DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS

No. M-223-05

BEFORE: Washington, Chief Judge; and Farrell, Ruiz, Reid, Glickman, Kramer, and Fisher, Associate Judges.

ORDER
(FILED AUGUST 1, 2006)

On consideration of the proposed amendments to the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct submitted by the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia Bar on June 23, 2005, and the comments thereto, it is ORDERED that the rules are amended in accordance with the version transmitted by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals to the District of Columbia Bar electronically and by written copy on August 1, 2006. It is FURTHER ORDERED that the effective date of the Rules as amended is February 1, 2007.

ENTERED BY DIRECTION OF THE COURT:

GARLAND PINKSTON, JR.
Clerk of the Court

SCOPE

[1] The Rules of Professional Conduct (Rules) are rules of reason. They should be interpreted with reference to the purposes of legal representation and of the law itself. Some of the Rules are imperatives, cast in the terms "shall" or "shall not." These define proper conduct for purposes of professional discipline. Others, generally cast in the term "may," are permissive and define areas under the Rules in which the lawyer has professional discretion. No disciplinary action should be taken when the lawyer chooses not to act or acts within the bounds of such discretion. Other Rules define the nature of relationships between the lawyer and others. The Rules are thus partly obligatory and disciplinary and partly constitutive and descriptive in that they define a lawyer's professional role. Many of the Comments use the term "should." Comments do not add obligations to the Rules but provide guidance for interpreting the Rules and practicing in compliance with them.

[2] The Rules presuppose a larger legal context shaping the lawyer's role. That context includes court rules and statutes relating to matters of licensure, laws defining specific obligations of lawyers, and substantive and procedural law in general. Compliance with the Rules, as with all law in an open society, depends primarily upon understanding and voluntary compliance, secondarily upon reinforcement by peer and public opinion, and finally, when necessary, upon enforcement through disciplinary proceedings. The Rules do not, however, exhaust the moral and ethical considerations that should inform a lawyer, for no worthwhile human activity can be completely defined by legal rules. The Rules simply provide a framework for the ethical practice of law.

[3] Failure to comply with an obligation or prohibition imposed by a rule is a basis for invoking the disciplinary process. The Rules presuppose that disciplinary assessment of a lawyer's conduct will be made on the basis of the facts and circumstances as they existed at the time of the conduct in question and in recognition of the fact that a lawyer often has to act upon uncertain or incomplete evidence of the situation. Moreover, the Rules presuppose that whether or not discipline should be imposed for a violation, and the severity of a sanction, depend on all the circumstances, such as the willfulness and seriousness of the violation, extenuating factors and whether there have been previous violations.

[4] Nothing in these Rules, the Comments associated with them, or this Scope section is intended to enlarge or restrict existing law regarding the liability of lawyers to others or the requirements that the testimony of expert witnesses or other modes of proof must be employed in determining the scope of a lawyer's duty to others. Moreover, nothing in the Rules or associated Comments or this Scope section is intended to confer rights on an adversary of a lawyer to enforce the Rules in a proceeding other than a disciplinary proceeding. Some judicial decisions have considered the standard of conduct established in these Rules in determining the standard of care applicable in a proceeding other than a disciplinary proceeding. A tribunal presented with claims that the conduct of a lawyer appearing before that tribunal requires, for example, disqualification of the lawyer and/or the lawyer's firm may take such action as seems appropriate in the circumstances, which may or may not involve disqualification.

[5] In interpreting these Rules, the specific shall control the general in the sense that any rule that specifically addresses conduct shall control the disposition of matters and the outcome of such matters shall not turn upon the application of a more general rule that arguably also applies to the conduct in question. In a number of instances, there are specific rules that address specific types of conduct. The rule of interpretation expressed here is meant to make it clear that the general rule does not supplant, amend, enlarge, or extend the specific rule. So, for instance, the general terms of Rule 1.3 are not intended to govern conflicts of interest, which are particularly discussed in Rules 1.7, 1.8, and 1.9. Thus, conduct that is proper under the specific conflicts rules is not improper under the more general rule of Rule 1.3. Except where the principle of priority stated here is applicable, however, compliance with one rule does not generally excuse compliance with other rules. Accordingly, once a lawyer has analyzed the ethical considerations under a given rule, the lawyer must generally extend the analysis to ensure compliance with all other applicable rules.

[6] The Comment accompanying each Rule explains and illustrates the meaning and purpose of the Rule. This note on Scope provides general orientation and general rules of interpretation. The Comments are intended as guides to interpretation, but the text of each Rule is controlling.

CLIENT-LAWYER RELATIONSHIP

RULE 1.0 – TERMINOLOGY

(a) "BELIEF" OR "BELIEVES" DENOTES THAT THE PERSON INVOLVED ACTUALLY SUPPOSED THE FACT IN QUESTION TO BE TRUE. A PERSON'S BELIEF MAY BE INFERRED FROM CIRCUMSTANCES.

(b) "CONSULT" OR "CONSULTATION" DENOTES COMMUNICATION OF INFORMATION REASONABLY SUFFICIENT TO PERMIT THE CLIENT TO APPRECIATE THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE MATTER IN QUESTION.

(c) "FIRM" OR "LAW FIRM" DENOTES A LAWYER OR LAWYERS IN A LAW PARTNERSHIP, PROFESSIONAL CORPORATION, SOLE PROPRIETORSHIP OR OTHER ASSOCIATION AUTHORIZED TO PRACTICE LAW; OR LAWYERS EMPLOYED IN A LEGAL SERVICES ORGANIZATION OR THE LEGAL DEPARTMENT OF A CORPORATION OR OTHER ORGANIZATION, BUT DOES NOT INCLUDE A GOVERNMENT AGENCY OR OTHER GOVERNMENT ENTITY. SEE COMMENT, RULE 1.10.

(d) "FRAUD" OR "FRAUDULENT" DENOTES CONDUCT THAT IS FRAUDULENT UNDER THE SUBSTANTIVE OR PROCEDURAL LAW OF THE APPLICABLE JURISDICTION AND HAS A PURPOSE TO DECEIVE.

(e) "INFORMED CONSENT" DENOTES THE AGREEMENT BY A PERSON TO A PROPOSED COURSE OF CONDUCT AFTER THE LAWYER HAS COMMUNICATED ADEQUATE INFORMATION AND EXPLANATION ABOUT THE MATERIAL RISKS OF AND REASONABLY AVAILABLE ALTERNATIVES TO THE PROPOSED COURSE OF CONDUCT.

(f) "KNOWINGLY," "KNOWN," OR "KNOWS" DENOTES ACTUAL KNOWLEDGE OF THE FACT IN QUESTION. A PERSON'S KNOWLEDGE MAY BE INFERRED FROM CIRCUMSTANCES.

(g) "LAW CLERK" DENOTES A PERSON, TYPICALLY A RECENT LAW SCHOOL GRADUATE, WHO ACTS, TYPICALLY FOR A LIMITED PERIOD, AS CONFIDENTIAL ASSISTANT TO A JUDGE OR JUDGES OF A COURT; TO AN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW JUDGE OR A SIMILAR ADMINISTRATIVE HEARING OFFICER; OR TO THE HEAD OF A GOVERNMENTAL AGENCY OR TO A MEMBER OF A GOVERNMENTAL COMMISSION, EITHER OF WHICH HAS AUTHORITY TO ADJUDICATE OR TO PROMULGATE RULES OR REGULATIONS OF GENERAL APPLICATION.

(h) "MATTER" MEANS ANY LITIGATION, ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEEDING, LOBBYING ACTIVITY, APPLICATION, CLAIM, INVESTIGATION, ARREST, CHARGE OR ACCUSATION, THE DRAFTING OF A CONTRACT, A NEGOTIATION, ESTATE OR FAMILY RELATIONS PRACTICE ISSUE, OR ANY OTHER REPRESENTATION, EXCEPT AS EXPRESSLY LIMITED IN A PARTICULAR RULE.

(i) "PARTNER" DENOTES A MEMBER OF A PARTNERSHIP, A SHAREHOLDER IN A LAW FIRM ORGANIZED AS A PROFESSIONAL CORPORATION OR PROFESSIONAL LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANY, OR A MEMBER OF AN ASSOCIATION AUTHORIZED TO PRACTICE LAW.

(j) "REASONABLE" OR "REASONABLY" WHEN USED IN RELATION TO CONDUCT BY A LAWYER DENOTES THE CONDUCT OF A REASONABLY PRUDENT AND COMPETENT LAWYER.

(k) "REASONABLY SHOULD KNOW" WHEN USED IN REFERENCE TO A LAWYER DENOTES THAT A LAWYER OF REASONABLE PRUDENCE AND COMPETENCE WOULD ASCERTAIN THE MATTER IN QUESTION.

(l) "SCREENED" DENOTES THE ISOLATION OF A LAWYER FROM ANY PARTICIPATION IN A MATTER THROUGH THE TIMELY IMPOSITION OF PROCEDURES WITHIN A FIRM THAT ARE REASONABLY ADEQUATE UNDER THE CIRCUMSTANCES TO PROTECT INFORMATION THAT THE ISOLATED LAWYER IS OBLIGATED TO PROTECT UNDER THESE RULES OR OTHER LAW.

(m) "SUBSTANTIAL" WHEN USED IN REFERENCE TO DEGREE OR EXTENT DENOTES A MATERIAL MATTER OF CLEAR AND WEIGHTY IMPORTANCE.

(n) "TRIBUNAL" DENOTES A COURT, AN ARBITRATOR IN A BINDING ARBITRATION PROCEEDING, OR A LEGISLATIVE BODY, ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCY, OR OTHER BODY ACTING IN AN ADJUDICATIVE CAPACITY. A LEGISLATIVE BODY, ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCY OR OTHER BODY ACTS IN AN

ADJUDICATIVE CAPACITY WHEN A NEUTRAL OFFICIAL, AFTER THE PRESENTATION OF EVIDENCE OR LEGAL ARGUMENT BY A PARTY OR PARTIES, WILL RENDER A BINDING LEGAL JUDGMENT DIRECTLY AFFECTING A PARTY'S INTERESTS IN A PARTICULAR MATTER.

(o) "WRITING" OR "WRITTEN" DENOTES A TANGIBLE OR ELECTRONIC RECORD OF A COMMUNICATION OR REPRESENTATION, INCLUDING HANDWRITING, TYPEWRITING, PRINTING, PHOTO STATING, PHOTOGRAPHY, AUDIO OR VIDEO RECORDING, AND E-MAIL. A "SIGNED" WRITING INCLUDES AN ELECTRONIC SOUND, SYMBOL OR PROCESS ATTACHED TO OR LOGICALLY ASSOCIATED WITH A WRITING AND EXECUTED OR ADOPTED BY A PERSON WITH THE INTENT TO SIGN THE WRITING.

COMMENT

"Fraud" or "fraudulent"

[1] When used in these Rules, the terms "fraud" or "fraudulent" refer to conduct that is characterized as such under the substantive or procedural law of the applicable jurisdiction and has a purpose to deceive. This does not include merely negligent misrepresentation or negligent failure to apprise another of relevant information. For purposes of these Rules, it is not necessary that anyone has suffered damages or relied on the misrepresentation or failure to inform.

"Informed consent"

[2] Many of the Rules of Professional Conduct require the lawyer to obtain the informed consent of a client or other person (e.g., a former client or, under certain circumstances, a prospective client) before accepting or continuing representation or pursuing a course of conduct. See, e.g., Rules 1.2(c), 1.6(e) and 1.7(c)(1). The communication necessary to obtain such consent will vary according to the Rule involved and the circumstances giving rise to the need to obtain informed consent. The lawyer must make reasonable efforts to ensure that the client or other person possesses information reasonably adequate to make an informed decision. Ordinarily, this will require communication that includes a disclosure of the facts and circumstances giving rise to the situation, any explanation reasonably necessary to inform the client or other person of the material advantages and disadvantages of the proposed course of conduct and a discussion of the client's or other person's options and alternatives. In some circumstances it may be appropriate for a lawyer to advise a client or other person to seek the advice of other counsel. A lawyer need not inform a client or other person of facts or implications already known to the client or other person; nevertheless, a lawyer who does not personally inform the client or other person assumes the risk that the client or other person is inadequately informed and the consent is invalid. In determining whether the information and explanation provided are reasonably adequate, relevant factors include whether the client or other person is experienced in legal matters generally and in making decisions of the type involved, and whether the client or other person is independently represented by other counsel in giving the consent. Normally, such persons need less information and explanation than others, and generally a client or other person who is independently represented by other counsel in giving the consent should be assumed to have given informed consent. In all circumstances, the client's consent must be not only informed but also uncoerced by the lawyer or by any other person acting on the lawyer's behalf.

[3] Obtaining informed consent will usually require an affirmative response by the client or other person. In general, a lawyer may not assume consent from a client's or other person's silence. Consent may be inferred, however, from the conduct of a client or other person who has reasonably adequate information about the matter. A number of Rules require that a person's consent be in writing. See Rules 1.8(a)(3) and 1.8(g). For a definition of "writing," see Rule 1.0(o).

"Screened"

[4] This definition applies to situations where screening of a personally disqualified lawyer is permitted to remove imputation of a conflict of interest under Rules 1.11, 1.12 or 1.18.

[5] The purpose of screening is to assure the affected parties that confidential information known by the personally disqualified lawyer remains protected. The personally disqualified lawyer should acknowledge the obligation not to communicate with any of the other lawyers in the firm with respect to the matter. Similarly, other lawyers in the firm who are working on the matter should be informed that the screening is in place and that they may not communicate with the personally disqualified lawyer with respect to the matter. Additional screening measures that are appropriate for the particular matter will depend upon the circumstances. To implement, reinforce and remind all affected lawyers of the presence of the screening, it may be appropriate for the firm to undertake such procedures as a written undertaking by the screened lawyer to avoid any communication with other firm personnel and any contact with any firm files or other materials relating to the matter, written notice and instructions to all other firm personnel forbidding any communication with the screened lawyer relating to the matter, denial of access by the screened lawyer to firm files or other materials relating to the matter and periodic reminders of the screen to the screened lawyer and all other firm personnel. For a further explanation of screening, see D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 279.

[6] In order to be effective, screening measures must be implemented as soon as practical after a lawyer or law firm knows or reasonably should know that there is a need for screening.

RULE 1.1 – COMPETENCE

(a) A LAWYER SHALL PROVIDE COMPETENT REPRESENTATION TO A CLIENT. COMPETENT REPRESENTATION REQUIRES THE LEGAL KNOWLEDGE, SKILL, THOROUGHNESS, AND PREPARATION REASONABLY NECESSARY FOR THE REPRESENTATION.

(b) A LAWYER SHALL SERVE A CLIENT WITH SKILL AND CARE COMMENSURATE WITH THAT GENERALLY AFFORDED TO CLIENTS BY OTHER LAWYERS IN SIMILAR MATTERS.

COMMENT

Legal Knowledge and Skill

[1] In determining whether a lawyer employs the requisite knowledge and skill in a particular matter, relevant factors include the relative complexity and specialized nature of the matter, the lawyer's general experience, the lawyer's training and experience in the field in question, the preparation and study the lawyer is able to give the matter, and whether it is feasible to refer the matter to, or associate or consult with, a lawyer of established competence in the field in question. In many instances, the required proficiency is that of a general practitioner. Expertise in a particular field of law may be required in some circumstances. One such circumstance would be where the lawyer, by representations made to the client, has led the client reasonably to expect a special level of expertise in the matter undertaken by the lawyer.

[2] A lawyer need not necessarily have special training or prior experience to handle legal problems of a type with which the lawyer is unfamiliar. A newly admitted lawyer can be as competent as a practitioner with long experience. Some important legal skills, such as the analysis of precedent, the evaluation of evidence, and legal drafting, are required in all legal problems. Perhaps the most fundamental legal skill consists of determining what kind of legal problems a situation may involve, a skill that necessarily transcends any particular specialized knowledge. A lawyer can provide adequate representation in a wholly novel field through necessary study. Competent representation can also be provided through the association of a lawyer of established competence in the field in question.

[3] In an emergency a lawyer may give advice or assistance in a matter in which the lawyer does not have the skill ordinarily required where referral to or consultation or association with another lawyer would be impractical. Even in an emergency, however, assistance should be limited to that reasonably necessary in the circumstances, for ill-considered action under emergency conditions can jeopardize the client's interest.

[4] A lawyer may accept representation where the requisite level of competence can be achieved by reasonable preparation. This applies as well to a lawyer who is appointed as counsel for an unrepresented person. See also Rule 6.2.

Thoroughness and Preparation

[5] Competent handling of a particular matter includes inquiry into and analysis of the factual and legal elements of the problem, and use of methods, procedures, and technology meeting the standards of competent practitioners. It also includes adequate preparation and continuing attention to the needs of the representation to assure that there is no neglect of such needs. The required attention and preparation are determined in part by what is at stake; major litigation and complex transactions ordinarily require more elaborate treatment than matters of lesser consequence.

Retaining or Contracting with Other Lawyers

[6] Except when directed by a client, before a lawyer retains or contracts with other lawyers not associated with the lawyer's own firm to provide or assist in the provision of legal services to a particular client or on a particular matter, the lawyer should inform the client or clients of 1) the use and nature of the other lawyers' services; and 2) the identity of the lawyers who will participate in the representation. However, the lawyer generally need not inform the client of the identity of other lawyers who are hired to conduct document review, digest depositions, provide translations, or perform similar services. The lawyer must reasonably believe that retaining other lawyers' services will contribute to the competent and ethical representation of the client. See also Rules 1.2, 1.4, 1.5, 1.6, and 5.5. The reasonableness of the decision to retain or contract with other lawyers not associated with the lawyer's own firm will depend upon the circumstances, including the education, experience and reputation of the nonfirm lawyers; the nature of the services assigned to the nonfirm lawyers; and the legal protections and professional conduct rules of the jurisdictions in which the services will be performed, particularly relating to confidential information. A division of a fee between lawyers who are not in the same firm is subject to the requirements of Rule 1.5(e).

[7] When the client directs that other lawyers not associated with the lawyer's firm assist in the provision of legal services to the client, the lawyer ordinarily should reach agreement with the client about the identity of the lawyers who will participate in the representation and about the contemplated division of responsibility among them. See Rules 1.2, 1.5. When making such an allocation in a matter pending before a tribunal, lawyers and parties may have additional obligations that are a matter of law beyond the scope of these Rules. If at any time the lawyer reasonably believes that the client's direction does not contribute to the competent and ethical representation of the client or materially changes an existing agreement between the client and the lawyer or law firm, the lawyer should inform the client and may withdraw from the representation pursuant to Rule 1.16.

Maintaining Competence

[8] To maintain the requisite knowledge and skill, a lawyer should keep abreast of changes in the law and its practice, and engage in such continuing study and education as may be necessary to maintain competence.

RULE 1.2 – SCOPE OF REPRESENTATION

(a) A LAWYER SHALL ABIDE BY A CLIENT'S DECISIONS CONCERNING THE OBJECTIVES OF REPRESENTATION, SUBJECT TO PARAGRAPHS (c), (d), AND (e), AND SHALL CONSULT WITH THE CLIENT AS TO THE MEANS BY WHICH THEY ARE TO BE PURSUED. A LAWYER MAY TAKE SUCH ACTION ON BEHALF OF THE CLIENT AS IS IMPLIEDLY AUTHORIZED TO CARRY OUT THE REPRESENTATION. A LAWYER SHALL ABIDE BY A CLIENT'S DECISION WHETHER TO ACCEPT AN OFFER OF SETTLEMENT OF A MATTER. IN A CRIMINAL CASE, THE LAWYER SHALL ABIDE BY THE CLIENT'S DECISION, AFTER CONSULTATION WITH THE LAWYER, AS TO A PLEA TO BE ENTERED, WHETHER TO WAIVE JURY TRIAL, AND WHETHER THE CLIENT WILL TESTIFY.

(b) A LAWYER'S REPRESENTATION OF A CLIENT, INCLUDING REPRESENTATION BY APPOINTMENT, DOES NOT CONSTITUTE AN ENDORSEMENT OF THE CLIENT'S POLITICAL, ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, OR MORAL VIEWS OR ACTIVITIES.

(c) A LAWYER MAY LIMIT THE SCOPE OF THE REPRESENTATION IF THE LIMITATION IS REASONABLE UNDER THE CIRCUMSTANCES AND THE CLIENT GIVES INFORMED CONSENT.

(d) A GOVERNMENT LAWYER'S AUTHORITY AND CONTROL OVER DECISIONS CONCERNING THE REPRESENTATION MAY, BY STATUTE OR REGULATION, BE EXPANDED BEYOND THE LIMITS IMPOSED BY PARAGRAPHS (a) AND (c).

(e) A LAWYER SHALL NOT COUNSEL A CLIENT TO ENGAGE, OR ASSIST A CLIENT, IN CONDUCT THAT THE LAWYER KNOWS IS CRIMINAL OR FRAUDULENT, BUT A LAWYER MAY DISCUSS THE LEGAL CONSEQUENCES OF ANY PROPOSED COURSE OF CONDUCT WITH A CLIENT AND MAY COUNSEL OR ASSIST A CLIENT TO MAKE A GOOD-FAITH EFFORT TO DETERMINE THE VALIDITY, SCOPE, MEANING, OR APPLICATION OF THE LAW.

(f) WHEN A LAWYER KNOWS THAT A CLIENT EXPECTS ASSISTANCE NOT PERMITTED BY THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT OR OTHER LAW, THE LAWYER SHALL CONSULT WITH THE CLIENT REGARDING THE RELEVANT LIMITATIONS ON THE LAWYER'S CONDUCT.

COMMENT

Scope of Representation

[1] Both lawyer and client have authority and responsibility in the objectives and means of representation. The client has ultimate authority to determine the purposes to be served by legal representation, within the limits imposed by law and the lawyer's professional obligations. Within these limits, a client also has a right to consult with the lawyer about the means to be used in pursuing those objectives. At the same time, a lawyer is not required to pursue objectives or employ means simply because a client may wish that the lawyer do so. A clear distinction between objectives and means sometimes cannot be drawn, and in many cases the client-lawyer relationship partakes of a joint undertaking. In questions of means, the lawyer should assume responsibility for technical and legal tactical issues, but should defer to the client regarding such questions as the expense to be incurred and concern for third persons who might be adversely affected. Law defining the lawyer's scope of authority in litigation varies among jurisdictions.

[2] In a case in which the client appears to be suffering mental disability, the lawyer's duty to abide by the client's decisions is to be guided by reference to Rule 1.14.

Independence From Client's Views or Activities

[3] Legal representation should not be denied to people who are unable to afford legal services, or whose cause is controversial or the subject of popular disapproval. By the same token, representing a client does not constitute approval of the client's views or activities.

Services Limited in Objectives or Means

[4] The objectives or scope of services provided by the lawyer may be limited by agreement with the client or by terms under which the lawyer's services are made available to the client. For example, a retainer may be for a specifically defined purpose. Representation provided through a legal aid agency may be subject to limitations on the types of cases the agency handles. When a lawyer has been retained by an insurer to represent an insured, the representation may be limited to matters related to the insurance coverage. The terms upon which representation is undertaken may exclude specific objectives or means. Such limitations may exclude objectives or means that the lawyer regards as repugnant or imprudent. Rule 1.5(b) requires a lawyer to communicate the scope of the lawyer's representation when the lawyer establishes a new lawyer-client relationship, and it is generally prudent for the lawyer to explain in writing any limits on the objectives or scope of the lawyer's services.

[5] An agreement concerning the scope of representation must accord with the Rules of Professional Conduct and other law. Thus, the client may not be asked to agree to representation so limited in scope as to violate Rule 1.1, or to surrender the right to terminate the lawyer's services or the right to settle litigation that the lawyer might wish to continue.

[6] Rule 1.5(b) requires a lawyer to communicate in writing the scope of the lawyer's representation when the lawyer has not regularly represented a client. In all matters involving limited scope representation, it is generally prudent for a lawyer to state in writing any limitation on representation, provide the client with a written summary of considerations discussed, and to receive a written informed consent from the client to the lawyer's limited representation. The term "informed consent" is defined in Rule 1.0(e) and is discussed in Comment 28 to Rule 1.7. Lawyers also should recognize that information and discussion sufficient for informed consent by more sophisticated business clients may not be sufficient to permit less sophisticated clients to provide informed consent. See Comment 28 to Rule 1.7.

Criminal, Fraudulent, and Prohibited Transactions

[7] A lawyer is required to give an honest opinion about the actual consequences that appear likely to result from a client's conduct. The fact that a client uses advice in a course of action that is criminal or fraudulent does not, of itself, make a lawyer a party to the course of action. However, a lawyer may not knowingly assist a client in criminal or fraudulent conduct. There is a critical distinction between presenting an analysis of legal aspects of questionable conduct and recommending the means by which a crime or fraud might be committed with impunity.

[8] When the client's course of action has already begun and is continuing, the lawyer's responsibility is especially delicate. The lawyer is required to avoid assisting the client, for example, by drafting or delivering documents that the lawyer knows are fraudulent or by suggesting how the wrongdoing might be concealed. A lawyer may not continue assisting a client in conduct that the lawyer originally supposed was legally proper but then discovers is criminal or fraudulent. The lawyer must, therefore, withdraw from the representation of the client in the matter. See Rule 1.16(a). In some cases, withdrawal alone might be insufficient. It may be necessary for the lawyer to give notice of the fact of withdrawal and to disaffirm any opinion, document, affirmation or the like. See Rule 4.1.

[9] Where the client is a fiduciary, the lawyer may be charged with special obligations in dealings with a beneficiary.

[10] Paragraph (e) applies whether or not the defrauded party is a party to the transaction. Hence, a lawyer should not participate in a sham transaction, for example, a transaction to effectuate criminal or fraudulent escape of tax liability. Paragraph (e) does not preclude undertaking a criminal defense incident to a general retainer for legal services to a lawful enterprise. The last clause of paragraph (e) recognizes that determining the validity or interpretation of a statute or regulation may require a course of action involving disobedience of the statute or regulation or of the interpretation placed upon it by governmental authorities.

RULE 1.3 – DILIGENCE AND ZEAL

(a) A LAWYER SHALL REPRESENT A CLIENT ZEALOUSLY AND DILIGENTLY WITHIN THE BOUNDS OF THE LAW.

(b) A LAWYER SHALL NOT INTENTIONALLY:

(1) FAIL TO SEEK THE LAWFUL OBJECTIVES OF A CLIENT THROUGH REASONABLY AVAILABLE MEANS PERMITTED BY LAW AND THE DISCIPLINARY RULES; OR

(2) PREJUDICE OR DAMAGE A CLIENT DURING THE COURSE OF THE PROFESSIONAL RELATIONSHIP.

(c) A LAWYER SHALL ACT WITH REASONABLE PROMPTNESS IN REPRESENTING A CLIENT.

COMMENT

[1] The duty of a lawyer, both to the client and to the legal system, is to represent the client zealously within the bounds of the law, including the Rules of Professional Conduct and other enforceable professional regulations, such as agency regulations applicable to lawyers practicing before the agency. This duty requires the lawyer to pursue a matter on behalf of a client despite opposition, obstruction, or personal inconvenience to the lawyer, and to take whatever lawful and ethical measures are required to vindicate a client's cause or endeavor. A lawyer should act with commitment and dedication to the interests of the client. However, a lawyer is not bound to press for every advantage that might be realized for a client. A lawyer has professional discretion in determining the means by which a matter should be pursued. See Rule 1.2. A lawyer's workload should be controlled so that each matter can be handled adequately.

[2] This duty derives from the lawyer's membership in a profession that has the duty of assisting members of the public to secure and protect available legal rights and benefits. In our government of laws and not of individuals, each member of our society is entitled to have such member's conduct judged and regulated in accordance with the law; to seek any lawful objective through legally permissible means; and to present for adjudication any lawful claim, issue, or defense.

[3] The bounds of the law in a given case are often difficult to ascertain. The language of legislative enactments and judicial opinions may be uncertain as applied to varying factual situations. The limits and specific meaning of apparently relevant law may be made doubtful by changing or developing constitutional interpretations, ambiguous statutes, or judicial opinions, and changing public and judicial attitudes.

[4] Where the bounds of law are uncertain, the action of a lawyer may depend on whether the lawyer is serving as advocate or adviser. A lawyer may serve simultaneously as both advocate and adviser, but the two roles are essentially different. In asserting a position on behalf of a client, an advocate for the most part deals with past conduct and must take the facts as the advocate finds them. By contrast, a lawyer serving as adviser primarily assists the client in determining the course of future conduct and relationships. While serving as advocate, a lawyer should resolve in favor of the client doubts as to the bounds of the law, but even when acting as an advocate, a lawyer may not institute or defend a proceeding unless the positions taken are not frivolous. See Rule 3.1. In serving a client as adviser, a lawyer, in appropriate circumstances, should give a lawyer's professional opinion as to what the ultimate decision of the courts would likely be as to the applicable law.

[5] To prevent neglect of client matters in the event that a sole practitioner ceases to practice law, each sole practitioner should prepare a plan, in conformity with applicable rules, that designates another competent lawyer to review client files, notify each client that the lawyer is no longer engaged in the practice of law, and determine whether there is a need for immediate protective action. See D.C. App. R. XI, § 15(a) (appointment of counsel by District of Columbia Court of Appeals, on motion of Board on Professional Responsibility, where an attorney dies, disappears, or is suspended for incapacity or disability and no partner, associate or other responsible attorney is capable of conducting the attorney's affairs).

[6] In the exercise of professional judgment, a lawyer should always act in a manner consistent with the best interests of the client. However, when an action in the best interests of the client seems to be unjust, a lawyer may ask the client for permission to forgo such action. If the lawyer knows that the client expects assistance that is not in accord with the Rules of Professional Conduct or other law, the lawyer must inform the client of the pertinent limitations on the lawyer's conduct. See Rule 1.2(e) and (f). Similarly, the lawyer's obligation not to prejudice the interests of the client is subject to the duty of candor toward the tribunal under Rule 3.3 and the duty to expedite litigation under Rule 3.2.

[7] The duty of a lawyer to represent the client with zeal does not militate against the concurrent obligation to treat with consideration all persons involved in the legal process and to avoid the infliction of needless harm. Thus, the lawyer's duty to pursue a client's lawful objectives zealously does not prevent the lawyer from acceding to reasonable requests of opposing counsel that do not prejudice the client's rights, being punctual in fulfilling all professional commitments, avoiding offensive tactics, or treating all persons involved in the legal process with courtesy and consideration.

[8] Perhaps no professional shortcoming is more widely resented by clients than procrastination. A client's interests often can be adversely affected by the passage of time or the change of conditions; in extreme instances, as when a lawyer overlooks a statute of limitations, the client's legal position may be destroyed. Even when the client's interests are not affected in substance, however, unreasonable delay can cause a client needless anxiety and undermine confidence in the lawyer's trustworthiness. Neglect of client matters is a serious violation of the obligation of diligence.

[9] Unless the relationship is terminated as provided in Rule 1.16, a lawyer should carry through to conclusion all matters undertaken for a client. If a lawyer's employment is limited to a specific matter, the relationship terminates when the matter has been resolved. If a lawyer has served a client over a substantial period in a variety of matters, the client sometimes may assume that the lawyer will continue to serve on a continuing basis unless the lawyer gives notice of withdrawal. Doubt about whether a client-lawyer relationship still exists should be eliminated by the lawyer, preferably in writing, so that the client will not mistakenly suppose the lawyer is looking after the client's affairs when the lawyer has ceased to do so. For example, if a lawyer has handled a judicial or administrative proceeding that produced a result adverse to the client but has not been specifically instructed concerning pursuit of an appeal, the lawyer should advise the client of the possibility of appeal before relinquishing responsibility for the matter.

[10] Rule 1.3 is a rule of general applicability, and it is not meant to enlarge or restrict any specific rule. In particular, Rule 1.3 is not meant to govern conflicts of interest, which are addressed by Rules 1.7, 1.8, and 1.9.

RULE 1.4 – COMMUNICATION

(a) A LAWYER SHALL KEEP A CLIENT REASONABLY INFORMED ABOUT THE STATUS OF A MATTER AND PROMPTLY COMPLY WITH REASONABLE REQUESTS FOR INFORMATION.

(b) A LAWYER SHALL EXPLAIN A MATTER TO THE EXTENT REASONABLY NECESSARY TO PERMIT THE CLIENT TO MAKE INFORMED DECISIONS REGARDING THE REPRESENTATION.

(c) A LAWYER WHO RECEIVES AN OFFER OF SETTLEMENT IN A CIVIL CASE OR PROFFERED PLEA BARGAIN IN A CRIMINAL CASE SHALL INFORM THE CLIENT PROMPTLY OF THE SUBSTANCE OF THE COMMUNICATION.

COMMENT

[1] The client should have sufficient information to participate intelligently in decisions concerning the objectives of the representation and the means by which they are to be pursued, to the extent the client is willing and able to do so. For example, a lawyer negotiating on behalf of a client should provide the client with facts relevant to the matter, inform the client of communications from another party, and take other reasonable steps that permit the client to make a decision regarding a serious offer from another party. A lawyer who receives from opposing counsel an offer of settlement in a civil controversy or a proffered plea bargain in a criminal case is required to inform the client promptly of its substance. See Rule 1.2(a). Even when a client delegates authority to the lawyer, the client should be kept advised of the status of the matter.

[2] A client is entitled to whatever information the client wishes about all aspects of the subject matter of the representation unless the client expressly consents not to have certain information passed on. The lawyer must be particularly careful to ensure that decisions of the client are made only after the client has been informed of all relevant considerations. The lawyer must initiate and maintain the consultative and decision-making process if the client does not do so and must ensure that the ongoing process is thorough and complete.

[3] Adequacy of communication depends in part on the kind of advice or assistance involved. The guiding principle is that the lawyer should fulfill reasonable client expectations for information consistent with (1) the duty to act in the client's best interests, and (2) the client's overall requirements and objectives as to the character of representation.

[4] Ordinarily, the information to be provided is that appropriate for a client who is a comprehending and responsible adult. However, fully informing the client according to this standard may be impracticable, for example, where the client is a child or suffers from mental disability. See Rule 1.14. When the client is an organization or group, it is often impossible or inappropriate to inform every one of its members about its legal affairs; ordinarily, the lawyer should address communications to the appropriate officials of the organization. See Rule 1.13. Where many routine matters are involved, a system of limited or occasional reporting may be arranged with the client. Practical exigency may also require a lawyer to act for a client without prior consultation. When the lawyer is conducting a trial, it is often not possible for the lawyer to consult with the client and obtain the client's acquiescence in tactical matters arising during the course of trial. It is sufficient if the lawyer consults with the client in advance of trial on significant issues that can be anticipated as arising during the course of the trial, and consults during trial to the extent practical, given the nature of the trial process.

Withholding Information

[5] In rare circumstances, a lawyer may be justified in delaying transmission of information when the client would be likely to react imprudently to an immediate communication. Thus, a lawyer might withhold a psychiatric diagnosis of a client when the examining psychiatrist indicates that disclosure would harm the client. Similarly, a lawyer may be justified, for humanitarian reasons, in not conveying certain information, for example, where the information would merely be upsetting to a terminally ill client. A lawyer may not withhold information to serve the lawyer's own interest or convenience. Rules or court orders governing litigation (such as a protective order limiting access to certain types of discovery material to counsel only) may provide that information supplied to a lawyer may not be disclosed to the client. Rule 3.4(c) directs compliance with such rules or orders.

RULE 1.5 – FEES

(a) A LAWYER'S FEE SHALL BE REASONABLE. THE FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED IN DETERMINING THE REASONABLENESS OF A FEE INCLUDE THE FOLLOWING:

(1) THE TIME AND LABOR REQUIRED, THE NOVELTY AND DIFFICULTY OF THE QUESTIONS INVOLVED, AND THE SKILL REQUISITE TO PERFORM THE LEGAL SERVICE PROPERLY;

(2) THE LIKELIHOOD, IF APPARENT TO THE CLIENT, THAT THE ACCEPTANCE OF THE PARTICULAR EMPLOYMENT WILL PRECLUDE OTHER EMPLOYMENT BY THE LAWYER;

(3) THE FEE CUSTOMARILY CHARGED IN THE LOCALITY FOR SIMILAR LEGAL SERVICES;

(4) THE AMOUNT INVOLVED AND THE RESULTS OBTAINED;

(5) THE LIMITATIONS IMPOSED BY THE CLIENT OR BY THE CIRCUMSTANCES;

(6) THE NATURE AND LENGTH OF THE PROFESSIONAL RELATIONSHIP WITH THE CLIENT;

(7) THE EXPERIENCE, REPUTATION, AND ABILITY OF THE LAWYER OR LAWYERS PERFORMING THE SERVICES; AND

(8) WHETHER THE FEE IS FIXED OR CONTINGENT.

(b) WHEN THE LAWYER HAS NOT REGULARLY REPRESENTED THE CLIENT, THE BASIS OR RATE OF THE FEE, THE SCOPE OF THE LAWYER'S REPRESENTATION, AND THE EXPENSES FOR WHICH THE CLIENT WILL BE RESPONSIBLE SHALL BE COMMUNICATED TO THE CLIENT, IN WRITING, BEFORE OR WITHIN A REASONABLE TIME AFTER COMMENCING THE REPRESENTATION.

(c) A FEE MAY BE CONTINGENT ON THE OUTCOME OF THE MATTER FOR WHICH THE SERVICE IS RENDERED, EXCEPT IN A MATTER IN WHICH A CONTINGENT FEE IS PROHIBITED BY PARAGRAPH (d) OR OTHER LAW. A CONTINGENT FEE

AGREEMENT SHALL BE IN WRITING AND SHALL STATE THE METHOD BY WHICH THE FEE IS TO BE DETERMINED, INCLUDING THE PERCENTAGE OR PERCENTAGES THAT SHALL ACCRUE TO THE LAWYER IN THE EVENT OF SETTLEMENT, TRIAL, OR APPEAL, LITIGATION, OTHER EXPENSES TO BE DEDUCTED FROM THE RECOVERY, WHETHER SUCH EXPENSES ARE TO BE DEDUCTED BEFORE OR AFTER THE CONTINGENT FEE IS CALCULATED, AND WHETHER THE CLIENT WILL BE LIABLE FOR EXPENSES REGARDLESS OF THE OUTCOME OF THE MATTER. UPON CONCLUSION OF A CONTINGENT FEE MATTER, THE LAWYER SHALL PROVIDE THE CLIENT WITH A WRITTEN STATEMENT STATING THE OUTCOME OF THE MATTER, AND IF THERE IS A RECOVERY, SHOWING THE REMITTANCE TO THE CLIENT AND THE METHOD OF ITS DETERMINATION.

(d) A LAWYER SHALL NOT ENTER INTO AN ARRANGEMENT FOR, CHARGE, OR COLLECT A CONTINGENT FEE FOR REPRESENTING A DEFENDANT IN A CRIMINAL CASE.

(e) A DIVISION OF A FEE BETWEEN LAWYERS WHO ARE NOT IN THE SAME FIRM MAY BE MADE ONLY IF:

(1) THE DIVISION IS IN PROPORTION TO THE SERVICES PERFORMED BY EACH LAWYER OR EACH LAWYER ASSUMES JOINT RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE REPRESENTATION;

(2) THE CLIENT IS ADVISED, IN WRITING, OF THE IDENTITY OF THE LAWYERS WHO WILL PARTICIPATE IN THE REPRESENTATION, OF THE CONTEMPLATED DIVISION OF RESPONSIBILITY, AND OF THE EFFECT OF THE ASSOCIATION OF LAWYERS OUTSIDE THE FIRM ON THE FEE TO BE CHARGED;

(3) THE CLIENT GIVES INFORMED CONSENT TO THE ARRANGEMENT; AND

(4) THE TOTAL FEE IS REASONABLE.

(f) ANY FEE THAT IS PROHIBITED BY PARAGRAPH (d) ABOVE OR BY LAW IS PER SE UNREASONABLE.

COMMENT

Basis or Rate of Fee

[1] When the lawyer has regularly represented a client, they ordinarily will have evolved an understanding concerning the basis or rate of the fee. In a new client-lawyer relationship, however, an understanding as to the fee should be promptly established, together with the scope of the lawyer's representation and the expenses for which the client will be responsible. It is not necessary to recite all the factors that underlie the basis of the fee, but only those that are directly involved in its computation. It is sufficient, for example, to state that the basic rate is an hourly charge or a fixed amount or an estimated amount, or to identify the factors that may be taken into account in finally fixing the fee. When developments occur during the representation that render an earlier estimate substantially inaccurate, a revised estimate should be provided to the client.

[2] A written statement concerning the fee, required to be furnished in advance in most cases by paragraph (b), reduces the possibility of misunderstanding. In circumstances in which paragraph (b) requires that the basis for the lawyer's fee be in writing, an individualized writing specific to the particular client and representation is generally not required. Unless there are unique aspects of the fee arrangement, the lawyer may utilize a standardized letter, memorandum, or pamphlet explaining the lawyer's fee practices, and indicating those practices applicable to the specific representation. Such publications would, for example, explain applicable hourly billing rates, if billing on an hourly rate basis is contemplated, and indicate what charges (such as filing fees, transcript costs, duplicating costs, long-distance telephone charges) are imposed in addition to hourly rate charges.

[3] Where the services to be rendered are covered by a fixed fee schedule that adequately informs the client of the charges to be imposed, a copy of such schedule may be utilized to satisfy the requirement for a writing. Such services as routine real estate transactions, uncontested divorces, or preparation of simple wills, for example, may be suitable for description in such a fixed-fee schedule.

Terms of Payment

[4] A lawyer may require advance payment of a fee, but is obliged to return any unearned portion. See Rule 1.16(d). A lawyer may accept property in payment for services, such as an ownership interest in an enterprise. However, a fee paid in property instead of money may be subject to special scrutiny because it involves questions concerning both the value of the services and the lawyer's special knowledge of the value of the property.

[5] An agreement may not be made whose terms might induce the lawyer improperly to curtail services for the client or perform them in a way contrary to the client's interest. For example, a lawyer should not enter into an agreement whereby services are to be provided only up to a stated amount when it is foreseeable that more extensive services probably will be required, unless the situation is adequately explained to the client. Otherwise, the client might have to bargain for further assistance in the midst of a proceeding or transaction. However, it is proper to define the extent of services in the light of the client's ability to pay. A lawyer should not exploit a fee arrangement based primarily on hourly charges by using wasteful procedures.

Contingent Fees

[6] Generally, contingent fees are permissible in all civil cases. However, paragraph (d) continues the prohibition, imposed under the previous Code of Professional Responsibility, against the use of a contingent fee arrangement by a lawyer representing a defendant in a criminal case. Applicable law may impose other limitations on contingent fees, such as a ceiling on the percentage. And in any case, if there is doubt whether a contingent fee is consistent with the client's best interests, the lawyer should explain any existing payment alternatives and their implications.

[7] Contingent fees in domestic relations cases, while rarely justified, are not prohibited by Rule 1.5. Contingent fees in such cases are permitted in order that lawyers may provide representation to clients who might not otherwise be able to afford to contract for the payment of fees on a noncontingent basis.

[8] Paragraph (c) requires that the contingent fee arrangement be in writing. This writing must explain the method by which the fee is to be computed, as well as the client's responsibility for expenses. The lawyer must also provide the client with a written statement at the conclusion of a contingent fee matter, stating the outcome of the matter and explaining the computation of any remittance made to the client.

Division of Fee

[9] A division of fee is a single billing to a client covering the fee of two or more lawyers who are not in the same firm. A division of fee facilitates association of more than one lawyer in a matter in which neither alone could serve the client as well, and most often is used when the fee is contingent and the division is between a referring lawyer and a trial specialist.

[10] Paragraph (e) permits the lawyers to divide a fee either on the basis of the proportion of services they render or by agreement between the participating lawyers if all assume responsibility for the representation as a whole. Joint responsibility for the representation entails the obligations stated in Rule 5.1 for purposes of the matter involved. Permitting a division on the basis of joint responsibility, rather than on the basis of services performed, represents a change from the basis for fee divisions allowed under the prior Code of Professional Responsibility. The change is intended to encourage lawyers to affiliate other counsel, who are better equipped by reason of experience or specialized background to serve the client's needs, rather than to retain sole responsibility for the representation in order to avoid losing the right to a fee.

[11] The concept of joint responsibility is not, however, merely a technicality or incantation. The lawyer who refers the client to another lawyer, or affiliates another lawyer in the representation, remains fully responsible to the client, and is accountable to the client for deficiencies in the discharge of the representation by the lawyer who has been brought into the representation. If a lawyer wishes to avoid such responsibility for the potential deficiencies of another lawyer, the matter must be referred to the other lawyer without retaining a right to participate in fees beyond those fees justified by services actually rendered.

[12] The concept of joint responsibility does not require the referring lawyer to perform any minimum portion of the total legal services rendered. The referring lawyer may agree that the lawyer to whom the referral is made will perform substantially all of the services to be rendered in connection with the representation, without review by the referring lawyer. Thus, the referring lawyer is not required to review pleadings or other documents, attend hearings or depositions, or otherwise participate in a significant and continuing manner. The referring lawyer does not, however, escape the implications of joint responsibility, see Comment [11], by avoiding direct participation.

[13] When fee divisions are based on assumed joint responsibility, the requirement of paragraph (a) that the fee be reasonable applies to the total fee charged for the representation by all participating lawyers.

[14] Paragraph (e) requires that the client be advised, in writing, of the fee division and states that the client must affirmatively give informed consent to the proposed fee arrangement. For the definition of "informed consent," see Rule 1.0(e). The Rule does not require disclosure to the client of the share that each lawyer is to receive but does require that the client be informed of the identity of the lawyers sharing the fee, their respective responsibilities in the representation, and the effect of the association of lawyers outside the firm on the fee charged.

Disputes Over Fees

[15] If a procedure has been established for resolution of fee disputes, such as an arbitration or mediation procedure established by the Bar, the lawyer should conscientiously consider submitting to it. Law may prescribe a procedure for determining a lawyer's fee, for example, in representation of an executor or administrator, a class, or a person entitled to a reasonable fee as part of the measure of damages. The lawyer entitled to such a fee and a lawyer representing another party concerned with the fee should comply with the prescribed procedure.

RULE 1.6 – CONFIDENTIALITY OF INFORMATION

(a) EXCEPT WHEN PERMITTED UNDER PARAGRAPH (c), (d), OR (e), A LAWYER SHALL NOT KNOWINGLY:

(1) REVEAL A CONFIDENCE OR SECRET OF THE LAWYER'S CLIENT;

(2) USE A CONFIDENCE OR SECRET OF THE LAWYER'S CLIENT TO THE DISADVANTAGE OF THE CLIENT;

(3) USE A CONFIDENCE OR SECRET OF THE LAWYER'S CLIENT FOR THE ADVANTAGE OF THE LAWYER OR OF A THIRD PERSON.

(b) "CONFIDENCE" REFERS TO INFORMATION PROTECTED BY THE ATTORNEY-CLIENT PRIVILEGE UNDER APPLICABLE LAW, AND "SECRET" REFERS TO OTHER INFORMATION GAINED IN THE PROFESSIONAL RELATIONSHIP THAT THE CLIENT HAS REQUESTED BE HELD INVIOLATE, OR THE DISCLOSURE OF WHICH WOULD BE EMBARRASSING, OR WOULD BE LIKELY TO BE DETRIMENTAL, TO THE CLIENT. 'SECRET' GENERALLY DOES NOT REFER TO LEGAL KNOWLEDGE OR LEGAL RESEARCH, TO KNOWLEDGE THE LAWYER HAS OBTAINED ABOUT THE REGULATORY ENVIRONMENT IN WHICH A CLIENT OPERATES, OR TO INFORMATION THAT IS GENERALLY KNOWN IN THE LOCAL COMMUNITY OR IN THE TRADE, FIELD, OR PROFESSION TO WHICH THE INFORMATION RELATES.

(c) A LAWYER MAY REVEAL CLIENT CONFIDENCES AND SECRETS, TO THE EXTENT REASONABLY NECESSARY:

(1) TO PREVENT A CRIMINAL ACT THAT THE LAWYER REASONABLY BELIEVES IS LIKELY TO RESULT IN DEATH OR SUBSTANTIAL BODILY HARM ABSENT DISCLOSURE OF THE CLIENT'S SECRETS OR CONFIDENCES BY THE LAWYER; OR

(2) TO PREVENT THE BRIBERY OR INTIMIDATION OF WITNESSES, JURORS, COURT OFFICIALS, OR OTHER PERSONS WHO ARE INVOLVED IN PROCEEDINGS BEFORE A TRIBUNAL IF THE LAWYER REASONABLY BELIEVES THAT SUCH ACTS ARE LIKELY TO RESULT ABSENT DISCLOSURE OF THE CLIENT'S CONFIDENCES OR SECRETS BY THE LAWYER.

(d) WHEN A CLIENT HAS USED OR IS USING A LAWYER'S SERVICES TO FURTHER A CRIME OR FRAUD, THE LAWYER MAY REVEAL CLIENT CONFIDENCES AND SECRETS, TO THE EXTENT REASONABLY NECESSARY:

(1) TO PREVENT THE CLIENT FROM COMMITTING THE CRIME OR FRAUD IF IT IS REASONABLY CERTAIN TO RESULT IN SUBSTANTIAL INJURY TO THE FINANCIAL INTERESTS OR PROPERTY OF ANOTHER; OR

(2) TO PREVENT, MITIGATE OR RECTIFY SUBSTANTIAL INJURY TO THE FINANCIAL INTERESTS OR PROPERTY OF ANOTHER THAT IS REASONABLY CERTAIN TO RESULT OR HAS RESULTED FROM THE CLIENT'S COMMISSION OF THE CRIME OR FRAUD.

(e) A LAWYER MAY USE OR REVEAL CLIENT CONFIDENCES OR SECRETS:

(1) WITH THE INFORMED CONSENT OF THE CLIENT;

(2) (A) WHEN PERMITTED BY THESE RULES OR REQUIRED BY LAW OR COURT ORDER; AND

(B) IF A GOVERNMENT LAWYER, WHEN PERMITTED OR AUTHORIZED BY LAW;

(3) TO THE EXTENT REASONABLY NECESSARY TO ESTABLISH A DEFENSE TO A CRIMINAL CHARGE, DISCIPLINARY CHARGE, OR CIVIL CLAIM, FORMALLY INSTITUTED AGAINST THE LAWYER, BASED UPON CONDUCT IN WHICH THE CLIENT WAS INVOLVED, OR TO THE EXTENT REASONABLY NECESSARY TO RESPOND TO SPECIFIC ALLEGATIONS BY THE CLIENT CONCERNING THE LAWYER'S REPRESENTATION OF THE CLIENT;

(4) WHEN THE LAWYER HAS REASONABLE GROUNDS FOR BELIEVING THAT A CLIENT HAS IMPLIEDLY AUTHORIZED DISCLOSURE OF A CONFIDENCE OR SECRET IN ORDER TO CARRY OUT THE REPRESENTATION;

(5) TO THE MINIMUM EXTENT NECESSARY IN AN ACTION INSTITUTED BY THE LAWYER TO ESTABLISH OR COLLECT THE LAWYER'S FEE; OR

(6) TO THE EXTENT REASONABLY NECESSARY TO SECURE LEGAL ADVICE ABOUT THE LAWYER'S COMPLIANCE WITH LAW, INCLUDING THESE RULES.

(f) A LAWYER SHALL EXERCISE REASONABLE CARE TO PREVENT:

(1) THE LAWYER'S EMPLOYEES, ASSOCIATES, AND OTHERS WHOSE SERVICES ARE UTILIZED BY THE LAWYER FROM DISCLOSING OR USING CONFIDENCES OR SECRETS OF A CLIENT, EXCEPT THAT SUCH PERSONS MAY REVEAL INFORMATION PERMITTED TO BE DISCLOSED BY PARAGRAPHS (C), (D), OR (E); AND

(2) THE UNAUTHORIZED ACCESS TO CONFIDENCES OR SECRETS OF A CLIENT.

(g) THE LAWYER'S OBLIGATION TO PRESERVE THE CLIENT'S CONFIDENCES AND SECRETS CONTINUES AFTER TERMINATION OF THE LAWYER'S EMPLOYMENT.

(h) THE OBLIGATION OF A LAWYER UNDER PARAGRAPH (a) ALSO APPLIES TO CONFIDENCES AND SECRETS LEARNED PRIOR TO BECOMING A LAWYER IN THE COURSE OF PROVIDING ASSISTANCE TO ANOTHER LAWYER.

(i) FOR PURPOSES OF THIS RULE, A LAWYER WHO SERVES AS A MEMBER OF THE D.C. BAR LAWYER COUNSELING COMMITTEE, OR AS A TRAINED INTERVENOR FOR THAT COMMITTEE, SHALL BE DEEMED TO HAVE A LAWYER-CLIENT RELATIONSHIP WITH RESPECT TO ANY LAWYER-COUNSELEE BEING COUNSELED UNDER PROGRAMS CONDUCTED BY OR ON BEHALF OF THE COMMITTEE. INFORMATION OBTAINED FROM ANOTHER LAWYER BEING COUNSELED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE COMMITTEE, OR IN THE COURSE OF AND ASSOCIATED WITH SUCH COUNSELING, SHALL BE TREATED AS A CONFIDENCE OR SECRET WITHIN THE TERMS OF PARAGRAPH (b). SUCH INFORMATION MAY BE DISCLOSED ONLY TO THE EXTENT PERMITTED BY THIS RULE.

(j) FOR PURPOSES OF THIS RULE, A LAWYER WHO SERVES AS A MEMBER OF THE D.C. BAR PRACTICE MANAGEMENT SERVICE COMMITTEE, FORMERLY KNOWN AS THE LAWYER PRACTICE ASSISTANCE COMMITTEE[1], OR A STAFF ASSISTANT, MENTOR, MONITOR OR OTHER CONSULTANT FOR THAT COMMITTEE, SHALL BE DEEMED TO HAVE A LAWYER-CLIENT RELATIONSHIP WITH RESPECT TO ANY LAWYER-COUNSELEE BEING COUNSELED UNDER PROGRAMS CONDUCTED BY OR ON BEHALF OF THE COMMITTEE. COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN THE COUNSELOR AND THE LAWYER BEING COUNSELED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE COMMITTEE, OR MADE IN THE COURSE OF AND ASSOCIATED WITH SUCH COUNSELING, SHALL BE TREATED AS A CONFIDENCE OR SECRET WITHIN THE TERMS OF PARAGRAPH (b). SUCH INFORMATION MAY BE DISCLOSED ONLY TO THE EXTENT PERMITTED BY THIS RULE. HOWEVER, DURING THE PERIOD IN WHICH THE LAWYER-COUNSELEE IS SUBJECT TO A PROBATIONARY OR MONITORING ORDER OF THE COURT OF APPEALS OR THE BOARD ON PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY IN A DISCIPLINARY CASE INSTITUTED PURSUANT TO RULE XI OF THE RULES OF THE COURT OF APPEALS GOVERNING THE BAR, SUCH INFORMATION SHALL BE SUBJECT TO DISCLOSURE IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE ORDER.

(k) THE CLIENT OF THE GOVERNMENT LAWYER IS THE AGENCY THAT EMPLOYS THE LAWYER UNLESS EXPRESSLY PROVIDED TO THE CONTRARY BY APPROPRIATE LAW, REGULATION, OR ORDER.

COMMENT

[1] The lawyer is part of a judicial system charged with upholding the law. One of the lawyer's functions is to advise clients so that they avoid any violation of the law in the proper exercise of their rights.

[2] The observance of the ethical obligation of a lawyer to hold inviolate confidential information of the client not only facilitates the full development of facts essential to proper representation of the client but also encourages people to seek early legal assistance.

[3] Almost without exception, clients come to lawyers in order to determine what their rights are and what is, in the maze of laws and regulations, deemed to be legal and correct. The common law recognizes that the client's confidences must be protected from disclosure. Based upon experience, lawyers know that almost all clients follow the advice given, and the law is upheld.

[4] A fundamental principle in the client-lawyer relationship is that the lawyer holds inviolate the client's secrets and confidences. The client is thereby encouraged to communicate fully and frankly with the lawyer even as to embarrassing or legally damaging subject matter.

[5] This rule prohibits a lawyer from revealing the confidences and secrets of a client except as provided in this rule or elsewhere in the Rules. Proper concern for professional duty should cause a lawyer to shun indiscreet conversations concerning clients. A lawyer's use of a hypothetical to discuss issues relating to the representation is permissible so long as there is no reasonable likelihood that the listener will be able to ascertain the identity of the client or the situation involved.

Relationship Between Rule 1.6 and Attorney-Client Evidentiary Privilege and Work Product Doctrine

[6] The principle of confidentiality is given effect in two related bodies of law: the attorney-client privilege and the work product doctrine in the law of evidence and the rule of confidentiality established in professional ethics. The attorney-client privilege and the work product doctrine apply in judicial and other proceedings in which a lawyer may be called as a witness or otherwise required to produce evidence concerning a client. This rule is not intended to govern or affect judicial application of the attorney-client privilege or work product doctrine. The privilege and doctrine were developed to promote compliance with law and fairness in litigation. In reliance on the attorney-client privilege, clients are entitled to expect that communications within the scope of the privilege will be protected against compelled disclosure.

[7] The attorney-client privilege is that of the client and not of the lawyer. As a general matter, the client has a reasonable expectation that information relating to the client will not be voluntarily disclosed and that disclosure of such information may be judicially compelled only in accordance with recognized exceptions to the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine.

