumstances. Some commonly recurring scenarios are discussed below.

A. Subpoenaing current or former clients who do not want to testify

The representation of witnesses and any related conflicts of interest are subject to Rules 1.7 and 1.9. Generally, these Rules detail the circumstances constituting conflicts of interest arising from current client (Rule 1.7) and former client (Rule 1.9) representations. As reflected in the Rules and highlighted below, avoiding current or former client conflicts associated with witnesses involves considerations of loyalty and confidentiality together with ensuring delivery of diligent and competent representation.[2]

One common question is whether issuing a subpoena to a current client, or to a former client in a substantially related matter, always constitutes a conflict. Ethics committees that have examined this question have reached different conclusions.[3] For example, the California Standing Committee on Professional Responsibility and Conduct concluded that serving a discovery subpoena "is an adverse action such that a concurrent client conflict of interest arises."[4] The New York City Bar was not so absolute in its approach, concluding in Opinion 2001-3 that "[s]ubpoenaing a current client on behalf of another current client ordinarily entails a conflict of interest that requires that the attorney obtain informed written consent from both clients." (emphasis added.) On the related subject of cross-examining a client, the ABA in Formal Opinion 92-367 opines that cross-examination "will likely" constitute a conflict. (emphasis added.)

The Committee disagrees with California's opinion that the issuance of a subpoena to a current client is a per se conflict of interest. In our view, subpoenaing a current client creates a conflict only if the client objects, or if it is reasonably foreseeable that the client will object to any aspect of the subpoena or to the burden and costs it creates.

A client-witness, or former client-witness, may want to help a lawyer's litigation client but may prefer to receive a subpoena because the witness might receive a financial or other benefit in connection with a deposition or court appearance only if a subpoena were issued. Issuance of that subpoena would not create a conflict. However, if a client-witness or former-client witness preferred not to testify for any reason, subpoenaing that witness would create

[1] See Rule 1.1 regarding the provision of competent representation, Rule 1.3 regarding the provision of diligent and zealous representation, and Rule 1.7(c)(2) regarding conflict waivers.

[2] These issues are addressed in detail in the context of responding to third-party subpoenas in D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion 381 (2021).

[3] See generally, e.g., Virginia Ethics Opinion 1882 (2015) (explaining that concurrent representation of two clients in unrelated criminal matters requires withdrawal from both representations if one client offers to provide incriminating information to prosecutors regarding the other client); California Ethics Opinion 2011-182 (2011); N.Y. City Bar Opinion 2001-3 (2011); Connecticut Bar Opinion 99-14 (1999) (determining that lawyer could not have reasonably concluded that cross-examination of a current client in an unrelated matter constituted a waivable conflict based on the facts underlying the litigation and the nature of the representation); ABA Formal Opinion 92-367 (1992).

[4] See California Formal Opinion No. 2011-182.

a conflict because of the compulsion to testify.

We therefore agree with the New York City Bar that the issuance of a subpoena to a current client, or to a former client in a substantially related matter, will ordinarily, but not always, result in a conflict.

1. Rule 1.7(a) – Current clients' adverse positions or interests in the same matter

Rule 1.7(a) states, "A lawyer shall not advance two or more adverse positions in the same matter," and defines the limited circumstances in which representation of conflicting interests is absolutely prohibited even with the informed consent of all involved clients. When a lawyer undertakes the joint representation of a litigation party and a witness in the same litigation, Rule 1.7(a) therefore prohibits the lawyer from subpoenaing the witness on behalf of the party if the witness would not want to testify for any reason.[5] The lawyer cannot on behalf of the litigation party advance the position that the witness should be required to testify and at the same time advance the position on behalf of the witness that he should not be required to testify as demanded by the subpoena.

Such a conflict could arise in a joint representation of an employer and an employee-witness whose interests appear aligned at the beginning of a litigation. Later, factual questions about which they disagree could arise, or their substantive interests related to the litigation could change. If the employee-witness does not want to testify at that later point, because she does not want to be cross-examined or because she now disagrees with the purpose of the litigation, issuing a subpoena would constitute a non-waivable conflict under Rule 1.7(a). Similarly, the employee-witness may be willing to testify while his or her employment continues but not willing to testify after that employment ends. If the joint representation continues after the end of employment, issuing a subpoena would constitute a non-waivable conflict.

2. Rule 1.7(b) – Concurrent clients' adverse positions or interests not in the same matter

Rule 1.7(b) protects the same client-witness interests protected by Rule 1.7(a) when a lawyer represents a subpoenaing litigation party and at the same time, in an unrelated matter, represents a client who happens also to be a witness in the party's case, even if the client-witness is represented by another law firm in the litigation.[6] Unlike conflicts arising in the same matter under Rule 1.7(a), however, conflicts arising under Rules 1.7(b)(1) through (4) are waivable, and Rule 1.7(c) permits a lawyer to seek informed consent to the lawyer's continued representation. Specifically, Rule 1.7(c)(1) requires informed consent from "each potentially affected client . . . after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation."[7] Consent may only be sought, however, if the lawyer reasonably believes "that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client."[8]

Under Rule 1.7(b)(1)[9], a conflict would arise if a matter involves a specific party or parties and "a position to be taken by one client in a matter is adverse to a position taken or to be taken by another client in the same matter even though the other client is unrepresented or represented by a different lawyer."

Example. If a lawyer's client, who happens also to be a witness in another client's case, does not want to be subpoenaed for any reason, Rule 1.7(b)(1) applies because litigation is a "matter involv[ing] a specific party or parties" and the position taken by the party issuing the subpoena is adverse to the position of the witness who objects to testifying.

Under Rule 1.7(b)(2) or (b)(3),[10] a conflict would arise if the representation of either a client-witness or a client-party would be or likely would be adversely affected by the representation of the other client.

Examples of client-witness interests. In one example, a lawyer represents a client-witness in a business transaction unrelated to a trial in which the lawyer represents a party where the business client will be a witness. If the business transaction would be or likely would be disrupted by public testimony of the witness, a conflict would result from the issuance of a trial subpoena. In another example, a lawyer represents a client-witness in obtaining a security clearance that the client needs to expedite in order to obtain a new job. If the clearance would be or likely would be delayed if the client has to report to the Department of Defense the fact of recent testimony, a conflict would result from a subpoena. In each example, the lawyer would need to obtain the informed consent of the client-witness after informing the client of the possible negative consequences of testifying. The lawyer would also have to be satisfied objectively and subjectively that the lawyer would be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each client. In the first example, the lawyer would need to have a reasonable belief that she would be able to address the disruption to the business transaction without harm to the client. And in the second example, the lawyer would need a reasonable belief that a timely clearance could be obtained notwithstanding reporting requirements and potential resulting delays.

Examples of client-party interests. As a general proposition, a client-party issuing a subpoena has an interest in ensuring that all available evidence is mustered for the party's benefit. In the examples above, if the business client or security-clearance client of the lawyer objects

[5] See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion 217 (1991).

[6] Accord N.Y. City Bar Opinion 2017-6.

[7] See also Comment [27] to Rule 1.7 ("Adequate disclosure requires such disclosure of the parties and their interests and positions as to enable each potential client to make a fully informed decision as to whether to proceed with the contemplated representation."). As with all conflict waivers, the need to obtain informed consent does not relieve the lawyer of the duty under Rule 1.6 to maintain the confidences and secrets of all current and former clients or seek consent to disclose. If a lawyer cannot provide adequate information to a client or prospective client to obtain informed consent, then the representation that the waiver would permit, if it could have been obtained with disclosure of the necessary information, cannot proceed: "If a lawyer's obligation to one or another client or to others or some other consideration precludes making such full disclosure to all affected parties, that fact alone precludes undertaking the representation at issue." Id.

[8] Rule 1.7(c)(2). See also Comment [30] to Rule 1.7 ("Generally, it is doubtful that a lawyer could hold such a belief where the representation of one client is likely to have a substantial and material adverse effect upon the interests of another client, or where the lawyer's individual interests make it likely that the lawyer will be adversely situated to the client with respect to the subject-matter of the legal representation.").

9 Rule 1.7(b)(1) states: "Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if: (1) that matter involves a specific party or parties and a position to be taken by that client in that matter is adverse to a position taken or to be taken by another client in the same matter even though that client is unrepresented or represented by a different lawyer; . . . ."

[10] Rule 1.7(b)(2) and (b)(3) states: "Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if: . . . (2) such representation will be or is likely to be adversely affected by representation of another client; [or] (3) representation of another client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by such representation; . . . ."

to the subpoena, a conflict would result if the lawyer's client-party would be or likely would be adversely affected by the absence of evidence. Rule 1.7(c)(1) would then require the lawyer to obtain the client-party's informed consent to not issue the subpoena. Under Rule 1.7(c)(2), even if the client-party consented, the lawyer also reasonably would have to believe that she could provide competent and diligent representation, for example, in the absence of the witness or, as another example, if conflict counsel were employed.[11] Such a determination usually would take into consideration factors like the importance of the involved issue, the availability of other evidence to address the issue, or the effect of using conflict counsel.[12]

Regarding Rule 1.7(b)(4),[13] in some circumstances, the lawyer's own interests may give rise to a "punch-pulling" conflict, which could render compliance with 1.7(c)(2) difficult.[14]

Example. A witness in another client's upcoming trial also happens to be a long-standing and lucrative client of the lawyer in other unrelated matters. The client-witness might be an important source of testimony in the trial. At the same time, however, there are other sources of facts—maybe documents alone or documents and other witnesses—to prove the fact that the client-witness would be asked to establish. In any event, for a reason unrelated to any matters in which the lawyer represents the client-witness, the witness would prefer not to testify but will consent to receiving a subpoena. Whether or not to issue the subpoena to the client-witness is left to the sound judgment of the lawyer. Depending on the facts, then, "the lawyer's own financial . . . or personal interests," given the lawyer's relationship with the client-witness, could cause a Rule 1.7(b)(4) "punch pulling" conflict against the interests of the client-party on the judgment-call question whether a subpoena should issue to the witness. In the event of a "punch-pulling" conflict, informed consent by the client-party under Rule 1.7(c) again would be required, and the lawyer reasonably would have to believe that the lawyer would be "able to provide competent and diligent representation" to the client-party.

Rule 1.9 – Former-client adverse positions or interests

Under Rule 1.9, a lawyer "who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent." A lawyer who is considering issuing a subpoena to a former client must consider whether the current matter is "the same or . . . substantially related" to the former client's matter,[15] and whether issuance of the subpoena would be considered "materially adverse."[16] In determining whether matters are substantially related, a lawyer should consider, among other things, whether "they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or if there otherwise is a substantial risk that confidential factual information as would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter."[17]

In its discussion of Rule 1.7(a) above, the Committee explains that a lawyer cannot on behalf of one client advance a position requiring another client in the same matter to testify and at the same time advance the position on behalf of the other client that she should not be required to testify. Such positions are inherently adverse. Similarly, in the former client context, the coercive effect of a subpoena creates material adversity if a former client does not want to testify in a substantially related matter. In the event of a conflict in a substantially related matter, the lawyer may not properly issue the subpoena without the informed consent of the former client.

B. Potential conflicts in connection with advising current or former clients about Fifth Amendment rights

In D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 232 (Multiple Clients/Criminal Matters), the Committee considered another context in which a client-witness conflict might arise in another client's unrelated matter. The specific inquiry involved a lawyer seeking to represent a client-witness in asserting his Fifth Amendment rights not to testify in a murder case against a current client of the lawyer's partner who was represented in the murder case by another law firm. Neither the murder case defendant nor the client-witness wanted the witness to testify. The Committee concluded that there was no conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(1) on the facts of the inquiry because the assertion of Fifth Amendment rights was not adverse to the interests of the murder-case defendant. In the words of Rule 1.7(b)(1), there was no adversity of the "positions" of the witness and the defendant.

At the same time, the Committee opined that a Rule 1.7(b)(1) conflict would arise under the Rule if the client-witness "should later decide that it is in his interest to bargain his testimony against [the murder-case defendant] for some advantage." In that event, the prospect of adverse "positions" would have [11] "Conflicts counsel" is the designation generally applied to the retention of a lawyer from a different firm engaged solely to represent the client on the discrete, severable aspect of the matter that gave rise to the conflict. See generally Ronald D. Rotunda, Resolving Client Conflicts by Hiring 'Conflicts Counsel,' 62 Hastings L. J. 677 (2011) (concluding that use of conflicts counsel is a useful tool to ameliorate the costs of disqualifying lawyers, while protecting legitimate client interests in confidentiality and loyalty). The use of conflicts counsel is consistent with our conclusion in D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 343 (2008). In that opinion, we explained a lawyer may limit the scope of an engagement to a discrete legal issue or stage of litigation to avoid a conflict of interest under Rule 1.9.

[12] Similar considerations about informed consent and competent, diligent, and zealous representation apply to each of the Rule 1.7 and 1.9 witness contexts discussed in this opinion.

[13] Rule 1.7(b)(4) states: "Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if: . . . (4) the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests."

[14] "Punch pulling" is a boxing term that refers to a fighter purposefully hitting his adversary with less than full force – as if the fighter pulled back a punch before making contact. In the professional responsibility context, a punch pulling conflict refers to circumstances where a lawyer is less zealous in advocating for, or advising, a client out of concern over the impact on the lawyer's representation of another client.

[15] The substantial relationship test of Rule 1.9 has a different scope than that of Rule 1.6 in connection with confidential information: "Matters are 'substantially related' for purpose of this rule if they involved the same transaction or legal dispute or if there otherwise is a substantial risk that confidential factual information as would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter." Comment [3] to Rule 1.9.

[16] The meaning of "material adversity" is determined by the principles of Rule 1.7, including the specific language of the Rule and the principles discussed in Comments [7] and [8] to Rule 1.7. See also Comment [1] to Rule 1.9.

[17] See Comment [3] to Rule 1.9; D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 343 (2008) (discussing factors in determining whether matters are substantially related, as well as the rebuttable presumption that confidences were exchanged if the substantial relationship factors are met).

arisen because the client-witness could decide to testify when the client-defendant wanted the witness not to testify. In coming to this conclusion, the Committee concluded that the Fifth-Amendment bargaining and the murder-case defense involved the same "matter" under the Rule, and that waiver of the conflict would require the informed consent of both witness and defendant.

D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 232 also noted that Rule 1.7(b)(2) would be implicated if a lawyer counseled a current client-witness not to testify against a current client-party when that advice might be adverse to the interests of the current client-witness. For example, if the refusal to testify were not legally warranted, the witness might be held in contempt of court. In this hypothetical, informed consent from the murder case defendant and the client-witness would be required after "full disclosure of the possible adverse consequences" of the advice.

Today, we add that a Rule 1.7(b) conflict would also arise if it were in the client-witness's interest to invoke the Fifth Amendment when the witness's testimony would assist the defense of the client-defendant.

C. Cross-examining current or former clients

D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 232 also provides a framework for addressing cross-examination conflict issues.

1. Concurrent clients

To begin with, the prospect of a lawyer's cross-examination of a current client-witness in the trial of another client of the lawyer obviously would occur in the same "matter" for the purpose of both Rule 1.7(a), if there were a joint representation, and 1.7(b)(1), if the defendant were represented in the criminal case by another firm.

If a lawyer were representing both a party and a witness in the same case, Rule 1.7(a) would prohibit any cross-examination of the witness adverse to any position that the witness took on direct examination. Informed consent could not remove this conflict.

The question then arises whether all cross-examinations of a client-witness who would testify adversely to a client-party on direct examination are conflicted under Rule 1.7(a), which prohibits only advancing "two or more adverse positions in the same manner." The Committee concludes that there may be circumstances in which a lawyer could cross examine a client-witness who testifies adversely to a client-party on direct examination without running afoul of Rule 1.7(a) with the informed consent of both the client-witness and client-party.

Example. In a civil trial, a lawyer represents both a corporate defendant and a former employee of the defendant as a witness. The plaintiff calls the former employee-witness in the plaintiff's case in chief, and the witness (a) authenticates documents that reflect meeting communications adverse to the interests of the defendant; and (b) testifies that the witness clearly recalls the communications. Rule 1.7(a) would prohibit the lawyer from attempting to establish on a cross-examination that the documents were not authentic or that the communications did not occur. On the other hand, a cross examination in the nature of a redirect might not be prohibited. The lawyer might ask the witness (a) to authenticate other documents that ameliorate the adverse impact of the plaintiff's exhibit on the defense case without contradicting the witness's testimony; (b) to testify about other ameliorative communications to the same effect as the additional documents; or (c) to explain the technical meaning of one of the communications reflected in the plaintiff's exhibit. If such an examination were not adverse to any position taken by the witness on direct examination or the redirect, or to any position taken or to be taken by the corporate defendant, these circumstances should not constitute a conflict under Rule 1.7(a).

If a lawyer represented a party in litigation and if a current client of the lawyer in an unrelated matter also happened to be a witness in that litigation, while represented by other counsel, Rule 1.7(b)(1) again would preclude any cross-examination of the witness adverse to any position that the witness took on direct examination without the informed consent of each client. In contrast to a Rule 1.7(a) conflict, however, the Rule 1.7(b)(1) conflict is waivable pursuant to the terms of Rule 1.7(c).

Rules 1.7(b)(2) and (b)(3) also could be implicated in circumstances involving cross examination of the client-witness.

Example. A lawyer represents a party in highly publicized litigation. Following pretrial depositions, the lawyer understands that he may need to cross-examine a certain witness at trial by seeking authentication and introduction of certain documents. The lawyer then is asked to represent the witness as a client in unrelated business negotiations in which both sides of that negotiation agree that certain documents will not be exchanged. They include the documents that the lawyer may need to introduce at trial through the witness. Introduction of those documents on the public record likely would adversely affect the witness-client's business negotiating position, and the lawyer is aware of that fact. Under Rule 1.7(b)(2), representation of the witness in the business negotiations would require her informed consent to the conflict of interest arising by her authentication and introduction of the documents, as well as the informed consent of the litigation client. Of course, in seeking informed consent, the lawyer must remain mindful of protecting client confidences and secrets in accordance with Rule 1.6(a). The obligation to maintain confidences and secrets limits the information the lawyer may properly disclose to both the prospective client and existing client in seeking informed consent unless further consent to disclose relevant confidences and secrets for this purpose is obtained. In addition, the lawyer must "reasonably believe" that she is able to provide competent and diligent representation to both clients in accordance with Rule 1.7(c)(2). In particular, the lawyer would need to assess whether requiring the client-witness to authenticate particular documents at trial is consistent with his obligations to deliver competent and diligent representation to the client-witness in the business negotiation.

A conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(3) could arise if a lawyer's cross-examination similar to the previous example might adversely affect the interests of an existing client in a different matter.

Example. A lawyer represents a client in ongoig business negotiations in which both sides agree that certain documents will not be exchanged. The lawyer is then asked by a new client to try a highly publicized case, in which the business client is a witness and the new client is a party. At the time of this request, the lawyer understands that she will need to cross-examine the business client by asking him to authenticate documents covered by the agreement in the business negotiations. If foregoing use of those documents at the trial likely would adversely affect the litigation client's interests, a conflict would arise under Rule 1.7(b)(3). Again, provided the lawyer is able to seek informed consents without disclosing or using client confidences or secrets in violation of Rule

1.6(a), undertaking representation of the litigation client again would require compliance with Rule 1.7(c)(2).[18]

The two previous examples also could present a Rule 1.7(b)(4) punch-pulling conflict against the interest of the litigation client because the business client is a significant and lucrative client.[19] Because of the lawyer's "responsibilities to or interests in" the business client witness, the lawyer's professional judgment about whether to introduce the documents at trial at all or about whether or how to cross-examine the witness could be adversely affected, and informed consent would be required from the litigation client.

If either client were not willing to provide that consent, then the lawyer would not be able to undertake the representation of the client-witness in the first example or of the client-party in the second example.

2. Former client

Under Rule 1.9 the same interest analysis, resulting conflicts, and need for informed consents discussed above could apply, depending on the timing of the facts, if a lawyer cross-examined a former client-witness in any matter that was the same as or "substantially related" to a matter in which the lawyer had formerly represented the witness. Furthermore, we note that the Court of Appeals held in Pinkney v. United States, 851 A. 2d 479, 487-788 (D.C. 2004), that a prior representation of a witness was substantially related to a later representation of a different client even though the two representations involved different subject matters.[20]

In Pinkney, a criminal defendant challenged the trial court's decision to disqualify his defense counsel (Wood) because of Wood's prior and concurrent representation of a government witness (Henderson). Henderson was to testify at Pinkney's criminal trial on behalf of the government about defendant's alleged jailhouse confession. Wood had previously represented Henderson in an unrelated criminal matter, and was currently representing him in two other unrelated criminal matters. Relying on precedent from the Second and Seventh Circuits, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals acknowledged that the subject matter of Wood's representation of Pinkney was unrelated to the subject matter of his prior representation of Henderson. 851 A.2d at 487-88. Nevertheless, Wood's diligent and competent representation of Pinkney would require Wood to attack Henderson's credibility, implicating confidences and secrets learned in the prior representation:

> [B]ecause [Pinkney's] defense would necessarily involve refuting Mr. Henderson's testimony, it would consist mostly of attacking his credibility on cross-examination. . . . 'Because this impeachment could be accomplished by eliciting specific instances of misconduct involving matters of truthfulness, and because the trial court found that it was likely that [defense counsel] gained knowledge of such instances involving [the witness] through their attorney-client relationship, the trial court found that [defense counsel's] prior representation of [the witness] was relevant to 'the issues and determinations presented in the instant case.' [B] ecause impeachment of Mr. Henderson would be an important part of the defense, issues concerning Henderson's credibility were therefore 'substantially related' to Mr. Wood's representation of [Pinkney]. We think the approach taken by the Second and Seventh Circuits is sound, and thus we conclude that the court did not abuse its discretion in disqualifying Mr. Wood.

Id. (quoting United States v. O'Malley, 786 F.2d 786, 792 (7th Cir. 1986)).[21] As highlighted in Pinkney, evaluating whether two matters are "substantially related" under Rule 1.9 requires the lawyer to not only consider whether they involve the same transaction or legal dispute, but also whether there "is a substantial risk that confidential information as would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter."[22]

D. Thrust-Upon Conflicts

In rare circumstances, a Rule 1.7(b)(1) witness conflict may arise that was not reasonably foreseeable at the outset of the representation. In that case, even in the absence of informed consent, Rule 1.7(d) may allow a lawyer to cross-examine the client-witness in an unrelated matter. Rule 1.7(d) provides:

> If a conflict not reasonably foreseeable at the outside of representation arises under paragraph (b)(1) after the representation commences, and is not waived under paragraph(c), a lawyer need not withdraw from any representation unless the conflict also arises under paragraphs (b)(2), (b)(3), or (b)(4).

The example below illustrates this thrust-upon conflict situation.

Example. A lawyer represents the buyer in a lengthy real estate transaction. The lawyer then undertakes representation of a company in defense of a fast-track patent case. Near the end of discovery in the patent case, the plaintiff adds as a new expert witness: the lawyer's real estate client. Even if the expert witness did not want to be cross-examined (or subpoenaed) by his or her lawyer, Rule 1.7(d) might apply if the addition of this particular expert witness was not reasonably foreseeable at the outset of the representation and the cross-examination would not adversely affect the real estate deal.

E. Imputation and Confidences or Secrets Regarding a Witness

Rule 1.6(a) forbids disclosure or use by a lawyer of the confidences or secrets of the lawyer's current clients, and Rule 1.6(g) continues this obligation after termination of the attorney client relationship.[23]

[18] When the facts of this example are viewed from the perspective of the prospective party client, the conflict arises under 1.7(b)(2) rather than (b)(3). If the business client were not willing to waive the conflict under 1.7(b)(3) to allow the introduction of the documents, the lawyer could not introduce them, which could adversely affect the party's litigation position. Just like the business client could decide to take the risk under 1.7(b)(3) and waive the conflict, the prospective party client could decide to take the litigation risk and provide informed consent to litigate the case without introduction of the business documents. The lawyer could accept this waiver assuming compliance with Rule 1.7(c)(2).

[19] As a general matter, whenever a client-witness's interest may cause a conflict, the possibility of a "punch-pulling" conflict related to the client-party's (or client-co-witness's) interest should be considered.

[20] Because it is beyond the scope of this Committee, we do not address the application of Sixth Amendment jurisprudence to cross examination of current or former clients in criminal trials.

[21] After concluding that disqualification of Wood was not an abuse of discretion, the Court of Appeals remanded the case to the trial court, faulting it for denying Pinkney's motion to reinstate Wood. See 851 A.2d at 490-91. The Court explained the trial court was required to consider whether Wood's conflict of interest still existed after the government no longer sought to call Henderson as a witness in Pinkney's criminal trial.

[22] Comment [3] to Rule 1.9.

[23] Rule 1.6(a) states: "Except when permitted under paragraph (c), (d), or (e), a lawyer shall not knowingly: (1) reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client; (2) use a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client to the disadvantage of the client; [or]

In connection with client witnesses, a lawyer may determine that she cannot satisfy Rule 1.7(b)(4): she is unable to provide competent and diligent legal services with independent judgment for a new client without drawing on her knowledge of the confidences or secrets of another current or former client that only the lawyer herself possesses. These confidences or secrets are unrelated to the substance of the representation and involve information that other lawyers at the firm are unlikely to have learned during the representation. The question then arises whether Rule 1.10 imputes a disqualification to the lawyer's entire firm even though other firm lawyers do not know, and have not had access to, those confidences and secrets. In the Committee's opinion, the answer to this question is no.

Example: A lawyer with a firm is considering representation of a defendant (Prospective Client A) in a criminal trial. The lawyer knows the prosecution intends to call Witness at trial who will testify about issues incriminating the defendant (Prospective Client A). The lawyer possesses certain information about this Witness she obtained during her representation of Client B in an unrelated business negotiation adverse to Party C. In particular, the lawyer learned from Party C that Client B and Witness were playing poker at a casino in Las Vegas on the precise date/time of the alleged crime of Prospective Client A. This information is completely extraneous to the business negotiation between Client B and Party C, but the lawyer learned it during the course of that representation. Client B would consider the public disclosure of this information embarrassing because Client B has a self-professed gambling problem. While Client B did not provide the information to lawyer, she learned it from Party C and concludes the information constitutes a client secret. She determines that she cannot undertake the representation of the Prospective Client A, the criminal defendant, because of Rule 1.7(b)(4). However, other lawyers at the firm could represent Prospective Client A provided that they do not possess, or have access to, the client secret the lawyer learned during the representation of Client B in the business negotiation.[24]

First, on its face, Rule 1.10 does not automatically impute to other lawyers in the firm knowledge of Rule 1.6 confidential or secret information known to another lawyer at the firm who are not or were not involved in the client's matter, providing instead a functional analysis. Comment [9] to Rule 1.10 (which deals with lawyers moving between firms) explains that a conclusive presumption that all partners in a law firm have access to all client confidences might properly apply if the client is extensively represented but may be unrealistic if the client is represented only for limited purposes. Rule 1.10 imputes only actual conflicts under Rule 1.7(a), (b)(1) through (b)(3), and Rule 1.9, but expressly carves out conflicts arising under Rule 1.7(b)(4). This analysis is reinforced by Rule 1.10(c), which provides that when a lawyer leaves a firm, the firm is not thereafter prevented from taking on matters adverse to a client formerly represented by the departed lawyer unless (1) the prospective matter is the same as or substantially related to the prior matter, and (2) another lawyer at the firm has information protected by Rule 1.6 that is material to the matter.

Second, given the importance of attorney-client confidentiality established by Rule 1.6, the Committee concludes that Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)—does not require a law firm to canvass confidential or secret Rule 1.6 information of all of its clients to fulfill the professional responsibility of one of its lawyers in his or her attorney-client relationship with any particular client. To the contrary, Rule 1.6 establishes an ethical mandate not to use or disclose the confidences and secrets of clients or former clients. When Rule 1.3(a) requires zealous and diligent representation within the bounds of the law, harvesting one client's confidences for another client's benefit is not required because it is outside those bounds. Similarly, Rule 1.3(b) forbids a lawyer's failure "to seek the lawful objectives of a client through reasonably available means permitted by law and the disciplinary rules." Consequently, in the Committee's view, there is no duty on one lawyer in a law firm representing Client A to obtain and use or disclose another lawyer's confidential or secret information of Client B about which the first lawyer is unaware.

Example. A lawyer represented a client-landlord in an eviction case. Years later, the same lawyer represents a plaintiff adverse to the landlord in an automobile accident personal injury case. The matters are not factually related, and there is no "risk that confidential information as would normally have been obtained in the prior [eviction] representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter." Comment [3] to Rule 1.9. But the lawyer remembers that the landlord commented during a meeting about the eviction that he carried no automobile insurance because it just encouraged people to sue, and he preferred to take his chances against greedy plaintiffs.

While details on automobile insurance are not the type of confidential information typically obtained in an eviction matter, they nevertheless constitute a protected "secret" under Rule 1.6. The lawyer learned of the landlord's automobile insurance practice in the course of representing the landlord and the lawyer's revelation of that information is embarrassing, or likely detrimental to the landlord. The lawyer could not report the information to the later plaintiff-client as they assess strategy for the accident case, nor should the lawyer use the information during strategy development. The lawyer cannot fulfill her duty to communicate with the plaintiff or zealously use her own memory to develop a competent strategy. Thus, the lawyer has a Rule 1.7(b)(4) conflict.[25] At the same time, however, the information and the subject matters of the two cases do not create a Rule 1.9 conflict, and another lawyer in the same law firm—not burdened by the memory of the first lawyer and screened from information about the eviction rep-

(3) use a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client for the advantage of the lawyer or of a third person."

Rule 1.6(g) explains: "The lawyer's obligation to preserve the client's confidences and secrets continues after termination of the lawyer's employment."

[24] Altering the facts of this example highlight the importance of distinguishing conflicts arising under Rules 1.7(b)(2) or (b)(3) —and subject to imputation under Rule 1.10(a)—from those arising under Rule 1.7(b)(4) and not subject to imputation. Under certain circumstances, the fact that Witness and Client B were playing poker at a casino in Las Vegas on a particular date/time might be material to the lawyer's representation of Client B in the business negotiation with Party C. For example, if the financial transaction that is the subject of the negotiation required Client B to make certain representations and warranties that implicate gambling issues, the lawyer's representation of Prospective Client A would give rise to a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(2) or 1.7(b)(3). Under these circumstances, the lawyer's conflict is imputed to the entire firm and would preclude the firm's representation of Prospective Client A.

[25] If this had been a Rule 1.7(b)(2) or (b)(3) conflict (if the landlord/eviction matter is a current matter), the conflict would be imputed to other lawyers at the firm under Rule 1.10(a).

resentation—can develop and communicate strategy competently, diligently, and zealously without ethical constraint.

The Committee therefore concludes that Rule 1.10 imputed disqualification applies, as the Rule states, to Rule 1.7(a), (b)(1) through (b)(3) and Rule 1.9 conflicts, but does not extend to Rule 1.6 duties and information without more. This conclusion is consistent with Legal Ethics Opinion 237, which concluded:

> An attorney may represent a defendant in a criminal case, even though another attorney in his or her office formerly represented an individual who is now a witness in that case if (1) the agency's representation of the person who is the witness was in an unrelated case; (2) the attorney involved in the current case does not actually possess any confidences or secrets of the former client; and (3) the agency takes adequate steps to screen that attorney from any such confidences and secrets."