[8] The rule of client-lawyer confidentiality applies in situations other than those where evidence is sought from the lawyer through compulsion of law; furthermore, it applies not merely to matters communicated in confidence by the client (i.e., confidences) but also to all information gained in the course of the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or would be likely to be detrimental to the client (i.e., secrets). This ethical precept, unlike the evidentiary privilege, exists without regard to the nature or source of the information or the fact that others share the knowledge. It reflects not only the principles underlying the attorney-client privilege, but the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the client.

The Commencement of the Client-Lawyer Relationship

[9] Principles of substantive law external to these Rules determine whether a client-lawyer relationship exists. Although most of the duties flowing from the client-lawyer relationship attach only after the client has requested the lawyer to render legal services and the lawyer has agreed to do so, the duty of confidentiality imposed by this rule attaches when the lawyer agrees to consider whether a client-lawyer relationship shall be established. Other duties of a lawyer to a prospective client are set forth in Rule 1.18.

Exploitation of Confidences and Secrets

[10] In addition to prohibiting the disclosure of a client's confidences and secrets, subparagraph (a)(2) provides that a lawyer may not use the client's confidences and secrets to the disadvantage of the client. For example, a lawyer who has learned that the client is investing in specific real estate may not seek to acquire nearby property where doing so would adversely affect the client's plan for investment. Similarly, information acquired by the lawyer in the course of representing a client may not be used to the disadvantage of that client even after the termination of the lawyer's representation of the client. However, the fact that a lawyer has once served a client does not preclude the lawyer from using generally known information about the former client when later representing another client. Under subparagraphs (a)(3) and (e)(1), a lawyer may use a client's confidences and secrets for the lawyer's own benefit or that of a third party only after the lawyer has obtained the client's informed consent to the use in question.

Authorized Disclosure

[11] A lawyer is impliedly authorized to make disclosures about a client when appropriate in carrying out the representation, except to the extent that the client's instructions or special circumstances limit that authority. In litigation, for example, a lawyer may disclose information by admitting a fact that cannot properly be disputed, or in negotiation by making a disclosure that facilitates a satisfactory conclusion.

[12] The obligation to protect confidences and secrets obviously does not preclude a lawyer from revealing information when the client gives informed consent, when necessary to perform the professional employment, when permitted by these Rules, or when required by law. For the definition of "informed consent," see Rule 1.0(e). Unless the client otherwise directs, a lawyer may disclose the affairs of the client to partners or associates of the lawyer's firm. It is a matter of common knowledge that the normal operation of a law office exposes confidential professional information to nonlawyer employees of the office, particularly secretaries and those having access to the files; and this obligates a lawyer to exercise care in selecting and training employees so that the sanctity of all confidences and secrets of clients may be preserved. If the obligation extends to two or more clients as to the same information, a lawyer should obtain the permission of all before revealing the information. A lawyer must always be sensitive to the rights and wishes of the client and act scrupulously in the making of decisions that may involve the disclosure of information obtained in the course of the professional relationship.

[13] A lawyer's confidentiality obligations do not preclude a lawyer from securing confidential legal advice about the lawyer's personal responsibilities to comply with these Rules. In most situations disclosing information to secure such advice will be impliedly authorized for the lawyer to carry out the representation. Even when disclosure is not impliedly authorized, paragraph (e)(6) permits such disclosure because of the importance of a lawyer's compliance with the Rules of Professional Conduct and other law.

[14] Unless the client otherwise directs, it is not improper for a lawyer to give limited information from client files to an outside agency necessary for statistical, bookkeeping, accounting, data processing, banking, printing, or other legitimate purposes, provided the lawyer exercises due care in the selection of the agency and warns the agency that the information must be kept confidential.

[15] Although the public interest is usually best served by a strict rule requiring lawyers to preserve the confidentiality of information relating to the representation of their clients, the confidentiality rule is subject to limited exceptions.

[16] Rule 1.6(c) describes situations presenting a sufficiently serious threat such that a client's confidences and secrets may be revealed to the extent reasonably necessary to prevent the harm described. Thus, a lawyer may reveal confidences and secrets to the extent necessary to prevent a criminal act that the lawyer reasonably believes is likely to result in death or substantial bodily harm absent disclosure and to prevent bribery or intimidation of witnesses, jurors, court officials, or other persons involved in proceedings before a tribunal.

[17] Rule 1.6(d) describes situations in which the client's usual expectation of confidentiality is not warranted because the client has abused the lawyer-client relationship by using the lawyer's services to further a crime or fraud. In these circumstances, Rule 1.6(d)(1) provides a limited exception to the rule of confidentiality, which permits the lawyer to reveal information to the extent reasonably necessary to enable affected persons or appropriate authorities to prevent the client from committing a crime or fraud, as defined in Rule 1.0(d), if such crime or fraud is reasonably certain to result in substantial injury to the financial or property interests of another. The D.C. Court of Appeals has held that the crime-fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege requires that a lawyer's services were actually used to further a crime or fraud that occurred, not merely that the client sought to do so. See In re Public Defender Service, 831 A.2d 890 (D.C. 2003). The Rule 1.6(d) exception to the ethical duty of confidentiality also requires that the lawyer's services actually were used to further a crime or fraud. A client can prevent disclosure by refraining from the wrongful conduct or by not using the lawyer's services to further a crime or fraud. Although Rule 1.6(d)(1) does not require the lawyer to reveal the client's misconduct, the lawyer may not counsel or assist the client in conduct the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent. See Rule 1.2(e). Rule 1.16 addresses the lawyer's obligation or right to withdraw from the representation of the client in such circumstances if withdrawal is necessary to prevent the client from misusing the lawyer's services or if withdrawal would otherwise prevent, mitigate, or rectify substantial injury caused by the client who misused the lawyer's services. Rules 3.3(a)(1), 3.3(d) and 4.1(b) address circumstances in which disclosure may be mandatory. Rules 3.4(a), 8.1, and 8.3 do not require disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6; disclosure that is permissive in the limited situations specified in Rule 1.6 is not mandatory under Rules 3.4(a), 8.1 or 8.3. Rule 1.6(d) applies to organizations as well as to individuals.

[18] Paragraph (d)(2) refers to situations in which the crime or fraud has already commenced and is on-going or completed such that complete prevention is not an option. Thus, the client no longer has the option of preventing disclosure by refraining from the wrongful conduct. In these circumstances, there may be situations in which the loss suffered by an affected person can be prevented, rectified, or mitigated. In such situations, the lawyer may disclose information relating to the representation to the extent necessary to enable the affected persons to prevent or mitigate reasonably certain losses or to attempt to recoup their losses. Paragraph (d)(2) does not apply to disclosure with regard to a crime or fraud committed prior to retaining the lawyer for representation concerning that offense.

[19] Rule 1.2, Comment [7] and Rule 4.1, Comment [3] acknowledge that, to avoid assisting in a client crime or fraud, a lawyer in some instances may be required to withdraw from representation, give notice of the fact of withdrawal, or disaffirm an opinion, document, affirmation or the like. In some instances when a lawyer's services have been or are being used to further a client's crime or fraud, a lawyer may conclude that more than withdrawal and disaffirmance is required to avoid assisting in the client's crime or fraud and that disclosure of client information protected by this rule is warranted. If the lawyer has such a reasonable belief, the lawyer may make such disclosures to the extent reasonably necessary to permit corrective action, for example, prompt initiation of proceedings in order to seize or recover assets fraudulently obtained by the client. Once the lawyer has disclosed information reasonably necessary to prevent, rectify, or mitigate loss, the lawyer may not take additional actions that would harm the client. Thus, a lawyer is not warranted under Rule 1.6(d) in providing legal advice or assistance to a victim as the victim's lawyer or voluntarily serving as a witness or otherwise cooperating in a proceeding brought by the victim or anyone else seeking compensation for the victim. The lawyer also may not use or disclose information for the purpose of voluntarily assisting a law-enforcement agency to apprehend and prosecute the client, unless the lawyer reasonably believes that such disclosure would be reasonably necessary to prevent, rectify, or mitigate the victim's loss.

[20] This rule permits but does not require the disclosure of information relating to a client's representation to accomplish the purposes specified. In exercising the discretion conferred by this rule by paragraphs (c) and (d), the lawyer may consider such factors as the nature of the lawyer's relationship with the client and with those who might be injured by the client, the lawyer's own involvement in the transaction, and factors that may extenuate the conduct in question. The lawyer's exercise of discretion in determining whether to make disclosures that are reasonably likely to prevent the death or substantial bodily injury of another requires consideration of such factors as the client's tendency to commit violent acts or, conversely, to make idle threats. When a lawyer is given discretion to disclose under this rule, the lawyer's decision not to disclose as permitted by the Rule does not violate Rule 1.6. Other Rules may impose disclosure obligations. See Rules 1.2(e), 2.3, 3.3, 3.4(a), 4.1(b), 8.1, and 8.3 regarding the reconciliation of the confidentiality protections of this rule with disclosure provisions of those Rules.

[21] Paragraphs (c) and (d) permit disclosure only to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes the disclosure is necessary to accomplish one of the purposes specified. The "reasonably believes" standard is applied because it is difficult for a lawyer to "know" when acts with such potentially serious consequences will actually be carried out, for the client may have a change of mind. Where practicable, the lawyer should first seek to persuade the client to take suitable action to obviate the need for disclosure. In any case, a disclosure adverse to the client's interest should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to accomplish the purpose. If the disclosure will be made in connection with a judicial proceeding, the disclosure should be made in a manner that limits access to the information to the tribunal or other persons having a need to know it, and appropriate protective orders or other arrangements should be sought by the lawyer to the fullest extent practicable.

[22] Other law may require that a lawyer disclose information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6. Whether a law requires such disclosure is a question of law beyond the scope of these Rules. When such disclosure appears to be required by other law, the lawyer must discuss the matter with the client to the extent required by Rule 1.4. If, however, the other law requires disclosure, paragraph (e)(2)(A) permits the lawyer to make such disclosure as is necessary to comply with the law.

Dispute Concerning Lawyer's Conduct

[23] Where a legal claim or disciplinary charge alleges complicity of the lawyer in a client's conduct or other misconduct of the lawyer involving representation of the client, the lawyer may respond to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to establish a defense. The same is true with respect to a claim involving the conduct or representation of a former client. Charges, in defense of which a lawyer may disclose client confidences and secrets, can arise in a civil, criminal, or professional disciplinary proceeding, and can be based on a wrong allegedly committed by the lawyer against the client, or on a wrong alleged by a third person; for example, a person claiming to have been defrauded by the lawyer and client acting together.

[24] The lawyer may not disclose a client's confidences or secrets to defend against informal allegations made by third parties; the Rule allows disclosure only if a third party has formally instituted a civil, criminal, or disciplinary action against the lawyer. Even if the third party has formally instituted such a proceeding, the lawyer should advise the client of the third party's action and request that the client respond appropriately, if this is practicable and would not be prejudicial to the lawyer's ability to establish a defense.

[25] If a lawyer's client, or former client, has made specific allegations against the lawyer, the lawyer may disclose that client's confidences and secrets in establishing a defense, without waiting for formal proceedings to be commenced. The requirement of subparagraph (e)(3) that there be "specific" charges of misconduct by the client precludes the lawyer from disclosing confidences or secrets in response to general criticism by a client; an example of such a general criticism would be an assertion by the client that the lawyer "did a poor job" of representing the client. But in this situation, as well as in the defense of formally instituted third-party proceedings, disclosure should be no greater than the lawyer reasonably believes is necessary to vindicate innocence, the disclosure should be made in a manner that limits access to the information to the tribunal or other persons having a need to know it, and appropriate protective orders or other arrangements should be sought by the lawyer to the fullest extent practicable.

Fee Collection Actions

[26] Subparagraph (e)(5) permits a lawyer to reveal a client's confidences or secrets if this is necessary in an action to collect fees from the client. This aspect of the rule expresses the principle that the beneficiary of a fiduciary relationship may not exploit it to the detriment of the fiduciary. Subparagraph (e)(5) should be construed narrowly; it does not authorize broad, indiscriminate disclosure of secrets or confidences. The lawyer should evaluate the necessity for disclosure of information at each stage of the action. For example, in drafting the complaint in a fee collection suit, it would be necessary to reveal the "secrets" that the lawyer was retained by the client, that fees are due, and that the client has failed to pay those fees. Further disclosure of the client's secrets and confidences would be impermissible at the complaint stage. If possible, the lawyer should prevent even the disclosure of the client's identity through the use of John Doe pleadings.

[27] If the client's response to the lawyer's complaint raised issues implicating confidences or secrets, the lawyer would be permitted to disclose confidential or secret information pertinent to the client's claims or defenses. Even then, the rule would require that the lawyer's response be narrowly tailored to meet the client's specific allegations, with the minimum degree of disclosure sufficient to respond effectively. In addition, the lawyer should continue, throughout the action, to make every effort to avoid unnecessary disclosure of the client's confidences and secrets and to limit the disclosure to those having the need to know it. To this end the lawyer should seek appropriate protective orders and make any other arrangements that would minimize the risk of disclosure of the confidential information in question, including the utilization of in camera proceedings.

Disclosures Otherwise Required or Authorized

[28] The attorney-client privilege is differently defined in various jurisdictions. If a lawyer is called as a witness to give testimony concerning a client, absent waiver by the client, subparagraph (e)(2) requires the lawyer to invoke the privilege when it is applicable. The lawyer may comply with the final orders of a court or other tribunal of competent jurisdiction requiring the lawyer to give information about the client. But a lawyer ordered by a court to disclose client confidences or secrets should not comply with the order until the lawyer has personally made every reasonable effort to appeal the order or has notified the client of the order and given the client the opportunity to challenge it.

Former Client

[29] The duty of confidentiality continues after the client-lawyer relationship has terminated.

Services Rendered in Assisting Another Lawyer Before Becoming a Member of the Bar

[30] There are circumstances in which a person who ultimately becomes a lawyer provides assistance to a lawyer while serving in a nonlawyer capacity. The typical situation is that of the law clerk or summer associate in a law firm or government agency. Paragraph (h) addresses the confidentiality obligations of such a person after becoming a member of the Bar; the same confidentiality obligations are imposed as would apply if the person had been a member of the Bar at the time confidences or secrets were received. This resolution of the confidentiality obligation is consistent with the reasoning employed in D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 84. For a related provision dealing with the imputation of disqualifications arising from prior participation as a summer associate or in a similar position, see Rule 1.10(b). For a provision addressing the imputation of disqualifications arising from prior participation as a law clerk, see Rule 1.11.

Bar Sponsored Counseling Programs

[31] Paragraph (i) adds a provision dealing specifically with the disclosure obligations of lawyers who are assisting in the counseling programs of the D.C. Bar's Lawyer Counseling Committee. Members of that committee, and lawyer-intervenors who assist the committee in counseling, may obtain information from lawyer-counselees who have sought assistance from the counseling programs offered by the committee. It is in the interest of the public to encourage lawyers who have alcohol or other substance abuse problems to seek counseling as a first step toward rehabilitation. Some lawyers who seek such assistance may have violated provisions of the Rules of Professional Conduct, or other provisions of law, including criminal statutes such as those dealing with embezzlement. In order for those who are providing counseling services to evaluate properly the lawyer-counselee's problems and enhance the prospects for rehabilitation, it is necessary for the counselors to receive completely candid information from the lawyer-counselee. Such candor is not likely if the counselor, for example, would be compelled by Rule 8.3 to report the lawyer-counselee's conduct to Disciplinary Counsel, or if the lawyer-counselee feared that the counselor could be compelled by prosecutors or others to disclose information.

[32] It is similarly in the interest of the public to encourage lawyers to seek the assistance of the D.C. Bar's Practice Management Service Committee to address management problems in their practices. In order for those who are providing counseling services through the Practice Management Service Committee to evaluate properly the lawyer-counselee's problems and enhance the prospects for self-improvement by the counselee, paragraph (j) adds a provision addressing the confidentiality obligations of lawyers who are assisting in the counseling programs of the Practice Management Service Committee.

[33] These considerations make it appropriate to treat the lawyer-counselee relationship as a lawyer-client relationship, and to create an additional limited class of information treated as secrets or confidences subject to the protection of Rule 1.6. The scope of that information is set forth in paragraph (i) and (j). The lawyer-client relationship is deemed to exist only with respect to the obligation of confidentiality created under Rule 1.6, and not to obligations created elsewhere in these Rules, including the obligation of zealous representation under Rule 1.3 and the obligation to avoid conflicts of interest set forth in Rules 1.7 and 1.9. The obligation of confidentiality extends to non-lawyer assistants of lawyers serving the committee. See Rule 5.1

[34] Notwithstanding the obligation of confidentiality under paragraph (j), during the period in which a lawyer-counselee is subject to a probationary or monitoring order of the Court of Appeals or the Board on Professional Responsibility in a disciplinary case instituted pursuant to Rule XI of the Rules of the Court of Appeals Governing the Bar, communications between the counselor and the lawyer being counseled under the auspices of the Practice Management Service Committee shall be subject to disclosure in accordance with an Order of the Court or the Board, since the participation of the lawyer-counselee in the programs of the committee in such circumstances is not voluntary.

[35] Ethical rules established by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals with respect to the kinds of information protected from compelled disclosure may not be accepted by other forums or jurisdictions. Therefore, the protections afforded to lawyer-counselees by paragraphs (i) and (j) may not be available to preclude disclosure in all circumstances. Furthermore, lawyers who are members of the bar of other jurisdictions may not be entitled, under the ethics rules applicable to members of the bar in such other jurisdictions, to forgo reporting violations to disciplinary authorities pursuant to the other jurisdictions' counterparts to Rule 8.3.

Government Lawyers

[36] Subparagraph (e)(2) was revised, and paragraph (k) was added, to address the unique circumstances raised by attorney-client relationships within the government.

[37] Subparagraph (e)(2)(A) applies to both private and government attorney-client relationships. Subparagraph (e)(2)(B) applies to government lawyers only. It is designed to permit disclosures that are not required by law or court order under Rule 1.6(e)(2)(A), but which the government authorizes its attorneys to make in connection with their professional services to the government. Such disclosures may be authorized or required by statute, executive order, or regulation, depending on the constitutional or statutory powers of the authorizing entity. If so authorized or required, subparagraph (e)(2)(B) governs.

[38] The term "agency" in paragraph (j) includes, inter alia, executive and independent departments and agencies, special commissions, committees of the legislature, agencies of the legislative branch such as the Government Accountability Office, and the courts to the extent that they employ lawyers (e.g., staff counsel) to counsel them. The employing agency has been designated the client under this rule to provide a commonly understood and easily determinable point for identifying the government client.

[39] Government lawyers may also be assigned to provide an individual with counsel or representation in circumstances that make clear that an obligation of confidentiality runs directly to that individual and that subparagraph (e)(2)(A), not (e)(2)(B), applies. It is, of course, acceptable in this circumstance for a government lawyer to make disclosures about the individual representation to supervisors or others within the employing governmental agency so long as such disclosures are made in the context of, and consistent with, the agency's representation program. See, e.g., 28 C.F.R. §§ 50.15 and 50.16. The relevant circumstances, including the agreement to represent the individual, may also indicate whether the individual client to whom the government lawyer is assigned will be deemed to have granted or denied informed consent to disclosures to the lawyer's employing agency. Examples of such representation include representation by a public defender, a government lawyer representing a defendant sued for damages arising out of the performance of the defendant's government employment, and a military lawyer representing a court-martial defendant.

Acting Competently to Preserve Confidences

[40] When transmitting or storing confidences or secrets of a client, the lawyer must take reasonable precautions to prevent the information from coming into the hands of unintended recipients. This duty does not require that the lawyer use special security measures if the method of communication or storage affords a reasonable expectation of privacy. Special circumstances, however, may warrant special precautions. Among the factors to be considered in determining the reasonableness of the lawyer's conduct in transmitting or storing that information are: the sensitivity of the information; the extent to which the privacy of the client information is protected by law or by a confidentiality agreement; the cost of the security measures; and, difficulty in implementing the safeguards. A client and a lawyer may agree that the lawyer will implement special security measures beyond those required by this rule. A client may give informed consent to forgo security measures that would otherwise be required by this rule. For a lawyer's duties when sharing information with nonlawyers outside the lawyer's own firm, see Rule 5.3, Comments [3]-[4].

[41] Agreements that restrict the subsequent use of information that is not a client secret or confidence can raise concerns about the general ability of clients to obtain lawyers and the ability of lawyers to represent other clients competently and zealously. Such agreements should be viewed with caution.

RULE 1.7 – CONFLICT OF INTEREST: GENERAL

(a) A LAWYER SHALL NOT ADVANCE TWO OR MORE ADVERSE POSITIONS IN THE SAME MATTER.

(b) EXCEPT AS PERMITTED BY PARAGRAPH (c) BELOW, A LAWYER SHALL NOT REPRESENT A CLIENT WITH RESPECT TO A MATTER IF:

(1) THAT MATTER INVOLVES A SPECIFIC PARTY OR PARTIES AND A POSITION TO BE TAKEN BY THAT CLIENT IN THAT MATTER IS ADVERSE TO A POSITION TAKEN OR TO BE TAKEN BY ANOTHER CLIENT IN THE SAME MATTER EVEN THOUGH THAT CLIENT IS UNREPRESENTED OR REPRESENTED BY A DIFFERENT LAWYER;

(2) SUCH REPRESENTATION WILL BE OR IS LIKELY TO BE ADVERSELY AFFECTED BY REPRESENTATION OF ANOTHER CLIENT;

(3) REPRESENTATION OF ANOTHER CLIENT WILL BE OR IS LIKELY TO BE ADVERSELY AFFECTED BY SUCH REPRESENTATION;

(4) THE LAWYER'S PROFESSIONAL JUDGMENT ON BEHALF OF THE CLIENT WILL BE OR REASONABLY MAY BE ADVERSELY AFFECTED BY THE LAWYER'S RESPONSIBILITIES TO OR INTERESTS IN A THIRD PARTY OR THE LAWYER'S OWN FINANCIAL, BUSINESS, PROPERTY, OR PERSONAL INTERESTS.

(c) A LAWYER MAY REPRESENT A CLIENT WITH RESPECT TO A MATTER IN THE CIRCUMSTANCES DESCRIBED IN PARAGRAPH (b) ABOVE IF

(1) EACH POTENTIALLY AFFECTED CLIENT PROVIDES INFORMED CONSENT TO SUCH REPRESENTATION AFTER FULL DISCLOSURE OF THE EXISTENCE AND NATURE OF THE POSSIBLE CONFLICT AND THE POSSIBLE ADVERSE CONSEQUENCES OF SUCH REPRESENTATION; AND

(2) THE LAWYER REASONABLY BELIEVES THAT THE LAWYER WILL BE ABLE TO PROVIDE COMPETENT AND DILIGENT REPRESENTATION TO EACH AFFECTED CLIENT.

(d) IF A CONFLICT NOT REASONABLY FORESEEABLE AT THE OUTSET OF REPRESENTATION ARISES UNDER PARAGRAPH (b)(1) AFTER THE REPRESENTATION COMMENCES, AND IS NOT WAIVED UNDER PARAGRAPH (c), A LAWYER NEED NOT WITHDRAW FROM ANY REPRESENTATION UNLESS

THE CONFLICT ALSO ARISES UNDER PARAGRAPHS (b)(2), (b)(3), OR (b)(4).

COMMENT

[1] Rule 1.7 is intended to provide clear notice of circumstances that may constitute a conflict of interest. Rule 1.7(a) sets out the limited circumstances in which representation of conflicting interests is absolutely prohibited even with the informed consent of all involved clients. Rule 1.7(b) sets out those circumstances in which representation is barred in the absence of informed client consent. For the definition of "informed consent," see Rule 1.0(e). The difference between Rule 1.7(a) and Rule 1.7(b) is that in the former, the lawyer is representing multiple interests in the same matter, while in the latter, the lawyer is representing a single interest, but a client of the lawyer who is represented by different counsel has an interest adverse to that advanced by the lawyer. The application of Rules 1.7(a) and 1.7(b) to specific facts must also take into consideration the principles of imputed disqualification described in Rule 1.10. Rule 1.7(c) states the procedure that must be used to obtain the client's informed consent if representation is to commence or continue in the circumstances described in Rule 1.7(b). Rule 1.7(d) governs withdrawal in cases arising under Rule 1.7(b)(1).

Representation Absolutely Prohibited – Rule 1.7(a)

[2] Institutional interests in preserving confidence in the adversary process and in the administration of justice preclude permitting a lawyer to represent adverse positions in the same matter. For that reason, paragraph (a) prohibits such conflicting representations, with or without client consent.

[3] The same lawyer (or law firm, see Rule 1.10) should not espouse adverse positions in the same matter during the course of any type of representation, whether such adverse positions are taken on behalf of clients or on behalf of the lawyer or an association of which the lawyer is a member. On the other hand, for purposes of Rule 1.7(a), an "adverse" position does not include inconsistent or alternative positions advanced by counsel on behalf of a single client. Rule 1.7(a) is intended to codify the result reached in D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 204, including the conclusion that a rulemaking whose result will be applied retroactively in pending adjudications is the same matter as the adjudications, even though treated as separate proceedings by an agency. However, if the adverse positions to be taken relate to different matters, the absolute prohibition of paragraph (a) is inapplicable, even though paragraphs (b) and (c) may apply.

[4] The absolute prohibition of paragraph (a) applies only to situations in which a lawyer would be called upon to espouse adverse positions for different clients in the same matter. It is for this reason that paragraph (a) refers to adversity with respect to a "position taken or to be taken" in a matter rather than adversity with respect to the matter or the entire representation. This approach is intended to reduce the costs of litigation in other representations where parties have common, non-adverse interests on certain issues, but have adverse (or contingently or possibly adverse) positions with respect to other issues. If, for example, a lawyer would not be required to take adverse positions in providing joint representation of two clients in the liability phase of a case, it would be permissible to undertake such a limited representation. Then, after completion of the liability phase, and upon satisfying the requirements of paragraph (c) of this rule, and of any other applicable Rules, the lawyer could represent either one of those parties as to the damages phase of the case, even though the other, represented by separate counsel as to damages, might have an adverse position as to that phase of the case. Insofar as the absolute prohibition of paragraph (a) is concerned, a lawyer may represent two parties that may be adverse to each other as to some aspects of the case so long as the same lawyer does not represent both parties with respect to those positions. Such a representation comes within paragraph (b), rather than paragraph (a), and is therefore subject to the consent provisions of paragraph (c).

[5] The ability to represent two parties who have adverse interests as to portions of a case may be limited because the lawyer obtains confidences or secrets relating to a party while jointly representing both parties in one phase of the case. In some circumstances, such confidences or secrets might be useful, against the interests of the party to whom they relate, in a subsequent part of the case. Absent the informed consent of the party whose confidences or secrets are implicated, the subsequent adverse representation is governed by the "substantial relationship" test, which is set forth in Rule 1.9.

[6] The prohibition of paragraph (a) relates only to actual conflicts of positions, not to mere formalities. For example, a lawyer is not absolutely forbidden to provide joint or simultaneous representation if the clients' positions are only nominally but not actually adverse. Joint representation is commonly provided to incorporators of a business, to parties to a contract, in formulating estate plans for family members, and in other circumstances where the clients might be nominally adverse in some respect but have retained a lawyer to accomplish a common purpose. If no actual conflict of positions exists with respect to a matter, the absolute prohibition of paragraph (a) does not come into play. Thus, in the limited circumstances set forth in Opinion 143 of the D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee, this prohibition would not preclude the representation of both parties in an uncontested divorce proceeding, there being no actual conflict of positions based on the facts presented in Opinion 143. For further discussion of common representation issues, including intermediation, see Comments [14]-[18].

Representation Conditionally Prohibited – Rule 1.7(b)

[7] Paragraphs (b) and (c) are based upon two principles: (1) that a client is entitled to wholehearted and zealous representation of its interests, and (2) that the client as well as the lawyer must have the opportunity to judge and be satisfied that such representation can be provided. Consistent with these principles, paragraph (b) provides a general description of the types of circumstances in which representation is improper in the absence of informed consent. The underlying premise is that disclosure and informed consent are required before assuming a representation if there is any reason to doubt the lawyer's ability to provide wholehearted and zealous representation of a client or if a client might reasonably consider the representation of its interests to be adversely affected by the lawyer's assumption of the other representation in question. Although the lawyer must be satisfied that the representation can be wholeheartedly and zealously undertaken, if an objective observer would have any reasonable doubt on that issue, the client has a right to disclosure of all relevant considerations and the opportunity to be the judge of its own interests.

[8] A client may, on occasion, adopt unreasonable positions with respect to having the lawyer who is representing that client also represent other parties. Such an unreasonable position may be based on an aversion to the other parties being represented by a lawyer, or on some philosophical or ideological ground having no foundation in the Rules regarding representation of conflicting interests. Whatever difficulties may be presented for the lawyer in such circumstances as a matter of client relations, the unreasonable positions taken by a client do not fall within the circumstances requiring notification and informed consent. Clients have broad discretion to terminate their representation by a lawyer and that discretion may generally be exercised on unreasonable as well as reasonable grounds.

[9] If the lawyer determines or can foresee that an issue with respect to the application of paragraph (b) exists, the only prudent course is for the lawyer to make disclosure, pursuant to paragraph (c), to each affected client and enable each to determine whether in its judgment the representation at issue is likely to affect its interests adversely.

[10] Paragraph (b) does not purport to state a uniform rule applicable to cases in which two clients may be adverse to each other in a matter in which neither is represented by the lawyer or in a situation in which two or more clients may be direct business competitors. The matter in which two clients are adverse may be so unrelated or insignificant as to have no possible effect upon a lawyer's ability to represent both in other matters. The fact that two clients are business competitors, standing alone, is usually not a bar to simultaneous representation. Thus, in a matter involving a specific party or parties, paragraphs (b)(1) and (c) require notice and informed consent if the lawyer will take a position on behalf of one client adverse to another client even though the lawyer represents the latter client only on an unrelated position or in an unrelated matter. Paragraphs (b)(2), (3), (4) and (c) require disclosure and informed consent in any situation in which the lawyer's representation of a client may be adversely affected by representation of another client or by any of the factors specified in paragraph (b)(4).

Individual Interest Conflicts

[11] The lawyer's own interests should not be permitted to have an adverse effect on representation of a client. For example, if the probity of a lawyer's own conduct in a transaction is in serious question, it may be difficult or impossible for the lawyer to give a client detached advice. Similarly, when a lawyer has discussions concerning possible employment with an opponent of the lawyer's client, or with a law firm representing the opponent, such discussions could adversely affect the lawyer's representation of the client. See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion No. 210 (defense attorney negotiating position with United States Attorney's Office). In addition, a lawyer may not allow related business interests to affect representation, for example, by referring clients to an enterprise in which the lawyer has an undisclosed financial interest. See Comment [34] for specific commentary concerning affiliated business interests; Rule 1.8 for specific Rules pertaining to a number of individual attorney's interest conflicts, including business transactions with clients; Rule 1.8(j) for the effect of firm-wide imputation upon individual attorney interests.

[12] For the effect of a blood or marital relationship between lawyers representing different clients, see Rule 1.8(h). Disqualification arising from a close family relationship is not imputed. See Rule 1.8(j).

Positional Conflicts

[13] Ordinarily a lawyer may take inconsistent legal positions in different forums at different times on behalf of different clients. The mere fact that advocating a legal position on behalf of one client might create precedent adverse to the interests of a client represented by the lawyer in an unrelated matter does not, without more, create a conflict of interest. A conflict of interest exists, however, if there is a significant risk that a lawyer's action on behalf of one client in a given matter, as referred to in Rule 1.7(b), will adversely affect the lawyer's effectiveness in representing another client in the same or different matter; for example, when a decision favoring one client will create a precedent likely to seriously weaken the position being taken on behalf of the other client. Factors relevant in determining whether the clients need to be advised of the risk include: where the matters are pending, the temporal relationship between the matters, the significance of the issue to the immediate and long-term interests of the clients involved, and the clients' reasonable expectations in retaining the lawyer. If there is significant risk of material limitation, then, absent informed consent of the affected clients, the lawyer must refuse one of the representations or withdraw from one or both matters, subject to the exception provided in Rule 1.7(d). See D.C. Legal Ethics Committee Opinion No. 265.

Special Considerations in Common Representation

[14] In considering whether to represent multiple clients in the same matter, a lawyer should be mindful that if the common representation fails because the potentially adverse interests cannot be reconciled, the result can be additional cost, embarrassment and recrimination. In some situations, the risk of failure is so great that multiple representation is plainly impossible. For example, a lawyer cannot undertake common representation of clients where contentious litigation or negotiations between them are imminent or contemplated. Moreover, because the lawyer is required to be impartial between commonly represented clients, representation of multiple clients is improper when it is unlikely that impartiality can be maintained. Generally, if the relationship between the parties has already assumed antagonism, the possibility that the clients' interests can be adequately served by common representation is not very good. Other relevant factors are whether the lawyer subsequently will represent both parties on a continuing basis and whether the situation involves creating or terminating a relationship between the parties.

[15] A particularly important factor in determining the appropriateness of common representation is the effect on client-lawyer confidentiality and the attorney-client privilege. With regard to the attorney-client privilege, the prevailing rule is that, as between commonly represented clients, the privilege does not attach. Hence, it must be assumed that if litigation eventuates between the clients, the privilege will not protect any such communications, and the clients should be so advised.

[16] As to the duty of confidentiality, continued common representation will almost certainly be inadequate if one client asks the lawyer not to disclose to the other client information relevant to the common representation. This is so because the lawyer has an equal duty of loyalty to each client, and each client has the right to be informed of anything bearing on the representation that might affect that client's interests and the right to expect that the lawyer will use that information to that client's benefit. See Rule 1.4. The lawyer should, at the outset of the common representation and as part of the process of obtaining each client's informed consent, advise each client that information relevant to the common representation will be shared, and explain the circumstances in which the lawyer may have to withdraw from any or all representations if one client later objects to continued common representation or sharing of such information. In limited circumstances, it may be appropriate for the lawyer to proceed with the representation when the clients have agreed, after being properly informed, that the lawyer will keep certain information confidential. For example, the lawyer may reasonably conclude that failure to disclose one client's trade secrets to another client will not adversely affect representation involving a joint venture between the clients and agree to keep that information confidential with the informed consent of both clients.

[17] When seeking to establish or adjust a relationship between clients, the lawyer should make clear that the lawyer's role is not that of partisanship normally expected in other circumstances and, thus, that the clients may be required to assume greater responsibility for decisions than when each client is separately represented. Any limitations on the scope of the representation made necessary as a result of the common representation should be fully explained to the clients at the outset of the representation. See Rule 1.2(c).

[18] Subject to the above limitations, each client in the common representation has the right to loyal and diligent representation and the protection of Rule 1.9 concerning the obligations to a former client. The client also has the right to discharge the lawyer as stated in Rule 1.16.

Lawyer's Duty to Make Inquiries to Determine Potential Conflicts

[19] The scope of and parties to a "matter" are typically apparent in on-the-record adversary proceedings or other proceedings in which a written record of the identity and the position of the parties exists. In Rule 1.7(b)(1), the phrase "matter involving a specific party or parties" refers to such situations. In other situations, however, it may not be clear to a lawyer whether the representation of one client is adverse to the interests of another client. For example, a lawyer may represent a client only with respect to one or a few of the client's areas of interest. Other lawyers, or non-lawyers (such as lobbyists), or employees of the client (such as government relations personnel) may be representing that client on many issues whose scope and content are unknown to the lawyer. Clients often have many representatives acting for them, including multiple law firms, nonlawyer lobbyists, and client employees. A lawyer retained for a limited purpose may not be aware of the full range of a client's other interests or positions on issues. Except in matters involving a specific party or parties, a lawyer is not required to inquire of a client concerning the full range of that client's interests in issues, unless it is clear to the lawyer that there is a potential for adversity between the interests of clients of the lawyer. Where lawyers are associated in a firm within the meaning of Rule 1.10(a), the rule stated in the preceding sentence must be applied to all lawyers and all clients in the firm. Unless a lawyer is aware that representing one client involves seeking a result to which another client is opposed, Rule 1.7 is not violated by a representation that eventuates in the lawyer's unwittingly taking a position for one client adverse to the interests of another client. The test to be applied here is one of reasonableness and may turn on whether the lawyer has an effective conflict checking system in place.

Situations That Frequently Arise

[20] A number of types of situations frequently arise in which disclosure and informed consent are usually required. These include joint representation of parties to criminal and civil litigation, joint representation of incorporators of a business, joint representation of a business or government agency and its employees, representation of family members seeking estate planning or the drafting of wills, joint representation of an insurer and an insured, representation in circumstances in which the personal or financial interests of the lawyer, or the lawyer's family, might be affected by the representation, and other similar situations in which experience indicates that conflicts are likely to exist or arise. For example, a lawyer might not be able to represent a client vigorously if the client's adversary is a person with whom the lawyer has longstanding personal or social ties. The client is entitled to be informed of such circumstances so that an informed decision can be made concerning the advisability of retaining the lawyer who has such ties to the adversary. The principles of disclosure and informed consent are equally applicable to all such circumstances, except that if the positions to be taken by two clients in a matter as to which the lawyer represents both are actually adverse, then, as provided in paragraph (a), the lawyer may not undertake or continue the representation with respect to those issues even if disclosure has been made and informed consent obtained.

Organization Clients

[21] As is provided in Rule 1.13, the lawyer who represents a corporation, partnership, trade association or other organization-type client is deemed to represent that specific entity, and not its shareholders, owners, partners, members or "other constituents." Thus, for purposes of interpreting this rule, the specific entity represented by the lawyer is the "client." Ordinarily that client's affiliates (parents and subsidiaries), other stockholders and owners, partners, members, etc., are not considered to be clients of the lawyer. Generally, the lawyer for a corporation is not prohibited by legal ethics principles from representing the corporation in a matter in which the corporation's stockholders or other constituents are adverse to the corporation. See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion No. 216. A fortiori, and consistent with the principle reflected in Rule 1.13, the lawyer for an organization normally should not be precluded from representing an unrelated client whose interests are adverse to the interests of an affiliate (e.g., parent or subsidiary), stockholders and owners, partners, members, etc., of that organization in a matter that is separate from and not substantially related to the matter on which the lawyer represents the organization.

[22] However, there may be cases in which a lawyer is deemed to represent a constituent of an organization client. Such de facto representation has been found where a lawyer has received confidences from a constituent during the course of representing an organization client in circumstances in which the constituent reasonably believed that the lawyer was acting as the constituent's lawyer as well as the lawyer for the organization client. See generally ABA Formal Opinion 92-365. In general, representation may be implied where on the facts there is a reasonable belief by the constituent that there is individual as well as collective representation. Id. The propriety of representation adverse to an affiliate or constituent of the organization client, therefore, must first be tested by determining whether a constituent is in fact a client of the lawyer. If it is, representation adverse to the constituent requires compliance with Rule 1.7. See ABA Opinion 92-365. The propriety of representation must also be tested by reference to the lawyer's obligation under Rule 1.6 to preserve confidences and secrets and to the obligations imposed by paragraphs (b)(2) through (b)(4) of this rule. Thus, absent informed consent under Rule 1.7(c), such adverse representation ordinarily would be improper if:

(a) the adverse matter is the same as, or substantially related to, the matter on which the lawyer represents the organization client,

(b) during the course of representation of the organization client the lawyer has in fact acquired confidences or secrets (as defined in Rule 1.6(b)) of the organization client or an affiliate or constituent that could be used to the disadvantage of any of the organization client or its affiliate or constituents, or

(c) such representation seeks a result that is likely to have a material adverse effect on the financial condition of the organization client.

[23] In addition, the propriety of representation adverse to an affiliate or constituent of the organization client must be tested by attempting to determine whether the adverse party is in substance the "alter ego" of the organization client. The alter ego case is one in which there is likely to be a reasonable expectation by the constituents or affiliates of an organization that each has an individual as well as a collective client-lawyer relationship with the lawyer, a likelihood that a result adverse to the constituent would also be adverse to the existing organization client, and a risk that both the new and the old representation would be so adversely affected that the conflict would not be "consentable." Although the alter ego criterion necessarily involves some imprecision, it may be usefully applied in a parent-subsidiary context, for example, by analyzing the following relevant factors: whether (i) the parent directly or indirectly owns all or substantially all of the voting stock of the subsidiary, (ii) the two companies have common directors, officers, office premises, or business activities, or (iii) a single legal department retains, supervises and pays outside lawyers for both the parent and the subsidiary. If all or most of those factors are present, for conflict of interest purposes those two entities normally would be considered alter egos of one another and the lawyer for one of them should refrain from engaging in representation adverse to the other, even on a matter where clauses (a), (b) and (c) of the preceding paragraph [22] are not applicable. Similarly, if the organization client is a corporation that is wholly owned by a single individual, in most cases for purposes of applying this rule, that client should be deemed to be the alter ego of its sole stockholder. Therefore, the corporation's lawyer should refrain from engaging in representation adverse to the sole stockholder, even on a matter where clauses (a), (b) and (c) of the preceding paragraph [22] are not applicable.

[24] If representation otherwise appropriate under the preceding paragraphs seeks a result that is likely ultimately to have a material adverse effect on the financial condition of the organization client, such representation is prohibited by Rule 1.7(b)(3). If the likely adverse effect on the financial condition of the organization client is not material, such representation is not prohibited by Rule 1.7(b)(3). Obviously, however, a lawyer should exercise restraint and sensitivity in determining whether to undertake such representation in a case of that type, particularly if the organization client does not realistically have the option to discharge the lawyer as counsel to the organization client.

[25] Agreements between a lawyer and a client precluding representation of other clients in circumstances that do not preclude representation under R. 1.7 through 1.12 will not expand the scope of those rules.

[26] In any event, in all cases referred to above, the lawyer must carefully consider whether Rule 1.7(b)(2) or Rule 1.7(b)(4) requires informed consent from the second client whom the lawyer proposes to represent adverse to an affiliate, owner or other constituent of the first client.

Disclosure and Consent

[27] Disclosure and informed consent are not mere formalities. Adequate disclosure requires such disclosure of the parties and their interests and positions as to enable each potential client to make a fully informed decision as to whether to proceed with the contemplated representation. If a lawyer's obligation to one or another client or to others or some other consideration precludes making such full disclosure to all affected parties, that fact alone precludes undertaking the representation at issue. Full disclosure also requires that clients be made aware of the possible extra expense, inconvenience, and other disadvantages that may arise if an actual conflict of position should later arise and the lawyer be required to terminate the representation.

[28] It is ordinarily prudent for the lawyer to provide at least a written summary of the considerations disclosed and to request and receive a written informed consent, although the rule does not require that disclosure be in writing or in any other particular form in all cases. Lawyers should also recognize that the form of disclosure sufficient for more sophisticated business clients may not be sufficient to permit less sophisticated clients to provide informed consent. Moreover, under the District of Columbia substantive law, the lawyer bears the burden of proof that informed consent was secured.

[29] The term "informed consent" is defined in Rule 1.0(e). As indicated in Comment [2] to that rule, a client's consent must not be coerced either by the lawyer or by any other person. In particular, the lawyer should not use the client's investment in previous representation by the lawyer as leverage to obtain or maintain representation that may be contrary to the client's best interests. If a lawyer has reason to believe that undue influence has been used by anyone to obtain agreement to the representation, the lawyer should not undertake the representation.

[30] The lawyer's authority to solicit and to act upon the client's consent to a conflict is limited further by the requirement that the lawyer reasonably believe that he or she will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client. Generally, it is doubtful that a lawyer could hold such a belief where the representation of one client is likely to have a substantial and material adverse effect upon the interests of another client, or where the lawyer's individual interests make it likely that the lawyer will be adversely situated to the client with respect to the subject-matter of the legal representation.

[31] Rule 1.7 permits advance waivers within certain limits and subject to certain client protections. Such waivers are permissible only if the prerequisites of the rule – namely "full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation" – are satisfied. Under the Rules' definition of "informed consent," the client must have "adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives to the proposed course of action." See Rule 1.0(e). Ordinarily this will require that either (1) the consent is specific as to types of potentially adverse representations and types of adverse clients (e.g., a bank client for whom the lawyer performs corporate work waives the lawyer's representation of borrowers in mortgage loan transactions with that bank) or (2) the waiving client has available in-house or other current counsel independent of the lawyer soliciting the waiver.

[32] Rule 1.7(a) provides that a conflict arising from the lawyer's advancing adverse positions in the same matter cannot be waived in advance or otherwise. Although an advance waiver may permit the lawyer to act adversely to the waiving client in matters that are substantially related to the matter in which the lawyer represents that client, lawyers should take particular care in obtaining and acting pursuant to advance waivers where such a matter is involved.

Withdrawal

[33] It is much to be preferred that a representation that is likely to lead to a conflict be avoided before the representation begins, and a lawyer should bear this fact in mind in considering whether disclosure should be made and informed consent obtained at the outset. If, however, a conflict arises after a representation has been undertaken, and the conflict falls within paragraph (a), or if a conflict arises under paragraph (b) and informed and uncoerced consent is not or cannot be obtained pursuant to paragraph (c), then the lawyer should withdraw from the representation, complying with Rule 1.16. Where a conflict is not foreseeable at the outset of representation and arises only under Rule 1.7(b)(1), a lawyer should seek informed consent to the conflict at the time that the conflict becomes evident, but if such consent is not given by the opposing party in the matter, the lawyer need not withdraw. In determining whether conflict is reasonably foreseeable, the test is an objective one. In determining the reasonableness of a lawyer's conduct, such factors as whether the lawyer (or lawyer's firm) has an adequate conflict-checking system in place, must be considered. Where more than one client is involved and the lawyer must withdraw because a conflict arises after representation has been undertaken, the question of whether the lawyer may continue to represent any of the clients is determined by Rule 1.9.

Imputed Disqualification

[34] All of the references in Rule 1.7 and its accompanying Comment to the limitation upon a "lawyer" must be read in light of the imputed disqualification provisions of Rule 1.10, which affect lawyers practicing in a firm.

[35] In the government lawyer context, Rule 1.7(b) is not intended to apply to conflicts between agencies or components of government (federal, state, or local) where the resolution of such conflicts has been entrusted by law, order, or regulation to a specific individual or entity.

Businesses Affiliated With a Lawyer or Firm

[36] Lawyers, either alone or through firms, may have interests in enterprises that do not practice law but that, in some or all of their work, become involved with lawyers or their clients either by assisting the lawyer in providing legal services or by providing related services to the client. Examples of such enterprises are accounting firms, consultants, real estate brokerages, and the like. The existence of such interests raises several questions under this rule. First, a lawyer's recommendation, as part of legal advice, that the client obtain the services of an enterprise in which the lawyer has an interest implicates paragraph 1.7(b)(4). The lawyer should not make such a recommendation unless able to conclude that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will not be adversely affected. Even then, the lawyer should not make such a recommendation without full disclosure to the client so that the client can make a fully informed choice. Such disclosure should include the nature and substance of the lawyer's or the firm's interest in the related enterprise, alternative sources for the non-legal services in question, and sufficient information so that the client understands that the related enterprise's services are not legal services and that the client's relationship to the related enterprise will not be that of a client to attorney. Second, such a related enterprise may refer a potential client to the lawyer; the lawyer should take steps to assure that the related enterprise will inform the lawyer of all such referrals. The lawyer should not accept such a referral without full disclosure of the nature and substance of the lawyer's interest in the related enterprise. See also Rule 7.1(b). Third, the lawyer should be aware that the relationship of a related enterprise to its own customer may create a significant interest in the lawyer in the continuation of that relationship. The substantiality of such an interest may be enough to require the lawyer to decline a proffered client representation that would conflict with that interest; at least Rule 1.7(b)(4) and (c) may require the prospective client to be informed and to give informed consent before the representation could be undertaken. Fourth, a lawyer's interest in a related enterprise that may also serve the lawyer's clients creates a situation in which the lawyer must take unusual care to fashion the relationship among lawyer, client, and related enterprise to assure that the confidences and secrets are properly preserved pursuant to Rule 1.6 to the maximum extent possible. See Rule 5.3.

Sexual Relations Between Lawyer and Client

[37] The relationship between lawyer and client is a fiduciary one in which the lawyer occupies the highest position of trust and confidence. Because of this fiduciary duty to clients, combining a professional relationship with any intimate personal relationship may raise concerns about conflict of interest, impairment of the judgment of both lawyer and client, and preservation of attorney-client privilege. These concerns may be particularly acute when a lawyer has a sexual relationship with a client. Such a relationship may create a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(4) or violate other disciplinary rules, and it generally is imprudent even in the absence of an actual violation of these Rules.

[38] Especially when the client is an individual, the client's dependence on the lawyer's knowledge of the law is likely to make the relationship between lawyer and client unequal. A sexual relationship between lawyer and client can involve unfair exploitation of the lawyer's fiduciary role and thereby violate the lawyer's basic obligation not to use the trust of the client to the client's disadvantage. In addition, such a relationship presents a significant risk that the lawyer's emotional involvement will impair the lawyer's independent professional judgment. Moreover, a blurred line between the professional and personal relationships may make it difficult to predict the extent to which client confidences will be protected by the attorney-client privilege, because client confidences are protected by privilege only when they are imparted in the context of the client-lawyer relationship. The client's own emotional involvement may make it impossible for the client to give informed consent to these risks.

[39] Sexual relationships with the representative of an organization client may not present the same questions of inherent inequality as the relationship with an individual client. Nonetheless, impairment of the lawyer's independent professional judgment and protection of the attorney-client privilege are still of concern, particularly if outside counsel has a sexual relationship with a representative of the organization who supervises, directs, or regularly consults with an outside lawyer concerning the organization's legal matters. An in-house employee in an intimate personal relationship with outside counsel may not be able to assess and waive any conflict of interest for the organization because of the employee's personal involvement, and another representative of the organization may be required to determine whether to give informed consent to a waiver. The lawyer should consider not only the disciplinary rules but also the organization's personnel policies regarding sexual relationships (for example, prohibiting such relationships between supervisors and subordinates).

Short-Term Limited Legal Services

[40] For the application of this rule and Rules 1.9 and 1.10 when the lawyer undertakes to provide short-term limited legal services to a client under the auspices of a program sponsored by a nonprofit organization or court, see Rule 6.5(a).

RULE 1.8 – CONFLICT OF INTEREST: SPECIFIC RULES

(a) A LAWYER SHALL NOT ENTER INTO A BUSINESS TRANSACTION WITH A CLIENT OR KNOWINGLY ACQUIRE AN OWNERSHIP, POSSESSORY, SECURITY, OR OTHER PECUNIARY INTEREST ADVERSE TO A CLIENT UNLESS:

(1) THE TRANSACTION AND TERMS ON WHICH THE LAWYER ACQUIRES THE INTEREST ARE FAIR AND REASONABLE TO THE CLIENT AND ARE FULLY DISCLOSED AND TRANSMITTED IN WRITING TO THE CLIENT IN A MANNER WHICH CAN BE REASONABLY UNDERSTOOD BY THE CLIENT;

(2) THE CLIENT IS GIVEN A REASONABLE OPPORTUNITY TO SEEK THE ADVICE OF INDEPENDENT COUNSEL IN THE TRANSACTION; AND

(3) THE CLIENT GIVES INFORMED CONSENT IN WRITING THERETO.

(b) A LAWYER SHALL NOT PREPARE AN INSTRUMENT GIVING THE LAWYER OR A PERSON RELATED TO THE LAWYER ANY SUBSTANTIAL GIFT FROM A CLIENT, INCLUDING A TESTAMENTARY GIFT, EXCEPT WHERE THE CLIENT IS RELATED TO THE DONEE. FOR PURPOSES OF THIS PARAGRAPH, RELATED PERSONS INCLUDE A SPOUSE, CHILD, GRANDCHILD, PARENT, GRANDPARENT OR OTHER RELATIVE OR INDIVIDUAL WITH WHOM THE LAWYER OR THE CLIENT MAINTAINS A CLOSE FAMILIAL RELATIONSHIP.

(c) PRIOR TO THE CONCLUSION OF REPRESENTATION OF A CLIENT, A LAWYER SHALL NOT MAKE OR NEGOTIATE AN AGREEMENT GIVING THE LAWYER LITERARY OR MEDIA RIGHTS TO A PORTRAYAL OR ACCOUNT BASED IN SUBSTANTIAL PART ON INFORMATION RELATING TO THE REPRESENTATION.

(d) WHILE REPRESENTING A CLIENT IN CONNECTION WITH CONTEMPLATED OR PENDING LITIGATION OR ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEEDINGS, A LAWYER SHALL NOT ADVANCE OR GUARANTEE FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO THE CLIENT, EXCEPT THAT A LAWYER MAY PAY OR OTHERWISE PROVIDE:

(1) THE EXPENSES OF LITIGATION OR ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEEDINGS, INCLUDING COURT COSTS, EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATION, EXPENSES OR MEDICAL EXAMINATION, COSTS OF OBTAINING AND PRESENTING EVIDENCE; AND

(2) OTHER FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE WHICH IS REASONABLY NECESSARY TO PERMIT THE CLIENT TO INSTITUTE OR MAINTAIN THE LITIGATION OR ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEEDINGS.

(e) A LAWYER SHALL NOT ACCEPT COMPENSATION FOR REPRESENTING A CLIENT FROM ONE OTHER THAN THE CLIENT UNLESS:

(1) THE CLIENT GIVES INFORMED CONSENT AFTER CONSULTATION;

(2) THERE IS NO INTERFERENCE WITH THE LAWYER'S INDEPENDENCE OF PROFESSIONAL JUDGMENT OR WITH THE CLIENT-LAWYER RELATIONSHIP; AND

(3) INFORMATION RELATING TO REPRESENTATION OF A CLIENT IS PROTECTED AS REQUIRED BY RULE 1.6.

(f) A LAWYER WHO REPRESENTS TWO OR MORE CLIENTS SHALL NOT PARTICIPATE IN MAKING AN AGGREGATE SETTLEMENT OF THE CLAIMS FOR OR AGAINST THE CLIENTS, OR IN A CRIMINAL CASE AN AGGREGATED AGREEMENT AS TO GUILTY OR NOLO CONTENDERE PLEAS, UNLESS EACH CLIENT GIVES INFORMED CONSENT IN A WRITING SIGNED BY THE CLIENT AFTER CONSULTATION, INCLUDING DISCLOSURE OF THE EXISTENCE AND NATURE OF ALL THE CLAIMS OR PLEAS INVOLVED AND OF THE PARTICIPATION OF EACH PERSON IN THE SETTLEMENT.

(g) A LAWYER SHALL NOT:

(1) MAKE AN AGREEMENT PROSPECTIVELY LIMITING THE LAWYER'S LIABILITY TO A CLIENT FOR MALPRACTICE; OR

(2) SETTLE A CLAIM OR POTENTIAL CLAIM FOR MALPRACTICE ARISING OUT OF THE LAWYER'S PAST CONDUCT WITH UNREPRESENTED CLIENT OR FORMER CLIENT UNLESS THAT PERSON IS ADVISED IN WRITING OF THE DESIRABILITY OF SEEKING THE ADVICE OF INDEPENDENT LEGAL COUNSEL AND IS GIVEN A REASONABLE OPPORTUNITY TO DO SO IN CONNECTION THEREWITH.

(h) A LAWYER RELATED TO ANOTHER LAWYER AS PARENT, CHILD, SIBLING, OR SPOUSE SHALL NOT REPRESENT A CLIENT IN A REPRESENTATION DIRECTLY ADVERSE TO A PERSON WHO THE LAWYER KNOWS IS REPRESENTED BY THE OTHER LAWYER EXCEPT UPON INFORMED CONSENT BY THE CLIENT AFTER CONSULTATION REGARDING THE RELATIONSHIP.

(i) A LAWYER MAY ACQUIRE AND ENFORCE A LIEN GRANTED BY LAW TO SECURE THE LAWYER'S FEES OR EXPENSES, BUT A LAWYER SHALL NOT IMPOSE A LIEN UPON ANY PART OF A CLIENT'S FILES, EXCEPT UPON THE LAWYER'S OWN WORK PRODUCT, AND THEN ONLY TO THE EXTENT THAT THE WORK PRODUCT HAS NOT BEEN PAID FOR. THIS WORK PRODUCT EXCEPTION SHALL NOT APPLY WHEN THE CLIENT HAS BECOME UNABLE TO PAY, OR WHEN WITHHOLDING THE LAWYER'S WORK PRODUCT WOULD PRESENT A SIGNIFICANT RISK TO THE CLIENT OF IRREPARABLE HARM.

(j) WHILE LAWYERS ARE ASSOCIATED IN A FIRM, A PROHIBITION IN THE FOREGOING PARAGRAPHS (a) THROUGH (g) AND (i) THAT APPLIES TO ANY ONE OF THEM SHALL APPLY TO ALL OF THEM.

COMMENT

Transactions Between Client and Lawyer

[1] A lawyer's legal skill and training, together with the relationship of trust and confidence between lawyer and client, create the possibility of overreaching when the lawyer participates in a business, property or financial transaction with a client, for example, a loan or sales transaction or a lawyer investment on behalf of a client. The requirements of paragraph (a) must be met even when the transaction is not closely related to the subject matter of the representation, as when a lawyer drafting a will for a client learns that the client needs money for unrelated expenses and offers to make a loan to the client. The rule applies to lawyers engaged in the sale of goods or services related to the practice of law, for example, the sale of title insurance or investment services to the existing clients of the lawyer's legal practice. See Rule 5.7. It also applies to lawyers purchasing property from estates they represent. It does not apply to ordinary fee arrangements between client and lawyer, which are governed by Rule 1.5, although the requirements of this rule must be met when the lawyer accepts an interest in the client's business or other non-monetary property as payment of all or part of a fee. In addition, the rule does not apply to standard commercial transactions between the lawyer and the client for products and services that the client generally markets to others; for example, banking or brokerage services, medical services, products manufactured or distributed by the client, and utility services. In such transactions, the lawyer has no advantage in dealing with the client, and the restrictions in paragraph (a) are unnecessary and impracticable.