The Committee also referenced then Comment [11] (now Comment [12]) to Rule 1.10, which discusses lawyers' access to information about law firm clients:

> Access to information . . . is essentially a question of fact in particular circumstances, aided by inferences, deductions, or working presumptions that reasonably may be made about the way in which lawyers work together. A lawyer may have general access to files of all clients of a law firm and may regularly participate in discussions of their affairs; it should be inferred that such a lawyer in fact is privy to all information about all the firm's clients. In contrast, another lawyer may have access to the files of only a limited number of clients and participate in discussion of the affairs of no other clients; in the absence of information to the contrary, it should be inferred that such a lawyer in fact is privy to information about the clients actually served but not those of other clients.

Comment [12] to Rule 1.10. In between these two examples are endless other examples. In the Committee's view, in any given example, inferences may or may not be reasonable. More importantly, the focus of Opinion 237 should remain the principal inquiry: whether the particular attorney "actually possesses any confidences or secrets of the former client" that were material to the former client's representation.

F. Suggestions Regarding Conflict-of-Interest Issues Related to Witnesses

The Committee suggests the following considerations to help identify, prevent, and resolve conflict-of-interest issues related to witnesses.

- To facilitate early identification of potential conflicts of interest involving witnesses, a lawyer could consider including the names of potential witnesses (including experts) and other sources of facts in conflict checks[26] and then supplementing checks as additional names arise.[27] Depending on the size of a law firm, it might circulate conflict checks to lawyers in addition to database checking, and it could encourage lawyers to review checks regularly.[28]
- To facilitate resolution of potential con flicts of interest related to witnesses, a lawyer, in advance of issuing a subpoena, might attempt to discuss it with the client-witness, assuming such discussion would not violate the Rule 1.6 interests of the client-party. The discussion could include the suggestion that the client-witness consult with independent counsel.
- More generally, advance waivers of conflicts of interest relating to discovery or other witness-related issues could be discussed with prospective-clients at the beginning of attorney-client relationships. As explained in Comment [31] to Rule 1.7, advance waivers are permissible only if the prerequisites of the rule – namely "full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation" – are satisfied.[29]
- Regarding potential client-parties, a lawyer could discuss the use of scope limitations and/or engagement of conflicts counsel to take discovery from, or to cross-examine, other clients of the lawyer to avoid conflicts of interest.[30]
- Joint representations sometimes develop witness conflicts, which might be addressed by advance agreements and consents. For example, joint clients could agree to maintain confidentiality of jointly shared facts and advice. They also might agree in advance to procedures for addressing downstream conflicts, including whether an unwaived conflict would require the lawyer's withdrawal from the representation of all or only some of the joint clients. Advance agreements also sometimes address how client information would be handled after withdrawal.
- In any organizational setting Upjohn warnings should be given to employees to avoid inadvertent creation of attorney-client relationships that could create conflicts.[31]

* * * *

Obtaining information from current- or former-client witnesses often gives rise to a variety of considerations. These issues might involve conflicts of interest pursuant to Rules 1.7 and 1.9, as well as considerations under Rule 1.6 and Rule 1.10. The opinion offers mechanisms for identifying, preventing, and resolving such conflicts while safeguarding confidentiality and remaining mindful of rules on imputation.

Published February 2021

[26] See, e.g., New York Rule of Professional Conduct 1.10(e).

[27] At the beginning of litigation, it is often impossible to identify all potential adverse witnesses. D.C. Rule 1.7(d) regarding "thrust upon" conflicts applies a "reasonably foreseeable" standard to all conflict issues, including those involving witnesses. If an adverse witness were not identified and were not "reasonably foreseeable" at the beginning of a litigation engagement, then even if the witness were a current client of the trial lawyer, an adverse cross-examination of the witness might be permitted under the D.C. Rule. We also note, however, the ABA Model Rules do not include a Rule similar to D.C. Rule 1.7(d). "Conflicts counsel," as defined in note 11 above, are often utilized to address thrust upon conflicts that arise at trial.

[28] See Comment [19] to Rule 1.7 (explaining that the "test to be applied here [to determine potential conflicts] is one of reasonableness and may turn on whether the lawyer has an effective conflict checking system in place").

[29] See also Comment [32] to Rule 1.7 ("Rule 1.7(a) provides that a conflict arising from the lawyer's advancing adverse positions in the same matter cannot be waived in advance or otherwise."); D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 309 (explaining that advance waivers of conflicts of interest must comply with the overarching requirement of informed consent). Accord N.Y. City Bar Opinion 2005-5.

[30] See, e.g., N.Y. City Bar Opinions 608 (2011) and 2017-6; ABA Formal Opinion 92-367.

[31] Upjohn v. United States, 449 U.S. 383 (1981). See also Rule 1.13(c) ("In dealing with an organization's directors, officers, employees, members, shareholders, or other constituents, a lawyer shall explain the identity of the client when it is apparent that the organization's interests may be adverse to those of the constituents with whom the lawyer is dealing.") and Comments [9] and [10] to Rule 1.13.

Opinion 381

Responding to Third-Party Subpoena

Introduction

A lawyer's representation of a prospective client in responding to a third-party subpoena that seeks documents, tangible things, property, or testimony[1] ("Information") about a lawyer's existing client does not create a conflict of interest unless the lawyer's representation of either the prospective client or the client will be, or likely will be, adversely affected.[2] A lawyer's representation of a prospective client in responding to a third-party subpoena that seeks Information about a lawyer's former client does not create a conflict of interest unless the subpoena matter is the same or substantially related to the lawyer's former representation and the interests of the prospective client and former client are adverse.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.0 (Terminology)
- Rule 1.1 (Competence)
- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification: General Rule)

Discussion

In this opinion, the Committee considers whether a lawyer's representation of a client in responding to a third-party subpoena for Information that identifies specific parties by name (the "Prospective Client") creates a conflict of interest if the lawyer also represents or represented one of the named persons (the "Other Client") in unrelated matters.[3]

1. Current Client Conflict of Interest

Typically, a lawyer may represent a Prospective Client, even if the Information sought relates to another client of the lawyer, without triggering a conflict under Rule 1.7(b).

Pursuant to D.C. Rule 1.7(b), a lawyer shall not represent a client in a matter if:

(1) That matter involves a specific party or parties and a position to be taken by that client is adverse to a position taken or to be taken by another client in the same matter even though that client is unrepresented or represented by a different lawyer;

(2) Such representation will be or is likely to be adversely affected by representation of another client;

(3) Representation of another client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by such representation; [or]

(4) The lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.[4]

A. Assessing Conflicts at the Outset of the Representation

A lawyer is required to assess conflicts on each proposed engagement at the outset of the representation.[5] Such assessment includes undertaking reasonable diligence concerning the subpoena. In assessing possible conflicts before undertaking the representation of the Prospective Client, a lawyer should consider the particulars of the proceeding out of which the subpoena issued and the information contained in the subpoena itself, including the time period, the scope of information sought, and the names of persons identified and their connection to the information sought. Whether additional diligence would be required is a question of fact and varies by the circumstances. For example, under certain circumstances, it might be necessary for the lawyer to review publicly available information or consult with the Other Client as part of the additional diligence effort.

Ordinarily, direct adversity will not exist between the interests of the Prospective Client and the Other Client because the issuer of the subpoena, not the subject of the subpoena, is adverse to the Prospective Client and a testimonial or documentary response by the Prospective Client does not constitute taking any "position" with respect to any of the subjects of the subpoena. Rather, the focus of the Prospective Client – and therefore the scope of the lawyer's representation – is the legality and propriety of the subpoena and the respondent's posting of proper objections to requests for production by the issuer of the subpoena.

The lawyer's representation of the Prospective Client may, however, create a conflict of interest if the representation of that client would likely adversely affect, or be adversely affected by, the representation of another client or personal interests of the lawyer. However, Rules 1.7(b)(2)-(4) do not obligate lawyers to assess the possibility of conflicts based upon rank conjecture and speculation but, rather, only to determine, based upon a reasonable objective belief, that certain facts will develop that would create a substantial risk that the lawyer's representation of a client will adversely affect or be adversely affected by ethical obligations to another client, former client, or herself.[6]

A few hypothetical examples may help to illustrate the applicable conflicts standard. Suppose a lawyer is asked to represent a hospital in producing medical records of a patient in response to a third-party subpoena issued by an insurance company in a vehicular personal injury matter. The parties to the litigation are the at-fault driver's insurance company and the injured party, who is a client of the lawyer in a custody matter.[7] In representing the hospital, the lawyer would be advising it on the scope of the subpoena, any deficiencies, and any objections, including, for example, the relevance and responsiveness of any documents of the injured party (Other Client) in the hospital's possession.

[1] The reference to documents, physical things, property, or testimony in this Opinion is intended to incorporate the same terms and definitions as contained in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 34.

[2] This Opinion does not address instances where the lawyer is the recipient of a third-party subpoena for his or her own records or for the records of the lawyer's firm. See D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 288 (1999).

[3] A lawyer reviewing a subpoena that does not specify names, but only a certain time period, will ordinarily be unable to identify a conflict at the outset of the representation, but might become aware of one after commencement of the representation. See section 1.B. infra.

[4] D.C. Rule 1.0(h) defines "matter" broadly to mean "any litigation, administrative proceeding, lobbying activity, application, claim, investigation, arrest, charge or accusation, the drafting of a contract, a negotiation, estate or family relations practice issue, or any other representation, except as expressly limited in a particular rule." Rule 1.0 (h).

[5] Rule 1.7 and Comments [7], [19], and [29].

[6] See Rule 1.7 Comments [7], [9], and [19]. See also D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 356 (2010) ("a conflict must be clear, specific and not based on mere speculation."); Rule 1.7(d) (the standard is "reasonably foreseeable" when assessing whether a conflict could have been anticipated at the outset of the representation).

[7] The Committee does not see any meaningful distinction in the conflicts analysis if the request for production of medical records is in the form of a pre-complaint letter request rather than a subpoena issued out of litigation.

At the outset of the representation, the lawyer does not know the contents of the medical records, and the lawyer's review of the complaint does not provide any more information about what the medical records of the hospital might reveal. Typically, the lawyer may therefore undertake the hospital representation without it creating a Rule 1.7 conflict of interest. The mere possibility that responsive medical records of the hospital that might undermine the injured party's claim exist and are produced does not give rise to a conflict of interest. There may be circumstances, however, where the lawyer's knowledge about the facts surrounding the subpoena request and its implications might necessitate the lawyer's consultation with the Other Client (subject of the subpoena) to properly assess conflicts of interest before undertaking the engagement by the Prospective Client.[8]

Suppose that the lawyer knows through and in the course of representing the Other Client in the custody case that the Other Client has been unable to honor the temporary custody schedule because of injuries sustained from athletic activities. As a result of the custody matter, the lawyer has in her possession medical records from the hospital during the relevant subpoena time period reflecting those injuries. Given the lawyer's knowledge about the cause of the injuries documented in the medical records, undertaking the prospective representation might well create a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(2) or (b)(3) or under Rule 1.7(b)(4) with the personal interest of the lawyer herself.

The Committee concludes that to determine whether a conflict of interest exists in undertaking the prospective engagement, the lawyer must assess whether the lawyer knows,[9] after performing reasonable diligence in evaluating the subpoena request as described above, that the Prospective Client possesses responsive information that, if produced, is or likely will be adverse[10] to the subject of the subpoena (the Other Client).[11] If so, then the lawyer must assess whether that knowledge will likely adversely affect the lawyer's representation of either client. If it likely will, a Rule 1.7(b)(2) or (3) conflict exists.

If neither representation is likely to be adversely affected or the lawyer does not know in the first instance that the Prospective Client possesses responsive information that is likely to be adverse to the Other Client, the lawyer must nonetheless consider whether the lawyer has a personal conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4). That is, the lawyer must determine in undertaking the prospective matter whether the lawyer's professional judgment will or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own interests.[12]

A lawyer who concludes at the outset of the representation that undertaking the new engagement would create a Rule 1.7(b) conflict with the Other Client could still represent the Prospective Client if the lawyer satisfies Rule 1.7(c)'s requirements that the lawyer obtain the informed consent from each affected client and reasonably believes that she can provide competent and diligent representation to each client.[13] A crucial initial consideration in this regard is whether the disclosure of the requisite information necessary to secure the informed consent of either the Prospective Client or the Other Client would violate the lawyer's Rule 1.6 duty to protect the confidences and secrets of each.[14] If so, then the lawyer could neither seek nor obtain informed consent and, as such, the lawyer would have to decline the prospective representation because the lawyer could not satisfy the Rule 1.7(c)(1) requirement.

If informed consent could be sought and were obtained, under Rule 1.7(c)(2), the lawyer must also undertake both a subjective self–assessment and an objective analysis to determine whether, notwithstanding the clients' informed consent, the lawyer will be able to "provide competent and diligent representation" to each client. That assessment would include consideration of whether the lawyer might pull punches during the new representation either out of concern over the impact on the lawyer's representation of the Other Client,[15] or because of the lawyer's own personal, financial or other interests.[16]

By way of further illustration, suppose a lawyer is asked to represent a bank that has received a Department of Justice subpoena for records of a party it is investigating for bribing a government official. News reports indicate that the subject of the investigation is a close personal friend of the government official and also a business person whose business seeks zoning approval and a building permit within the jurisdiction of the government official. The business is a long-standing client of the lawyer, which has generated substantial fees for the lawyer over time. The lawyer currently represents the business in litigation alleging breach of a commercial contract. The lawyer does

[8] See, e.g., Comment [19] to Rule 1.7.

[9] Rule 1.0(f) defines "knowledge" or "knows" as "actual knowledge of the fact in question," which "may be inferred from the circumstances."

[10] Whether or not information known to the lawyer is "adverse" or "harmful" is left to the reasonable judgment of the lawyer.

[11] While Rule 1.3(b)(2) provides that "[a] lawyer shall not intentionally prejudice or damage a client during the course of the professional relationship," the act of producing responsive information on behalf of another client that might be harmful to a lawyer's client does not run afoul of Rule 1.3(b)(2) because it is not in the matter in which the lawyer represents the client and "Rule 1.3 is not meant to govern conflicts of interest, which are addressed by Rules 1.7, 1.8, and 1.9."

[12] See Rule 1.7(b)(4) infra as quoted in the body of the Opinion.

[13] Rule 1.0(e) defines informed consent as "the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably alternatives to the proposed course of conduct." Such required "information and explanation" varies by circumstances and is subject to a variety of factors, including the sophistication, vel non, of the person granting the informed consent.

Rule 1.7(c) provides that a lawyer may represent a client notwithstanding a conflict if "(1) each potentially affected client provides informed consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation; and (2) the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client under the circumstances."

[14] Moreover, pursuant to Rule 1.18(b), "Even when no client-lawyer relationship ensues, a lawyer who has had discussions with a prospective client shall not use or reveal information learned in the consultation, except as permitted by Rule 1.6." Thus, the duty of confidentiality owed to a prospective client is coextensive with the duty owed to an actual client. In some instances, the mere fact of the representation or prospective representation may constitute a Rule 1.6 secret, further potentially complicating the ability of the lawyer to obtain the requisite informed consent.

[15] As explained in D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 380 (2021), "'Punch pulling' is a boxing term that refers to a fighter purposefully hitting his adversary with less than full force – as if the fighter pulled back a punch before making contact. In the professional responsibility context, a punch pulling conflict refers to circumstances where a lawyer is less zealous in advocating for, or advising, a client out of concern over the impact on the lawyer's representation of another client."

[16] See Rules 1.1, 1.3, and 1.7(c)(2) and see, e.g., comment [7] ("The underlying premise is that disclosure and informed consent are required before assuming a representation if there is any reason to doubt the lawyer's ability to provide wholehearted and zealous representation of a client….").

not know at the outset of the prospective representation whether the bank possesses records reflecting payments from the business person to the government official, but the bank suspects that there might be some payments because of the frequency with which both transact at the bank and the time period involved.

While the lawyer does not have actual knowledge that the bank possesses any responsive documents damaging to the business person, nor does the lawyer represent the business person personally in a matter, the lawyer's long-standing and substantial professional relationship with the business might prevent the lawyer from providing competent and diligent representation to the bank. For example, the lawyer might be overzealous in raising objections to production of the potentially damaging documents because they might adversely affect the principal of a long-standing and lucrative client, when the bank does not have any concerns about the production other than its own cost. Under these circumstances, the bank representation could create a personal conflict of interest for the lawyer. Barring a problem with the lawyer's ability to provide competent and diligent representation to each client, without the lawyer's actual knowledge that certain information harmful to the interests of the subject of the subpoena exists and is responsive, the mere possibility that documents responsive to the subpoena exist that are, or might be, adverse to the interests of the business person or the lawyer's Other Client, the business, and might be produced, is purely speculative.

Even if it later develops that the lawyer's speculation about the potentially damaging nature of the information produced results in the evidence being used adversely against the business, the subsequent factual confirmation of the lawyer's speculation would not change the analysis.[17] The production of Information adverse to a particular client would be an "unwitting" side effect of the representation of the Prospective Client, and not the lawyer's attempt to seek a result for the Prospective Client "to which another client is opposed."[18] Nor would it be considered in hindsight to have been a Rule 1.7(b)(2) or (b)(3) conflict.

As discussed, although typically there is no ethical requirement that a lawyer disclose the prospective representation of a subpoenaed third-party to the Other Client (who is the subject of the subpoena), it might nonetheless be prudent for the lawyer to notify the Other Client of the prospective engagement – barring any Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information) issues. The consultation could permit the Other Client an opportunity to voice concerns about the lawyer's representation of the Prospective Client under the circumstances.

B. Discovery or development of a conflict after commencement of the representation of the Prospective Client

If the lawyer undertakes the representation of the Prospective Client, a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(2), (b)(3), or (b)(4) may nevertheless arise after the representation commences if the lawyer's discovery of potentially damaging information, prior to its production, might adversely affect the lawyer's ability to competently and diligently represent either the Prospective Client or the Other Client.[19]

Returning to the first example of the third-party subpoena to the hospital by an insurance company in a vehicular personal injury matter where the lawyer also represents Other Client in a custody matter but does not possess knowledge of the Other Client's medical issues: suppose after reviewing the medical records of the hospital for the Prospective Client for responsiveness and privilege, the lawyer discovers a note in the medical records that undermines, or would seem to undermine, the patient's injury claim. Suppose further that the note reflects that the patient disclosed that he had participated in sports activities around the time of the accident and that such sports activities could have produced the same injuries being attributed to the accident.

As the lawyer learns information during the course of the third-party subpoena representation, through reviewing documents, discussions with the client, or otherwise, the lawyer might learn information prior to production that is harmful to the Other Client and might also conclude that such information is responsive to the subpoena. Under such circumstances, continuing to represent the Prospective Client might adversely affect, or be adversely affected by, representation of the Other Client.[20] Or, the lawyer might conclude that there is a personal conflict pursuant to Rule 1.7(b)(4) because the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the subpoenaed client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by her responsibilities to a third party or by her own interests. Whether continuing the Prospective Client representation is a conflict of interest under Rules 1.7(b)(2) – (b)(4) is a matter of degree and a question of fact, which turns on whether a reasonable lawyer would conclude that there would be a diminution in the quality of the representation of either the Prospective Client or the Other Client.

Should the lawyer conclude in the affirmative, he or she must assess whether the conflict is consentable and if so, seek informed consent from each affected client.[21] Such informed consent could be sought in advance in the engagement terms or sought contemporaneously.[22] If the lawyer concludes that she may not seek informed consent, either because the lawyer reasonably concludes that she would be unable to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client given the nature and degree of the conflict, or because confidentiality obligations prevent her from disclosing information sufficient to obtain informed consent, she may retain conflicts counsel to address that portion of the representation if the client agrees and the retention is otherwise consistent with the Rules.[23]

[17] See D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 356 (2010).

[18] See Rule 1.7, Comment [19].

[19] Because of the nature of the third-party representation, a conflict of interest will not typically arise under Rule 1.7 (b)(1) because, as stated previously, raising objections to a subpoena or providing responsive documents is not adverse to the subject of the subpoena (the Other Client) but, rather, is adverse to the issuer of the subpoena. In the unusual circumstance that a Rule 1.7(b)(1) conflict arises in connection with responding to a third-party subpoena, the conflict might be considered under the "thrust upon" scenario pursuant to Rule 1.7(d). D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 356 might also be instructive in this regard. But, see, footnote 22 infra.

[20] See Rule 1.7(b)(2) or (b)(3).

[21] See Rule 1.7(c) and Rules 1.1 and 1.3.

[22] While advance waivers of conflicts of interest are permissible under certain circumstances, they are more susceptible to failing the informed consent standard than contemporaneous consents. See Rule 1.7, Comment [31]. See also D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 309 (2001) ("The less specific the circumstances considered by the client and the less sophisticated the client, the less likely that an advanced waiver will be valid."). A client may also revoke valid consents. D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 317 (2002).

[23] "Conflicts counsel" has the same definition as set forth in endnote 11 of D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 380 (2021). ("'Conflicts counsel' is the designation generally applied to the retention of a lawyer from a different firm engaged solely to represent the client on the discrete, severable aspect of the matter that gave rise to the conflict.…").

Otherwise, the lawyer must withdraw from the representation.[24]

2. Former Client Conflict of Interest

A lawyer's representation of a Prospective Client to produce documents or give testimony that might include information adverse to the interests of a former client might constitute a conflict of interest if the prospective engagement is "the same or a substantially related matter in which [the Prospective Client's] interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent."[25] The purpose of Rule 1.9, the former client conflicts rule, is twofold: first, to prevent "side-switching" and, second, to protect confidential factual information gained through or in the course of the prior representation from being used to the former client's detriment in the current representation.[26]

Side-switching occurs when parties are materially adverse to each other in a subsequent substantially related matter and the former client's lawyer begins representing a client in a matter adverse to the former client's interests.[27] In connection with a subpoena request, when a lawyer represents the Prospective Client either in a matter that is not adverse to the former client (subject of the subpoena) or in a matter that is not the same as nor substantially related to the matter in which the lawyer formerly represented the Other Client, the prohibition on side-switching is not implicated.

With respect to client confidences, the rule focuses on the risk that the former client's confidential information may be used to benefit another client in a subsequent representation to the former client's detriment. The rule assures the former client that information confided to the lawyer will not be used by the lawyer against the former client in a subsequent matter without the former client's consent. The rule does not concern the possibility that some other party may later have information detrimental to the former client.[28] In that circumstance, the lawyer is able to represent the Prospective Client to respond to a third-party subpoena involving the former client without running afoul of Rule 1.9.

Conclusion

A lawyer's representation of a Prospective Client does not create a conflict of interest unless: (1) the lawyer knows, after performing reasonable diligence in evaluating the subpoena request, that the Prospective Client possesses responsive information that, if produced, is or likely will be adverse to the Other Client, and such knowledge likely will adversely affect the lawyer's representation of either client; or (2) the lawyer's professional judgment will or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or other interests as a result of the prospective engagement. Reasonable diligence prior to undertaking the new engagement includes considering the particulars of the proceeding out of which the subpoena issued and the information contained in the subpoena itself, including the time period, the scope of information sought, and the names of persons identified and their connection to the information sought. It might also include review of publicly available information or consultation with the Other Client depending on the knowledge of the lawyer concerning the circumstances surrounding the subpoena request and its implications. Whether additional diligence would be required is a question of fact and varies by the circumstances.

A lawyer who undertakes a representation of a Prospective Client having concluded that there was not a conflict at the outset of the representation and who, despite reasonable diligence, does not discover a conflict throughout the engagement, has not violated Rule 1.7 if responsive Information produced is subsequently used by another party in a manner that is damaging to the Other Client.

However, if a lawyer discovers Information potentially damaging to the Other Client during the course of the Prospective Client engagement and prior to production, the lawyer must assess from both an objective and subjective perspective whether the lawyer's ability to competently and diligently represent either the Prospective Client or the Other Client might be comprised. If such Information readily appears to be, or reasonably will be, damaging to the lawyer's Other Client (not speculatively), then it is a conflict that develops after commencement of the engagement, for which informed consent from each affected client would be required. If informed consent is not obtained, then conflicts counsel would have to be retained, if permissible, or the lawyer must withdraw.

Finally, a lawyer's representation of a prospective client in responding to a third-party subpoena that seeks Information about a lawyer's former client does not create a conflict of interest unless the subpoena matter is the same as or substantially related to the lawyer's former representation and the interests of the prospective client and former client are adverse.

Published February 2021

Opinion 382

Lawyer-Directors Representing Entity-Clients

Introduction

The Legal Ethics Committee has received several inquiries regarding whether a lawyer who represents an entity-client may also serve as a member of the client's board of directors.[1] The Committee is aware that acting in such [24] Rule 1.7(d) will typically not be available to a lawyer who concludes that a conflict has arisen during a representation in this context because a conflict arising under Rule 1.7(b)(2)-(4) is not consentable under Rule 1.7(d). As to withdrawal, see Rule 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation).

[25] Rule 1.9 states: "A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent."

[26] See Rule 1.9, Comments [2] and [3]; D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 272 (1997) ("purpose of the rule is to assure the preservation of attorney-client confidences gained in the prior representation and to preserve the reasonable expectations of the former client that the attorney will not seek to benefit from the prior representation at the expense of the former client"); and Brown v. District of Columbia Board of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37 (D.C. 1984) (en banc).

[27] Cf, Rule 1.9, Comment [2]: "[A] lawyer who recurrently handled a type of problem for a former client is not precluded from later representing another client in a wholly distinct problem of that type even though the subsequent representation involves a position adverse to the prior client."

[28] See Rule 1.9, Comment [3]: "Information that has been disclosed to the public or to other parties adverse to the former client ordinarily will not be disqualifying."

[1] This Opinion does not apply to lawyers who serve on the boards of entities for whom they do not also serve as counsel. See, e.g., Harris, Micalyn S., and Karen L. Valihura. Outside Counsel as Director: The Pros and Potential Pitfalls of Dual Service (Business Lawyer, vol. 53, no. 2, Feb. 1998, pp. 479-506.)

dual capacities is a common practice that often accrues to the benefit of both lawyer and client and is not generally prohibited[2] but, as former Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart warned, there are significant ethical issues implicated by such dual service's intertwining "the function of the lawyer in giving professional counsel" and "the function of corporate management . . . in the profit-making interests of its stockholders."[3]

At its core, the essential ethical issues relating to a lawyer representing a client-entity also serving as a director on the entity's board are conflicts of interest that may arise between two or more of: (1) the lawyer's duties to the entity as its counsel; (2) the lawyer's fiduciary duties to the entity as a director; and (3) the lawyer's personal self-interest inherent in simultaneously serving in both roles.[4]

For example, a personal conflict might arise for the lawyer-director when:[5]

- the lawyer-director is asked for legal advice regarding her own acts or omissions that she took in her directorial capacity;
- the lawyer-director is asked for legal advice regarding different potential courses of action, and she prefers one option as a board member;
- the lawyer-director is asked to represent a client whose interests are directly adverse to the entity;
- the lawyer-director is, or may be, called as a witness by those bringing lawsuits against the entity-client;[6]
- the lawyer-director is employed by a law firm and serves as outside counsel to the entity, and the board must deliberate with respect to the relationship between the firm and the entity, including deciding whether to retain the firm, the fees to be paid to the firm, when and whether to retain the firm's services, etc.;
- a lawsuit is brought against the corporation and its directors, and the interests of the board are adverse to those of the corporation or adverse to the interests of the lawyer-director.[7]

The purpose of this Opinion is to create a roadmap for practitioners to navigate the ethical and practical issues of such dual service.

The Committee concludes that while there is no per se proscription against a lawyer representing an entity while simultaneously serving as a director of that entity, the lawyer must first carefully determine whether the additional fiduciary or other responsibilities related to serving on the entity's board creates a material risk of compromising the lawyer's independence of professional judgment on behalf of the client or otherwise creates a personal or other conflict of interest. This determination must include full and frank discussions with the client of all material risks inherent in the lawyer serving in such a dual role and obtaining the entity-client's informed consent thereto.[8]

The Committee notes that it may be more practical for the lawyer-director to recuse herself from representing the entity-client or from giving it legal advice while serving on its board as an effective way to avoid most, but not all,[9] of the types of conflicts discussed herein. Where consistent with the rules, the lawyer-director may suggest that the client agree to a different lawyer from her firm representing it while she serves as a director, which would minimize, but not eliminate, the ethics issues discussed herein.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.0 (Terminology)
- Rule 1.1 (Competence)
- Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- Rule 1.4 (Communication)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest)
- Rule 1.8 (Conflict of Interest: Specific Rules)
- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification: General Rule)
- Rule 1.13 (Organization as Client)
- Rule 5.7 (Responsibilities Regarding Law-Related Service)

General Discussion

Unlike accountants, who are prohibited by the Code of Professional Ethics for Certified Public Accountants from serving on boards of directors of their entity-clients,[10] neither the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct nor the D.C. Rules bar lawyers from serving in [2] See, e.g., Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers, § 135, comment d (2000).

[3] Potter Stewart, Professional Ethics for the Business Lawyer: The Morals of the Market Place, 31 Bus. Law. 463, 464 (1975); see The Lawyer as Director of a Client, 57 Bus. Law. 387, 395-96 (2001).

Lawyer-directors of nonprofit entities may also encounter potential issues, some of which are unique to nonprofits. For instance, some state statutes limit liability for uncompensated directors and officers of nonprofit organizations when they are acting in their capacity as directors and officers.

[4] Lawyers provide advice on law and legal strategy to an entity client but do not make commercial or other business decisions on the ultimate objectives of the client. Such decisions are made by the entity, usually acting through its directors. See Rule 1.2. A lawyer who serves in both roles runs the risk of confusing and blurring these important distinctions.

[5] A lawyer-director may have a conflict of interest in undertaking to provide legal advice to an entity-client regarding a challenge to the legality of actions in which he or she participated as a director. See generally Rule 1.7, comment [4]: "[I]f the probity of a lawyer's own conduct in a transaction is in serious question, it may be difficult or impossible for the lawyer to give client detached advice." However, under certain circumstances where the lawyer concludes that the conflict is consentable, the lawyer-director may provide such legal advice after notifying the entity-client of the conflict and obtaining its informed consent. Rule 1.7(c).

[6] Because of the broad scope of insider knowledge and industry information presumably known by a lawyer-director, she may be targeted and called a witness by those bringing lawsuits against the corporate client, creating a potential personal conflict. Moreover, Rule 3.7 (Lawyer as Witness) may preclude the lawyer-director from serving as trial counsel. As per Comment [1], "combining the roles of advocate and witness can prejudice the opposing party and can involve a conflict of interest between the lawyer and client."

[7] In this regard, plaintiffs sometimes may aim at strategically disqualifying the lawyer-director and the lawyer-director's firm from representing the corporation.

[8] See Rule 1.8(g)(1) and Comment [13] thereto.

Although the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct do not require a lawyer to carry professional liability insurance, having such protection is a sound and highly recommended practice. However, under some malpractice insurance policies that exclude non-law-related liabilities, lawyer-directors are entitled to less coverage – or even possibly no coverage at all – for work they perform in that dual role, even if a significant portion of the work performed was legal. See, e.g., Continental Cas. Co. v. Smith, 243 F. Supp. 2d 576, 582 (E.D. La. 2003). As such, lawyer-directors should always check with their insurers to determine if such limitations apply to their coverage.

[9] A lawyer-director may not solve all conflict problems by refraining from providing legal advice to the client-entity. For example, she may have a conflict imputable to other members of her firm pursuant to Rule 1.10, or she and/or other firm lawyers may have a personal conflict, as discussed infra.

To be clear, however, it is not the position of the Committee that a Rule 1.7 conflict necessarily arises where the lawyer-director limits herself to serving as director and a different firm lawyer serves as counsel to the entity. Even in the absence of a conflict, lawyers should be aware that some courts have disqualified lawyers in such circumstances.