[2] The client's consent need not be an actual or electronic signature but must be in written or electronic form and show the client's assent to the terms communicated by the lawyer, e.g., a return electronic mail. When necessary, the lawyer should discuss both the material risks of the proposed transaction, including any risk presented by the lawyer's involvement, and the existence of reasonably available alternatives and, where appropriate, should explain that the client may wish to seek the advice of independent counsel.

[3] The risk to a client is greatest when the client expects the lawyer to represent the client in the transaction itself or when the lawyer's financial interest otherwise poses a significant risk that the lawyer's representation of the client will be adversely affected by the lawyer's financial interest in the transaction. Here the lawyer's role requires that the lawyer must comply not only with the requirements of paragraph (a), but also with the requirements of Rule 1.7. Under that rule, the lawyer must disclose the risks associated with the lawyer's dual role as both legal adviser and participant in the transaction, such as the risk that the lawyer will structure the transaction or give legal advice in a way that favors the lawyer's interests at the expense of the client. Moreover, the lawyer must obtain the client's informed consent. For the definition of "informed consent," see Rule 1.0(e). In some cases, the lawyer's interest may be such that Rule 1.7 will preclude the lawyer from seeking the client's consent to the transaction.

[4] The fact that the client was independently represented in the transaction is relevant in determining whether the agreement was fair and reasonable to the client, as paragraph (a)(1) requires.

[5] A lawyer may accept a gift from a client, if the transaction meets general standards of fairness. For example, a simple gift such as a present given at a holiday or as a token of appreciation is permitted. If effectuation of a substantial gift requires preparing a legal instrument such as a will or conveyance, however, the client should be advised by the lawyer to obtain the detached advice that another lawyer can provide. Paragraph (b) recognizes an exception where the client is a relative of the donee or the gift is not substantial.

[6] This rule does not prohibit a lawyer from seeking to have the lawyer or a partner or associate of the lawyer named as executor of the client's estate or to another potentially lucrative fiduciary position. Nevertheless, such appointments will be subject to the general conflict of interest provision in Rule 1.7 when there is a significant risk that the lawyer's interest in obtaining the appointment will adversely affect the lawyer's independent professional judgment in advising the client concerning the choice of an executor or other fiduciary. In obtaining the client's informed consent to the conflict, the lawyer should advise the client concerning the nature and extent of the lawyer's financial interest in the appointment, as well as the availability of alternative candidates for the position.

[7] This rule does not prevent a lawyer from entering into a contingent fee arrangement with a client in a civil case, if the arrangement satisfies all the requirements of Rule 1.5(c).

Literary Rights

[8] An agreement by which a lawyer acquires literary or media rights concerning the conduct of the representation creates a conflict between the interests of the client and the personal interests of the lawyer. Measures that might otherwise be taken in the representation of the client may detract from the publication value of an account of the representation. Paragraph (c) does not prohibit a lawyer representing a client in a transaction concerning literary property from agreeing that the lawyer's fee shall consist of a share in ownership in the property, if the arrangement conforms to Rule 1.5.

Paying Certain Litigation Costs and Client Expenses

[9] Historically, under the Code of Professional Responsibility, lawyers could only advance the costs of litigation. The client remained ultimately responsible, and was required to pay such costs even if the client lost the case. That rule was modified by this court in 1980 in an amendment to DR 5-103(B) that eliminated the requirement that the client remain ultimately liable for costs of litigation, even if the litigation was unsuccessful. The provisions of Rule 1.8(d) embrace the result of the 1980 modification, but go further by providing that a lawyer may also pay certain expenses of a client that are not litigation expenses. Thus, under Rule 1.8(d), a lawyer may pay medical or living expenses of a client to the extent necessary to permit the client to continue the litigation. The payment of these additional expenses is limited to those strictly necessary to sustain the client during the litigation, such as medical expenses and minimum living expenses. The purpose of permitting such payments is to avoid situations in which a client is compelled by exigent financial circumstances to settle a claim on unfavorable terms in order to receive the immediate proceeds of settlement. This provision does not permit lawyers to "bid" for clients by offering financial payments beyond those minimum payments necessary to sustain the client until the litigation is completed. Regardless of the types of payments involved, assuming such payments are proper under Rule 1.8(d), client reimbursement of the lawyer is not required. However, no lawyer is required to pay litigation or other costs to a client. The rule merely permits such payments to be made without requiring reimbursement by the client.

Person Paying for Lawyer's Services

[10] Lawyers are frequently asked to represent a client under circumstances in which a third person will compensate the lawyer, in whole or in part. The third person might be a relative or friend, an indemnitor (such as a liability insurance company) or a co-client (such as a corporation sued along with one or more of its employees). Because third-party payers frequently have interests that differ from those of the client, including interests in minimizing the amount spent on the representation and in learning how the representation is progressing, lawyers are prohibited from accepting or continuing such representations unless the lawyer determines that there will be no interference with the lawyer's independent professional judgment and there is informed consent from the client. In some circumstances, such as the relationship among insured, insurer, and defense counsel, substantive law regarding the role of the third-party payer may affect the applicability of this rule. Paragraph (e) requires disclosure of the fact that the lawyer's services are being paid for by a third party. Such an arrangement must also conform to the requirements of Rule 1.6 concerning confidentiality and Rule 1.7 concerning conflict of interest. Where the client is a class, consent may be obtained on behalf of the class by court-supervised procedure. See also Rule 5.4(c) (prohibiting interference with a lawyer's professional judgment by one who recommends, employs or pays the lawyer to render legal services for another). The requirements of Rule 1.8(e)(1) do not apply to lawyers appointed to represent indigent criminal defendants whose fees are paid under the Criminal Justice Act or any similar statute or rule.

[11] Sometimes, it will be sufficient for the lawyer to obtain the client's informed consent regarding the fact of the payment and the identity of the third-party payer. If, however, the fee arrangement creates a conflict of interest for the lawyer, then the lawyer must comply with Rule 1.7. The lawyer must also conform to the requirements of Rule 1.6 concerning confidentiality. Under Rule 1.7(b)(4), a conflict of interest exists if there is a significant risk that the lawyer's representation will be adversely affected by the lawyer's own interest in the fee arrangement or by the lawyer's responsibilities to the third-party payer (for example, when the third-party payer is a co-client). Under Rule 1.7, the lawyer may accept or continue the representation with the informed consent of each affected client, unless the conflict is non-consentable under Rule 1.7(a).

Aggregate Settlements

[12] Differences in willingness to make or accept an offer of settlement are among the risks of common representation of multiple clients by a single lawyer. Under Rule 1.7, this is one of the risks that should be discussed before undertaking the representation, as part of the process of obtaining the clients' informed consent. In addition, Rule 1.2(a) protects each client's right to have the final say in deciding whether to accept or reject an offer of settlement and in deciding whether to enter a guilty or nolo contendere plea in a criminal case. The rule stated in paragraph (f) of this rule is a corollary of both Rules 1.7 and 1.2(a), and provides that, before any settlement offer or plea bargain is made or accepted on behalf of multiple clients, the lawyer must inform each of them about all the material terms of the settlement, including what the other clients will receive or pay if the settlement or plea offer is accepted. Lawyers representing a class of plaintiffs or defendants, or those proceeding derivatively, must comply with applicable rules regulating notification of class members, compensation of class counsel, and other procedural requirements designed to ensure adequate protection of the entire class.

Limiting Liability and Settling Malpractice Claims

[13] Agreements prospectively limiting a lawyer's liability for malpractice are prohibited because they are likely to undermine competent and diligent representation. Also, many clients are unable to evaluate the desirability of making such an agreement before a dispute has arisen. Rule 1.8(g) does not, however, prohibit a lawyer from entering into an agreement with the client to arbitrate legal malpractice claims, to the extent that such an agreement is valid and enforceable and the client is fully informed of the scope and effect of the agreement. Nor does the rule prohibit an agreement in accordance with Rule 1.2 that defines the scope of the representation, although a definition of scope that makes the obligations of representation illusory will amount to an attempt to limit liability.

[14] Agreements settling a claim or potential claim for malpractice arising out of the lawyer's past conduct are not prohibited by Rule 1.8(g). Nevertheless, in view of the danger that the lawyer will take unfair advantage of an unrepresented client or a former client, the lawyer must first advise such a person in writing of the appropriateness of independent representation in connection with such a settlement. In addition, the lawyer must give the client or former client a reasonable opportunity to find and consult independent counsel. Settlement of a potential claim most often will occur in the context of the resolution of an actual dispute between the attorney and the client, whether concerning the claim itself or a dispute concerning fees. The rule does not authorize the lawyer to solicit a blanket release from the client as a routine incident of the conclusion of the legal representation.

[15] Paragraph (h) applies to related lawyers who are in different firms. Related lawyers in the same firm are governed by Rules 1.7, 1.9, and 1.10. Pursuant to the provisions of Rule 1.8(j), the disqualification stated in paragraph (h) is personal and is not imputed to members of firms with whom the lawyers are associated. Since each of the related lawyers is subject to paragraph (h), the effect is to require the informed consent of all materially affected clients. Romantic relationships between lawyers may create conflicts of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(4), likewise requiring informed consent of all materially affected clients.

[16] The substantive law of the District of Columbia has long permitted lawyers to assert and enforce liens against the property of clients. See, e.g., Redevelopment Land Agency v. Dowdey, 618 A.2d 153, 159-60 (D.C. 1992), and cases cited therein. Whether a lawyer has a lien on money or property belonging to a client is generally a matter of substantive law as to which the ethics rules take no position. Exceptions to what the common law might otherwise permit are made with respect to contingent fees and retaining liens. See, respectively, Rule 1.5(c) and Rule 1.8(i).

[17] Rule 1.16(d) requires a lawyer to surrender papers and property to which the client is entitled when representation of the client terminates. Paragraph (i) of this rule states a narrow exception to 1.16(d): a lawyer may retain anything the law permits – including property – except for files. As to files, a lawyer may retain only the lawyer's own work product, and then only if the client has not paid for the work. However, if the client has paid for the work product, the client is entitled to receive it, even if the client has not previously seen or received a copy of the work product. Furthermore, the lawyer may not retain the work product for which the client has not paid, if the client has become unable to pay or if withholding the work product might irreparably harm the client's interest.

[18] Under Rule 1.16(d), for example, a lawyer would be required to return all papers received from a client, such as birth certificates, wills, tax returns, or "green cards." Rule 1.8(i) does not permit retention of such papers to secure payment of any fee due. Only the lawyer's own work product – results of factual investigations, legal research and analysis, and similar materials generated by the lawyer's own effort – could be retained. (The term "work product" as used in paragraph (i) is limited to materials falling within the "work product doctrine," but includes any material generated by the lawyer that would be protected under that doctrine whether or not created in connection with pending or anticipated litigation.) And a lawyer could not withhold all the work product merely because a portion of the lawyer's fees had not been paid.

[19] There are situations in which withholding the work product would not be permissible because of irreparable harm to the client. The possibility of involuntary incarceration or criminal conviction constitutes one category of irreparable harm. The realistic possibility that a client might irretrievably lose a significant right or become subject to a significant liability because of the withholding of the work product constitutes another category of irreparable harm. On the other hand, the mere fact that the client might have to pay another lawyer to replicate the work product does not, standing alone, constitute irreparable harm. These examples are merely indicative of the meaning of the term "irreparable harm," and are not exhaustive.

Attribution of Prohibitions

[20] Under paragraph (j), a prohibition of conduct by an individual lawyer in paragraphs (a) through (g) and (i) applies also to all lawyers associated in a firm with the personally prohibited lawyer. For example, one lawyer in a firm may not enter into a business transaction with a client of another member of the firm without complying with paragraph (a), even if the first lawyer is not personally involved in the representation of the client. The prohibition set forth in paragraph (h) is personal and is not applied to associated lawyers.

Sexual Relationships with Clients

[21] Concerns about personal relationships, including sexual relationships, between lawyers and clients are addressed in Comments [37]-[39] to Rule 1.7.

RULE 1.9 – CONFLICT OF INTEREST: FORMER CLIENT

A LAWYER WHO HAS FORMERLY REPRESENTED A CLIENT IN A MATTER SHALL NOT THEREAFTER REPRESENT ANOTHER PERSON IN THE SAME OR A SUBSTANTIALLY RELATED MATTER IN WHICH THAT PERSON'S INTERESTS ARE MATERIALLY ADVERSE TO THE INTERESTS OF THE FORMER CLIENT UNLESS THE FORMER CLIENT GIVES INFORMED CONSENT.

COMMENT

[1] After termination of client-lawyer relationship, a lawyer may not represent another client except in conformity with the Rule. The principles in Rule 1.7 determine whether the interests of the present and former client are adverse. Thus, a lawyer could not properly seek to rescind on behalf of a new client a contract drafted on behalf of the former client. Similarly, a lawyer who has defended a client against charges brought by a regulatory agency concerning a transaction may not later represent another client in a private lawsuit against the client involving the same transaction, absent the first client's informed consent. For the definition of "informed consent," see Rule 1.0(e).

[2] The scope of a "matter" for purposes of this rule may depend on the facts of a particular situation or transaction. The lawyer's involvement in a matter can also be a question of degree. When a lawyer has been directly involved in a specific transaction, subsequent representation of other clients with materially adverse interests clearly is prohibited. On the other hand, a lawyer who recurrently handled a type of problem for a former client is not precluded from later representing another client in a wholly distinct problem of that type even though the subsequent representation involves a position adverse to the prior client. Similar considerations can apply to the reassignment of military lawyers between defense and prosecution functions within the same military jurisdiction. The underlying question is whether the lawyer was so involved in the matter that the subsequent representation can be justly regarded as a changing of sides in the matter in question. Rule 1.9 is intended to incorporate District of Columbia and federal case law defining the "substantial relationship" test. See, e.g., Brown v. District of Columbia Board of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37 (D.C. 1984) (en banc); T.C. Theatre Corp. v. Warner Brothers Pictures, 113 F. Supp. 265 (S.D.N.Y. 1953), and its progeny.

[3] Matters are "substantially related" for purposes of this rule if they involve the same transaction or legal dispute or if there otherwise is a substantial risk that confidential factual information as would normally have been obtained in the prior representation would materially advance the client's position in the subsequent matter. For example, a lawyer who has represented a businessperson and learned extensive private financial information about that person may not then represent that person's spouse in seeking a divorce. Similarly, a lawyer who has previously represented a client in securing environmental permits to build a shopping center would be precluded from representing neighbors seeking to oppose rezoning of the property on the basis of environmental considerations; however, the lawyer would not be precluded, on the grounds of substantial relationship, from defending a tenant of the completed shopping center in resisting eviction for nonpayment of rent. Information that has been disclosed to the public or to other parties adverse to the former client ordinarily will not be disqualifying. Information acquired in a prior representation may have been rendered obsolete by the passage of time, a circumstance that may be relevant in determining whether two representations are substantially related. In the case of an organizational client, general knowledge of the client's policies and practices ordinarily will not preclude a subsequent representation; on the other hand, knowledge of specific facts gained in a prior representation that are relevant to the matter in question ordinarily will preclude such a representation. A former client is not required to reveal the confidential information learned by the lawyer in order to establish a substantial risk that the lawyer has confidential information to use in the subsequent matter. A conclusion about the possession of such information may be based on the nature of the services the lawyer provided the former client and information that would in ordinary practice be learned by a lawyer providing such services.

[4] Disqualification from subsequent representation is for the protection of clients and can be waived by them. A waiver is effective only if there is disclosure of the circumstances, including the lawyer's intended role in behalf of the new client. The question of whether a lawyer is personally disqualified from representation in any matter on account of successive government and private employment is governed by Rule 1.11 rather than by Rule 1.9.

[5] With regard to disqualification of a firm with which a lawyer is associated, see Rules 1.10; for former government lawyers, see Rule 1.11; for former judges and law clerks, see Rule 1.11.

RULE 1.10 – IMPUTED DISQUALIFICATION: GENERAL RULE

(a) WHILE LAWYERS ARE ASSOCIATED IN A FIRM, NONE OF THEM SHALL KNOWINGLY REPRESENT A CLIENT WHEN ANY ONE OF THEM PRACTICING ALONE WOULD BE PROHIBITED FROM DOING SO BY RULES 1.7 OR 1.9, UNLESS:

> (1) THE PROHIBITION OF THE INDIVIDUAL LAWYER'S REPRESENTATION IS BASED ON AN INTEREST OF THE LAWYER DESCRIBED IN RULE 1.7(b)(4) AND THAT INTEREST DOES NOT PRESENT A SIGNIFICANT RISK OF ADVERSELY AFFECTING THE REPRESENTA-

TION OF THE CLIENT BY THE REMAINING LAWYERS IN THE FIRM; OR

(2) THE REPRESENTATION IS PERMITTED BY RULES 1.11, 1.12, OR 1.18, OR BY PARAGRAPH (b) OF THIS RULE.

(b)(1) EXCEPT AS PROVIDED IN SUBPARAGRAPHS (2) AND (3), WHEN A LAWYER BECOMES ASSOCIATED WITH A FIRM, THE FIRM MAY NOT KNOWINGLY REPRESENT A PERSON IN A MATTER WHICH IS THE SAME AS, OR SUBSTANTIALLY RELATED TO, A MATTER WITH RESPECT TO WHICH THE LAWYER HAD PREVIOUSLY REPRESENTED A CLIENT WHOSE INTERESTS ARE MATERIALLY ADVERSE TO THAT PERSON AND ABOUT WHOM THE LAWYER HAS IN FACT ACQUIRED INFORMATION PROTECTED BY RULE 1.6 THAT IS MATERIAL TO THE MATTER.

(2) THE FIRM IS NOT DISQUALIFIED BY THIS PARAGRAPH IF THE LAWYER PARTICIPATED IN A PREVIOUS REPRESENTATION OR ACQUIRED INFORMATION UNDER THE CIRCUMSTANCES COVERED BY RULE 1.6(h) OR RULE 1.18.

(3) THE FIRM IS NOT DISQUALIFIED BY THIS PARAGRAPH IF THE PROHIBITION IS BASED UPON RULE 1.9 AND

(A) THE DISQUALIFIED LAWYER IS SCREENED FROM THE MATTER AND IS APPORTIONED NO PART OF THE FEE THEREFROM; AND

(B) WRITTEN NOTICE IS PROMPTLY GIVEN BY THE FIRM AND THE LAWYER TO ANY AFFECTED FORMER CLIENT OF THE SCREENED LAWYER, SUCH NOTICE TO INCLUDE A DESCRIPTION OF THE SCREENING PROCEDURES EMPLOYED AND A STATEMENT OF COMPLIANCE WITH THESE RULES.

(c) WHEN A LAWYER HAS TERMINATED AN ASSOCIATION WITH A FIRM, THE FIRM IS NOT PROHIBITED FROM THEREAFTER REPRESENTING A PERSON WITH INTERESTS MATERIALLY ADVERSE TO THOSE OF A CLIENT WHO WAS REPRESENTED BY THE FORMERLY ASSOCIATED LAWYER DURING THE ASSOCIATION AND IS NOT CURRENTLY REPRESENTED BY THE FIRM, UNLESS:

(1) THE MATTER IS THE SAME OR SUBSTANTIALLY RELATED TO THAT IN WHICH THE FORMERLY ASSOCIATED LAWYER REPRESENTED THE CLIENT; AND

(2) ANY LAWYER REMAINING IN THE FIRM HAS INFORMATION PROTECTED BY RULE 1.6 THAT IS MATERIAL TO THE MATTER.

(d) A DISQUALIFICATION PRESCRIBED BY THIS RULE MAY BE WAIVED BY THE AFFECTED CLIENT UNDER THE CONDITIONS STATED IN RULE 1.7.

(e) A LAWYER WHO, WHILE AFFILIATED WITH A FIRM, IS MADE AVAILABLE TO ASSIST THE OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA IN PROVIDING LEGAL SERVICES TO THAT AGENCY IS NOT CONSIDERED TO BE ASSOCIATED IN A FIRM FOR PURPOSES OF PARAGRAPH (a), PROVIDED, HOWEVER, THAT NO SUCH LAWYER SHALL REPRESENT THE OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL WITH RESPECT TO A MATTER IN WHICH THE LAWYER'S FIRM APPEARS ON BEHALF OF AN ADVERSARY.

(f) IF A CLIENT OF THE FIRM REQUESTS IN WRITING THAT THE FACT AND SUBJECT MATTER OF A REPRESENTATION SUBJECT TO PARAGRAPH (b) NOT BE DISCLOSED BY SUBMITTING THE WRITTEN NOTICE REFERRED TO IN SUBPARAGRAPH (b)(3)(B), SUCH NOTICE SHALL BE PREPARED CONCURRENTLY WITH UNDERTAKING THE REPRESENTATION AND FILED WITH DISCIPLINARY COUNSEL UNDER SEAL. IF AT ANY TIME THEREAFTER THE FACT AND SUBJECT MATTER OF THE REPRESENTATION ARE DISCLOSED TO THE PUBLIC OR BECOME A PART OF THE PUBLIC RECORD, THE WRITTEN NOTICE PREVIOUSLY PREPARED SHALL BE PROMPTLY SUBMITTED AS REQUIRED BY SUBPARAGRAPH (b)(3)(B).

COMMENT

Definition of "Firm"

[1] Whether two or more lawyers constitute a firm within this definition can depend on the specific facts. See Rule 1.0(c). For purposes of this rule, the term "firm" includes lawyers in a private firm and lawyers employed in the legal department of a corporation, legal services organization, or other organization, but does not include a government agency or other government entity. For example, two practitioners who share office space and occasionally consult or assist each other ordinarily would not be regarded as constituting a firm. However, if they present themselves to the public in a way suggesting that they are a firm or conduct themselves as a firm, they should be regarded as a firm for purposes of the Rules. The terms of any formal agreement between associated lawyers are relevant in determining whether they are a firm, as is the fact that they have mutual access to confidential information concerning the clients they serve. Furthermore, it is relevant in doubtful cases to consider the underlying purpose of the Rule that is involved. A group of lawyers could be regarded as a firm for purposes of the Rule that the same lawyer should not represent opposing parties in litigation, while it might not be so regarded for purposes of the Rule that information acquired by one lawyer is attributed to another.

[2] There is ordinarily no question that the members of the law department of an organization constitute a firm within the meaning of the Rules of Professional Conduct, but there can be uncertainty as to the identity of the client. For example, it may not be clear whether the law department of a corporation represents a subsidiary or an affiliated corporation, as well as the corporation by which the members of the department are directly employed. A similar question can arise concerning an unincorporated association and its local affiliates.

[3] Similar questions can also arise with respect to lawyers in legal aid organizations. Lawyers employed in the same unit of a legal service organization constitute a firm, but not necessarily those employed in separate units. As in the case of independent practitioners, whether the lawyers should be treated as associated with each other can depend on the particular Rule that is involved, and on the specific facts of the situation.

Principles of Imputed Disqualification

[4] The rule of imputed disqualification stated in paragraph (a) gives effect to the principle of loyalty to the client as it applies to lawyers who practice in a law firm. Such situations can be considered from the premise that a firm of lawyers is essentially one lawyer for purposes of the Rules governing loyalty to the client, or from the premise that each lawyer is vicariously bound by the obligation of loyalty owed by each lawyer with whom the lawyer is associated. Paragraph (a) operates only among the lawyers currently associated in a firm. When a lawyer moves from one firm to another, the situation is governed by paragraph (b) or (c).

[5] Where an individual lawyer is prohibited from engaging in certain transactions under Rule 1.8, paragraph (j) of that Rule, and not this Rule, governs whether that prohibition applies also to other lawyers in a firm with which that lawyer is associated. For issues involving prospective clients, see Rule 1.18.

[6] Where a lawyer has joined a private firm after having represented the government, the situation is governed by Rule 1.11.

Exception for Personal Interest of the Disqualified Lawyer

[7] The rule in paragraph (a) does not prohibit representation by the firm where neither questions of client loyalty nor protection of confidential information are presented. Where an individual lawyer could not effectively represent a given client because of an interest described in Rule 1.7(b)(4), but that lawyer will do no work on the matter and the disqualifying interest of the lawyer will not adversely affect the representation by others in the firm, the firm should not be disqualified. For example, a lawyer's strong political beliefs may disqualify the lawyer from representing a client, but the firm should not be disqualified if the lawyer's beliefs will not adversely affect the representation by others in the firm. Similarly, representation of a client by the firm would not be precluded merely because the client's adversary is a person with whom one of the firm's lawyers has longstanding personal or social ties or is represented by a lawyer in another firm who is closely related to one of the firm's lawyers. See Rule 1.7, Comment [12] and Rule 1.8(h), Comment [7], respectively. Nor would representation by the firm be precluded merely because one of its lawyers is seeking possible employment with an opponent (e.g., U.S. Attorney's Office) or with a law firm representing the opponent of a firm client.

Lawyers Moving Between Firms

[8] When lawyers move between firms or when lawyers have been associated in a firm but then end their association, the fiction that the law firm is the same as a single lawyer is no longer wholly realistic. There are several competing considerations. First, the client previously represented must be reasonably assured that the principle of loyalty to the client is not compromised. Second, the rule of disqualification should not be so broadly cast as to preclude other persons from having reasonable choice of legal counsel. Third, the rule of disqualification should not unreasonably hamper lawyers from forming new associations and taking on new clients after having left a previous association, or unreasonably hamper the former firm from representing a client with interests adverse to those of a former client who was represented by a lawyer who has terminated an association with the firm. In this connection, it should be recognized that today many lawyers practice in firms, that many to some degree limit their practice to one field or another, and that many move from one association to another several times in their careers. If the concept of imputed disqualification were defined with unqualified rigor, the result would be radical curtailment of the opportunity of lawyers to move from one practice setting to another and of the opportunity of clients to change counsel.

[9] Reconciliation of these competing principles in the past has been attempted under two rubrics. One approach has been to seek per se rules of disqualification. For example, it has been held that a partner in a law firm is conclusively presumed to have access to all confidences concerning all clients of the firm. Under this analysis, if a lawyer has been a partner in one law firm and then becomes a partner in another law firm, there is a presumption that all confidences known by a partner in the first firm are known to all partners in the second firm. This presumption might properly be applied in some circumstances, especially where the client has been extensively represented, but may be unrealistic where the client was represented only for limited purposes. Furthermore, such a rigid rule exaggerates the difference between a partner and an associate in modern law firms.

[10] The other rubric formerly used for dealing with vicarious disqualification is the appearance of impropriety proscribed in Canon 9 of the Code of Professional Responsibility. Applying this rubric presents two problems. First, the appearance of impropriety can be taken to include any new client-lawyer relationship that might make a former client feel anxious. If that meaning were adopted, disqualification would become little more than a question of subjective judgment by the former client. Second, since "impropriety" is undefined, the term "appearance of impropriety" is question-begging. It therefore has to be recognized that the problem of imputed disqualification cannot be properly resolved either by simple analogy to a lawyer practicing alone or by the very general concept of appearance of impropriety.

[11] A rule based on a functional analysis is more appropriate for determining the question of vicarious disqualification. Two functions are involved: preserving confidentiality and avoiding positions adverse to a client.

Confidentiality

[12] Preserving confidentiality is a question of access to information. Access to information, in turn, is essentially a question of fact in particular circumstances, aided by inferences, deductions, or working presumptions that reasonably may be made about the way in which lawyers work together. A lawyer may have general access to files of all clients of a law firm and may regularly participate in discussions of their affairs; it should be inferred that such a lawyer in fact is privy to all information about all the firm's clients. In contrast, another lawyer may have access to the files of only a limited number of clients and participate in discussion of the affairs of no other clients; in the absence of information to the contrary, it should be inferred that such a lawyer in fact is privy to information about the clients actually served but not those of other clients.

[13] Application of paragraphs (b) and (c) depends on a situation's particular facts. In any such inquiry, the burden of proof should rest upon the firm whose disqualification is sought.

[14] The provisions of paragraphs (b) and (c) which refer to possession of protected information operate to disqualify the firm only when the lawyer involved has actual knowledge of information protected by Rule 1.6. Thus, if a lawyer while with one firm acquired no knowledge of information relating to a particular client of the firm, and that lawyer later joined another firm, neither the lawyer individually nor the second firm is disqualified from representing another client in the same or a substantially related matter even though the interests of the two clients conflict.

[15] Independent of the question of disqualification of a firm, a lawyer changing professional association has a continuing duty to preserve confidentiality of information about a client formerly represented. See Rule 1.6.

Adverse Positions

[16] The second aspect of loyalty to a client is the lawyer's obligation to decline subsequent representations involving positions adverse to a former client arising in the same or substantially related matters. This obligation requires abstention from adverse representations by the individual lawyer involved, and may also entail abstention of other lawyers through imputed disqualification. Hence, this aspect of the problem is governed by the principles of Rule 1.9. Thus, under paragraph (b), if a lawyer left one firm for another, the new affiliation would preclude the lawyer's new firm from continuing to represent clients with interests materially adverse to those of the lawyer's former clients in the same or substantially related matters. In this respect paragraph (b) is at odds with – and thus must be understood to reject – the dicta expressed in the "second" hypothetical in the second paragraph of footnote 5 of Brown v. District of Columbia Board of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37, 42 n. 5 (D.C. 1984) (en banc), premised on LaSalle National Bank v. County of Lake, 703 F.2d 252, 257-59 (7th Cir. 1983). An exception to paragraph (b) is provided by subparagraph (b)(3).

[17] The concept of "former client" as used in paragraph (b) extends only to actual representation of the client by the newly affiliated lawyer while that lawyer was employed by the former firm. Thus, not all of the clients of the former firm during the newly affiliated lawyer's practice there are necessarily deemed former clients of the newly affiliated lawyer. Only those clients with whom the newly affiliated lawyer in fact personally had a lawyer-client relationship are former clients within the terms of paragraph (b).

[18] Subparagraph (b)(2) limits the imputation rule in certain limited circumstances. Those circumstances involve situations in which any secrets or confidences obtained were received before the lawyer had become a member of the Bar, but during a time when such person was providing assistance to another lawyer. The typical situation is that of the part time or summer law clerk, or so-called summer associate. Other types of assistance to a lawyer, such as working as a paralegal or legal assistant, could also fall within the scope of this sentence. The limitations on the imputation rule is similar to the provision dealing with judicial law clerks under Rule 1.11(b). Not applying the imputation rule reflects a policy choice that imputation in such circumstances could unduly impair the mobility of persons employed in such nonlawyer positions once they become members of the Bar. The personal disqualification of the former non-lawyer is not affected, and the lawyer who previously held the non-legal job may not be involved in any representation with respect to which the firm would have been disqualified but for subparagraph (b)(2). Rule 1.6(h) provides that the former nonlawyer is subject to the requirements of Rule 1.6 (regarding protection of client confidences and secrets) just as if the person had been a member of the Bar when employed in the prior position.

[19] Under certain circumstances, paragraph (c) permits a law firm to represent a person with interests directly adverse to those of a client represented by a lawyer who formerly was associated with the firm. The Rule applies regardless of when the formerly associated lawyer represented the client. The firm, however, may not represent a person in a matter adverse to a current client of the firm, which would violate Rule 1.7. Moreover, the firm may not represent the person where the matter is the same as, or substantially related to, that in which the formerly associated lawyer represented the client and any other lawyer currently in the firm has material information protected by Rule 1.6.

[20] Subparagraph (b)(3) removes the imputation otherwise required by paragraphs 1.10(a) and (b), but does so without requiring informed consent by the former client of the lawyer changing firms. Instead, it requires that the procedures set out in subparagraphs (b)(3)(A) and (B) be followed. The term "screened" is defined in Rule 1.0(l) and explained in comments [4]-[6] to Rule 1.0. Lawyers should be aware, however, that even where subparagraph 1.10(b)(3) has been followed, tribunals in other jurisdictions may consider additional factors in ruling upon motions to disqualify lawyers from pending litigation. Establishing a screen under this rule does not constitute dropping an existing client in favor of another client. Cf. D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 272 (1997) (permitting lawyer to drop occasional client for whom lawyer is handling no current projects in order to accept conflicting representation).

[21] Subparagraph (b)(3)(A) does not prohibit the screened lawyer from receiving a salary or partnership share established by prior independent agreement, but that lawyer may not receive compensation directly related to the matter from which the screened lawyer is disqualified. See D.C. Legal Ethics Op. 279 (1998).

[22] The written notice required by subparagraph (b)(3)(B) generally should include a description of the screened lawyer's prior representation and an undertaking by the new law firm to respond promptly to any written inquiries or objections by the former client regarding the screening procedures. The notice should be provided as soon as practicable after the need for screening becomes apparent. It also should include a statement by the screened lawyer and the new firm that the screened lawyer's former client's confidential information has not been disclosed or used in violation of the Rules. The notice is intended to enable the screened lawyer's former client to evaluate and comment upon the effectiveness of the screening procedures. Nothing in this rule is intended to restrict the firm and the screened lawyer's former client from agreeing to different screening procedures but those set out herein are sufficient to comply with the rule.

[23] Paragraph (f) makes it clear that a lawyer's duty, under Rule 1.6, to maintain client confidences and secrets may preclude the submission of any notice required by subparagraph (b)(3)(B). If a client requests in writing that the fact and subject matter of the representation not be disclosed, the screened lawyer and law firm must comply with that request. If a client makes such a request, the lawyer must abide by the client's wishes until such time as the fact and subject matter of the representation become public through some other means, such as a public filing. Filing a pleading that is publicly available or making an appearance in a proceeding before a tribunal that is open to the public constitutes a public filing for purposes of this rule. Once information concerning the representation is public, the notifications called for must be made promptly, and the lawyers involved may not honor a client's request not to make the notifications.

[24] Although paragraph (f) prohibits the lawyer from disclosing the fact and subject matter of the representation when the client has requested in writing that the information be kept confidential, the paragraph requires the screened lawyer and the screened lawyer's new firm to prepare the documents described in paragraph (f) as soon as the representation commences, to file the documents with Disciplinary Counsel, and to preserve the documents for possible submission to the screened lawyer's former client if and when the client does consent to their submission or the information becomes public.

[25] The responsibilities of partners, managers, and supervisory lawyers prescribed by Rules 5.1 and 5.3 apply in respect of screening arrangements under Rule 1.10(b)(3).

Lawyers Assisting the Office of the Attorney General of the District of Columbia

[26] The Office of the Attorney General of the District of Columbia may experience periods of peak need for legal services which cannot be met by normal hiring programs, or may experience problems in dealing with a large backlog of matters requiring legal services. In such circumstances, the public interest is served by permitting private firms to provide the services of lawyers affiliated with such private firms on a temporary basis to assist the Office of the Attorney General. Such arrangements do not fit within the classical pattern of situations involving the general imputation rule of paragraph (a). Provided that safeguards are in place which preclude the improper disclosure of client confidences or secrets, and the improper use of one client's confidences or secrets on behalf of another client, the public interest benefits of such arrangements justify an exception to the general imputation rule, just as Comment [1] excludes from the definition of "firm" lawyers employed by a government agency or other government entity. Lawyers assigned to assist the Office of the Attorney General pursuant to such temporary programs are, by virtue of paragraph (e), treated as if they were employed as government employees and as if their affiliation with the private firm did not exist during the period of temporary service with the Office of the Attorney General. See Rule 1.11(h) with respect to the procedures to be followed by lawyers participating in such temporary programs and by the firms with which such lawyers are affiliated after the participating lawyers have ended their participation in such temporary programs.

[27] The term "made available to assist the Office of the Attorney General in providing legal services" in paragraph (e) contemplates the temporary cessation of practice with the firm during the period legal services are being made available to the Office of the Attorney General, so that during that period the lawyer's activities which involve the practice of law are devoted fully to assisting the Office of the Attorney General.

[28] Rule 1.10(e) prohibits a lawyer who is assisting the Office of the Attorney General from representing that office in any matter in which the lawyer's firm represents an adversary. Rule 1.10(e) does not, however, by its terms, prohibit lawyers assisting the Office of the Attorney General from participating in every matter in which the Attorney General is taking a position adverse to that of a current client of the firm with which the participating lawyer was affiliated prior to joining the program of assistance to the Office of the Attorney General. Such an unequivocal prohibition would be overly broad, difficult to administer in practice, and inconsistent with the purposes of Rule 1.10(e).

[29] The absence of such a per se prohibition in Rule 1.10(e) does not diminish the importance of a thoughtful and restrained approach to defining those matters in which it is appropriate for a participating lawyer to be involved. An appearance of impropriety in programs of this kind can undermine the public's acceptance of the program and embarrass the Office of the Attorney General, the participating lawyer, that lawyer's law firm and clients of that firm. For example, it would not be appropriate for a participant lawyer to engage in a representation adverse to a party who is known to be a major client of the participating lawyer's firm, even though the subject matter of the representation of the Office of the Attorney General bears no substantial relationship to any representation of that party by the participating lawyer's firm. Similarly, it would be inappropriate for a participating lawyer to be involved in a representation adverse to a party that the participating lawyer has been personally involved in representing while at the firm, even if the client is not a major client of the firm. The appropriate test is that of conservative good judgment; if any reasonable doubts concerning the unrestrained vigor of the participating lawyer's representation on behalf of the Office of the Attorney General might be created, the lawyer should advise the appropriate officials of the Office of the Attorney General and decline to participate. Similarly, if participation on behalf of the Office of the Attorney General might reasonably give rise to a concern on the part of a participating lawyer's firm or a client of the firm that its secrets or confidences (as defined by Rule 1.6) might be compromised, participation should be declined. It is not anticipated that situations suggesting the appropriateness of a refusal to participate will occur so frequently as to significantly impair the usefulness of the program of participation by lawyers from private firms.

[30] The primary responsibility for identifying situations in which representation by the participating lawyer might raise reasonable doubts as to the lawyer's zealous representation on behalf of the Office of the Attorney General must rest on the participating lawyer, who will generally be privy to nonpublic information bearing on the appropriateness of the lawyer's participation in a matter on behalf of the Office of the Attorney General. Recognizing that many representations by law firms are nonpublic matters, the existence and nature of which may not be disclosed consistent with Rule 1.6, it is not anticipated that law firms from which participating lawyers have been drawn would be asked to perform formal "conflicts checks" with respect to matters in which participating lawyers may be involved. However, consultations between participating lawyers and their law firms to identify potential areas of concern, provided that such consultations honor the requirements of Rule 1.6, are appropriate to protect the interests of all involved – the Office of the Attorney General, the participating lawyer, that lawyer's law firm and any clients whose interests are potentially implicated.

RULE 1.11 – SUCCESSIVE GOVERNMENT AND PRIVATE OR OTHER EMPLOYMENT

(a) A LAWYER SHALL NOT ACCEPT OTHER EMPLOYMENT IN CONNECTION WITH A MATTER WHICH IS THE SAME AS, OR SUBSTANTIALLY RELATED TO, A MATTER IN WHICH THE LAWYER PARTICIPATED PERSONALLY AND SUBSTANTIALLY AS A PUBLIC OFFICER OR EMPLOYEE. SUCH PARTICIPATION INCLUDES ACTING ON THE MERITS OF A MATTER IN A JUDICIAL OR OTHER ADJUDICATIVE CAPACITY.

(b) IF A LAWYER IS REQUIRED TO DECLINE OR TO WITHDRAW FROM EMPLOYMENT UNDER PARAGRAPH (a) ON ACCOUNT OF A PERSONAL AND SUBSTANTIAL PARTICIPATION IN A MATTER, NO PARTNER OR ASSOCIATE OF THAT LAWYER, OR LAWYER WITH AN OF COUNSEL RELATIONSHIP TO THAT LAWYER, MAY KNOWINGLY ACCEPT OR CONTINUE SUCH EMPLOYMENT EXCEPT AS PROVIDED IN PARAGRAPHS (c) AND (d) BELOW. THE DISQUALIFICATION OF SUCH OTHER LAWYERS DOES NOT APPLY IF THE SOLE FORM OF PARTICIPATION WAS AS A JUDICIAL LAW CLERK.

(c) THE PROHIBITION STATED IN PARAGRAPH (b) SHALL NOT APPLY IF THE PERSONALLY DISQUALIFIED LAWYER IS TIMELY SCREENED FROM ANY FORM OF PARTICIPATION IN THE MATTER OR REPRESENTATION AS THE CASE MAY BE, AND FROM SHARING IN ANY FEES RESULTING THEREFROM, AND IF THE REQUIREMENTS OF PARAGRAPHS (d) AND (e) ARE SATISFIED.

(d) EXCEPT AS PROVIDED IN PARAGRAPH (e), WHEN ANY OF COUNSEL, LAWYER, PARTNER, OR ASSOCIATE OF A LAWYER PERSONALLY DISQUALIFIED UNDER PARAGRAPH (a) ACCEPTS EMPLOYMENT IN CONNECTION WITH A MATTER GIVING RISE TO THE PERSONAL DISQUALIFICATION, THE FOLLOWING NOTIFICATIONS SHALL BE REQUIRED:

(1) THE PERSONALLY DISQUALIFIED LAWYER SHALL SUBMIT TO THE PUBLIC DEPARTMENT OR AGENCY BY WHICH THE LAWYER WAS FORMERLY EMPLOYED AND SERVE ON EACH OTHER PARTY TO ANY PERTINENT PROCEEDING A SIGNED DOCUMENT ATTESTING THAT DURING THE PERIOD OF DISQUALIFICATION THE PERSONALLY DISQUALIFIED LAWYER WILL NOT PARTICIPATE IN ANY MANNER IN THE MATTER OR THE REPRESENTATION, WILL NOT DISCUSS THE MATTER OR THE REPRESENTATION WITH ANY PARTNER, ASSOCIATE, OR OF COUNSEL LAWYER, AND WILL NOT SHARE IN ANY FEES FOR THE MATTER OR THE REPRESENTATION.

(2) AT LEAST ONE AFFILIATED LAWYER SHALL SUBMIT TO THE SAME DEPARTMENT OR AGENCY AND SERVE ON THE SAME PARTIES A SIGNED DOCUMENT ATTESTING THAT ALL AFFILIATED LAWYERS ARE AWARE OF THE REQUIREMENT THAT THE PERSONALLY DISQUALIFIED LAWYER BE SCREENED FROM PARTICIPATING IN OR DISCUSSING THE MATTER OR THE REPRESENTATION AND DESCRIBING THE PROCEDURES BEING TAKEN TO SCREEN THE PERSONALLY DISQUALIFIED LAWYER.

(e) IF A CLIENT REQUESTS IN WRITING THAT THE FACT AND SUBJECT MATTER OF A REPRESENTATION SUBJECT TO PARAGRAPH (d) NOT BE DISCLOSED BY SUBMITTING THE SIGNED STATEMENTS REFERRED TO IN PARAGRAPH (d), SUCH STATEMENTS SHALL BE PREPARED CONCURRENTLY WITH UNDERTAKING THE REPRESENTATION AND FILED WITH DISCIPLINARY COUNSEL UNDER SEAL. IF AT ANY TIME THEREAFTER THE FACT AND SUBJECT MATTER OF THE REPRESENTATION ARE DISCLOSED TO THE PUBLIC OR BECOME A PART OF THE PUBLIC RECORD, THE SIGNED STATEMENTS PREVIOUSLY PREPARED SHALL BE PROMPTLY SUBMITTED AS REQUIRED BY PARAGRAPH (d).

(f) SIGNED DOCUMENTS FILED PURSUANT TO PARAGRAPH (d) SHALL BE AVAILABLE TO THE PUBLIC, EXCEPT TO THE EXTENT THAT A LAWYER SUBMITTING A SIGNED DOCUMENT DEMONSTRATES TO THE SATISFACTION OF THE PUBLIC DEPARTMENT OR AGENCY UPON WHICH SUCH DOCUMENTS ARE SERVED THAT PUBLIC DISCLOSURE IS INCONSISTENT WITH RULE 1.6 OR OTHER APPLICABLE LAW.

(g) THIS RULE APPLIES TO ANY MATTER INVOLVING A SPECIFIC PARTY OR PARTIES.

(h) A LAWYER WHO PARTICIPATES IN A PROGRAM OF TEMPORARY SERVICE TO THE OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE KIND DESCRIBED IN RULE 1.10(e) SHALL BE TREATED AS HAVING SERVED AS A PUBLIC OFFICER OR EMPLOYEE FOR PURPOSES OF PARAGRAPH (a), AND THE PROVISIONS OF PARAGRAPHS (b)-(e) SHALL APPLY TO THE LAWYER AND TO LAWYERS AFFILIATED WITH THE LAWYER.

COMMENT

[1] This rule deals with lawyers who leave public office and enter other employment. It applies to judges and their law clerks as well as to lawyers who act in other capacities. It is a counterpart of Rule 1.9, as applied to an individual former government lawyer, and of Rule 1.10, as applied to a law firm.

[2] A lawyer representing a government agency, whether employed or specially retained by the government, is subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct, including the prohibition against representing adverse interests stated in Rule 1.7 and the protections afforded former clients in Rule 1.9. In addition, such a lawyer is subject to this Rule 1.11 and to statutes and government regulations concerning conflict of interest. In the District of Columbia, where there are many lawyers for the federal and D.C. governments and their agencies, a number of whom are constantly leaving government and accepting other employment, particular heed must be paid to the federal conflict-of-interest statutes. See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. Chapter 11 and regulations and opinions thereunder.

[3] Rule 1.11, in paragraph (a), flatly forbids a lawyer to accept other employment in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee; participation specifically includes acting on a matter in a judicial capacity. Other than as noted in Comment [10] to this rule, there is no provision for waiver of the individual lawyer's disqualification. "Matter" is defined in paragraph (g) so as to encompass only matters that are particular to a specific party or parties. The making of rules of general applicability and the establishment of general policy will ordinarily not be a "matter" within the meaning of Rule 1.11. When a lawyer is forbidden by paragraph (a) to accept private employment in a matter, the partners and associates of that lawyer are likewise forbidden, by paragraph (b), to accept the employment unless the screening and disclosure procedures described in paragraphs (c) through (f) are followed.

[4] The rule forbids lawyers to accept other employment in connection with matters that are the same as or "substantially related" to matters in which they participated personally and substantially while serving as public officers or employees. The leading case defining "substantially related" matters in the context of former government employment is Brown v. District of Columbia Board of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37 (D.C. 1984) (en banc). There the D.C. Court of Appeals, en banc, held that in the "revolving door" context, a showing that a reasonable person could infer that, through participation in one matter as a public officer or employee, the former government lawyer "may have had access to information legally relevant to, or otherwise useful in" a subsequent representation, is prima facie evidence that the two matters are substantially related. If this prima facie showing is made, the former government lawyer must disprove any ethical impropriety by showing that the lawyer "could not have gained access to information during the first representation that might be useful in the later representation." Id. at 49-50. In Brown, the Court of Appeals announced the "substantially related" test after concluding that, under former DR 9-101(B), see "Revolving Door," 445 A.2d 615 (D.C. 1982) (en banc) (per curiam), the term "matter" was intended to embrace all matters "substantially related" to one another – a test that originated in "side-switching" litigation between private parties. See Rule 1.9, Comments [2] and [3]; Brown, 486 A.2d at 39-40 n. 1, 41-42 & n. 4. Accordingly, the words "or substantially related to" in paragraph (a) are an express statement of the judicial gloss in Brown interpreting "matter."

[5] Paragraph (a)'s absolute disqualification of a lawyer from matters in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially carries forward a policy of avoiding both actual impropriety and the appearance of impropriety that is expressed in the federal conflict-of-interest statutes and was expressed in the former Code of Professional Responsibility. Paragraph (c) requires the screening of a disqualified lawyer from such a matter as a condition to allowing any lawyers in the disqualified lawyer's firm to participate in it. This procedure is permitted in order to avoid imposing a serious deterrent to lawyers' entering public service. Governments have found that they benefit from having in their service both younger and more experienced lawyers who do not intend to devote their entire careers to public service. Some lawyers might not enter into short-term public service if they thought that, as a result of their active governmental practice, a firm would hesitate to hire them because of a concern that the entire firm would be disqualified from matters as a result.

[6] There is no imputed disqualification and consequently no screening requirement in the case of a judicial law clerk. But such clerks are subject to a personal obligation not to participate in matters falling within paragraph (a), since participation by a law clerk is within the term "judicial or other adjudicative capacity."

[7] Paragraph (d) imposes a further requirement that must be met before lawyers affiliated with a disqualified lawyer may participate in the representation. Except to the extent that the exception in paragraph (e) is satisfied, both the personally disqualified lawyer and at least one affiliated lawyer must submit to the agency signed documents basically stating that the personally disqualified lawyer will be screened from participation in the matter. The personally disqualified lawyer must also state that the lawyer will not share in any fees paid for the representation in question. And the affiliated lawyer must describe the procedures to be followed to ensure that the personally disqualified lawyer is effectively screened.

[8] Paragraph (e) makes it clear that the lawyer's duty, under Rule 1.6, to maintain client confidences and secrets may preclude the submission of any notice required by paragraph (d). If the client requests in writing that the fact and subject matter of the representation not be disclosed, the lawyer must comply with that request. If the client makes such a request, the lawyer must abide by the client's wishes until such time as the fact and subject matter of the representation become public through some other means, such as a public filing. Filing a pleading or making an appearance in a proceeding before a tribunal constitutes a public filing. Once information concerning the representation is public, the notifications called for must be made promptly, and the lawyers involved may not honor a client request not to make the notifications. If a government agency has adopted rules governing practice before the agency by former government employees, members of the District of Columbia Bar are not exempted by Rule 1.11(e) from any additional or more restrictive notice requirements that the agency may impose. Thus the agency may require filing of notifications whether or not a client consents. While the lawyer cannot file a notification that the client has directed the lawyer not to file, the failure to file in accordance with agency rules may preclude the lawyer's representation of the client before the agency. Such issues are governed by the agency's rules, and Rule 1.11(e) is not intended to displace such agency requirements.

[9] Although paragraph (e) prohibits the lawyer from disclosing the fact and subject matter of the representation when the client has requested in writing that the information be kept confidential, the paragraph requires the lawyer to prepare the documents described in paragraph (d) as soon as the representation commences and to preserve the documents for possible submission to the agency and parties to any pertinent proceeding if and when the client does consent to their submission or the information becomes public.

[10] "Other employment," as used in paragraph (a) of this rule, includes the representation of a governmental body other than an agency of the government by which the lawyer was employed as a public officer or employee, but in the case of a move from one government agency to another the prohibition provided in paragraph (a) may be waived by the government agency with which the lawyer was previously employed. As used in paragraph (a), it would not be other employment for a lawyer who has left the employment of a particular government agency and taken employment with another government agency (e.g., the Department of Justice) or with a private law firm to continue or accept representation of the same government agency with which the lawyer was previously employed.

[11] Paragraph (c) does not prohibit a lawyer from receiving a salary or partnership share established by prior independent agreement. It prohibits directly relating the attorney's compensation in any way to the fee in the matter in which the lawyer is disqualified. See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 279.

[12] Rule 1.10(e) provides an exception to the general imputation imposed by Rule 1.10(a) for lawyers assisting the Office of the District of Columbia Attorney General on a temporary basis. Rule 1.10(e) provides that lawyers providing such temporary assistance are not considered to be affiliated with their law firm during such periods of temporary assistance. However, lawyers participating in such temporary assistance programs have a potential for conflicts of interest or the abuse of information obtained while participating in such programs. It is appropriate to subject lawyers participating in temporary assistance programs to the same rules which paragraphs (a)-(g) impose on former government employees. Paragraph (h) effects this result.

[13] In addition to ethical concerns, provisions of conflict of interest statutes or regulations may impose limitations on the conduct of lawyers while they are providing assistance to the Office of the District of Columbia Attorney or after they return from such assignments. See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 207, 208. Compliance with the Rules of Professional Conduct does not necessarily constitute compliance with all of the obligations imposed by conflict of interest statutes or regulations.

RULE 1.12 – THIRD-PARTY NEUTRALS

(a) EXCEPT AS STATED IN PARAGRAPH (e), A LAWYER SHALL NOT REPRESENT ANYONE IN CONNECTION WITH A MATTER IN WHICH THE LAWYER PARTICIPATED PERSONALLY AND SUBSTANTIALLY AS AN ARBITRATOR, MEDIATOR OR OTHER THIRD-PARTY NEUTRAL, UNLESS ALL PARTIES TO THE PROCEEDINGS GIVE THEIR INFORMED CONSENT AFTER DISCLOSURE.

(b) A LAWYER SHALL NOT NEGOTIATE FOR EMPLOYMENT WITH ANY PERSON WHO IS INVOLVED AS A PARTY OR AS A LAWYER FOR A PARTY IN A MATTER IN WHICH THE LAWYER IS PARTICIPATING PERSONALLY AND SUBSTANTIALLY AS AN ARBITRATOR, MEDIATOR OR OTHER THIRD PARTY NEUTRAL.

(c) IF A LAWYER IS DISQUALIFIED BY PARAGRAPH (a), NO LAWYER IN A FIRM WITH WHICH THAT LAWYER IS ASSOCIATED MAY KNOWINGLY UNDERTAKE OR CONTINUE REPRESENTATION IN THE MATTER UNLESS:

(1) THE DISQUALIFIED LAWYER IS TIMELY SCREENED FROM ANY PARTICIPATION IN THE MATTER AND IS APPORTIONED NO PART OF THE FEE THEREFROM; AND

(2) WRITTEN NOTICE IS PROMPTLY GIVEN TO THE PARTIES AND ANY APPROPRIATE TRIBUNAL TO ENABLE THEM TO ASCERTAIN COMPLIANCE WITH THE PROVISIONS OF THIS RULE.

(d) IF A CLIENT REQUESTS IN WRITING THAT THE FACT AND SUBJECT MATTER OF A REPRESENTATION SUBJECT TO PARAGRAPH (a) NOT BE DISCLOSED BY SUBMITTING THE SIGNED STATEMENTS REFERRED TO IN PARAGRAPH (c), SUCH STATEMENTS SHALL BE PREPARED CONCURRENTLY WITH UNDERTAKING THE REPRESENTATION AND FILED WITH DISCIPLINARY COUNSEL UNDER SEAL. IF AT ANY TIME THEREAFTER THE FACT AND SUBJECT MATTER OF THE REPRESENTATION ARE DISCLOSED TO THE PUBLIC OR BECOME A PART OF THE PUBLIC RECORD, THE SIGNED STATEMENTS PREVIOUSLY PREPARED SHALL BE PROMPTLY SUBMITTED AS REQUIRED BY PARAGRAPH (c).

(e) AN ARBITRATOR SELECTED AS A PARTISAN OF A PARTY IN A MULTIMEMBER ARBITRATION PANEL IS NOT PROHIBITED FROM SUBSEQUENTLY REPRESENTING THAT PARTY.

COMMENT

[1] Lawyers who have served as arbitrators, mediators or other third-party neutrals may be asked to represent a client in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially. This rule forbids such representation unless all of the parties to the proceedings give their informed consent. For the definition of "informed consent," see Rule 1.0(e). Other law or codes of ethics governing third-party neutrals may impose more stringent standards of personal or imputed disqualification. See Rule 2.4.

[2] Although lawyers who serve as third-party neutrals do not have information concerning the parties that is protected under Rule 1.6, they typically owe the parties an obligation of confidentiality under law or codes of ethics governing third-party neutrals. Thus, paragraph (c) provides that conflicts of the personally disqualified lawyer will be imputed to other lawyers in a law firm unless the conditions of this paragraph are met.

[3] Requirements for screening procedures are stated in Rule 1.0(l). Paragraph (c)(1) does not prohibit the screened lawyer from receiving a salary or partnership share established by prior independent agreement, but that lawyer may not receive compensation directly related to the matter in which the lawyer is disqualified. See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 279.

[4] Notice, including a description of the screened lawyer's prior representation and of the screening procedures employed, generally should be given as soon as practicable after the need for screening becomes apparent.

[5] With respect to statements filed with Disciplinary Counsel pursuant to paragraph (d), see Comments [8] and [9] to Rule 1.11.

RULE 1.13 – ORGANIZATION AS CLIENT

(a) A LAWYER EMPLOYED OR RETAINED BY AN ORGANIZATION REPRESENTS THE ORGANIZATION ACTING THROUGH ITS DULY AUTHORIZED CONSTITUENTS.

(b) IF A LAWYER FOR AN ORGANIZATION KNOWS THAT AN OFFICER, EMPLOYEE, OR OTHER PERSON ASSOCIATED WITH THE ORGANIZATION IS ENGAGED IN ACTION, INTENDS TO ACT OR REFUSES TO ACT IN A MATTER RELATED TO THE REPRESENTATION THAT IS A VIOLATION OF A LEGAL OBLIGATION, OR A VIOLATION OF LAW WHICH REASONABLY MIGHT BE IMPUTED TO THE ORGANIZATION, AND IS LIKELY TO RESULT IN SUBSTANTIAL INJURY TO THE ORGANIZATION, THE LAWYER SHALL PROCEED AS IS REASONABLY NECESSARY IN THE BEST INTEREST OF THE ORGANIZATION. UNLESS THE LAWYER REASONABLY BELIEVES THAT IT IS NOT NECESSARY IN THE BEST INTEREST OF THE ORGANIZATION TO DO SO, THE LAWYER SHALL REFER THE MATTER TO HIGHER AUTHORITY IN THE ORGANIZATION, INCLUDING, IF WARRANTED BY THE CIRCUMSTANCES, TO THE HIGHEST AUTHORITY THAT CAN ACT ON BEHALF OF THE ORGANIZATION AS DETERMINED BY APPLICABLE LAW.