[10] Code of Professional Ethics for Certified Public Accountants, Rule 101.

such a dual capacity, but they warn lawyers to decline such representations in circumstances where there exists a material risk that the lawyer's independent judgment will be compromised or where there is a disqualifying conflict.[11]

The duties of a corporate director to shareholders do not overlap cleanly with the duties that a lawyer owes a client under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. As such, the lawyer must provide information to the entity-client sufficient for it to be aware of the potential risks inherent in an attorney serving such dual roles and make clear to the client at all times "which hat she is wearing."

An attorney-client relationship may unintentionally arise when the entity reasonably believes that the lawyer-director is acting as its counsel in providing legal advice. As such, it is important for a lawyer to take every reasonable step to avoid such misconceptions and to clarify his role at every stage. When acting pursuant to his duties as a board member, the attorney must make clear that he is not acting as a lawyer or giving legal advice. On the other hand, when the lawyer is acting as counsel to the entity-client, he must take every reasonable step to ensure that it understands that he represents only the entity and that he does not represent any of its board members, officers, employees, or anyone else.[12] Best practices include specifying this important point to the client both through specific and unambiguous language in the retainer agreement consistent with Rule 1.5 and thereafter when required by Rules 1.4 and 1.13.

There are several additional ethical issues that arise in the context of a lawyer serving a dual role on behalf of the entity-client, particularly the risk that her professional judgment could be compromised. As a stark – but not at all uncommon – example, a lawyer-director might be required to determine the legality of the board's decisions in which she directly participated; in such situations, her ethical obligation to provide competent, diligent, objective, and independent legal advice could be at odds with her personal and managerial interests.[13] Moreover, while it is not uncommon for an entity to agree prospectively to limit the liability of its directors, a lawyer who decides to also serve as a director could not make any agreement that prospectively limits the lawyer's liability to a client for malpractice.[14]

As such, a lawyer considering assuming a dual role on behalf of an entity must first assess whether assuming such a dual role is ethically permissible and, if so, discuss these issues with the client-entity and, together with it, determine, based upon a risk-benefit or other appropriate analysis, if assuming a dual role is appropriate under the circumstances.[15]

Discussion

Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)

Pursuant to Rule 1.2(a):

> A lawyer shall abide by a client's decisions concerning the objectives of representation … and shall consult with the client as to the means by which they are to be pursued. . . A lawyer shall abide by a client's decision whether to accept an offer of settlement of a matter. In a criminal case, the lawyer shall abide by the client's decision, after consultation with the lawyer, whether to waive a jury trial, and whether the client will testify.

Thus, the Rule carefully distinguishes between the objectives of the representation, such as whether to accept a settlement or request a jury trial or plea, which vest generally in the client, and the means of obtaining those objectives, which vest generally in the lawyer: As Comment [1] to the Rule elaborates:

> Both lawyer and client have authority and responsibility in the objectives and means of representation. The client has ultimate authority to determine the purposes to be served by legal representation, within the limits imposed by law and the lawyer's professional obligations. Within these limits, a client also has a right to consult with the lawyer about the means to be used in pursuing those objectives. At the same time, a lawyer is not required to pursue objectives or employ means simply because the client may wish that the lawyer do so. A clear distinction between objectives and means sometimes cannot be drawn, and in many cases the client–lawyer relationship partakes of a joint undertaking. In questions of means, the lawyer should assume responsibility for technical and legal tactical issues, but should defer to the client regarding such questions as the expense to be incurred and concern for third persons who might be adversely affected . . .

This distinction creates an issue for the lawyer-director, who at all times must be conscious of this important "objectives vs. means" distinction. As counsel to the entity, he must abide by the decisions of his client regarding the objectives of the representation[16] even if, as a director, he powerfully disagrees with the client's decision in that regard. Moreover, as counsel, he may exercise his best legal judgment and decline to follow the entity's instructions with respect to the means of the representation, even if the client urges such action. However, so long as the decision of the entity acting through its duly authorized constituent(s)[17] is both legal and ethical, the lawyer, in his capacity as a director, must follow the client's directions regarding even the

[11] See ABA Model Rule 1.7, Comment [35]. See also ABA Formal Opinion 98-410, pursuant to which:

> The lawyer should reasonably assure at the outset of the dual relationship that management and the other board members understand the different responsibilities of legal counsel and director; understand that in some circumstances matters discussed at board meetings with the lawyer in her role as director will not receive the protection of the attorney-client privilege; and understand that conflicts of interest could arise requiring the lawyer to recuse herself as a director or to decline representation of the corporation in a matter. During the dual relationship, the lawyer should exercise reasonable care to protect the corporation's confidential information and to confront and resolve conflicts of interest that arise.

[12] See Rule 1.13(a) (Organization as Client). There are circumstances when a lawyer may undertake to represent simultaneously and jointly both the entity and one of its constituents in the same matter, but that issue is beyond the scope of this Opinion. See, e.g., D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 327 (2005) (Joint Representation: Confidentiality of Information Revisited).

[13] See, e.g., The Lawyer as Director of a Client (The Business Lawyer, Nov. 2001, Vol. 57, No. 1, at 388); ABA Model Rule 1.7.

[14] Rule 1.8(g). See also Comment [13]: "Agreements prospectively limiting a lawyer's liability for malpractice are prohibited because they are likely to undermine competent and diligent representation."

[15] See, e.g., ABA Formal Opinion 98-410.

[16] A basic feature of the lawyer-client relationship, sometimes frustrating to lawyers, is that the client has the right to make foolish decisions. For example, a client might reject an attractive settlement offer that the lawyer believes is greater than a probable judgment were the case to be tried and the client to prevail spectacularly. See, e.g., Rule 1.13, comment [3]: "When constituents of the organization make decisions for it, the decisions ordinarily must be accepted by the lawyer even if their utility or prudence is doubtful. Decisions concerning policy and operations, including the ones entailing serious risk, are not as such in the lawyer's province."

Of course, a lawyer has the ethical duty to counsel and advise the client against such foolish decisions but, at the end of the day, the client has the unfettered right to reject the lawyer's advice regarding the objectives of the representation.

[17] See discussion on Rule 1.13, infra.

means of the representation, even if he strongly believes that such action is not in the client's best interests.

As discussed more fully below, this dichotomy on the objectives-means continuum between a lawyer-director's prerogatives and duties as a lawyer and as a director creates potential personal conflicts of interest for lawyers wearing both hats.

Rule 1.1 (Competence)

Pursuant to Rule 1.1, lawyers must provide competent representation to their clients and must possess the "legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation." Some courts have ruled that a director for an entity who is also a lawyer is held to a higher standard of care than a non-lawyer director and, as such, must be careful to recognize "red flags" for potential legal issues in a company's operations which may not be apparent to a non-lawyer director.[18]

Moreover, unlike lawyers who advise a company but do not also serve as directors, lawyer-directors might know the intimate details of the entity-client's internal operations.[19] This heightened standard of care means that the lawyer-director faces a greater potential risk of violating Rule 1.1 when the lawyer is also representing the entity.

Finally, although it is generally outside the scope of the authority of the Legal Ethics Committee to comment on matters of substantive law, it is important to remind practitioners that they are bound by the substantive law,[20] and that their duty of competence under Rule 1.1 includes the duty to be familiar with all applicable laws and regulations. Again, in this regard, lawyer-directors should be aware that courts have often held them to substantially higher standards of care and due diligence under various SEC Rules than other directors.[21]

Rule 1.13 (Organization as Client) and Rule 1.4 (Communication)

Rule 1.13 establishes that a lawyer for an organization represents only the entity itself, "acting through its duly authorized constituents," who could be any person or persons designated by the entity-client to act in that capacity. As such, the duly authorized constituent is merely an agent for the entity with respect to the representation, and the full scope of the lawyer's ethical duties run directly to the entity itself, and not to any of its directors, officers, owners, employees, shareholders, or to any other persons or constituents.

There may be situations where one or more fellow directors is engaged in an action, intends to act, or refuses to act in a matter related to the lawyer-director's representation that is a violation of law which reasonably might be imputed to the organization and is likely to result in substantial injury to the organization. Under such circumstances, Rule 1.13(b) mandates that the lawyer proceed "as is reasonably necessary in the best interests of the organization," including referring the matter "to higher authority in the organization, including, if warranted by the circumstances, to the highest authority that can act on behalf of the organization as determined by applicable law."[22]

When a lawyer is also a director, it may be particularly uncomfortable and difficult for her to "report up" on her fellow directors – perhaps even as to the acts or omissions of the duly authorized constituent – with whom she has established a working relationship and perhaps friendships. Nevertheless, when the interests of management or the board or any of its directors diverge from that of the entity, the lawyer-director is bound by Rule 1.13 to prioritize the interests of the entity and to act only in its best interests.

Moreover, above and beyond Rule 1.13, a lawyer-director has the same duty as any other lawyer to ensure that all client decisions be made "only after the client has been informed of all relevant considerations."[23] Thus, if a lawyer who represents an entity-client is also considering serving on the client's board, he must provide all information that the entity will need to make an informed decision as to whether to invite the lawyer to serve as a director for the entity as well. Such information that must be discussed with the entity-client includes, at the very least, the fact that certain communications with the board by a lawyer who is also a director may not be protected by the attorney-client privilege.[24]

By virtue of the close working relationship with her fellow directors, the lawyer-director may actually obtain more information to communicate to the client and to draw on when advising the client. However, some confusion may result when a lawyer also serving as a director learns information that a non-director lawyer would not have known; again, Rule 1.4 would also require that the lawyer-director relay this information to the client to the possible detriment of the board.

Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information) and Rule 5.7 (Responsibilities regarding Law-Related Services)

The duty of a lawyer to protect client confidences and secrets under the D.C. Rules is a fundamentally important obligation which, subject to very few exceptions, generally takes priority over other ethical imperatives. That particularly broad duty extends not only to confidential attorney-client communications but also to "secrets," which Rule 1.6(b) defines as "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would likely to be detrimental, to the client." However, the client holds the privilege and the entity-client and/or its directors may waive the attorney-client privilege and consent to the disclosure of the entity's confidences and secrets.

[18] See, e.g., Escott v. BarCharis Constr. Corp., 283 F. Sup. 647 (S.D.N.Y. 1968).

[19] See, e.g., Feit v. Leasco Data processing Equipment Corp., 332 F. Supp. 54, 578 (E.D. NY 1971):

> Inside directors with intimate knowledge of corporate affairs and of the particular transactions will be expected to make a more complete investigation and have more extensive knowledge of facts supporting or contradicting inclusions in the registration statements than outside directors . . . such stringent requirements of knowledge of corporate affairs [apply to] inside directors that one is led to the conclusion that liability will lie in practically all cases of misrepresentation.

[20] When the substantive law is proscriptive and the D.C. Rules are permissive or silent on the matter, then the substantive law will control. On the other hand, when the D.C. Rules are proscriptive and the substantive law is permissive or silent, the Rules will control.

[21] See Blakely v. Lisac, 357 F. Supp. 255, 266 (D. Ore. 1972) (holding a lawyer-director "liable both as a lawyer and as a director" for drafting a fraudulent prospectus under SEC Rule 10b-5, while not holding other directors similarly liable).

[22] In the District of Columbia, this is colloquially referred to as the "report up, but not out" rule; that is, a lawyer for an entity has the duty to report such information up to the highest decision maker within the entity, but may generally not report "out" to regulators or others because of the duty to maintain client confidences and secrets. See discussion on the implications of Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information) on a lawyer-director, infra. But see D.C. Rule 1.6 (d) (narrow exception to permit lawyers to "report out" – but only "to the extent reasonably necessary" – when the lawyer's services were or are being used to perpetrate an economic crime-fraud.)

[23] Rule 1.4, Comment [2].

[24] See discussion on Rule 1.6 implications, infra.

There are any number of communications by a lawyer that are legally protected from disclosure by applicable substantive law of attorney-client privilege but which are not afforded similar protection for communications from a director to his entity. As such, confusion may arise regarding which hat the lawyer–director is wearing; under which circumstances, in his role as lawyer, he is obligated to protect certain private information; and when, in his role as director, he is required to make disclosures.

The general rule is that legal advice is protected by the attorney-client privilege and Rule 1.6, but business-related advice is not always protected and is potentially discoverable in litigation.[25] The repercussions of this distinction may be dire; for example, given the different scopes of the fiduciary and attorney-client privileges with regard to confidential information, the lawyer-director may be forced to turn over information during discovery or potentially testify as to information that would have been covered by attorney-client privilege had the lawyer not also been a director.[26]

Distinguishing between these roles can be complex because the discussion may oscillate between legal advice and business discussions and also because a bright line between "legal" and "business-related" may not always exist, making legal advice provided by a lawyer-director more vulnerable to involuntary disclosure or subject to mandatory disclosure than that of a lawyer who is not also a director.[27] As such, when the lawyer-director must discuss legal matters which he would like to make subject to the attorney-client privilege, it may be insufficient to declare that "I am speaking now in my capacity as legal counsel." Rather, he must take affirmative and substantive steps to make plain the strictly legal nature of the discussion.

Although often impractical and difficult to achieve, the lawyer-director could consider having entirely separate sessions with his entity-client where only legal issues are discussed and where other firm lawyers and inside general counsel are purposely included in such meetings. Though the subject of attorney-client privilege substantive law is beyond the scope of this opinion, the lawyer-director might consider the crafting of meeting minutes so as to avoid revealing client confidential information in privileged discussions with entity counsel.

Moreover, Rule 5.7, which imposes additional duties upon a lawyer who provides "law related services," applies particularly to lawyer-directors. Rule 5.7(b) defines law-related services as "services that might reasonably be performed in connection with and in substance are related to the provision of legal services, and that are not prohibited as unauthorized practice of law when provided by a nonlawyer." As Comment [9] explains:

> A broad range of economic and other interests of clients may be served by lawyers engaging in the delivery of law-related services. Examples of law-related services include providing title insurance, financial planning, accounting, trust services, real estate counseling, legislative lobbying, economic analysis, social work, psychological counseling, tax preparation, and patent, medical or environmental consulting.

When a lawyer provides general legal services to the entity, but also provides only business advice to the entity in a particular case, Rule 5.7 will apply:

> (a) A lawyer shall be subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct with respect to the provision of law-related services, as defined in paragraph (b), if the law-related services are provided:
>
> (1) By the lawyer in circumstances that are not distinct from the lawyer's provision of legal services to clients; or
>
> (2) In other circumstances if the lawyer fails to take reasonable measures to assure that a person obtaining the law-related services knows that the services are not legal services and that the protections of the client–lawyer relationship do not exist.

Thus, Rule 5.7 creates an additional mandate under the D.C. Rules that a lawyer-director be careful at all times to remember which "hat" he is wearing – lawyer or director – and to be meticulous in communicating with the entity-client to make clear which role he is playing at a particular time.[28] This is particularly important, and the risk of confusion is particularly severe, where the recipient of services lacks sophistication.[29]

Rule 1.7(b)(4) (Conflicts of Interest: General Rule)

Many lawyers think of "conflicts" as those that arise between two or more current clients or between a current and former client.[30] It goes without saying that, in undertaking any representation of an entity-client – whether as only in his capacity as lawyer or as a lawyer-director – the lawyer must always conduct a competent and thorough conflicts check against current and previous representations as he would ordinarily do in every representation. However, for a lawyer-director, disqualifying conflicts may not involve conflicts between two or more clients but, rather, conflicts that are personal to him.

The analysis of such conflicts begins with Rule 1.7(b)(4):

> (b) Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if: . . .
>
> (4) The lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.

(Emphasis added).

This rule has very broad applicability; a lawyer has a Rule 1.7(b)(4) conflict not only where there exists an actual personal conflict, but even in cases where the lawyer's professional [25] See, e.g., ABA Formal Ethics Opinion 98 – 410, Lawyer Serving as Director of Client Corporation (1998).

[26] Some courts have even gone so far as to hold that the attorney-client privilege for communications between a lawyer and the lawyer's corporate client dissolves entirely when the lawyer becomes a director for the entity. See, e.g., Federal Savings & Loan Ins. Corp. v. Fielding, 343 F.Supp. 537 at 546 (D. Nev. 1972) (When a lawyer "gets into bed together" with the entity by serving also as a director, the lawyer converts the relationship into strictly a business relationship, rendering all communications between the lawyer-director and the entity as "business communications" unprotected by the attorney-client privilege.)

[27] There is hardly a courtroom in the land where litigants do not regularly seek to pierce assertions of attorney-client privilege by arguing that the lawyer provided business advice, which is discoverable, and not legal advice, which is not. The courts have employed a wide variety of tests to determine whether a lawyer-director's communications are privileged, and some have ruled that "when the lawyer becomes a director the privilege essentially evaporates" and that even lawyer-director's communications which consist only of legal advice may not be privileged. Other courts have held that even non-legal advice is privileged so long as the parties sought purely legal advice from the lawyer-director. See ABA Formal Ethics Opinion 980-410, citing Corp, v. Fielding, 343 F. Supp. 537, 546.

[28] For a comprehensive discussion of Rule 5.7, see Singer, Saul Jay, May A D.C. Lawyer Build A Deck (Washington Lawyer, Speaking of Ethics, March 2016).

[29] Rule 5.7, Comment [8].

[30] See generally Rule 1.7 (Conflicts of Interest: General) and Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client), respectively.

judgment on behalf of a client "may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interest." (Emphasis added). Such personal conflicts undermine the lawyer-director's capacity to render objective, detached advice because he will be – or even may be – personally affected by the legal advice he renders.[31]

However, even when a lawyer-director has a personal conflict, it may still be ethically permissible for him to represent the entity-client if he can meet both requirements of Rule 1.7(c):

> (c) A lawyer may represent a client with respect to a matter in the circumstances described in paragraph (b) above if
>
> (1) Each potentially affected client provides informed consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation; and
>
> (2) The lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client.

As Comment [7] explains:

> The underlying premise is that disclosure and informed consent are required before assuming a representation if there is any reason to doubt the lawyer's ability to provide wholehearted and zealous representation of a client . . . Although the lawyer must be satisfied that the representation can be wholeheartedly and zealously undertaken, if an objective observer would have any reasonable doubt on the issue, the client has a right to disclosure of all relevant considerations and the opportunity to be the judge of its own interest.[32]

Thus, after a good faith effort to determine which conflicts of interest may exist, the lawyer must obtain the client's informed consent[33] before taking on a dual role.[34] However, in the context of resolving personal conflicts, it is very important for the lawyer-director seeking to represent the entity-client to carefully consider the implications of Rule 1.6, the duty to maintain and protect client confidences and secrets, in seeking such informed consent. If, for the consent by the entity-client to be "informed," the lawyer would be required to disclose Rule 1.6-protected information from another client (current or past), the lawyer would be ethically prohibited from doing so. The result would be that the lawyer could not obtain the requisite informed consent; she could not satisfy Rule 1.7(c)(1); she therefore could not remove the taint of her Rule 1.7(b)(4) personal conflict; and she would be precluded from representing the entity-client in that matter.

Moreover, some lawyers erroneously conclude that obtaining the client's informed consent effectively resolves a personal interest conflict. In fact, pursuant to Rule 1.7(c)(2), the lawyer must also undertake both a subjective self-assessment and an objective analysis[35] to determine whether – notwithstanding the client's informed consent – he will be able to provide competent, diligent, and zealous representation to the client notwithstanding his own interests. In the language of Legal Ethics Opinion 365:

> the lawyer must [subjectively] hold such a belief and that belief must be reasonable under an objective standard . . . the prohibition of Rule 1.7(b)(4) is one which is highly dependent on the circumstances of the representation and the lawyer's own circumstances . . . we can do no more than identify the conflict of interest considerations, and leave it to the inquirer to determine whether the particular circumstance of his representation of his client are such that his judgment "will be or reasonably may be affected . . ."

The analysis is not complete, however, because even when the lawyer-director has a personal conflict such that she cannot satisfy either the objective or subjective test of Rule 1.7(c)(2), she may nonetheless continue to serve as counsel to the entity-client if she can limit the scope of her representation so as to "carve out" the personal conflict.

Pursuant to Rule 1.2, a lawyer may eliminate the taint of a personal conflict by limiting the scope of the representation when such limitation is "reasonable under the circumstances" and the "client gives informed consent." As such, a lawyer-director may limit the scope of her representation when her directorial role undermines, or has the capacity to undermine, her judgment on behalf of the client-entity. In some circumstances, she may step out of one of her roles on behalf of the entity, or she may either withdraw from serving as counsel for the entity and advising it on the problematic issue (and recommend substitute counsel to advise the entity for that limited purpose) or abstain from her role as a board director when the board addresses and acts on the problematic issue.

In instances involving specific discrete matters, such as determining the lawyer's compensation and whether to retain the lawyer's firm to represent the entity in certain matters, such a limitation is both feasible and reasonable. In other cases, however, where the taint of the personal conflict will permeate virtually everything the lawyer does in representing the entity – such as, for example, when she is asked to represent the corporation in a lawsuit in which both she and the board are defendants – such a limitation will generally not remove the taint of the personal conflict, even if the entity-client gives informed consent to the representation.

Finally, pursuant to Rule 1.10(a)(1),[36] a lawyer's personal conflicts are not ordinarily imputed to her firm. Therefore, [31] A lawyer who has a personal stake in the outcome of her legal advice may, for instance, be tempted to provide more cautious advice. Even a lawyer-director whose self-interest is wholly congruent with the interests of the entity may nevertheless have a personal conflict if her concern for her own personal interest in any way interferes with her concern for the client's interest.

---

[32] See also Comment [11]: "The lawyer's own interests should not be permitted to have an adverse effect on representation of a client. For example, if the probity of a lawyer's own conduct in a transaction is in serious question, it may be difficult or impossible for the lawyer to give a client detached advice."

[33] Informed consent "denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct." Rule 1.0(e) (Terminology).

[34] This would apply to both a director who subsequently seeks to represent the entity as counsel, and counsel for the entity who wants to serve on its board.

[35] A lawyer-director might undertake the requisite self-evaluation in good faith and subjectively conclude that she will be able to devote herself entirely to the client's interests and disregard any interest that might pose a personal conflict of interest. However, whether a reasonable person in the lawyer's position could objectively come to that conclusion under the circumstances is an important question that must always be addressed in personal conflict situations.

[36] Rule 1.10(a)(1) provides that:

> (a) While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rules 1.7 or Rule 1.9, unless:
>
> (1) the prohibition of the individual lawyer's representation is based on an interest of the lawyer described in Rule 1.7(b)(4) and that interest does not present a significant risk of adversely affecting the representation of the client by the remaining lawyers in the firm . . .

when the lawyer-director has a personal conflict with respect to a particular matter, another lawyer at the firm may be able to represent the entity-client with respect to that matter – unless the personal interest of the conflicted lawyer "presents a significant risk of adversely affecting the representation of the client by the remaining lawyers in the firm."

As such, any firm lawyer seeking to replace a lawyer-director from his firm who has been disqualified from representing the entity because of a personal conflict must undertake his own Rule 1.7(b)(4) analysis as discussed above to determine if he, too, has a conflict. As an obvious example, there is no lawyer at the firm who would not have an irreconcilable conflict representing the client-entity with respect to determining the appropriate compensation for the firm. On the other hand, for example, "a lawyer's strong political beliefs may disqualify the lawyer from representing a client, but the firm should not be disqualified if the lawyer's beliefs will not adversely affect the representation by others in the firm."[37]

If a lawyer for an entity has a personal conflict or is otherwise uncomfortable assuming a position on the board, then he must "just say no." However, where an entity is pressuring its lawyer to accept a position on its board, she may be able to mollify the client by agreeing to serve as a director and recommending that a different firm lawyer represent the entity-client going forward.

Conclusion

A lawyer may simultaneously serve as counsel and as a director for an entity as long as, while a lawyer-director, she takes every reasonable step to ensure that the client-entity appreciates the distinction between her duties as counsel and her duties as corporate director and declines any representation of the entity, or recuses herself from further representation of the entity, if a conflict is reasonably foreseeable or arises between two or more of: (1) the lawyer's duties to the entity as its counsel; (2) the lawyer's fiduciary duties to the entity as a director; and (3) the lawyer's personal self-interest inherent in simultaneously serving in both roles. The lawyer-director must engage in full and frank discussions with the entity-client of all material risks inherent in the lawyer serving in such a dual role and must obtain informed consent thereto.

Published August 2021

[37] Rule 1.10, comment [7].

Opinion No. 383

Disclosure of Client Confidences or Secrets in Compliance With the Outside Counsel Guidelines of Another Client; Advance Agreement to Withdraw from Representation in the Event of a "Midstream" Conflict

Absent informed consent, a lawyer generally may not disclose to a client or prospective client information about another client or prospective client that is protected by Rule 1.6 or Rule 1.18. Such information includes all confidences and secrets, as defined in Rule 1.6, which typically include the identity of another client or prospective client and the nature of the other client or prospective client's matter. Even requesting or agreeing to a commitment to make such disclosures, whether pursuant to Outside Counsel Guidelines or otherwise, may constitute a prohibited inducement to another to violate, or an attempt to violate, the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Rule 1.7(d), and not an advance agreement between one client and its outside lawyer, governs whether the lawyer must withdraw from a representation if a "midstream" conflict arises.

Also, a lawyer may not permit a client to have access to the lawyer's records if such access might disclose confidences or secrets of other clients.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7(d) (Conflict of Interest: Generally)
- Rule 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation)
- Rule 1.18(b) (Duties to Prospective Client)
- Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Inquiry

In recent years, numerous issues have arisen regarding the relationship between outside counsel and their clients or prospective clients. These issues frequently arise in the context of engagement letters, outside counsel guidelines, or similar undertakings (collectively, "OCGs") generated by large institutional clients. Such OCGs sometimes require outside counsel, as a matter of contract, to engage or refrain from engaging in specified conduct or practices.

OCGs may raise issues regarding information that is protected under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules" or "Rules"). By way of example, lawyers or law firms may be asked to agree as a matter of contract to advise a client, or obtain the client's consent, before the lawyer or law firm agrees to represent a competitor of the client in an unrelated matter not involving the client. Sometimes such requests extend to situations where the issue involved might be of interest to the client, even if the prospective client is not a competitor of the requesting client and the requesting client is not involved in the prospective matter. These types of issues may arise even before a lawyer and a prospective client reach the point of establishing an attorney-client relationship—for example, when a prospective client is interviewing lawyers for possible retention. Importantly, these are representations that would not constitute conflicts of interest under the D.C. Rules.[1]

Whether lawyers may request, or agree to, such commitments is beyond the scope of this opinion. The Legal Ethics Committee is issuing this opinion principally to remind lawyers that in the absence of informed consent,[2] (1) the D.C. Rules prohibit disclosure of a client's protected information in connection with such a request or commitment, and (2) agreeing to make such a disclosure or intentionally requesting such information may constitute a violation of the Rules even if no disclosure ultimately is made.

The Committee also has examined the propriety of two additional requirements found in some OCGs, namely that (1) the outside lawyer must withdraw from representing another current client if a so-called midstream conflict arises and (2) the client be permitted to audit the lawyer's records.

[1] See D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.7 (general conflicts rules). Although the current D.C. Rules permit a lawyer and her client to expand—arguably without limit—Rule 1.7's definition of what constitutes a conflict of interest, the D.C. Bar has recommended that the D.C. Court of Appeals eliminate this open-ended provision and limit the definition of conflicts of interest to those set out expressly in the Rules. D.C. Bar, Rules of Prof. Conduct Review Comm., Report to the Board of Governors Proposing Changes to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct Relating to Client-Generated Engagement Letters and Outside Counsel Guidelines (Jan. 2022) at 4-12, 23-26 (https://www.dcbar.org/getmedia/a2fed463-f33e-4155-82e4-3622e1e37afb/Report-of-OCGs-2022-Final-Transmittal-to-DCCA).

[2] See D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.6(e)(1). "'Informed consent' denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct." D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.0(e).

Discussion

The D.C. Rules strike a balance between allowing clients and lawyers latitude to contract with one another as they see fit, on the one hand, and protecting essential elements of the practice of law, on the other. These essential elements include confidentiality of specified client information.

With certain exceptions, Rule 1.6 prohibits a lawyer from revealing a "confidence" or "secret" of a client[3] as well as from using such information "for the advantage of the lawyer or of a third person."[4] Rule 1.18(b) provides similar protection for confidences and secrets of a prospective client. "Confidences" are information protected by the attorney-client privilege.[5] "Secrets" are defined broadly as "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client."[6]

Information that is neither a confidence nor a secret—for example, information that is "harmless or unexceptionable"[7] and information about a former client that is "generally known"[8]—is not protected by Rules 1.6 and 1.18. Note, however, that "the lawyer must err on the side of protecting information where any doubt exists" whether it qualifies as a confidence or secret.[9]

Information relating to representation of other clients

A client's identity comes within the protection of Rule 1.6, at least where disclosure might be detrimental to that client.[10] The same is true with respect to a prospective client.[11] The nature of the representation or prospective representation also is a protected secret[12] and in some circumstances may be a confidence as well.

Absent the informed consent of the affected client or prospective client, disclosure of that person's identity or the issues on which the lawyer is representing that person would violate Rule 1.6, Rule 1.18, or both where the client or prospective client has requested that the information be held inviolate or where its disclosure would be embarrassing or likely detrimental to the client or prospective client.

Thus, an outside lawyer for Client A ordinarily may not reveal to A the identity of that lawyer's client or prospective client B, or the nature of B's legal issue, unless permitted by an exception to Rule 1.6. Typically, the only potentially applicable exception will be "with the informed consent of [B]." Such consent presumably will not be forthcoming where A and B are competitors or where B does not want its engagement of the lawyer to be disclosed. Moreover, waivers of confidentiality "may not be implied from waivers of conflicts of interest" and are subject to "particular scrutiny" if challenged.[13]

A lawyer who agrees to disclose such information risks violating D.C. Rule 8.4(a) even if she never actually discloses protected information, as that rule prohibits not only violations of the Rules but also attempts to violate them.[14]

Moreover, an in-house lawyer who secures outside counsel's agreement to an OCG that requires outside counsel to violate the Rules may herself become subject to discipline: "It is professional misconduct for a lawyer to . . . knowingly . . . induce another to [violate the Rules]."[15] Indeed, even seeking such an agreement might constitute a prohibited attempt to violate the Rules or to induce another to do so.[16] Further, an in-house lawyer cannot avoid the restrictions discussed in this opinion by having a nonlawyer request such an agreement, as violating the Rules "through the act of another" is prohibited as well.[17]

That said, an in-house lawyer does not induce or attempt a violation if her request for information about other clients is conditioned upon such disclosure being consistent with the Rules' restrictions regarding client confidences and secrets. (If a conflict of interest is present, the outside lawyer would have to decline the proposed representation if she would have to disclose another client's confidences or secrets in order to seek informed consent.[18]) Moreover, a lawyer making an inquiry of another lawyer does not induce or attempt a violation if she reasonably believes that her inquiry will not elicit information protected by Rule 1.6 or Rule 1.18.

"Midstream" conflicts of interest

Another type of OCG that has come to the Committee's attention requires the lawyer to withdraw from representing another current client if a so-called midstream conflict arises. A midstream conflict is one that arises after a representation has commenced and that was "not reasonably foreseeable at the outset of the representation."[19] In such an instance, "a lawyer need not withdraw from any representation unless the conflict [would adversely affect one of the representations in question]."[20] Absent such an adverse effect, a lawyer may not withdraw under such circumstances if withdrawal would have a "material adverse effect on the interests of the client" from whose representation the lawyer proposes to withdraw unless one of the specialized circumstances set out in Rule

[3] D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.6(a)(1).

[4] D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.6(a)(3).

[5] D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.6(b).

[6] Id.

[7] D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Op. 312 (2002).