(c) IN DEALING WITH AN ORGANIZATION'S DIRECTORS, OFFICERS, EMPLOYEES, MEMBERS, SHAREHOLDERS, OR OTHER CONSTITUENTS, A LAWYER SHALL EXPLAIN THE IDENTITY OF THE CLIENT WHEN IT IS APPARENT THAT THE ORGANIZATION'S INTERESTS MAY BE ADVERSE TO THOSE OF THE CONSTITUENTS WITH WHOM THE LAWYER IS DEALING.

(d) A LAWYER REPRESENTING AN ORGANIZATION MAY ALSO REPRESENT ANY OF ITS DIRECTORS, OFFICERS, EMPLOYEES, MEMBERS, SHAREHOLDERS, OR OTHER CONSTITUENTS, SUBJECT TO THE PROVISIONS OF RULE 1.7. IF THE ORGANIZATION'S CONSENT TO THE DUAL REPRESENTATION IS REQUIRED BY RULE 1.7, THE CONSENT SHALL BE GIVEN BY AN APPROPRIATE OFFICIAL OF THE ORGANIZATION OTHER THAN THE INDIVIDUAL WHO IS TO BE REPRESENTED, OR BY THE SHAREHOLDERS.

COMMENT

The Entity as the Client

[1] An organizational client is a legal entity, but it cannot act except through its officers, directors, employees, shareholders, and other constituents. Officers, directors, employees, and shareholders are the constituents of the corporate organizational client. The duties defined in this Comment apply equally to unincorporated associations. "Other constituents" as used in this Comment means the positions equivalent to officers, directors, employees, and shareholders held by persons acting for organizational clients that are not corporations.

[2] When one of the constituents of an organizational client communicates with the organization's lawyer in that person's organizational capacity, the communication is protected by Rule 1.6. Thus, by way of example, if an organizational client requests its lawyer to investigate allegations of wrongdoing, interviews made in the course of that investigation between the lawyer and the client's employees or other constituents are covered by Rule 1.6. This does not mean, however, that constituents of an organizational client are the clients of the lawyer. The lawyer may not disclose to such constituents information relating to the representation except for disclosures explicitly or impliedly authorized by the organizational client in order to carry out the representation or as otherwise permitted by Rule 1.6.

[3] When constituents of the organization make decisions for it, the decisions ordinarily must be accepted by the lawyer even if their utility or prudence is doubtful. Decisions concerning policy and operations, including ones entailing serious risk, are not as such in the lawyer's province. Paragraph (b) makes clear, however, that when the lawyer knows that the organization is likely to be substantially injured by action of an officer or other constituent that violates a legal obligation to the organization or is in violation of law that might be imputed to the organization, the lawyer must proceed as reasonably necessary in the best interest of the organization. As defined in Rule 1.0(f), knowledge can be inferred from circumstances, and a lawyer cannot ignore the obvious.

[4] In determining how to proceed under paragraph (b), the lawyer should give due consideration to the seriousness of the violation and its consequences, the responsibility in the organization and the apparent motivation of the person involved, the policies of the organization concerning such matters, and any other relevant considerations. Ordinarily, referral to a higher authority would be necessary. In some circumstances, however, it may be appropriate for the lawyer to ask the constituent to reconsider the matter; for example, if the circumstances involve a constituent's innocent misunderstanding of law and subsequent acceptance of the lawyer's advice, the lawyer may reasonably conclude that the best interest of the organization does not require that the matter be referred to higher authority. If a constituent persists in conduct contrary to the lawyer's advice, it will be necessary for the lawyer to take steps to have the matter reviewed by a higher authority in the organization. If the matter is of sufficient seriousness and importance or urgency to the organization, referral to higher authority in the organization may be necessary even if the lawyer has not communicated with the constituent. Any measures taken should, to the extent practicable, minimize the risk of revealing information relating to the representation to persons outside the organization. Even in circumstances where a lawyer is not obligated by Rule 1.13 to proceed, a lawyer may bring to the attention of an organizational client, including its highest authority, matters that the lawyer reasonably believes to be of sufficient importance to warrant doing so in the best interest of the organization.

[5] When it is reasonably necessary to enable the organization to address the matter in a timely and appropriate manner, paragraph (b) requires the lawyer to refer the matter to higher authority, including, if warranted by the circumstances, the highest authority that can act on behalf of the organization under applicable law. The organization's highest authority to whom a matter may be referred ordinarily will be the board of directors or similar governing body. However, applicable law may prescribe that under certain conditions the highest authority reposes elsewhere, for example, in the independent directors of a corporation.

[6] Although Model Rule 1.13 contains a "reporting out" requirement that authorizes disclosure of confidential client information concerning an organizational client that would be prohibited with respect to other types of clients, D.C. Rule 1.13 does not expand the kinds of disclosures that are permitted for organizational clients. Under the D.C. Rules, client confidences are protected to the same degree whether the client is an organization or an individual. If a lawyer has reported a matter to the highest appropriate authority in the organization, and that authority has determined not to take any action recommended by the lawyer, the lawyer should accept that authority's decision, just as the lawyer is required to abide by the decision of an individual client to maintain confidences and secrets – unless disclosure is authorized under Rule 1.6. If a binding judicial determination is made that the disclosure limitations under D.C. Rule 1.13 are preempted by federal law conferring broader authority to disclose client confidences or secrets of certain types of organizational clients, a lawyer may exercise the broader authority granted by federal law. The strictures of the D.C. Rules, however, would continue to apply to protection of confidences and secrets of other types of organizational clients.

Relation to Other Rules

[7] This rule does not limit or expand the lawyer's responsibility under Rules 1.6, 1.8, 1.16, 3.3, and 4.1. If the lawyer's services are being used by an organization to further a crime or fraud by the organization, Rules 1.2(e) and 1.6 (d) can be applicable.

Government Agency

[8] The duty defined in this rule encompasses the representation of governmental organizations. See Rule 1.6 comments [37] through [40].

Clarifying the Lawyer's Role

[9] There are times when the organization's interest may be or become adverse to those of one or more of its constituents. In such circumstances the lawyer should advise any constituent, whose interest the lawyer finds adverse to that of the organization, of the conflict or potential conflict of interest, that the lawyer cannot represent such constituent, and that such person may wish to obtain independent representation. Care must be taken to assure that the individual understands that, when there is such adversity of interest, the lawyer for the organization cannot provide legal representation for that constituent individual, and that discussions between the lawyer for the organization and the individual may not be privileged.

[10] Whether such a warning should be given by the lawyer for the organization to any constituent individual may turn on the facts of each case.

Dual Representation

[11] Paragraph (c) recognizes that a lawyer for an organization may also represent a principal officer or major shareholder.

Derivative Actions

[12] Under generally prevailing law, the shareholders or members of a corporation may bring suit to compel the directors to perform their legal obligations in the supervision of the organization. Members of unincorporated associations have essentially the same right. Such an action may be brought nominally by the organization, but usually is, in fact, a legal controversy over management of the organization.

[13] The question can arise whether counsel for the organization may defend such an action. The proposition that the organization is the lawyer's client does not alone resolve the issue. Most derivative actions are a normal incident of an organization's affairs, to be defended by the organization's lawyer like any other suit. However, if the claim involves serious charges of wrongdoing by those in control of the organization, a conflict may arise between the lawyer's duty to the organization and the lawyer's relationship with the board. In those circumstances, Rule 1.7 governs whether lawyers who normally serve as counsel to the corporation can properly represent both the directors and the organization.

RULE 1.14 – CLIENT WITH DIMINISHED CAPACITY

(a) WHEN A CLIENT'S CAPACITY TO MAKE ADEQUATELY CONSIDERED DECISIONS IN CONNECTION WITH A REPRESENTATION IS DIMINISHED, WHETHER BECAUSE OF MINORITY, MENTAL IMPAIRMENT OR FOR SOME OTHER REASON, THE LAWYER SHALL, AS FAR AS REASONABLY POSSIBLE, MAINTAIN A TYPICAL CLIENT-LAWYER RELATIONSHIP WITH THE CLIENT.

(b) WHEN THE LAWYER REASONABLY BELIEVES THAT THE CLIENT HAS DIMINISHED CAPACITY, IS AT RISK OF SUBSTANTIAL PHYSICAL, FINANCIAL OR OTHER HARM UNLESS ACTION IS TAKEN AND CANNOT ADEQUATELY ACT IN THE CLIENT'S OWN INTEREST, THE LAWYER MAY TAKE REASONABLY NECESSARY PROTECTIVE ACTION, INCLUDING CONSULTING WITH INDIVIDUALS OR ENTITIES THAT HAVE THE ABILITY TO TAKE ACTION TO PROTECT THE CLIENT AND, IN APPROPRIATE CASES, SEEKING THE APPOINTMENT OF A SURROGATE DECISION-MAKER.

(c) INFORMATION RELATING TO THE REPRESENTATION OF A CLIENT WITH DIMINISHED CAPACITY IS PROTECTED BY RULE 1.6. WHEN TAKING PROTECTIVE ACTION PURSUANT TO PARAGRAPH (b), THE LAWYER IS IMPLIEDLY AUTHORIZED UNDER RULE 1.6(a) TO REVEAL INFORMATION ABOUT THE CLIENT, BUT ONLY TO THE EXTENT REASONABLY NECESSARY TO PROTECT THE CLIENT'S INTERESTS.

COMMENT

[1] The typical client-lawyer relationship is based on the assumption that the client, when properly advised and assisted, is capable of making decisions about important matters. When the client is a minor or suffers from a diminished mental capacity, however, maintaining the ordinary client-lawyer relationship may not be possible in all respects. In particular, a severely incapacitated person may have no power to make legally binding decisions. Nevertheless, a client with diminished capacity often has the ability to understand, deliberate upon, and reach conclusions about matters affecting the client's own well-being. For example, children as young as five or six years of age, and certainly those of ten or twelve, are regarded as having opinions that are entitled to weight in legal proceedings concerning their custody. So also, it is recognized that some persons of advanced age can be quite capable of handling routine financial matters while needing special legal protection concerning major transactions. Many people with intellectual disabilities, while lacking sufficient capacity to make binding decisions, have, and are capable of expressing, opinions about a wide range of matters that affect their lives.

[2] The fact that a client suffers a disability does not diminish the lawyer's obligation to treat the client with attention and respect. Even if the person has a surrogate decision-maker, the lawyer should as far as possible accord the represented person the status of client, particularly in maintaining communication. "Surrogate decision-maker" denotes an individual or entity appointed by a court or otherwise authorized by law to make important decisions on behalf of an individual who lacks capacity to make decisions in one or more significant areas of his or her life. The term "surrogate decision-maker" includes, but is not limited to, guardian ad litem, plenary or limited guardian or conservator, proxy decision-maker, or other legal representative.

[3] The client may wish to have family members, lay advocates, or other persons participate in discussions with the lawyer. When necessary to assist in the representation, the presence of such persons generally does not affect the applicability of the attorney-client evidentiary privilege. Nevertheless, the lawyer must keep the client's interests foremost and, except for protective action authorized under paragraph (b), must look to the client, and not family members or others, to make decisions on the client's behalf.

[4] If a surrogate decision-maker has already been appointed for the client, the lawyer should ordinarily look to that person for decisions on behalf of the client. In matters involving a minor, whether the lawyer should look to the parents as natural guardians may depend on the type of proceeding or matter in which the lawyer is representing the minor. In either case, the lawyer should consult with the represented person to the maximum extent possible, as indicated in comment [2] above.

Taking Protective Action

[5] If a lawyer reasonably believes that a client is at risk of substantial physical, financial or other harm unless action is taken, and that a typical client-lawyer relationship cannot be maintained as provided in paragraph (a) because the client lacks sufficient capacity to communicate or to make adequately considered decisions in connection with the representation, then paragraph (b) permits the lawyer to take protective measures deemed necessary. Such measures could include: consulting with family members, using a reconsideration period to permit clarification or improvement of circumstances, using voluntary surrogate decision-making tools such as durable powers of attorney, or consulting with support groups, professional services, adult-protective agencies or other individuals or entities that have the ability to protect the client. In taking any protective action, the lawyer should be guided by such factors as the wishes and values of the client to the extent known, the client's best interests, the goals of intruding into the client's decision-making autonomy to the least extent feasible, maximizing client capacities and respecting the client's family and social connections.

[6] In determining the extent of the client's diminished capacity, the lawyer should consider and balance such factors as: the client's ability to articulate reasoning leading to a decision, variability of state of mind, ability to appreciate the consequences of a decision, the substantive fairness of a decision, the consistency of a decision with the known long-term commitments and values of the client. In appropriate circumstances, the lawyer may seek guidance from an appropriate diagnostician.

[7] If the client does not have a surrogate decision-maker, the lawyer should consider whether the appointment of a surrogate decision-maker is necessary to protect the client's interests. Thus, if a client with diminished capacity has substantial property that should be sold for the client's benefit, effective completion of the transaction may require appointment of a surrogate decision-maker. In addition, rules of procedure in litigation sometimes provide that minors or persons with diminished capacity must be represented by a guardian or next friend if they do not have a general guardian. In many circumstances, however, the appointment of at least some types of surrogate decision-makers may be more expensive, intrusive, or traumatic for the client than circumstances in fact require. Evaluation of such circumstances is a matter entrusted to the professional judgment of the lawyer. In considering alternatives, however, the lawyer should advocate on behalf of the client the least restrictive form of intervention in the client's decision-making.

Disclosure of the Client's Condition

[8] Disclosure of the client's diminished capacity could adversely affect the client's interests. For example, raising the question of diminished capacity could, in some circumstances, lead to proceedings for involuntary commitment. Information relating to the representation is protected by Rule 1.6. Therefore, unless authorized to do so, the lawyer may not disclose such information. When taking protective action pursuant to paragraph (b), the lawyer is impliedly authorized to make the necessary disclosures, even when the client directs the lawyer to the contrary. Nevertheless, given the risks of disclosure, paragraph (c) limits what the lawyer may disclose in consulting with other individuals or entities or seeking the appointment of a surrogate decision-maker. At the very least, the lawyer should determine whether it is likely that the person or entity consulted with will act adversely to the client's interests before discussing matters related to the client. The lawyer's position in such cases is an unavoidably difficult one.

Emergency Legal Assistance

[9] In an emergency where the health, safety or a financial interest of a person with seriously diminished capacity is threatened with imminent and irreparable harm, a lawyer may take legal action on behalf of such a person even though the person is unable to establish a client-lawyer relationship or to make or express considered judgments about the matter, when the person or another acting in good faith on that person's behalf has consulted with the lawyer. Even in such an emergency, however, the lawyer should not act unless the lawyer reasonably believes that the person has no other lawyer, agent or other representative available. The lawyer should take legal action on behalf of the person only to the extent reasonably necessary to maintain the status quo or otherwise avoid imminent and irreparable harm. A lawyer who undertakes to represent a person in such an exigent situation has the same duties under these Rules as the lawyer would with respect to a client.

[10] A lawyer who acts on behalf of a person with seriously diminished capacity in an emergency should keep the confidences of the person as if dealing with a client, disclosing them only to the extent necessary to accomplish the intended protective action. The lawyer should disclose to any tribunal involved and to any other counsel involved the nature of his or her relationship with the person. The lawyer should take steps to regularize the relationship or implement other protective solutions as soon as possible. Normally, a lawyer would not seek compensation for such emergency actions taken.

RULE 1.15 – SAFEKEEPING PROPERTY

(a) A LAWYER SHALL HOLD PROPERTY OF CLIENTS OR THIRD PERSONS THAT IS IN THE LAWYER'S POSSESSION IN CONNECTION WITH A REPRESENTATION SEPARATE FROM THE LAWYER'S OWN PROPERTY. FUNDS OF CLIENTS OR THIRD PERSONS THAT ARE IN THE LAWYER'S POSSESSION (TRUST FUNDS) SHALL BE KEPT IN ONE OR MORE TRUST ACCOUNTS MAINTAINED IN ACCORDANCE WITH PARAGRAPH (B). OTHER PROPERTY SHALL BE IDENTIFIED AS SUCH AND APPROPRIATELY SAFEGUARDED. COMPLETE RECORDS OF SUCH ACCOUNT FUNDS AND OTHER PROPERTY SHALL BE KEPT BY THE LAWYER AND SHALL BE PRESERVED FOR A PERIOD OF FIVE YEARS AFTER TERMINATION OF THE REPRESENTATION.

(b) ALL TRUST FUNDS SHALL BE DEPOSITED WITH AN "APPROVED DEPOSITORY" AS THAT TERM IS DEFINED IN RULE XI OF THE RULES GOVERNING THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BAR. TRUST FUNDS THAT ARE NOMINAL IN AMOUNT OR EXPECTED TO BE HELD FOR A SHORT PERIOD OF TIME, AND AS SUCH WOULD NOT BE EXPECTED TO EARN INCOME FOR A CLIENT OR THIRD-PARTY IN EXCESS OF THE COSTS INCURRED TO SECURE SUCH INCOME, SHALL BE HELD AT AN APPROVED DEPOSITORY AND IN COMPLIANCE WITH THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA'S INTEREST ON LAWYERS TRUST ACCOUNT (DC IOLTA) PROGRAM. THE TITLE ON EACH DC IOLTA ACCOUNT SHALL INCLUDE THE NAME OF THE LAWYER OR LAW FIRM THAT CONTROLS THE ACCOUNT, AS WELL AS "DC IOLTA ACCOUNT" OR "IOLTA ACCOUNT." THE TITLE ON ALL OTHER TRUST ACCOUNTS SHALL INCLUDE THE NAME OF THE LAWYER OR LAW FIRM

THAT CONTROLS THE ACCOUNT, AS WELL AS "TRUST ACCOUNT" OR "ESCROW ACCOUNT." THE REQUIREMENTS OF THIS PARAGRAPH (B) SHALL NOT APPLY WHEN A LAWYER IS OTHERWISE COMPLIANT WITH THE CONTRARY MANDATES OF A TRIBUNAL; OR WHEN THE LAWYER IS PARTICIPATING IN, AND COMPLIANT WITH, THE TRUST ACCOUNTING RULES AND THE IOLTA PROGRAM OF THE JURISDICTION IN WHICH THE LAWYER IS LICENSED AND PRINCIPALLY PRACTICES.

(c) UPON RECEIVING FUNDS OR OTHER PROPERTY IN WHICH A CLIENT OR THIRD PERSON HAS AN INTEREST, A LAWYER SHALL PROMPTLY NOTIFY THE CLIENT OR THIRD PERSON. EXCEPT AS STATED IN THIS RULE OR OTHERWISE PERMITTED BY LAW OR BY AGREEMENT WITH THE CLIENT, A LAWYER SHALL PROMPTLY DELIVER TO THE CLIENT OR THIRD PERSON ANY FUNDS OR OTHER PROPERTY THAT THE CLIENT OR THIRD PERSON IS ENTITLED TO RECEIVE AND, UPON REQUEST BY THE CLIENT OR THIRD PERSON, SHALL PROMPTLY RENDER A FULL ACCOUNTING REGARDING SUCH PROPERTY, SUBJECT TO RULE 1.6.

(d) WHEN IN THE COURSE OF REPRESENTATION A LAWYER IS IN POSSESSION OF PROPERTY IN WHICH INTERESTS ARE CLAIMED BY THE LAWYER AND ANOTHER PERSON, OR BY TWO OR MORE PERSONS TO EACH OF WHOM THE LAWYER MAY HAVE AN OBLIGATION, THE PROPERTY SHALL BE KEPT SEPARATE BY THE LAWYER UNTIL THERE IS AN ACCOUNTING AND SEVERANCE OF INTERESTS IN THE PROPERTY. IF A DISPUTE ARISES CONCERNING THE RESPECTIVE INTERESTS AMONG PERSONS CLAIMING AN INTEREST IN SUCH PROPERTY, THE UNDISPUTED PORTION SHALL BE DISTRIBUTED AND THE PORTION IN DISPUTE SHALL BE KEPT SEPARATE BY THE LAWYER UNTIL THE DISPUTE IS RESOLVED. ANY FUNDS IN DISPUTE SHALL BE DEPOSITED IN A SEPARATE ACCOUNT MEETING THE REQUIREMENTS OF PARAGRAPH (A) AND (B).

(e) ADVANCES OF UNEARNED FEES AND UNINCURRED COSTS SHALL BE TREATED AS PROPERTY OF THE CLIENT PURSUANT TO PARAGRAPH (A) UNTIL EARNED OR INCURRED UNLESS THE CLIENT GIVES INFORMED CONSENT TO A DIFFERENT ARRANGEMENT. REGARDLESS OF WHETHER SUCH CONSENT IS PROVIDED, RULE 1.16(D) APPLIES TO REQUIRE THE RETURN TO THE CLIENT OF ANY UNEARNED PORTION OF ADVANCED LEGAL FEES AND UNINCURRED COSTS AT THE TERMINATION OF THE LAWYER'S SERVICES IN ACCORDANCE WITH RULE 1.16(D).

(f) NOTHING IN THIS RULE SHALL PROHIBIT A LAWYER FROM PLACING A SMALL AMOUNT OF THE LAWYER'S FUNDS INTO A TRUST ACCOUNT FOR THE SOLE PURPOSE OF DEFRAYING BANK CHARGES THAT MAY BE MADE AGAINST THAT ACCOUNT.

COMMENT

[1] A lawyer should hold property of others with the care required of a professional fiduciary. Securities should be kept in a safe deposit box, except when some other form of safekeeping is warranted by special circumstances. All property that is the property of clients or third persons should be kept separate from the lawyer's business and personal property and, if monies, in one or more trust accounts maintained with financial institutions meeting the requirements of this rule. This rule, among other things, sets forth the longstanding prohibitions of the misappropriation of entrusted funds and the commingling of entrusted funds with the lawyer's property. This rule also requires that a lawyer safeguard "other property" of clients, which may include client files. For guidance concerning the disposition of closed client files, see D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion No. 283.

[2] Paragraph (a) of Rule 1.15 requires lawyers to keep "[c]omplete records of [client] funds and property. . . ." The D.C. Court of Appeals addressed the meaning of "complete records" in In re Clower, 831 A.2d 1030, 1034 (D.C. 2003): "The Rules of Professional Conduct should be interpreted with reference to their purposes. The purpose of maintaining 'complete records' is so that the documentary record itself tells the full story of how the attorney handled client or third-party funds and whether the attorney complied with his fiduciary obligation that client or third-party funds not be misappropriated or commingled. Financial records are complete only when documents sufficient to demonstrate an attorney's compliance with his ethical duties are maintained. The reason for requiring complete records is so that any audit of the attorney's handling of client funds by Disciplinary Counsel can be completed even if the attorney or the client, or both, are not available." Rule 1.15 requires that lawyers maintain records such that ownership or any other question about client funds can be answered without assistance from the lawyer or the lawyer's clients. The precise records that achieve this result obviously can vary, but lawyers may wish to look for guidance on records from the 2010 ABA Model Rules For Client Trust Account Records.

[3] Paragraph (a) concerns trust funds arising from "a representation." The obligations of a lawyer under this rule are independent of those arising from activity other than rendering legal services. For example, a lawyer who serves as an escrow agent is governed by the applicable law relating to fiduciaries even though the lawyer does not render legal services in the transaction. Separate trust accounts may be warranted when administering estate monies or acting in similar fiduciary capacities.

[4] Paragraph (b) mandates where trust deposits shall be held and further mandates participation in the District of Columbia's IOLTA program. This paragraph is intended to reach every lawyer who is admitted in this jurisdiction regardless of where the lawyer practices, unless a stated exception applies. Thus, a lawyer should follow the contrary mandates of a tribunal regarding deposits that are subject to that tribunal's oversight. Similarly, if the lawyer principally practices in a foreign jurisdiction in which the lawyer is also licensed, and the lawyer maintains trust accounts compliant with that foreign jurisdiction's trust accounting rules, the lawyer may deposit trust funds to an approved depository or to a banking institution acceptable to that foreign jurisdiction. Finally, a lawyer is not obligated to participate in the District of Columbia IOLTA program if the lawyer is participating in, and compliant with, the IOLTA program in the jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed and principally practices. IOLTA programs are known by different names or acronyms in some jurisdictions; this rule and its exceptions apply to all such programs, however named. This rule anticipates that a law firm with lawyers admitted to practice in the District of Columbia may be obligated to maintain accounts compliant with the IOLTA rules of other jurisdictions where firm lawyers principally practice. A lawyer who is not participating in the IOLTA program of the jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices because the lawyer has exercised a right to opt out of, or not to opt into, the jurisdiction's IOLTA program, or because the jurisdiction does not have an IOLTA program, shall not thereby be excused from participating in the District of Columbia's IOLTA program. To the extent paragraph (b) does not resolve a multi-jurisdictional conflict, see Rule 8.5. Nothing in this rule is intended to limit the power of any tribunal to direct a lawyer in connection with a pending matter, including a lawyer who is admitted pro hac vice, to hold trust funds as may be directed by that tribunal. For a list of approved depositories and additional information regarding DC IOLTA program compliance, see Rule XI, Section 20, of the Rules Governing the District of Columbia Bar, and the D.C. Bar Foundation's website www.dcbarfoundation.org.

[5] The exception to Rule 1.15(b) requires a lawyer to make a good faith determination of the jurisdiction in which the lawyer principally practices. The phrase "principally practices" refers to the conduct of an individual lawyer, not to the principal place of practice of his or her law firm (which might yield a different result for a lawyer with partners). For purposes of this rule, an individual lawyer principally practices in the jurisdiction where the lawyer is licensed and generates the clear majority of his or her income. If there is no such jurisdiction, then a lawyer should identify the physical location of the office where the lawyer devotes the largest portion of his or her time. In any event, the initial good faith determination of where the lawyer principally practices should be changed only if the lawyer's circumstances change significantly and the change is expected to continue indefinitely.

[6] The determination, under paragraph (b), whether trust funds are not expected to earn income in excess of costs, rests in the sound judgment of the lawyer. The lawyer should review trust practices at reasonable intervals to determine whether circumstances require further action with respect to the funds of any client or third party. Because paragraph (b) is a lawyer-specific obligation, this rule anticipates that a law firm may be obligated to maintain accounts compliant with the IOLTA rules of other jurisdictions, to the extent the lawyers in that firm do not all principally practice in the District of Columbia.

[7] Paragraphs (c) and (d) recognize that lawyers often receive funds from third parties from which the lawyer's fee will be paid. The lawyer is not required to remit to the client funds that the lawyer reasonably believes represent fees owed. However, a lawyer may not hold funds to coerce a client into accepting the lawyer's contention. The disputed portion of the funds should be kept in trust and the lawyer should suggest means for prompt resolution of the dispute, such as arbitration. The undisputed portion of the funds should be promptly distributed.

[8] Third parties, such as a client's creditors, may have just claims against funds or other property in a lawyer's custody. A lawyer may have a duty under applicable law to protect such third-party claims against wrongful interference by the client, and accordingly may refuse to surrender the property to the client. However, a lawyer should not unilaterally assume to arbitrate a dispute between the client and the third party. See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 293.

[9] Paragraph (e) permits advances against unearned fees and unincurred costs to be treated as either the property of the client or the property of the lawyer, but absent informed consent by the client to a different arrangement, the rule's default position is that such advances be treated as the property of the client, subject to the restrictions provided in paragraph (a). In any case, at the termination of an engagement, advances against fees that have not been incurred must be returned to the client as provided in Rule 1.16(d). For the definition of "informed consent," see Rule 1.0(e).

[10] With respect to property that constitutes evidence, such as the instruments or proceeds of crime, see Rule 3.4(a).

RULE 1.16 – DECLINING OR TERMINATING REPRESENTATION

(a) EXCEPT AS STATED IN PARAGRAPH (c), A LAWYER SHALL NOT REPRESENT A CLIENT OR, WHERE REPRESENTATION HAS COMMENCED, SHALL WITHDRAW FROM THE REPRESENTATION OF A CLIENT IF:

(1) THE REPRESENTATION WILL RESULT

IN VIOLATION OF THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT OR OTHER LAW;

(2) THE LAWYER'S PHYSICAL OR MENTAL CONDITION MATERIALLY IMPAIRS THE LAWYER'S ABILITY TO REPRESENT THE CLIENT; OR

(3) THE LAWYER IS DISCHARGED.

(b) EXCEPT AS STATED IN PARAGRAPH (c), A LAWYER MAY WITHDRAW FROM REPRESENTING A CLIENT IF WITHDRAWAL CAN BE ACCOMPLISHED WITHOUT MATERIAL ADVERSE EFFECT ON THE INTERESTS OF THE CLIENT, OR IF:

(1) THE CLIENT PERSISTS IN A COURSE OF ACTION INVOLVING THE LAWYER'S SERVICES THAT THE LAWYER REASONABLY BELIEVES IS CRIMINAL OR FRAUDULENT;

(2) THE CLIENT HAS USED THE LAWYER'S SERVICES TO PERPETRATE A CRIME OR FRAUD;

(3) THE CLIENT FAILS SUBSTANTIALLY TO FULFILL AN OBLIGATION TO THE LAWYER REGARDING THE LAWYER'S SERVICES AND HAS BEEN GIVEN REASONABLE WARNING THAT THE LAWYER WILL WITHDRAW UNLESS THE OBLIGATION IS FULFILLED;

(4) THE REPRESENTATION WILL RESULT IN AN UNREASONABLE FINANCIAL BURDEN ON THE LAWYER OR OBDURATE OR VEXATIOUS CONDUCT ON THE PART OF THE CLIENT HAS RENDERED THE REPRESENTATION UNREASONABLY DIFFICULT;

(5) THE LAWYER BELIEVES IN GOOD FAITH, IN A PROCEEDING BEFORE A TRIBUNAL, THAT THE TRIBUNAL WILL FIND THE EXISTENCE OF OTHER GOOD CAUSE FOR WITHDRAWAL.

(c) A LAWYER MUST COMPLY WITH APPLICABLE LAW REQUIRING NOTICE TO OR PERMISSION OF A TRIBUNAL WHEN TERMINATING A REPRESENTATION. WHEN ORDERED TO DO SO BY A TRIBUNAL, A LAWYER SHALL CONTINUE REPRESENTATION NOTWITHSTANDING GOOD CAUSE FOR TERMINATING THE REPRESENTATION.

(d) IN CONNECTION WITH ANY TERMINATION OF REPRESENTATION, A LAWYER SHALL TAKE TIMELY STEPS TO THE EXTENT REASONABLY PRACTICABLE TO PROTECT A CLIENT'S INTERESTS, SUCH AS GIVING REASONABLE NOTICE TO THE CLIENT, ALLOWING TIME FOR EMPLOYMENT OF OTHER COUNSEL, SURRENDERING PAPERS AND PROPERTY TO WHICH THE CLIENT IS ENTITLED, AND REFUNDING ANY ADVANCE PAYMENT OF FEE OR EXPENSE THAT HAS NOT BEEN EARNED OR INCURRED. THE LAWYER MAY RETAIN PAPERS RELATING TO THE CLIENT TO THE EXTENT PERMITTED BY RULE 1.8(i). IT IS NOT MISCONDUCT FOR A LAWYER TO RETAIN COPIES OF DOCUMENTS RELATING TO THE CLIENT.

COMMENT

[1] A lawyer should not accept representation in a matter unless it can be performed competently, promptly, without improper conflict of interest, and to completion.

Mandatory Withdrawal

[2] A lawyer ordinarily must decline or withdraw from representation if the client demands that the lawyer engage in conduct that is illegal or violates the Rules of Professional Conduct or other law. The lawyer is not obliged to decline or withdraw simply because the client suggests such a course of conduct; a client may make such a suggestion in the hope that a lawyer will not be constrained by a professional obligation.

[3] When a lawyer has been appointed to represent a client, withdrawal ordinarily requires approval of the appointing authority. See also Rule 6.2. Difficulty may be encountered if withdrawal is based on the client's demand that the lawyer engage in unprofessional conduct. The court may wish an explanation for the withdrawal, while the lawyer may be bound to keep confidential the facts that would constitute such an explanation. The lawyer's statement that irreconcilable differences between the lawyer and client require termination of the representation ordinarily should be accepted as sufficient.

Discharge

[4] A client has a right to discharge a lawyer at any time, with or without cause, subject to liability for payment for the lawyer's services. Where future dispute about the withdrawal may be anticipated, it may be advisable to prepare a written statement reciting the circumstances.

[5] Whether a client can discharge appointed counsel may depend on applicable law. A client seeking to do so should be given a full explanation of the consequences. These consequences may include a decision by the appointing authority that appointment of successor counsel is unjustified, thus requiring the client to proceed pro se.

[6] If the client has diminished capacity, the client may lack the legal capacity to discharge the lawyer, and in any event the discharge may be seriously adverse to the client's interests. The lawyer should make a special effort to help the client consider the consequences and, in an extreme case, may initiate proceedings for the appointment of a surrogate decision-maker or similar protection of the client. See Rule 1.14.

Optional Withdrawal

[7] A lawyer may withdraw from representation in some circumstances. The lawyer has the option to withdraw if the withdrawal can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the client's interests. Withdrawal is also justified if the client persists in a course of action that the lawyer reasonably believes is criminal or fraudulent, for a lawyer is not required to be associated with such conduct even if the lawyer does not further it. Withdrawal is also permitted if the lawyer's services were misused in the past even if that would materially prejudice the client.

[8] A lawyer may withdraw if the client refuses to abide by the terms of an agreement relating to the representation, such as an agreement concerning the timely payment of the lawyer's fees, court costs or other out-of-pocket expenses of the representation, or an agreement limiting the objectives of the representation.

Assisting the Client Upon Withdrawal

[9] Even if the lawyer has been unfairly discharged by the client, a lawyer must take all reasonable steps to mitigate the consequences to the client. The lawyer may retain papers as security for a fee only to the extent permitted by Rule 1.8(i).

Compliance With Requirements of a Tribunal

[10] Paragraph (c) reflects the possibility that a lawyer may, by appearing before a tribunal, become subject to the tribunal's power in some circumstances to prevent a withdrawal that would otherwise be proper. Paragraph (c) requires the lawyer who is ordered to continue a representation before a tribunal to do so. However, paragraph (c) is not intended to prevent the lawyer from challenging the tribunal's order as beyond its jurisdiction, arbitrary, or otherwise improper while, in the interim, continuing the representation.

Return of Client's Property or Money

[11] Paragraph (d) requires a lawyer to make timely return to the client of any property or money "to which the client is entitled." Where a lawyer holds property or money of a client at the termination of a representation and there is a dispute concerning the distribution of such property or money – whether such dispute is between the lawyer and a client, the lawyer and another lawyer who is owed a fee in the matter, or between either the lawyer or the client and a third party – the lawyer must segregate the disputed portion of such property or money, hold that property or money in trust as required by Rule 1.15, and promptly distribute any undisputed amounts. See Rule 1.15 and Comments [4] and [5] thereto; see In re Haar, 667 A.2d 1350 (D.C. 1995), 698 A.2d 412 (D.C. 1997). Notwithstanding the foregoing, where a lawyer has a valid lien covering undisputed amounts of property or money, the lawyer may continue to hold such property or money to the extent permitted by the substantive law governing the lien asserted. See generally Rules 1.8, 1.15(b).

[12] Information contained in copies of client documents retained by the lawyer following the conclusion of a representation may not be revealed or used where such revelation or use is prohibited by Rule 1.6 or other of these Rules (e.g., Rule 1.9, 1.7, 3.3).

RULE 1.17 – SALE OF LAW PRACTICE

A LAWYER OR A LAW FIRM MAY SELL OR PURCHASE A LAW PRACTICE, OR AN AREA OF LAW PRACTICE, INCLUDING GOOD WILL, IF THE FOLLOWING CONDITIONS ARE SATISFIED:

(a) THE SELLER CEASES TO ENGAGE IN THE PRIVATE PRACTICE OF LAW, OR IN THE AREA OF PRACTICE THAT HAS BEEN SOLD, IN THE JURISDICTION IN WHICH THE PRACTICE HAS BEEN CONDUCTED;

(b) THE ENTIRE PRACTICE IS SOLD TO ONE OR MORE LAWYERS OR LAW FIRMS OR AN ENTIRE AREA OF PRACTICE IS SOLD TO ONE PURCHASER (EITHER A SOLO PRACTITIONER OR A SINGLE LAW FIRM);

(c) THE SELLER GIVES A WRITTEN NOTICE TO EACH OF THE SELLER'S CLIENTS REGARDING:

(1) THE PROPOSED SALE;

(2) THE CLIENT'S RIGHT TO RETAIN OTHER COUNSEL, TO TAKE POSSESSION OF THE FILE OR OF ANY FUNDS OR PROPERTY TO WHICH THE CLIENT IS ENTITLED; AND

(3) THE FACT THAT THE CLIENT'S CONSENT TO THE TRANSFER TO THE PURCHASING LAWYER OR LAW FIRM OF THE CLIENT'S FILES, OF THE REPRESENTATION AND OF ANY CLIENT FUNDS HELD BY THE SELLING LAWYER OR LAW FIRM WILL BE PRESUMED IF THE CLIENT DOES NOT TAKE ANY ACTION OR DOES NOT OTHERWISE OBJECT WITHIN NINETY (90) DAYS OF RECEIPT OF THE NOTICE.

IF A CLIENT CANNOT BE GIVEN NOTICE, THE REPRESENTATION OF THAT CLIENT MAY BE TRANSFERRED TO THE PURCHASER ONLY UPON ENTRY OF AN ORDER SO AUTHORIZ-

ING BY A COURT HAVING JURISDICTION. THE SELLER MAY DISCLOSE TO THE COURT IN CAMERA INFORMATION RELATING TO THE REPRESENTATION ONLY TO THE EXTENT NECESSARY TO OBTAIN AN ORDER AUTHORIZING THE TRANSFER OF A FILE.

ONCE A CLIENT HAS CONSENTED TO THE TRANSFER TO THE PURCHASING LAWYER OR LAW FIRM OF THE CLIENT'S FILES, FUNDS AND REPRESENTATION OR THE CLIENT FAILS TO TAKE ACTION OR OTHERWISE OBJECT WITHIN NINETY (90) DAYS OF THE NOTICE, THEN THE PURCHASING LAWYER IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE CLIENT'S MATTER(S).

(d) THE FEES CHARGED CLIENTS SHALL NOT BE INCREASED BY REASON OF THE SALE.

COMMENT

[1] The practice of law is a profession, not merely a business. Clients are not commodities that can be purchased and sold at will. Pursuant to this rule, when a lawyer or an entire firm ceases to practice, or ceases to practice in an area of law, and other lawyers or firms take over the representation, the selling lawyer or firm may obtain compensation for the reasonable value of the practice as may withdrawing partners of law firms. See Rules 5.4 and 5.6.

Termination of Practice by the Seller

[2] The requirement that all of the private practice, or all of an area of practice, be sold is satisfied if the seller in good faith makes the entire practice, or the area of practice, available for sale to the purchasers. The fact that a number of the seller's clients decide not to be represented by the purchasers but take their matters elsewhere, therefore, does not result in a violation. Return to private practice as a result of an unanticipated change in circumstances does not necessarily result in a violation. For example, a lawyer who has sold the practice to accept an appointment to judicial office does not violate the requirement that the sale be attendant to cessation of practice if the lawyer later resumes private practice upon being defeated in a contested or a retention election for the office or resigns from a judiciary position.

[3] The requirement that the seller cease to engage in the private practice of law does not prohibit employment as a lawyer on the staff of a public agency or a legal services entity that provides legal services to the poor, or as in-house counsel to a business.

[4] The rule permits a sale of an entire practice attendant upon retirement from the private practice of law within the jurisdiction. Its provisions, therefore, accommodate the lawyer who sells the practice on the occasion of moving to another state.

[5] This rule also permits a lawyer or law firm to sell an area of practice, although, in contrast to the ABA Model Rule and to the provisions of this rule with respect to the sale of an entire practice, a sale of an area of practice can only be made to a single purchaser. If an area of practice is sold and the lawyer remains in the active practice of law, the lawyer must cease accepting any matters in the area of practice that has been sold, either as counsel or co-counsel or by assuming joint responsibility for a matter in connection with the division of a fee with another lawyer as would otherwise be permitted by Rule 1.5(e). For example, a lawyer with a substantial number of estate planning matters and a substantial number of probate administration cases may sell the estate planning portion of the practice but remain in the practice of law by concentrating on probate administration; however, that practitioner may not thereafter accept any estate planning matters. Although a lawyer who leaves the jurisdiction typically would sell the entire practice, this rule permits the lawyer to limit the sale to one or more areas of the practice, thereby preserving the lawyer's right to continue practice in the areas of the practice that were not sold.

Sale of Entire Practice or Entire Area of Practice

[6] The rule requires that the seller's entire practice, or an entire area of practice, be sold. The prohibition against sale of less than an entire practice area protects those clients whose matters are less lucrative and who might find it difficult to secure other counsel if a sale could be limited to substantial fee-generating matters. The purchasers are required to undertake all client matters in the practice or practice area, subject to client consent. This requirement is satisfied, however, even if a purchaser is unable to undertake a particular client matter because of a conflict of interest.

Client Confidences, Consent and Notice

[7] Negotiations between seller and prospective purchaser prior to disclosure of information relating to a specific representation of an identifiable client no more violate the confidentiality provisions of Rule 1.6 than do preliminary discussions concerning the possible association of another lawyer or merger between firms, with respect to which client consent is not required. Providing the purchaser access to client-specific information relating to the representation and to the file, however, requires client consent. The rule provides that before such information may be disclosed by the seller to the purchaser, the client must be given actual written notice of the contemplated sale, including the identity of the purchaser, and must be told that the decision to consent or make other arrangements must be made within 90 days. If nothing is heard from the client within that time, consent to the sale is presumed, and the purchasing attorney is thereafter responsible for all aspects of the client representation for which the selling lawyer or law firm previously had responsibility. So long as the client does not object or instruct otherwise, the transfer of the representation includes the transfer of client funds or property held by the selling lawyer or law firm directly to the purchasing lawyer or law firm; the contrary guidance contained on the issue of client funds or property in D.C. Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 294 is not adopted. The provision concerning transfer of the representation is added to the ABA Model Rule to ensure that clients are fully aware and fully protected when a lawyer or law firm sells a law practice.

[8] A lawyer or law firm ceasing to practice cannot be required to remain in practice because some clients cannot be given actual notice of the proposed purchase. Since these clients cannot themselves consent to the purchase or direct any other disposition of their files and of the representation generally, the rule requires an order from a court having jurisdiction authorizing their transfer or other disposition. The court can be expected to determine whether reasonable efforts to locate the client have been exhausted, and whether the absent client's legitimate interests will be served by authorizing the transfer of the file and representation so that the purchaser may continue the representation. Preservation of client confidences requires that the petition for a court order be considered in camera.

[9] All elements of client autonomy, including the client's absolute right to discharge a lawyer and transfer the representation to another, survive the sale of the practice or area of practice.

Fee Arrangements Between Client and Purchaser

[10] The sale may not be financed by increases in fees charged the clients of the practice. Existing arrangements between the seller and the client as to fees and the scope of the work must be honored by the purchaser. The purchasing lawyer must comply with all existing rules concerning fee arrangements, such as Rule 1.5.

Other Applicable Ethical Standards

[11] Lawyers participating in the sale of a law practice or a practice area are subject to the ethical standards applicable to involving another lawyer in the representation of a client. These include, for example, the seller's obligation to exercise competence in identifying a purchaser qualified to assume the practice and the purchaser's obligation to undertake the representation competently (see Rule 1.1); the obligation to avoid disqualifying conflicts, and to secure the client's informed consent for those conflicts that can be agreed to (see Rule 1.7 regarding conflicts and Rule 1.0(e) for the definition of informed consent); and the obligation to protect information relating to the representation (see Rules 1.6 and 1.9).

[12] If approval of the substitution of the purchasing lawyer for the selling lawyer is required by the rules of any tribunal in which a matter is pending, such approval must be obtained before the matter may be included in the sale (see Rule 1.16).

Applicability of the Rule

[13] This rule applies to the sale of a law practice of a deceased, disabled or disappeared lawyer. Thus, the seller may be represented by a non-lawyer representative not subject to these Rules. Since, however, no lawyer may participate in a sale of a law practice which does not conform to the requirements of this rule, the representatives of the seller as well as the purchasing lawyer may be expected to see to it that they are met.

[14] Admission to or retirement from a law partnership or professional association, retirement, plans and similar arrangements, and a sale of tangible assets of a law practice, do not constitute a sale or purchase governed by this rule.

[15] This rule does not apply to the transfers of legal representation between lawyers when such transfers are unrelated to the sale of a practice or an area of practice.

Other

[16] This rule generally follows the discussion and views concerning the sale of a law practice expressed in D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 294. The provisions of that Opinion not inconsistent with this rule and Comments remain as appropriate guidance.

RULE 1.18 – DUTIES TO PROSPECTIVE CLIENT

(a) A PERSON WHO DISCUSSES WITH A LAWYER THE POSSIBILITY OF FORMING A CLIENT-LAWYER RELATIONSHIP WITH RESPECT TO A MATTER IS A PROSPECTIVE CLIENT.

(b) EVEN WHEN NO CLIENT-LAWYER RELATIONSHIP ENSUES, A LAWYER WHO HAS HAD DISCUSSIONS WITH A PROSPECTIVE CLIENT SHALL NOT USE OR REVEAL INFORMATION LEARNED IN THE CONSULTATION, EXCEPT AS PERMITTED BY RULE 1.6.

(c) A LAWYER SUBJECT TO PARAGRAPH (b) SHALL NOT REPRESENT A CLIENT WITH INTERESTS MATERIALLY ADVERSE TO THOSE OF A PROSPECTIVE CLIENT IN THE SAME OR A SUBSTANTIALLY RELATED MATTER IF THE LAWYER RECEIVED A CONFIDENCE OR SECRET FROM THE PROSPECTIVE CLIENT, EXCEPT AS PROVIDED IN PARAGRAPH (d). IF A LAWYER IS DISQUALIFIED FROM REPRESENTATION UNDER THIS PARAGRAPH, NO LAWYER IN A FIRM WITH WHICH THAT LAWYER IS ASSOCIATED MAY KNOWINGLY UNDERTAKE OR CONTINUE REPRESENTATION IN SUCH A MATTER, EXCEPT AS PROVIDED IN PARAGRAPH (d).

(d) WHEN THE LAWYER HAS RECEIVED A CONFIDENCE OR SECRET FROM THE PROSPECTIVE CLIENT, REPRESENTATION IS PERMISSIBLE IF:

(1) BOTH THE AFFECTED CLIENT AND THE PROSPECTIVE CLIENT HAVE GIVEN INFORMED CONSENT, OR

(2) THE DISQUALIFIED LAWYER IS TIMELY SCREENED FROM ANY PARTICIPATION IN THE MATTER.

COMMENT

[1] Prospective clients, like clients, may disclose information to a lawyer, place documents or other property in the lawyer's custody, or rely on the lawyer's advice. A lawyer's discussions with a prospective client usually are limited in time and depth and leave both the prospective client and the lawyer free (and sometimes required) to proceed no further. The principle of loyalty diminishes in importance if the sole reason for an individual lawyer's disqualification is the lawyer's initial consultation with a prospective new client with whom no client-lawyer relationship was ever formed, either because the lawyer detected a conflict of interest as a result of an initial consultation, or for some other reason (e.g., the prospective client decided not to retain the firm). Hence, prospective clients should receive some but not all of the protection afforded clients.

[2] Not all persons who communicate information to a lawyer are entitled to protection under this rule. A person who communicates information unilaterally to a lawyer, without any reasonable expectation that the lawyer is willing to discuss the possibility of forming a client-lawyer relationship, is not a "prospective client" within the meaning of paragraph (a).

[3] It is often necessary for a prospective client to reveal information to the lawyer during an initial consultation prior to the decision about formation of a client-lawyer relationship. The client may disclose such information as part of the process of determining whether the client wishes to form a client-lawyer relationship. The lawyer often must learn such information to determine whether there is a conflict of interest with an existing client and whether the matter is one that the lawyer is willing to undertake. Such information is generally protected by Rule 1.6, even if the client or lawyer decides not to proceed with the representation. See Rule 1.6, Comment [9]. Paragraph (b) of Rule 1.18 prohibits the lawyer from using or revealing that information, except as permitted by Rule 1.6. The duty to protect confidences and secrets exists regardless of how brief the initial conference may be. The prohibition against use or disclosure of information received from the prospective client may in turn cause the individual lawyer to be disqualified pursuant to Rule 1.7(b)(4) from representing a current or future client of the firm adverse to the prospective client because that lawyer's inability to use or disclose information from the prospective client may adversely affect that lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the current or future client of the firm whose interests are adverse to the interests of the prospective client.

[4] In order to avoid acquiring confidences and secrets from a prospective client, a lawyer considering whether or not to undertake a new matter may limit the initial interview only to information that does not constitute a confidence or secret, if the lawyer can do so and still determine whether a conflict of interest or other reason for non-representation exists. An individual lawyer of the firm who obtains information from a prospective client is permitted by Rule 1.6(a) to disclose that information to other persons in the lawyer's firm, but any such dissemination may cause additional individual lawyers of the firm to be personally disqualified. If a firm wishes to keep open the screening option under paragraph (d)(2) which permits lawyers who are not personally disqualified to represent clients in the same or substantially related matters, the firm must limit and control dissemination of information obtained from the prospective client. Where the information from the prospective client indicates that any reason for non-representation exists, the lawyer should so inform the prospective client or decline the representation. If the prospective client wishes to retain the lawyer, and if consent is possible under Rule 1.7, then informed consent from all affected present or former clients must be obtained before accepting the representation.

[5] A lawyer may condition conversations with a prospective client on the person's informed consent that no information disclosed during the consultation will prohibit the lawyer from representing a different client in the matter. For the definition of "informed consent," see Rule 1.0(e). If the agreement expressly so provides, the prospective client may also consent to the lawyer's subsequent use of information received from the prospective client.

[6] Even in the absence of an agreement, under paragraph (c), the lawyer is not prohibited from representing a client with interests adverse to those of the prospective client in the same or a substantially related matter unless the lawyer has received confidences and secrets from the prospective client. ABA Model Rule 1.18 provides for personal disqualification only if the information received by the lawyer could be significantly harmful if used in the matter, but the trigger in D.C. Rule 1.18 is receipt of any confidence or secret because of the interest in more broadly protecting the prospective client and the difficulty of determining whether use of the information would be significantly harmful to the prospective client.

[7] Under paragraph (c), the prohibition in this rule is imputed to other lawyers as provided in Rule 1.10, but, under paragraph (d)(1), imputation may be avoided if the lawyer obtains the informed consent of both the prospective and affected clients. In the alternative, imputation may be avoided under paragraph (d)(2) if all disqualified lawyers are timely screened. See Rule 1.0(l) (requirements for screening procedures). When a firm may wish to rely on paragraph (d)(2) to avoid imputed disqualification of the firm as a whole, it should take affirmative steps – as soon as an actual or potential conflict is suspected – to prevent a personally disqualified lawyer from disseminating any information about the potential client that is protected by Rule 1.6, except as necessary to investigate potential conflicts of interest, to any other person in the firm, including non-lawyer staff. Any lawyer in the firm who actually receives, directly or indirectly, protected information provided by a prospective client is disqualified. Unlike ABA Model Rule 1.18, this rule does not condition use of screening on the taking of reasonable measures by the personally disqualified lawyer to avoid exposure to more disqualifying information than was reasonably necessary to determine whether to represent the prospective client; that is because the screen protects the prospective client regardless of the amount of information received by the personally disqualified lawyer, and this standard may be difficult to apply in practice. This rule does not prohibit the screened lawyer from receiving any part of the fee, in contrast to ABA Model Rule 1.18, because the substantial administrative burden of complying with such a prohibition exceeds any marginal benefit.

[8] This rule, unlike ABA Model Rule 1.18, does not require notice to the prospective client that lawyers in the firm who are not personally disqualified are representing a client adverse to the prospective client in the same or substantially related matters subject to the screening requirement, because the lack of such a notice requirement under the prior D.C. Rule concerning prospective clients (Rule 1.10(a)) did not prove problematic and it is not clear that the notice requirement materially advances any significant interest of the prospective client.

[9] For the duty of competence of a lawyer who gives assistance on the merits of a matter to a prospective client, see Rule 1.1. For a lawyer's duties when a prospective client entrusts valuables or papers to the lawyer's care, see Rule 1.15.

AMENDMENTS TO RULE 1: CLIENT-LAWYER RELATIONSHIP

RULE 1.10 (IMPUTED DISQUALIFICATION: GENERAL RULE)

Rule 1.10 and its comments were amended to permit ethical screening (without client consent) of lawyers moving laterally between private employers with certain initial notice requirements to former clients. New subparagraph (f) was added to address situations in which a law firm cannot provide required notifications without violating confidentiality obligations to an existing client. (10/0/15)

RULE 1.15 (SAFEKEEPING PROPERTY)

Rule 1.15(a) and 1.15(b) were amended to require all D.C. Bar members who possess Interest on Lawyers Trust Account (IOLTA) eligible funds to maintain such funds in a pooled-client D.C. IOLTA account, unless the lawyer falls within certain limited exceptions found in Rule 1.15(b). Rule 1.15(b) defines IOLTA eligible funds. Comments [2] through [5] were added to Rule 1.15 to provide further guidance on the amendments and its narrow exceptions. (8/1/2010)

New Comment [2] of Rule 1.15 was adopted to provide more detailed guidance to lawyers on financial record keeping for trust accounts. The guidance on financial record keeping was revised to (1) reflect the purpose of the "complete records" language of Rule 1.15 as interpreted and explained by the D.C. Court of Appeals in In re Clower, 831 A.2d 1030 (D.C. 2003); and (2) encourage lawyers to consult the 2010 ABA Model Rules on Client Trust Records. (10/8/15)

RULE 1.19 (TRUST ACCOUNT OVERDRAFT NOTIFICATION)

Rule 1.19 was deleted in its entirety. (8/1/10)

Related Changes

A new Section 20 was added to Rule XI of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals Rules Governing the Bar titled "Approved Depositories for Lawyers' Trust Accounts and District of Columbia Interest on Lawyers Trust Accounts Program. (8/1/2010)

Appendix B of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals Rules Governing the Bar titled "Interest on Lawyers' Trust Accounts Program" was deleted in its entirety. (8/1/2010)

COUNSELOR

RULE 2.1 – ADVISOR

IN REPRESENTING A CLIENT, A LAWYER SHALL EXERCISE INDEPENDENT PROFESSIONAL JUDGMENT AND RENDER CANDID ADVICE. IN RENDERING ADVICE, A LAWYER MAY REFER NOT ONLY TO LAW BUT TO OTHER CONSIDERATIONS SUCH AS MORAL, ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND POLITICAL FACTORS, THAT MAY BE RELEVANT TO THE CLIENT'S SITUATION.

COMMENT

Scope of Advice

[1] A client is entitled to straightforward advice expressing the lawyer's honest assessment. Legal advice often involves unpleasant facts and alternatives that a client may be disinclined to confront. In presenting advice, a lawyer endeavors to sustain the client's morale and may put advice in as acceptable a form as honesty permits. However, a lawyer should not be deterred from giving candid advice by the prospect that the advice will be unpalatable to the client.

[2] Advice couched in narrowly legal terms may be of little value to a client, especially where practical considerations, such as cost or effects on other people, are predominant. Purely technical legal advice, therefore, can sometimes be inadequate. It is proper for a lawyer to refer to relevant moral and ethical considerations in giving advice. Although a lawyer is not a moral advisor as such, moral and ethical considerations impinge upon most legal questions and may decisively influence how the law will be applied.

[3] A client may expressly or impliedly ask the lawyer for purely technical advice. When such a request is made by a client experienced in legal matters, the lawyer may accept it at face value. When such a request is made by a client inexperienced in legal matters, however, the lawyer's responsibility as advisor may include indicating that more may be involved than strictly legal considerations.

[4] Matters that go beyond strictly legal questions may also be in the domain of another profession. Family matters can involve problems within the professional competence of psychiatry, clinical psychology, or social work; business matters can involve problems within the competence of the accounting profession or of financial specialists. Where consultation with a professional in another field is itself something a competent lawyer would recommend, the lawyer should make such a recommendation. At the same time, a lawyer's advice at its best often consists of recommending a course of action in the face of conflicting recommendations of experts.

Offering Advice

[5] In general, a lawyer is not expected to give advice until asked by the client. However, when a lawyer knows that a client proposes a course of action that is likely to result in substantial adverse legal consequences to the client, duty to the client under Rule 1.4 may require that the lawyer act if the client's course of action is related to the representation. Similarly, when a matter is likely to involve litigation, it may be necessary under Rule 1.4 to inform the client of forms of dispute resolution that might constitute reasonable alternatives to litigation. A lawyer ordinarily has no duty to initiate investigation of a client's affairs or to give advice that the client has indicated is unwanted, but a lawyer may initiate advice to a client when doing so appears to be in the client's interest.

RULE 2.3 – EVALUATION FOR USE BY THIRD PERSONS

(a) A LAWYER MAY PROVIDE AN EVALUATION OF A MATTER AFFECTING A CLIENT FOR THE USE OF SOMEONE OTHER THAN THE CLIENT IF THE LAWYER REASONABLY BELIEVES THAT MAKING THE EVALUATION IS COMPATIBLE WITH OTHER ASPECTS OF THE LAWYER'S RELATIONSHIP WITH THE CLIENT.