[8] D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.6, cmt. [10]. The ABA's Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility has explained that "generally known" means "widely recognized by members of the public in the relevant geographic area or . . . widely recognized in the former client's industry, profession, or trade" and not merely, say, mentioned in open court, a public record, or a document available in a public library. ABA Formal Ethics Op. 479 (2017); see N.Y. State Bar Ass'n Op. 1088 ¶ 8 (2016) (discussing examples of generally known information). The fact that information appears in a public filing somewhere does not ipso facto remove such data from the "secrets" category. D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Op. 246 (1994).

[9] D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Op. 312 (2002).

[10] In re Hager, 812 A.2d 904, 920 (D.C. 2002); accord ABA Formal Op. 480 at 2 (2018); ELLEN J. BENNETT & HELEN W. GUNNARSSON, ANNOTATED MODEL RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT 112-13 (9th ed. 2019) ("ANNOTATED MODEL RULES").

[11] D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.18(b); accord D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.6, cmt. [9]; ANNOTATED MODEL RULES 312-13.

[12] See N.Y. State Bar Ass'n Op.720 (1999) (interpreting N.Y. version of Rule 1.6).

[13] D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Op. 309 n. 10 (2001).

[14] See In re Fink, 22 A.3d 461 (Vt. 2011) (disciplining lawyer who contracted for unreasonable fee, even though lawyer did not attempt to collect it).

[15] D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 8.4(a); see In re Asher, 772 A.2d 1161 (D.C. 2001) (inducing another lawyer to lie to court); In re Isaacson, 860 N.W.2d 490 (Wisc. 2015) (directing other lawyer to file court documents containing false and offensive statements).

[16] See Fink, 22 A.3d 461.

[17] D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 8.4(a)

[18] D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.7, cmt. [27]; D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Op. 312 n. 9 (2002).

[19] D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.7(d).

[20] D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.7(d).

1.16(b)(1) through (5) is present.[21] Thus, an advance agreement to make such a withdrawal may contravene Rule 1.7(d).

Client access to law firm records

OCGs requiring that the client be permitted to audit a lawyer's records also may implicate the rules protecting client confidences and secrets. This depends not only upon the breadth of the OCG but also the nature of the lawyer's record keeping systems.

One provision of which the Committee is aware states: "[CLIENT] shall have full access to all electronic and paper records the firm maintains and the right to examine any such materials during this period upon reasonable notice."

A client is entitled to its entire file, with a narrow exception for lawyer work product in some instances where full payment of fees has not been made.[22] That is a far cry, however, from "full access" to a lawyer's records, which is not permitted where such access might reveal confidences or secrets of other clients (e.g., if the lawyer's electronic records are stored on an information system with relatively open architecture).

Conclusions

Absent informed consent, a lawyer generally may not disclose to a client or prospective client information about another client or prospective client that is a protected secret or confidence under Rule 1.6 or Rule 1.18. Such information often includes (1) the identity of another client or prospective client, and (2) the nature of the other person's matter. Even requesting or agreeing to a commitment to make such disclosures, whether pursuant to an Outside Counsel Guideline or otherwise, may constitute a prohibited attempt or inducement to another to violate the Rules.

Rules 1.7(d) and 1.16, and not an advance agreement between one client and its outside counsel, govern whether a lawyer must—or may—withdraw from her representation of another client if a "midstream" conflict arises.

Finally, a lawyer may not permit a client to have access to the lawyer's records if such access might disclose confidences or secrets of other clients.

Published April 2022

[21] See D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.16(b).

[22] D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.8(i), 1.16(d); D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 333 (2005); D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 250 (1994); D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 230 (1992).

Legal Ethics Opinion 384

Restrictions on Accepting a Legal Fee For Benefit of Certain Incarcerated Persons Before Notifying Prior Counsel of Record

This Opinion addresses the limits, under Rule 7.1(f) of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules" or "Rules"), on a successor counsel's ability to accept a legal fee from (or on behalf of) certain criminal defendants and detained youth who are incarcerated in District of Columbia correctional or juvenile detention facilities.

Rule 7.1(f) was added to the D.C. Rules in 2007 at the behest of the Public Defender Service and U.S. Attorney's Office, to protect already-represented incarcerated persons from lawyers who solicit fee-paying engagements based on unrealistic promises of success.[1] Rule 7.1(f) imposes specific notification obligations on a successor counsel before the successor may accept a legal fee from (or on behalf of) the incarcerated client. Rule 7.1(f) provides:

> Any lawyer or person acting on behalf of a lawyer who solicits or invites or seeks to solicit any person incarcerated at the District of Columbia Jail, the Correctional Treatment Facility or any District of Columbia juvenile detention facility for the purpose of representing that person for a fee paid by or on behalf of that person or under the Criminal Justice Act, D.C. Code Ann. §11-2601 (2001) et seq., in any then-pending criminal case in which that person is represented, must provide timely and adequate notice to the person's then-current lawyer prior to accepting any fee from or on behalf of the incarcerated person.

Nowhere does Rule 7.1(f) define what "accepting any fee" or "timely and adequate notice" means. Other D.C. Rules inform us (i) that a lawyer's fees must be reasonable (Rule 1.5(a)); (ii) special disclosures and consents are required when a family member or other third-party seeks to pay the client's legal bill (Rule 1.8(e)[2]); and (iii) prepaid flat fees are never earned on receipt (Rule 1.15(e)[3]).

This Committee is mindful that criminal defense attorneys often require payment in full of prepaid flat fees (or a substantial deposit towards total expected hourly fees) before the defense attorney will commit to entering an appearance. Rule 7.1(f) could be read as requiring a successor counsel to defer receipt of fees until entering an appearance. Such a reading, however, would make it difficult for incarcerated persons to exercise their absolute right to change counsel. We therefore conclude that nothing in Rule 7.1(f) prohibits successor counsel from receiving payment of a fee into the lawyer's trust account pending "timely" service and filing of a notice of an appearance or motion to substitute.

As to what constitutes "timely and adequate notice," we note that Rule 112 of the D.C. Superior Court's Rules of Criminal Procedure currently requires a notice of appearance "within 3 days of appointment or retention." Criminal Procedure Rule 49 further requires that such notice be served upon the party's attorney. Although violation of a court procedure does not always constitute an ethics violation, we conclude that service and filing of an entry of appearance that conforms to Criminal Procedure Rules 49 and 112 is consistent with a lawyer's duties under Rule 7.1(f) to (i) protect client interests and (ii) avoid wasting resources of prior counsel and the court.

Published August 2022

[1] The legislative history to Rule 7.1(f) appears at page 179 of the Rules of Professional Conduct Review Committee's Proposed Amendments to the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct Final Report and Recommendations (June 21, 2005) found at https://www.dcbar.org/about/who-we-are/reports/rules-of-professional-conduct-review-committee/rules-of-professional-conduct-review-committee.

[2] Rule 1.8 (e) states: "A lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless: (1) the client gives informed consent after consultation; (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independence of professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and (3) information relating to representation of a client is protected as required by [the confidentiality restrictions of] Rule 1.6."

[3] Under Rule 1.15(e), a client's prepaid fees, including prepaid flat fees, belong to the client and must remain in trust until the lawyer completes the associated work unless the client has given informed consent to a different arrangement. In re Mance, 980 A.2d 1196 (D.C. 2009). Informed consent generally cannot be obtained without first informing the client of the risks associated with waiving use of a trust account and that termination of the lawyer-client relationship, prior to completing all work, will entitle the client to a refund of prepaid fees associated with the portion of work not performed. Mance. at 1206-7. See also D.C. Bar LEC Op. 355. Although Rule 1.15(e) provides limited circumstances in which the client may provide informed consent to waive use of a trust account for the client's prepayments, we conclude that such a waiver normally would be inoperable before the lawyer has provided the notice of appearance to prior counsel as required by Criminal Procedure Rules 49 and 112.

Ethics Opinion 385

Advising Clients About Communications with Represented Opponents

Introduction

Parties to a legal matter generally have a right to communicate directly with each other. This Opinion provides guidance for lawyers about when and how they may counsel their clients regarding communications with represented opposing parties. It does not address the question of how a litigant (plaintiff or defendant) may communicate directly with a witness or third party represented by counsel.

A lawyer may advise a client about communications with represented opponents (herein, "opponent-party") in which the client legally is entitled to engage without running afoul of D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct 4.2 and 8.4(a) ("D.C. Rules" or "Rules"). In doing so, a lawyer may provide assistance to the client, including recommending that the client undertake direct communications with the opposing party, identifying general topic areas and specific issues for discussion, discussing the goal or goals of such communications, and preparing or revising talking points representing the client's viewpoints, questions, and proposals. A lawyer may not, however, advise a client about legally-permissible communications solely for the purpose of evading the prohibitions of Rule 4.2. Even if the lawyer does not intend to evade Rule 4.2, the lawyer's assistance should not result in the client acting as a surrogate for the lawyer.

Although a lawyer may provide a client with assistance in communicating directly with an opponent-party, the lawyer may not attend or otherwise participate in party-to-party communications with an opponent-party, unless opposing counsel provides consent. This bar on attendance and participation includes a bar on monitoring party-to-party communications or consulting with the client in real time while such communications are going on.

Furthermore, a lawyer who advises a client about communications with a represented opponent-party should advise her client that the opponent-party may want an opportunity to consult with opposing counsel before entering into any agreements, making admissions, or disclosing confidential information. Under certain circumstances, such consultation should be encouraged by the party initiating the direct party-to-party communications.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.4 (Communication)
- Rule 1.13 (Organization as Client)
- Rule 1.14 (Client with Diminished Capacity)
- Rule 4.2 (Communication Between Lawyer and Person Represented by Counsel)
- Rule 5.3 (Responsibilities Regarding Nonlawyer Assistants)
- Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Inquiry

1. May a lawyer encourage her client to communicate directly with a represented opposing party, without opposing counsel's knowledge or participation? If yes, to what extent may a lawyer assist her client in preparing for such communications?
2. May a lawyer attend or observe party-to-party communications and assist his client during them?

Discussion

Rule 4.2 prohibits a lawyer, during the course of representing a client, from "communicat[ing] or caus[ing] another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a person known to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other person or is authorized by law or a court order to do so."[1] This prohibition extends to non-lawyer assistants who are employed or retained by or associated with the lawyer.[2] Indeed, "[i]t is professional misconduct for a lawyer to . . . [v]iolate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through the acts of another."[3]

Rule 4.2 applies to communications related to a matter with persons–and not just parties–represented by counsel. Persons include opponents, third parties brought into the litigation by formal process, and witnesses. Here, the Committee addresses only how the rule applies to opponent-parties.

The commentary to Rule 4.2 states:

> parties to a matter may communicate directly with each other . . . [and] a lawyer is not prohibited from advising a client concerning a communication that the client is legally entitled to make, provided that the client communication is not solely for the purpose of evading restrictions imposed on the lawyer by this rule.

Rule 4.2 cmt [2].[4] Thus, although a lawyer and her non-lawyer agents may be prohibited from communicating with a represented opponent-party, the same prohibition does not extend to the lawyer's client or an agent of the lawyer's client, and the lawyer may advise the client or client's agent accordingly.

What "accordingly" means, however, is a question that many state bars, the ABA, and ethics counsel have struggled to answer. Numerous authorities concur with the dictate of Comment [2], that a lawyer may not advise a client about legally permissible communications solely for the purpose of evading the prohibitions of Rule 4.2. But this boundary is so extreme, practically requiring an attorney to admit (at least to himself) bad faith, that it is not particularly useful. This Opinion, therefore, provides some [2] Rule 5.3(b) ("With respect to a nonlawyer employed or retained by or associated with a lawyer . . . [a] lawyer having direct supervisory authority over the nonlawyer shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the person's conduct is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyer."); see also D.C. Legal Eth. Op. 295 (2000) (concluding that a guardian ad litem representing a minor is prohibited by Rules 4.2 and 8.4(a) from using a social worker or any other third party to communicate with the represented parent of the guardian ad litem's client "as a go-between to circumvent Rule 4.2"); cf. D.C. Legal Eth. Op. 321 (2003) (concluding that, under Rules 5.3 and 8.4, respondent's counsel in a domestic violence matter must "make reasonable efforts to ensure that the non-lawyer assistants, including investigators, conduct themselves in a manner consistent with the D.C. Rules" when communicating with an unrepresented petitioner).

[1] Rule 4.2(a).

[3] Rule 8.4(a); see also Rule 5.3(c) ("A lawyer shall be responsible for conduct of such a person that would be a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct if engaged in by a lawyer if: (1) The lawyer requests or, with knowledge of the specific conduct, ratifies the conduct involved; or (2) The lawyer has direct supervisory authority over the person, or is a partner or a lawyer who individually or together with other lawyers possess comparable managerial authority in the law firm or government agency in which the person is employed, and knows of the conduct at a time when its consequences can be avoided or mitigated but fails to take reasonable remedial action.").

[4] The Committee has previously noted that Comment [2] to Rule 4.2 does not create an exception to Rule 4.2. D.C. Legal Eth. Op. 258 (1995). It "merely reflects the American jurisprudential tradition that parties generally are free to communicate directly with each other. This tradition is based on the belief that parties have a right to settle their disputes without the involvement or consent of their lawyers." D.C. Legal Eth. Op. 258 (discussing comment formerly numbered as Comment [1]). considerations that will allow practitioners to gauge whether their contemplated involvement in party-to-party communications may be considered permissible under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

The Duty of Zealous and Diligent Representation Is Bounded By Duties to The Legal System and Other Parties

Among the first principles of legal representation are that a lawyer has a duty to zealously and diligently represent his client and to consult with the client about the means by which the client's objectives can be pursued.[5] Additionally, a lawyer is obligated to pursue the client's objectives through whatever reasonably available means are permitted by law and the disciplinary rules.[6] Throughout, a lawyer is required to "explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation."[7]

There often are circumstances under which party-to-party communications may succeed in bringing about a resolution. These circumstances may arise from the posture of the matter, the relationship between the parties, or the nature of the parties' dispute. Perhaps the most common dynamic where direct party-to-party communications may be helpful are settlement negotiations that have hit a stand-still and one party questions whether its settlement overtures have been conveyed promptly and accurately to the opposing party. Parties to contract or commercial disputes that have an ongoing business relationship (including conflicts between principals of a small business) will sometimes benefit from informal, direct communications. And, the areas of family law (divorce, custody), will contests, and intra-family torts are frequently referenced as matters in which the principals may be better positioned, at times, to resolve their disputes than their counsel are – or, at least, may have a better chance of reaching agreements that will preserve future family relations. These are but some examples, sufficient for the Committee to find that a reasonable practitioner may believe that party-to-party communications might advance her client's interests and that a diligent and zealous practitioner may wish to recommend that her client engage in such direct communication with his opponent-party.[8]

Rule 4.2 Is Intended to Protect Fundamental Aspects of the Legal System: The Adversarial Process, Professional Advocacy, and Attorney-Client Privilege

As this Committee has previously observed:

> Among [the] main purposes [of Rule 4.2] is the protection of the adversary system. A client who receives a communication from opposing counsel without the participation of his own counsel may not be able to evaluate the correctness of statements of law made by opposing counsel. Without the participation of his lawyer, an unprotected client may be induced by opposing counsel into making admissions, waiving confidentiality, or taking positions detrimental to the client's interest without the client realizing it because the client's lawyer is not aware of, and not participating in, the communication.

D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 274 (1997).

The Committee has specifically noted that lawyers generally have a substantial advantage over lay persons in discussing legal matters. This inequality, as well as the integrity of the attorney-client relationships that are intended to keep adverse parties on equal footing, are the core purposes of the Rule.

> Rule 4.2 has at its core the concern that lawyers generally are in a better position, by education and training, to overwhelm a lay party and exploit his lack of legal knowledge in the course of communicating directly with the lay party. Courts and this Committee have noted that the Rule is intended to protect against the lawyer who might coax a statement or settlement or otherwise take advantage of the unsuspecting and momentarily uncounseled lay person. Thus, courts have noted the "difficulty the uncounseled lay person has in marshalling the information and foresight required to conduct negotiations about complex legal issues with a lawyer representing [an adverse party]."
>
> Courts also have observed that Rule 4.2 helps prevent the inadvertent disclosure of privileged information and has "preserved the proper functioning of the legal system" by protecting the integrity of the lawyer-client relationship.

D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 258 (1995).

With these considerations in mind, a lawyer is permitted to counsel his client on party-to-party communications without engaging in an overreach that would compromise any of the purposes underlying Rule 4.2.

Striking the Proper Balance Between Zealous Representation and the Safeguards of Rule 4.2

Comment [2] to Rule 4.2 permits a lawyer to respond to a client's proposal for party-to-party communications and to answer the client's questions regarding such communications. The Committee additionally believes that nothing in Rule 4.2 or the commentary prevents a lawyer from affirmatively suggesting that a client should communicate directly with his opponent-party when, in the lawyer's opinion, the client's objectives may be advanced by such outreach.

Beyond this threshold advice, counsel may assist a client in preparing for party-to-party communications. Counsel may not, however, participate in such communications, in any respect, unless opposing counsel has been advised in advance of such participation and consented to it.

Preparing for Party-to-Party Communications

Party-to-party communications may be carried out through written, telephone, digital (e.g., video conference), or in-person communications. Regardless of the medium, a lawyer may assist his client in preparing for such communications.

Given that a lawyer cannot communicate directly with a represented opponent-party, and cannot use his client for the same purposes, the lawyer should be mindful of not dictating or directing the communications and not coaching the client to seek confidential information, admissions, or binding agreements. The lawyer may, however, do the following:

- Solicit and clarify the client's objectives for the communication or meeting;

[5] Rule 1.2(a) ("A lawyer shall abide by a client's decisions concerning the objectives of representation [subject to certain limits] and shall consult with the client as to the means by which they are to be pursued."); Rule 1.3(a) ("A lawyer shall represent a client zealously and diligently within the bounds of the law.").

[6] Rule 1.3(a), Rule 1.3(b)(1).

[7] Rule 1.4(b).

[8] Conversely, there are relationships and disputes that are facially ill-suited for direct communications between the parties. These include relationships in which the relative bargaining power and sophistication of the parties are significantly disparate. As discussed below, direct communications should not be encouraged where they are likely to be overbearing or harassing.

- Remind the client of previously stated objectives in the litigation and propose objectives for the communication or meeting;
- Assist the client in drafting talking points or questions to present during the meeting;
- Advise the client on how the client should respond to information or questions that the opponent-party may present during the meeting.

The lawyer may not, however, attempt to script the communication or coach the client to handle the communications as the lawyer would. The point of encouraging the parties to speak directly to one another is to use the dynamics between them, and their own voices, to find common ground.[9] When the lawyer's level of assistance in preparing for these communications turns the client into the lawyer's surrogate, it has gone too far.

A lawyer can help his client draft a letter or e-mail to the opponent-party and may even draft such correspondence for his client to send to the opponent-party. But the lawyer may not prepare binding legal documents – i.e., formal statements, admissions, contracts, or settlement agreements –for the client to present to the opponent-party.[10]

Should the parties, in the course of a direct communication, reach an agreement to settle their dispute, counsel may help his client reduce that agreement to writing for subsequent presentation to the opponent-party by his client.

In addition to helping a client prepare for a party-to-party communications, the lawyer should advise his client that the right of the parties to communicate directly with one another is not absolute. Coercive or harassing communications are not permissible.[11]

Furthermore, a lawyer who advises a client about communications with a represented opponent-party should advise her client that the opponent-party may want an opportunity to consult with opposing counsel before entering into any agreements, making admissions, or disclosing confidential information. Under certain circumstances, such consultation should be encouraged by the party initiating the direct party-to-party communications.

The Committee notes that the ABA has published an opinion allowing lawyers to play a greater role in preparing their clients for party-to-party communications, including drafting a settlement agreement for presentation by the client to the opponent-party with the goal of having the opponent-party sign it during the party-to-party meeting. ABA Op. 11-461. The Committee notes that the ABA opinion is based upon ABA Model Rule 4.2, which is structured and written differently than Rule 4.2, and is supported by different commentary. The ABA opinion created some controversy at the time of its publication and was inconsistent with legal ethics opinions issued by numerous state bar associations.[12] The ABA advised members in 2012 that the opinion might be revised,[13] but in the intervening years it has not been revised or superseded. At least one state has rejected it outright and others have not adopted its conclusions.[14] It is also worth noting that the conduct approved in ABA Opinion 11-461 is conditioned upon the inclusion in any document prepared by counsel for the opponent-party's signature of a prominent notice advising the opponent-party to consult his counsel before signing.[15]

Participation in Party-to-Party Communications

Participation in party-to-party communications is limited to the parties themselves unless counsel for one party has sought and received the opposing counsel's consent to attend. This means that it is not permissible for a lawyer to provide advice or commentary to his client while a communication is being conducted – even though technology would permit real-time monitoring and correspondence via email, text, chat, or any other means between the lawyer and the client. This bar on participation includes a bar on silent attendance or observation, in-person, telephonically, virtually, or remotely. Even if a lawyer plans to remain silent, and not communicate with either party, he should not attend a party-to-party communication.

It is possible that one party-to-party communication – an email, a phone call, or a meeting – could lead to a series of communications over time, during which one of the parties is intermittently consulting with his counsel. When this happens, the guidance provided above ("Preparing for Party-to-Party Communications") applies. Although the rules allow counsel to advise his client on a party-to-party communication, they do not allow counsel to negotiate with the opponent-party through his client without providing notice to and obtaining consent from opposing counsel.

Based on D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 258, which generally prohibits an attorney acting pro se from communicating directly with his opponent-party with-

[9] If the lawyer believes the objective of the meeting is something other than finding common ground – on some aspect of the dispute or proceeding, if not on resolution of the matter entirely – she should question whether the proposed meeting is permissible. If, for example, the client wants to solicit information from the opponent-party outside of the rules of discovery, he is free to do so on his own, but he should not be doing so at the instruction of counsel.

[10] The lawyer may, however, share a copy of a binding document with the client and recommend that the client send or present it to his opponent-party if that document has already been provided to opposing counsel.

[11] "A party cannot achieve a settlement from another uncounseled party through 'duress, harassment, or overbearing conduct'." D.C. Legal Eth Op. 258 (1995) (citing Lewis v. S.S. Baune, 534 F.2d 1115, 1122 (3d Cir. 1976)).

[12] See, e.g., Cal. Eth. Op. 1993-131 (prohibiting party-to-party communications that originate with or are directed by attorney for one party; permitting such communications where counsel advises the client on communications originating with and directed by the client; explicitly prohibiting counsel from "drafting documents, correspondence, or other written materials . . . even if they are prepared at the request of the client"); Mass. Bar Ass'n Op. 11-03 (2011) (giving client general advice regarding party-to-party communication is permissible, but preparing and presenting a binding legal document directly to the opposing party is not permissible); State Bar of Mich. CI-1206 (1988) (reviewing and affirming earlier decision holding that lawyer may prepare and share a draft settlement document with client knowing that client will discuss it with – but not present it to obtain signature from – opponent-party; affirming that attorney cannot encourage client to "take action which might tend to interfere with the lawyer-client relationship of an adverse party"); Ass'n Bar of City of New York Eth. Op. 2002-3 ("where the client conceives the idea to communicate with a represented party, [our rules do] not preclude the lawyer from advising the client concerning the substance of the communication. The lawyer may freely advise the client so long as the lawyer does not assist the client inappropriately to seek confidential information or invite the nonclient to take action without the advice of counsel or otherwise to overreach the nonclient.") Or. Eth. Op. 2005-147 ("even if [a client] initiates communication with [an opponent-party], [counsel for the client] must not instruct [the client] to convey a particular message").

[13] James Podgers, On Second Thought, 98-JAN A.B.A. J. 21 (2012).

[14] Martin Cole, Scripting Contacts with Represented Persons, 68-NOV Bench & B. Minn. 12 (2011) (expressly rejecting ABA 11-461); Vir. Legal Eth. Op. 1890 (2021) (affirming earlier opinions prohibiting counsel from scripting a client's communications with opponent-party or directing client to make contact with opponent-party).

[15] The New York ethics rules permit a lawyer to draft papers for his client to present to an opponent-party, but expressly require advance notice to opposing counsel before any party-to-party communications take place. Compare N.Y. Rule of Prof. Conduct 4.2(b) and Comment [11].

out opposing counsel's permission, the Committee also concludes that in-house counsel cannot participate in party-to-party communications without opposing counsel's agreement.

Circumstances Outside the Scope of This Opinion

This Opinion does not address what role counsel may play in advising or preparing a client for party-to-party communications where the opposing party is a government agency. As recognized in Rule 4.2(d), Comments [9] and [10] to Rule 4.2, and related D.C. legal ethics opinions, government agencies have experience and expertise that distinguish them from many non-lawyer clients and are capable of representing their own interests in direct communications initiated by their opponent-parties.[16] Because of this institutional advantage, counsel for an opponent-party is permitted to meet with a governmental entity without the government's lawyer present. See D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 280 (1998). The Committee believes the same reasoning should permit a lawyer greater leeway in preparing his client for a party-to-party communications with a government agency, including the preparation of binding documents for presentation by her client to a government representative in a party-to-party meeting.

Nothing in this Opinion is intended to disturb the provisions of Rule 1.2(c) governing limited scope representations. Should, for example, a lawyer agree to represent a client under Rule1.2(c) for the limited purpose of drafting a contract, the client would be free, subsequently, to present that contract to a potential business partner in a party-to-party meeting without opposing counsel's knowledge or participation because the lawyer is not representing the client in contract negotiations or advising the client on the broader commercial relationship contemplated in the contract. If, however, the limited scope agreement is broader – e.g., to represent the client in securing business partners – the guidelines set forth above ("Preparing for Party-to-Party Communications and Participation in Party-to-Party Communications) would apply. Lawyers should not attempt to evade the general limits described in this Opinion by structuring representation of a client as a series of limited scope representations.

This Opinion has no application to the practice of assisting pro se litigants in preparing court papers, which is discussed in D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 330 (2005). Such conduct is often controlled by court rules and court papers are served on opposing counsel. Thus, the concerns animating this Opinion are not present.

Conclusion

A lawyer may encourage her client to communicate directly with a represented opposing party, without opposing counsel's knowledge or participation. A lawyer may also assist her client in preparing for such communications in several ways, but should not direct the communications or coach the client to seek confidential information, admissions, or binding agreements.

A lawyer may not attend or observe party-to-party communications or assist his client during them. This is so, even though technology would easily allow a lawyer to do so undetected and would allow a client to seek real-time assistance during telephonic, virtual or remote meetings.

As stated above, the duty of zealous and diligent representation is bounded by duties to the legal system and other parties. Whether certain actions cross the fuzzy line between permissible and impermissible is a fact-bound issue. A lawyer should remember to balance these duties and consider his conduct from the perspectives of an objective person and opposing counsel.

Published: March 2023

Ethics Opinion 386

Aggregate Settlements

Introduction

Lawyers frequently represent multiple clients in civil litigation. As the matters proceed, the lawyers may seek to obtain an aggregate settlement for their clients. However, when lawyers attempt to settle matters on behalf of multiple clients, issues may arise that are not present in individual representations. This opinion provides guidance for lawyers on how to navigate the disciplinary rules and advise their clients when representing multiple clients in civil matters that could lead to aggregate settlements.[1]

D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct 1.8(f) states:

> A lawyer who represents two or more clients shall not participate in making an aggregate settlement of the claims for or against the clients, or in a criminal case an aggregated agreement as to guilty or nolo contendere pleas, unless each client gives informed consent in a writing signed by the client after consultation, including disclosure of the existence and nature of all the claims or pleas involved and of the participation of each person in the settlement.[2]

The D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct (D.C. Rules or Rules) do not define the term "aggregate settlement," but ABA Formal Opinion 06-438 (2006) provides that an aggregate settlement "occurs when two or more clients who are represented by the same lawyer together resolve their claims or defenses or pleas."[3] The ALI Principles of the Law of Aggregate Litigation, Section 3.16, defines aggregate settlements as

> (a) . . . a settlement of the claims of two or more individual claimants in which the resolution of the claims is interdependent; (b) The resolution of claims in a non-class aggregate settlement is interdependent if: (1) the defendant's acceptance of the settlement is contingent upon the acceptance by a number

[16] See, e.g., D.C. Legal Eth. Op. 280 (1998) (The concern regarding exploitation of a lay party "is not fully applicable in the governmental context because government officials generally are presumed to be sufficiently capable of resisting legal or policy arguments that are not proper and genuinely persuasive. Moreover, government officials, by virtue of their experience and expertise, should be competent to decide whether to engage in such discussions with opposing counsel without seeking legal advice or having a lawyer present.") In dealings with government officials, however, a lawyer does need to disclose the representation of the adverse client and matter.

[1] Rule 1.8(f) refers to aggregate settlements in civil and criminal matters. This Opinion, however, addresses aggregate settlements in civil matters only.

[2] Under Rule 1.0(b), "`consultation' denotes communication of information reasonably sufficient to permit the client to appreciate the significance of the matter in question." "Informed consent" under Rule 1.0(e) "denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct." Rule 1.0(o) defines writing as "a tangible or electronic record of a communication or representation, including handwriting, typewriting, printing, phot stating, photography, audio or video recording, and e-mail." Under the Rule, a "signed" writing "includes an electronic sound, symbol or process attached to or logically associated with a writing and executed or adopted by a person with the intent to sign the writing."

[3] The ABA Model Rule on aggregate settlements is 1.8(g), which is substantially similar to D.C. Rule 1.8(f). or specified percentage of claimants; or (2) the value of each claim is not based solely on individual case-by-case facts and negotiations.

Although the precise definition of aggregate settlements remains unresolved under the Rules, the core of Rule 1.8(f) is that a lawyer who represents multiple clients in a matter or related matter must obtain all clients' informed consent in writing and provide adequate disclosures in connection with a settlement on their behalf.

As the text of Rule 1.8(f) indicates, lawyers may enter into aggregate settlements on behalf of their clients if the clients are fully informed about the settlement, including the financial or other consideration they and the lawyers' other clients are receiving. In addition, at the outset of a joint representation, pursuant to the conflict-of-interest rules, lawyers must ensure that they are appropriately advising their clients of the risks associated with the multiple representations, including settlement risks. They must also ensure that they provide their clients with accurate information about the nature and scope of the settlement prior to obtaining their clients' written consent to the settlement.

Applicable Rules

- 1.0 (Terminology)
- 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- 1.4 (Communication)
- 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
- 1.8 (Conflict of Interest: Specific Rules)
- 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation)

Inquiry

1. What steps must a lawyer representing multiple clients take to ensure that the clients fully understand the nature and scope of any aggregate settlement into which they may enter?
2. What rules must lawyers follow when representing clients in matters involving aggregate settlements?

Discussion

A. Engagement of Clients in a Joint Representation Involving a Potential Aggregate Settlement

A lawyer who represents multiple clients must initially ensure that there is no conflict between or among the clients that may prohibit the joint representation.[4] If there are conflicts, the lawyer must determine whether the conflicts may be waived, fully disclose the nature of the conflicts to the clients, and obtain the clients' informed consent before proceeding with the joint representation.[5] The lawyer must be mindful that "[i]n a joint representation, a lawyer owes ethical duties of loyalty and confidentiality, as well as the duty to inform, to each client."[6] This means that, throughout the representation, the lawyer may not favor one client over another but rather must treat each equally.

Typically, aggregate settlements occur in the context of the representation of multiple clients in the same matter. Rule 1.8(f), however, is not restricted to the representation of clients in one matter. A lawyer may represent multiple clients, for example, in several matters against the same party for violations of a form agreement. If the lawyer resolves the matters through an aggregate settlement, the lawyer must abide by Rule 1.8(f) and any other applicable rules.