(b) WHEN THE LAWYER KNOWS OR REASONABLY SHOULD KNOW THAT THE EVALUATION IS LIKELY TO AFFECT THE CLIENT'S INTERESTS MATERIALLY AND ADVERSELY, THE LAWYER SHALL NOT PROVIDE THE EVALUATION UNLESS THE CLIENT GIVES INFORMED CONSENT.

(c) EXCEPT AS DISCLOSURE IS AUTHORIZED IN CONNECTION WITH A REPORT OF AN EVALUATION, INFORMATION RELATING TO THE EVALUATION IS OTHERWISE PROTECTED BY RULE 1.6.

COMMENT

Definition

[1] An evaluation may be performed at the client's direction or when impliedly authorized in order to carry out the representation. See Rule 1.2. Such an evaluation may be for the primary purpose of establishing information for the benefit of third parties; for example, an opinion concerning the title of property rendered at the behest of a vendor for the information of a prospective purchaser, or at the behest of a borrower for the information of a prospective lender. In some situations, the evaluation may be required by a government agency; for example, an opinion concerning the legality of the securities registered for sale under the securities laws. In other instances, the evaluation may be required by a third person, such as a purchaser of a business.

[2] A legal evaluation should be distinguished from an investigation of a person with whom the lawyer does not have a client-lawyer relationship. For example, a lawyer retained by a purchaser to analyze a vendor's title to property does not have a client-lawyer relationship with the vendor. So also, an investigation into a person's affairs by a government lawyer, or by special counsel employed by the government, is not an evaluation as that term is used in this rule. The question is whether the lawyer is retained by the person whose affairs are being examined. When the lawyer is retained by that person, the general rules concerning loyalty to client and preservation of confidences apply, which is not the case if the lawyer is retained by someone else. For this reason, it is essential to identify the person by whom the lawyer is retained. This should be made clear not only to the person under examination, but also to others to whom the results are to be made available.

Duties Owed to Third Person and Client

[3] When the evaluation is intended for the information or use of a third person, a legal duty to that person may or may not arise. That legal question is beyond the scope of this rule. However, since such an evaluation involves a departure from the normal client-lawyer relationship, careful analysis of the situation is required. The lawyer must be satisfied as a matter of professional judgment that making the evaluation is compatible with other functions undertaken on behalf of the client. For example, if the lawyer is acting as advocate in defending the client against charges of fraud, it would normally be incompatible with that responsibility for the lawyer to perform an evaluation for others concerning the same or a related transaction. Assuming no such impediment is apparent, however, the lawyer should advise the client of the implications of the evaluation, particularly the lawyer's responsibilities to third persons and the duty to disseminate the findings.

Access to and Disclosure of Information

[4] The quality of an evaluation depends on the freedom and extent of the investigation upon which it is based. Ordinarily a lawyer should have whatever latitude of investigation seems necessary as a matter of professional judgment. Under some circumstances, however, the terms of the evaluation may be limited. For example, certain issues or sources may be categorically excluded, or the scope of search may be limited by time constraints or the noncooperation of persons having relevant information. Any such limitations that are material to the evaluation should be described in the report. If after a lawyer has commenced an evaluation, the client refuses to comply with the terms upon which it was understood the evaluation was to have been made, the lawyer's obligations are determined by law, having reference to the terms of the client's agreement and the surrounding circumstances. In no circumstances is the lawyer permitted to knowingly make a false statement of material fact or law in providing an evaluation under this rule. See Rule 4.1. If a lawyer learns that the client has used or will use an evaluation in a crime or fraud, the lawyer may have a duty under Rule 4.1(b) to take action to avoid assisting in the crime or fraud.

Obtaining Client's Informed Consent

[5] Information relating to an evaluation is protected by Rule 1.6. In many situations, providing an evaluation to a third party poses no significant risk to the client; thus, the lawyer may be impliedly authorized to disclose information to carry out the representation. See Rule 1.6(a). Where, however, it is reasonably likely that providing the evaluation will affect the client's interests materially and adversely, the lawyer must first obtain the client's consent after the client has been adequately informed concerning the important possible effects on the client's interests. See Rules 1.6(a) and 1.0(e).

Financial Auditors' Requests for Information

[6] When a question concerning the legal situation of a client arises at the instance of the client's financial auditor and the question is referred to the lawyer, the lawyer's response may be made in accordance with procedures recognized in the legal profession. Such a procedure is set forth in the American Bar Association Statement of Policy Regarding Lawyers' Responses to Auditors' Requests for Information, adopted in 1975.

RULE 2.4 – LAWYER SERVING AS THIRD PARTY NEUTRAL

(a) A LAWYER SERVES AS A THIRD-PARTY NEUTRAL WHEN THE LAWYER ASSISTS TWO OR MORE PERSONS WHO ARE NOT CLIENTS OF THE LAWYER TO REACH A RESOLUTION OF A DISPUTE OR OTHER MATTER THAT HAS ARISEN BETWEEN THEM. SERVICE AS A THIRD-PARTY NEUTRAL MAY INCLUDE SERVICE AS AN ARBITRATOR, A MEDIATOR OR IN SUCH OTHER CAPACITY AS WILL ENABLE THE LAWYER TO ASSIST THE PARTIES TO RESOLVE THE MATTER.

(b) A LAWYER SERVING AS A THIRD-PARTY NEUTRAL SHALL INFORM UNREPRESENTED PARTIES THAT THE LAWYER IS NOT REPRESENTING THEM. WHEN THE LAWYER KNOWS OR REASONABLY SHOULD KNOW THAT A PARTY DOES NOT UNDERSTAND THE LAWYER'S ROLE IN THE MATTER, THE LAWYER SHALL EXPLAIN THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE LAWYER'S ROLE AS A THIRD-PARTY NEUTRAL AND A LAWYER'S ROLE AS ONE WHO REPRESENTS A CLIENT.

COMMENT

[1] Alternative dispute resolution has become a substantial part of the civil justice system. Aside from representing clients in dispute-resolution processes, lawyers often serve as third-party neutrals. A third-party neutral is a person, such as a mediator, arbitrator, conciliator or evaluator, who assists the parties, represented or unrepresented, in the resolution of a dispute or in the arrangement of a transaction. Whether a third-party neutral serves primarily as a facilitator, evaluator or decision-maker depends on the particular process that is either selected by the parties or mandated by a court.

[2] The role of a third-party neutral is not unique to lawyers, although, in some court-connected contexts, only lawyers are allowed to serve in this role or to handle certain types of cases. In performing this role, the lawyer may be subject to court rules or other law that applies either to third-party neutrals generally or to lawyers serving as third-party neutrals. Lawyer-neutrals may also be subject to various codes of ethics, such as the Code of Ethics for Arbitration in Commercial Disputes prepared by a joint committee of the American Bar Association and the American Arbitration Association or the Model Standards of Conduct for Mediators jointly prepared by the American Bar Association, the American Arbitration Association and the Society of Professionals in Dispute Resolution.

[3] Unlike non-lawyers who serve as third-party neutrals, lawyers serving in this role may experience unique problems as a result of differences between the role of a third-party neutral and a lawyer's service as a client representative. The potential for confusion is significant when the parties are unrepresented in the process. Thus, paragraph (b) requires a lawyer-neutral to inform unrepresented parties that the lawyer is not representing them. For some parties, particularly parties who frequently use dispute-resolution processes, this information will be sufficient. For others, particularly those who are using the process for the first time, more information will be required. Where appropriate, the lawyer should inform unrepresented parties of the important differences between the lawyer's role as third-party neutral and a lawyer's role as a client representative, including the inapplicability of the attorney-client evidentiary privilege. The extent of disclosure required under this paragraph will depend on the particular parties involved and the subject matter of the proceedings, as well as the particular features of the dispute-resolution process selected.

[4] A lawyer who serves as a third-party neutral subsequently may be asked to serve as a lawyer representing a client in the same matter. The conflicts of interest that arise for both the individual lawyer and the lawyer's law firm are addressed in Rule 1.12.

[5] Lawyers who represent clients in alternative dispute-resolution processes are governed by the Rules of Professional Conduct. When the dispute-resolution process takes place before a tribunal, as in binding arbitration (see Rule 1.0(n)), the lawyer's duty of candor is governed by Rule 3.3. Otherwise, the lawyer's duty of candor toward both the third-party neutral and other parties is governed by Rule 4.1.

ADVOCATE

RULE 3.1 – MERITORIOUS CLAIMS AND CONTENTIONS

A LAWYER SHALL NOT BRING OR DEFEND A PROCEEDING, OR ASSERT OR CONTROVERT AN ISSUE THEREIN, UNLESS THERE IS A BASIS IN LAW AND FACT FOR DOING SO THAT IS NOT FRIVOLOUS, WHICH INCLUDES A GOOD-FAITH ARGUMENT FOR AN EXTENSION, MODIFICATION, OR REVERSAL OF EXISTING LAW. A LAWYER FOR THE DEFENDANT IN A CRIMINAL PROCEEDING, OR FOR THE RESPONDENT IN A PROCEEDING THAT COULD RESULT IN INVOLUNTARY INSTITUTIONALIZATION, SHALL, IF THE CLIENT ELECTS TO GO TO TRIAL OR TO A CONTESTED FACT-FINDING HEARING, NEVERTHELESS SO DEFEND THE PROCEEDING AS TO REQUIRE THAT THE GOVERNMENT CARRY ITS BURDEN OF PROOF.

COMMENT

[1] The advocate has a duty to use legal procedure for the fullest benefit of the client's cause, but also a duty not to abuse legal procedure. The law, both procedural and substantive, establishes the limits within which an advocate may proceed. However, the law is not always clear and never is static. Accordingly, in determining the proper scope of advocacy, account must be taken of the law's ambiguities and potential for change.

[2] The filing of an action or defense or similar action taken for a client is not frivolous merely because the facts have not first been fully substantiated or because the lawyer expects to develop vital evidence only by discovery. Lawyers, however, are required to inform themselves about the facts of their clients' cases and the applicable law and determine that they can make good faith arguments in support of their clients' positions. Such action is not frivolous even though the lawyer believes that the client's position ultimately will not prevail. The action is frivolous if the lawyer is unable either to make a good-faith argument on the merits of the action taken or to support the action taken by a good-faith argument for an extension, modification, or reversal of existing law.

[3] In criminal cases or proceedings in which the respondent can be involuntarily institutionalized, such as juvenile delinquency and civil commitment cases, the lawyer is not only permitted, but is indeed required, to put the government to its proof whenever the client elects to contest adjudication. The lawyer's obligations under this rule are subordinate to federal or state law that entitles a defendant in a criminal matter to the assistance of counsel in presenting a claim or contention that otherwise would be prohibited by this rule.

RULE 3.2 – EXPEDITING LITIGATION

(a) IN REPRESENTING A CLIENT, A LAWYER SHALL NOT DELAY A PROCEEDING WHEN THE LAWYER KNOWS OR WHEN IT IS OBVIOUS THAT SUCH ACTION WOULD SERVE SOLELY TO HARASS OR MALICIOUSLY INJURE ANOTHER.

(b) A LAWYER SHALL MAKE REASONABLE EFFORTS TO EXPEDITE LITIGATION CONSISTENT WITH THE INTERESTS OF THE CLIENT.

COMMENT

[1] Dilatory practices bring the administration of justice into disrepute. Delay should not be indulged merely for the convenience of the advocates, or for the purpose of frustrating an opposing party's attempt to obtain rightful redress or repose. It is not a justification that similar conduct is often tolerated by the bench and bar. The question is whether a competent lawyer acting in good-faith would regard the course of action as having some substantial purpose other than delay. Realizing financial or other benefit from otherwise improper delay in litigation is not a legitimate interest of the client.

RULE 3.3 – CANDOR TO TRIBUNAL

(a) A LAWYER SHALL NOT KNOWINGLY:

(1) MAKE A FALSE STATEMENT OF FACT OR LAW TO A TRIBUNAL OR FAIL TO CORRECT A FALSE STATEMENT OF MATERIAL FACT OR LAW PREVIOUSLY MADE TO THE TRIBUNAL BY THE LAWYER, UNLESS CORRECTION WOULD REQUIRE DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION THAT IS PROHIBITED BY RULE 1.6;

(2) COUNSEL OR ASSIST A CLIENT TO ENGAGE IN CONDUCT THAT THE LAWYER KNOWS IS CRIMINAL OR FRAUDULENT, BUT A LAWYER MAY DISCUSS THE LEGAL CONSEQUENCES OF ANY PROPOSED COURSE OF CONDUCT WITH A CLIENT AND MAY COUNSEL OR ASSIST A CLIENT TO MAKE A GOOD-FAITH EFFORT TO DETERMINE THE VALIDITY, SCOPE, MEANING, OR APPLICATION OF THE LAW;

(3) FAIL TO DISCLOSE TO THE TRIBUNAL

LEGAL AUTHORITY IN THE CONTROLLING JURISDICTION NOT DISCLOSED BY OPPOSING COUNSEL AND KNOWN TO THE LAWYER TO BE DISPOSITIVE OF A QUESTION AT ISSUE AND DIRECTLY ADVERSE TO THE POSITION OF THE CLIENT; OR

(4) OFFER EVIDENCE THAT THE LAWYER KNOWS TO BE FALSE, EXCEPT AS PROVIDED IN PARAGRAPH (b). A LAWYER MAY REFUSE TO OFFER EVIDENCE, OTHER THAN THE TESTIMONY OF A DEFENDANT IN A CRIMINAL MATTER, THAT THE LAWYER REASONABLY BELIEVES IS FALSE.

(b) WHEN THE WITNESS WHO INTENDS TO GIVE EVIDENCE THAT THE LAWYER KNOWS TO BE FALSE IS THE LAWYER'S CLIENT AND IS THE ACCUSED IN A CRIMINAL CASE, THE LAWYER SHALL FIRST MAKE A GOOD-FAITH EFFORT TO DISSUADE THE CLIENT FROM PRESENTING THE FALSE EVIDENCE; IF THE LAWYER IS UNABLE TO DISSUADE THE CLIENT, THE LAWYER SHALL SEEK LEAVE OF THE TRIBUNAL TO WITHDRAW. IF THE LAWYER IS UNABLE TO DISSUADE THE CLIENT OR TO WITHDRAW WITHOUT SERIOUSLY HARMING THE CLIENT, THE LAWYER MAY PUT THE CLIENT ON THE STAND TO TESTIFY IN A NARRATIVE FASHION, BUT THE LAWYER SHALL NOT EXAMINE THE CLIENT IN SUCH MANNER AS TO ELICIT TESTIMONY WHICH THE LAWYER KNOWS TO BE FALSE, AND SHALL NOT ARGUE THE PROBATIVE VALUE OF THE CLIENT'S TESTIMONY IN CLOSING ARGUMENT.

(c) THE DUTIES STATED IN PARAGRAPH (a) CONTINUE TO THE CONCLUSION OF THE PROCEEDING.

(d) A LAWYER WHO RECEIVES INFORMATION CLEARLY ESTABLISHING THAT A FRAUD HAS BEEN PERPETRATED UPON THE TRIBUNAL SHALL PROMPTLY TAKE REASONABLE REMEDIAL MEASURES, INCLUDING DISCLOSURE TO THE TRIBUNAL TO THE EXTENT DISCLOSURE IS PERMITTED BY RULE 1.6(d).

COMMENT

[1] This rule defines the duty of candor to the tribunal. See Rule 1.0(l) for the definition of "tribunal." The rule also applies when the lawyer is representing a client in an ancillary proceeding conducted pursuant to the tribunal's adjudicative authority, such as a deposition. In dealing with a tribunal the lawyer is also required to comply with the general requirements of Rule 1.2(e) and (f). However, an advocate does not vouch for the evidence submitted in a cause; the tribunal is responsible for assessing its probative value.

Representations by a Lawyer

[2] An assertion purported to be made by the lawyer, as in an affidavit by the lawyer or in a statement in open court, may properly be made only when the lawyer knows the assertion is true or believes it to be true on the basis of a reasonably diligent inquiry. There may be circumstances where failure to make a disclosure is the equivalent of an affirmative misrepresentation. If the lawyer comes to know that a statement of material fact or law that the lawyer previously made to the tribunal is false, the lawyer has a duty to correct the statement, unless correction would require a disclosure of information that is prohibited by Rule 1.6. This provision in paragraph (a)(1) differs from ABA Model Rule 3.3(a)(1), which requires a lawyer to disclose information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6 if necessary to correct the lawyer's false statement. If Rule 1.6 permits a lawyer to disclose a client confidence or secret, D.C. Rule 3.3(a)(1) requires the lawyer to disclose that information to the extent reasonably necessary to correct a false statement of material fact or law. Nothing in D.C. Rule 3.3(a)(1) limits any disclosure duty under Rule 4.1(b) when substantive law requires a lawyer to disclose client information to avoid being deemed to have assisted the client's crime or fraud. The obligation prescribed in Rule 1.2(e) not to counsel a client to commit or assist the client in committing a fraud applies in litigation but is subject to Rule 3.3(b) and (d). Regarding compliance with Rule 1.2(e), see the Comment to that Rule. See also Rule 8.4.

Misleading Legal Argument

[3] Legal argument based on a knowingly false representation of law constitutes dishonesty toward the tribunal. A lawyer is not required to make a disinterested exposition of the law, but must recognize the existence of pertinent legal authorities. Furthermore, as stated in subparagraph (a)(3), an advocate has a duty to disclose directly adverse authority in the controlling jurisdiction that has not been disclosed by the opposing party and that is dispositive of a question at issue. The underlying concept is that legal argument is a discussion seeking to determine the legal premises properly applicable to the case.

Offering Evidence

[4] When evidence that a lawyer knows to be false is provided by a person who is not the client, the lawyer must refuse to offer it regardless of the client's wishes. This duty is premised on the lawyer's obligation as an officer of the court to prevent the trier of fact from being misled by false evidence. A lawyer does not violate this rule if the lawyer offers the evidence for the purpose of establishing its falsity.

[5] When false evidence is offered by the client, however, a conflict may arise between the lawyer's duty to keep the client's revelations confidential and the duty of candor to the court. Upon ascertaining that material evidence is false, the lawyer should seek to persuade the client that the evidence should not be offered or, if it has been offered, that its false character should immediately be disclosed. Regardless of the client's wishes, however, a lawyer may not offer evidence of a client if the evidence is known by the lawyer to be false, except to the extent permitted by paragraph (b) where the client is a defendant in a criminal case. The lawyer is obligated not only to refuse to offer false evidence under subparagraph (a)(4) but also to take reasonable remedial measures under paragraph (d) if the false evidence has been offered.

[6] The prohibition against offering false evidence applies only if the lawyer knows that the evidence is false. A lawyer's knowledge that evidence is false can be inferred from the circumstances. See Rule 1.0(f). Thus, although a lawyer should resolve doubts about the veracity of testimony or other evidence in favor of the client, the lawyer cannot ignore an obvious falsehood.

[7] Although paragraph (a)(4) prohibits a lawyer from offering evidence only if the lawyer knows it to be false, it also permits the lawyer to refuse to offer testimony or other proof that the lawyer reasonably believes is false. Offering such proof may reflect adversely on the lawyer's ability to discriminate in the quality of evidence and thus impair the lawyer's effectiveness as an advocate. Because of the special protections historically provided criminal defendants, however, this rule does not permit a lawyer to refuse to offer the testimony of such a client where the lawyer reasonably believes but does not know that the testimony will be false. Unless the lawyer knows the testimony will be false, the lawyer must honor the client's decision to testify.

Remedial Measures

[8] Paragraph (d) provides that if a lawyer learns that a fraud has been perpetrated on the tribunal, the lawyer must take reasonable remedial measures. If the lawyer's client is implicated in the fraud, the lawyer should ordinarily first call upon the client to rectify the fraud. If the client is unwilling to do so, the lawyer should consider other remedial measures. The lawyer may not, however, disclose information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6, unless the client has used the lawyer's services to further a crime or fraud and disclosure is permitted by Rule 1.6(d). In other cases, the lawyer may learn of the client's intention to present false evidence before the client has had a chance to do so. In this situation, paragraphs (a)(4) and (b) forbid the lawyer to present the false evidence, except in rare instances where the witness is the accused in a criminal case, the lawyer is unsuccessful in dissuading the client from going forward, and the lawyer is unable to withdraw without causing serious harm to the client. In addition, Rule 1.6(c) may permit disclosure of client confidences and secrets when the lawyer learns of a prospective fraud on the tribunal involving, for example, bribery or intimidation of witnesses. The terms "criminal case" and "criminal defendant" as used in Rule 3.3 and its Comment include juvenile delinquency proceedings and the person who is the subject of such proceedings.

Perjury by a Criminal Defendant

[9] Paragraph (b) allows the lawyer to permit a client who is the accused in a criminal case to present false testimony in very narrowly circumscribed circumstances and in a very limited manner. Even in a criminal case the lawyer must seek to persuade the defendant-client to refrain from perjurious testimony. There has been dispute concerning the lawyer's duty when that persuasion fails. Paragraph (b) requires the lawyer to withdraw rather than offer the client's false testimony, if this can be done without seriously harming the client.

[10] Serious harm to the client sufficient to prevent the lawyer's withdrawal entails more than the usual inconveniences that necessarily result from withdrawal, such as delay in concluding the client's case or an increase in the costs of concluding the case. The term should be construed narrowly to preclude withdrawal only where the special circumstances of the case are such that the client would be significantly prejudiced, such as by express or implied divulgence of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6. If the confrontation with the client occurs before trial, the lawyer ordinarily can withdraw. Withdrawal before trial may not be possible, however, either because trial is imminent, or because the confrontation with the client does not take place until the trial itself, or because no other counsel is available. In those rare circumstances in which withdrawal without such serious harm to the client is impossible, the lawyer may go forward with examination of the client and closing argument subject to the limitations of paragraph (b).

Refusing to Offer Proof of a Non-client Known to Be False

[11] Generally speaking, a lawyer may not offer testimony or other proof, through a non-client, that the lawyer knows to be false. Furthermore, a lawyer may not offer evidence of a client if the evidence is known by the lawyer to be false, except to the extent permitted by paragraph (b) where the client is a defendant in a criminal case.

Duration of Obligation

[12] A practical time limit on the obligation to take reasonable remedial measures concerning criminal and fraudulent conducted related to the proceeding is needed. The conclusion of the proceeding is an appropriate and reasonably definite point for the termination of the obligation. A proceeding has concluded within the meaning of this rule when a final judgment in the proceeding has been affirmed on appeal or the time for review has passed. If the lawyer withdraws before the conclusion of the proceeding, the lawyer's obligation ends at the time of withdrawal.

Withdrawal

[13] A lawyer's compliance with the duty of candor imposed by this rule might require that the lawyer withdraw from the representation of a client. The lawyer may, however, be required by Rule 1.16(a) to seek permission of the tribunal to withdraw if the lawyer's compliance with this rule's duty of candor, or with the requirements of Rule 1.6(c), results in the lawyer's inability to represent the client in accordance with these Rules. See also Rule 1.16(b) for the circumstances in which a lawyer will be permitted to seek a tribunal's permission to withdraw. In connection with a request for permission to withdraw that is premised on a client's misconduct, a lawyer may reveal information relating to the representation only to the extent permitted by Rule 1.6.

RULE 3.4 – FAIRNESS TO OPPOSING PARTY AND COUNSEL

A LAWYER SHALL NOT:

(a) OBSTRUCT ANOTHER PARTY'S ACCESS TO EVIDENCE OR ALTER, DESTROY, OR CONCEAL EVIDENCE, OR COUNSEL OR ASSIST ANOTHER PERSON TO DO SO, IF THE LAWYER REASONABLY SHOULD KNOW THAT THE EVIDENCE IS OR MAY BE THE SUBJECT OF DISCOVERY OR SUBPOENA IN ANY PENDING OR IMMINENT PROCEEDING. UNLESS PROHIBITED BY LAW, A LAWYER MAY RECEIVE PHYSICAL EVIDENCE OF ANY KIND FROM THE CLIENT OR FROM ANOTHER PERSON. IF THE EVIDENCE RECEIVED BY THE LAWYER BELONGS TO ANYONE OTHER THAN THE CLIENT, THE LAWYER SHALL MAKE A GOOD-FAITH EFFORT TO PRESERVE IT AND TO RETURN IT TO THE OWNER, SUBJECT TO RULE 1.6;

(b) FALSIFY EVIDENCE, COUNSEL OR ASSIST A WITNESS TO TESTIFY FALSELY, OR OFFER AN INDUCEMENT TO A WITNESS THAT IS PROHIBITED BY LAW;

(c) KNOWINGLY DISOBEY AN OBLIGATION UNDER THE RULES OF A TRIBUNAL EXCEPT FOR AN OPEN REFUSAL BASED ON AN ASSERTION THAT NO VALID OBLIGATION EXISTS;

(d) IN PRETRIAL PROCEDURE, MAKE A FRIVOLOUS DISCOVERY REQUEST OR FAIL TO MAKE REASONABLY DILIGENT EFFORTS TO COMPLY WITH A LEGALLY PROPER DISCOVERY REQUEST BY AN OPPOSING PARTY;

(e) IN TRIAL, ALLUDE TO ANY MATTER THAT THE LAWYER DOES NOT REASONABLY BELIEVE IS RELEVANT OR THAT WILL NOT BE SUPPORTED BY ADMISSIBLE EVIDENCE, ASSERT PERSONAL KNOWLEDGE OF FACTS IN ISSUE EXCEPT WHEN TESTIFYING AS A WITNESS, OR STATE A PERSONAL OPINION AS TO THE JUSTNESS OF A CAUSE, THE CREDIBILITY OF A WITNESS, THE CULPABILITY OF A CIVIL LITIGANT, OR THE GUILT OR INNOCENCE OF AN ACCUSED;

(f) REQUEST A PERSON OTHER THAN A CLIENT TO REFRAIN FROM VOLUNTARILY GIVING RELEVANT INFORMATION TO ANOTHER PARTY UNLESS:

(1) THE PERSON IS A RELATIVE OR AN EMPLOYEE OR OTHER AGENT OF A CLIENT; AND

(2) THE LAWYER REASONABLY BELIEVES THAT THE PERSON'S INTERESTS WILL NOT BE ADVERSELY AFFECTED BY REFRAINING FROM GIVING SUCH INFORMATION; OR

(g) PEREMPTORILY STRIKE JURORS FOR ANY REASON PROHIBITED BY LAW.

COMMENT

[1] The procedure of the adversary system contemplates that the evidence in a case is to be marshaled competitively by the contending parties. Fair competition in the adversary system is secured by prohibitions against destruction or concealment of evidence, improperly influencing witnesses, obstructive tactics in discovery procedure, and the like.

[2] Documents and other items of evidence are often essential to establish a claim or defense. Subject to evidentiary privileges, the right of an opposing party, including the government, to obtain evidence through discovery or subpoena is an important procedural right. The exercise of that right can be frustrated if relevant material is altered, concealed, or destroyed. To the extent clients are involved in the effort to comply with discovery requests, the lawyer's obligations are to pursue reasonable efforts to assure that documents and other information subject to proper discovery requests are produced. Applicable law in many jurisdictions makes it an offense to destroy material for purpose of impairing its availability in a pending proceeding or a proceeding whose commencement can be foreseen. Falsifying evidence is also generally a criminal offense. Paragraph (a) applies to evidentiary material generally, including computerized information.

[3] Paragraph (a) permits, but does not require, the lawyer to accept physical evidence (including the instruments or proceeds of crime) from the client or any other person. Such receipt is, as stated in paragraph (a), subject to other provisions of law and the limitations imposed by paragraph (a) with respect to obstruction of access, alteration, destruction, or concealment, and subject also to the requirements of paragraph (a) with respect to return of property to its rightful owner, and to the obligation to comply with subpoenas and discovery requests. The term "evidence" includes any document or physical object that the lawyer reasonably should know may be the subject of discovery or subpoena in any pending or imminent litigation. See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion No. 119 (test is whether destruction of document is directed at concrete litigation that is either pending or almost certain to be filed).

[4] A lawyer should ascertain that the lawyer's handling of documents or other physical objects does not violate any other law. Federal criminal law may forbid the destruction of documents or other physical objects in circumstances not covered by the ethical rule set forth in paragraph (a). See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 1503 (obstruction of justice); 18 U.S.C. § 1505 (obstruction of proceedings before departments, agencies, and committees); 18 U.S.C. § 1510 (obstruction of criminal investigations). And it is a crime in the District of Columbia for one who knows or has reason to know that an official proceeding has begun or is likely to be instituted to alter, destroy, or conceal a document with intent to impair its integrity or availability for use in the proceeding. D.C. Code § 22-723 (2001). Finally, some discovery rules having the force of law may prohibit the destruction of documents and other material even if litigation is not pending or imminent. This rule does not set forth the scope of a lawyer's responsibilities under all applicable laws. It merely imposes on the lawyer an ethical duty to make reasonable efforts to comply fully with those laws. The provisions of paragraph (a) prohibit a lawyer from obstructing another party's access to evidence, and from altering, destroying, or concealing evidence. These prohibitions may overlap with criminal obstruction provisions and civil discovery rules, but they apply whether or not the prohibited conduct violates criminal provisions or court rules. Thus, the alteration of evidence by a lawyer, whether or not such conduct violates criminal law or court rules, constitutes a violation of paragraph (a).

[5] Because of the duty of confidentiality under Rule 1.6, the lawyer is generally forbidden to volunteer information about physical evidence received from a client without the client's informed consent. In some cases, the Office of Disciplinary Counsel will accept physical evidence from a lawyer and then turn it over to the appropriate persons; in those cases this procedure is usually the best means of delivering evidence to the proper authorities without disclosing the client's confidences. However, Disciplinary Counsel may refuse to accept evidence; thus lawyers should keep the following in mind before accepting evidence from a client, and should discuss with Disciplinary Counsel's office the procedures that may be employed in particular circumstances.

[6] First, if the evidence received from the client is subpoenaed or otherwise requested through the discovery process while held by the lawyer, the lawyer will be obligated to deliver the evidence directly to the appropriate persons, unless there is a basis for objecting to the discovery request or moving to quash the subpoena. A lawyer should therefore advise the client of the risk that evidence may be subject to subpoena or discovery, and of the lawyer's duty to turn the evidence over in that event, before accepting it from the client.

[7] Second, if the lawyer has received physical evidence belonging to the client, for purposes of examination or testing, the lawyer may later return the property to the client pursuant to Rule 1.15, provided that the evidence has not been subpoenaed. The lawyer may not be justified in returning to a client physical evidence the possession of which by the client would be per se illegal, such as certain drugs and weapons. And if it is reasonably apparent that the evidence is not the client's property, the lawyer may not retain the evidence or return it to the client. Instead, the lawyer must, under paragraph (a), make a good-faith effort to return the evidence to its owner. Rule 3.4(a) makes this duty subject to Rule 1.6. Rules 1.6(c), (d) and (e) describe circumstances in which a lawyer may reveal information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6. If such circumstances exist, the lawyer may, but is not required to, reveal information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6 as part of a good-faith effort to preserve the evidence and return it to the owner pursuant to Rule 3.4(a).

[8] With regard to paragraph (b), it is not improper to pay a witness's expenses or to compensate a witness for loss of time in preparing to testify, in attending, or in testifying. A fee for the services of a witness who will be proffered as an expert may be made contingent on the outcome of the litigation, provided, however, that the fee, while conditioned on recovery, shall not be a percentage of the recovery.

[9] Paragraph (f) permits a lawyer to advise employees of a client to refrain from giving information to another party, for the employees may identify their interests with those of the client. See also Rule 4.2.

[10] Paragraph (g) prohibits any lawyer from exercising peremptory challenges to prospective jurors on any impermissible ground. Impermissible grounds include race, sex, and other factors that have been determined in binding judicial decisions to be discriminatory in jury selection.

RULE 3.5 – IMPARTIALITY AND DECORUM OF THE TRIBUNAL

A LAWYER SHALL NOT:

(a) SEEK TO INFLUENCE A JUDGE, JUROR, PROSPECTIVE JUROR, OR OTHER OFFICIAL BY MEANS PROHIBITED BY LAW;

(b) COMMUNICATE EX PARTE WITH SUCH A PERSON DURING THE PROCEEDING UNLESS AUTHORIZED TO DO SO BY LAW OR COURT ORDER;

(c) COMMUNICATE, EITHER EX PARTE OR WITH OPPOSING COUNSEL, WITH A JUROR OR PROSPECTIVE JUROR AFTER DISCHARGE OF THE JURY IF:

(1) THE COMMUNICATION IS PROHIBITED BY LAW OR COURT ORDER;

(2) THE JUROR OR PROSPECTIVE JUROR HAS MADE KNOWN TO THE LAWYER A DESIRE NOT TO COMMUNICATE; OR

(3) THE COMMUNICATION INVOLVES MISREPRESENTATION, COERCION, DURESS, OR HARASSMENT; OR

(d) ENGAGE IN CONDUCT INTENDED TO DISRUPT ANY PROCEEDING OF A TRIBUNAL, INCLUDING A DEPOSITION.

COMMENT

[1] Many forms of improper influence upon a tribunal are proscribed by criminal law. Others are specified in the Code of Judicial Conduct, with which an advocate should be familiar. A lawyer is required to avoid contributing to a violation of such provisions.

[2] During a proceeding a lawyer may not communicate ex parte with persons serving in an official capacity in the proceeding, such as judges, masters or jurors, unless authorized to do so by law or court order.

[3] A lawyer may on occasion want to communicate with a juror or prospective juror after the jury has been discharged, even though the proceeding has not ended. The lawyer may do so, either ex parte or with opposing counsel, unless the communication is prohibited by law or a court order. The lawyer, however, must respect the desire of the juror or prospective juror not to talk with the lawyer. The lawyer may not engage in improper conduct during the communication.

[4] The advocate's function is to present evidence and argument so that the cause may be decided according to law. Refraining from abusive or obstreperous conduct is a corollary of the advocate's right to speak on behalf of litigants. A lawyer may stand firm against abuse by a judge but should avoid reciprocation; the judge's default is no justification for similar dereliction by an advocate. An advocate can present the cause, protect the record for subsequent review, and preserve professional integrity by patient firmness no less effectively than by belligerence or theatrics.

RULE 3.6 – TRIAL PUBLICITY

A LAWYER ENGAGED IN A CASE BEING TRIED TO A JUDGE OR JURY SHALL NOT MAKE AN EXTRAJUDICIAL STATEMENT THAT THE LAWYER KNOWS OR REASONABLY SHOULD KNOW WILL BE DISSEMINATED BY MEANS OF MASS PUBLIC COMMUNICATION AND WILL CREATE A SERIOUS AND IMMINENT THREAT OF MATERIAL PREJUDICE TO THE PROCEEDING.

COMMENT

[1] It is difficult to strike a proper balance between protecting the right to a fair trial and safeguarding the right of free expression, which are both guaranteed by the Constitution. On one hand, publicity should not be allowed to influence the fair administration of justice. On the other hand, litigants have a right to present their side of a dispute to the public, and the public has an interest in receiving information about matters that are in litigation. Often a lawyer involved in the litigation is in the best position to assist in furthering these legitimate objectives. No body of rules can simultaneously satisfy all interests of fair trial and all those of free expression.

[2] The special obligations of prosecutors to limit comment on criminal matters involve considerations in addition to those implicated in this rule, and are dealt with in Rule 3.8(f). Furthermore, this rule is not intended to abrogate special court rules of confidentiality in juvenile or other cases. Lawyers are bound by Rule 3.4(c) to adhere to any such rules that have not been found invalid.

[3] Because administrative agencies should have the prerogative to determine the ethical rules for prehearing publicity, this rule does not purport to apply to matters before administrative agencies.

RULE 3.7 – LAWYER AS WITNESS

(a) A LAWYER SHALL NOT ACT AS ADVOCATE AT A TRIAL IN WHICH THE LAWYER IS LIKELY TO BE A NECESSARY WITNESS EXCEPT WHERE:

(1) THE TESTIMONY RELATES TO AN UNCONTESTED ISSUE;

(2) THE TESTIMONY RELATES TO THE NATURE AND VALUE OF LEGAL SERVICES RENDERED IN THE CASE; OR

(3) DISQUALIFICATION OF THE LAWYER WOULD WORK SUBSTANTIAL HARDSHIP ON THE CLIENT.

(b) A LAWYER MAY NOT ACT AS ADVOCATE IN A TRIAL IN WHICH ANOTHER LAWYER IN THE LAWYER'S FIRM IS LIKELY TO BE CALLED AS A WITNESS IF THE OTHER LAWYER WOULD BE PRECLUDED FROM ACTING AS ADVOCATE IN THE TRIAL BY RULE 1.7 OR RULE 1.9. THE PROVISIONS OF THIS PARAGRAPH (b) DO NOT APPLY IF THE LAWYER WHO IS APPEARING AS AN ADVOCATE IS EMPLOYED BY, AND APPEARS ON BEHALF OF, A GOVERNMENT AGENCY.

COMMENT

[1] Combining the roles of advocate and witness can prejudice the opposing party and can involve a conflict of interest between the lawyer and client.

[2] The opposing party has proper objection where the combination of roles may prejudice that party's rights in the litigation. A witness is required to testify on the basis of personal knowledge, while an advocate is expected to explain and comment on evidence given by others. It may not be clear whether a statement by an advocate-witness should be taken as proof or as an analysis of the proof.

[3] Subparagraph (a)(1) recognizes that if the testimony will be uncontested, the ambiguities in the dual role are purely theoretical. Subparagraph (a)(2) recognizes that where the testimony concerns the extent and value of legal services rendered in the action in which the testimony is offered, permitting the lawyers to testify avoids the need for a second trial with new counsel to resolve that issue. Moreover, in such a situation the judge has firsthand knowledge of the matter in issue; hence, there is less dependence on the adversary process to test the credibility of the testimony.

[4] Apart from these two exceptions, subparagraph (a)(3) recognizes that a balancing is required between the interests of the client and those of the opposing party. Whether the opposing party is likely to suffer prejudice depends on the nature of the case, the importance and probable tenor of the lawyer's testimony, and the probability that the lawyer's testimony will conflict with that of other witnesses. Even if there is risk of such prejudice, in determining whether the lawyer should be disqualified, due regard must be given to the effect of disqualification on the lawyer's client. It is relevant that one or both parties could reasonably foresee that the lawyer would probably be a witness.

[5] If the only reason for not permitting a lawyer to combine the roles of advocate and witness is possible prejudice to the opposing party, there is no reason to disqualify other lawyers in the testifying lawyer's firm from acting as advocates in that trial. In short, there is no general rule of imputed disqualification applicable to Rule 3.7. However, the combination of roles of advocate and witness may involve an improper conflict of interest between the lawyer and the client in addition to or apart from possible prejudice to the opposing party. Whether there is such a client conflict is determined by Rule 1.7 or 1.9. For example, if there is likely to be a significant conflict between the testimony of the client and that of the lawyer, the representation is improper by the standard of Rule 1.7(b) without regard to Rule 3.7(a). The problem can arise whether the lawyer is called as a witness on behalf of the client or is called by the opposing party. Determining whether such a conflict exists is, in the first instance, the responsibility of the lawyer involved. See Comment to Rule 1.7. Rule 3.7(b) states that other lawyers in the testifying lawyer's firm are disqualified only when there is such a client conflict and the testifying lawyer therefore could not represent the client under Rule 1.7 or 1.9. The principles of client consent, embodied in Rules 1.7 and 1.9, also apply to paragraph (b). Thus, the reference to Rules 1.7 and 1.9 incorporates the client consent aspects of those Rules. Paragraph (b) is designed to provide protection for the client, not rights of disqualification to the adversary. Subject to the disclosure and consultation requirements of Rules 1.7 and 1.9, the client may consent to the firm's continuing representation, despite the potential problems created by the nature of the testimony to be provided by a lawyer in the firm.

[6] Even though a lawyer's testimony does not involve a conflict with the client's interests under Rule 1.7 or 1.9 and would not be precluded under Rule 3.7, the client's interests might nevertheless be harmed by the appearance as a witness of a lawyer in the firm that represents the client. For example, the lawyer's testimony would be vulnerable to impeachment on the grounds that the lawyer-witness is testifying to support the position of the lawyer's own firm. Similarly, a lawyer whose firm colleague is testifying in the case should recognize the possibility that the lawyer might not scrutinize the testimony of the colleague carefully enough and that this could prejudice the client's interests, whether the colleague is testifying for or against the client. In such instances, the lawyer should inform the client of any possible adverse effects on the client's interests that might result from the lawyer's relationship with the colleague-witness, so that the client may make a meaningful choice whether to retain the lawyer for the representation in question.

RULE 3.8 – SPECIAL RESPONSIBILITIES OF A PROSECUTOR

THE PROSECUTOR IN A CRIMINAL CASE SHALL NOT:

(a) IN EXERCISING DISCRETION TO INVESTIGATE OR TO PROSECUTE, IMPROPERLY FAVOR OR INVIDIOUSLY DISCRIMINATE AGAINST ANY PERSON;

(b) FILE IN COURT OR MAINTAIN A CHARGE THAT THE PROSECUTOR KNOWS IS NOT SUPPORTED BY PROBABLE CAUSE;

(c) PROSECUTE TO TRIAL A CHARGE THAT THE PROSECUTOR KNOWS IS NOT SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE SUFFICIENT TO ESTABLISH A PRIMA FACIE SHOWING OF GUILT;

(d) INTENTIONALLY FAIL TO DISCLOSE TO THE DEFENSE, AT A TIME WHEN USE BY THE DEFENSE IS REASONABLY FEASIBLE, ANY EVIDENCE OR INFORMATION, WHICH CAN INCLUDE IMPEACHMENT INFORMATION OR INFORMATION TENDING TO SUPPORT A MOTION TO SUPPRESS EVIDENCE, THAT THE PROSECUTOR KNOWS OR REASONABLY SHOULD KNOW TENDS TO NEGATE THE GUILT OF THE ACCUSED OR TO MITIGATE THE OFFENSE,

OR IN CONNECTION WITH SENTENCING, INTENTIONALLY FAIL TO DISCLOSE TO THE DEFENSE ANY UNPRIVILEGED MITIGATING INFORMATION KNOWN TO THE PROSECUTOR AND NOT REASONABLY AVAILABLE TO THE DEFENSE, EXCEPT WHEN THE PROSECUTOR IS RELIEVED OF THIS RESPONSIBILITY BY A PROTECTIVE ORDER OF THE TRIBUNAL;

(e) INTENTIONALLY AVOID PURSUIT OF EVIDENCE OR INFORMATION, OR UNREASONABLE DELAY THE DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION OR EVIDENCE THAT TENDS TO NEGATE THE GUILT OF THE ACCUSED OR TO MITIGATE THE OFFENSE, BECAUSE IT MAY DAMAGE THE PROSECUTION'S CASE OR AID THE DEFENSE;

(f) EXCEPT FOR STATEMENTS WHICH ARE NECESSARY TO INFORM THE PUBLIC OF THE NATURE AND EXTENT OF THE PROSECUTOR'S ACTION AND WHICH SERVE A LEGITIMATE LAW ENFORCEMENT PURPOSE, MAKE EXTRAJUDICIAL COMMENTS WHICH SERVE TO HEIGHTEN CONDEMNATION OF THE ACCUSED; OR

(g) IN PRESENTING A CASE TO A GRAND JURY, INTENTIONALLY INTERFERE WITH THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE GRAND JURY, PREEMPT A FUNCTION OF THE GRAND JURY, ABUSE THE PROCESSES OF THE GRAND JURY, OR FAIL TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF THE GRAND JURY MATERIAL FACTS TENDING SUBSTANTIALLY TO NEGATE THE EXISTENCE OF PROBABLE CAUSE.

(h) WHEN A PROSECUTOR KNOWS OF INFORMATION THAT THE PROSECUTOR KNOWS OR REASONABLY SHOULD KNOW RAISES A SUBSTANTIAL QUESTION ABOUT WHETHER A PERSON WAS CONVICTED OF AN OFFENSE THAT THE PERSON DID NOT COMMIT, THE PROSECUTOR SHALL

(1) PROMPTLY DISCLOSE THAT INFORMATION TO: (i) THE CHIEF PROSECUTOR OF THE JURISDICTION WHERE THE CONVICTION WAS OBTAINED; (ii) THE COURT IN WHICH THE CONVICTION WAS OBTAINED; AND, UNLESS THE COURT AUTHORIZES A DELAY, (iii) THE CONVICTED PERSON AND (iv) IF KNOWN, THE PERSON'S LAWYER; AND

(2) IF THE PROSECUTION OCCURRED IN THE PROSECUTOR'S JURISDICTION AND UNDER THE AUTHORITY OF THE PROSECUTOR'S OFFICE, UNDERTAKE FURTHER INVESTIGATION, OR MAKE REASONABLE EFFORTS TO CAUSE AN INVESTIGATION, TO DETERMINE WHETHER THE PERSON WAS CONVICTED OF AN OFFENSE THAT THE PERSON DID NOT COMMIT.

(3) IF THERE ARE MULTIPLE PROSECUTORIAL AUTHORITIES IN THE JURISDICTION, THE DISCLOSURE SHOULD BE MADE TO THE PROSECUTORIAL AUTHORITY RESPONSIBLE FOR THE CONVICTION AT ISSUE.

(4) A PROSECUTOR DOES NOT VIOLATE SUBPARAGRAPH (h) BY FAILING TO NOTIFY A PERSON OR PERSONS OR COURT WHOSE IDENTITY OR LOCATION REMAINS UNKNOWN TO THE PROSECUTOR AFTER UNDERTAKING REASONABLE EFFORTS.

(i) WHEN A PROSECUTOR KNOWS OF INFORMATION THAT THE PROSECUTOR KNOWS CONSTITUTES CLEAR AND CONVINCING EVIDENCE ESTABLISHING THAT A PERSON WAS CONVICTED IN THE PROSECUTOR'S JURISDICTION AND UNDER THE AUTHORITY OF THE PROSECUTOR'S OFFICE OF AN OFFENSE THAT THE PERSON DID NOT COMMIT, THE PROSECUTOR SHALL SEEK TO REMEDY THE CONVICTION.

COMMENT

[1] A prosecutor has the responsibility of a minister of justice and not simply that of an advocate. This responsibility carries with it specific obligations to see that the defendant is accorded procedural justice and that guilt is decided upon the basis of sufficient evidence. The constitutional protections in the criminal context serve a fundamentally different purpose than disciplinary proceedings in the ethical context. While this rule may overlap with what constitutional due process requires, it is a rule to govern professional conduct; its requirements are not co-extensive with due process or with statutory obligations or court procedural rules. Paragraph (d) requires disclosure of information that the prosecutor knows or reasonably should know tends to negate the guilt of the accused or to mitigate the offense. However, because the failure to disclose must be intentional, the rule only requires disclosure of such information when its existence is known to the prosecutor. Although another government actor's knowledge will not be imputed to the prosecutor, a prosecutor's knowledge may be inferred from circumstances under Rule 1.0(f). Moreover, paragraph (e) independently imposes obligations concerning the intentional avoidance of the pursuit of evidence or information. The disclosure duty under paragraph (d) exists regardless of whether that information might later be deemed immaterial to the outcome of the case and regardless of the prosecutor's assessment of how the information might be explained away or discredited at trial or ultimately rejected by the fact-finder. For further guidance, see In re Kline, 113 A.3d 202 (D.C. 2015).

[2] Apart from the special responsibilities of a prosecutor under this rule, prosecutors are subject to the same obligations imposed upon all lawyers by these Rules of Professional Conduct, including Rule 3.4 prohibiting the discriminatory use of peremptory strikes, and Rule 5.3, relating to responsibilities regarding nonlawyers who work for or in association with the lawyer's office. Indeed, because of the power and visibility of a prosecutor, the prosecutor's compliance with these Rules, and recognition of the need to refrain even from some actions technically allowed to other lawyers under the Rules, may, in certain instances, be of special importance. For example, Rule 3.6 prohibits extrajudicial statements that will have a substantial likelihood of destroying the impartiality of the judge or jury. In the context of a criminal prosecution, pretrial publicity can present the further problem of giving the public the incorrect impression that the accused is guilty before having been proven guilty through the due processes of the law. It is unavoidable, of course, that the publication of an indictment may itself have severe consequences for an accused. What is avoidable, however, is extrajudicial comment by a prosecutor that serves unnecessarily to heighten public condemnation of the accused without a legitimate law enforcement purpose before the criminal process has taken its course. When that occurs, even if the ultimate trial is not prejudiced, the accused may be subjected to unfair and unnecessary condemnation before the trial takes place. Accordingly, a prosecutor should use special care to avoid publicity, such as through televised press conferences, which would unnecessarily heighten condemnation of the accused.

[3] Nothing in this Comment, however, is intended to suggest that a prosecutor may not inform the public of such matters as whether an official investigation has ended or is continuing, or who participated in it, and the prosecutor may respond to press inquiries to clarify such things as technicalities of the indictment, the status of the matter, or the legal procedures that will follow. Also, a prosecutor should be free to respond, insofar as necessary, to any extrajudicial allegations by the defense of unprofessional or unlawful conduct on the part of the prosecutor's office.

[4] Rectifying the conviction and preventing the incarceration of an innocent person are core values of the judicial system and matters of vital concern to the legal profession. When a prosecutor knows of information that the prosecutor knows or reasonably should know raises a substantial question about whether a person was convicted of an offense that the person did not commit, paragraph (h) requires prompt disclosure to the chief prosecutor of the jurisdiction where the conviction occurred as well as the court in which the conviction was obtained. Prompt disclosure under paragraph (h)(1) does not preclude a reasonable period of time for consultation with the chief prosecutor of the jurisdiction where the conviction was obtained. A disclosure made to a convicted person pursuant to paragraph (h) does not violate Rule 4.2(a) of these Rules. As used in this Rule, the "chief prosecutor" includes the head of the organization or any managerial lawyer in the chief prosecutor's office. The notification obligations in paragraph (h) assume that the prosecutor knows, or through reasonable efforts can ascertain, the identity and location (i.e., mailing address, email address, or telephone number) of the persons and court to be notified.

[5] Not every piece of information raising a question about whether a person was convicted of an offense that the person did not commit need be disclosed. Rather, this rule limits the disclosure requirement to information that is sufficient to cause a reasonable lawyer to believe there is substantial question about whether a person was convicted of an offense that the person did not commit. See Rule 1.0(j) for the definition of "reasonable." The phrase "substantial question" refers to the degree of concern the particular information triggers about whether the person was convicted of an offense that the person did not commit, and not the quantum of information of which the lawyer is aware. See Rule 1.0(m) for the definition of "substantial." In order to comply with paragraph (h), a prosecutor need not disclose information that the prosecutor knows was previously disclosed, and a prosecutor need not undertake an investigation or take steps to initiate an investigation when the prosecutor knows another prosecutor is already doing so. A prosecutor may not decline to disclose information under Rule 3.8(h) merely because the prosecutor subjectively believes that the information is not credible. On the other hand, whether the information is objectively plausible or could reasonably be credited can appropriately be taken into account when determining whether information 'raises a substantial question' of innocence.

[6] A prosecutor who knows of information that could raise a substantial question about whether a person was convicted of an offense that the person did not commit may, but is not required to, disclose that information as directed in paragraph (h) without further inquiry into whether the information actually raises such a question. A prosecutor's disclosure of information pursuant to this Rule is not an admission or concession that such information raises a substantial question about whether a person was convicted of an offense that he or she did not commit.

[7] Under paragraph (i), remedial steps may include requesting that the court appoint counsel for an unrepresented defendant. In order to comply with paragraph (i), a prosecutor need not seek to remedy a conviction where the prosecutor knows another prosecutor is already doing so.

RULE 3.9 – ADVOCATE IN NON-ADJUDICATIVE PROCEEDINGS

A LAWYER REPRESENTING A CLIENT BEFORE A LEGISLATIVE OR ADMINISTRATIVE BODY IN A NONADJUDICATIVE PROCEEDING SHALL DISCLOSE THAT THE APPEARANCE IS IN A REPRESENTATIVE CAPACITY AND SHALL CONFORM TO THE PROVISIONS OF RULES 3.3, 3.4(a) THROUGH (c), AND 3.5.

COMMENT

[1] In representation before bodies such as legislatures, municipal councils, and executive and administrative agencies acting in a rule-making or policy-making capacity, lawyers present facts, formulate issues, and advance argument in the matters under consideration. The decision-making body, like a court, should be able to rely on the integrity of the submissions made to it. A lawyer appearing before such a body should deal with it honestly and in conformity with applicable rules of procedure.

[2] Lawyers have no exclusive right to appear before nonadjudicative bodies, as they do before a court. The requirements of this rule therefore may subject lawyers to regulations inapplicable to advocates, such as nonlawyer lobbyists, who are not lawyers. However, legislatures and administrative agencies have a right to expect lawyers to deal with them as they deal with courts.

[3] This rule does not apply to representation of a client in a negotiation or other bilateral transaction with a government agency; representation in such a transaction is governed by Rules 4.1 through 4.4.

[4] This rule is closely related to Rules 3.3 through 3.5, which deal with conduct regarding tribunals. The term "tribunal," as defined Rule 1.0(n), refers to adjudicative or quasi-adjudicative bodies.

TRANSACTIONS WITH PERSONS OTHER THAN CLIENTS

RULE 4.1 – TRUTHFULNESS IN STATEMENTS TO OTHERS

IN THE COURSE OF REPRESENTING A CLIENT, A LAWYER SHALL NOT KNOWINGLY:

(a) MAKE A FALSE STATEMENT OF MATERIAL FACT OR LAW TO A THIRD PERSON; OR

(b) FAIL TO DISCLOSE A MATERIAL FACT TO A THIRD PERSON WHEN DISCLOSURE IS NECESSARY TO AVOID ASSISTING A CRIMINAL OR FRAUDULENT ACT BY A CLIENT, UNLESS DISCLOSURE IS PROHIBITED BY RULE 1.6.

COMMENT

Misrepresentation

[1] A lawyer is required to be truthful when dealing with others on a client's behalf, but generally has no affirmative duty to inform an opposing party of relevant facts. A misrepresentation can occur if the lawyer incorporates or affirms a statement of another person that the lawyer knows is false. Misrepresentations can also occur by partially true but misleading statements or omissions that are the equivalent of affirmative false statements. For dishonest conduct that does not amount to a false statement or for misrepresentations by a lawyer other than in the course of representing a client, see Rule 8.4. The term "third person" as used in paragraphs (a) and (b) refers to any person or entity other than the lawyer's client.

Statements of Fact

[2] This rule refers to material statements of fact. Whether a particular statement should be regarded as material, and as one of fact, can depend on the circumstances. Under generally accepted conventions in negotiation, certain types of statements ordinarily are not taken as statements of material fact. Estimates of price or value placed on the subject of a transaction and a party's intentions as to an acceptable settlement of a claim are ordinarily in this category, and so is the existence of an undisclosed principal except where nondisclosure of the principal would constitute fraud. Lawyers should be mindful of their obligations under applicable law to avoid criminal and tortious misrepresentation. There may be other analogous situations.

Fraud by Client

[3] Under Rule 1.2(e), a lawyer is prohibited from counseling or assisting a client in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent. Paragraph (b) states a specific application of the principle set forth in Rule 1.2(e) and addresses the situation where a client's crime or fraud takes the form of a lie or misrepresentation. Ordinarily, a lawyer can avoid assisting a client's crime or fraud by withdrawing from the representation. Sometimes it may be necessary for the lawyer to give notice of the fact of withdrawal and to disaffirm an opinion, document, affirmation or the like. In extreme cases, substantive law may require a lawyer to disclose client information to avoid being deemed to have assisted the client's crime or fraud. If the lawyer can avoid assisting a client's crime or fraud only by disclosing such client information, then under paragraph (b) the lawyer is required to do so, unless the disclosure is prohibited by Rule 1.6. If, in the particular circumstances in which the lawyer finds himself or herself, the lawyer has discretion to disclose a client confidence or secret under Rule 1.6(c), (d), or (e), disclosure is not prohibited by Rule 1.6, and the lawyer must disclose the information if otherwise required by this rule.

RULE 4.2 – COMMUNICATION BETWEEN LAWYER AND PERSON REPRESENTED BY COUNSEL

(a) DURING THE COURSE OF REPRESENTING A CLIENT, A LAWYER SHALL NOT COMMUNICATE OR CAUSE ANOTHER TO COMMUNICATE ABOUT THE SUBJECT OF THE REPRESENTATION WITH A PERSON KNOWN TO BE REPRESENTED BY ANOTHER LAWYER IN THE MATTER, UNLESS THE LAWYER HAS THE PRIOR CONSENT OF THE LAWYER REPRESENTING SUCH OTHER PERSON OR IS AUTHORIZED BY LAW OR A COURT ORDER TO DO SO.

(b) DURING THE COURSE OF REPRESENTING A CLIENT, A LAWYER MAY COMMUNICATE ABOUT THE SUBJECT OF THE REPRESENTATION WITH A NONPARTY EMPLOYEE OF AN ORGANIZATION WITHOUT OBTAINING THE CONSENT OF THAT ORGANIZATION'S LAWYER. IF THE ORGANIZATION IS AN ADVERSE PARTY, HOWEVER, PRIOR TO COMMUNICATING WITH ANY SUCH NONPARTY EMPLOYEE, A LAWYER MUST DISCLOSE TO SUCH EMPLOYEE BOTH THE LAWYER'S IDENTITY AND THE FACT THAT THE LAWYER REPRESENTS A PARTY THAT IS ADVERSE TO THE EMPLOYEE'S EMPLOYER.