Under Rule 1.8(f), aggregate settlements are permissible, so long as each client provides informed consent in writing after full disclosure by the lawyer of the terms of the settlement.[7] However, a lawyer ordinarily may not rely upon an advance waiver from a client under which the client agrees not to object to the terms of a future aggregate settlement. We agree with the ABA's admonition that the disclosures required "must be made in the context of a specific offer or demand. Accordingly, the informed consent required by the rule generally cannot be obtained in advance of the formulation of such offer or demand." ABA Opinion 06-438. See also In re Hoffman, 883 So. 2d 425, 433 (La. 2004) (informed consent cannot be avoided by obtaining client consent in advance of a future decision by the attorney or by a majority of the clients about the merits of an aggregate settlement); Tax Authority v. Jackson Hewitt, 898 A.2d 512, 522 (N.J. 2006) (the rule "forbids an attorney from obtaining consent in advance from multiple clients that each will abide by a majority decision in respect of an aggregate settlement. Before a client may be bound by a settlement, he or she must have knowledge of the terms of the settlement and agree to them.") Thus, informed consent cannot be obtained from a client until the terms of the settlement are known and have been fully disclosed to the client, which ordinarily is not possible until the proposed settlement is offered or demanded. Otherwise, a client's advance waiver could result in adverse consequences to the client who may ultimately receive an unfavorable settlement to which the client would not have agreed had the terms been fully explained at the time of the settlement.

The information concerning the potential aggregate settlement that the lawyer receives from and discloses to his clients is protected by Rule 1.6. While ordinarily a lawyer cannot disclose the privileged and confidential information of a client to others, in a multiple representation the lawyer is required to disclose relevant information among the joint clients as necessary to keep each client adequately informed; accordingly, at the outset of the joint representation, the lawyer should obtain the informed consent from all clients to share privileged and confidential information among the group.[8] The lawyer should also advise the clients that, should a dispute arise, the attorney-client privilege may no longer be available against other members of the commonly represented group on issues on which they have received advice from counsel. Comment 15 to Rule 1.7 states:

> A particularly important factor in determining the appropriateness of common representation is the effect on client-lawyer confidentiality and the attorney-client privilege. With regard to the attorney-client privilege, the prevailing rule is that, as between commonly represented clients, the privilege does not attach. Hence, it must be assumed that if litigation eventuates between the clients, the privilege will not protect any such communications, and the clients should be so advised.[9]

4 See Rule 1.7(b).

5 See Rule 1.7(c).

6 D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 296 (2000).

7 Rule 1.8(f) specifically refers to aggregate settlements. Rule 1.4(c) generally requires that lawyers communicate all offers of settlement to their clients: "A lawyer who receives an offer of settlement in a civil case . . . shall inform the client promptly of the substance of the communication."

8 See Rule 1.6 cmt. 12; Rule 1.7 cmt. 16.

9 Comment 16 of Rule 1.7 addresses confidentiality in joint representations in further detail, and states:

> As to the duty of confidentiality, continued common representation will almost certainly be inadequate if one client asks the lawyer not to disclose to the other client information relevant to the common representation. This is so because the lawyer has an equal duty of loyalty

If settlement of claims or defenses is at issue in a lawyer's representation of multiple clients, the lawyer should explain the risks involved:

> Differences in willingness to make or accept an offer of settlement are among the risks of common representation of multiple clients by a single lawyer. Under Rule 1.7, this is one of the risks that should be discussed before undertaking the representation, as part of the process of obtaining the clients' informed consent.[10]

B. Entering Into the Aggregate Settlement Agreement

The nature of an aggregate settlement agreement is such that two or more clients of a lawyer resolve the matter at once, through a negotiation. Unlike in a class action, however, the fairness of the settlement is not reviewed by a judge. Class action litigants have inherent protections under Rule 23 of the Federal and D.C. Superior Court Rules of Civil Procedure. Among other things, under Rule 23 in both federal court and the courts of the District of Columbia, notice must be provided to the litigants and the court must approve the settlement. Non-class aggregate settlements do not provide such protections as noted in In Re Kennedy: "The absence of those safeguards to protect collective action clients from the unfair or unethical settlement of their claims necessitates maintaining the protections of Rule 1.8(f) for collective actions such as the one in this case."[11] Although there is no explicit exception in Rule 1.8(f) for aggregate settlements in class actions, there is little doubt that non-class aggregate settlements present particular concerns due to a lack of court oversight of the resolution of the matter, which Rule 1.8(f) is designed to address.

The comments to Rule 1.8(f) set forth what disclosures a lawyer must make to the clients before an aggregate settlement is made or accepted on their behalf: "the lawyer must inform each of them about all the material terms of the settlement, including what the other clients will receive or pay if the settlement or plea offer is accepted."[12] For the settlement to be binding, each client must provide informed consent in writing.

ABA Opinion 06-438 sets forth a list of minimal disclosures a lawyer should make to the clients to whom a settlement offer is made, the pertinent portions of which are as follows:

- The total amount of the aggregate settlement or the result of the aggregate agreement.
- The existence and nature of all of the claims and defenses involved in the aggregate settlement.
- The details of every other client's participation in the aggregate settlement, whether it be their settlement contribution, their settlement receipts, or any other contribution or receipt of something of value as a result of the aggregate resolution.
- The total fees and costs to be paid to the lawyer as a result of the aggregate settlement, if the lawyer's fees and/or costs will be paid, in whole or in part, from the proceeds of the settlement or by an opposing party or parties.
- The method by which the costs (including costs already paid by the lawyer as well as costs to be paid out of the settlement proceeds) are to be apportioned among them.

The ABA opinion's list of minimum disclosures is consistent with Comment 12 to Rule 1.8. The specific information the lawyer should disclose to the clients, however, will ultimately depend upon the nature of the case and the information the clients will need to make intelligent and informed decisions on whether to approve the proposed resolution. As the Kennedy court suggested, in aggregate settlements conflicts between the lawyer and the clients, or between or among the clients, may occur. A lawyer may have an incentive to maximize the amount of money he or she may obtain through settlement. Or the lawyer may wish to streamline the settlement process so that the matter may be resolved more easily and with less administrative burden. This incentive may lead the lawyer to fail to disclose adequately to the clients the full terms of the settlement or to construct arrangements with the clients that run afoul of the rules.

In the Kennedy case, for example, Respondent retained 67% of the settlement funds for himself, and distributed the rest to his clients, without informing them of the terms of the settlement or the percentage he had taken. The court determined that the lawyer had violated Rule 1.8(f), among other rules. Kennedy, 281 A.3d at 42-43. See also Florida Bar v. Kane, 202 So.3d 11 (Fla. 2016) (upholding disbarment of three lawyers who entered into an aggregate settlement in which the lawyers had complete discretion over the disbursement of funds to their clients); In re Gatti, 333 P.3d 994, 1004 (Or. 2014) (lawyer violated rule on aggregate settlement by not obtaining clients' informed consent, in writing, to the formula he used to divide the defendants' lump-sum settlement offers).

An arrangement that some lawyers have employed in the past is obtaining the clients' advance consent to accept the majority's decision on whether to accept the terms of the aggregate settlement. Such an approach, however, is impermissible. The lawyer has a duty to all the clients. To the extent that one or more clients disagree with the terms of the aggregate settlement, the settlement cannot proceed. Under Rule 1.2(a), a lawyer "shall abide by a client's decision whether to accept an offer of settlement of a matter. In a criminal case, the lawyer shall abide by the client's decision, after consultation with the lawyer, as to a plea to be entered." See also D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion 289 ("[Rule 1.2(a)] is designed to preserve the client's right to accept or reject a settlement offer, and it requires that a client be able to exercise his or her judgment at the time the offer is communicated . . . [A] client's right to accept or reject a settlement offer is absolute. . ").

Accordingly, it is ultimately each client's decision, not a decision for a majority of clients in a multiple representation, whether to accept or reject a settlement. Indeed, many courts have determined that "majority rule" arrangements violate Rule 1.8(f) or its equivalent. See, e.g., The Tax Authority, Inc. v. Jackson Hewitt, Inc., 898 A/2d 512. 522 (N.J. 2006); Knisley v. City of Jacksonville, > to each client, and each client has the right to be informed of anything bearing on the representation that might affect that client's interests and the right to expect that the lawyer will use that information to that client's benefit . . . The lawyer should, at the outset of the common representation and as part of the process of obtaining each client's informed consent, advise each client that information relevant to the common representation will be shared, and explain the circumstances in which the lawyer may have to withdraw from any or all representations if one client later objects to continued common representation or sharing of such information.

Moreover, there may be situations in which the lawyer must disclose information received from one joint to other joint clients, even if the disclosing client asks that the information be kept in confidence. See D.C. LEO 327 (2005).

[10] Rule 1.8 cmt. 12.

[11] In re Kennedy, 281 A.3d 36, 42-43 (D.C. 2022).

[12] See Rule 1.8 cmt. 12.

147 Ill. App. 3d 116, 121 (1986) ("[T]he arrangement presented allowing the majority to govern the rights of the minority is violative of the basic tenets of the attorney-client relationship in that it delegates to the attorney powers which allow him to act not only contrary to the wishes of his client, but to act in a manner disloyal to his client and to his client's interests."); Hayes v. Eagle-Picher Industries, Inc., 513 F.2d 892, 894-95 (10th Cir. 1975).

Similarly, the Rules do not permit the construction of a committee or smaller group of jointly represented clients to decide for the entire group whether to accept an aggregate settlement, or other like arrangements. See, e.g., Abbott v. Kidder Peabody & Co., 42 F. Supp. 2d 1046, 1050-51 (D. Colo. 1999). While an appointed committee may try to accept only an aggregate settlement that it deems fair to all litigants, each individual client is entitled to determine whether to accept or reject a settlement after being fully informed of its terms.

Issues about a lawyer's ability to continue to represent multiple clients typically arise when one or more clients approve, and others reject, a settlement proposal. The lawyer may or may not be able to continue to represent any of the clients. A lawyer confronted with such a scenario should carefully review Rules 1.6, 1.7, 1.8, 1.9, and 1.16 for guidance. In particular, the lawyer will need to determine, among other things, whether continuing representation of one or more clients will be adversely affected by representation of, or continuing duties to, the other clients. Further, depending on the particular facts, the lawyer may or may not need to obtain the informed consent from all clients to continue to represent all clients or a subset of clients in the matter.

C. Other Issues

Non-class settlements that may involve hundreds or thousands of plaintiffs present special challenges. It may be difficult to obtain the approval of every plaintiff to such an aggregate settlement. The clients may be concerned about their privacy, not wanting every other jointly represented client to learn about the details of their respective case and the amount of funds they will receive. Individual clients may also be concerned about the settlement becoming public. Or they may simply have different views on the terms of a settlement.

The language of Rule 1.8(f) is helpful in resolving these issues. An attorney must disclose to each individual client "the existence and nature of all the claims or pleas involved and of the participation of each person in the settlement." The rule does not require that the client's name and the personal details of each client's claim be disclosed. Accordingly, with the clients' written consent, where privacy concerns are at issue, a lawyer may be able to reveal the nature of each individual's claim without disclosing the specific identity of each individual client.[13]

Conclusion

The representation of multiple clients creates unique issues concerning conflicts, confidentiality, and duties of loyalty, among others, of which lawyers need to be mindful. Representing multiple clients in settlement discussions touches upon all these issues and more. It is critical that lawyers fully inform their clients at the outset of the representation of the potential conflicts that can occur in the context of settlement discussions, and that they provide complete information to their clients about the nature of any settlement proposal, including the amounts they and other clients will receive and full details of the settlement, so that the clients can provide informed consent in writing, or interpose any objections they may have, to the terms of the settlement.

Published: November 2023

Ethics Opinion 387

Serving as Local Counsel for a Matter Being Litigated in a District of Columbia Court

The D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Helpline regularly receives calls from D.C. lawyers seeking clarification regarding their ethical obligations when they serve as local counsel for lawyers not admitted to practice in the District of Columbia. This Opinion addresses the ethical obligations of D.C. lawyers who are serving as local counsel in matters litigated in District of Columbia courts. It draws on an article by D.C. Bar legal ethics counsel that appeared in the July/August 2022 edition of Washington Lawyer.[1]

Applicable Rules

- 1.0 (Terminology)
- 1.1 (Competence)
- 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- 1.4 (Communication)
- 1.5 (Fees)
- 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General)
- 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
- 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification: General Rule)
- 3.1 (Meritorious Claims and Contentions)
- 3.3 (Candor to Tribunal)
- 4.1 (Truthfulness in Statements to Others)
- 5.1 (Responsibilities of Partners, Managers, and Supervisory Lawyers)
- 8.3 (Reporting Professional Misconduct)

Discussion

Although not defined in the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct,[2] the term "local counsel" is commonly used in the District of Columbia to describe a D.C. lawyer who has been engaged by a client that wants to litigate a case before a D.C. tribunal using the client's out-of-state attorney as primary counsel.[3] Local counsel commonly helps the out-of-state attorney, or "lead counsel," to obtain pro hac vice admission to the local courts per D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) Rule 49(c)(7).[4] Local counsel does not represent lead counsel; rather, both local counsel and lead counsel represent the mutual client. Local counsel is not typically affiliated with the out-of-state attorney, but a D.C. attorney can serve as local counsel to other lawyers from the D.C.

[13] James Podgers, On Second Thought, 98-JAN A.B.A. J. 21 (2012).

[1] Erika Stillabower, A Roadmap for Local Counsel, WASHINGTON LAWYER, July/August 2022, at 54.

[2] The term "local counsel" also does not appear in the American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct or the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers.

[3] Local counsel are also engaged for non-litigation matters. For example, out-of-state real estate attorneys engage local counsel with specialized knowledge about land records systems to avoid title defects. They may also use local counsel to understand local transfer taxes and zoning matters. Although local counsel in non-litigation matters also have ethical obligations to the client, these types of local counsel scenarios are beyond the scope of this opinion.

[4] Federal courts have their own requirements and procedures for appearances by out-of-state attorneys. See, e.g., D.D.C. LCvR 83.2(c), governing admission pro hac vice in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

attorney's firm who are seeking pro hac vice admission to D.C. courts.

DCCA Rule 49(c)(7) provides limited guidance regarding the duties of D.C. local counsel. The rule, which was amended in June 2022,[5] requires a pro hac vice applicant to "arrange[] to be supervised . . . by a D.C. Bar Member"[6] and defines "supervise" as "mak[ing] reasonable efforts to ensure that another person conforms to the applicable Rules of Professional Conduct."[7]

In its order adopting the Rule 49(c)(7) amendments, which were proposed by the D.C. Committee on Unauthorized Practice of Law (CUPL), the D.C. Court of Appeals explained:

> The requirements for "supervision" of a pro hac vice attorney by local counsel have been revised. D.C. App. R. 49(c)(7)(A)(ii). The current Rule refers to supervision by cross-referencing Super. Ct. Civ. R. 101. That Rule, however, was amended in 2020 to remove the supervision provisions. The prior version of R. 101 required local counsel to "at all times be prepared to go forward with the case, . . . sign all documents subsequently filed[,] and . . . attend all subsequent proceedings in the action unless this latter requirement is waived by the judge presiding at the proceedings in question." Super. Ct. Civ. R. 101(a)(3) (2019). The CUPL's original proposal was to move the requirements of R. 101(a)(3) in this court's rule. The CUPL has subsequently recommended that, instead of simply carrying forward the requirements of a Superior Court rule that is no longer in effect, the court should replace those requirements with the requirement that the local attorney agree to "supervise" the pro hac vice attorney, with "supervise" defined to mean "to make reasonable efforts to ensure that another person conforms to the applicable Rules of Professional Conduct." D.C. App. R. 49(b)(9). The court adopts the latter approach.[8]

Despite the paucity of guidance regarding the specific duties of local counsel beyond "mak[ing] reasonable efforts to ensure [lead counsel] conforms to the applicable Rules of Professional Conduct," a local counsel's obligations under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct remain inviolable notwithstanding her designation as "local" counsel.[9]

This opinion highlights some of a local counsel's duties to the client and to the court in the District of Columbia.

A. SCOPE OF REPRESENTATION

Local counsel's role in a representation can range from narrowly limited to substantive and comparable to that of co-counsel or even lead counsel. In some cases, the out-of-state attorney may assist only behind-the-scenes without seeking pro hac vice admission, so long as her involvement does not amount to unauthorized practice of law under Rule 49(a).

Where the local counsel's role will be narrow, it is good practice for local counsel to explicitly limit the scope of his representation in writing. Rule 1.2(c) states that "[a] lawyer may limit the scope of the representation if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances and the client gives informed consent."[10] While we do not here opine on whether local counsel arrangements are always subject to Rule 1.2(c), it is advisable for lawyers who anticipate a limited "local counsel" role to communicate that understanding to the client and to obtain informed consent.

Memorializing the local counsel's limited role in writing to the client is a preferable practice.[11] An engagement letter stating that the lawyer will be serving as "local counsel" to assist lead counsel and documenting that the client agreed to a narrow role for local counsel can protect local counsel from malpractice claims stemming from missteps made by lead counsel that are outside the scope of the local counsel's responsibility. Indeed, it is good practice for such an agreement to delineate the tasks (or the kinds of tasks) for which local counsel will be responsible, as well as those for which local counsel will not be responsible.

If local counsel is working with lead counsel pursuant to a court order appointing counsel, the court's order controls the scope of representation. In complex litigation, courts will often define the responsibilities of lead counsel and limit the participation of attorneys not appointed to leadership roles. A prudent practice would be to include any such limits, or incorporate them by reference, into the engagement letter.

B. DUTY TO COMMUNICATE

Regardless of the scope of local counsel's participation in the representation, her ethical obligations to the client may not be delegated or contractually diminished.[12] For example, local counsel remains bound by Rule 1.4, which sets forth her duties of communication with the client:

> (a) A lawyer shall keep a client reasonably informed about the status of a matter and promptly comply with reasonable requests for information.
>
> (b) A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation.
>
> (c) A lawyer who receives an offer of settlement in a civil case or proffered plea bargain in a criminal case shall inform the client promptly of the substance of the communication.

5 On June 22, 2022, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals adopted changes to certain provisions of DCCA Rule 49, including the provisions pertaining to pro hac vice admission, which became effective in August 2022.

6 DCCA Rule 49(c)(7)(A)(ii).

7 DCCA Rule 49(b)(9).

8 DCCA Order No. M-227-21, at 2 (June 22, 2022).

9 See In re Bailey, 283 A.3d 1199, 1203 & 1206 n.1 (D.C. 2022) (noting that lawyer's ethical obligations not altered by "local co counsel" designation). See also In re Fay, 111 A.3d 1025, 1030 (D.C. 2015) ("By asserting his bar membership to aid [lead counsel] in presenting [the client's] claim, respondent, like local counsel, assumed the ethical responsibilities and duties of the [lead counsel]."). Accord State Bar of N.M. Ethics Advisory Comm., Formal Op. 2020 01, at 1 (2020) ("A lawyer who enters an appearance in a matter as local counsel in association with another lawyer who is admitted pro hac vice has the same duties under the Rules as in every matter in which the attorney appears."); Utah State Bar, Ethics Op. 17 09, at 2-3 (2017) ("There is nothing in the Utah Rules of Professional Conduct . . . that limits the duties of an attorney admitted to the Utah State Bar who happens to be acting as local counsel for a pro hac vice attorney."); Ass'n of the Bar of the City of N.Y., Formal Op. 2015 4, at 1 (2015) ("Merely being designated as 'local counsel' does not necessarily limit the attorney's role, nor does it narrow her ethical obligations to the client").

10 General guidance on limited scope representations may be found in D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 330 (2005).

11 See Rule 1.2 cmt. [6] ("In all matters involving limited scope representation, it is generally prudent for a lawyer to state in writing any limitation on representation, provide the client with a written summary of considerations discussed, and to receive a written informed consent from the client to the lawyer's limited representation"); see also Ass'n of the Bar of the City of N.Y., Formal Op. 2015 4, at 3 (2015) ("Even where a writing is not required, the better practice is to obtain the client's consent in writing.").

12 See Philadelphia Bar Ass'n Prof'l Guidance Comm., Op. 2019-1, at 1 (2019) (noting that although "the scope of [local] counsel's professional services can be limited with client consent, . . . fiduciary duties such as loyalty and communication are not narrowed.").

Ideally, local counsel might regularly update the client jointly with lead counsel. That said, it may be reasonable under Rule 1.4 for lead counsel to assume responsibility for client communications.[13] Local and lead counsel should resolve at the outset of the representation their expectations about which lawyer should be in direct contact with the client and under what circumstances local counsel should contact the client directly. Although local counsel can generally rely on lead counsel's representations that lead counsel will communicate relevant information to the client, should local counsel learn that lead counsel's communication did not occur or is otherwise insufficient to satisfy the rule, local counsel must take steps to ensure the client is fully apprised consistent with Rule 1.4.[14] If the reason behind lead counsel's failure to communicate with the client—or comply with any other D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct or regulation—stems from unawareness of the relevant D.C. rules or practices, local counsel should recognize that she is likely regarded as the expert on D.C. rules and practices, and should act accordingly. Further, should local counsel become aware of any malfeasance or misfeasance by lead counsel that is seriously prejudicial to the client's interests (e.g., willful disregard of court orders), local counsel has a duty to inform the client.[15]

In addition to communicating with the client, local counsel should also keep open channels of communication with lead counsel as they have a duty to work together and communicate with one another with the common goal of representing a client's interests competently and diligently.[16]

C. WRITTEN NOTICE OF FEES

Rule 1.5(b) requires a lawyer who has not regularly represented a client to provide written notice to the client before or a reasonable time after the representation commences of "the basis or rate of the fee, the scope of the lawyer's representation, and the expenses for which the client will be responsible."[17]

Although local counsel may enter into a fee arrangement with the client that is separate from lead counsel's, it is not uncommon for lead counsel to assume primary responsibility for billing the client.[18] In such instances Rule 1.5(e), which pertains to fees shared between lawyers who are not in the same firm, requires that:

> (1) The division is in proportion to the services performed by each lawyer or each lawyer assumes joint responsibility for the representation;
>
> (2) The client is advised, in writing, of the identity of the lawyers who will participate in the representation, of the contemplated division of responsibility, and of the effect of the association of lawyers outside the firm on the fee to be charged;
>
> (3) The client gives informed consent to the arrangement; and
>
> (4) The total fee is reasonable.

As Comment [14] to Rule 1.5 notes, "[t]he Rule does not require disclosure to the client of the share that each lawyer is to receive but it does require the client be informed of the identity of the lawyers sharing the fee, their respective responsibilities in the representation, and the effect of the association of lawyers outside the firm of the fee charged." Further, it is not enough for local counsel to speak with the client about the local counsel arrangement or division of responsibilities; local counsel must ensure that the client receives written notice of the arrangement as "written disclosure is the crux of the rule."[19] Although the purpose of Rule 1.5(e) is to minimize controversy and protect clients from billing practices that serve only to drive up costs, the exercise of clearly delineating responsibility for the matter is particularly helpful in the context of lead counsel-local counsel relationships, as expectations of each may vary significantly with each new engagement.

D. CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

Lawyers approached to serve as local counsel must remember that the conflict of interest rules— D.C. Rules 1.7, 1.8, and 1.9— apply to them regardless of the division of responsibilities between local and lead counsel.[20]

Principles of imputed disqualification do not typically apply to a local counsel-lead counsel arrangement when local counsel is not associated with lead counsel or her law firm. Under Rule 1.10, a lawyer's conflicts are imputed to all lawyers within a firm when the lawyer is deemed "associated with" the firm. Although DCCA Rule 49(c)(7)(A)(ii) previously required lead counsel to make arrangements to be "associated with" local counsel, the 2022 amendments changed the term "associated with" to "supervised by."[21] Indeed, local counsel is more akin to a temporary contract attorney working on a single project who is physically segregated from the firm's office space and who has no access to the confidential information of the firm's other clients. In such an arrangement, the temporary contract lawyer would not be considered "associated with" the hiring firm and the temporary contract attorney's conflicts

[13] Indeed, the client may prefer or expect lead counsel to act as the intermediary between local counsel and the client. See Ass'n of the Bar of the City of N.Y., Formal Op. 2015-4, at 4 (noting "the long-standing, customary practice of lead counsel acting as intermediary between local counsel and the client").

[14] Id. at 5 ("if local counsel knows or has reason to know that lead counsel is not adequately updating the client concerning the case, she must take steps to remedy the omission, even if it means bypassing lead counsel and communicating directly with the client.").

[15] See e.g. Philadelphia Bar Ass'n Prof'l Guidance Comm., Op. 2019-1. See also ABA Standing Comm. Ethics & Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 481 (2018) (discussing a lawyer's duty to inform client of material error).

[16] See Rules 1.1 and 1.3.

[17] Rule 1.5(b). See also Rule 1.2 cmt. [6] ("Rule 1.5(b) requires a lawyer to communicate in writing the scope of the lawyer's representation when the lawyer has not regularly represented a client.").

[18] See Rule 1.5 cmt. [9] ("A division of fee is a single billing to a client covering the fee of two or more lawyers who are not in the same firm. A division of fee facilitates association of more than one lawyer in a matter in which neither alone could serve the client as well, and most often is used when the fee is contingent and the division is between a referring lawyer and a trial specialist.").

[19] In re Confidential (J.E.S.), 670 A.2d 1343, 1344-45 (D.C. 1996) (informal admonition warranted where respondent failed to meet the requirements of Rule 1.5(e)(2). While respondent's retainer agreement stated generally that co-counsel would be obtained to assist with the case, it did not identify the name of co-counsel, omitted entirely the division of responsibilities between respondent and co-counsel, and excluded language regarding the effect of lawyers outside the firm on the fee to be charged, resulting in the client never gaining "an understand[ing] of [what] each lawyer would do.").

[20] See also Rules 1.11, 1.12, and 1.18 related to former government employment, third-party neutrals, and prospective clients.

[21] Notwithstanding the former language of the rule, the Committee does not believe that the prior version of Rule 49 obligated lawyers to impute conflicts between the firms of local counsel and lead counsel.

would not be imputed to that firm.[22] Similarly, local counsel working out of her own D.C. office on a single matter with no access to confidential information concerning lead counsel's other clients would not be "associated with" lead counsel or lead counsel's law firm (or vice versa) for imputation purposes. As a practical matter, this means that each lawyer's conflicts review would be limited to her own law firm's current and prior representations with respect to the matter at hand.

E. DUTIES TO THE COURT

Similar to local counsel's duties to the client, local counsel's ethical obligations to the court apply notwithstanding a "local counsel" designation. As an example, local counsel has a nondelegable duty to comply with Rule 3.1:

> A lawyer shall not bring or defend a proceeding, or assert or controvert an issue therein, unless there is a basis in law and fact for doing so that is not frivolous, which includes a good-faith argument for an extension, modification, or reversal of existing law.[23]

Thus, regardless of whether local counsel participates substantively in a matter, she is obligated to refrain from filing frivolous claims, pleadings, motions, or other documents.[24]

In addition, to the extent that local counsel learns a fraud has been perpetrated in a court, local counsel must take reasonable remedial measures. Comment [8] to Rule 3.3 states: "If the lawyer's client is implicated in the fraud, the lawyer should ordinarily first call upon the client to rectify the fraud. If the client is unwilling to do so, the lawyer should consider other remedial measures. The lawyer may not, however, disclose information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6, unless the client has used the lawyer's services to further a crime or fraud and disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(d)."[25]

F. DUTIES UPON WITHDRAWAL

A local counsel who has entered an appearance in a matter is obligated to abide by the tribunal's rules with respect to withdrawing from the representation.[26] Should a lawyer serving as local counsel conclude that she has a duty or right to seek to withdraw under Rule 1.16(a) or (b), the client and lead counsel must be timely informed.

G. REPORTING PROFESSIONAL MISCONDUCT

Pursuant to D.C. Rule 5.1(b) and DCCA Rule 49(c)(7)(A)(ii), local counsel has a duty to supervise lead counsel by making reasonable efforts to ensure that lead counsel conforms to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. To the extent lead counsel's conduct does not conform to the rules, local counsel should consider her obligations to the court, her client, and the opposing party.

As explained in Comment [1] to Rule 8.3, "[s]elf-regulation of the legal profession requires that members of the profession initiate disciplinary investigation when they know of a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct." Accordingly, the rule imposes on all lawyers a mandatory duty to report substantial misconduct. Rule 8.3(a) states:

> A lawyer who knows that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness, or fitness as a lawyer in other respects, shall inform the appropriate professional authority.

Rule 8.3(a) "does not require disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6 or other law."[27] Information protected by Rule 1.6 includes confidences preserved by the attorney-client privilege and secrets "gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate" or that would be embarrassing or otherwise detrimental to the client if disclosed.[28] Generally, local counsel would have to obtain the informed consent of the client before reporting misconduct by lead counsel that occurred during the representation.

Conclusion

The D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct make no distinction between "local counsel" and "lead counsel." A lawyer serving as local counsel for litigation in a D.C. court remains subject to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct and must make reasonable efforts to ensure that non-D.C. lead counsel conforms to all applicable ethics and court rules.

Published: January 2024

Ethics Opinion 388

Attorneys' Use of Generative Artificial Intelligence in Client Matters

Advances in technology have greatly improved the ways in which lawyers provide legal services. What technology has not done is alter lawyers' fundamental ethical obligations, and specifically, the duties lawyers owe to their clients—and to the courts. We anticipate that both of these statements will hold true with respect to lawyers' use of generative artificial intelligence (GAI). Due to the rapid development of technology in this area, we recognize that some of the concerns raised in this opinion may be resolved or mooted for particular products in the future, perhaps even in the near future.[1]

The Rules of Professional Conduct require lawyers to be competent. Competence includes understanding enough about any technology the lawyer uses in legal practice to be reasonably confident that the technology will advance the [22] See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion 352 (2010); see also D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Opinion 255 (1995) ("[T]he association of a lawyer with a firm on an ad hoc, case-by-case basis does not create that kind of continuing relationship, triggering imputation . . . of the individual lawyer's disqualifications to the firm—except with respect to the individual matters on which the lawyer is associated with the firm—so long as the firm does not create the impression among its clients or the public at large that such a continuing relationship exists.").

23 Local counsel must also comply with rules imposed by state and federal courts. See, e.g., D.C. Sup. Ct. R. Civ. P. 11(b) ("By presenting to the court a pleading, written motion, or other paper, including electronic filing—whether by signing, filing, submitting, or later advocating it—an attorney . . . certifies that [she has met the requirements of the rule] to the best of the person's knowledge, information, and belief, formed after an inquiry reasonable under the circumstances"); Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(b) (same).

[24] See Ass'n of the Bar of the City of N.Y., Formal Op. 2015-4, at 4 ("In our view, local counsel cannot reasonably limit the representation to exclude her ethical duty to avoid filing frivolous claims."). Note, however, that when a lawyer represents a defendant in a criminal proceeding, or a respondent in a proceeding that could result in involuntary institutionalization, Rule 3.1 requires that, "if the client elects to go to trial or to a contested fact-finding hearing, [a lawyer shall] nevertheless so defend the proceeding as to require that the government carry its burden of proof."

[25] See also Rule 4.1(b) (prohibiting knowing failure to disclose material facts to third persons when necessary to avoid assisting a criminal or fraudulent act by the client except when disclosure is prohibited by Rule 1.6).

[26] Rule 1.16(c).

[27] Rule 8.3(c).

[28] Rule 1.6(b).

[1] This opinion is based on information available to the Committee as of the second quarter of 2024.

client's interests in the representation. Separately, the lawyer should also be reasonably confident that use of and reliance on the technology will not be inconsistent with any of the lawyer's other obligations under the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Lawyers commonly adopt and use recently developed technology in their practices to achieve competitive advantage and gain efficiencies in providing legal services to their clients. Although technological innovation offers definite advantages, it comes with risks and the potential for adverse consequences. All of this holds true with respect to GAI. It can be a great boon to the practicing lawyer but—as recent events have shown—can sometimes be an untrustworthy and incompetent legal assistant.