(c) FOR PURPOSES OF THIS RULE, THE TERM "PARTY" OR "PERSON" INCLUDES ANY PERSON OR ORGANIZATION, INCLUDING AN EMPLOYEE OF AN ORGANIZATION, WHO HAS THE AUTHORITY TO BIND AN ORGANIZATION AS TO THE REPRESENTATION TO WHICH THE COMMUNICATION RELATES.

(d) THIS RULE DOES NOT PROHIBIT COMMUNICATION BY A LAWYER WITH GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS WHO HAVE THE AUTHORITY TO REDRESS THE GRIEVANCES OF THE LAWYER'S CLIENT, WHETHER OR NOT THOSE GRIEVANCES OR THE LAWYER'S COMMUNICATIONS RELATE TO MATTERS THAT ARE THE SUBJECT OF THE REPRESENTATION, PROVIDED THAT IN THE EVENT OF SUCH COMMUNICATIONS THE DISCLOSURES SPECIFIED IN (B) ARE MADE TO THE GOVERNMENT OFFICIAL TO WHOM THE COMMUNICATION IS MADE.

COMMENT

[1] This rule covers any person, whether or not a party to a formal proceeding, who is represented by counsel concerning the matter in question.

[2] This rule does not prohibit communication with a person or party, or an employee or agent of an organization, concerning matters outside the representation. For example, the existence of a controversy between two organizations does not prohibit a lawyer for either from communicating with representatives of the other regarding a separate matter. Also, parties to a matter may communicate directly with each other and a lawyer having independent justification for communicating with the other party is permitted to do so. In addition, a lawyer is not prohibited from advising a client concerning a communication that the client is legally entitled to make, provided that the client communication is not solely for the purpose of evading restrictions imposed on the lawyer by this rule.

[3] In the case of an organization, and other than as noted in Comment [5], this rule prohibits communication by a lawyer for one party concerning the matter in representation with persons having the power to bind the organization as to the particular representation to which the communication relates. If an agent or employee of the organization with authority to make binding decisions regarding the representation is represented in the matter by separate counsel, the consent by that agent's or employee's counsel to a communication will be sufficient for purposes of this rule.

[4] The rule does not prohibit a lawyer from communicating with employees of an organization who have the authority to bind the organization with respect to the matters underlying the representation if they do not also have authority to make binding decisions regarding the representation itself. A lawyer may therefore communicate with such persons without first notifying the organization's lawyer. See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion No. 129. But before communicating with such a "nonparty employee," the lawyer must disclose to the employee the lawyer's identity and the fact that the lawyer represents a party with a claim against the employer. It is preferable that this disclosure be made in writing. The notification requirements of Rule 4.2(b) apply to contacts with government employees who do not have the authority to make binding decisions regarding the representation.

[5] Because this rule is primarily focused on protecting represented persons unschooled in the law from direct communications from counsel for an adverse person, consent of the organization's lawyer is not required where a lawyer seeks to communicate with in-house counsel of an organization. If individual in-house counsel is represented separately from the organization, however, consent of that individual's personal counsel is required before communicating with that individual in-house counsel.

[6] Consent of the organization's lawyer is not required where a lawyer seeks to communicate with a former constituent of an organization. In making such contact, however, the lawyer may not seek to obtain information that is otherwise protected.

[7] This rule also does not preclude communication with a represented person who is seeking advice from a lawyer who is not otherwise representing a client in the matter.

[8] This rule applies even though the represented person initiates or consents to the communication. A lawyer must immediately terminate communication with a person if, after commencing communication, the lawyer learns that the person is one with whom communication is not permitted by this rule.

[9] This rule does not apply to the situation in which a lawyer contacts employees of an organization for the purpose of obtaining information generally available to the public, or obtainable under the Freedom of Information Act, even if the information in question is related to the representation. For example, a lawyer for a plaintiff who has filed suit against an organization represented by a lawyer may telephone the organization to request a copy of a press release regarding the representation, without disclosing the lawyer's identity, obtaining the consent of the organization's lawyer, or otherwise acting as paragraphs (a) and (b) of this rule require.

[10] Paragraph (d) recognizes that special considerations come into play when a lawyer is seeking to redress grievances involving the government. It permits communications with those in government having the authority to redress such grievances (but not with any other government personnel) without the prior consent of the lawyer representing the government in such cases. However, a lawyer making such a communication without the prior consent of the lawyer representing the government must make the kinds of disclosures that are required by paragraph (b) in the case of communications with non-party employees.

[11] Paragraph (d) does not permit a lawyer to bypass counsel representing the government on every issue that may arise in the course of disputes with the government. It is intended to provide lawyers access to decision makers in government with respect to genuine grievances, such as to present the view that the government's basic policy position with respect to a dispute is faulty, or that government personnel are conducting themselves improperly with respect to aspects of the dispute. It is not intended to provide direct access on routine disputes such as ordinary discovery disputes, extensions of time or other scheduling matters, or similar routine aspects of the resolution of disputes.

[12] This rule is not intended to enlarge or restrict the law enforcement activities of the United States or the District of Columbia which are authorized and permissible under the Constitution and law of the United States or the District of Columbia. The "authorized by law" proviso to Rule 4.2(a) is intended to permit government conduct that is valid under this law. The proviso is not intended to freeze any particular substantive law, but is meant to accommodate substantive law as it may develop over time.

RULE 4.3 – DEALING WITH UNREPRESENTED PERSON

(a) IN DEALING ON BEHALF OF A CLIENT WITH A PERSON WHO IS NOT REPRESENTED BY COUNSEL, A LAWYER SHALL NOT:

> (1) GIVE ADVICE TO THE UNREPRESENTED PERSON OTHER THAN THE ADVICE TO SECURE COUNSEL, IF THE INTERESTS OF SUCH PERSON ARE OR HAVE A REASONABLE POSSIBILITY OF BEING IN CONFLICT WITH THE INTERESTS OF THE LAWYER'S CLIENT; OR
> (2) STATE OR IMPLY TO UNREPRESENTED PERSONS WHOSE INTERESTS ARE NOT IN CONFLICT WITH THE INTERESTS OF THE LAWYER'S CLIENT THAT THE LAWYER IS DISINTERESTED.

(b) WHEN THE LAWYER KNOWS OR REASONABLY SHOULD KNOW THAT THE UNREPRESENTED PERSON MISUNDERSTANDS THE LAWYER'S ROLE IN THE MATTER, THE LAWYER SHALL MAKE REASONABLE EFFORTS TO CORRECT THE MISUNDERSTANDING.

COMMENT

[1] An unrepresented person, particularly one not experienced in dealing with legal matters, might assume that a lawyer will provide disinterested advice concerning the law even when the lawyer represents a client. In dealing personally with any unrepresented third party on behalf of the lawyer's client, a lawyer must take great care not to exploit these assumptions. See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 321.

[2] The rule distinguishes between situations involving unrepresented third parties whose interests may be adverse to those of the lawyer's client and those in which the third party's interests are not in conflict with the client's. In the former situation, the possibility of the lawyer's compromising the unrepresented person's interests is so great that the rule prohibits the giving of any advice, apart from the advice that the unrepresented person obtain counsel. A lawyer is free to give advice to unrepresented persons whose interests are not in conflict with those of the lawyer's client, but only if it is made clear that the lawyer is acting in the interests of the client. Thus the lawyer should not represent to such persons, either expressly or implicitly, that the lawyer is disinterested. Furthermore, if it becomes apparent that the unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer must take whatever reasonable, affirmative steps are necessary to correct the misunderstanding.

[3] This rule does not prohibit a lawyer from negotiating the terms of a transaction or settling a dispute with an unrepresented person. So long as the lawyer has explained that the lawyer represents an adverse party and is not representing the person, the lawyer may inform the person of the terms on which the lawyer's client will enter into an agreement or settle a matter, prepare documents that require the person's signature and explain the lawyer's own view of the meaning of the document or the lawyer's view of the underlying legal obligations.

[4] This rule is not intended to restrict in any way law enforcement efforts by government lawyers that are consistent with constitutional requirements and applicable federal law.

RULE 4.4 – RESPECT FOR RIGHTS OF THIRD PERSONS

(a) IN REPRESENTING A CLIENT, A LAWYER SHALL NOT USE MEANS THAT HAVE NO SUBSTANTIAL PURPOSE OTHER THAN TO EMBARRASS, DELAY, OR BURDEN A THIRD PERSON, OR KNOWINGLY USE METHODS OF OBTAINING EVIDENCE THAT VIOLATE THE LEGAL RIGHTS OF SUCH A PERSON.

(b) A LAWYER WHO RECEIVES A WRITING RELATING TO THE REPRESENTATION OF A CLIENT AND KNOWS, BEFORE EXAMINING THE WRITING, THAT IT HAS BEEN INADVERTENTLY SENT, SHALL NOT EXAMINE THE WRITING, BUT SHALL NOTIFY THE SENDING PARTY AND ABIDE BY THE INSTRUCTIONS OF THE SENDING PARTY REGARDING THE RETURN OR DESTRUCTION OF THE WRITING.

(c) A LAWYER WHO BEGINS TO EXAMINE A WRITING RELATING TO THE REPRESENTATION OF A CLIENT AND ONLY THEN REALIZES THAT THE WRITING RELATES TO THE REPRESENTATION OF A CLIENT AND HAS BEEN INADVERTENTLY SENT TO THE LAWYER SHALL STOP EXAMINING THE WRITING, SHALL NOTIFY THE SENDING PARTY, AND SHALL ABIDE BY THE INSTRUCTIONS OF THE SENDING PARTY REGARDING THE RETURN OR DESTRUCTION OF THE WRITING.

COMMENT

[1] Responsibility to a client requires a lawyer to subordinate the interests of others to those of the client, but that responsibility does not imply that a lawyer may disregard the rights of third persons. It is impractical to catalogue all such rights, but they include legal restrictions on methods of obtaining evidence from third persons and unwarranted intrusions into privileged relationships, such as the client-lawyer relationship.

[2] Paragraph (b) addresses, for example, the obligations of a lawyer who receives writings containing client secrets or confidences in material delivered by another lawyer and who knows that the sending lawyer inadvertently included these writings. As the D.C. Legal Ethics Committee noted in Opinion 256, this problem is "an unfortunate (but not uncommon) consequence of an increasingly electronic world, as when a facsimile or electronic mail transmission is mistakenly made to an unintended recipient." Consistent with Opinion 256, paragraph (b) requires the receiving lawyer to comply with the sending party's instruction about disposition of the writing in these circumstances, and also prohibits the receiving lawyer from reading or using the material. ABA Model Rule 4.4 requires the receiving lawyer only to notify the sender in order to permit the sender to take protective measures, but Paragraph (b) of the D.C. Rule 4.4 requires the receiving lawyer to do more.

[3] Where writings containing client secrets or confidences are inadvertently delivered to an adversary lawyer, and the receiving lawyer in good faith reviews the materials before the lawyer knows that they were inadvertently sent, the receiving lawyer commits no ethical violation by retaining and using those materials. See D.C. Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 256 (addressing writings containing client secrets or confidences). See also D.C. Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 341 (applying paragraph (b) to the receipt of inadvertently disclosed metadata imbedded in electronic files).

[4] Whether the privileged status of a writing has been waived is a matter of law beyond the scope of these Rules. Similarly, this rule does not address the duties of a lawyer who receives a writing that the lawyer knows or reasonably should know may have been wrongfully obtained by the sending person. But see D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 318 (analyzing a lawyer's ethical obligations when receiving privileged documents that may have been taken without authorization from an opposing party) and Rules 1.1, 1.3, 1.6, 1.15 and 8.4.

LAW FIRMS AND ASSOCIATIONS

RULE 5.1 – RESPONSIBILITIES OF PARTNERS, MANAGERS, AND SUPERVISORY LAWYERS

(a) A PARTNER IN A LAW FIRM, AND A LAWYER WHO INDIVIDUALLY OR TOGETHER WITH OTHER LAWYERS POSSESSES COMPARABLE MANAGERIAL AUTHORITY IN A LAW FIRM OR GOVERNMENT AGENCY, SHALL MAKE REASONABLE EFFORTS TO ENSURE THAT THE FIRM HAS IN EFFECT MEASURES GIVING REASONABLE ASSURANCE THAT ALL LAWYERS IN THE FIRM OR AGENCY CONFORM TO THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT.

(b) A LAWYER HAVING DIRECT SUPERVISORY AUTHORITY OVER ANOTHER LAWYER SHALL MAKE REASONABLE EFFORTS TO ENSURE THAT THE OTHER LAWYER CONFORMS TO THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT.

(c) A LAWYER SHALL BE RESPONSIBLE FOR ANOTHER LAWYER'S VIOLATION OF THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT IF:

> (2) THE LAWYER HAS DIRECT SUPERVISORY AUTHORITY OVER THE OTHER LAWYER OR IS A PARTNER OR HAS COMPARABLE MANAGERIAL AUTHORITY IN THE LAW FIRM OR GOVERNMENT AGENCY IN WHICH THE OTHER LAWYER PRACTICES, AND KNOWS OR REASONABLY SHOULD KNOW OF THE CONDUCT AT A TIME WHEN ITS CONSEQUENCES CAN BE AVOIDED OR MITIGATED BUT FAILS TO TAKE REASONABLE REMEDIAL ACTION.

COMMENT

[1] Paragraph (a) applies to lawyers who have managerial authority over the professional work of a firm or government agency. This includes members of a partnership, the shareholders in a law firm organized as a professional corporation and members of other associations authorized to practice law; lawyers having comparable managerial authority in a legal services organization or the law department of an enterprise or government agency; and lawyers who have intermediate managerial responsibilities in a firm. For the broad definition of "firm," see Rule 1.0(c). Paragraph (b) applies to lawyers who have supervisory authority over the work of other lawyers.

[2] Paragraph (a) requires lawyers with managerial authority within a firm to make reasonable efforts to establish internal policies and procedures designed to provide reasonable assurance that all lawyers in the firm will conform to the Rules of Professional Conduct. Such policies and procedures include those designed to detect and resolve conflicts of interest, identify dates by which actions must be taken in pending matters, account for client funds and property and ensure that inexperienced lawyers are properly supervised.

[3] Other measures that may be required to fulfill the responsibility prescribed in paragraph (a), and measures that may be required to fulfill the responsibility prescribed in paragraph (b), can depend on the firm's structure and the nature of its practice. In a small firm, informal supervision and occasional admonition ordinarily might be sufficient. In a large firm, or in practice situations in which intensely difficult ethical problems frequently arise, more elaborate procedures may be necessary. Some firms, for example, have a procedure whereby junior lawyers can make confidential referral of ethical problems directly to a designated senior partner or special committee. See Rule 5.2. Firms, whether large or small, may also rely on continuing legal education in professional ethics. In any event, the ethical atmosphere of a firm can influence the conduct of all its members and a lawyer having authority over the work of another may not assume that the subordinate lawyer will inevitably conform to the Rules.

[4] Paragraph (c) sets forth general principles of imputed responsibility for the misconduct of others. Subparagraph (c)(1) makes any lawyer who orders or, with knowledge, ratifies misconduct responsible for that misconduct. See also Rule 8.4(a). Subparagraph (c)(2) extends that responsibility to any lawyer who is a partner or person in comparable managerial authority in the firm in which the misconduct takes place, or who has direct supervisory authority over the lawyer who engages in misconduct, when the lawyer knows or should reasonably know of the conduct and could intervene to ameliorate its consequences. Whether a lawyer has such supervisory authority in particular circumstances is a question of fact. A lawyer with direct supervisory authority is a lawyer who has an actual supervisory role with respect to directing the conduct of other lawyers in a particular representation. A lawyer who is technically a "supervisor" in organizational terms, but is not involved in directing the effort of other lawyers in a particular representation, is not a supervising lawyer with respect to that representation.

[5] The existence of actual knowledge is also a question of fact; whether a lawyer should reasonably have known of misconduct by another lawyer in the same firm is an objective standard based on evaluation of all the facts, including the size and organizational structure of the firm, the lawyer's position and responsibilities within the firm, the type and frequency of contacts between the various lawyers involved, the nature of the misconduct at issue, and the nature of the supervision or other direct responsibility (if any) actually exercised. The mere fact of partnership or a position as a principal in a firm is not sufficient, without more, to satisfy this standard. Similarly, the fact that a lawyer holds a position on the management committee of a firm, or heads a department of the firm, or has comparable management authority in some other form of organization or a government agency is not sufficient, standing alone, to satisfy this standard.

[6] Appropriate remedial action would depend on the immediacy of the involvement and the seriousness of the misconduct. The supervisor is required to intervene to prevent avoidable consequences of misconduct if the supervisor knows that the misconduct occurred. Thus, if a supervising lawyer knows that a subordinate misrepresented a matter to an opposing party in a negotiation, the supervisor as well as the subordinate has a duty to correct the resulting misapprehension.

[7] Professional misconduct by a lawyer under supervision could reveal a violation of paragraph (b) on the part of the supervisory lawyer even though it does not entail a violation of paragraph (c) because there was no direction, ratification, or knowledge of the violation.

[8] Apart from this rule and Rule 8.4(a), a lawyer does not have disciplinary liability for the conduct of a partner, associate, or subordinate. Whether a lawyer may be liable civilly or criminally for another lawyer's conduct is a question of law beyond the scope of these Rules.

[9] The duties imposed by this rule on managing and supervisory lawyers do not alter the personal duty of each lawyer in a firm to abide by the Rules of Professional Conduct. See Rule 5.2(a).

RULE 5.2 – SUBORDINATE LAWYERS

(a) A LAWYER IS BOUND BY THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT NOTWITHSTANDING THAT THE LAWYER ACTED AT THE DIRECTION OF ANOTHER PERSON.

(b) A SUBORDINATE LAWYER DOES NOT VIOLATE THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT IF THAT LAWYER ACTS IN ACCORDANCE WITH A SUPERVISORY LAWYER'S REASONABLE RESOLUTION OF AN ARGUABLE QUESTION OF PROFESSIONAL DUTY.

COMMENT

[1] Although a lawyer is not relieved of responsibility for a violation by the fact that the lawyer acted at the direction of a supervisor, that fact may be relevant in determining whether a lawyer had the knowledge required to render conduct a violation of the Rules. For example, if a subordinate filed a frivolous pleading at the direction of a supervisor, the subordinate would not be guilty of a professional violation unless the subordinate knew of the document's frivolous character.

[2] When lawyers in a supervisor-subordinate relationship encounter a matter involving professional judgment as to ethical duty, the supervisor may assume responsibility for making the judgment. Otherwise a consistent course of action or position could not be taken. If the question can reasonably be answered only one way, the duty of both lawyers is clear and they are equally responsible for fulfilling it. However, if the question is reasonably arguable, someone has to decide upon the course of action. That authority ordinarily reposes in the supervisor, and a subordinate may be guided accordingly. For example, if a question arises whether the interests of two clients conflict under Rule 1.7, the supervisor's reasonable resolution of the question should protect the subordinate professionally if the resolution is subsequently challenged.

RULE 5.3 – RESPONSIBILITIES REGARDING NONLAWYER ASSISTANTS

WITH RESPECT TO A NONLAWYER EMPLOYED OR RETAINED BY OR ASSOCIATED WITH A LAWYER:

(a) A PARTNER OR A LAWYER WHO INDIVIDUALLY OR TOGETHER WITH OTHER LAWYERS POSSESSES COMPARABLE MANAGERIAL AUTHORITY IN A LAW FIRM OR GOVERNMENT AGENCY SHALL MAKE REASONABLE EFFORTS TO ENSURE THAT THE FIRM OR AGENCY HAS IN EFFECT MEASURES GIVING REASONABLE ASSURANCE THAT THE PERSON'S CONDUCT IS COMPATIBLE WITH THE PROFESSIONAL OBLIGATIONS OF THE LAWYER;

(b) A LAWYER HAVING DIRECT SUPERVISORY AUTHORITY OVER THE NONLAWYER SHALL MAKE REASONABLE EFFORTS TO ENSURE THAT THE PERSON'S CONDUCT IS COMPATIBLE WITH THE PROFESSIONAL OBLIGATIONS OF THE LAWYER; AND

(c) A LAWYER SHALL BE RESPONSIBLE FOR CONDUCT OF SUCH A PERSON THAT WOULD BE A VIOLATION OF THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT IF ENGAGED IN BY A LAWYER IF:

(1) THE LAWYER REQUESTS OR, WITH KNOWLEDGE OF THE SPECIFIC CONDUCT, RATIFIES THE CONDUCT INVOLVED; OR

(2) THE LAWYER HAS DIRECT SUPERVISORY AUTHORITY OVER THE PERSON, OR IS A PARTNER OR A LAWYER WHO INDIVIDUALLY OR TOGETHER WITH OTHER LAWYERS POSSESS COMPARABLE MANAGERIAL AUTHORITY IN THE LAW FIRM OR GOVERNMENT AGENCY IN WHICH THE PERSON IS EMPLOYED, AND KNOWS OF THE CONDUCT AT A TIME WHEN ITS CONSEQUENCES CAN BE AVOIDED OR MITIGATED BUT FAILS TO TAKE REASONABLE REMEDIAL ACTION.

COMMENT

[1] Lawyers generally employ assistants in their practice, including secretaries, investigators, law student interns, and paraprofessionals. Such assistants, whether employees or independent contractors, act for the lawyer in rendition of the lawyer's professional services. A lawyer should give such assistants appropriate instruction and supervision concerning the ethical aspects of their employment, particularly regarding the obligation not to disclose information relating to representation of the client, and should be responsible for their work product. The measures employed in supervising should take account of the fact that they do not have legal training and are not subject to professional discipline.

[2] Just as lawyers in private practice may direct the conduct of investigators who may be independent contractors, prosecutors and other government lawyers may effectively direct the conduct of police or other governmental investigative personnel, even though they may not have, strictly speaking, formal authority to order actions by such personnel, who report to the chief of police or the head of another enforcement agency. Such prosecutors or other government lawyers have a responsibility with respect to police or investigative personnel, whose conduct they effectively direct, equivalent to that of private lawyers with respect to investigators whom they retain. See also Comments [4], [5], and [6] to Rule 5.1, in particular, the concept of what constitutes direct supervisory authority, and the significance of holding certain positions in a firm. Comments [4], [5], and [6] of Rule 5.1 apply as well to Rule 5.3.

Nonlawyers Not Associated With the Firm

[3] A lawyer may use nonlawyers not associated with the lawyer's own firm to assist the lawyer in rendering legal services to the client. Examples include the retention of an investigative or paraprofessional service, hiring a document management company to create and maintain a database for complex litigation, sending client documents to a third party for printing and scanning, and using an internet-based service to store client information. Unless directed by the client to use specified nonlawyers not associated with the firm, in using such services a lawyer must make reasonable efforts and communicate appropriate directions to ensure that the services are provided in a manner that is compatible with the lawyer's professional obligations. The extent of this obligation will depend upon the circumstances, including the education, experience and reputation of the nonlawyer; the nature of the service involved; the terms of any arrangements concerning the protection of client information; and the legal and ethical environments of the jurisdictions in which the services will be performed, particularly with regard to confidentiality. See also Rules 1.1, 1.2, 1.4, 1.6, 5.4, and 5.5.

[4] When the client directs the selection of a nonlawyer service provider not associated with the lawyer's firm, the lawyer ordinarily should reach agreement with the client about the scope of the lawyer's representation and the division of responsibility among the lawyer, the client, and the service provider. When making such a division of responsibility in a matter pending before a tribunal, lawyers and parties may have additional obligations that are a matter of law beyond the scope of these Rules. If at any time the lawyer reasonably believes that the client's direction does not contribute to the competent and ethical representation of the client or materially changes an existing agreement between the client and the lawyer or law firm, the lawyer should inform the client and may withdraw from the representation pursuant to Rule 1.16.

RULE 5.4 – PROFESSIONAL INDEPENDENCE OF A LAWYER

(a) A LAWYER OR LAW FIRM SHALL NOT SHARE LEGAL FEES WITH A NONLAWYER, EXCEPT THAT:

(1) AN AGREEMENT BY A LAWYER WITH THE LAWYER'S FIRM, PARTNER, OR ASSOCIATE MAY PROVIDE FOR THE PAYMENT OF MONEY, OVER A REASONABLE PERIOD OF TIME AFTER THE LAWYER'S DEATH, TO THE LAWYER'S ESTATE OR TO ONE OR MORE SPECIFIED PERSONS;

(2) A LAWYER WHO UNDERTAKES TO COMPLETE UNFINISHED LEGAL BUSINESS OF A DECEASED LAWYER MAY PAY TO THE ESTATE OF THE DECEASED LAWYER THAT PROPORTION OF THE TOTAL COMPENSATION WHICH FAIRLY REPRESENTS THE SERVICES RENDERED BY THE DECEASED LAWYER. A LAWYER WHO PURCHASES THE PRACTICE OF A DECEASED, DISABLED, OR DISAPPEARED LAWYER MAY, PURSUANT TO THE PROVISIONS OF RULE 1.17, PAY TO THE ESTATE OR OTHER REPRESENTATIVE OF THAT LAWYER THE AGREED-UPON PURCHASE PRICE.

(3) A LAWYER OR LAW FIRM MAY INCLUDE NONLAWYER EMPLOYEES IN A COMPENSATION OR RETIREMENT PLAN, EVEN THOUGH

THE PLAN IS BASED IN WHOLE OR IN PART ON A PROFIT-SHARING ARRANGEMENT;

(4) SHARING OF FEES IS PERMITTED IN A PARTNERSHIP OR OTHER FORM OF ORGANIZATION WHICH MEETS THE REQUIREMENTS OF PARAGRAPH (b); AND

(5) A LAWYER MAY SHARE LEGAL FEES, WHETHER AWARDED BY A TRIBUNAL OR RECEIVED IN SETTLEMENT OF A MATTER, WITH A NONPROFIT ORGANIZATION THAT EMPLOYED, RETAINED, OR RECOMMENDED EMPLOYMENT OF THE LAWYER IN THE MATTER AND THAT QUALIFIES UNDER SECTION 501(c)(3) OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE.

(b) A LAWYER MAY PRACTICE LAW IN A PARTNERSHIP OR OTHER FORM OF ORGANIZATION IN WHICH A FINANCIAL INTEREST IS HELD OR MANAGERIAL AUTHORITY IS EXERCISED BY AN INDIVIDUAL NONLAWYER WHO PERFORMS PROFESSIONAL SERVICES WHICH ASSIST THE ORGANIZATION IN PROVIDING LEGAL SERVICES TO CLIENTS, BUT ONLY IF:

(1) THE PARTNERSHIP OR ORGANIZATION HAS AS ITS SOLE PURPOSE PROVIDING LEGAL SERVICES TO CLIENTS;

(2) ALL PERSONS HAVING SUCH MANAGERIAL AUTHORITY OR HOLDING A FINANCIAL INTEREST UNDERTAKE TO ABIDE BY THESE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT;

(3) THE LAWYERS WHO HAVE A FINANCIAL INTEREST OR MANAGERIAL AUTHORITY IN THE PARTNERSHIP OR ORGANIZATION UNDERTAKE TO BE RESPONSIBLE FOR THE NONLAWYER PARTICIPANTS TO THE SAME EXTENT AS IF NONLAWYER PARTICIPANTS WERE LAWYERS UNDER RULE 5.1;

(4) THE FOREGOING CONDITIONS ARE SET FORTH IN WRITING.

(c) A LAWYER SHALL NOT PERMIT A PERSON WHO RECOMMENDS, EMPLOYS, OR PAYS THE LAWYER TO RENDER LEGAL SERVICES FOR ANOTHER TO DIRECT OR REGULATE THE LAWYER'S PROFESSIONAL JUDGMENT IN RENDERING SUCH LEGAL SERVICES.

COMMENT

[1] The provisions of this rule express traditional limitations on sharing fees with nonlawyers. (On sharing fees among lawyers not in the same firm, see Rule 1.5(e).) These limitations are to protect the lawyer's professional independence of judgment. Where someone other than the client pays the lawyer's fee or salary, or recommends employment of the lawyer, that arrangement does not modify the lawyer's obligation to the client. As stated in paragraph (c), such arrangements should not interfere with the lawyer's professional judgment.

[2] Traditionally, the canons of legal ethics and disciplinary rules prohibited lawyers from practicing law in a partnership that includes nonlawyers or in any other organization where a nonlawyer is a shareholder, director, or officer. Notwithstanding these strictures, the profession implicitly recognized exceptions for lawyers who work for corporate law departments, insurance companies, and legal service organizations.

[3] As the demand increased for a broad range of professional services from a single source, lawyers employed professionals from other disciplines to work for them. So long as the nonlawyers remained employees of the lawyers, these relationships did not violate the disciplinary rules. However, when lawyers and nonlawyers considered forming partnerships and professional corporations to provide a combination of legal and other services to the public, they faced serious obstacles under the former rules.

[4] This rule rejects an absolute prohibition against lawyers and nonlawyers joining together to provide collaborative services, but continues to impose traditional ethical requirements with respect to the organization thus created. Thus, a lawyer may practice law in an organization where nonlawyers hold a financial interest or exercise managerial authority, but only if the conditions set forth in subparagraphs (b)(1), (b)(2), and (b)(3) are satisfied, and pursuant to subparagraph (b)(4), satisfaction of these conditions is set forth in a written instrument. The requirement of a writing helps ensure that these important conditions are not overlooked in establishing the organizational structure of entities in which nonlawyers enjoy an ownership or managerial role equivalent to that of a partner in a traditional law firm.

[5] Nonlawyer participants under Rule 5.4 ought not be confused with nonlawyer assistants under Rule 5.3. Nonlawyer participants are persons having managerial authority or financial interests in organizations that provide legal services. Within such organizations, lawyers with financial interests or managerial authority are held responsible for ethical misconduct by nonlawyer participants about which the lawyers know or reasonably should know. This is the same standard of liability contemplated by Rule 5.1, regarding the responsibilities of lawyers with direct supervisory authority over other lawyers.

[6] Nonlawyer assistants under Rule 5.3 do not have managerial authority or financial interests in the organization. Lawyers having direct supervisory authority over nonlawyer assistants are held responsible only for ethical misconduct by assistants about which the lawyers actually know.

[7] As the introductory portion of paragraph (b) makes clear, the purpose of liberalizing the Rules regarding the possession of a financial interest or the exercise of management authority by a nonlawyer is to permit nonlawyer professionals to work with lawyers in the delivery of legal services without being relegated to the role of an employee. For example, the rule permits economists to work in a firm with antitrust or public utility practitioners, psychologists or psychiatric social workers to work with family law practitioners to assist in counseling clients, nonlawyer lobbyists to work with lawyers who perform legislative services, certified public accountants to work in conjunction with tax lawyers or others who use accountants' services in performing legal services, and professional managers to serve as office managers, executive directors, or in similar positions. In all of these situations, the professionals may be given financial interests or managerial responsibility, so long as all of the requirements of paragraph (c) are met.

[8] Paragraph (b) does not permit an individual or entity to acquire all or any part of the ownership of a law partnership or other form of law practice organization for investment or other purposes. It thus does not permit a corporation, an investment banking firm, an investor, or any other person or entity to entitle itself to all or any portion of the income or profits of a law firm or other similar organization. Since such an investor would not be an individual performing professional services within the law firm or other organization, the requirements of paragraph (b) would not be met.

[9] The term "individual" in subparagraph (b) is not intended to preclude the participation in a law firm or other organization by an individual professional corporation in the same manner as lawyers who have incorporated as a professional corporation currently participate in partnerships that include professional corporations.

[10] Some sharing of fees is likely to occur in the kinds of organizations permitted by paragraph (b). Subparagraph (a)(4) makes it clear that such fee sharing is not prohibited.

[11] Subparagraph (a)(5) permits a lawyer to share legal fees with a nonprofit organization that employed, retained, or recommended employment of the lawyer in the matter. A lawyer may decide to contribute all or part of legal fees recovered from the opposing party to a nonprofit organization. Such a contribution may or may not involve fee-splitting, but when it does, the prospect that the organization will obtain all or part of the lawyer's fees does not inherently compromise the lawyer's professional independence, whether the lawyer is employed by the organization or was only retained or recommended by it. A lawyer who has agreed to share legal fees with such an organization remains obligated to exercise professional judgment solely in the client's best interests. Moreover, fee-splitting in these circumstances may promote the financial viability of such nonprofit organizations and facilitate their public interest mission. Unlike the corresponding provision of Model Rule 5.4(a)(5), this provision is not limited to sharing of fees awarded by a court because that restriction would significantly interfere with settlement of cases, without significantly advancing the purpose of the exception. To prevent abuse of this broader exception, it applies only if the nonprofit organization qualifies under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code.

RULE 5.5 – UNAUTHORIZED PRACTICE

A LAWYER SHALL NOT:

(a) PRACTICE LAW IN A JURISDICTION WHERE DOING SO VIOLATES THE REGULATION OF THE LEGAL PROFESSION IN THAT JURISDICTION; OR

(b) ASSIST A PERSON WHO IS NOT A MEMBER OF THE BAR IN THE PERFORMANCE OF ACTIVITY THAT CONSTITUTES THE UNAUTHORIZED PRACTICE OF LAW.

COMMENT

[1] This rule concerns the unauthorized practice of law by District of Columbia Bar members in other jurisdictions and assistance by District of Columbia Bar members in the unauthorized practice of law by lawyers not admitted in this jurisdiction or by non-lawyers. The provisions concerning the unauthorized practice of law in the District of Columbia, including those activities in which a lawyer not admitted in the District of Columbia may and may not engage, are set forth in Rule 49 of the Rules of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

[2] The definition of the practice of law is established by law and varies from one jurisdiction to another. Whatever the definition, limiting the practice of law to members of the bar protects the public against rendition of legal services by unqualified persons. Paragraph (b) does not prohibit a lawyer from employing the services of paraprofessionals and delegating functions to them, so long as the lawyer supervises the delegated work and retains responsibility for their work. See Rule 5.3. Likewise, it does not prohibit lawyers from providing professional advice and instruction to nonlawyers whose employment requires knowledge of law; for example, claims adjusters, employees of financial or commercial institutions, social workers, accountants and persons employed in government agencies. In addition, a lawyer may counsel nonlawyers who wish to proceed pro se.

RULE 5.6 – RESTRICTIONS ON RIGHT TO PRACTICE

A LAWYER SHALL NOT PARTICIPATE IN OFFERING OR MAKING:

(a) A PARTNERSHIP, SHAREHOLDERS, OPERATING, EMPLOYMENT, OR OTHER SIMILAR TYPE OF AGREEMENT THAT RESTRICTS THE RIGHTS OF A LAWYER TO PRACTICE AFTER TERMINATION OF THE RELATIONSHIP, EXCEPT AN AGREEMENT CONCERNING BENEFITS UPON RETIREMENT; OR

(b) AN AGREEMENT IN WHICH A RESTRICTION ON THE LAWYER'S RIGHT TO PRACTICE IS PART OF THE SETTLEMENT OF A CONTROVERSY BETWEEN PARTIES.

COMMENT

[1] An agreement restricting the right of partners or associates to practice after leaving a firm not only limits their professional autonomy but also limits the freedom of clients to choose a lawyer. Paragraph (a) prohibits such agreements except for restrictions incident to provisions concerning retirement benefits for service with the firm. Whether provisions limiting benefits are retirement provisions, excepted by this rule, will depend on a number of factors. See Neuman v. Akman, 715 A.2d 127 (D.C. 1998).

[2] Restrictions, other than those concerning retirement benefits, that impose a substantial financial penalty on a lawyer who competes after leaving the firm may violate paragraph (a).

[3] Paragraph (b) prohibits a lawyer from agreeing not to represent other persons in connection with settling a claim on behalf of a client.

[4] Although a lawyer may agree to work exclusively on behalf of a single client for a given period, in light of the strong policy in favor of providing a free choice of counsel, see, e.g., Jacobson Holman PLLC v. Gentner, 244 A.3d 690, 700-03 (D.C. 2021), outside of such an exclusive relationship, a lawyer should not agree to restrictions a client seeks to place on the lawyer's ability to represent other individuals or entities whose representation is not otherwise precluded by these rules if those restrictions would unduly interfere with the general ability of clients to obtain lawyers or lawyers' ability to engage in public service or would undermine the integrity of the profession.

[5] This rule does not prohibit restrictions that may be included in the terms of the sale of a law practice pursuant to Rule 1.17.

RULE 5.7 – RESPONSIBILITIES REGARDING LAW-RELATED SERVICES

(a) A LAWYER SHALL BE SUBJECT TO THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT WITH RESPECT TO THE PROVISION OF LAW-RELATED SERVICES, AS DEFINED IN PARAGRAPH (B), IF THE LAW-RELATED SERVICES ARE PROVIDED:

(1) BY THE LAWYER IN CIRCUMSTANCES THAT ARE NOT DISTINCT FROM THE LAWYER'S PROVISION OF LEGAL SERVICES TO CLIENTS; OR

(2) IN OTHER CIRCUMSTANCES BY AN ENTITY CONTROLLED BY THE LAWYER INDIVIDUALLY OR WITH OTHERS IF THE LAWYER FAILS TO TAKE REASONABLE MEASURES TO ASSURE THAT A PERSON OBTAINING THE LAW-RELATED SERVICES KNOWS THAT THE SERVICES ARE NOT LEGAL SERVICES AND THAT THE PROTECTIONS OF THE CLIENT-LAWYER RELATIONSHIP DO NOT EXIST.

(b) THE TERM LAW-RELATED SERVICES DENOTES SERVICES THAT MIGHT REASONABLY BE PERFORMED IN CONJUNCTION WITH AND IN SUBSTANCE ARE RELATED TO THE PROVISION OF LEGAL SERVICES, AND THAT ARE NOT PROHIBITED AS UNAUTHORIZED PRACTICE OF LAW WHEN PROVIDED BY A NONLAWYER.

COMMENT

[1] When a lawyer performs law-related services or controls an organization that does so, there exists the potential for ethical problems. Principal among these is the possibility that the person for whom the law-related services are performed fails to understand that the services may not carry with them the protections normally afforded as part of the client-lawyer relationship. The recipient of the law-related services may expect, for example, that the protection of client confidences, prohibitions against representation of persons with conflicting interests, and obligations of a lawyer to maintain professional independence apply to the provision of law-related services when that may not be the case.

[2] Rule 5.7 applies to the provision of law-related services by a lawyer even when the lawyer does not provide any legal services to the person for whom the law-related services are performed and whether the law-related services are performed through a law firm or a separate entity. The rule identifies the circumstances in which all the Rules of Professional Conduct apply to the provision of law-related services. Even when those circumstances do not exist, however, the conduct of a lawyer involved in the provision of law-related services is subject to those Rules that apply generally to lawyer conduct, regardless of whether the conduct involves the provision of legal services. See, e.g., Rule 8.4.

[3] When law-related services are provided by a lawyer under circumstances that are not distinct from the lawyer's provision of legal services to clients, the lawyer in providing the law-related services must adhere to the requirements of the Rules of Professional Conduct as provided in paragraph (a)

(1). Even when the law-related and legal services are provided in circumstances that are distinct from each other, for example through separate entities or different support staff within the law firm, the Rules of Professional Conduct apply to the lawyer as provided in paragraph (a)(2) unless the lawyer takes reasonable measures to assure that the recipient of the law-related services knows that the services are not legal services and that the protections of the client-lawyer relationship do not apply.

[4] Law-related services also may be provided through an entity that is distinct from that through which the lawyer provides legal services. If the lawyer individually or with others has control of such an entity's operations, the rule requires the lawyer to take reasonable measures to assure that each person using the services of the entity knows that the services provided by the entity are not legal services and that the Rules of Professional Conduct that relate to the client-lawyer relationship do not apply. A lawyer's control of an entity extends to the ability to direct its operation. Whether a lawyer has such control will depend upon the circumstances of the particular case.

[5] When a client-lawyer relationship exists with a person who is referred by a lawyer to a separate law-related service entity controlled by the lawyer, individually or with others, the lawyer must comply with Rule 1.8(a).

[6] In taking the reasonable measures referred to in paragraph (a)(2) to assure that a person using law-related services understands the practical effect or significance of the inapplicability of the Rules of Professional Conduct, the lawyer should communicate to the person receiving the law-related services, in a manner sufficient to assure that the person understands the significance of the fact, that the relationship of the person to the business entity will not be a client-lawyer relationship. The communication should be made before entering into an agreement for provision of or providing law-related services, and preferably should be in writing.

[7] The burden is upon the lawyer to show that the lawyer has taken reasonable measures under the circumstances to communicate the desired understanding. For instance, a sophisticated user of law-related services, such as a publicly held corporation, may require a lesser explanation than someone unaccustomed to making distinctions between legal services and law-related services, such as an individual seeking tax advice from a lawyer-accountant or investigative services in connection with a lawsuit.

[8] Regardless of the sophistication of potential recipients of law-related services, a lawyer should take special care to keep separate the provision of law-related and legal services in order to minimize the risk that the recipient will assume that the law-related services are legal services. The risk of such confusion is especially acute when the lawyer renders both types of services with respect to the same matter. Under some circumstances the legal and law-related services may be so closely entwined that they cannot be distinguished from each other, and the requirement of disclosure and consultation imposed by paragraph (a)(2) of the rule cannot be met. In such a case a lawyer will be responsible for assuring that both the lawyer's conduct and, to the extent required by Rule 5.3, that of nonlawyer employees in the distinct entity that the lawyer controls complies in all respects with the Rules of Professional Conduct.

[9] A broad range of economic and other interests of clients may be served by lawyers engaging in the delivery of law-related services. Examples of law-related services include providing title insurance, financial planning, accounting, trust services, real estate counseling, legislative lobbying, economic analysis, social work, psychological counseling, tax preparation, and patent, medical or environmental consulting.

[10] When a lawyer is obliged to accord the recipients of such services the protections of those Rules that apply to the client-lawyer relationship, the lawyer must take special care to heed the proscriptions of the Rules addressing conflict of interest (Rules 1.7 through 1.11, especially Rules 1.7(b)(2)-(4) and 1.8(a) and (e)), and to scrupulously adhere to the requirements of Rule 1.6 relating to disclosure and use of confidential information. See also Comment [26] to Rule 1.7. The promotion of the law-related services must also in all respects comply with Rule 7.1, dealing with advertising and solicitation. In that regard, lawyers should take special care to identify the obligations that may be imposed as a result of a jurisdiction decisional law. Rule 1.8 addresses a lawyer's provision of non-law-related services to a client.

[11] When the full protections of all the Rules of Professional Conduct do not apply to the provision of law-related services, principles of law external to the Rules, for example, the law of principal and agent, govern the legal duties owed to those receiving the services. Those other legal principles may establish a different degree of protection for the recipient with respect to confidentiality of information, conflicts of interest and permissible business relationships with clients. Rule 5.7 does not limit the protection provided by any other Rule, including but not limited to Rule 8.4, which prohibits, among other things, conduct involving dishonesty or fraud whether or not the lawyer engages in such conduct in connection with the rendering of law-related services.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RULE 6.1 – PRO BONO PUBLICO SERVICE

A LAWYER SHOULD PARTICIPATE IN SERVING THOSE PERSONS, OR GROUPS OF PERSONS, WHO ARE UNABLE TO PAY ALL OR A PORTION OF REASONABLE ATTORNEY'S FEES OR WHO ARE OTHERWISE UNABLE TO OBTAIN COUNSEL. A LAWYER MAY DISCHARGE THIS RESPONSIBILITY BY PROVIDING PROFESSIONAL SERVICES AT NO FEE, OR AT A SUBSTANTIALLY REDUCED FEE, TO PERSONS AND GROUPS WHO ARE UNABLE TO AFFORD OR OBTAIN COUNSEL, OR BY ACTIVE PARTICIPATION IN THE WORK OF ORGANIZATIONS THAT PROVIDE LEGAL SERVICES TO THEM. WHEN PERSONAL REPRESENTATION IS NOT FEASIBLE, A LAWYER MAY DISCHARGE THIS RESPONSIBILITY BY PROVIDING FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR ORGANIZATIONS THAT PROVIDE LEGAL REPRESENTATION TO THOSE UNABLE TO OBTAIN COUNSEL.

COMMENT

[1] This rule reflects the long-standing ethical principle underlying Canon 2 of the previous Code of Professional Responsibility that "A lawyer should assist the legal profession in fulfilling its duty to make legal counsel available." The rule incorporates the legal profession's historical commitment to the principle that all persons in our society should be able to obtain necessary legal services. The rule also recognizes that the rights and responsibilities of individuals and groups in the United States are increasingly defined in legal terms and that, as a consequence, legal assistance in coping with the web of statutes, rules, and regulations is imperative for persons of modest and limited means, as well as for the relatively well-to-do. The rule also recognizes that a lawyer's pro bono services are sometimes needed to assert or defend public rights belonging to the public generally where no individual or group can afford to pay for the services.

[2] This rule carries forward the ethical precepts set forth in the Code. Specifically, the rule recognizes that the basic responsibility for providing legal services for those unable to pay ultimately rests upon the individual lawyer, and that every lawyer, regardless of professional prominence or professional work load, should find time to participate in or otherwise support the provision of legal services to the disadvantaged.

[3] The rule also acknowledges that while the provision of free legal services to those unable to pay reasonable fees continues to be an obligation of each lawyer as well as the profession generally, the efforts of individual lawyers are often not enough to meet the need. Thus, it has been necessary for the profession and government to institute additional programs to provide legal services. Accordingly, legal aid offices, lawyer referral services, and other related programs have been developed, and others will be developed by the profession and government. Every lawyer should support all proper efforts to meet this need for legal services. A lawyer also should not refuse a request from a court or bar association to undertake representation of a person unable to obtain counsel except for compelling reasons such as those listed in Rule 6.2.

[4] This rule expresses the profession's traditional commitment to make legal counsel available, but it is not intended that the rule be enforced through disciplinary process. Neither is it intended to place any obligation on a government lawyer that is inconsistent with laws such as 18 U.S.C. §§ 203 and 205 limiting the scope of permissible employment or representational activities.

[5] In determining their responsibilities under this rule, lawyers admitted to practice in the District of Columbia should be guided by the Resolutions on Pro Bono Services passed by the Judicial Conferences of the District of Columbia and the D.C. Circuit as amended from time to time. Those resolutions as adopted in 2009 and 2010, respectively, call on members of the D.C. Bar, at a minimum, each year to (1) accept one court appointment, (2) provide 50 hours of pro bono legal service, or (3) when personal representation is not feasible, contribute the lesser of $750 or 1 percent of earned income to a legal assistance organization that services the community's economically disadvantaged, including pro bono referral and appointment offices sponsored by the Bar and the courts.

[6] Law firms and other organizations employing lawyers should act reasonably to enable and encourage all lawyers in the organization to provide the pro bono legal services called for by this rule.

RULE 6.2 – ACCEPTING APPOINTMENTS

A LAWYER SHALL NOT SEEK TO AVOID APPOINTMENT BY A TRIBUNAL TO REPRESENT A PERSON EXCEPT FOR GOOD CAUSE, SUCH AS:

(a) REPRESENTING THE CLIENT IS LIKELY TO RESULT IN VIOLATION OF THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT OR OTHER LAW;

(b) REPRESENTING THE CLIENT IS LIKELY TO RESULT IN A SUBSTANTIAL AND UNREASONABLE BURDEN ON THE LAWYER; OR

(c) THE CLIENT OR THE CAUSE IS SO REPUGNANT TO THE LAWYER AS TO BE LIKELY TO IMPAIR THE CLIENT-LAWYER RELATIONSHIP OR THE LAWYER'S ABILITY TO REPRESENT THE CLIENT.

COMMENT

[1] A lawyer ordinarily is not obliged to accept a client whose character or cause the lawyer regards as repugnant. The lawyer's freedom to select clients is, however, qualified. All lawyers have a responsibility to assist in providing pro bono public service. See Rule 6.1. An individual lawyer fulfills this responsibility by accepting a fair share of unpopular matters or indigent or unpopular clients. A lawyer may also be subject to appointment by a court to serve unpopular clients or persons unable to afford legal services.

Appointed Counsel

[2] For good cause a lawyer may seek to decline an appointment to represent a person who cannot afford to retain counsel or whose cause is unpopular. Good cause exists if the lawyer could not handle the matter competently, see Rule 1.1, or if undertaking the representation would result in an improper conflict of interest; for example, when the client or the cause is so repugnant to the lawyer as to be likely to impair the client-lawyer relationship or the lawyer's ability to represent the client. A lawyer may also seek to decline an appointment if acceptance would be substantially and unreasonably burdensome, such as when it would impose a financial sacrifice so great as to be unjust.

[3] An appointed lawyer has the same obligations to the client as retained counsel, including the obligations of loyalty and confidentiality, and is subject to the same limitations on the client-lawyer relationship, such as the obligation to refrain from assisting the client in violation of the Rules.

RULE 6.3 – MEMBERSHIP IN LEGAL SERVICES ORGANIZATION

A LAWYER MAY SERVE AS A DIRECTOR, OFFICER, OR MEMBER OF A LEGAL SERVICES ORGANIZATION, APART FROM THE LAW FIRM IN WHICH THE LAWYER PRACTICES, NOTWITHSTANDING THAT THE ORGANIZATION SERVES PERSONS HAVING INTERESTS ADVERSE TO A CLIENT OF THE LAWYER. THE LAWYER SHALL NOT KNOWINGLY PARTICIPATE IN A DECISION OR ACTION OF THE ORGANIZATION:

(a) IF PARTICIPATING IN THE DECISION WOULD BE INCOMPATIBLE WITH THE LAWYER'S OBLIGATIONS TO A CLIENT UNDER RULE 1.7; OR

(b) WHERE THE DECISION COULD HAVE A MATERIAL ADVERSE EFFECT ON THE REPRESENTATION OF A CLIENT OF THE ORGANIZATION WHOSE INTERESTS ARE ADVERSE TO A CLIENT OF THE LAWYER.

COMMENT

[1] Lawyers should be encouraged to support and participate in legal service organizations. A lawyer who is an officer or a member of such an organization does not thereby have a client-lawyer relationship with persons served by the organization. However, there is potential conflict between the interests of such persons and the interests of the lawyer's clients. If the possibility of such conflict disqualified a lawyer from serving on the board of a legal services organization, the profession's involvement in such organizations would be severely curtailed.

[2] It may be necessary in appropriate cases to reassure a client of the organization that the representation will not be affected by conflicting loyalties of a member of the board. Established, written policies in this respect can enhance the credibility of such assurances.

RULE 6.4 – LAW REFORM ACTIVITIES AFFECTING CLIENT INTERESTS

(a) A LAWYER SHOULD ASSIST IN IMPROVING THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE. A LAWYER MAY DISCHARGE THIS REQUIREMENT BY RENDERING SERVICES IN ACTIVITIES FOR IMPROVING THE LAW, THE LEGAL SYSTEM, OR THE LEGAL PROFESSION.

(b) A LAWYER MAY SERVE AS A DIRECTOR, OFFICER, OR MEMBER OF AN ORGANIZATION INVOLVED IN REFORM OF THE LAW OR ITS ADMINISTRATION NOTWITHSTANDING THAT THE REFORM MAY AFFECT THE INTERESTS OF A CLIENT OF THE LAWYER. WHEN THE LAWYER KNOWS THAT THE INTERESTS OF A CLIENT MAY BE MATERIALLY BENEFITED BY A DECISION IN WHICH THE LAWYER PARTICIPATES, THE LAWYER SHALL DISCLOSE THAT FACT BUT NEED NOT IDENTIFY THE CLIENT.

COMMENT

[1] Changes in human affairs and imperfections in human institutions make necessary constant efforts to maintain and improve our legal system. This system should function in a manner that commands public respect and fosters the use of legal remedies to achieve redress of grievances. By reason of education and experience, lawyers are especially qualified to recognize deficiencies in the legal system and to initiate corrective measures therein. Thus, they should participate in proposing and supporting legislation and programs to improve the system, without regard to the general interests or desires of clients or former clients. Rules of law are deficient if they are not just, understandable, and responsive to the needs of society. If a lawyer believes that the existence or absence of a rule of law, substantive or procedural, causes or contributes to an unjust result, the lawyer should endeavor by lawful means to obtain appropriate changes in the law. This rule expresses the policy underlying Canon 8 of the previous Code of Professional Responsibility that "A lawyer should assist in improving the legal system," but it is not intended that it be enforced through disciplinary process.

[2] Lawyers involved in organizations seeking law reform generally do not have a client-lawyer relationship with the organization. Otherwise, it might follow that a lawyer could not be involved in a bar association law reform program that might indirectly affect a client. See also Rule 1.2(b). For example, a lawyer specializing in antitrust litigation might be regarded as disqualified from participating in drafting revisions of rules governing that subject. In determining the nature and scope of participation in such activities, a lawyer should be mindful of obligations to clients under other Rules, particularly Rule 1.7. A lawyer is professionally obligated to protect the integrity of the program by making an appropriate disclosure within the organization when the lawyer knows a private client might be materially benefited.

RULE 6.5 – NONPROFIT AND COURT-ANNEXED LIMITED LEGAL SERVICES PROGRAMS

(a) A LAWYER WHO, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF A PROGRAM SPONSORED BY A NONPROFIT ORGANIZATION OR COURT, PROVIDES SHORT-TERM LIMITED LEGAL SERVICES TO A CLIENT WITHOUT EXPECTATION BY EITHER THE LAWYER OR THE CLIENT THAT THE LAWYER WILL PROVIDE CONTINUING REPRESENTATION IN THE MATTER:

(1) IS SUBJECT TO RULES 1.7 AND 1.9 ONLY IF THE LAWYER KNOWS THAT THE REPRESENTATION OF THE CLIENT INVOLVES A CONFLICT OF INTEREST; AND

(2) IS SUBJECT TO RULE 1.10 ONLY IF THE LAWYER KNOWS THAT ANOTHER LAWYER ASSOCIATED WITH THE LAWYER IN A LAW FIRM IS DISQUALIFIED BY RULE 1.7 OR 1.9 WITH RESPECT TO THE MATTER.

(b) EXCEPT AS PROVIDED IN PARAGRAPH (a)(2), RULE 1.10 IS INAPPLICABLE TO A REPRESENTATION GOVERNED BY THIS RULE.

COMMENT

[1] Legal services organizations, courts, and various nonprofit organizations have established programs through which lawyers provide short-term limited legal services, such as advice or the completion of legal forms, that will assist persons to address their legal problems without further representation by a lawyer. In these programs, such as legal-advice hotlines, advice-only clinics or pro se counseling programs, a client-lawyer relationship is established, but there is no expectation that the lawyer's representation of the client will continue beyond the limited consultation. Such programs are normally operated under circumstances in which it is not feasible for a lawyer to systematically screen for conflicts of interest as is generally required before undertaking a representation. See, e.g., Rules 1.7, 1.9 and 1.10. For the purposes of this rule, short-term limited legal services normally do not include appearing before a tribunal on behalf of a client.

[2] A lawyer who provides short-term limited legal services pursuant to this rule must secure the client's informed consent to the limited scope of the representation. See Rule 1.2(c). If a short-term limited representation would not be reasonable under the circumstances, the lawyer may offer advice to the client but must also advise the client of the need for further assistance of counsel. Except as provided in this rule, the Rules of Professional Conduct, including Rule 1.6, are applicable to the limited representation.

[3] Because a lawyer who is representing a client in the circumstances addressed by this rule ordinarily is not able to check systematically for conflicts of interest, paragraph (a) requires compliance with Rules 1.7 or 1.9 only if the lawyer knows that the representation presents a conflict of interest for the lawyer, and with Rule 1.10 only if the lawyer knows that another lawyer in the lawyer's firm is disqualified by Rules 1.7 or 1.9 in the matter.

[4] Because the limited nature of the services significantly reduces the risk of conflicts of interest with other matters being handled by the lawyer's firm, paragraph (b) provides that Rule 1.10 is inapplicable to a representation governed by this rule except as provided by paragraph (a)(2). Paragraph (a)(2) requires the participating lawyer to comply with Rule 1.10 when the lawyer knows that the lawyer's firm is disqualified by Rules 1.7 or 1.9. By virtue of paragraph (b), however, a lawyer's participation in a short-term limited legal services program will not preclude the lawyer's firm from undertaking or continuing the representation of a client with interests adverse to a client being represented under the program's auspices. Nor will the personal disqualification of a lawyer participating in the program be imputed to other lawyers participating in the program.

[5] If, after commencing a short-term limited representation in accordance with this rule, a lawyer undertakes to represent the client in the matter on an ongoing basis, Rules 1.7, 1.9 and 1.10 become applicable.

[6] This rule serves the public interest by making it easier for lawyers affiliated with firms to provide pro bono legal services. Rule 1.10(e) contains a similarly-motivated exception from imputation for attorneys who, while affiliated with a firm, assist the District of Columbia Attorney General with certain matters.

AMENDMENTS TO RULE 6: PUBLIC SERVICE

RULE 6.1 (PRO BONO PUBLICO SERVICE)

Comment [5] was revised to reflect more recent resolutions on Pro Bono Services passed by the Judicial Conferences of the District of Columbia (2009) and District of Columbia Circuit (2010), to call on members of the D.C. Bar, at a minimum, to (1) accept one court appointment, (2) provide 50 hours (up from 40) of pro bono legal service, or (3) when personal representation is not feasible, to contribute the lesser of $750 (up from $400) or 1 percent of earned income to a legal assistance organization that services the community's economically disadvantaged, including pro bono referral and appointment offices sponsored by the Bar and the courts.