Lawyers should understand that GAI products are not search engines that accurately report hits on existing data in a constantly updated database. The information available to a GAI product is confined to the dataset on which the GAI has been trained. That dataset may be incomplete as to the relevant topic, out of date, or biased in some way. More fundamentally, GAI is not programed to accurately report the content of existing information in its dataset. Instead, GAI is attempting to create new content. In the case of a request for something in writing, GAI uses a statistical process to predict what the next word in the sentence should be. That is what the "generative" in GAI means: the GAI generates something new that has the properties its dataset tells it the user is expecting to see.

GAI products sometimes "hallucinate," meaning they make up things that do not exist. As discussed below and as has been widely reported, a GAI product fabricated the names and citations of several "cases" that did not exist in response to a request for citations to support a particular legal position in a brief. Believing the GAI to be a "super search engine," a lawyer included the fake cites in the brief without checking them. That matter ended very badly for the lawyers who signed the brief. Current GAI for a general audience is not a reliable substitute for traditional fact- and cite-checking, and lawyers who blindly rely on outputs produced by GAI do so at considerable peril.[2]

Lawyers also should understand that many GAI products currently on the market are specifically designed to collect and use information received from users—which may include client confidences and secrets—for the GAI's own training and for transmission to future users of the technology. That raises potential issues under D.C. Rule 1.6, which requires lawyers not to reveal client confidences or secrets to third parties without the client's informed consent.

Regarding confidential client information, lawyers should determine whether the product will save information that the lawyers provide to the GAI, and whether the lawyers' interaction with the GAI product will affect the answers the GAI gives to future users of the product outside of the lawyer's law firm. Affirmative answers to either of those questions signal a need for caution. Depending on the circumstances, lawyers should either identify a different or more advanced GAI product that can be trusted with Client Confidential Information[3] (or negotiate with the product vendor for improved confidentiality terms to make the first product trustworthy), or input only data that is not Client Confidential Information.

For proceedings before a court or other tribunal—especially but not only those that have adopted rules or issued orders regulating the use of GAI—lawyers must be attentive to their duty of candor to the tribunal and their fairness obligations to opposing parties and counsel. Lawyers should also be attentive to their obligations as to the client file with respect to their use of the GAI. Additionally, lawyers whose fee agreements provide for fees based solely on time spent may only bill for the time the lawyers actually spend, even if the GAI reduces the time the lawyers devote to the matter. Absent a prior agreement, a lawyer cannot charge separately for the perceived value to a client of the work done by the GAI, though they may pass through any out-of-pocket expenses for GAI applications where the client has agreed to pay for out-of-pocket expenses. Finally, these issues implicate lawyers' duties of supervision. Under Rules 5.1 and 5.3, a lawyer should take reasonable measures to ensure that any supervised lawyer's or nonlawyer's use of GAI conforms to the Rules of Professional Conduct and the principles discussed in this opinion.

Applicable Rules

- 1.1 (Competence)
- 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- 1.5 (Fees)
- 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- 1.16 (Client File)
- 3.3 (Candor to Tribunal)
- 3.4 (Fairness to Opposing Party and Counsel
- 5.1 (Responsibilities of Partners, Managers, and Supervisory Lawyers)
- 5.3 (Responsibilities Regarding Nonlawyer Assistants)
- 8.4 (Misconduct)

Discussion

Most lawyers are not computer programmers or engineers and are not expected to have those specialized skills. As technology that can be used in legal practice evolves, however, lawyers who rely on the technology should have a reasonable and current understanding of how to use the technology with due regard for its potential dangers and limitations. So it is with generative AI technology. The widely reported events culminating with Mata v. Avianca, Inc., 678 F. Supp. 3d 443 (S.D.N.Y. 2023), provide an object lesson.

The Mata debacle began with a lawyer's fundamental misunderstanding of a technology that was new to him. The principal plaintiff's lawyer in that case regularly practiced in state courts in New York. The legal research database that he normally used was complete as to state court caselaw but had only limited access to federal caselaw, which became a problem when a case he had filed in state court was removed to federal court. He needed a new legal research tool.

As the lawyer testified at the sanctions hearing, "I had heard about this new site which I assumed – I falsely assumed was like a super search engine called ChatGPT, and that's what I used." 678 F. Supp. 3d at 456. With that incorrect understanding, he used ChatGPT to look for cases upon which he could rely in opposing a motion to dismiss his client's complaint.

Unbeknownst to the lawyer, the Chat-

[2] Although not the subject of this opinion, lawyers should also be aware that GAI has the potential to facilitate outright fraud by bad actors. For example, if prompted to do so, GAI can produce genuine loking videos or photographs of things that never happened, and "recordings" making it sound like a person said something that they never said.

[3] As discussed below, Rule 1.6 requires lawyers to maintain the confidentiality of certain information acquired during the professional relationship. This obligation extends to both "confidences" (defined by the rule as "information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law") and "secrets" (defined as other information gained in the relationship "that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client."). This opinion will refer to information protected by Rule 1.6 as "Client Confidential Information." Unless otherwise indicated, any citations to a "Rule" in this opinion will be to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

GPT tool that he consulted was not a legal research tool built to search a comprehensive library (a database) of previously published judicial opinions. The "free" version of ChatGPT that he chose had no such library. Indeed, ChatGPT explicitly disclaimed having a database in responding to an inquiry sent in October 2023 (after the events just described):

> I don't have a "database" in the traditional sense. I generate responses based on the text data I was trained on up until my last knowledge update in September 2021. My responses are generated by predicting what comes next in a given text prompt, drawing upon the patterns and information present in the text data I was trained on. I don't have access to the internet or real-time databases, and my knowledge is static, meaning I can't provide information on events or developments that have occurred after my last update.

The technical term for what ChatGPT and many other GAI programs use is a "data*set*" rather than a data*base*.[4] A dataset may be thought of as a limited pool of materials that illustrate a premise on which GAI learns the vocabulary necessary to generate a reasonable-sounding answer to a user's questions – without any regard for the truth of the answer. For GAI to generate case citations, for example, the dataset merely needs to include information indicating the proper format in which case citations normally appear, e.g., Party A v. Party B, 100 F.3d 100 (D.C. Cir. 2020). For the GAI to produce citations for divorce cases, it might rely on information in the dataset establishing that the parties in divorce cases tend to have the same last name, and that such cases are published in a state reporting service rather than a federal reporter. Similarly, to generate criminal case citations, the GAI might rely on information that a government entity normally appears on the plaintiff side of the caption.

Had the lawyer in Mata understood that only a limited dataset was available to ChatGPT, he presumably would not have felt comfortable using the platform to research federal case law. As ChatGPT's disclaimer statement establishes, its initial training might or might not have included subject matter relevant to the Mata attorney's research; even if it had, that information would no longer have been current.

A more fundamental problem is that large language GAI tools like ChatGPT simply are not built to supply accurate answers even based on the limited datasets available to them, at least not yet. Instead, they respond to text prompts by creating "new" content that is statistically similar to what they have seen before:

> Generative AI refers to deep-learning models that can take raw data — say, all of Wikipedia or the collected works of Rembrandt — and "learn" to generate statistically probable outputs when prompted. At a high level, generative models encode a simplified representation of their training data and draw from it to create a new work that's similar, but not identical, to the original data.

Kim Martineau, What is Generative AI? | IBM Research Blog,[5] https://research.ibm.com/blog/what-is-generative-AI (Apr. 20, 2023). For example, a graphical GAI program might be prompted to generate a portrait of a horse that appears to have been painted by Rembrandt. But that output is new, different from what came before, and certainly not a genuine Rembrandt painting.

"Statistically probable outputs" are not what a lawyer searching for existing controlling authorities needs or wants. Generative AI offered to a broad audience is simply no substitute for the familiar legal research tools provided by trusted services like LexisNexis and Westlaw, which have databases of previously published laws, regulations, and cases that are constantly updated as laws change and new cases are decided.[6]

In the Mata case, ChatGPT appeared to provide the lawyer with exactly what he requested: six case citations for the propositions the lawyer needed to defeat a motion to dismiss. Unfortunately for the lawyer, however, those cases—reported by ChatGPT with case numbers, court names, citations, and authorship by real judges—did not exist.

Why did ChatGPT make up cases from whole cloth? As the IBM Research Blog explains:

> Many generative models, including those powering ChatGPT, can spout information that sounds authoritative but isn't true (sometimes called "hallucinations") or is objectionable and biased. Generative models can also inadvertently ingest information that's personal or copyrighted in their training data and output it later, creating unique challenges for privacy and intellectual property laws.

Id. Put differently, "The best way to think about this is you are chatting with an omniscient, eager-to-please intern who sometimes lies to you." Emma Bowman, A New AI Chatbot Might Do Your Homework for You. But It's Still Not an A+ Student, National Public Radio (Dec. 19, 2022) (quoting Ethan Mollick, a professor at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School of Business). Similarly:

> "There are still many cases where you ask it a question and it'll give you a very impressive-sounding answer that's just dead wrong," said Oren Etzioni, the founding CEO of the Allen Institute for AI, who ran the research nonprofit until recently. "And, of course, that's a problem if you don't carefully verify or corroborate its facts."

Id. For a visual demonstration of GAI hallucinations in action, see Gerrit De Vynck, Jhaan Elker and Tyler Remmel, The Future of AI Video Is Here, Super Weird Flaws and All, Washington Post (Feb. 28, 2024).

Again, had the Mata lawyer known of the risk of hallucinations at the outset, he presumably would have acted differently by, at a minimum, performing a traditional cite check on the cases ChatGPT claimed to have found.[7] He would not have done what he did next.

[4] Such GAI tools are initially trained on a finite dataset that, unlike a traditional database, may not be updated regularly. See generally https://atlan.com/dataset-vs-database/#:~:text=A%20dataset%20is%20like%20a,for%20ongoing%20data%20management%20tasks and https://databasetown.com/dataset-vs-database-key-differences/. The initial training might not include the subject matter relevant to whatever the lawyer wants to ask about and, even if it did initially, that information might not have been kept current.

[5] This link and the other links in this opinion were last visited in April of 2024. Over time, the content of information at links may change or the links themselves may stop working. The links in this opinion will not be checked or updated after publication of this opinion.

[6] We understand that both Westlaw and Lexis are now offering GAI-assisted cite checking products. See Westlaw Quick Check and Lexis + AI. While we are unable to vouch for either product, we understand that they seek to make their legal research databases as complete and up to date as technology allows.

[7] A check of ChatGPT's policies many months after the widely-reported Mata debacle yielded this disclaimer:

> A note about accuracy: Services like ChatGPT generate responses by reading a user's request and, in response, predicting the words most likely to appear next. In some cases, the words most likely to appear next may not be the most factually accurate. For this reason, you should not rely on the factual accuracy of output from our models.

https://openai.com/policies/privacy-policy (last visited April 2024 and reflecting a Privacy Policy

Upon receiving the brief with the fake citations, opposing counsel and the court raised questions about cited cases that they could not find. Still unaware of the "hallucinations" issue, the attorney doubled down with ChatGPT and asked the GAI whether the cases were real. ChatGPT "responded that it had supplied 'real' authorities that could be found through Westlaw, LexisNexis and the Federal Reporter." 678 F. Supp. 3d at 458. Again, that was not true. The cases were fabrications manufactured by the GAI's innate "desire" to give the lawyer what he was looking for.

At the conclusion of the sanctions hearing, the involved lawyers (the one who used ChatGPT and wrote the brief, and his local counsel supporting him in the federal court to which he was only admitted pro hac vice) were required to (1) pay a $5,000 fine; (2) notify their client in writing of the court's decision and of the background leading up to the sanction; and (3) "mail a letter individually addressed to each judge falsely identified as the author of the fake 'Varghese,' 'Shaboon,' 'Petersen,' 'Martinez,' 'Durden,' and 'Miller' opinions," providing a copy of the sanctions opinion, the transcript of the hearing, and the fake opinion wrongly attributed to each judge. Id. at 466.

In the wake of the wide publicity surrounding the Mata case, a number of judges around the country issued orders addressing potential use of GAI by attorneys practicing before them. Judge Brantley Starr of the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Texas was one of the first:

> All attorneys appearing before the Court must file on the docket a certificate attesting either that no portion of the filing was drafted by generative artificial intelligence (such as ChatGPT, Harvey.AI, or Google Bard) or that any language drafted by generative artificial intelligence was checked for accuracy, using print reporters or traditional legal databases, by a human being. These platforms are incredibly powerful and have many uses in the law: form divorces, discovery requests, suggested errors in documents, anticipated questions at oral argument. But legal briefing is not one of them. Here's why. These platforms in their current states are prone to hallucinations and bias. On hallucinations, they make stuff up—even quotes and citations. Another issue is reliability or bias. While attorneys swear an oath to set aside their personal prejudices, biases, and beliefs to faithfully uphold the law and represent their clients, generative artificial intelligence is the product of programming devised by humans who did not have to swear such an oath. As such, these systems hold no allegiance to any client, the rule of law, or the laws and Constitution of the United States (or, as addressed above, the truth). Unbound by any sense of duty, honor, or justice, such programs act according to computer code rather than conviction, based on programming rather than principle. Any party believing a platform has the requisite accuracy and reliability for legal briefing may move for leave and explain why. Accordingly, the Court will strike any filing from an attorney who fails to file a certificate on the docket attesting that the attorney has read the Court's judge-specific requirements and understands that he or she will be held responsible under Rule 11 [of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure] for the contents of any filing that he or she signs and submits to the Court, regardless of whether generative artificial intelligence drafted any portion of that filing.

Chief Justice John Roberts specifically referenced GAI issues in his 2023 Year-End Report on the Federal Judiciary. As he described it, "AI combines algorithms and enormous data sets to solve problems." Id. at 5. While "AI apparently can earn Bs on law school assignments and even pass the bar exam… any use of AI requires caution and humility." Id.

> One of AI's prominent applications made headlines this year for a shortcoming known as "hallucination," which caused the lawyers using the application to submit briefs with citations to non-existent cases. (Always a bad idea.) Some legal scholars have raised concerns about whether entering confidential information into an AI tool might compromise later attempts to invoke legal privileges.

Id. at 5-6.

Closing out an eventful year for GAI, disbarred former lawyer Michael Cohen admitted to (unknowingly) supplying his lawyer in his criminal case with fake citations generated by GAI. Ella Lee, Michael Cohen Gave Lawyer Fraudulent Case Citations Generated by AI, The Hill (Dec. 29, 2023). This time the GAI in question was Google Bard, which Cohen believed to be "a supercharged search engine." Id. Cohen wrote that he had "not kept up with 'emerging trends (and related risks)' in legal technology and was not aware" that generative text services "could create citations and descriptions that 'looked real but actually were not.'" Id. Falling back on his current non-lawyer status, Cohen wrote that he trusted his lawyer to vet his suggestions before "drop[ping] the cases into his submission wholesale without even confirming that they existed," which is what his counsel did. Id.

Unmentioned thus far is what ChatGPT likely did with the fake cases it created in response to the Mata lawyer's inquiry. As mentioned above, ChatGPT was initially trained on a limited dataset. As time goes on, however, many GAI programs supplement their datasets based on interactions with users. To ChatGPT, the interaction with the Mata lawyer was successful and the fake case names may have been added to the dataset to be reported to future users with similar questions. Until the hallucination issue is resolved, systems prone to this problem are therefore self-corrupting, which is yet another reason their outputs need to be checked carefully.

In early 2024, researchers at Stanford University announced the preliminary results of a study finding that "[l]arge language models hallucinate at least 75% of the time when answering questions about a court's core ruling." Isabel Gottlieb & Isaiah Poritz, Legal Errors by Top AI Models "Alarmingly Prevalent," Study Says, Bloomberg Law (Jan. 12, 2024). Their testing involved "more than 200,000 legal questions on OpenAI's Chat GPT 3.5, Google's PaLM 2, and Meta's Llama 2—all general-purpose models not built for specific legal use." Id. One of the researchers said:

> We should not take these very general purpose foundation models and naively deploy them and put them into all sorts of deployment settings, as a number of lawyers seem to have done…. Proceed with much more caution—where you really need lawyers, and people with some legal knowledge, to be able to assess the veracity of what an engine like this is giving to you.

Id.

updated on Nov. 14, 2023 and effective on Jan. 31, 2024). The version of the policy in effect when Mata attorney relied on ChatGPT did not have this disclaimer. The motion to dismiss in Mata was filed on January 13, 2023, and the brief opposing it was filed on March 1, 2023. 2023 WL 4114965, at *2. The WayBack Machine has links to the relevant ChatGPT policy as far back as February 27, 2023. The policy then in force (and dated Sept. 19, 2022) did not have the "note about accuracy" disclaimer. https://web.archive.org/web/20230227230602/https://openai.com/policies/privacy-policy (last visited April 2024). The essence of that disclaimer appears to have been added as of April 27, 2023. https://web.archive.org/web/20230601012741/https://openai.com/policies/privacy-policy (last visited April 2024).

More recently, a Washington Post reporter evaluated two GAI products for use in connection with some of her job functions. Danielle Abril, I Used AI Work Tools to Do My Job. Here's How it Went - The Washington Post (Feb. 26, 2024). She found that "[t]he AI seemed to do better when it was fed documents or data. But it still sometimes made things up, returned error messages or didn't understand context." Id. The article ended as follows:

> [A]ll results and content need careful inspection for accuracy, some tweaking or deep edits — and both tech companies advise users to verify everything generated by the AI."I don't want people to abdicate responsibility," said Kristina Behr, vice president of product management for collaboration apps at Google Workspace. "This helps you do your job. It doesn't do your job."
>
> And as is the case with AI, the more details and direction in the prompt, the better the output. So as you do each task, you may want to consider whether AI will save you time or actually create more work.
>
> "The work it takes to generate outcomes like text and videos has decreased," Rahman [a professor at Northwestern University's Kellogg School of Management] said. "But the work to verify has significantly increased."

Id.

Also quite recently, a law firm invoked ChatGPT in a court filing for new and different purpose. J.G. v. New York City Dept. of Education, 2024 WL 728626 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 22, 2024). Given the now well documented issues with ChatGPT, the court was not receptive. The case involved a motion for attorneys' fees from the losing party by counsel for a prevailing plaintiff in a situation in which the law permits such fee shifting. Movants must establish the "reasonableness" of their fee request. After making what the court deemed to be "aggressive" arguments under case law with respect to the reasonableness issue, the plaintiff's attorneys submitted a report from ChatGPT "as a 'cross-check' supporting" what the court deemed to be "problematic sources." Id. at *7. The court found the law firm's "invocation of ChatGPT as support for its aggressive fee bid" to be "utterly and unusually unpersuasive." Id. "As the firm should have appreciated, treating ChatGPT's conclusions as a useful gauge of the reasonable billing rate for the work of a lawyer with a particular background carrying out a bespoke assignment for a client in a niche practice area was misbegotten at the jump." Id. The court discussed Mata and another case where lawyers submitted fake citations manufactured by ChatGPT. And then the court focused on the absence of any basis for believing that ChatGPT could be a reliable source of information in this context:

> In claiming here that ChatGPT supports the fee award it urges, the [law firm] does not identify the inputs on which ChatGPT relied. It does not reveal whether any of these were similarly imaginary. It does not reveal whether ChatGPT anywhere considered a very real and relevant data point: the uniform bloc of precedent, canvassed below, in which courts in this District and Circuit have rejected as excessive the billing rates the [law firm] urges for its timekeepers. The Court therefore rejects out of hand ChatGPT's conclusions as to the appropriate billing rates here. Barring a paradigm shift in the reliability of this tool, the [law firm] is well advised to excise references to ChatGPT from future fee applications.

Id. at *7.[8]

Against that background, we address specific Rules of Professional Conduct implicated by attorneys' use of GAI in legal practice. We recognize that there are different kinds of GAI in existence now, and increasingly powerful ones in the pipeline. Use of certain AI or AI-like products for document review and discovery has become an accepted part of legal practice because experience has shown that, when used properly, some of these products yield accurate results and reduce the cost of document review and production. That is not yet the case for the current versions of certain GAI products when used for legal research. This opinion, which is confined to generative AI products, is intended to provide guidance to attorneys as the technology evolves to determine when and how those products can be ethically incorporated into their practice. Due to rapid development of technology in this area, we anticipate that many of the concerns raised in this opinion may be resolved or mooted for particular products in the future, perhaps even in the near future.

As discussed below, use of GAI in legal matters implicates lawyers' duties of competence, confidentiality, communication, candor to the court, and fairness to opposing parties and counsel; their obligation to supervise nonlawyer assistants and hold them to lawyer standards of conduct; their obligations as to the fees and expenses of a representation; and their obligation to maintain and make available a complete client file at the conclusion of a representation.

A. Competence

Under Rule 1.1(a), "[a] lawyer shall provide competent representation to a client." "To maintain the requisite knowledge and skill, a lawyer should keep abreast of changes in the law and its practice, and engage in such continuing study and education as may be necessary to maintain competence." Rule 1.1 cmt. [6]. As we noted in D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 371 regarding the use of social media in the practice of law:

> We agree with ABA Comment [8] to Model Rule 1.1 that to be competent "a lawyer should keep abreast of changes in the law and its practice, including the benefits and risks associated with relevant technology." Although the District's Comments to Rule 1.1 do not specifically reference technology, competent representation always requires the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness, and preparation reasonably necessary to carry out the representation. Because of society's embrace of technology, a lawyer's ignorance or disregard of it, including social media, presents a risk of ethical misconduct.

We hold the same view as to the use of GAI in legal practice.[9] Indeed, there may [8] The United States Patent and Trademark Office recently issued detailed guidance on the use of artificial intelligence tools by attorneys and others practicing before it. Guidance on Use of Artificial Intelligence-Based Tools in Practice Before the United States Patent and Trademark Office, 89 Fed. Reg. 25609 (Apr. 11, 2024) ("PTO AI Guidance"). It discusses some issues that are not addressed in this opinion, including patentability and the potential violation of export control and national security regulations. Attorneys who practice before the PTO or whose practices expose them to data that is subject to export controls or national security restrictions should study that guidance.

[9] At the time of this writing, the D.C. Court of Appeals is considering a proposal that would add a reference to technology to the comments to Rule 1.1. Under that proposal, Comment [5] to Rule 1.1 would be amended to add the underscored language:

> Competent handling of a particular matter includes inquiry into and analysis of the factual and legal elements of the problem, and use of methods, procedures, and technology meeting the standards of competent practitioners. It also includes adequate preparation and continuing attention to the needs of the representation to assure that there is no neglect of such needs. The required attention and preparation are determined in part by what is at stake; major litigation and complex transactions ordinarily require more elaborate treatment than matters of lesser consequences.

come a time when lawyers' use of GAI is standard practice.

Before using any particular form of GAI, attorneys should have a reasonable and current understanding of how it works and what it does, with due regard for (a) its potential dangers, including the risk of "hallucinations" or misuse or exposure of Client Confidential Information, (b) its limitations, including whether it uses a narrow dataset that could generate incomplete, out-of-date, or inaccurate results, and (c) its cost. Attorneys also should have a reasonable basis for trusting the GAI outputs, or must review and validate GAI outputs, before incorporating these outputs in their work product for clients or relying on them in support of a legal proceeding.

How might a lawyer do these things? Given what has befallen fellow lawyers in connection with GAI, we suggest the kind of diligence that any reasonable business owner would undertake before making a significant investment in technology for their legal practice. Depending on the context, this might include the following questions and answers:

- What is in the news about the GAI platform with respect to legal practice?
- Has the GAI been tested for your intended purpose by disinterested third parties?
- Have other legal professionals that you trust used the GAI? Have they encountered any issues?
- Ask the GAI to do something you or a respected colleague or adver sary has already done and compare its output with the human work product.[10]
- Verify the accuracy and completeness(including any date limitations) of the GAI's output in a test run, especially with respect to citations to laws, regulations and judicial decisions.

What is required or prudent in any specific situation depends on the circumstances. Significantly less diligence may be warranted for GAI products that rely on proven, current databases of the relevant information. At the other end of the spectrum, much more care should be taken with respect to GAI products that are offered to a general audience and lack a positive track record in connection with legal services.

[10]This assumes that the original work product is (1) competent and (2) not already in the GAI's database.

B. Confidentiality

Under Rule 1.6(a)(1), "a lawyer shall not knowingly… reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client." Under this rule "'[c]onfidence' refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law and 'secret' refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client." Rule 1.6(b). As we noted in DC Legal Ethics Opinion 364:

> This expansive confidentiality obligation "[t]ouch[es] the very soul of lawyering." In re Gonzalez, 773 A.2d 1026, 1030 (D.C. 2001) (quoting Fred Weber, Inc. v. Shell Oil Co., 566 F.2d 602, 607 (8th Cir. 1977)). "Disclosure of client confidences is 'contrary to the fundamental principle that an attorney owes a fiduciary duty to his client and must serve the client's interests with the utmost loyalty and devotion.'" Herbin v. Hoeffel, 806 A.2d 186, 197 (D.C. 2002) (quoting In re Gonzalez, 773 A.2d at 1031).

Comment [40] to Rule 1.6 notes that, "[w]hen transmitting a communication that includes information relating to the representation of a client, the lawyer must take reasonable precautions to prevent the information from coming into the hands of unintended recipients."

Separately, Rule 1.6(f) requires lawyers to "exercise reasonable care to prevent the lawyer's employees, associates, and others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidences or secrets of a client." A third party GAI provider who has access to the inputs to a GAI program is an "other" as to which this obligation extends.

To protect client confidences and secrets, lawyers should ask two questions:

(1) Will information I provide to the GAI be visible to the GAI pro vider or other strangers to the attorney-client relationship?

(2) Will my interactions with the GAI affect answers that later users of the GAI will get in a way that could reveal information I pro vided to the GAI?

From the perspective of confidentiality, an affirmative answer to the first is at least a red flag but, perhaps, one that can be resolved after a negotiation with the GAI provider (or an upgrade to a paid product with better terms) to improve the data security and prevent third party access.[11] An affirmative answer to the second might be more challenging to resolve. A lawyer should be reasonably satisfied that her interaction with the GAI will not reveal Client Confidential Information to future users of the GAI. If the lawyer is not so satisfied, she should not reveal Client Confidential Information to the GAI or should not use the GAI.

Many currently available GAI products invite a conversation with their users. Attorney users seek to have GAI generate legal theories to support their client's claims or defenses. They may also share their own legal or factual theories hoping the GAI can provide legal and factual support. The attorney then reacts to the response with follow up inquiries. Through these inputs, the lawyer effectively may be disclosing her mental impressions to the GAI in the hope of getting further support and refining her strategy. Meanwhile, some GAI programs may be saving both the attorney's inputs (or "prompts") and the GAI's own outputs to make that "content" available to future users.

The lawyer's mental impressions about a client matter are, of course, work product. Separate from the attorney/client privilege, work product is among the most protected categories of confidential information in our adversary legal system. Even when a court orders disclosure of some work product information after a required showing of "substantial need," the court "must protect against disclosure of the mental impressions, conclusions, opinions, or legal theories of a party's attorney or other representative concerning the litigation." Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(3)(B); D.C. Super. Ct. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(3)(B).

Lawyers who input Client Confidential Information, or their mental impressions about a client matter, into GAI products —especially "free" ones—risk violating fundamental rules about client confidentiality. Most technology companies that provide these services make no secret of what they will do with any information submitted to them in connection with their publicly usable services: from their perspective, user inputs are theirs to use and share as they see fit.

[11]ChatGPT's Privacy Policy (discussed below) states that it "does not apply to content that we process on behalf of customers of our business offerings, such as our API. Our use of that data is governed by our customer agreements covering access to and use of those offerings."

For example, the Privacy Policy underlying ChatGPT's free offering makes clear that ChatGPT and its parent OpenAI:

- "[C]ollect Personal Information that is included in the input, file uploads, or feedback that you provide to our Services ("Content"); and
- "[M]ay use Personal Information… [t]o improve our Services and con duct research" and "[t]o develop new programs and services."

Indeed, the policy shows that they view the information as simply another "asset" of theirs to be exploited and sold to others:

> Business Transfers: If we are involved in strategic transactions, reorganization, bankruptcy, receivership, or transition of service to another provider (collectively, a "Transaction"), your Personal Information and other information may be disclosed in the diligence process with counterparties and others assisting with the Transaction and transferred to a successor or affiliate as part of that Transaction along with other assets.

Absent client consent, lawyers who share Client Confidential Information with third party providers who have privacy policies like this risk violating their confidentiality obligations under Rule 1.6. And clients are unlikely to give informed consent—and typically should not be asked to consent—to wide ranging disclosures that could waive attorney/client privilege or otherwise make their most confidential and secret information available for third parties to see and use.[12] This includes potential litigation adversaries and their counsel who also have access to the same GAI. Attorneys who would provide client confidences and secrets to a GAI product should ensure that product has implemented adequate security safeguards and controls to ensure confidentiality and protect against unauthorized access and use of client information.

Comment [5] to Rule 1.6 does say that "[a] lawyer's use of a hypothetical to discuss issues relating to the representation is permissible so long as there is no reasonable likelihood that the listener will be able to ascertain the identity of the client or the situation involved." This may tempt GAI users to try to protect client confidentiality by anonymizing information that they submit to the GAI. Again, we urge caution. The more information a lawyer provides to a growing GAI dataset, the greater the likelihood that the GAI or one of its other users will be able to connect the dots and link the information the lawyer provided to the client in question. GAI is, after all, artificial "intelligence."

This is especially true if the lawyer's representation of a client is available in publicly searchable information, such as docket sheets for litigation, news reports about litigation, or—to the extent the lawyer's website identifies specific client matters handled by the lawyer—the lawyer's own website. Similarly, if a lawyer using such a service inputs her client's name for billing purposes, anyone with access to the service's records may be able to connect a given research request with an identifiable client.

Even if the lawyer and the client cannot be linked by the GAI as the source of information provided to the GAI, there is still a potential for harm if the information itself is valuable to the client because of the secrecy surrounding it. Imagine, for example, the harm that would occur to the client if a lawyer shared the client's trade secret manufacturing process with a GAI, and the GAI later revealed that information to others looking for faster and cheaper ways of making the product in question.[13]

One option that some GAI products provide to resolve confidentiality concerns is a zero data retention policy in which the provider of the GAI retains neither the inputs nor the outputs of the GAI's interaction with a particular user. As noted above, business users who pay to use a GAI product may be able to negotiate better terms than are available to users of a "free" service that the provider makes available for the provider's own marketing and product development purposes.

C. Responsibilities Regarding Lawyers in a Firm and Their Nonlawyer Assistants

Under Rules 5.1 and 5.3, a lawyer should take reasonable measures to ensure that any supervised lawyer's or nonlawyer's use of GAI conforms to the Rules of Professional Conduct and the principles discussed in this opinion.

Rule 5.1(a) requires managers of law firms and other lawyers with comparable managerial authority in a law firm or government agency to "make reasonable efforts to ensure that the firm has in effect measures giving reasonable assurance that all lawyers in the firm or agency conform to the Rules of Professional Conduct." Rule 5.1(b) requires lawyers with direct supervisory authority over another lawyer to "make reasonable efforts to ensure that the other lawyer conforms to the Rules of Professional Conduct."

Rule 5.3 extends these obligations to nonlawyers working in or for the firm, lawyer, or government agency. Under Rule 5.3(b), "[a] lawyer having direct supervisory authority over the nonlawyer shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the person's conduct is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyer." Similarly, under Rule 5.3(a), partners or other lawyers in a firm or government agency "who individually or together with other lawyers possess[] comparable managerial authority in a law firm … shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the firm or agency … has in effect measures giving reasonable assurance that the person's conduct is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyer." Thus, both the lawyers who retain nonlawyers and the managers of a firm or lawyers with comparable managerial authority in a law firm or government agency that retains nonlawyers must take steps to assure that the nonlawyers abide by the professional conduct rules for lawyers and confirm compliance with attorneys' ethical responsibilities.