INFORMATION ABOUT LEGAL SERVICES

RULE 7.1 – COMMUNICATIONS CONCERNING A LAWYER'S SERVICES

(a) A LAWYER SHALL NOT MAKE A FALSE OR MISLEADING COMMUNICATION ABOUT THE LAWYER OR THE LAWYER'S SERVICES. A COMMUNICATION IS FALSE OR MISLEADING IF IT:

> (1) CONTAINS A MATERIAL MISREPRESENTATION OF FACT OR LAW, OR OMITS A FACT NECESSARY TO MAKE THE STATEMENT CONSIDERED AS A WHOLE NOT MATERIALLY MISLEADING; OR
> (2) CONTAINS AN ASSERTION ABOUT THE LAWYER OR THE LAWYER'S SERVICES THAT CANNOT BE SUBSTANTIATED.

(b) A LAWYER SHALL NOT SEEK BY IN-PERSON CONTACT, EMPLOYMENT (OR EMPLOYMENT OF A PARTNER OR ASSOCIATE) BY A NONLAWYER WHO HAS NOT SOUGHT THE LAWYER'S ADVICE REGARDING EMPLOYMENT OF A LAWYER, IF:

> (2) THE SOLICITATION INVOLVES THE USE OF COERCION, DURESS OR HARASSMENT; OR
> (3) THE POTENTIAL CLIENT IS APPARENTLY IN A PHYSICAL OR MENTAL CONDITION WHICH WOULD MAKE IT UNLIKELY THAT THE POTENTIAL CLIENT COULD EXERCISE REASONABLE, CONSIDERED JUDGMENT AS TO THE SELECTION OF A LAWYER.

(c) A LAWYER SHALL NOT PAY MONEY OR GIVE ANYTHING OF MATERIAL VALUE TO A PERSON (OTHER THAN THE LAWYER'S PARTNER OR EMPLOYEE) IN EXCHANGE FOR RECOMMENDING THE LAWYER'S SERVICES EXCEPT THAT A LAWYER MAY:

> (1) PAY THE REASONABLE COSTS OF ADVERTISEMENTS OR COMMUNICATIONS PERMITTED BY THIS RULE;
> (3) PAY FOR A LAW PRACTICE IN ACCORDANCE WITH RULE 1.17; AND
> (4) REFER CLIENTS TO ANOTHER LAWYER OR NONLAWYER PROFESSIONAL PURSUANT TO AN AGREEMENT NOT OTHERWISE PROHIBITED UNDER THESE RULES THAT PROVIDES FOR THE OTHER PERSON TO REFER CLIENTS OR CUSTOMERS TO THE LAWYER, IF:
> > (A) THE RECIPROCAL AGREEMENT IS NOT EXCLUSIVE, AND
> > (B) THE CLIENT IS INFORMED OF THE EXISTENCE AND NATURE OF THE AGREEMENT.

(d) A LAWYER SHALL NOT KNOWINGLY ASSIST AN ORGANIZATION THAT FURNISHES OR PAYS FOR LEGAL SERVICES TO OTHERS TO PROMOTE THE USE OF THE LAWYER'S SERVICES OR THOSE OF THE LAWYER'S PARTNER OR ASSOCIATE, OR ANY OTHER LAWYER AFFILIATED WITH THE LAWYER OR THE LAWYER'S FIRM, AS A PRIVATE PRACTITIONER, IF THE PROMOTIONAL ACTIVITY INVOLVES THE USE OF COERCION, DURESS, COMPULSION, INTIMIDATION, THREATS, OR VEXATIOUS OR HARASSING CONDUCT.

(e) NO LAWYER OR ANY PERSON ACTING ON BEHALF OF A LAWYER SHALL SOLICIT OR INVITE OR SEEK TO SOLICIT ANY PERSON FOR PURPOSES OF REPRESENTING THAT PERSON FOR A FEE PAID BY OR ON BEHALF OF A CLIENT OR UNDER THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT, D.C. CODE ANN. §11-2601 (2001) ET SEQ., IN ANY PRESENT OR FUTURE CASE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURTHOUSE, ON THE SIDEWALKS ON THE NORTH, SOUTH, AND WEST SIDES OF THE COURTHOUSE, OR WITHIN 50 FEET OF THE BUILDING ON THE EAST SIDE.

(f) ANY LAWYER OR PERSON ACTING ON BEHALF OF A LAWYER WHO SOLICITS OR INVITES OR SEEKS TO SOLICIT ANY PERSON INCARCERATED AT THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA JAIL, THE CORRECTIONAL TREATMENT FACILITY OR ANY DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA JUVENILE DETENTION

FACILITY FOR THE PURPOSE OF REPRESENTING THAT PERSON FOR A FEE PAID BY OR ON BEHALF OF THAT PERSON OR UNDER THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT, D.C. CODE ANN. §11-2601 (2001) ET SEQ., IN ANY THEN-PENDING CRIMINAL CASE IN WHICH THAT PERSON IS REPRESENTED, MUST PROVIDE TIMELY AND ADEQUATE NOTICE TO THE PERSON'S THEN-CURRENT LAWYER PRIOR TO ACCEPTING ANY FEE FROM OR ON BEHALF OF THE INCARCERATED PERSON.

COMMENT

[1] This rule governs all communications about a lawyer's services, including advertising. It is especially important that statements about a lawyer or the lawyer's services be accurate, since many members of the public lack detailed knowledge of legal matters. Certain advertisements such as those that describe the amount of a damage award, the lawyer's record in obtaining favorable verdicts, or those containing client endorsements, unless suitably qualified, have a capacity to mislead by creating an unjustified expectation that similar results can be obtained for others. Advertisements comparing the lawyer's services with those of other lawyers are false or misleading if the claims made cannot be substantiated.

Advertising

[2] To assist the public in obtaining legal services, lawyers should be allowed to make known their services not only through reputation but also through organized information campaigns in the form of advertising. Advertising involves an active quest for clients, contrary to the tradition that a lawyer should not seek clientele. However, the public's need to know about legal services can be fulfilled in part through advertising. This need is particularly acute in the case of persons of limited means who have not made extensive use of legal services. The interest in expanding public information about legal services ought to prevail over considerations of tradition.

[3] This rule permits public dissemination of information concerning a lawyer's name or firm name, address, and telephone number; the kinds of services the lawyer will undertake; the basis on which the lawyer's fees are determined, including prices for specific services and payment and credit arrangements; a lawyer's foreign language ability; names of references and, with their consent, names of clients regularly represented; and other information that might invite the attention of those seeking legal assistance.

[4] Questions of effectiveness and taste in advertising are matters of speculation and subjective judgment. Some jurisdictions have rules regulating the type and content of advertising by lawyers that go beyond prohibitions against false or misleading statements. Such regulations create unneeded barriers to the flow of information about lawyers' services to persons needing such services, and so this rule subjects advertising by lawyers only to the requirement that it not be false or misleading.

[5] There is no significant distinction between disseminating information and soliciting clients through mass media or through individual personal contact. In-person solicitation (which would include telephone contact but not electronic mail) can, however, create problems because of the particular circumstances in which the solicitation takes place. This rule prohibits in-person solicitation in circumstances or through means that are not conducive to intelligent, rational decisions. Such circumstances and means could be the harassment of early morning or late night telephone calls to a prospective client to solicit legal work, or repeated calls at any time of day, and solicitation of an accident victim or the victim's family shortly after the accident or while the victim is still in medical distress. A lawyer is no longer permitted to conduct in-person solicitation through the use of a paid intermediary, i.e., a person who is neither the lawyer's partner (as defined in Rule 1.0(i)) nor employee (see Rule 5.3) and who is compensated for such services. This prohibition represents a change in Rule 7.1(b), which had previously authorized payments to intermediaries for recommending a lawyer. Experience under the former provision showed it to be unnecessary and subject to abuse. See Rules 5.3, 8.4(a), and 8.4(c) regarding a lawyer's responsibility for abusive or deceptive solicitation of a client by the lawyer's employee.

[6] Rule 7.1(c) does not address fee splitting between two or more firms representing the same client in the same project. Compare Rule 1.5(e). Lawyers must also be aware of their obligation to maintain their professional independence under Rule 5.4

[7] A lawyer may agree to refer clients to another lawyer or a nonlawyer professional, in return for the undertaking of that person to refer clients or customers to the lawyer. Such reciprocal referral arrangements must not interfere with the lawyer's professional judgment as to making referrals or as to providing substantive legal services. See Rules 2.1 and 5.4(c). Except as provided in Rule 1.5(e), a lawyer who receives referrals from a lawyer or nonlawyer professional must not pay money or give anything of material value solely for the referral, but the lawyer does not violate paragraph (c) of this Rule by agreeing to refer clients to the other lawyer or nonlawyer professional, so long as the reciprocal referral agreement is not exclusive and the client is informed of the referral agreement. Conflicts of interest created by such arrangements are governed by Rule 1.7. Reciprocal referral agreements should not be of indefinite duration and should be reviewed periodically to determine whether they comply with these Rules. This Rule does not restrict referrals or divisions of revenues or net income among lawyers within firms comprised of multiple entities.

Payments for Advertising

[8] A lawyer is allowed to pay for advertising or marketing permitted by this rule. Likewise, a lawyer may participate in lawyer referral programs and pay the usual fees charged by such programs.

Solicitations in the Vicinity of the District of Columbia Courthouse

[9] Paragraph (e) is designed to prohibit unseemly solicitations of prospective clients in and around the District of Columbia Courthouse. The words "for a fee paid by or on behalf of a client or under the Criminal Justice Act" have been added to paragraph (e) as it was originally promulgated by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals in 1982. The purpose of the addition is to permit solicitation in the District of Columbia Courthouse for the purposes of pro bono representation. For the purposes of this rule, pro bono representation, whether by individual lawyers or nonprofit organizations, is representation undertaken primarily for purposes other than a fee. That representation includes providing services free of charge for individuals who may be in need of legal assistance and may lack the financial means and sophistication necessary to have alternative sources of aid. Cases where fees are awarded under the Criminal Justice Act do not constitute pro bono representation for the purposes of this rule. However, the possibility that fees may be awarded under the Equal Access to Justice Act and Civil Rights Attorneys' Fees Awards Act of 1976, as amended, or other statutory attorney fee statutes, does not prevent representation from constituting pro bono representation.

Solicitations of Inmates

[10] Paragraph (f) is designed to address the vulnerability of incarcerated persons to lawyers seeking fee-paying representations. It applies only to situations where the incarcerated person has not initiated contact with the lawyer. In such situations, the lawyer may have contact with the individual but may not accept a fee unless and until timely notice is provided to current counsel for such incarcerated person.

RULE 7.5 – FIRM NAMES AND LETTERHEADS

(a) A LAWYER SHALL NOT USE A FIRM NAME, LETTERHEAD, OR OTHER PROFESSIONAL DESIGNATION THAT VIOLATES RULE 7.1. A TRADE NAME MAY BE USED BY A LAWYER IN PRIVATE PRACTICE IF IT DOES NOT IMPLY A CONNECTION WITH A GOVERNMENT AGENCY OR WITH A PUBLIC OR CHARITABLE LEGAL SERVICES ORGANIZATION AND IS NOT OTHERWISE IN VIOLATION OF RULE 7.1.

(b) A LAW FIRM WITH OFFICES IN MORE THAN ONE JURISDICTION MAY USE THE SAME NAME OR OTHER PROFESSIONAL DESIGNATION IN EACH JURISDICTION, BUT IDENTIFICATION OF THE LAWYERS IN AN OFFICE OF THE FIRM SHALL INDICATE THE JURISDICTIONAL LIMITATIONS ON THOSE NOT LICENSED TO PRACTICE IN THE JURISDICTION WHERE THE OFFICE IS LOCATED.

(c) THE NAME OF A LAWYER HOLDING A PUBLIC OFFICE SHALL NOT BE USED IN THE NAME OF A LAW FIRM, OR IN COMMUNICATIONS ON ITS BEHALF, DURING ANY SUBSTANTIAL PERIOD IN WHICH THE LAWYER IS NOT ACTIVELY AND REGULARLY PRACTICING WITH THE FIRM.

(d) LAWYERS MAY STATE OR IMPLY THAT THEY PRACTICE IN A PARTNERSHIP OR OTHER ORGANIZATION ONLY WHEN THAT IS THE FACT.

COMMENT

[1] A firm may be designated by the names of all or some of its members, by the names of deceased members where there has been a continuing succession in the firm's identity, or by a trade name such as the "ABC Legal Clinic." A lawyer or law firm may also be designated by a distinctive website address or comparable professional designation. Although the United States Supreme Court has held that legislation may prohibit the use of trade names in professional practice, use of such names in law practice is acceptable so long as it is not misleading. If a private firm uses a trade name that includes a geographical name such as "Springfield Legal Clinic," an express disclaimer that it is a public legal aid agency may be required to avoid a misleading implication. It may be observed that any firm name including the name of a deceased partner is, strictly speaking, a trade name. The use of such names to designate law firms has proven a useful means of identification. However, it is misleading to use the name of a lawyer not associated with the firm or a predecessor of the firm. It is also misleading to continue to use the name of a lawyer formerly associated with the firm who currently is practicing elsewhere. See D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 277.

[2] With regard to paragraph (d), lawyers sharing office facilities, but who are not in fact associated with each other in a law firm, may not denominate themselves as, for example, "Smith and Jones," for that title suggests that they are practicing law together in a firm.

AMENDMENTS TO RULE 7: INFORMATION ABOUT LEGAL SERVICES

RULE 7.1 (COMMUNICATIONS CONCERNING A LAWYER'S SERVICES)

Rule 7.1 and its comments were amended to prohibit the payment of referral fees. Lawyers are still permitted to pay the usual and reasonable fees of a lawyer referral service and may still share fees with other lawyers under Rule 1.5(e). These changes restore the approach the District of Columbia used prior to the 1991 adoption of a rule allowing the use of paid intermediaries or "runners," which was repealed in 2007. (10/8/15)

MAINTAINING THE INTEGRITY OF THE PROFESSION

RULE 8.1 – BAR ADMISSION AND DISCIPLINARY MATTERS

AN APPLICANT FOR ADMISSION TO THE BAR, OR A LAWYER IN CONNECTION WITH A BAR ADMISSION APPLICATION OR IN CONNECTION WITH A DISCIPLINARY MATTER, SHALL NOT:

(a) KNOWINGLY MAKE A FALSE STATEMENT OF FACT; OR

(b) FAIL TO DISCLOSE A FACT NECESSARY TO CORRECT A MISAPPREHENSION KNOWN BY THE LAWYER OR APPLICANT TO HAVE ARISEN IN THE MATTER, OR KNOWINGLY FAIL TO RESPOND REASONABLY TO A LAWFUL DEMAND FOR INFORMATION FROM AN ADMISSIONS OR DISCIPLINARY AUTHORITY, EXCEPT THAT THIS RULE DOES NOT REQUIRE DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION OTHERWISE PROTECTED BY RULE 1.6.

COMMENT

[1] The duty imposed by this rule extends to persons seeking admission to the Bar as well as to lawyers. Hence, if a person knowingly makes a false statement of fact in connection with an application for admission, it may be the basis for subsequent disciplinary action if the person is admitted, and in any event may be relevant in a subsequent admission application. Lack of materiality does not excuse a knowingly false statement of fact. The duty imposed by this rule applies to a lawyer's own admission or discipline as well as that of others. Thus, it is a separate professional offense for a lawyer knowingly to make a misrepresentation or omission in connection with a disciplinary investigation of the lawyer's own conduct. Paragraph (b) of this rule also requires correction of any prior factual misstatement in the matter that the lawyer or applicant may have made, including affirmative clarification of any factual misunderstanding on the part of the admissions or disciplinary authority of which the person involved becomes aware.

[2] This rule is subject to the provisions of the Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution and corresponding provisions of state constitutions. A person relying on such a provision in response to a question, however, should do so openly and not use the right of nondisclosure as a justification for failure to comply with this rule.

[3] A lawyer representing an applicant for admission to the Bar, or representing a lawyer who is the subject of a disciplinary inquiry or proceeding, is governed by the Rules applicable to the client-lawyer relationship. For example, Rule 1.6 may prohibit disclosures, which would otherwise be required, by a lawyer serving in such representative capacity. Information that is a client confidence or secret under Rule 1.6 is "protected by Rule 1.6" within the meaning of Rule 8.1(b), even if a permissive disclosure option applies. Rule 1.6(c), (d), and (e) describe circumstances in which a lawyer may reveal information otherwise protected by 1.6. In such circumstances, a lawyer acting in a representative capacity may, but is not required to, make disclosures otherwise required by this rule. This rule refers to demands for information from an admissions or disciplinary authority. If a lawyer appears in an adjudicative proceeding regarding admission or bar discipline as a witness or client representative, the lawyer's conduct is governed by Rule 3.3.

RULE 8.3 – REPORTING PROFESSIONAL MISCONDUCT

(a) A LAWYER WHO KNOWS THAT ANOTHER LAWYER HAS COMMITTED A VIOLATION OF THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT THAT RAISES A SUBSTANTIAL QUESTION AS TO THAT LAWYER'S HONESTY, TRUSTWORTHINESS, OR FITNESS AS A LAWYER IN OTHER RESPECTS, SHALL INFORM THE APPROPRIATE PROFESSIONAL AUTHORITY.

(b) A LAWYER WHO KNOWS THAT A JUDGE HAS COMMITTED A VIOLATION OF APPLICABLE RULES OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT THAT RAISES A SUBSTANTIAL QUESTION AS TO THE JUDGE'S FITNESS FOR OFFICE SHALL INFORM THE APPROPRIATE AUTHORITY.

(c) THIS RULE DOES NOT REQUIRE DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION OTHERWISE PROTECTED BY RULE 1.6 OR OTHER LAW.

COMMENT

[1] Self-regulation of the legal profession requires that members of the profession initiate disciplinary investigation when they know of a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct. Lawyers have a similar obligation with respect to judicial misconduct. An apparently isolated violation may indicate a pattern of misconduct that only a disciplinary investigation can uncover. Reporting a violation is especially important where the victim is unlikely to discover the offense.

[2] A report about misconduct is not required where it would involve violation of Rule 1.6. However, a lawyer should encourage a client to consent to disclosure where prosecution would not substantially prejudice the client's interests. Information that is a client confidence or secret under Rule 1.6 is "otherwise protected by Rule 1.6" within the meaning of Rule 8.3(c). Rule 1.6(c), (d), and (e) describe circumstances in which a lawyer may reveal information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6. In such circumstances, a lawyer may, but is not required to, make disclosures otherwise required by this rule.

[3] If a lawyer were obliged to report every violation of the Rules, the failure to report any violation would itself be a professional offense. Such a requirement existed in many jurisdictions but proved to be unenforceable. This rule limits the reporting obligation to those offenses that a self-regulating profession must vigorously endeavor to prevent. A measure of judgment is, therefore, required in complying with the provisions of this rule. The term "substantial" refers to the seriousness of the possible offense and not the quantum of evidence of which the lawyer is aware. A report should be made to the Office of Disciplinary Counsel. A lawyer who believes that another lawyer has a significant problem of alcohol or other substance abuse which does not require reporting to Disciplinary Counsel under this rule, may nonetheless wish to report the perceived situation to the Lawyer Counseling Committee, operated by the D.C. Bar, which assists lawyers having such problems.

[4] The duty to report professional misconduct does not apply to a lawyer retained to represent a lawyer whose professional conduct is in question. Such a situation is governed by the Rules applicable to the client-lawyer relationship. Rule 1.6(c), (d), and (e) give a lawyer discretion to reveal information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6 in some circumstances, despite a client-lawyer relationship. If such circumstances exist, the lawyer may, but is not required, to reveal the information as part of a report of misconduct under this rule. The duty to report may also be limited by other law, including court rules or orders, protective orders, and laws restricting disclosure of grand jury or tax information.

[5] Rule 1.6(h) brings within the protections of Rule 1.6 certain types of information gained by lawyers participating in lawyer counseling programs of the D.C. Bar Lawyer Counseling Committee. To the extent information concerning violations of the Rules of Professional Conduct falls within the scope of Rule 1.6(h), a lawyer-counselor would not be required or permitted to inform the "appropriate professional authority" referred to in Rule 8.3. Where disclosure is permissive under Rule 1.6 (see paragraph 1.6(c), (d), and (e) for cases of permitted disclosures), discretion to disclose to the "appropriate professional authority" would also exist pursuant to paragraph 8.3(c). See also Comment to Rule 1.6, paragraphs [29], [30], and [31].

RULE 8.4 – MISCONDUCT

IT IS PROFESSIONAL MISCONDUCT FOR A LAWYER TO:

(a) VIOLATE OR ATTEMPT TO VIOLATE THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT, KNOWINGLY ASSIST OR INDUCE ANOTHER TO DO SO, OR DO SO THROUGH THE ACTS OF ANOTHER;

(b) COMMIT A CRIMINAL ACT THAT REFLECTS ADVERSELY ON THE LAWYER'S HONESTY, TRUSTWORTHINESS, OR FITNESS AS A LAWYER IN OTHER RESPECTS;

(c) ENGAGE IN CONDUCT INVOLVING DISHONESTY, FRAUD, DECEIT, OR MISREPRESENTATION;

(d) ENGAGE IN CONDUCT THAT SERIOUSLY INTERFERES WITH THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE;

(e) STATE OR IMPLY AN ABILITY TO INFLUENCE IMPROPERLY A GOVERNMENT AGENCY OR OFFICIAL;

(f) KNOWINGLY ASSIST A JUDGE OR JUDICIAL OFFICER IN CONDUCT THAT IS A VIOLATION OF APPLICABLE RULES OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT OR OTHER LAW; OR

(g) SEEK OR THREATEN TO SEEK CRIMINAL CHARGES OR DISCIPLINARY CHARGES SOLELY TO OBTAIN AN ADVANTAGE IN A CIVIL MATTER.

COMMENT

[1] Many kinds of illegal conduct reflect adversely on fitness to practice law, such as offenses involving fraud and the offense of willful failure to file an income tax return. However, some kinds of offenses carry no such implication. Traditionally, the distinction was drawn in terms of offenses involving "moral turpitude." That concept can be construed to include offenses concerning some matters of personal morality, such as adultery and comparable offenses, that have no specific connection to fitness for the practice of law. Although a lawyer is personally answerable to the entire criminal law, a lawyer should be professionally answerable only for offenses that indicate lack of those characteristics relevant to law practice. Offenses involving violence, dishonesty, breach of trust, or serious interference with the administration of justice are in that category. A pattern of repeated offenses, even ones of minor significance when considered separately, can indicate indifference to legal obligation.

[2] Paragraph (d)'s prohibition of conduct that "seriously interferes with the administration of justice" includes conduct proscribed by the previous Code of Professional Responsibility under DR 1-102(A)(5) as "prejudicial to the administration of justice." The cases under paragraph (d) include acts by a lawyer such as: failure to cooperate with Disciplinary Counsel; failure to respond to Disciplinary Counsel's inquiries or subpoenas; failure to abide by agreements made with Disciplinary Counsel; failure to appear in court for a scheduled hearing; failure to obey court orders; failure to turn over the assets of a conservatorship to the court or to the successor conservator; failure to keep the Bar advised of respondent's changes of address, after being warned to do so; and tendering a check known to be worthless in settlement of a claim against the lawyer or against the lawyer's client. Paragraph (d) is to be interpreted flexibly and includes any improper behavior of an analogous nature to these examples.

[3] A lawyer violates paragraph (d) by offensive, abusive, or harassing conduct that seriously interferes with the administration of justice. Such conduct may include words or actions that manifest bias or prejudice based upon race, sex, religion, national origin, disability, age, sexual orientation, or socioeconomic status.

RULE 8.5 – DISCIPLINARY AUTHORITY; CHOICE OF LAW

(a) DISCIPLINARY AUTHORITY. A LAWYER ADMITTED TO PRACTICE IN THIS JURISDICTION IS SUBJECT TO THE DISCIPLINARY AUTHORITY OF THIS JURISDICTION, REGARDLESS OF WHERE THE LAWYER'S CONDUCT OCCURS. A LAWYER MAY BE SUBJECT TO THE DISCIPLINARY AUTHORITY OF BOTH THIS JURISDICTION AND ANOTHER JURISDICTION WHERE THE LAWYER IS ADMITTED FOR THE SAME CONDUCT.

(b) CHOICE OF LAW. IN ANY EXERCISE OF THE DISCIPLINARY AUTHORITY OF THIS JURISDICTION, THE RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT TO BE APPLIED SHALL BE AS FOLLOWS:

> (2) FOR ANY OTHER CONDUCT,
> > (ii) IF THE LAWYER IS LICENSED TO PRACTICE IN THIS AND ANOTHER JURISDICTION, THE RULES TO BE APPLIED SHALL BE THE RULES OF THE ADMITTING JURISDICTION IN WHICH THE LAWYER PRINCIPALLY PRACTICES; PROVIDED, HOWEVER, THAT IF PARTICULAR CONDUCT CLEARLY HAS ITS PREDOMINANT EFFECT IN ANOTHER JURISDICTION IN WHICH THE LAWYER IS LICENSED TO PRACTICE, THE RULES OF THAT JURISDICTION SHALL BE APPLIED TO THAT CONDUCT.

COMMENT

Disciplinary Authority

[1] Paragraph (a) restates long-standing law.

Choice of Law

[2] A lawyer may be potentially subject to more than one set of rules of professional conduct which impose different obligations. The lawyer may be licensed to practice in more than one jurisdiction with differing rules, or may be admitted to practice before a particular court with rules that differ from those of the jurisdiction or jurisdictions in which the lawyer is licensed to practice. In the past, decisions have not developed clear or consistent guidance as to which rules apply in such circumstances.

[3] Paragraph (b) seeks to resolve such potential conflicts. Its premise is that minimizing conflicts between rules, as well as uncertainty about which rules are applicable, is in the best interest of both clients and the profession (as well as the bodies having authority to regulate the profession). Accordingly, it takes the approach of (i) providing that any particular conduct of an attorney shall be subject to only one set of rules of professional conduct, and (ii) making the determination of which set of rules applies to particular conduct as straightforward as possible, consistent with recognition of appropriate regulatory interests of relevant jurisdictions.

[4] Paragraph (b) provides that as to a lawyer's conduct relating to a matter pending before a tribunal the lawyer shall be subject only to the rules of professional conduct of that tribunal. As to all other conduct, paragraph (b) provides that a lawyer licensed to practice only in this jurisdiction shall be subject to the rules of professional conduct of this jurisdiction, and that a lawyer licensed in multiple jurisdictions shall be subject only to the rules of the jurisdiction where he or she (as an individual, not his or her firm) principally practices, but with one exception: if particular conduct clearly has its predominant effect in another admitting jurisdiction, then only the rules of that jurisdiction shall apply. The intention is for the latter exception to be a narrow one. It would be appropriately applied, for example, to a situation in which a lawyer admitted in, and principally practicing in, State A, but also admitted in State B, handled an acquisition by a company whose headquarters and operations were in State B of another similar such company. The exception would not appropriately be applied, on the other hand, if the lawyer handled an acquisition by a company whose headquarters and operations were in State A of a company whose headquarters and main operations were in State A, but which also had some operations in State B.

[5] If two admitting jurisdictions were to proceed against a lawyer for the same conduct, they should, applying this rule, identify the same governing ethics rules. They should take all appropriate steps to see that they do apply the same rule to the same conduct, and in all events should avoid proceeding against a lawyer on the basis of two inconsistent rules.

[6] The choice of law provision applies to lawyers engaged in transnational practice, unless international law, treaties or other agreements between competent regulatory authorities in the affected jurisdictions provide otherwise.

NONDISCRIMINATION BY MEMBERS OF THE BAR

RULE 9.1 – NONDISCRIMINATION

A LAWYER SHALL NOT DISCRIMINATE AGAINST ANY INDIVIDUAL IN CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT BECAUSE OF THE INDIVIDUAL'S RACE, COLOR, RELIGION, NATIONAL ORIGIN, SEX, AGE, MARITAL STATUS, SEXUAL ORIENTATION, FAMILY RESPONSIBILITY, OR PHYSICAL HANDICAP.

COMMENT

[1] This provision is modeled after the D.C. Human Rights Act, D.C. Code § 2-1402.11 (2001), though in some respects is more limited in scope. There are also provisions of federal law that contain certain prohibitions on discrimination in employment. The Rule is not intended to create ethical obligations that exceed those imposed on a lawyer by applicable law.

[2] The investigation and adjudication of discrimination claims may involve particular expertise of the kind found within the D.C. Office of Human Rights and the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Such experience may involve, among other things, methods of analysis of statistical data regarding discrimination claims. These agencies also have, in appropriate circumstances, the power to award remedies to the victims of discrimination, such as reinstatement or back pay, which extend beyond the remedies that are available through the disciplinary process. Remedies available through the disciplinary process include such sanctions as disbarment, suspension, censure, and admonition, but do not extend to monetary awards or other remedies that could alter the employment status to take into account the impact of prior acts of discrimination.

[3] If proceedings are pending before other organizations, such as the D.C. Office of Human Rights or the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the processing of complaints by Disciplinary Counsel may be deferred or abated where there is substantial similarity between the complaint filed with Disciplinary Counsel and material allegations involved in such other proceedings. See §19(d) of Rule XI of the Rules Governing the District of Columbia Bar.

To Members of the District of Columbia Bar:

Effective February 1, 2007, the D.C. Court of Appeals amended the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct in the most comprehensive revision to the Rules since they first became effective on January 1, 1991. Although the vast majority of opinions issued by the D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee ("Committee") prior to the effective date of the amended Rules are substantively unaffected by the amendments, there are some that simply no longer provide complete guidance in light of the recent changes. It is critical, therefore, that anyone who seeks guidance from a Committee opinion pay particular attention to the possibility that the Rules or Comments have changed in relevant ways since the opinion was published. Some of the changes are "non-substantive," such as the renumbering of a Rule section or a Comment. In these circumstances, the Committee opinion remains valid, even though a particular citation to a Rule or a Comment may no longer be consistent with the current version. The Committee urges anyone consulting an opinion to read it in light of the revised Rules and Comments. In the table below, the Committee has identified those opinions that, in its judgment, are substantively affected by the amended Rules:

Opinion	Relevant Changes
Opinion 211: Fee Agreements; Mandatory Arbitration Clauses	D.C. Rule 1.8(g)(2) has been revised to clarify the conditions under which a lawyer may settle a claim or potential claim for malpractice. Comment [13] now explains that the Rule does not prohibit lawyers from entering into an agreement with the client for mandatory arbitration of legal malpractice claims, and there is no requirement that the client have separate counsel before such an agreement is permissible.
Opinion 212: Representation by Law Firm Adverse to Former Client in a Substantially Related Matter After Lawyers Who Represented Former Client Have Left the Law Firm	D.C. Rule 1.10(c) now permits a law firm to represent a person with interests directly adverse to those of a client represented by a lawyer who formerly was associated with the firm, so long as none of the remaining lawyers has any information protected by D.C. Rule 1.6 that is material to the matter.
Opinion 217: Multiple Representation; Intermediation	D.C. Rule 2.2 has been eliminated, and the discussion of intermediation and common representation has been moved to Comments [14] through [18] of D.C. Rule 1.7.
Opinion 218: Retainer Agreement Providing for Mandatory Arbitration of Fee Disputes Is Not Unethical	Comment [1] to D.C. Rule 1.8 now explains that the requirements of paragraph (a) do not apply to ordinary fee arrangements between client and lawyer, which are governed by D.C. Rule 1.5. Moreover, Comment [13] to D.C. Rule 1.8 now explains that D.C. Rule 1.8 generally permits lawyers to enter into agreements to arbitrate any legal malpractice claim.
Opinion 219: Conflict of Ethical Obligations	D.C. Rule 1.6(d) now permits a lawyer whose services were used to further a crime or fraud to reveal client confidences and secrets under certain circumstances to prevent the crime or fraud or to mitigate the harm caused by a client's crime or fraud. Because a lawyer is now permitted to make certain disclosures under D.C. Rule 1.6, the disclosure obligations under D.C. Rules 4.1(b) and 3.3(d)—both of which are expressly made subject to the obligations under D.C. Rule 1.6—may now be broader.
Opinion 232: Multiple Clients/Criminal Matter	D.C. Rule 1.7(c) has been revised to require that each potentially affected client provide informed consent to a representation otherwise prohibited under paragraph (b) and that the lawyer reasonably believe that the lawyer will be able to provide competent and diligent representation to each affected client.

Opinion	Relevant Changes
Opinion 238: Written Fee Agreements	D.C. Rule 1.5(b) has been revised to require that a written fee agreement describe not only the basis or rate of the fee but also the scope of the lawyer's representation and the expenses for which the client will be responsible.
Opinion 243: Joint Representation in Divorce Cases	D.C. Rule 2.2 has been eliminated, and the discussion of intermediation and common representation has been moved to Comments [14] through [18] of D.C. Rule 1.7.
Opinion 253: Referral Fee Arrangement Between Law Firms and Insurance Companies	D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(5) has been eliminated. As a result, a portion of the opinion is no longer applicable—specifically, the discussion about the relationship between the prohibition on sharing fees with nonlawyers in D.C. Rule 5.4 and the provision in D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(5) that had permitted lawyers to pay referral fees to intermediaries under certain conditions.
Opinion 264: Refunds of Special Retainers; Commingling of Such Funds with the General Funds of the Law Firm Upon Receipt	D.C. Rule 1.15(d) has been revised significantly since this opinion was issued. Most particularly, D.C. Rule 1.15(d) now provides that advances of unearned fees and unincurred costs shall be treated as property of the client. The opinion's contrary determination was based on a prior version of D.C. Rule 1.15(d).*
Opinion 273: Ethical Considerations of Lawyers Moving From One Private Law Firm to Another	D.C. Rule 1.10(c) now permits a firm to represent persons with interests materially adverse to those of a former client in matters which are the same as or substantially related to those in which a formerly associated lawyer represented the client while at the firm where none of the remaining lawyers has any information protected by D.C. Rule 1.6 that is material to the matter. The opinion's contrary conclusion was based on the prior version of D.C. Rule 1.10(c).
Opinion 275: Receipt of Confidential Information Bars Subsequent Representation of Another Client in the Same or a Substantially Related Matter Unless Screen Can Be Erected	D.C. Rule 1.10(a) no longer contains the potential-client exception to the imputed disqualification of a law firm. That exception is now contained in a new rule, D.C. Rule 1.18(d).
Opinion 279: Availability of Screening as Cure for Imputed Disqualification	D.C. Rule 1.10(a) no longer contains the potential client exception to the imputed disqualification of a law firm. That exception is now contained in a new rule, D.C. Rule 1.18(d).
Opinion 286: Contingent Referral Fees	D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(5) has been eliminated. The opinion's discussion of how the Rule marked a departure from prior ethics law and authorized certain payments to others for the referral of legal business is no longer applicable.
Opinion 294: Sale of Law Practice by Retiring Lawyer	D.C. Rule 1.17 is new and governs the sale of a law practice. This rule (together with Comment [10]) authorizes the sale of a law practice so long as the sale is not financed by increases in fees charged to the transferred clients and existing arrangements between the transferring lawyer and the client as to fees and the scope of the work are honored by the purchasing lawyer.

* When Opinion 264 was published in 1996, D.C. Rule 1.15(d) provided that "[a]dvances of legal fees and costs become the property of the lawyer upon receipt. Any unearned amount of prepaid fees must be returned to the client at the termination of the lawyer's services in accordance with Rule 1.16(d)." The D.C. Court of Appeals amended D.C. Rule 1.15(d), effective January 1, 2000, to clarify that, "[a]dvances of unearned fees and unincurred costs shall be treated as property of the client pursuant to paragraph (a) until earned or incurred unless the client consents to a different arrangement." Although the D.C. Court of Appeals also made some minor modifications to D.C. Rule 1.15(d) in the most recent amendments that became effective on February 1, 2007, the earlier amendments to the rule are the ones directly relevant to Opinion 264.

Opinion	Relevant Changes
Opinion 296: Joint Representation: Confidentiality of Information	D.C. Rule 2.2 has been eliminated, and Comments [14]–[18] to D.C. Rule 1.7 have been added to address special considerations in common representation. Moreover, D.C. Rule 1.6(d) now permits a lawyer whose services were used to further a crime or fraud to reveal client confidences and secrets under certain circumstances to prevent the crime or fraud or to mitigate the harm caused by a client's crime or fraud.
Opinion 299: Duty of Confidentiality to the Corporate Client That Has Ceased Operations	D.C. Rule 1.6(d) now permits a lawyer whose services were used to further a crime or fraud to reveal client confidences and secrets under certain circumstances to prevent the crime or fraud or to mitigate the harm caused by a client's crime or fraud.
Opinion 302: Soliciting Plaintiffs for Class Action Lawsuits or Obtaining Legal Work Through Internet-based Web Pages	D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(5) has been eliminated. As a result, a portion of the opinion is no longer applicable—specifically, the discussion about the steps that a lawyer must take when paying fees to participate in a web-based bidding service to satisfy the conditions of D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(5).
Opinion 306: Practicing Law While Simultaneously Selling Insurance	D.C. Rule 5.7 is new. It provides that a lawyer shall be subject to the Rules of Professional Conduct with respect to the provision of services that might reasonably be performed in conjunction with and which are related to the provision of law services. This opinion remains consistent with D.C. Rule 5.7, but it relied only on Comment [25] (now renumbered [36]) to D.C. Rule 1.7 for the conclusion that a lawyer may sell insurance products to clients so long as she makes full disclosure, obtains consent, and concludes that her professional judgment on behalf of the client will not be adversely affected.
Opinion 307: Participation in Government Program Requiring Payment of Percentage of Fee	D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(5) has been eliminated. As a result, a portion of the opinion is no longer applicable—specifically, the discussion about the steps that a lawyer must take when paying to participate in a government-run schedule program for legal services to satisfy the conditions of D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(5).
Opinion 311: Choice-of-Law Rules for Professional Conduct in Non-Judicial Proceedings	D.C. Rule 8.5(b)(1) now applies more broadly to conduct in connection with a "matter pending before a tribunal" rather than only in connection with a "proceeding in a court before which a lawyer has been admitted to practice."
Opinion 329: Non-Profit Organization Fee Arrangement with an Attorney to Whom It Refers Matters	D.C. Rule 5.4(a)(5) now provides that a lawyer may share legal fees with a nonprofit organization that employed, retained, or recommended employment of the lawyer in the matter and that qualifies as tax exempt under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code. The opinion's requirement that reimbursements be permitted only to recoup the non-profit's out-of pocket expenses and not to provide some portion of the fees collected is no longer necessary given that D.C. Rule 5.4(a)(5) now expressly authorizes the sharing of legal fees under these circumstances.

Opinion No. 210

Representation Of Criminal Defendants By Attorney Seeking Position As Assistant U.S. Attorney

• A lawyer who is primarily engaged in criminal defense work may continue to represent criminal defense clients while seeking a position with the United States Attorney's office provided that each of his/her criminal defense clients gives consent to the representation after full disclosure of the possible disadvantages that may result if the lawyer must withdraw to start employment with the United States Attorney. Disclosure must be made and consent obtained when the lawyer takes the first active step in seeking such employment. With disclosure and consent, a lawyer may accept new criminal defense clients after deciding to apply to the United States Attorney's office, before commencement of employment

Applicable Code Provisions

• DR 7-101 (Representing a Client Zealously).

• DR 5-101 (Refusing Employment when the Interests of the Lawyer May Impair His Independent Professional Judgment).

Applicable Rules Provision

• Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)

Inquiry

An attorney practicing in the District of Columbia primarily represents criminal defendants under the Criminal Justice Act in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia. The attorney determines to seek a position with the United States Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia and submits a resume for review. It will be several weeks before the United States Attorney's offices decides whether or not to grant the applicant an interview. Thereafter, if she is offered a position as an Assistant in the U.S. Attorney's Office, actual employment may not commence for a number of months, perhaps as long as a year, pending an FBI investigation and because of federal hiring freezes.

The attorney asks whether she must disclose to her clients her decision to seek employment with the prosecutor's office, and whether she is required to withdraw from representation of criminal defendants prosecuted by the United States Attorney's office:

1) As soon as she determines to seek a position with the United States Attorney's office;
2) When she submits a resume;
3) When she is granted an interview;
4) When she is offered a position;
5) When an employment date is set.

The attorney also inquires whether she must disclose the potential conflict to the trial court even if after disclosure to the client, the client agrees to let the attorney continue as counsel. Finally, the attorney inquires whether she may continue to represent criminal defendants who are prosecuted by the District of Columbia Corporation Counsel's Office, after employment is offered but before it commences with the United States Attorney's office; and if so whether she must disclose her pending employment to her clients in such cases.

Discussion

This inquiry raises the issue whether a lawyer who is actively seeking a position as a prosecutor in the office of the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia is thereby disqualified during the pendency of her job application, and before she has a firm employment date, from continuing to represent clients involved in criminal investigations or proceedings being conducted by that office and by the District of Columbia Corporation Counsel's office. The questions to be resolved are first, whether the lawyer's interest in pursuing this ambition will or reasonably may be expected to affect the exercise of her professional judgment in behalf of her clients; if so, whether and under what circumstances the lawyer may continue to represent existing clients in criminal cases being prosecuted by the United States Attorney's office after deciding to seek a position with that office; and, second, whether the lawyer after determining to seek a position with the United States Attorney's office, may continue to seek and accept new employment to represent clients being prosecuted by that office or by the District of Columbia Corporation Counsel's office.

In defining the obligation of the bar to represent clients zealously within the bounds of law, DR 7-101 (A) provides that "A lawyer shall not intentionally: (1) fail to seek the lawful objectives of his client through reasonably available means permitted by law and the disciplinary rules,...." This grave responsibility, which is also set forth in Rule 1.3 of the Rules of Professional Conduct and Related Comments (adopted March 1, 1990 by the D.C. Court of Appeals and effective January 1, 1991), is of special importance in criminal proceedings where the client's liberty is in jeopardy.

To insure the lawyer's independence and freedom to act at all times in the best interests of his or her client, DR 5-101 enjoins the lawyer to refuse employment when some personal interest may impair the lawyer's independent professional judgment. Thus, DR 5-101(A) provides: "Except with the consent of this client after full disclosure, a lawyer shall not accept employment if the exercise of his professional judgment on behalf of his client will be or reasonably may be affected by his own financial, business, property or personal interests." Cf. Rule 1.7(B)(4) of the Rules of Professional Conduct effective January 1, 1991.

This rule governs the lawyer's initial decision whether or not to undertake the representation of a client in a new matter when some existing interest of the lawyer might reasonably be expected to affect the zealousness with which the lawyer acts in behalf of the client. The rule has also been interpreted to impose a continuing ethical obligation on a lawyer not to place his or her personal interests above the client's interests. Opinion Nos. 144, 169.

Rule 1.7 of the new Rules effective January 1, 1991, contains prescriptions similar to those of DR 5-101.

DR 5-101(A), read literally, addresses the question of whether and when a lawyer may accept new employment that might be in conflict with the lawyer's own business or personal interests; or which might adversely affect the lawyer's ability to exercise independent professional judgment in behalf of an existing client, or otherwise involve the lawyer in representing conflicting interests. In considering the present inquiry the Committee interprets this rule as applying as well to the question of whether and when a lawyer may affirmatively seek new employment which, if accepted, would create the same sort of conflicts.

1. Lawyer's Duty to Existing Clients When He or She Applies for a Position in the Prosecutor's Office

The overriding consideration in addressing the questions raised by this inquiry, is not the personal interest or ambition of the lawyer, but the lawyer's responsibility to represent his or her client zealously within the bounds of law, especially those who may be charged with a crime. Clearly, the lawyer cannot allow personal interests to interfere with that duty. The lawyer may perceive the particular prosecutor handling a case or matter she has been retained to defend as having some influence over her employment prospects. She may also believe that her advocacy skills as demonstrated in that case or matter will provide a principal basis upon which she will be evaluated. If so, she likely will seek to make a favorable impression. It is difficult to know whether or not these subjective feelings will compromise her zealous representation of her client. They may or they may not. In some circumstances the lawyer may work even harder in her client's behalf in order to demonstrate her competence and ability.

Thus, the lawyer may redouble the effort and time she previously gave to the client's cause, working more vigorously to master the applicable law and facts of the case. Obscure tactics and defenses may receive greater attention than otherwise, and the lawyer, in an effort to perform well, may conduct a more thorough discovery to better anticipate the prosecution's attack. At trial, the attorney may put forth her defense and counter the prosecution more energetically than otherwise. All of this activity, though driven by the lawyer's personal interest in performing well and enhancing her employment prospects, would benefit the client also. The interests of the lawyer and the client in this situation, therefore, could very well be consistent.

On the other hand, when representing clients in criminal proceedings, the lawyer is often required to make judgments as to courses of action and to assert rights that heavily burden the prosecution and create difficult obstacles to conviction of the lawyers's clients. The prosecutor may view some of defense counsel's tactics as unwarranted, technical, unreasonable or even personally offensive.

Moreover, criminal investigations and trials are the most adversarial of all litigation. It is to be expected that the prosecutor will vigorously contest, in his effort to obtain a conviction, virtually all of defense counsel's requests for discovery, pre-trial motions, and trial tactics. In the context of such hotly contested and adversarial proceedings, relationships between opposing counsel may become strained. Nevertheless, defense counsel is obligated to take whatever lawful and ethical measures are required to vindicate a client's cause without regard to opposition, obstruction, or personal interests, such as a desire not to offend or irritate members of the prosecutor's office from which she is seeking or may have recently received favorable job consideration. Where concern for jeopardizing her employment opportunities interferes with a lawyer's representation of her client, an impermissible conflict of interest exists.

The difficulty, therefore, is that, while the lawyer may react in this situation in a manner entirely consistent with her client's best interests, she could also perceive her own interests to be in conflict with those of her client. Moreover, the lawyer may not be able to foresee whether or when this conflict will arise during the course of her representation.

The Committee finds that DR 5-101 applies here, as will Rule 1.7 when it becomes effective on January 1, 1991. These rules provide that, where, as here, the lawyer's judgment on behalf of her client reasonably may be affected by her own personal interests, she may not proceed without obtaining the client's consent after full disclosure. (DR 5-101(A)).

The Committee has previously recognized "that the obvious ability to provide adequate representation, which pursuant to DR 7-101 must be zealous, is an independent requirement which must be met even though consent is provided." Opinion 163, referring to Opinion 49. A criminal defendant, moreover, may feel compelled to give consent rather than incur the delay and inconvenience which would otherwise result.

While it is ultimately the lawyer's own subjective perception of the relationship between her interests and the client's which determines the existence of a conflict,[1] the evaluation of the potential for conflict necessarily must rest with the client. Thus, even if the lawyer determines that her own interests in obtaining a position in the prosecutor's office will not impair the zealousness of her representation of her client's interests, this possibility must be fully disclosed to the client. The client must also be made aware of the possibility of added expense, delay, inconvenience and other disadvantages to the client that may occur, if the lawyer must subsequently withdraw from the case, perhaps at a most inconvenient time, to commence employment with the United States Attorney's office. Only if the client consents after full and complete disclosure of all of these possibilities may the lawyer continue to represent the client. See Comment [12] to Rule 1.7 effective January 1, 1991.

The Committee believes that this duty to disclose and seek consent arises when the attorney has determined to pursue employment with the United States Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia. Thus, disclosure should be made not later than when the lawyer takes the first active step in seeking such employment. This may be when the lawyer calls to discuss or inquire about procedures for making application; and the duty certainly arises when the lawyer submits a resume.

Further, the lawyer must apprise her client of any significant change in her employment prospects with the prosecutor's office, particularly any developments tending to indicate that the lawyer might need to withdraw from the representation. This duty derives from the lawyer's obligation to mitigate the burden which withdrawal imposes on the client.[2]

2. During Pendency of Application For a Position In Prosecutor's Office, Lawyer May Accept New Criminal Defense Clients With Their Consent After Full Disclosure

The resolution of the question whether or not the inquirer may seek and accept new criminal defense clients after she has determined to apply for a position with the United States Attorney's office, while her application is pending and before employment is scheduled to commence, is governed by DR 5-101(A). This rule permits a lawyer, with the consent of the client, to accept new employment even though the exercise of the lawyer's independent judgment might be affected by some business or personal interest.

In these circumstances, assuming full disclosure, the client is in a position to evaluate the possibility that the vigor of the lawyer's representation may be tempered by a desire not to take any action that could lessen the chances of her becoming a member of the prosecutor's staff. A decision can be reached freely without concern about possible significant disadvantages if consent is refused. Other counsel not so infected with adverse personal interests are presumably available, and there is no apparent reason why the client would suffer any significant delay, expense or inconvenience by refusing consent.

Accordingly, the Committee concludes that under DR 5-101(A), the lawyer may accept new criminal matters with the consent of the clients after full disclosure.

There remains the question whether a lawyer may continue to seek and accept new employment to represent clients being prosecuted by the District of Columbia Corporation Counsel's office during the pendency of her application with the United States Attorney's office. This question does not present a situation in which there is or may be a conflict between the lawyer's interests and her client's interests. Unlike the scenario which the above analysis contemplates, the lawyer cannot reasonably be concerned about jeopardizing her employment prospects in an unrelated agency by her actions in zealously defending a criminal client prosecuted by a different agency. Therefore, neither DR 5-101 nor DR 5-105 applies. Although a client in a criminal matter may prefer that his lawyer be completely "defense oriented" and not even consider becoming a prosecutor while defending him, this preference does not mean that a potential or actual conflict of interest exists, absent the circumstances described above. Consequently, the Committee finds that the lawyer is not obligated to disclose to any of her clients who are being prosecuted by the District of Columbia Corporation Counsel's office that she is seeking employment with the United States Attorney's office.

Concurring Opinion of Four Members

We agree with the Committee's conclusion but wish to emphasize the narrow reach of the Opinion.

The Inquiry presents a situation in which the lawyer has an extensive on-going criminal practice and the employment process in the U.S. Attorney's Office takes many months to complete. Since the lawyer cannot be expected to cease her practice entirely, it is not feasible for her to time her decision to seek employment with the U.S. Attorney's Office until the possible conflict with existing clients is eliminated. In other circumstances, however, it may be feasible for a lawyer to avoid any conflict by delaying the decision, in which case, we believe the lawyer may have an ethical duty to withhold the application until the conflict is removed. See, EC 5-2 ("After accepting employment, a lawyer carefully should refrain from assuming a position that would tend to make his judgment less protective of the interests of his client.")

Adopted April 17, 1990

Opinion No. 211

Fee Agreements; Mandatory Arbitration Clauses.

• A lawyer may not insist that a client enter into a fee agreement containing a clause mandating arbitration of fee and malpractice disputes unless the client is represented by other counsel.

Applicable Code Provisions

• DR 2-106 (A) A lawyer shall not enter into an agreement for, charge, or collect an illegal or clearly excessive fee.

• EC 2-19 Desirability of written fee agreements.

• EC 2-23 A lawyer should be zealous in his efforts to avoid controversies over fees with clients and should attempt to resolve amicably any differences on the subject.

• DR 6-102(A) A lawyer shall not attempt to exonerate himself from or limit his liability to his client for his personal malpractice.

Applicable Rules Provisions

• 1.5(b) Requirement of written fee disclosures.

• 1.8(a) In transactions with clients, a lawyer shall make full written disclosure of relevant information and shall give the c1lient a reasonable opportunity to seek independent legal advice.

• 1.8 (g) A lawyer shall not attempt to limit his liability to his client for his personal malpractice.

Inquiry

A law firm proposes to use a form retainer agreement which describes the legal representation to be provided and states that the law firm will use "its best efforts on behalf of the client's interest." The agreement requires the firm and its client to resort to arbitration for "[a]ll claims, disputes and other matters in question arising out of, or relating to, payment under this Contract for Legal Services, or the breach thereof ...." By its terms, the agreement requires arbitration of claims by the firm against its clients for unpaid fees and claims by the client against the firm for malpractice.

Fee disputes are to be arbitrated before the Fee Arbitration Board of the District of Columbia Bar, or if that is not available, before an arbitration panel mutually chosen by the parties. All other disputes are to be arbitrated in the District of Columbia under the rules of the American Arbitration Association. The agreement states that the client consents to the jurisdiction of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia for "all purposes in connection with arbitration" and agrees "to pay reasonable attorney's fees in the amount of fifteen percent (15%) of the balance owed to the law firm..., plus

2 While there may be situations where it would be appropriate to do so, this opinion does not address the question of whether a lawyer should inform the judge handling a client's case that he or she has applied for a position in the prosecutor's office.

all costs of said suit." Finally, the contract erects a two-year statute of limitations within which arbitration must be started.

The law firm asks whether the mandatory arbitration provisions are proper under the District of Columbia Code of Professional Responsibility.

Discussion

In our Opinion 103, we decided that written retainer agreements are highly desirable, and to that end we approved the use of a form agreement for legal services.[1] However, we warned that form agreements "may not be adequate to set forth fully and fairly the terms of representation for all legal matters or for all attorney-client relationships," and that great care must be taken to insure that form agreements comport with all relevant ethics requirements.

In our Opinion 190, we held that a lawyer was not prohibited from incorporating in a fee agreement a clause which mandated arbitration of all disputes between lawyer and client under the procedures of the American Arbitration Association or the District of Columbia Bar Fee Arbitration Board.[2] However, we cautioned that a mandatory arbitration provision was not proper unless the lawyer made full disclosure to his client concerning any rights the client might waive by agreeing to arbitration and that the lawyer must not create arbitration procedures that violate DR 6-102(A).

Opinion 190 was issued prior to the promulgation of Rule 1.8 of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, which is similar to rules in other jurisdictions that have been construed to bar mandatory arbitration provisions in retainer agreements unless the lawyer at least advises his client to seek independent legal counsel before entering into such an agreement. In addition, we note that Rule 1.5(b) of the new Rules of Professional Conduct will soon require lawyers to provide many clients with written statements concerning fee practices. Accordingly, we believe it appropriate to visit again the issues raised by mandatory arbitration clauses in written retainer agreements

The State Bar of Michigan, in Opinion RI-2, which applies Rule 1.8(h)(1) of the Michigan Rules by analogy,[3] has disapproved mandatory arbitration provisions in fee agreements unless the client has actually received independent counsel on the advisability of entering into the agreement. Opinion RI-2 notes that the lawyer and the client may have conflicting interests with respect to whether arbitration is appropriate and that, at the least, the client may not have the knowledge needed to make an informed decision about arbitration. The Philadelphia Bar Association's Opinion 88-2, relying on Rule 1.8(a)[4] of the Pennsylvania Rules of Professional Conduct, requires that a lawyer advise his client "in writing, in simple direct language, that by agreeing to arbitration the client is waiving the right to trial by jury...," and to seek independent legal counsel before executing the arbitration agreement.

Our Opinion 190 similarly cautioned that lawyers must "make a full disclosure to the client of all the ramifications of an agreement to arbitrate," and we suggested that any agreement limiting the availability of punitive damages would be unethical under DR 6-102(A). However, over a dissent, this Committee rejected the need for independent counsel as required by Michigan and Philadelphia.

Our Court of Appeals has now promulgated Rule 1.8(a),[5] which states:

> A lawyer shall not enter into a business transaction with a client or knowingly acquire an ownership, possessory, security or other pecuniary interest adverse to a client unless:
> (1) The transaction and terms on which the lawyer acquires the interest are fair and reasonable to the client and are fully disclosed and transmitted in writing to the client in a manner which can be reasonably understood by the client;
> (2) The client is given a reasonable opportunity to seek the advice of independent counsel in the transaction; and
> (3) The client consents in writing thereto.

While a mandatory arbitration pro-vision does not precisely fit the language of the Rule 1.8(a), comment one to the Rule suggests that the Rule should be broadly construed to cover transactions in which the lawyer may have a conflicting interest with his client and has any advantage in dealing with the client.

> As a general principle, all transactions between client and lawyer should be fair and reasonable to the client. In such transactions a review by independent counsel on behalf of the client is often advisable. Paragraph (a) does not, however, apply to standard commercial transactions[.] ... In such transactions, the lawyer has no advantage in dealing with the client, and the restrictions in paragraph (a) are unnecessary and impracticable. (Emphasis added).

Our previous opinions concerning the lawyer-client fee relationship have similarly stressed the need for complete fair dealing by the lawyer with his client in the fee agreement. When a lawyer seeks to impose an atypical requirement in a fee agreement, for example, the lawyer must explicitly bring that provision to the attention of the client at the time the agreement is presented so that the client can intelligently consider the provision. See, e.g., Opinion 11 (interest on unpaid fees). Second, the lawyer owes the utmost duty of candor and fair dealing to the client with respect

1 The District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct also permit the use of form agreements:

> "...[A]n individual writing specific to the particular client and representation is generally not required. Unless there are unique aspects of the fee arrangement, the lawyer may utilize a standardize letter, memorandum or pamphlet explaining the lawyer's fee practices, and indicating those practices applicable to the specific representation.

Comment 2 to Rule 1.5.

2 The value of fee arbitration is recognized in the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, which counsel attorneys to submit fee disputes to arbitration or mediation procedures established by the Bar when those procedures are invoked by a client. See Comment 15 to Rule 1.5.

3Michigan Rule 1.8(h)(1) provides:

> A lawyer shall not make an agreement prospectively limiting the lawyer's liability to a client for malpractice unless permitted by law and the client is independently represented in making the agreement.

The equivalent District of Columbia Rule of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.8(g)(1), does not contain the italicized last clause, which was intentionally deleted by the Bar in proposing Rule 1.8(g)(1) to the Court of Appeals. Were our Rule 1.8(g)(1) applicable to arbitration provisions, which we hold it is not, then no agreement to arbitrate malpractice claims would be permissible in the District of Columbia.