Where it is foreseeable that lawyers or nonlawyers within or retained by a firm or government agency will be using GAI in connection with a client representation, the firm and the retaining lawyers should take appropriate steps to ensure that any use of GAI is consistent with the Rules of Professional Conduct.

[12] See D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 309, n.10 (2001) (noting high bar for waiving confidentiality).

[13] As noted in the PTO AI Guidance referenced above:

> Use of AI in practice before the USPTO can result in the inadvertent disclosure of client sensitive or confidential information, including highly-sensitive technical information, to third parties. This can happen, for example, when aspects of an invention are input into AI systems to perform prior art searches or generate drafts of specification, claims, or responses to Office actions. AI systems may retain the information that is entered by users. This information can be used in a variety of ways by the owner of the AI system including using the data to further train its AI models or providing the data to third parties in breach of practitioners' confidentiality obligations to their clients…. If confidential information is used to train AI, that confidential information or some parts of it may filter into outputs from the AI system provided to others.

89 Fed. Reg. at 25627.

One step law firms, lawyers, and government agencies could consider is to require employees—lawyers and nonlawyers alike—to satisfy themselves that client confidentiality under Rule 1.6 will be protected before using a GAI product. For example, if a review of the GAI's privacy policy determines that the GAI will not keep client confidential or secret information from the GAI's owner and other third parties outside the law firm, law office, or government agency, Rules 5.1 and 5.3 likely prohibit the supervising lawyers from permitting supervised personnel to use the GAI in the client matter. In the absence of a clear privacy policy, supervising lawyers should consider directing the employees to make other inquiries to satisfy themselves that the client's confidentiality will be protected.

Another step could be to require lawyers and nonlawyers within or retained by a law firm, lawyer, or government agency to take steps to verify the accuracy of the output of any GAI they use. At some point, however, the time and costs associated with the verification may outweigh whatever perceived benefits led the lawyer to consider using the GAI in the first place. Once a firm has vetted a particular GAI for particular purposes, it could require its lawyers to use that GAI for those purposes rather than some competing GAI not yet approved within the firm.

D. Candor to Tribunal and Fairness to Opposing Party and Counsel

For matters in litigation or arbitration, the use of GAI outputs that contain misrepresentations of facts or law, or that provide fake citations, also implicates the lawyer's duties to the tribunal and to the opposing party and counsel. This is especially true if the tribunal has adopted rules or procedures or issued orders requiring disclosure of the use of GAI and verification or other safeguards with respect to GAI outputs.

Under Rule 3.3(a), lawyers shall not knowingly:[14]

> (1) Make a false statement of fact or law to a tribunal or fail to correct a false statement of material fact or law previously made to the tribunal by the lawyer, unless correction would require disclosure of information that is prohibited by Rule 1.6;
>
> * * *
>
> (3) Fail to disclose to the tribunal legal authority in the controlling jurisdiction not disclosed by opposing counsel and known to the lawyer to be dispositive of a question at issue and directly adverse to the position of the client; or
>
> (4) Offer evidence that the lawyer knows to be false, except as provided in paragraph (b) [dealing with representation of the accused in a criminal case]. A lawyer may refuse to offer evidence, other than the testimony of a defendant in a criminal matter, that the lawyer reasonably believes is false.

These duties "continue to the conclusion of the proceeding." Rule 3.3(c). "A lawyer who receives information clearly establishing that a fraud has been perpetrated upon the tribunal shall promptly take reasonable remedial measures, including disclosure to the tribunal to the extent disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(d)." Rule 3.3(d).

The comments to this rule specifically address use of fake citations akin to those generated by the GAI in Mata. "Legal argument based on a knowingly false representation of law constitutes dishonesty toward the tribunal. A lawyer is not required to make a disinterested exposition of the law, but must recognize the existence of pertinent legal authorities." Rule 3.3 cmt. [3].

Similarly, Rule 3.4 imposes certain duties of fairness to the opposing party and counsel. Among these duties, the lawyer shall not:

- "[f]alsify evidence" (Rule 3.4(b)); or
- "[k]nowingly disobey an obligation under the rules of a tribunal except for an open refusal based on an assertion that no valid obligation exists" (Rule 3.4(c)).

Rule 3.4(c) comes into play when the tribunal has adopted rules or has issued orders restricting or otherwise governing use of GAI in connection with the proceeding, and the lawyer does not comply with those rules or orders.[15]

E. Fees

Under Rule 1.5(a), "[a] lawyer's fee shall be reasonable." The rule provides a non-exclusive list of eight factors to be considered in assessing the fee's reasonableness. Separately, when "the lawyer has not regularly represented the client," the lawyer must send the client a writing stating "the basis or rate of the fee, the scope of the lawyer's representation, and the expenses for which the client will be responsible." Rule 1.5(b). That writing must be sent "before or within a reasonable time after commencing the representation." Id.

If the lawyer intends to bill the client for use of GAI for which there is an out-of-pocket cost to the lawyer, that expected cost is an expense that should be communicated to the client under this rule.

Separately:

> [i]t goes without saying that a lawyer who has undertaken to bill on an hourly basis is never justified in charging a client for hours not actually expended. If a lawyer has agreed to charge the client on this basis (i.e., hourly), and it turns out that the lawyer is particularly efficient in accomplishing a given result, it nonetheless will not be permissible to charge the client for more hours than were actually expended on the matter. When that basis for billing the client has been agreed to, the economies associated with the result must inure to the benefit of the client.

D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 267 (1996) (quoting ABA Formal Ethics Opinion 379 (1993)).

A familiar variation of this issue occurs when a lawyer expends considerable time and effort to prepare a detailed legal research memo for one client and, to that first client, considerable expense based on the lawyer's hourly rate. Shortly thereafter, a second client happens to ask the same legal question. It will take far less time to adapt the first memorandum for the second client's use than it took to create the memorandum in the first place. While the lawyer may believe it is not fair or reasonable to charge the second client only a fraction of what the first client paid for such a valuable piece of legal research, that is what is required if the lawyer's billing arrangement with the second client is based exclusively on an hourly rate.

The same is true when the use of GAI reduces billable time and the lawyer's

[14] As defined in the Rules of Professional Conduct, "'[k]nowingly,' 'known,' or 'knows' denotes actual knowledge of the fact in question. A person's knowledge may be inferred from circumstances." Rule 1.0(f); In re Soto, 298 A.3d 762, 767 (D.C. 2023) (quoting Rule 1.0(f)). This is a high threshold that would not normally be crossed by a lawyer's unintended misrepresentation due to the lawyer's ignorance of the limitations of the GAI or other technological application. To the extent that the misrepresentation could have been prevented through ordinary care like cite-checking, however, the lawyer could still face sanctions, claims or other consequences, as did the lawyers in Mata.

[15] As noted above, GAI technologies can create false photographs, audio recordings and videos that look or sound very real. These sorts of "deepfake" files have the potential to be used as false evidence squarely within the prohibitions of Rules 3.3 and 3.4.

fee agreement with the client is based exclusively on the time the lawyer spends working on the matter. No matter how good or valuable the GAI's output is, absent a different fee arrangement, the lawyer can only bill for the time the lawyer spent. As discussed above, the reasonable expense of the GAI itself may be billed as an expense item if the lawyer's agreement with the client permits the lawyer to bill for such expenses.

F. Client File

When a representation is terminated, Rule 1.16(d) requires a lawyer to do several things, including "surrendering papers and property to which the client is entitled." As we discussed in D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 333 (2005), this rule requires production of the "entire file," including "copies of internal notes and memoranda reflecting the views, thoughts and strategies of the lawyer." Although lawyers are not required to retain every piece of paper or electronic datum generated or received during a client representation, a lawyer should consider whether specific interactions with GAI in connection with a client matter should be retained as part of the client file.[16]

Conclusion

We anticipate that GAI eventually will be a boon to the practice of law. Moreover, lawyers who use generative artificial intelligence do not need to be computer programmers who can write AI programs or critique AI code written by others. But they do need to understand enough about how GAI works, what it does, and its risks and limitations to become comfortable that the GAI will be helpful and accurate for the task at hand, and that it will not breach client confidentiality. Lawyers should also be mindful of the implications GAI creates for their duties of supervision; their duty of candor to the tribunal and their fairness obligations to opposing parties and counsel; the reasonableness of their fees; and their obligations with respect to the client file.

Published: April 2024

[16] A lawyer may, at her own expense, retain a copy of the client file. See D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 273 (1997); D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 250 n. 2 (1994).

Ethics Opinion 389

Flat Fees, Subscription Fees and Disbarment

Rule 1.15 contains the default rule requiring a lawyer to hold funds of clients or third parties in trust, separate from the lawyer's funds. Rule 1.15's application to prepaid flat fees (typically received by lawyers in connection with criminal cases, immigration matters, and subscription services) has been the subject of much confusion among the bar's membership.

The current text of Rule 1.15(e) of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct requires the following treatment of a client's advances (prepayments) of fees or costs:

> Advances of unearned fees and unincurred costs shall be treated as property of the client [in a qualifying lawyer trust account] until earned or incurred unless the client gives informed consent to a different arrangement. Regardless of whether such consent is provided, [a lawyer shall refund] to the client [ ] any unearned portion of advanced legal fees and unincurred costs at the termination of the lawyer's services in accordance with Rule 1.16(d).

A trilogy of cases from the D.C. Court of Appeals between 2009 and 2024 has defined "unearned" fees, "earned" fees, and client "informed consent" in ways that are not obvious on the face of the rule.[1]

Failure to follow the strict requirements of these three cases creates a risk of disciplinary prosecution for commingling (which is typically sanctioned by public censure), negligent misappropriation (which carries a presumptive minimum sanction of a six month suspension), or intentional or reckless misappropriation (which carries a presumptive sanction of disbarment under In re Addams, 579 A.2d 190, 191(D.C. 1990) (en banc)).[2]

[1] The Legal Ethics Committee understands that work is currently under way to prepare proposed revisions to Rule 1.15 (reflecting current case law) for submission to the D.C. Court of Appeals for its consideration.

[2] Disbarment is the presumptive sanction in the District and most other jurisdictions for intentional misappropriation. Reckless misappropriation under the District's precedents is the non-intentional use of client (or third-party) entrusted property without proper consent, resulting from something more than simple negligence. Recklessness may be found, for example, when a lawyer pays the same invoice from trust twice, yet fails to detect and correct the error for several months because the lawyer has no bookkeeping system designed to prevent or detect the duplicate payment. By contrast, a promptly detected and corrected duplicate payment may be treated in the District as the lower-sanctioned negligent misappropriation. The Court of Appeals has acknowledged that "[t]he decision in Addams has generated substantial controversy and criticism over the years." In re Mensah, 262 A.3d 1100, 1102-03 (D.C. 2021) (collecting and summarizing cases). For those of our members who are also licensed elsewhere, our multistate survey suggests that the District is the only jurisdiction that routinely disbars for what the District classifies as a first offense of reckless misappropriation. See generally, David Luty, I*n the Matter of Mitigation: The Necessity of a Less Discretionary Standard for Sanctioning Lawyers Found Guilty of Intentionally Misappropriating Client Property*, 32 Hofstra L. Rev. 999 (2004).

This opinion examines common misconceptions about the rules governing fee agreements that could expose District-licensed attorneys to professional discipline and offers practical ways to comply with the applicable Rules and case law.

Applicable Rules[3]

- 1.0(e) (Terminology: Informed Consent
- 1.8(i) (Lawyer Liens and Their Enforcement
- 1.5 (Fees)
- 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- 1.15 (SafeKeeping Property)
- 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation)

Discussion

The Trilogy Adds Requirements Not Evident in Rule 1.15.

The first case in the trilogy, In re Mance, 980 A.2d 1196 (D.C. 2009), stands for the proposition that prepaid flat fees and prepaid costs are subject to the same entrustment requirements under Rule 1.15(a) as prepayments for hourly fee projects; absent a valid Rule 1.15(e) waiver of entrustment, prepaid fees and costs belong in trust, until earned by performance of the associated work.[4]

The second case, In re Ponds, 279 A.3d 357 (D.C. 2022), adds requirements for a lawyer to provide verbal and written

[3] Unless otherwise indicated, any citations to a "Rule" in this opinion are to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

[4] D.C. Rule 1.15(e) allows a client to waive the default rule that client prepayments must be held in trust until the lawyer completes the associated work. This waiver applies only to prepayments: clients cannot waive entrustment for traditional escrows (such as proceeds of real estate settlements or collection litigation). Note also that states following the ABA's Model Rule 1.15 do not allow waiver of entrustment under any circumstances.

disclosures to a client before the client can waive the entrustment requirements under Rule 1.15(a).

The third case in the trilogy, In re Alexei, 319 A.3d 404 (D.C. 2024), holds that a lawyer may not make interim draws from trust on a flat fee project unless the client has expressly agreed to treat portions of the flat fee as earned before completion of the entire flat fee project.

Rule 1.15(d) has traditionally allowed a lawyer to impound disputed trust funds, for reasons such as the lawyer's good faith assertion of a reasonable amount of fees earned; provided that the lawyer could not draw from trust over the client's objection (even if that objection is baseless), until the fee dispute was resolved via settlement, arbitration, or litigation. See, e.g., In re Haar, 667 A.2d 1350, 1353 (D.C. 1995) (Haar I); In re Haar, 698 A.2d 412, 421 (D.C. 1997) (Haar II). Alexei suggests Rule 1.15(d) will no longer apply to disputes over prepaid fees unless the lawyer's flat fee agreement has an explicit contractual mechanism to resolve a lawyer's claims to the portion of fees earned when the lawyer's services are terminated before completing the entire scope of work to which the flat fee applies.

Engagement Agreement and Banking Formalities.

Rule 1.5 contains specific requirements for disclosure of how fees and costs will be charged to a client. When "the lawyer has not regularly represented the client," the lawyer must provide the client with a writing stating "the basis or rate of the fee, the scope of the lawyer's representation, and the expenses for which the client will be responsible." Rule 1.5(b).[5] That writing must be transmitted "before or within a reasonable time after commencing the representation." Id.

As part of any investigation into alleged lawyer misconduct, Disciplinary Counsel likely will request a copy of the lawyer's engagement agreement with the client. Failure to have complied with Rule 1.5(b) can provide an additional basis for discipline even in cases that started with no allegations relating to the fee or its collection. If the engagement agreement provides for prepayment for future services, Disciplinary Counsel's investigation may expand into whether the lawyer has complied with the trilogy even if funds handling has nothing to do with the original complaint against the lawyer.

Under Rule 1.5(a), "[a] lawyer's fee shall be reasonable." The rule provides a non-exclusive list of eight factors to be considered in assessing the fee's reasonableness. Under case law, however, the overarching requirement of reasonableness imposes rights and obligations that are not readily apparent from the current text of Rules 1.0 (Terminology), 1.5 (Fees), or 1.15 (Safekeeping Property).

Under Rule 1.15(a), a lawyer in possession of property of clients or third parties must keep that property separate from the lawyer's own property. When the property is money, the money must be kept in a trust account. The current version of Rule 1.15(e) provides that:

> Advances of unearned fees and unincurred costs shall be treated as property of the client pursuant to paragraph (a) until earned or incurred unless the client gives informed consent to a different arrangement. Regardless of whether such consent is provided, Rule 1.16(d) applies to require the return to the client of any unearned portion of advanced legal fees and unincurred costs at the termination of the lawyer's services in accordance with Rule 1.16(d).

Comment [9] to Rule 1.15 explains:

> Paragraph (e) permits advances against unearned fees and unincurred costs to be treated as either the property of the client or the property of the lawyer, but absent informed consent by the client to a different arrangement, the rule's default position is that such advances be treated as the property of the client, subject to the restrictions provided in paragraph (a). In any case, at the termination of an engagement, advances against fees that have not been incurred must be returned to the client as provided in Rule 1.16(d). For the definition of "informed consent," see Rule 1.0(e).

"'Informed consent' denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct." Rule 1.0(e). Clients who are "experienced in legal matters generally and in making decisions of the type involved" or are represented by independent legal counsel may require "less information and explanation than others." Id. at cmt. [2].

These rules are intended to protect clients. Client money in a lawyer trust account cannot be attached by the lawyer's creditors. That is not the case when client funds are located in a lawyer's operating account. The above language from the current version of Rule 1.15 authorizes clients to give "informed consent" to having their funds put in an operating account but does not detail exactly what must be done to get an enforceable informed consent. The trilogy now requires additional steps to obtain an effective consent, as discussed below.

Client protection also requires lawyers to withdraw money that belongs to the lawyers from the trust account promptly after the lawyer becomes entitled to the money. Failure to withdraw the lawyer's funds results in "commingling" of entrusted funds with lawyer funds and potentially exposes the trust account to claims from the lawyer's creditors. In re Hessler, 549 A.2d 700, 702 (D.C. 1988) ("By mingling client funds with the attorney's own, the client's funds become more difficult to trace and are subject to the risk that they may be taken by creditors of the attorney.").

Commingling is treated as a serious disciplinary offense because it is often a precursor to accidental misappropriation. Simple commingling, without other aggravating factors, typically results in a censure. In re Osborne, 713 A.2d 312, 313 (D.C. 1998). The presumptive sanction for negligent misappropriation of funds that are supposed to be in trust is a six-month suspension. In re Anderson, 778 A.2d 330, 342 (D.C. 2001). The presumptive sanction for reckless or intentional misappropriation is disbarment. In re Addams, 579 A.2d 190, 191(D.C. 1990) (en banc) ("[I]n virtually all cases of misappropriation, disbarment will be the only appropriate sanction unless it appears that the misconduct resulted from nothing more than simple negligence.").[6]

[5] This opinion refers to the writing that Rule 1.5 requires as an "engagement agreement." Rule 1.5 specifies when writings or written agreements are required. As is the case with Rule 1.7—a rule that does not require a writing or a client signature for a conflict waiver—"[i]t is ordinarily prudent for the lawyer to provide at least a written summary of the considerations disclosed and to request and receive a written informed consent, although the rule does not require that disclosure be in writing or in any other particular form in all cases. Lawyers should also recognize that the form of disclosure sufficient for more sophisticated business clients may not be sufficient to permit less sophisticated clients to provide informed consent. Moreover, under the District of Columbia substantive law, the lawyer bears the burden of proof that informed consent was secured." Rule 1.7 cmt. [28].

[6] The Court of Appeals ultimately held in In re Mensah, 262 A.3d 1100,1105(D.C. 2021) that, in some negotiated discipline cases involving reckless but not intentional misappropriation, a three-year suspension with reinstatement conditioned on a showing of fitness to practice law may be an appropriate resolution. Id. at 1105. It should be noted that a "disbarment" in the District of Columbia is in effect a five-year suspension with a showing of fitness required for reinstatement. Id. at 1102.

Contract Caveat: According to Mance: No Matter What the Engagement Agreement Says, Flat Fees for Future Services Are Not "Earned on Receipt." Likewise, Calling the Prepayment a Retainer Doesn't Make It Earned on Receipt.

In re Mance, 980 A.2d 1196 (D.C. 2009), involved a murder case in which a father hired an attorney to defend the father's son. The attorney put most of the money in his trust account and the rest in his operating account. Id. at 1200. At the time, it was common for criminal defense attorneys to have flat-fee-earned-on-receipt engagement arrangements.

From the attorney's perspective, there was nothing to do until the son authorized him to start negotiating the terms under which the son would turn himself in to police. Id. at 1200. However, the father was upset by an apparent lack of action by the attorney. The father hired another attorney and asked the first attorney for a refund. When the attorney did not immediately refund the entire payment, the father filed a bar complaint.

The Court of Appeals ultimately held "that when an attorney receives payment of a flat fee at the outset of a representation, the payment is an 'advance[] of unearned fees' and 'shall be treated as property of the client … until earned unless the client consents to a different arrangement.'" Id. at 1202 (quoting Rule 1.15). Quoting Rule 1.5(a), the Court noted that "[t]he primary rule concerning the amount of fees is that '[a] lawyer's fee shall be reasonable.'" Id. Citing a Colorado opinion, Mance held that "an attorney earns fees only by conferring a benefit on or performing a legal service for the client." Id. (quoting In re Sather, 3 P.3d 403, 410 (Colo. 2000)). Thus, "a flat fee is an advance of unearned fees because it is money paid up-front for legal services that are yet to be performed." Id.

Mance "note[d] that an attorney may obtain informed consent from the client to deposit all of the money in the lawyer's operating account or to deposit some of the money in the lawyer's operating account as it is earned, per their agreement." Id. at 1206 (citing Rule 1.15). However, the court found no informed consent in that case because there had been no discussion with the client of the possibility of the money being put in a trust or escrow account, or what that meant. Id. at 1207.

Mance also described how treating flat fees as unearned fees protects a client's right to change counsel:

> Another important benefit to placing flat fees in a trust or escrow account is preservation of the client's right to choose his or her counsel, including the right to discharge an attorney. See D.C. Rule 1.7(b) cmt. 8 ("Clients have broad discretion to terminate their representation by a lawyer and that discretion may generally be exercised on unreasonable as well as reasonable grounds."). Since a flat fee is not owned by an attorney until it has been earned through the performance of services to the client, "the client will not risk forfeiting fees for work to be performed in the future if the client chooses to discharge his attorney."

Id. at 1203 (quoting In re Sather, 3 P.3d at 410). See also Rule 1.16(d) ("In connection with any termination of representation, a lawyer shall take timely steps to the extent reasonably practicable to protect a client's interests, such as … refunding any advance payment of fee or expense that has not been earned or incurred.") (emphasis added).

Mance distinguished prepaid "flat fees" from what we will call "availability fees" to avoid using a variety of confusing and potentially conflicting applications of the word "retainer" that have been applied in the past. An availability fee "'is a fee paid, apart from any other compensation, to ensure that a lawyer will be available for the client if required.'" Id. at 1202 (quoting RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS § 34 cmt. e (Am. L. Inst. 2000)). Such a fee "is a 'fee[] paid solely for availability and therefore do[es] not involve an advance fee but a fee that is fully earned when paid.'" D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 264 (1996) (citations omitted).[7] Such arrangements "'are quite rare,' and have 'largely disappeared from the modern practice of law.' However, attempts to cast what is actually an advance payment of fees for services to be performed later as [an availability fee] are very much present today." ABA Formal Opinion 505, at 3 (footnotes omitted).[8]

A true availability fee fairly can be viewed as the client's purchasing an option to retain the lawyer in the future. The price paid for the option is fully earned by the lawyer upon receipt but, to exercise the option, the client may need to engage the lawyer in the future and enter into a separate fee agreement with the lawyer to pay for the legal work to be done during that engagement.[9]

Mance also warned against efforts to evade its dictates by creative terminology or "front loading."

> Simply labeling a fee as something other than a flat fee or extreme 'front-loading' of payment milestones in the context of the anticipated length and complexity of the representation will not excuse the lawyer from safekeeping the client's funds until it can reasonably be said that they have been earned in light of the scope of the representation.

Mance at 1204-05 (footnote omitted). A footnote to the quoted sentence stated that "[t]he questionable ethical viability of non-refundable fee advances has inspired some imaginative terminology designed to characterize the advance payments in a manner that eludes the issue: retainers, non-refundable retainers, fee advances, or advanced fees, prepaid fees, flat fees, and minimum fees." Id. at 1204 n.9 (quoting Idaho Sup. Ct. Bd. Of Prof'l Ethics & Conduct v. Apland, 577 N.W.2d 50, 55 (Iowa 1998) (quoting ABA/BNA Lawyers' Manual on Professional Conduct 45:109 (1993)).

In practice, a regulator or court can easily identify prepayments for legal

[7] Separate from its discussion of various forms of retainers, D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 264 (1996) also stated that a fee advance belongs to the lawyer and must be put in the lawyer's operating account rather than being commingled with client funds in a trust account. That aspect of the 1996 opinion was superseded by changes to Rule 1.15 that took effect in 2000.

[8] In 2023, the American Bar Association provided guidance on these issues through the lens of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct. ABA Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility, Formal Opinion 505, Fees Paid in Advance for Contemplated Services (2023). As is typical, that opinion notes in its first footnote that the Model Rules are only models and that the "controlling" authorities are provided by the "laws, court rules, regulations, rules of professional conduct and opinions promulgated in individual jurisdictions." The ABA opinion then went beyond the usual disclaimer, adding, "This is especially noteworthy for this opinion as jurisdictions have adopted substantially different rules relating to the management of client property including fees paid in advance for legal work to be performed in the future." This opinion focuses on the D.C. rules and case law. Practitioners in other jurisdictions should study their own controlling local authorities carefully because there are significant variations around the country as to what is and is not permitted, and as to what the likely sanction for an error might be.

[9] The trilogy of cases discussed in this opinion do not address what should or must happen if an availability fee arrangement is terminated, or attempted to be terminated, by the lawyer or the client before the agreed availability period expires. We assume, without deciding, that refundability of a previously earned-on-receipt true availability fee may be impacted by circumstances under which contracts are determined to be void, voidable, or impossible to perform.

services by examining the circumstances surrounding the payment and asking what the client understood. The names that the parties applied to the payment at the outset will carry little or no weight.

Recognizing that its ruling was new and different from a "widely-used practice," Mance made its ruling prospective as to D.C. bar members other than the respondent in that case. 980 A.2d 1205-06. As to that respondent, the court wrote that its interpretation would have made him guilty of a long list of violations:

- "misappropriation of client funds in violation of Rule 1.15(a);"
- "commingling of lawyer funds with those of the client in violation of Rule 1.15(a);"
- "failure to maintain complete records of client funds in violation of Rule 1.15(a)…;"
- "failure to treat an advance as client funds in violation of Rule 1.15(d);"
- "failure to take timely steps to sur render client funds in violation of Rule 1.16(d);" and
- "failure to deposit client funds in a specially titled trust or escrow account, in violation of Rule 1.16(d)."

Id. at 1208. Given its decision to apply the ruling prospectively, however, Mance found that respondent could not be guilty of the "more serious violations" of the provisions in the list, especially misappropriation. Id. The takeaway from Mance is that clients cannot be bound to engagement agreements that purport to transform, through misleading contractual language, prepayments into something they are not.

Ponds: Detailed Requirements for Any Client Consent to Unearned Funds Being Placed in an Operating Account.

The Court of Appeals revisited these issues in 2022 when it disbarred an attorney who entered into the following flat fee agreement with a client, put the entire flat fee in his operating account, and did not refund the money at the conclusion of the representation despite an Attorney-Client Arbitration Board ruling requiring him to do so:

> The fee agreement between [the lawyer] and [the client] described the flat fee as non-refundable. It further provided that [the lawyer] was not required to keep a record of the time he spent working on [the client's] case; that the flat fee was the exclusive property of [the lawyer]; that [the client] waived any claim of property interest in the flat fee; and that [the client] agreed that the flat fee would not be placed in an escrow account. The fee agreement did not advise [the client] that [the lawyer] could keep the flat fee only if [the lawyer] provided the agreed-upon services or that [the lawyer] was required to return the flat fee if it was unreasonable or unearned. The fee agreement also did not explain what an escrow account is or the benefits of keeping client funds in such an account.

In re Ponds, 279 A.3d 357, 359 (D.C. 2022). The case turned on whether this agreement was an enforceable "informed consent" from the client.

The court held that it was not because it fell short of the following guidelines:

> Informed consent [under Rule 1.15(e)] requires an attorney to discuss the "material risks of and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct." In re Mance, 980 A.2d at 1206 (internal quotation marks omitted). To satisfy this requirement in connection with a flat-fee agreement, the attorney must "expressly communicate to the client verbally and in writing" that (1) "the attorney will treat the advance fee as the attorney's property upon receipt"; (2) "the attorney can keep the fee only by providing a benefit or providing a service for which the client has contracted"; (3) "the fee agreement must spell out the terms of the benefit to be conferred upon the client"; (4) "the client must be aware of the attorney's obligation to refund any amount of advance funds to the extent that they are unreasonable or unearned if the representation is terminated by the client"; and (5) "unless there is agreement otherwise, the attorney must ... hold the flat fee in escrow until it is earned by the lawyer's provision of legal services." Id. at 1206-07 (internal quotation marks omitted).

279 A.3d at 358-59. The most likely "benefit to the client" of an agreement like this is the described scope of services that the lawyer commits to provide if the client enters into the agreement.

As to the sanction, the respondent in Ponds argued that "his failure to comply with the requirements of In re Mance was simply a good faith but perhaps negligent mistake of law." Id. at 362. The Court of Appeals disagreed and disbarred him because "[d]isbarment is normally the appropriate sanction when an attorney has intentionally or recklessly misappropriated client funds." Id. (quoting In re Smith, 70 A.3d 1213, 1218 (D.C. 2013)).

Alexei: Flat Fees Not Earned Until the Conclusion of the Matter Absent a Written Agreement to the Contrary.

The third case in the trilogy is In re Alexei, 319 A.3d 404 (D.C. 2024). The attorney in that case entered into a flat-fee-earned-on-receipt billing arrangement with an immigration client. The flat fees were for filing (1) a green card application, (2) a separate immigration-related request, and (3) an appeal from a prior immigration decision. Id. at 406. The amount in question was initially paid into the lawyer's trust account. However, the lawyer periodically transferred portions of the payment to his operating account based on time spent working on the matter at the lawyer's standard hourly rate. Hourly drawdowns from trust led the attorney to have paid himself all of the client trust funds before any of the filings referenced in the engagement agreement had been made. Id. As discussed below, the ultimate problem for the attorney was that "[t]he agreement neither mentioned [the lawyer's] hourly rate nor specified how [the lawyer] might earn the advanced funds." Id. at 406.

It is clear from the Hearing Committee Report and the Board on Professional Responsibility Report in Alexei that at least some of the documents that the lawyer had agreed to file were eventually filed, including the green card application. However, that application "was ultimately denied, and [the client] hired new counsel." Alexei, 319 A.3d at 406. Through new counsel, the client filed a Lozada-based[10] disciplinary complaint against the respondent while "sincerely" thanking him for his past service and asking him to "[p]lease understand this is not personal, it is just something that is necessary in order to re-open my [immigration] case." Id. at 407. The disciplinary complaint did not allege any

[10]When an immigrant seeks to reopen an immigration decision on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, he or she must file a disciplinary complaint against former counsel or explain why such a complaint was not filed. In re Lozada, 19 I&N Dec. 637 (BIA 1988). As a practical matter under Lozada's progeny, the immigrant's challenge will not be considered unless and until a disciplinary complaint is filed. American Immigration Lawyers Association, Policy Brief: Ending the Reign of Lozada and Removing Barriers to Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claims in Immigration Law (July 11, 2024). As noted in that article, an Attorney General of the United States during the second Bush administration acknowledged "that most bar complaints under Lozada are 'unfounded.'" Moreover, "[s]uch unfounded complaints impose costs on well-intentioned and competent attorneys, and make it harder for State bars to identify meritorious complaints in order to impose sanctions on lawyers whose performance is truly deficient."

misappropriation of funds but the issue emerged during Disciplinary Counsel's investigation. Id.

Before the case reached the Court of Appeals, both the Hearing Committee and the Board on Professional Responsibility concluded that the respondent "violated no rules of professional conduct because he had earned at least a portion of the advance payment as he worked on the case." Id. at 406. Disciplinary Counsel argued to the Board "that In re Mance held that advanced payments on a flat fee could be earned only after the attorney finished the legal services encompassed by the fee [agreement]." Id. at 407. "[T]he Board determined that that case did not 'articulate the bright-line rule that Disciplinary Counsel now advocates,'" and found that that Disciplinary Counsel had not carried its burden of proving a violation by clear and convincing evidence. Id.

Disciplinary Counsel appealed, arguing that, "unless the fee agreement says otherwise, the 'default rule' is that the entire flat fee for a specified service is earned only when the attorney actually provides the entirety of that service to the client." Disciplinary Counsel's Opening Brief, In re Alexei, No. 23-BG-591, at 11 (D.C. filed Oct. 5, 2023).

Finding this to be an "issue of first impression," the Court of Appeals endorsed Disciplinary Counsel's "default rule":

> [A]s a default rule, attorneys earn funds advanced on a flat-fee payment only when all the legal services pertaining to the flat fee are complete. We reach this conclusion for three reasons: (1) it best fits the nature of a flat fee, (2) it places the onus to contract differently on the party generally best positioned to do so, and (3) it facilitates clarity and better enforcement of the rules of professional conduct.

In re Alexei, 319 A.3d at 411.

Alexei acknowledged the respondent's "arguments in favor of a more flexible default rule" based on "fear that the default rule we adopt today could leave attorneys unpaid for significant work if their client terminates the representation before the attorney completes the job." Id. at 413. It found, however, that "[a] ttorneys are not without remedy against a client who declines to pay for partial services." Id.

> [A]ttorneys may recover for uncompensated work through a quantum meruit action. See, e.g., Ginberg v. Tauber, 678 A.2d 543, 544 (D.C. 1996) (involving a quantum meruit action brought by an attorney against their former client for "the reasonable value of the services [the attorney] provided"); Jonathan Woodner Co. v. Laufer, 531 A.2d 280, 287 (D.C. 1987) (clarifying that appellant, an attorney, could recover under a quantum meruit theory if he "present[ed] proof of the reasonable value of the services rendered in advancing" the client's goal). Or, if the parties have agreed to arbitrate their fee disputes, the attorney may file a petition with the Attorney/Client Arbitration Board.

Id. at 413.

Under the text of Alexei, absent a contractual basis to impound in trust the portion of prepaid fees that a discharged lawyer in good faith believes to have been earned, the quantum meruit remedy is now safely available only after refunding to the client and hoping that the client will still have the means to pay at the conclusion of the quantum meruit action.[11]

Alexei recognized that the default rule it was adopting was not within the holding of Mance. See 319 A.3d at 409-10. Thus, the court determined to apply its "holding prospectively such that it does not apply to Mr. Alexei or any agreements already in force before the issuance of this opinion." Id. at 415.

What Alexei Did Not Discuss: The Common Law Retention Lien and Rule 1.8(i).

Alexei did not address the long history of retaining liens in the District of Columbia and its interplay with Rule 1.15(d) (on lawyer's right to impound in trust funds pending resolution of fee dispute). "The substantive law of the District of Columbia has long permitted lawyers to assert and enforce liens against the property of clients. See, e.g., Redevelopment Land Agency v. Dowdey, 618 A.2d 153, 159-60 (D.C. 1992), and cases cited therein." D.C. Rule 1.8 cmt. [16]. Under the common law, attorneys in the District of Columbia had:

> a so-called "retaining lien," which attaches to particular funds or papers, belonging to the client, that come into the attorney's possession. See Wolf v. Sherman, 682 A.2d 194, 197 (D.C.1996); Lyman v. Campbell, 87 U.S. App. D.C. 44, 45-46, 182 F.2d 700, 701-02 (1950); District of Columbia Bar Legal Ethics Op. No. 100 at 172, 173 n. 5 (1984) (providing that attorney may assert retaining lien on client assets in attorney's possession but may not ethically deduct fee from client funds held in escrow absent "a specific agreement between the attorney and client" permitting the withdrawal) (quoting ABA Committee on Ethics, Informal Op. No. 859, Aug. 4, 1965).

In re Haar, 698 A.2d 412, 416 n.4 (D.C. 1997) (Haar II). "The retaining lien attaches to property of the client in the possession of the attorney and entitles the attorney to retain possession of that property until the fee is paid." Wolf, 582 A.2d at 197.[12] The traditional subject of the retaining lien is what most attorneys today understand to be a "retainer," an advance payment from the client to assure that the attorney will be paid for work to be performed in the future and costs associated with that work.

Changes to Rule 1.8(i) severely limited an attorney's ability to assert and enforce a retaining lien as to "a client's files." Unlike its predecessor, the rule now provides:

> A lawyer may acquire and enforce a lien granted by law to secure the lawyer's fees or expenses, but a lawyer shall not impose a lien upon any part of a client's files, except upon the lawyer's own work product, and then only to the extent that the work product has not been paid for. This work product exception shall not apply when the client has become unable to pay, or when withholding the lawyer's work product would present a significant risk to the client of irreparable harm.

Rule 1.8(i) (emphasis added).

[11] Our members who are also licensed elsewhere should note that there appears to be no other jurisdiction that requires refunding, prior to instituting quantum meruit proceedings, what the lawyer reasonably believes to be the value of services rendered in a prematurely terminated flat fee case. Even Colorado, the source of the Sather case on which the trilogy so heavily relies, does not require refunding before initiating quantum meruit arbitration or suit against the client on flat fee issues. In re Gilbert, 346 P.3d 1018, 1026 (Colo. 2015) ("It would be a waste of resources in these circumstances to force attorneys to return money to which they are entitled and then bring suit against the client to recover it."); accord Gilbert dissenting opinion at 1030 (dissenting on other grounds, while acknowledging obvious right of lawyers to impound in trust a portion of prepaid flat fee in trust pending resolution of dispute through quantum meruit litigation). The holding of Gilbert was subsequently codified in Colorado Rules 1.5(h)(2) and 1.15(A)(c).

[12] For a detailed discussion of how the possessory lien works and is protected by Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code, even in the absence of an agreement explicitly granting a lien, see Cassandra Burke Robertson & Jesse Wynn, Untangling Attorney Retainers from Creditor Claims, 12 St. Mary's J. Legal Mal. & Ethics 142 (2021).

However, this rule does not affect a lawyer's continued ability to assert and enforce a retention lien as to client property in the lawyer's possession other than "a client's files." To the contrary, it affirmatively states the attorney's right to do so: "Rule 1.16(d) requires a lawyer to surrender papers and property to which the client is entitled when representation of the client terminates. Paragraph (i) of this rule states a narrow exception to 1.16(d): a lawyer may retain anything the law permits – including property – except for files." Rule 1.8, cmt. [17] (emphasis added).[13]

Under Rule 1.15(d):

> If a dispute arises concerning the respective interests among persons claiming an interest in such property, the undisputed portion shall be distributed and the portion in dispute shall be kept separate by the lawyer until the dispute is resolved. Any funds in dispute shall be deposited in a separate account meeting the requirements of paragraph (a) and (b).

A comment to this rule explains:

> The lawyer is not required to remit to the client funds that the lawyer reasonably believes represent fees owed. However, a lawyer may not hold funds to coerce a client into accepting the lawyer's contention. The disputed portion of the funds should be kept in trust and the lawyer should suggest means for prompt resolution of the dispute, such as arbitration. The undisputed portion of the funds should be promptly distributed.

Rule 1.15 cmt. [7].

The engagement agreement in the Alexei case contained no explicit terms to treat a portion of the client's prepayment as disputed funds under Rule 1.15(e) and thereby impound that portion in trust pending resolution of the fee dispute. Alexei is clear that refunding before pursuing a quantum meruit claim is not required to the extent the lawyer has a contractual claim of earned fees based an explicit and fair pricing method for partially-completed work. A fee agreement that contains a clearly written lien notice is another basis on which to defer refunding, what the lawyer reasonably believes can be proven as earned, before pursuing a quantum meruit claim.[14] For examples of such lien notices, see Cassandra Burke Robertson & Jesse Wynn, Untangling Attorney Retainers from Creditor Claims, 12 St. Mary's J. Legal Mal. & Ethics 142 (2021).

A separate provision of Rule 1.15 requires lawyers to "promptly deliver to the client or third person any funds or other property that the client or third person is entitled to receive." Rule 1.15(c). Thus, any amount in the lawyer's possession in excess of the lawyer's reasonable belief as to what can be proven in quantum meruit must be paid to the client promptly. What is "prompt" depends on the circumstances because "[t]he Rules of Professional Conduct [] are rules of reason." D.C. Rules: Scope cmt. [1]. If the lawyer is travelling and unable to make a transfer, for example, "prompt" requires doing it reasonably soon after returning. Holding on to other people's funds for over a year is not "prompt." In re Nave, 197 A.3d 511 (D.C. 2018); In re Martin, 67 A.3d 1032 (D.C. 2014).

Possible Arrangements to "Earn" Fees Before the Conclusion of the Matter and Holding Disputed Fee Amounts in Trust Pending Resolution of Any Fee Dispute.

As to possible arrangements that could entitle the lawyer to some amounts prior to the conclusion of a flat fee matter, Alexei left open a number of approaches so long as the chosen one is documented in the engagement agreement:

- "[T]he agreement might provide that the attorney earns the flat fee at an hourly rate set forth in the contract up to but not exceeding the total flat fee." To avoid improper front-loading, the hourly rate must be set at a level that will not prematurely exhaust client funds before completing substantially all work.
- "[T]he agreement might involve multiple discrete legal services … and attach a separate price for each service that sums to the total flat fee. Under such a contract, an attorney would earn the portion of the flat fee attributable to each separate legal service upon completing that project."[15]
- "[T]he agreement might provide that after the attorney submits, say, a first draft of a legal brief to the client for approval, [the lawyer] earns a [stated] percentage of the flat fee. These agreements, by deviating from the default rule, would allow attorneys to earn portions of the advanced flat fee as they worked on the client's behalf."
- "The rate at which the attorney earns the fees—whether hourly, by milestones, or by some other measurement—would still need to comport with the separate ethical requirement that the fees be reasonable."

319 A.3d at 414.

As we previously have written:

> The agreement can also contain language reflecting that the lawyer will earn the entire fee at the conclusion of a representation even if certain specified milestones have never been reached. For example, a lawyer who persuades a prosecutor to dismiss criminal charges in advance of trial could earn the entire fee, even if the lawyer and client had specified the trial as a milestone in their agreement. The milestones and approaches used can and should be tailored to the type of engagement. Those suitable for a criminal matter may not be appropriate to use for a real estate transaction or the drafting of a will.

D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 355 (2010).[16]

Although not required by the trilogy, we recommend that the lawyer give notice to the client as each agreed milestone is reached, unless the circumstances are such that the client has other means of knowing that. In a criminal case, for example, with a milestone of "appearing at the arraignment, $500," separate notice should not be required because both the attorney and the client would have been physically present at the arraignment. If another threshold involved the "filing of a discovery motion, $500," however, the client might not know about it unless the [13] D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 379 (2020) speaks broadly about limits on "retention liens" but it was focused on file retention liens and did not address the distinction that Rule 1.8(i) and its comments make about retention liens as to files and retention liens against client funds and other non-file, client property in the lawyer's possession.

[14] Explicit lien language was not before the Alexei Court. The Alexei Court expressed no intention to overrule longstanding precedent on a lawyer's right to contract explicitly for a security interest in the client's funds. See, e.g., Wolf v. Sherman, 682 A.2d 194 (D.C. 1996) (describing differences between common law retaining liens and contract-based "express liens"). There is likewise no basis to conclude that Alexei requires refunding before briefly first attempting to compromise and settle the fee dispute with the client.

[15] We are mindful that it may be impossible, on all but the simplest projects, to craft flat fee milestones that address every possible future fork in the road. Lawyers may also consider having a contractual provision to measure the amount of fees that will accrue (or be impoundable in trust) if the representation ends after starting work on the first milestone (or any other milestone) but before completing that milestone.

[16] D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion 355 was withdrawn in 2022 because the advice in the ethics opinion about any writing requirement in then Rule 1.15 was inconsistent with Ponds.

lawyer gives notice or makes a practice of sending copies of all filings to the client. In arrangements based on hourly rates, lawyers can simply continue the usual practice of sending a monthly statement reflecting their tasks, the hours expended, and the charges to be taken against the agreed fee. Building a record in which the client receives regular notices (and perforce, opportunities to object) will strengthen the lawyer's position in the event of any later dispute or disciplinary investigation.

Monthly Recurring Fees or Subscription Agreements.

An agreement might also provide for the periodic payment of a fixed amount in exchange for certain services generally described, as is often the case in lobbying or outside counsel for small business agreements. It is the nature of such arrangements that more work may be done in some months than in others during the term of the contract. The flat fee per period allows the parties to share the risk and smooth out the expected payments. The client may prefer for its own budgeting purposes to know the full amount in advance and pay it in installments (which may be equal or unequal, periodic or intermittent, regular or irregular) during the term of the engagement. So long as the agreement is reviewed and adjusted from time to time to assure that it has not become "unreasonable," we do not believe that the client is entitled to a refund of the monthly (or periodic) fee for odd months (or periods) in which little or no actual work was done.

Under the Mance/Ponds/Alexei trilogy, however, the monthly fee in this situation will not be considered to have been "earned" until the month (or other agreed period) in question has passed. Billing ideally should be "in arrears" and the monthly amount should remain in the trust account until the month (or other period) ends. If the client terminates the representation mid-month, the lawyer should think very carefully before treating any portion of that month's fee as having been earned. Uncertainty on this issue can be avoided if the engagement agreement spells out a formula for calculating the fee for a mid-month termination, perhaps by applying a fraction in which the numerator is the number of days in the month when the lawyer was still retained and the denominator is the total number of days in that month.

Lawyers sometimes enter into subscription agreements with clients under which clients are entitled to specified legal services in exchange for payment of a monthly or other periodic fee. A simple example would entitle the client to up to a certain number of consultations per month for a fixed or reduced fee. After that threshold has been crossed, the rates are adjusted to a level defined in the subscription agreement. These agreements may go into considerable detail as to what services are and are not covered. To the extent that these plans require payment in advance for legal services to be provided in the future, however, they are subject to Mance, Ponds and Alexei. Lawyers offering such plans should conduct themselves accordingly, especially if and when the client terminates the agreement sooner than originally expected. Lawyers should be aware that, if an unsophisticated client uses no services for several months, Disciplinary Counsel may assert that the trilogy requires a return of some or all of the funds to the client.

Conclusion

Prepaid fees should normally be held in a trust account until earned by performing the associated work. Although it is possible to secure an enforceable informed consent from the client to put the prepayment in the law firm's operating account, the Mance, Ponds and Alexei trilogy now requires oral and written specific disclosures to the client as described above.

The lesson of the trilogy is that prepaid legal fees for future services cannot be "earned on receipt" regardless of what the engagement agreement says. When and how prepaid fees will be earned during the representation should be defined in a written engagement agreement with the client. Failing that, the fee will not be deemed earned for purposes of drawing from the trust account until the natural completion of the entire matter.

Even then, the lawyer may not be entitled to a full fee if the matter ends without achieving all the agreed milestones on which the "earning" of the fee was conditioned. Lawyers can and should anticipate that possibility and contract for a reasonable written solution in the engagement agreement at the start of the matter.

During the representation, we recommend that the lawyer inform the client as the agreed milestones are met, unless the circumstances are such that the client already knows about it.

When the representation ends before the matter ends, the lawyer may not pay herself from trust, over the client's objection, until that objection is resolved by agreement, arbitration, or litigation. While the lawyer will have the right to bring a quantum meruit claim against the client to collect a fee for the reasonable value of the lawyer's services, it is no longer safe to hold the disputed amount of the fee in trust pending a resolution of the dispute absent a client's prior written authorization to do so. Being safe means refunding before suing for quantum meruit or contracting from the outset to an impoundment in trust of what the lawyer in good faith believes to be the value of services rendered in the lawyer's trust account during the pendency of the dispute.

Because Disciplinary Counsel routinely requests the engagement agreement whenever someone files a disciplinary complaint against an attorney, every disciplinary complaint could potentially trigger a disciplinary investigation into a lawyer's billing and payment procedures even if the complaint itself has nothing to do with such matters and lacks any merit.

Lawyers will not be able to avoid rules established by the Mance, Ponds and Alexei decisions by calling what amounts to a prepayment for future services some form of earned on receipt "retainer" or similarly misleading characterization. Lawyers who do so, whether deliberately or because they honestly do not understand the difference, may put their law licenses in peril.

Published: August 2025

Ethics Opinion 390

Representation and Privilege Issues in Context of Prior Work

A lawyer's prior work for a client occasionally becomes an issue in subsequent litigation or other representation on behalf of the same client.[1] When this situation arises, the lawyer must consider whether a conflict exists that prevents the lawyer from taking on or continuing the representation, or whether to seek the client's informed consent to a conflict. Among [1] Rule 1.7(b)(4) enumerates several broad areas where a lawyer's professional judgment may be compromised, resulting in a potential conflict in the representation of a client. This opinion only addresses conflicts that may occur where the lawyer has represented a client and the lawyer's prior work for the client may be at issue in the same or different matter for the same client. Although the prior work of a lawyer may be at issue when the lawyer subsequently represents a different client, this opinion does not address that scenario.

other rules of professional conduct, D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct 1.7(b)(4), 1.7(c), and 3.7 may apply. Under Rule 1.7(b)(4), a lawyer cannot take on a representation or continue to represent a client in an ongoing matter if the lawyer's personal interests will adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client. Rule 1.7(c), however, may permit the lawyer to take on the representation or continue the representation in certain situations, notwithstanding the proscription of Rule 1.7(b)(4). Further, under Rule 3.7, absent limited circumstances, a lawyer cannot advocate for a client at a trial in which the lawyer is likely to be a necessary witness.[2]

Attorney-client privilege issues arising in litigation may implicate a lawyer's prior work for a client. By way of example, the client may be able to raise an advice of counsel defense or otherwise attempt to negate claims against the client based upon, in whole or in part, the prior work performed by the lawyer, where raising such a defense may require or counsel that the client waive attorney-client privilege in whole or in part over prior communications between the lawyer and client. As discussed below, this situation raises ethical issues for the lawyer.

Applicable Rules

- 1.0 (Terminology)
- 1.4 (Communication)
- 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
- 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification: General Rule)
- 3.7 (Lawyer as Witness)

Inquiries

1. Under Rule 1.7, when is a lawyer precluded from representing a client in a matter where the lawyer's prior work for the client may be at issue?

2. Under Rule 3.7, when is a lawyer precluded from advocating for a client at trial?

3. What are a lawyer's obligations when attorney-client privilege issues arise based upon the lawyer's prior work for a client?

[2]See generally Iowa Ethics Opinion 09-03 (August 25, 2009) (analyzing Iowa Rules 1.7 and 3.7 in discussing whether law firm involved in purchase of closely held corporation could represent client in later dispute between the buyer and seller where law firm's prior work could be the focus of litigation.)

Discussion

D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct 1.7(b)(4) and 1.7(c) state:

> (b) Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if:
>
> * * * * *
>
> (4) The lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.
>
> (c) A lawyer may represent a client with respect to a matter in the circumstances described in paragraph (b) above if
>
> (1) Each potentially affected client provides informed consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation; and
>
> (2) The lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client.

D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct 3.7 states:

> (a) A lawyer shall not act as advocate at a trial in which the lawyer is likely to be a necessary witness except where:
>
> (1) The testimony relates to an uncontested issue;
>
> (2) The testimony relates to the nature and value of legal services rendered in the case; or
>
> (3) Disqualification of the lawyer would work substantial hardship on the client.
>
> (b) A lawyer may not act as advocate in a trial in which another lawyer in the lawyer's firm is likely to be called as a witness if the other lawyer would be precluded from acting as advocate in the trial by Rule 1.7 or Rule 1.9. The provisions of this paragraph (b) do not apply if the lawyer who is appearing as an advocate is employed by, and appears on behalf of, a government agency.

A. Application of Rule 1.7 When a Lawyer's Prior Work for a Client Raises Issues as to Whether the Lawyer May Continue to Represent the Client

A lawyer's prior work for a client may become an issue in a variety of circumstances. For example, a lawyer may provide tax advice that later becomes the subject of an audit or litigation with the Internal Revenue Service. Or a lawyer may negotiate a contract or draft an instrument on behalf of a client, and the meaning of the language negotiated or drafted by the lawyer later becomes the subject of actual or threatened litigation. See Iowa Ethics Opinion 09-03, supra. The lawyer and the lawyer's firm may nevertheless wish to represent the client in the subsequent matter, and the client may also desire the firm's representation in the subsequent matter. The lawyer and the firm, however, will need to consider their ethical obligations in determining whether they can take on the representation.

Rules 1.7(b)(4) and 1.7(c) provide the starting point in the analysis. As a threshold matter, Rule 1.7(b)(4) requires the lawyer to determine whether the lawyer can provide unvarnished advice to the client and vigorously represent the client given the lawyer's prior work or whether the lawyer's professional judgment will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's interest in her prior work. A concern is that the lawyer may avoid taking positions that could bring the quality of the lawyer's prior work into question. For example, the lawyer might choose a strategy that avoids exposing the shortcomings of the lawyer's prior work, even if that might not be the best strategy for the client. The lawyer must carefully analyze the rules and the circumstances of the potential representation and consider whether it would be permissible, or prudent, to represent the client. See Rule 1.7, cmt. 11 ("The lawyer's own interests should not be permitted to have an adverse effect on representation of a client. For example, if the probity of a lawyer's own conduct in a transaction is in serious question, it may be difficult or impossible for the lawyer to give a client detached advice.") See, e.g., In Re Conduct of Kluge, 335 Or. 326, 336-337 (2003) (lawyer violated Oregon's rules of professional conduct where the legality of the attorney's prior work was at issue, his interests reasonably might have affected his professional judgment, and he failed to make full disclosure of the potential conflict to his client and did not obtain his client's consent.)[3] If the lawyer concludes that she cannot provide competent and diligent representation to the client under the circumstances, then she may not undertake or continue the representation under Rule 1.7(c).

[3]The Kluge court opined that the lawyer "had a strong interest in defending the propriety of his conduct to protect his professional reputation…. and in avoiding any personal liability to [plaintiff] for his actions as [plaintiff's] supervisor." Id. In addition, the court found that the lawyer's interests might reasonably have compromised his ability to advise his client about litigation strategy in the case.

Examples of situations where courts have found representation impermissible, under the particular circumstances of those cases, include In Re Kieler, 290 Kan. 397, 401 (2010) (violation of Rule 1.7 when lawyer continued to represent client after malpractice claim ripened, his interests were in conflict with the client's interests, and he failed to obtain informed consent from his client under Kansas Rule 1.7(b)); In re Marriage of Wixom and Wixom, 182 Wash. App. 881, 888-905 (lawyer violated Rule 1.7 when he refused to withdraw from case after contending that his client should pay all fees associated with a Rule 11 sanctions order; because actual conflict existed, the client could not waive the conflict.). In these and similar situations, the lawyer must carefully consider, among other things, whether she can provide "competent and diligent" representation to the client.

There are instances where the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's personal interests, yet the client may nevertheless wish to retain the lawyer or continue with a current representation. In such circumstances, under Rule 1.7(c) the lawyer must: 1) reasonably believe that the lawyer can provide competent and diligent representation to the client; and 2) obtain informed consent from the client to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation. See Ambush v. Engelberg, 282 F. Supp. 3d. 58, 64 (D.D.C. 2017) (attorney could continue to represent clients where clients provided consent – after being advised by another attorney – as to attorney's continued representation, and attorney maintained that he reasonably believed he could provide competent and diligent representation of clients).

If the lawyer reasonably believes that the lawyer can provide competent and diligent representation to the client, the lawyer must communicate adequate information and an explanation about the material risks of and reasonable available alternatives to the proposed course of conduct.[4] In the context of prior work, the lawyer should at a minimum advise the client of the nature of the potential conflict, including the known risks of the representation, and the ability of the client to obtain new counsel. Although the lawyer's disclosures and the client's consent need not be in writing, it is prudent for the lawyer's disclosures and the client's consent to be in writing to avoid any subsequent misunderstandings.

A question arises as to whether the lawyer is in the best position to advise the client when there is a potential conflict of interest under Rule 1.7 due to the lawyer's prior work for the client. In such circumstances, the lawyer should consider advising the client to obtain independent legal advice on whether the client should retain the lawyer or the lawyer's firm in the matter.[5]

B. The Impact of Rule 3.7

In addition to assessing whether a lawyer can diligently handle a subsequent matter given the lawyer's prior work, the lawyer should assess whether the lawyer is likely to be a necessary witness at trial in the subsequent matter. Under Rule 3.7, if the lawyer is likely to be a necessary witness, the lawyer cannot act as an advocate at a trial in the matter unless the testimony relates to an uncontested issue, the testimony relates to the nature and value of legal services rendered in the case, or disqualification of the lawyer would work substantial hardship on the client.[6] Whether a lawyer is "likely" to be a "necessary" witness is dependent on the particular facts of the case. Others besides the lawyer may be able to testify on the matter on which the lawyer has knowledge, or the issue may not be important to the case or not be in dispute.[7]

Rule 3.7 generally applies only to advocacy at a trial and does not preclude an attorney from advocating for a client in pre-trial matters. The Committee has previously issued Legal Ethics Opinion 228, making it clear that Rule 3.7 applies only to representation as an advocate at trial, and that a lawyer may generally work on and appear in pre-trial matters for the client even if the lawyer is precluded from advocating for the client at trial under Rule 3.7. See also ABA Informal Op. 89-1529 (Oct. 20, 1989) (same).

Rule 3.7 attempts to balance the interests of the client in proceeding with the lawyer of its choice and the need to ensure that the opposing party is not prejudiced by the lawyer appearing both as an advocate and witness. As comments 1 and 2 to Rule 3.7 state:

> Combining the roles of advocate and witness can prejudice the opposing party and can involve a conflict of interest between the lawyer and client . . . The opposing party has a proper objection where the combination of roles may prejudice that party's rights in the litigation. A witness is required to testify on the basis of personal knowledge, while an advocate is expected to explain and comment on evidence given by others. It may not be clear whether a statement by an advocate-witness should be taken as proof or as an analysis of the proof.

The substantial hardship exception recognizes that "a balancing is required between the interests of the client and those of the opposing party."[8] Although the opposing party might suffer prejudice from the lawyer testifying, "[e]ven if there is risk of such prejudice, in determining whether the lawyer should be disqualified, due regard must be given to the effect of disqualification on the lawyer's client. It is relevant that one or both parties could reasonably foresee that the lawyer would probably be a witness."[9] Id.

Even if the lawyer is disqualified from acting as an advocate due to the lawyer's likelihood of appearing as a witness at trial, other lawyers in the firm are not necessarily precluded from acting as advocates in the trial. "[T]here is no general rule of imputed disqualification applicable to Rule 3.7." Rule 3.7, cmt. 5; see Rule 1.10. Whether there is nevertheless an improper client conflict of interest is determined by Rule 1.7 or 1.9. The lawyer's testimony may conflict with the client's, or the lawyer may be vulnerable to impeachment due to an incentive to testify in support of the position of the lawyer's firm.[10] The lawyer and firm will need to analyze whether a conflict may be present and fully inform the client of the issues so that the client can make a [4] See Rule 1.0(e).

[5] See Ambush, supra.

[6] See Rule 3.7(a).

[7] If the lawyer is a "necessary" witness from an objective standpoint, a strategy of refraining from calling the lawyer as a witness ordinarily will not avoid the restriction of Rule 3.7. See, e.g., Premium Products, Inc. v. Pro Performance Sports, LLC, 997 F. Supp. 2d 433 (E.D. Va. 2014); Freeman v. Vicchiarelli, 827 F. Supp. 300 (D.N.J. 1993); MacArthur v. Bank of N.Y., 524 F. Supp. 1205 (S.D.N.Y. 1981). But see Real Estate Training Int'l, LLC v. Nick Vertucci Cos., 124 F. Supp. 3d 1005 (C.D. Calif. 2015) (applying California rule).

[8] Rule 3.7, cmt. 4.

[9] For example, a client might face significant hardship if it must switch lawyers when the initial lawyer has substantial knowledge of the facts and nuances of the case, and the cost in time and money to switch counsel would be significant.

[10] See Rule 3.7, cmt. 6

meaningful choice whether to retain the firm or continue to have the firm represent it in the matter.

C. Attorney-Client Privilege Issues

A client's decision whether to waive an attorney-client privilege concerning the lawyer's prior work can implicate the rules and considerations discussed above. For example, a lawyer may advise a publicly-traded company that it need not reveal certain information in its public disclosure materials. If the client is later sued for failing to disclose that information, the client may need to consider an advice of counsel or similar defense. At least in some circumstances, advancing such a defense might mean waiving attorney-client privilege over some of the lawyer's communications, either because the client may affirmatively produce such communications or because opposing counsel may seek them.[11] If the same lawyer who gave the disclosure advice is representing the client in the subsequent litigation matter, a Rule 1.7 conflict may exist because the lawyer's own prior conduct is at issue. The potential waiver of privilege may be a significant aspect of the Rule 1.7 inquiry because the lawyer's own communications might be subject to disclosure and, depending on the circumstances, might cause embarrassment or create legal exposure for the lawyer. In these circumstances, the lawyer will need to fully inform the client about these circumstances and determine whether she can still provide competent and diligent representation to the client.[12] See Rule 1.7(c); Rule 1.6(e)(1) (unless an exception applies, a lawyer may only use or reveal client confidences or secrets with the informed consent of the client); see also Rule 1.4(b).

Rule 3.7 may also be implicated when a client advances a defense that might lead to an implied waiver of the attorney-client privilege. If the privilege is waived, the likelihood that the lawyer will be a necessary witness at trial increases, and consideration must be given to whether the lawyer can or should continue to represent the client.

Given the foregoing issues, the lawyer must determine whether she is in the best position to address with the client the possibility of advancing an advice of counsel or good faith defense. As with the representation issues discussed above, in providing advice to the client, the lawyer may intentionally or inadvertently seek to protect the lawyer's own interests rather than those of the client. In the case of privileged materials, the lawyer may not wish to have potentially embarrassing or ill-thought-out attorney-client communications disclosed to the other side, the court, or a jury, and may wish to avoid the possibility of having to testify at trial. And the lawyer may be concerned about a later malpractice claim by the client. Again, depending on the circumstances, an independent lawyer may be in a better position to advise the client on whether to advance the defense.

D. Conclusion

When a lawyer's prior work may be at issue in a subsequent matter for the same client, the lawyer must carefully consider whether the ethics rules permit the lawyer to represent the client in the subsequent matter. Rules 1.7 and 3.7, in particular, come into play. As an example, Rules 1.7 and 3.7 may be implicated when a client faces a decision whether to waive privilege, or whether to assert a position in litigation that could have the effect of waiving privilege, over the lawyer's prior communications with the client. When the lawyer's prior work is at issue, the lawyer must determine whether the lawyer's professional judgment will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's personal interests, and if so, whether the lawyer can continue to provide the client with diligent and competent representation. If the lawyer reasonably believes she can continue the representation notwithstanding the conflict, the lawyer must fully inform the client of the existence and nature of the conflict, as well as the possible adverse consequences of the representation, and obtain the client's informed consent before proceeding. It may be prudent for the lawyer to suggest that the client seek the advice of independent counsel. When a trial is possible, the lawyer or independent counsel must consider whether the lawyer is likely to be a necessary witness at the trial and, if so, whether Rule 1.7 or Rule 3.7 affects the lawyer's ability to represent or continue to represent the client.

Published: August 2025

[11] See, e.g. United States v. Bilzerian, 926 F.2d 1285 (1991) (attorney-client privilege implicitly waived when defendant in criminal securities fraud case raised good faith defense)

[12] Of course, there are a myriad of other situations where a lawyer's prior work might be implicated in a potential waiver of attorney-client privilege. This opinion does not purport to address the issue of when a client will be deemed to have waived the privilege; rather, the opinion merely discusses the ethical issues that a lawyer should consider when confronted with a potential waiver of privilege over past communications.