4 Pennsylvania Rule 1.8(a) is identical to the District of Columbia Rule.

5 Rule 1.8(a) is a refocusing of the provisions of DR 5-104(A). DR 5-104(A) requires full disclosure by the lawyer to the client of possible conflicts arising from business transactions with the client and consent by the client after full disclosure.

to fee matters. See, e.g., Opinion 185 (billing for disbursements). Our Opinion 190 also stressed the "obligation to make a full disclosure to the client of all the ramifications of an agreement to arbitrate."

Our consideration of the arbitration provisions in instant agreement has lead us to the conclusion that Opinion 190 was incorrect in its belief that the complex nature of arbitration could be adequately disclosed to a lay client. The virtue of arbitration is its flexibility; arbitration procedures will typically be "atypical". The salient characteristics of an arbitration which must be disclosed are therefore very difficult to catalog.

For example, is the arbitrator to be paid and, if so, must these fees be disclosed to the client? The instant agreement provides for both D.C. Bar and American Arbitration Association ("AAA") arbitration, but does not disclose that the arbitrators must be paid. Since the fee for D.C. Bar arbitration is $25.00, perhaps it does not need to be disclosed. On the other hand, AAA fees can be substantial and surely would have to be disclosed. Similarly, what of matters of procedure? Neither the D.C. Bar nor the AAA Commercial Arbitration rules provide for discovery.[6] Must this be disclosed? If so, how are the tactical considerations to be explained to a lay client? Arbitrations are typically not open to the public, while trials are. Must the client be told of this distinction; does it raise a tactical issue? In our Opinion 190, we stated that punitive damages are not available in arbitrations, but now we are told that there is a line of cases permitting arbitrators to award any type of damage a jury could award. If that is so, must the attorney advise the prospective client on the advantages and disadvantages of jury trial versus an arbitrator's award for malpractice damages?

A second level of complexity arises with respect to the enforcement of the arbitral award. The instant agreement requires the client to consent in advance to the jurisdiction of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia. Is this fair to a client who resides in California and retains a District of Columbia attorney with a special federal expertise to handle a complex federal matter in, for example, (a) California, (b) Texas, or (c) North Carolina? Why should such a client be forced to bear the expense of travel to the District of Columbia to arbitrate even a simple fee dispute? On the other hand, can an uncounseled client realistically be expected to appreciate the issues raised by forum selection and is it practical for a lawyer in an initial meeting with the client to attempt to explain such a thing?

In summary, this Committee has come to the conclusion that it is unrealistic to expect lawyers to provide enough information about arbitration to a prospective client, particularly on a first visit, so that the client can make an informed consent to a mandatory arbitration provision. It is equally unrealistic to conclude that limited disclosure coupled with the advice to seek independent legal counsel will cure the problem. How many clients either will see or can afford to see a second lawyer as a condition of entering into an agreement with the first? Therefore, we now conclude that Opinion 190 was incorrect in supposing that adequate disclosures concerning mandatory arbitration could be made to lay clients.

Accordingly, mandatory arbitration agreements covering all disputes between lawyer and client are not permitted under either our prior Opinions or Rule 1.8(a) unless the client is in fact counselled by another attorney.[7] We see no problem, on the other hand, with proposing mandatory arbitration where a client has actual counsel from another lawyer, who has no conflict of interest, upon whom the client can rely to assess the complexities posed by arbitration.

Even when mandatory arbitration is permitted, however, it is important to observe other restrictions on lawyer-client agreements in framing the procedures to be used. Where an arbitration agreement covers claims by the client for malpractice, the restrictions contained in DR 6-102(A) and Rule 1.8(g) of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct must be observed. In the instant case, for example, DR 6-102(A) makes unethical the lawyer's attempt to reduce the limitations period for malpractice below that otherwise provided by law.[8]

Finally, we turn to that portion of the agreement which imposes on the client additional legal fees equal to 15 percent of fees owed in the event that the firm goes to arbitration and prevails. This provision must be considered under DR 2-106(A), which provides that "A lawyer shall not enter into an agreement for, charge, or collect an illegal or clearly excessive fee." Given the speed, efficiency and reduced costs or arbitration, the 15% charge may well be unrelated to any actual costs incurred by the firm and quite likely excessive. As we have stated in other opinions, "the firm must make certain that the percentage bears a reasonable relationship to the costs incurred." Opinion 155.

Nothing in this Opinion should be read to discourage firms from seeking to avail themselves of the benefit of alternative dispute resolution techniques for resolving claims made by or against a firm. In the context of an actual dispute, rather than at the outset of the lawyer-client relationship, it may well be possible to recommend arbitration and to make all required disclosures in a fashion that permits intelligent consideration even by the lay client.

Dissent Of Two Members From Opinion No. 211

In a series of recent decisions the United States Supreme Court has broadly endorsed arbitration as an alternative to traditional litigation as a means of resolving disputes in a wide range of circumstances.[9] The Court's decisions have applied not only to labor arbitration but to the broad range of commercial arbitrations subject to the United States Arbitra-

6 The instant agreement made reference to AAA procedures without giving even a general description of those procedures. We doubt that even most lawyers know what those procedures are.

7 We note that we do not have before us the case of an agreement limited to resolving fee disputes by arbitration before the D.C. Bar Fee Arbitration Board. The Board Rules have been designed to be inexpensive, quick, and fair to clients, and are publically available. These are important characteristics that could lead to a different outcome.

8 The limitations period for malpractice in the District of Columbia is three years, D.C. Code §12-301(8), see, e.g., Duggan v. Keto, 554 A.2d 1126 (D.C. App. 1989), whereas the proposed form agreement erects a two-year limitations period.

9 E.g., Rodriquez de Quijas v. Shearson/Am. Exp., Inc., 109 S. Ct. 1917, 1920 (1989); Shearson/Am. Exp., Inc., v. McMahon, 482 U.S. 220 (1987); *Mitsubishi Motors Corp. v. tion Act., 9 U.S.C.§§ et seq. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals has given similarly broad reading to the District of Columbia's enactment of the Uniform Arbitration Act.[10]

The majority, however, treats disputes between lawyers and their "lay clients" as inherently different from all other disputes, without ever explaining why and without any solid foundation in the applicable provisions of the Code or Rules. In other contexts arbitration agreements have been held enforceable without regard to whether each party fully understood its impact or the potential differences between arbitration and litigation. The AAA has a useful brochure describing the arbitration process. A Commercial Arbitration Guide For Business People. While it may well be difficult for a lawyer to effectively summarize all to the potential differences, it is quite possible to convey objectively the basic nature of arbitration. For example, a spokesperson for the AAA recently gave the following succinct summary:

> Arbitration is hailed as a prompt and economical contractual method of resolving disputes without resort to the courts. Thus, when parties choose arbitration in preference to litigation, they must be conscious of the trade-offs found in arbitration but not found in litigation, such as (1) the privacy of the process, (2) the parties' selection of their own decision maker, (3) the absence of a jury trial, (4) the absence of a judicial appeal on the law since arbitrators are not bound by principles of substantive law absent a contractual or statutory provision to the contrary, (5) the absence of broad discovery, (6) the relaxed application of the rules of evidence,(7) the payment of arbitration administration costs by the parties themselves instead of by taxpayers and (8) the absence of a written opinion with the award unless otherwise required [Page, Waiver of Right to Explanations, N.Y.L.J. April, 26, 1990].[11]

The majority relies principally on DR 5-104(A) of the Code and on Rule 1.8(a), but they were intended (in our view) to address transactions between a lawyer and client other than the agreement that creates the lawyer-client relationship upon which the application of those provisions is premised.

Consent-to-jurisdiction provisions are found in a variety of commercial contracts and are ordinarily enforceable unless shown to be unreasonable upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case. A provision that would presumptively be enforceable except in extreme circumstances ought not to be unethical just because the parties are lawyer and client.

Finally, the majority concludes that the provision for a cost of collection charge of 15% is subject to DR 2-106(A), prohibiting a lawyer from collecting a "clearly excessive fee." That provision is aimed at the fee charged by a lawyer for legal services rendered to a client; it does not address the attorney's cost of collecting a debt owed by the client. Such cost-of-collection provisions are common as to other parties, and are generally enforceable unless resulting in a disproportionate award, in which case the arbitrator, like a court, can limit the award to a reasonable fee. E.g., Central Fidelity Bank v. McLellan, 563 A.2d 358 (D.C. Ct. App. 1989) (agreed 25% fee for collection may be awarded if reasonable); F.W. Bolgiano & Co. v. Brown, 333 A.2d 674, 675 (D.C. Ct. App. 1975); (court should not impose 10% maximum on fee award in collection case). It is not self-evident that a charge of 15% of the balance owing will likely be unrelated to actual costs or will otherwise likely be excessive.[12]

Representation By Law Firm Adverse To Former Client In A Substantially Related Matter After Lawyers Who Represented Former Client Have Left The Law Firm

• A law firm may undertake representation adverse to a former client in a matter substantially related to the matter for the former client, provided that (i) all firm lawyers who represented the former client in the first matter have left the firm, and (ii) no lawyer remaining in the firm has, or has access to, confidences or secrets of the former client that are material to the related matter for the second client. New District of Columbia Rule 1.10(c) would compel a contrary result on and after its effective date of January 1, 1991. However, on the facts presented, and assuming the representation would otherwise continue after January 1, 1991, new Rule 1.10(c) should not be applied in this case to require the law firm to resign as counsel for the second client; the representation approved herein may continue after January 1, 1991.

Inquiry

The inquirer is a law firm ("the Law Firm"). Beginning in late 1983 and continuing through November 1987 the Law Firm represented a client ("First Client") in connection with First Client's negotiation of a billion dollar construction contract with the United States Government for a large military facility in a foreign country.

First Client as the overall construction manager-engineer is in substance the general contractor for the project. The project is ongoing and is not expected to be completed until sometime in the mid-1990's.

In March 1987, one of the two partners of the Law Firm who had been principally involved in the representation of First Client resigned from the Law Firm and joined another law firm ("Second Law Firm"). The other partner remaining in the Law Firm who had been involved in the representation of First Client continued to handle all matters for First Client, with the occasional help of other partners and associates. The Law Firm's 11 The majority asserts that the arbitrators must be paid, but in AAA arbitration the arbitrators normally work without a fee.

12 For example, with a debt of $10,000 a 15% charge would be $1,500, or 15 hours at $100/hour, which scarcely seems excessive.

1 Rules of Professional Conduct and Related Comments (effective January 1, 1991), promulgated by Order of the District of Columbia Court of appeals dated March 1, 1990.

representation of First Client included several matters in addition to and unrelated to the military construction project.

In October 1987, as the Law Firm was nearing the end of the lengthy contract negotiation process and related matters on behalf of First Client with the U.S. Government, a long-time client of the Law Firm ("Second Client") became a major subcontractor on the project, and asked the Law Firm to represent it vis-a-vis the project generally. At that time there were no disputes or anticipated disputes between First Client (the general contractor) and Second Client (the subcontractor).

In October 1987 the Law Firm obtained written consent of First Client to its representation of a Second Client, the consent containing this condition:

> "However, in the event of a dispute or conflict of any interest between [Second Client] and [First Client]...we would expect [the Law Firm] to remove itself from any contact or distribution of any information to any of the parties."

The Law Firm then undertook the representation of Second Client in connection with the project. The representation of Second Client was undertaken by lawyers in the Law Firm other than the lawyers who had been involved in the representation of First Client. A month later (in November 1987), apparently by coincidence, the other partner of the Law Firm who had been in charge of all matters for First Client resigned from the Law Firm and joined the same Second Law Firm that the first departing partner had joined eight months earlier. That second departing partner took all files of First Client with him to Second Law Firm.

Thus, in early November 1987, the Law Firm completely ceased to represent First Client, which thereupon and thereafter was represented by Second Law Firm on all continuing aspects of the construction project, including recurring disputes between First Client and the U.S. Government, and recurring disputes between First Client and various subcontractors.

In late 1988 disputes began to occur between First Client represented by Second Law Firm, and Second Client relating to the construction project. The Law Firm represented Second Client in connection with those disputes.

As the disputes between First Client and Second Client became more numerous and more serious, First Client in late 1989 asserted that the Law Firm must withdraw as counsel for Second Client on all disputes between First Client and Second client.

The Law Firm in its inquiry represents that, when the partner who was in charge of First Client's matters left the Law Firm in November 1987 and took all of First Client's files with him, as of that time and at all relevant times thereafter,

(a) nobody remaining at the Law Firm had any "confidences" or "secrets" of First Client within the meaning of DR 4-104(A),

(b) nobody remaining at the Law Firm had any "information [pertaining to First Client] protected by Rule 1.6" within the meaning of Rule 1.10(c), and

(c) there were no files or other records of First Client remaining within the premises of the Law Firm containing any information described in the preceding clauses (a) and (b), material to the Law Firm's ongoing representation of Second Client's contractual disputes with First Client.

Discussion

It is clear that the lawyer-client relationship between the Law Firm and Second Client that is being challenged by First Client will continue well beyond January 1, 1991 in the ordinary course of events. Therefore, among other things, this inquiry presents a novel issue as to the applicability of Rule 1.10(c) to this case when that Rule becomes effective in the District of Columbia on January 1, 1991.

In responding to this inquiry we turn first to the "current" law; we then analyze the "new" law, namely, rule 1.10(c). Before considering "the law," it is necessary to announced a caveat, and to discuss the issue presented by First Client's conditional consent (referred to above) to the Law Firm's representation of Second Client.

First, the caveat: the Law Firm's representation that it has no relevant confidences or secrets of First Client appears to be consistent with the facts available to the Committee. We therefore assume the accuracy of that representation, and it is a fundamental premise in responding to this inquiry. It is not the function of this Committee to make its own determination on such fact-intensive issues.[2]

Second, it is the Committee's view that as a matter of legal ethics the conditions imposed on the Law Firm by First Client in October 1987 when it consented to the Law Firm's representation of Second Client are no longer binding on the Law Firm. The reason is that those conditions were based on the assumption by all concerned that somebody at the Law Firm would continue to be in possession of, or have access to, relevant confidences or secrets of First Client, and the Law Firm's acceptance of those conditions was based on that assumption. Because that assumption is no longer correct, in our opinion those conditions no longer raise ethical concerns. Therefore, and from the viewpoint strictly of legal ethics, this inquiry is analyzed without further reference to First Client's conditional consent to the Law Firm's representation of Second Client[3]. We now turn to the applicable law.

Current Law

The Committee concludes that the Law Firm's representation of Second Client is materially adverse to First Client, and that the matter on which the Law Firm is representing Second Client is substantially related to the matter on which the Law Firm previously represented First Client. See, e.g., Comment [2] under new District of Columbia Rule 1.9, which makes it clear that the substantial relationship criterion is to be analyzed by reference to existing federal case law. An illustrative case is United States Football League v. National Football League, 605 F. Supp. 1448

2 It appears from the material submitted to the committee by the Law Firm and First Client that the only matter relating to this construction project that any current partner or employee of the Law Firm was involved in prior to the transfer by First Client of its business and its fields to Second Law Firm in November 1987 was this: in late 1985 and early 1986, an associate (who is now a partner) of the Law firm logged eight hours of time researching the quesiton of what remedies might be available to first Client if the U.S. Government purported to terminate the then-existing letter argreement with First Client. The Law Firm has advised the Committee that the person involved has no present recollection of that research (which he turned over to one of the partners who left the Law Firm in 1987), and that in any event he did not obtain in connection with that research any "confidences" or "secrets" of First Client material to the later contractual disputes between first Client and Second Client.

3 The Committee expresses no opinion on the question whether, as a matter of contract law, or on some other basis, First Client may enforce the October 1987 conditions against the Law Firm.

In this case, however, the combination of adverse representation and a substantial relationship is not the end of the analysis. There are no District of Columbia cases or opinions of this Committee precisely on point, but a consensus has emerged in the Code of Professional Responsibility states generally that, under DR 4-101 and DR 5-105, the Law Firm's representation of Second Client in these circumstances is permissible, because nobody at the Law Firm has, or has access to, relevant confidences or secrets of First Client. Since 1983, that principle has been codified in what is now ABA Model Rule 1.10(b):

> "(b)When a lawyer has terminated an association with a firm, the firm is not prohibited from thereafter representing a person with interests materially adverse to those of a client represented by the formerly associated lawyer and not currently represented by the firm, unless:
> "(1)the matter is the same or substantially related to that in which the formerly associated lawyer represented the client; and
> "(2)any lawyer remaining in the firm has information protected by Rules 1.6 and 1.9(c) that is material to the matter."[4]

Thus, "current" law, as evidenced by and codified in ABA Model Rule 1.10(b), predicates disqualification on (i) a substantial relationship and (ii) possession of relevant confidences or secrets of the former client. In this case, predicate (ii) is absent, so the Law Firm's representation of Second Client is proper under current law.

New Law

District of Columbia Rule 1.10(c), the counterpart of ABA Model Rule 1.10(b), would disqualify the Law Firm (effective January 1, 1991) because the D.C. Rule is drafted in the disjunctive: it predicates disqualification on (i) a substantial relationship or (ii) possession of relevant confidences or secrets of the former client:

> "(c) When a lawyer has terminated an association with a firm, the firm is not prohibited from thereafter representing a person with interests materially adverse to those of a client represented by the formerly associated lawyer during the association unless:
> "(1) the matter is the same or substantially related to that in which the formerly associated lawyer represented the client during such former association; or
> "(2) any lawyer remaining in the firm has information protected by Rule 1.6 that is material to the matter."

The District of Columbia deviation from ABA Model Rule 1.10(b), resulting in the more restrictive District of Columbia Rule 1.10(c) quoted above, is both explicit and deliberate. The original version of the District of Columbia rules was drafted by the District of Columbia Bar Model Rules of Professional Conduct Committee (commonly referred to as the "Jordan Committee" after the name of its Chair, Robert E. Jordan, III, Esquire). The Jordan Committee in its September 1985 Report to the District of Columbia Bar Board of Governors proposed the deviation from the ABA version. The Jordan Committee's proposal was adopted by the Bar Board of Governors in its November 19, 1986 Petition to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, and by the Court of Appeals in its September 1, 1988 Proposed Rules, and in its March 1, 1990 Order promulgating the new Rules.

The Jordan Committee, acknowledging that the question was a close one, explained its stricter version of Rule 1.10(c) as follows:

> "The ABA [Rule 1.10(b)] would disqualify the firm only if the matter were the same matter or substantially related to a matter in which the departing lawyer represented the client while with the firm and a lawyer still with the firm possessed client confidences or secrets material to the matter. [Emphasis in original.] The Committee thought it wrong that adverse representation should be allowed, in any kind of matter, where client confidences or secrets material to the matter remain in the firm. It therefore proposes changing the ABA's 'and' to 'or' in paragraph (c). It is a closer question whether the possession by a remaining lawyer of confidences or secrets should not be the sole test for firm disqualification. The committee believed, however, that it is appropriate to provide for disqualification in the same or related matter to avoid the unseemly spectacle of all the lawyers responsible for a particular piece of litigation leaving a firm and the firm turning up the next day as counsel for the opposing party. Apart from the general unseemliness of such a situation, the firm might well have in its files, or in the knowledge paralegals or other nonlegal personnel, significant confidences or secrets of the former client. Rather than requiring an inquiry into the knowledge of confidences or secrets, paragraph (c) simply forbids representation by the former firm in such circumstances." [Bold type in original.]

Consistent with the foregoing, the official Comment under District of Columbia Rule 1.10 contains the following explanation of Rule 1.10(c):

> "[17] Conversely, when a lawyer terminates as association with a firm, paragraph (c) provides that the old firm may not thereafter represent clients whose interests are materially adverse to those of the formerly associated lawyer's client in respect to a matter which is the same or substantially related to a matter with respect to which the formerly associated lawyer represented the client during the former association. For example, if a lawyer who represented a client in a litigation while with Firm A departs the firm, taking to the lawyer's new firm the litigation, Firm A may not, despite the departure of the lawyer, who takes the matter and the client to the new firm, undertake a representation adverse to the former client in that same litigation."

The Jordan Committee, the Board of Governors, and the Court all were concerned about what the Jordan Committee described as the "unseemly spectacle" (not present in this case) of a law firm switching sides in a pending case immediately following the departure from the firm of all of the lawyers who had previously been involved on the other side of that case. In addition, the Jordan Committee expressed its concern about a key issue identified above: the difficulty of determining as a matter of fact exactly what information the lawyers remaining in a firm have in their heads or in their files following the departure of a lawyer or group of lawyers who had represented a former client.

The "effective date" or "retroactivity" issue presented by this inquiry appears to have been anticipated at least to some extent by the Court of Appeals in its March 1, 1990 Order, which contains the following paragraph:

> "FURTHER ORDERED, that with respect to conduct occurring before January 1, 1991, the provisions of the Code of Professional Responsibility in 4 This ABA Model Rule was lettered 1.10(c) when it was originally promulgated in 1983; it was relettered 1.10(b) without substantive change as part of the ABA's February 1989 revisions of the Model Rules.

effect on the date of the conduct in question are the governing rules of decision for this court, the Board on Professional Responsibility, its hearing committees, and the Bar Counsel."

The foregoing effective date provision appears to us to encourage restraint in applying new Rule 1.10(c) in the circumstances presented by this inquiry. We therefore conclude that in this case the Law Firm's representation of Second Client should be permitted to continue on and after January 1, 1991.

The issue presented by this inquiry may not be unique, and it is therefore appropriate to provide clarity and guidance for others similarly situated. We observe that our conclusion could have been, but is not, based on the fact that the representation at issue here commenced prior to March 1, 1990, the date of the Court of Appeals' final Order promulgating the new Rules. It is self-evident that, because of the Court's well-publicized January 1, 1991 effective date, many members of the Bar (including many of the most conscientious and best-informed members) will not read and analyze the new Rules until toward the end of the year. The Court in its Preface to the new Rules explicitly acknowledged that the new Rules are "complex and comprehensive," and urged Bar members to attend "educational workshops" to be sponsored by the Bar "[o]ver the course of the next year." Those workshops, which are now being planned, will not commence until October of this year and are not expected to be completed until mid-November at the earliest.

It is therefore unrealistic and unreasonable to assume that members of the Bar have actual knowledge or to charge them with constructive knowledge of the content of the new Rules as of March 1, 1990 or as of any other date prior to January 1, 1991. Accordingly, we hold that, if a lawyer-client relationship formed prior to January 1, 1991 was proper when commenced and continued to be proper under ethics principles applicable prior to January 1, 1991, the new Rules of Professional Conduct should not be applied on and after January 1, 1991 to require the abrupt termination of any such previously proper relationship.

Inquiry

This inquiry arises out of a post-trial ineffective assistance of counsel proceeding in the Superior Court. The inquirer argued in that proceeding that his predecessor's representation of a criminal defendant was ineffective because predecessor counsel failed to secure enforceable process upon a witness ("Witness B") whose testimony allegedly would have exculpated the defendant. Predecessor counsel had located another witness ("Witness A") who advised him that she had heard Witness B confess to the crime in question. Predecessor counsel spoke to Witness B, who promised to be present for trial. Witness B was mailed a subpoena. However, it is not clear whether Witness B was properly served with the subpoena, and he did not appear for trial.

In supporting the ineffective assistance of counsel petition, the inquirer submitted an affidavit from Witness A that recounted the inculpatory statement Witness B allegedly made in her presence.[1] The petition argued, inter alia, that the failure to secure enforceable service of a subpoena upon Witness B was prejudicial to the client and rendered predecessor counsel's assistance ineffective.

Some months after the court took the matter under advisement, the inquirer located Witness B, who denied making any statements of any kind to Witness A. The inquirer asks whether he has an ethical obligation to inform the court that Witness B denies making the inculpatory statement.

Discussion

Consideration of this inquiry must start with DR 4-101, "Preservation of confidences and secrets of a client." The information that the inquirer learned from his interview of Witness B -- that Witness B denies making inculpatory statements to Witness A -- comes within the definition of a "secret." DR 4-101(A) (a secret is information, other than confidence, that is "gained in the professional relationship...the disclosure of which...would be likely to be detrimental to the client."[2] Thus, unless the disclosure of the secret is "permitted under DR 4-101(C)," the inquirer may not reveal the information he learned from Witness B. DR 4-101(B)(1).

The only provision of DR 4-101(C) that would appear relevant to this inquiry is subparagraph (2), which allows disclosure of confidences and secrets "when permitted under Disciplinary Rules or required by law or court order." Under this standard, the Committee concludes that the inquirer may not reveal his client's secret.[3]

1. DR 7-102(A)(4) (Knowing use of false evidence).

It is true that the inquirer now possesses information that conflicts with the sworn statement of Witness A, a statement that the inquirer has presented to the court. However, inquirer states that he submitted Witness A's statement to the court before he located and interviewed Witness B. Thus, on the facts presented, there appears to be no violation of DR 7-102(A)(4), because the element of counsel's prior knowledge of any falsity is absent.

1 Although Witness A testified at the criminal trial, the inquirer advises that testimony regarding Witness B's statement was not elicited, because Witness A had not been "asked the proper questions." The Committee offers no opinion regarding this assertion.

2 See also Comment 6 to Rule 1.6 of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, which provides that the prohibition against disclosure of secrets "exists without regard to the nature or source of the information or the fact that others share the knowledge."

3 This opinion is limited to consideration of disclosures "permitted under Disciplinary Rules." The inquiry makes no reference to a court order mandating disclosure of the secret, so the Committee presumes no such order exists. See Opinion 180. Whether the inquirer was or is "required by law" to disclose the information in question is a legal issue that is beyond the authority of the Committee to decides. Id. at n. 1.

The simple existence of conflicting witness statements does not by itself rise to the level of "knowledge" that one such statement is false. See Butler v. United States, 414 A.2d 844 at 850 (D.C. App. 1979) and the cases cited therein. In any event, when the inquirer presented Witness A's affidavit to the court, he had no knowledge that Witness B would make a contrary statement. The Committee therefore cannot conclude that, in submitting Witness A's affidavit, the inquirer knowingly submitted a false statement.

2. DR 7-102(A)(5) (Knowing false statement of fact).

Similarly, under the facts presented, the inquirer did not knowingly make false statements of fact in his petition, to the extent that he argued that Witness B would have exculpated the defendant had the witness been required to appear at trial. DR 7-102(A)(5). The element of knowledge of any falsity at the time the statement may have been made to the court is lacking.[4]

3. DR 7-102(B)(2) (Revealing fraud upon a tribunal by a non-client).

Finally, there is the question whether DR 7-102(B)(2) requires counsel to reveal to the court the conflict between the statements of Witness A and Witness B, on the grounds that Witness A's statement amounts to a "fraud upon a tribunal" by a non-client. The Committee concludes that DR 7-102(B)(2) does not mandate disclosure under these facts.

The obligation to disclose non-client fraud is predicated upon a lawyer's having received "information clearly establishing" the fraud. See In re Grievance Committee of U.S. District Court, 847 F.2d 57, 62-63 (2d Cir. 1988) (interpreting DR 7-102(B) as requiring "actual knowledge of a fraud.") The Committee believes that, standing alone, the conflicting statements described in the inquiry do not clearly establish that Witness A's statement is false.

Conclusion

Under the facts presented, the inquirer must preserve the confidences and secrets of his client. The inquirer therefore is not ethically obligated to disclose to the Court the information he learned from his interview of Witness B. Indeed, such disclosure at present would be prohibited.[5]

However, the inquirer must exercise care in any future dealings with the court in this matter. Given his present knowledge that Witness B denies making inculpatory statements to Witness A, the inquirer should insure that any future representations to the court regarding what Witness B's testimony would have been do not run afoul of the inquirer's ethical obligations. See In re Austern, 524 A.2d 680 (D.C. App. 1987).

Disclosure to Internal Revenue Service of Name of Client Paying Fee in Cash

Applicable Code Provisions

- DR 4-101(B), Rule 1.6(a)(A Lawyer Shall Not Knowingly Reveal A Confidence or Secret of the Lawyer's Client Nor Use a Confidence or Secret of the Client to the Client's Disadvantage.)
- DR 4-101(C)(3); Rule 1.6(d)A Lawyer May Reveal Confidences or Secrets When Permitted Under Disciplinary Rules or Required by Law or Court Order.)

This Inquiry raises an important issue concerning the confidentiality of client names requested to be disclosed under government reporting requirements.

Facts

The Inquirer, a law firm, represented a client in connection with drug related criminal charges to which the client has pleaded guilty, been sentenced and served his term of incarceration. In partial payment of the firm's outstanding bill for services, the client remitted in excess of $12,000 in cash. In accepting the cash payment, the firm explained to the client that the firm would be required to submit Form 8300, Report of Cash Payments Over $10,000 Received In a Trade or Business, to the Internal Revenue Service. At the client's insistence, the firm agreed to withhold the client's name from Form 8300. The firm advised the client, however, that the Internal Revenue Service might seek to compel disclosure of the client's name, and he agreed to accept financial responsibility for the firm's efforts in resisting disclosure. The client, however, still owes a substantial amount to the firm from its prior representation of him.

More than a year after submitting the redacted Form 8300, the firm was served with an administrative summons, directing the firm's managing partner to appear before an IRS Revenue Agent to give testimony and to produce for examination the following information relating to the Form 8300:

> The unredacted, unaltered, originals of all records related to or associated with the attached Form(s) 8300 filed by you, including but not limited to accounting records, cash receipts journals, bank records, escrow account records, payment records, contracts, which contain the following information necessary to complete the attached Form(s) 8300:
> 1. The complete name(s), address(es), business or occupation(s) and social security or taxpayer identification numbers(s) of any and all clients (whether individual(s) and/or organization(s)) for whom the transaction(s) reported were completed.
> 2. The complete name(s), address(es) and taxpayer identification number(s) of any and all individuals conducting the reported transaction(s), if different from the information in item number 1.
> 3. The passport number(s) and country(ies) of origin and/or alien registration number(s) and coun-try(ies) of origin for all foreign individual(s) or organization(s) who conducted the transaction(s) or for whom the transaction(s) was/were completed.
> 4. Any other identifying data for the individual(s) or organization(s) who conducted the transaction(s) or for whom the transaction(s) was/were conducted.

The firm has refused to comply with the summons pending the Committee's resolution of this Inquiry, which raises three questions:

1. Whether the firm is obligated pursuant to its ethical responsibilities to withhold from the IRS the client's identity notwithstanding the pending summons from the IRS?
2. If so, what is the extent of that obligation? Does it include an obligation to file an action seeking to quash the summons, to be held in contempt, or to appeal any adverse

4 Nonetheless, as noted below, the inquirer must take care to avoid knowlingly making false statements in the future.

5 The Committee concludes that the result reached in this opinion would be the same under the Rules of Professional Conduct that will go into effect in the District of Columbia on January 1, 1991. See Rules 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information) and 3.3 (Candor toward The Tribunal).

decision by an IRS administrative tribunal or by a district court?

3. In what way, if any, does the client's failure to meet his financial obligations affect the firm's obligation to litigate these issues on his behalf?

Discussion

DR 4-101(B) of the Code of Professional Responsibility provides that a lawyer shall not knowingly "reveal a confidence or secret of his client." DR 4-101(C)(2) allows disclosure of "[c]onfidences and secrets when permitted under Disciplinary Rules or required by law or court order." Similar rules apply under Rule 1.6 of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct (effective January 1, 1991).

In Opinion No. 180 (March 17, 1987), the Committee summarized its prior opinions relating to the disclosure of client information to governmental authorities, stating "[t]he consistent rule we have followed is that, in the absence of on-going criminal activity, a lawyer may not voluntarily compromise the client's position." In Opinion No. 99 (January 28, 1981), the Committee stated that where there is a "colorable basis" for asserting that statements made to an attorney are confidences or secrets protected from disclosure by DR-4-101, "the lawyer must resolve the question...in favor of preserving the confidentiality of the disclosures." Accord: Opinion No. 186 (October 20, 1987).

Opinion No. 124 (March 22, 1983) involved facts similar to those presented here. In the course of a routine audit of a law firm's federal tax returns, the IRS auditor was provided a record of the firm's receipts with the clients' names deleted. The auditor then requested the firm to provide the clients' names. The firm had represented members of Congress under circumstances the disclosure of which, the firm believed, could be damaging to the Members' careers. It requested guidance as to whether under these circumstances it could accede to the auditor's request.

The Committee held in Opinion No. 124 that "whenever a client requests nondisclosure of the fact of representation, or circumstances suggest that such disclosure would embarrass or detrimentally affect any client, the fact of the firm's representation of that client is a client 'confidence' or 'secret' subject to the protections accorded by the other provisions of Canon 4." The firm could not therefore voluntarily accede to the auditor's request. Furthermore, the Committee held, "...if the IRS does issue a summons, the inquirer's firm may not automatically comply with it. Rather, the firm remains under an ethical obligation to resist disclosure until either the consent of the client is obtained or the firm has exhausted available avenues of appeal with respect to the summons." Only after the firm is ordered by a court to disclose the names of its clients may it do so.

The client in this case has requested that the firm withhold his name from the Internal Revenue Service; moreover, as in Opinion No. 124, disclosure of the client's name to the Internal Revenue Service could "embarrass or detrimentally affect" the client.[1] An important difference between this case and Opinion No. 124, however, is that the name of the firm's client is not sought under the IRS' general authority to examine "relevant and material" books and records. See, 26 U.S.C. §7602(a)(1). Section 6050I of the Internal Revenue Code, the statutory authority for Form 8300, is narrowly and specifically drawn to require disclosure of the names and other identifying information of persons making cash payments in excess of $10,000 received in the course of a trade or business. Civil and criminal penalties are available to enforce its provisions. See, 26 U.S.C. §§6721, 6724(d) and 7203. Section 06050I is, therefore, a "law" which may justify disclosure of client confidences or secrets under DR 4-101(C)(2) in an appropriate case.

It does not necessarily follow that disclosure of the client's name is "required by" section 6050I in this case or other similar cases. Under the present state of the law, substantial good faith arguments exist as to whether law firms are a "trade or business" within the meaning of section 6050I[2] and whether Congress intended the statute to override traditional lawyer-client confidentiality.[3] Until these and any other questions regarding the coverage of section 6050I in a particular case are resolved definitively by the courts, our prior Opinions are clear that a firm may not ethically disclose the name of its client on Form 8300 without the client's consent.[4] Furthermore, since the IRS' administrative summons is intended to obtain the information withheld from Form 8300, the firm may not voluntarily disclose the client's name in response to the summons.

Our prior Opinions also address the firm's second question regarding the extent of the duty to resist compelled disclosure of client confidences and secrets. In Opinion No. 14 (January 26, 1976) we were asked to define the extent of an attorney's duty to protect the confidentiality of a former client's records subpoenaed by a grand jury. We stated that "it is the lawyer's ethical duty to a former client to assert on the former client's behalf every objection or claim of privilege available to him when to do so might be prejudicial to the client." In Opinion No. 124, involving IRS, we stated that "the attorney must assert in the pending proceeding the client's interests in nondisclosure." See also, Opinion No. 99 (January 28, 1981) ("inquirer's obligation is to assert before the grand jury the confidentiality of those statements"); Opinion No. 180 (absent the client's consent to disclosure, the attorney "must assert the confidentiality of the documents and information....") Thus, if the IRS files an action to enforce its summons,

1 The government, for example, may prosecute a taxpayer for failing to report income by demonstrating that the defendant's net worth is so substantial that it may be inferred that he or she received income that was not reported to the IRS. E.g., Holland v. U.S., 348 U.S. 121 (1954); United States v. Citron, 783 F.2d 307 (2d Cir. 1986).

2 The American Bar Association and other lawyers' organizations urged the IRS to include an exception for attorney's fees in the regulations issued under Section 6050I. The IRS refused. See, 51 F.R. 31610 (September 4, 1986).

3 The identity of an attorney's client and information regarding the payment of attorneys' fees generally are not protected from forced disclosure by the attorney-client privilege. See, e.g., In re Semel, 411 F. 2d 195 (3rd Cir. 1969); U.S. v. Fenlag, 434 f. 2d 596 (6th Cir. 1970); In re Grand Jury Proceedings, (Rabin v. U.S.), 896 F.2d 1297 (11th Cir. 1990). Exceptions to this rule have been recognized, however, hwere the values promoted by the privilege outweigh the need for disclosrue of the client's identity. See, e.g., Baird v. Koepher, 279 F.2d 623 (9th Cir. 1960); Tillotson v. Boughner, 350 F.2d 663 7th Cir. 1965); NLRB v. Harvey, 349 F.2d 900 (4th Cir. 1965); In re Gand Jury Proceedings (U.S. v. Jones), 517 F.2d 666 (5th Cir. 1975); In re grand Jury Investigation No. 83-2-35, 723 F.2d. 447 (6th Cir. 1983).

4 The Professional Responsibility Committee of the Chicago Bar Association has similarly concluded that an attorney should not reveal the name of a client to the IRS in Form 8300 because the application of the statute to attorneys is unclear. Docket No. 86-2 (5-11-88).

the firm must assert the client's objections to disclosure.[5]

Our prior Opinions are not entirely clear as to whether a lawyer who is ordered by a court to disclose client confidences or secrets may comply immediately with this order or must seek review of a higher court. In Opinion No. 124, we said with respect to an IRS subpoena that the firm could not comply until it had obtained its clients' consent or "exhausted available avenues of appeal with respect to the summons." It is not clear, however, whether the Committee intended the word "appeal" to mean a court's initial review of the agency's decision or a higher court's review of an initial judicial order. Our other opinions in this area suggest that the lawyer need not appeal an initial judicial order to a higher court, although he or she must allow the client an opportunity to do so. In Opinion No. 14, for example, we stated that "the attorney is...free to comply with whatever directive the trial court gives." (Emphasis added.) In Opinion No. 83 we stated that an attorney "is not obliged to run the risk of being held in contempt of court because of the client's desire that confidences and secrets not be disclosed." And, in Opinion No. 180 we stated that "if attorney is ordered by a court to disclose the client information, he must not make disclosure until he has given the client an opportunity to appeal the order to a higher tribunal." (Emphasis added.)

The trend of our prior decisions is supported by the new Rules of Professional Conduct. Comment 26 to Rule 1.6 states:

> If a lawyer is called as a witness to give testimony concerning a client, absent waiver by the client, paragraph (d)(2) requires the lawyer to invoke the privilege when it is applicable. The lawyer may comply with the final orders of a court or other tribunal of competent jurisdiction requiring the lawyer to give information about the client. But a lawyer ordered by a court to disclose client confidences or secrets should not comply with the order until the lawyer has personally made every reasonable effort to appeal the order or has notified the client of the order and given the client the opportunity to challenge it.

In light of our prior decisions and Comment 26, we conclude that the law firm here may comply with a final judicial order enforcing an IRS summons without seeking appellate review of that order, but only after giving its client notice of the court's order and a reasonable opportunity to seek review independently of the firm.[6]

Finally, in response to the firm's third question, the fact that the client is in arrears in his payments to the firm does not relieve the firm of its basic ethical obligation to resist disclosure in response to the IRS summons. The Committee has consistently held that DR 4-101(c) prohibits disclosure of confidences and secrets of a former client. See, e.g., Opinion Nos. 14, 58, 96, 99, 124, 175, 180, 186. In none of these opinions was there any suggestion that the Committee envisioned that the lawyer would be compensated by the former client for his or her efforts in protecting against disclosure. Indeed, in two of our previous decisions, the client was currently represented by other counsel at the time that the information was demanded and we nevertheless found an obligation on the part of the former attorney to resist disclosure. See, Opinion Nos. 14, 83. The ethical obligation of lawyers to protect the confidences and secrets of their clients is not a matter of contract between the lawyer and client; the obligation arises because "confidentiality is essential to the role of the lawyer in the administration of justice," Opinion No. 180, and because, under Canon 1, every lawyer has a duty "to assist in maintaining the integrity and competence of the legal profession."[7]

Adopted September 18, 1990

5 In appearing and asserting the client's objections to disclosure, the firm is serving, in effect, as a witness in the proceeding. Whether the firm must go further and act as an advocate for the client's position will depend upon a number of circumstances including whether the client or former client has been notified of the proceeding and whether the client or former client has been able to retain separate counsel to advocate his or her interests in teh proceeding. Where the client or former client is unable to participate because he or she is incarcerated, incapacitated or unable to afford separate counsel, the firm may have an obligation to act as an advocate for the clients or former client.

6 A duty to appeal the order may exist, however, where the client is unable to act. See, supra note 5.

7 It is possible that a lawyer may have an action against a current or former client who refuses to pay for such services although having the means to do so, especially where, as here, the representation with respect to disclosure has previously been agreed to by the client. This is a question of law which is beyond the jurisdication of this Committee.

Communication with Potential Client Currently Represented by Other Counsel

• A lawyer is not prohibited by the Code of Professional Responsibility or the Rules of Professional Conduct from communicating with a person who is currently represented by counsel for the purpose of determining whether such person may wish to retain the lawyer and discharge the current lawyer.

Applicable Code Provisions

• DR 7-104(A)(1) (Communicating with One of Adverse Interest)
• DR 2-104 (Suggestion of Need of Legal Services)

Applicable Rules Provision[1]

• Rule 4.2(a) (Communication Between Lawyer and Opposing Parties)

The Inquiry

The inquirer is an attorney who was retained to represent a client in a matter on which the client was then being represented by other counsel. The client was apparently dissatisfied with the first attorney's representation. The inquirer wrote the first attorney advising him that the inquirer had been retained and asking that he turn over the client's file. The client had met all her financial obligations to the former attorney. The former attorney wrote the inquirer accusing her of unethical conduct, apparently on the theory that the inquirer spoke with the client on the subject of the representation before the client had discharged the former attorney. The former attorney also demanded payment of $13.75 to cover photocopying the client's file and postage to mail it to the new attorney.

The inquirer asks for the Committee's views on whether it is unethical for an attorney to offer advice and legal services to a person who is already represented by counsel and who expresses dissatisfaction with his or her current attorney.

Discussion

There is no provision of the Code of

1 The Rules of Professional Conduct are effective on January 1, 1991. They are cited as Rule_____. The Code of Professional Responsibility is cited as DR_____.

Professional Responsibility or the Rules of Professional Conduct which prohibits an attorney from conferring with a potential client who is already represented by counsel on the matter. Nevertheless the Committee believes there is a common misconception among some members of the bar that such contact is prohibited until after the client has first discharged the prior lawyer.

DR 7-104 (Communicating With One of Adverse Interest) provides:

> (1) Communicate or cause another to communicate on the subject of the representation with a party he knows to be represented by a lawyer in that matter unless he has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other party or is authorized by law to do so.

Does DR 7-104(A)(1) prohibit a lawyer from communicating with a person who is already represented by counsel for the purpose of having that person possibly retain the lawyer and discharge the prior lawyer? In our opinion DR 7-104 does not prohibit such communication. Neither the text of the rule itself nor the purpose underlying the rule admits of such an interpretation.

The title of the rule, Communication With One of Adverse Interest, indicates that the represented person with whom the lawyer may not communicate without permission is a party adverse to that lawyer's client, not a person who has sought the lawyer's advice and representation to replace an attorney previously retained for the matter.[2] The rule refers to communication "during the course of [the lawyer's] representation of a client"--a lawyer consulting with a potential client is not engaging in a communication during the course of representation, since at this point the lawyer does not yet have a client. The communication which is prohibited is with "a party [the lawyer] knows to be represented" without consent of "such other party['s]" lawyer--the reference to other party can only mean a party other than the party being represented by the lawyer seeking the communication. Rule of Professional Conduct 4.2(a)(Communication Between Lawyer and Opposing Parties) is virtually identical to DR 7-104(A)(1). Therefore, the result would be the same under the new rules.

DR 2-104 prohibits a lawyer who has given unsolicited advice to a layperson from accepting employment resulting from the advice under two circumstances, where the advice includes a statement that is false, fraudulent, misleading or deception, and where the advice involves coercion or other overreaching. There is nothing in DR 2-104 which prohibits a lawyer from giving advice to a person already represented by counsel when the client has sought the lawyer's advice. The analogous provision in the Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 7.1(b) prohibits solicitation of employment by any of several inappropriate means, including false statements and undue influence.

Finally, although we were not asked to comment on the former lawyer's demand for payment to photocopy and mail the file, we note that we have previously addressed a client's right to have a former lawyer provide file materials to the current lawyer in Legal Ethics Committee Opinion 168.

Opinion No. 216

Representation of Closely Held Corporation In Action Against Corporate Shareholder

Applicable Rules Provision

- Rule 1.13(a)(Organization as Client)

A and B were each 50% shareholders of C, a close corporation organized under Maryland law which did business in the District of Columbia.

C had a banking relationship with U, which also extended personal loans to A and B, individually. A and B have defaulted on their loan payments to U. C has filed an action in the District of Columbia against U, alleging a wrongful termination of the banking relationship.

Following the filing of C's action against U, U obtained a judgment against A and, as the result of a Sheriff's execution sale, U became the owner of A's 50% interest in C. A, however, maintains that he is still President of C, since C's two shareholders, B and U are deadlocked and a majority vote is needed to remove him. U has filed an action in the Maryland courts to dissolve C because of shareholder deadlock. This action is still pending.

B's widow, who has succeeded to B's interest in C, wishes to maintain C's action against U. U, of course, wishes to discontinue the action. The question in this Inquiry is whether C's corporate lawyer, retained when C was controlled by A and B, may continue to represent C in its action against U, now one of its 50% shareholders, and in U's action to dissolve C.

Discussion

The Inquiry is governed by Rule 1.13 of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct. Under Rule 1.13(a), "[a] lawyer employed or retained by an organization represents the organization acting through its duly authorized constituents." This rule embodies the well-established principle that a lawyer retained by a corporation, or by any other organization recognized as a separate legal entity, represents the entity. As stated in EC 5-18 of the former Code of Professional Responsibility, "[a] lawyer employed or retained by a corporation or similar entity owes his allegiance to the entity and not to a shareholder, director, officer, employee, representative, or other person connected with the entity." See, Opinion 159 (1985); Opinion 186 (1987); Egan v. McNamara, 467 A.2d 733, 738 (D.C.Ct. of App. 1983).

The principle that a lawyer representing a corporation represents the entity and not its individual shareholders or other constituents applies even when the shareholders come into conflict with the entity. Courts have generally held, therefore, that a corporation's lawyer is not disqualified from representing the corporation in litigation against its constituents. See, e.g., Bobbitt v. Victorian House, Inc., 545 F. Supp. 1124 (N.D. Ill. 1982); Dalrymple v. National Bank and Trust Co. of Traverse City, 615 F. Supp. 979 (W.D. Mich. 1985); U.S. Industries, Inc. v. Goldman, 421 F. Supp. 7 (S.D. N.Y. 1976); Wayland v. Shore Lobster & Shrimp Corp., 537 F. Supp. 1220 (S.D. N.Y. 1982). A different result may sometimes be required where the shareholders of a closely held corporation reasonably might have believed they had a personal lawyer-client relationship with the corporation's lawyer. See, e.g., Rosman v. Shapiro, 653 F. Supp. 1441 (S.D. N.Y. 1987); In re Brownstein, 288 Or. 83, 602 P. 2d 655 (1979); In re Banks, 283 Or. 459, 584 P. 2d 284 (1978). This is not such a case, however, since under the circumstances U, the bank, could not reasonably believe it has or had a personal lawyer-client relationship with C's lawyer.

2 Of course, the lawyer may not represent the client in any event if the lawyer has a conflict of interest. DR 5-101. Our opinion presupposes that there is no other such conflict that would prevent the lawyer from taking on this particular client.

Since C's lawyer is not disqualified from continuing to represent C in its litigation with one of its 50% shareholders, the question arises how the lawyer is to carry out his ethical duties in this representation. On the one hand, the corporate lawyer owes a duty of loyalty to the corporation, as distinct from its owners and managers, and he or she must act in the best interests of the corporation as an entity.

On the other hand, the lawyer must normally follow the direction of those duly appointed or elected to act on behalf of the corporation. See, e.g., Financial General Bankshares, Inc. v. Metzger, 523 F. Supp. 744, 764 (D. D.C. 1981), vacated for lack of jurisdiction, 680 F. 2d 768 (D.C. Cir. 1982) ("...both practically and theoretically, the corporate attorney should consider himself as representing the entity interests articulated by those in current control of the management"); ABA Informal Opinion 1056 (1968); Comment, Conflicts of Law in the Legal Profession, 94 Harv. L. Rev. 1244, 1336 (1981). Rule 1.13 expressly recognizes that a lawyer represents an organization such as a corporation "through its duly authorized constituents." Comment [4] further states that "[w]hen constituents of the organization make decisions for it, the decisions ordinarily must be accepted by the lawyer even if their utility or prudence is doubtful."

The difficulty here is that the corporation's President, A, may continue to hold office only because of the shareholder deadlock; moreover, because of his own dispute with U, A may have reason to disregard the corporation's interest in determining the corporation's course of action in its dispute with U. These difficulties notwithstanding, the corporation's lawyer may continue to take direction from A until the dispute over control of the corporation is resolved by the courts or the parties. If, however, the lawyer should become convinced that A's decisions are clearly in violation of A's own fiduciary duties to the corporation, the lawyer may be forced to seek guidance from the courts as to who is in control of the corporation, there being no higher authority within the corporation to whom the lawyer can turn. Throughout the representation, the lawyer must continue to recognize that the interests of the corporation must be paramount and that he must take care to remain neutral with respect to the disputes between the present shareholders, B and U, and between A and U. See, ABA Opinion 86 (1932) ("In acting as the corporation's legal adviser [an attorney] must refrain from taking part in any controversies or factual differences which may exist among stockholders as to its control"), quoted with approval in Financial General Bankshares, Inc. v. Metzger, 523 F. Supp. at 765.

Inquiry 90-10-40

Opinion No. 217

Multiple Representation; Intermediation.

• After full disclosure and consent from the clients, a firm may represent multiple members of a group of claimants against other individual claimants or groups of claimants to a limited fund. The firm may not serve as an advocate for any of the clients in determining the allocation of any award among the clients. It may be appropriate, however, for the firm to serve as an intermediary in determining the allocation among its clients.

The firm's obligation to protect the secrets of its clients respecting settlements in prior cases would not preclude subsequent joint representation of those clients and a new client, with the consent of the clients after full disclosure. The extent to which any confidentiality agreement might restrict the firm's representation of clients in subsequent proceedings is independent of the Rules, and therefore is not addressed.

Applicable Rules Provisions

- Rule 1.7 (Multiple Representation)
- Rule 2.2 (Lawyer as Intermediary)[1]

1 The District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct became effective January 1, 1991. Accordingly, there is no reason to consider whether the proposed representation would have been appropriate under the District of Columbia Code of Professional Responsibility.

Inquiry

A law firm proposes to represent three clients in proceedings before the Copyright Royalty Tribunal. Each year cable television carriers that retransmit broadcast programming signals deposit copyright "royalties" with the Register of Copyrights for ultimate distribution by the Copyright Tribunal. See 17 U.S.C. 111(d). The tribunal is authorized to determine the allocation of the fund among the claimants, subject to federal court review. See 17 U.S.C. 111(d)(4); see generally 37 C.F.R. 301.70-301.83 (1990). The tribunal allocates the fund among prescribed "claimant groups" such as "joint sports programmers," "program suppliers," and "devotional claimants" in "Phase I" proceedings. In "Phase II" the tribunal allocates the awards to each group among the members of the group.

The firm has represented two clients before the Copyright Royalty Tribunal in previous proceedings. These clients want the firm to represent them in upcoming proceedings, and believe that it would be in their interest to have a third claimant join them in submitting their claims to the tribunal as a group.[2] The three clients would be members of the same Copyright Royalty Tribunal "claimant group." In all negotiations with other claimants or in proceedings before the tribunal, the firm would represent the three clients as a group. The allocation of any resulting award among the three clients would be determined by agreement.

In the past the claims of the firm's clients have been resolved without a hearing before the Copyright Royalty Tribunal. By contract, the terms of prior settlements are confidential.

Discussion

Rule 1.7. Rule 1.7 is as follows:

(a) A lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a position to be taken in a matter if that position is adverse to a position taken or to be taken in the same matter by another client represented with respect to that position by the same lawyer.

2 For purposes of submitting claims to the Copyright Royalty Tribunal, "claimants may agree among themselves as to the proportionate divison of compulsory licensing fees among them, may lump thier claims together and file them jointly or as a single claim, or may designate a common agent to receive payment on their behalf." 17 U.S.C. §111(d)(4)(A).

(b) Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if:

(1) A position to be taken by that client in that matter is adverse to a position taken or to be taken by another client in the same matter;

(2) Such representation will be or is likely to be adversely affected by representation of another client;

(3) Representation of another client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by such representation; or

(4) The lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibility to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.

(c)A lawyer may represent a client with respect to a matter in the circumstances described in paragraph (b) above if:

(1) Each potentially affected client provides consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation; and

(2)The lawyer is able to comply with all other applicable rules with respect to such representation."

Rule 1.7(a) thus prohibits multiple representation without regard to client consent. Cf. Opinion 158 (1985). Rule 1.7(b) in contrast permits multiple representation with the consent of the affected clients, but only after full disclosure. Cf. Opinion 54 (1978).

The prohibition of Rule 1.7(a) is absolute, and precludes representation in any "matter," whether it involves judicial or administrative proceedings, an application, drafting a contract, negotiations, estate planning, or family relations. The reach of Rule 1.7(a), however, is relatively narrow: representation is prohibited only with respect to a particular "position" in a matter in which the firm also represents a second client who actually takes or will take an adverse "position" on the same issue. Comment [4] to the Rule confirms that "[t]he absolute prohibition of paragraph (a) applies only to situations in which a lawyer would be called upon to espouse adverse positions in the same matter."

Thus, Rule 1.7(a) precludes a firm that takes a position on behalf of Client A from representing Client B in the same proceeding only if Client B actually takes or will take an adverse position on the issue. If the benefits of joint representation are sufficiently great or the likelihood of prevailing on a position that would increase its individual recovery is sufficiently small, each of the clients might after "consultation" choose to forgo such arguments. See generally Rule 1.3(b) (client determines lawful objectives); Opinion 143 (1984). Accordingly, if Client B chooses to forgo taking an adverse position on the particular issue, Rule 1.7(a) would be inapplicable by its terms. Rule 1.7(b) governs in any case in which simultaneous representation of clients with potentially adverse interests would not actually require the firm to take inconsistent positions in the same proceeding.

Similarly, notwithstanding Rule 1.7(a), a firm may represent multiple clients in one phase of a case, even if the firm will be precluded from representing the clients in subsequent phases of the case. For example, a firm could represent two or more parties in the liability phase of a case, although separate counsel will be required for each of the clients in the damages phase of the case because the parties will take adverse positions. Rule 1.7, Comment [4]. In such a case, Rule 1.7(b), and not Rule 1.7(a), would be controlling. See also Rules 1.6 and 1.9.

Under Rule 1.7(b) clients may "consent" to the simultaneous representation of potentially adverse parties, so long as the lawyers in the firm can satisfy their professional responsibilities.[3] "'Consent' denotes a client's uncoerced assent to a proposed course of action, following consultation with the lawyer regarding the matter in question." Terminology [2]. "'Consult' or 'consultation' denotes communication of information reasonably sufficient to permit the client to appreciate the significance of the matter in question." Terminology [3]. Effective consent therefore requires full disclosure sufficient to allow each client to make an informed decision.

In this case, full disclosure necessarily would include a frank discussion of Rules 1.9 and 1.6 in particular. If the clients fail to agree on an appropriate allocation of any award among themselves or if any one of them concludes that its interests are irreconcilable with those of the others for another reason and terminates the joint representation, the firm may be precluded from representing any of the clients in proceedings before the Copyright Royalty Tribunal. Further, because the firm has represented two of the clients in prior proceedings, the extent to which the proposed joint representation might require the firm to use or disclose confidences or secrets previously obtained also should be discussed explicitly. Finally, as discussed below (pages 7-9), if the firm will participate in the efforts of the clients to agree on an allocation among themselves, Rule 2.2(d) should be addressed explicitly at the outset.

In the case posed by the inquirer, Rule 1.7(a) would not prohibit joint representation of the clients in any phase of the proceedings before the Copyright Royalty Tribunal or in negotiations with the other participants. Under Rule 1.7(b), the clients may "consent" to joint representation, provided the firm makes full disclosure of the costs and benefits of proceeding in that fashion. Each of the clients is entitled to consider whether the benefits of joint representation warrant putting aside its differences with the others to pursue a common negotiating or litigating strategy. See generally Rule 1.3; Opinion 143 (1984). In some cases, additional attorneys fees and the likelihood of increased delay may outweigh the value of any expected incremental recovery from separate representation. Opinion 143 (1984).

Rule 2.2. In contrast, the firm plainly cannot serve as an advocate for any of the three clients in negotiations with the others to establish the allocation of any award among them. More for any one of the three would necessarily mean less for at least one of the others. Nonetheless under Rule 2.2:

(a) A lawyer may act as intermediary between clients if:

(1) The lawyer consults with each client concerning the implica-

3 "For example, even if a client provides informed and uncoerced consent, a lawyer may not undertake or continue a representation if the lawyer is unable to comply with the obligations regarding diligence, communication, and protection of client confidences provided in Rules 1.3, 1.4, and 1.6." Rule 1.7, Comment [15].

tions of the common representation, including the advantages and risks involved, and the effect on the attorney-client privileges, and obtains each client's consent to the common representation;

(2) The lawyer reasonably believes that the matter can be resolved on terms compatible with the clients's best interests, that each client will be able to make adequately informed decisions in the matter, and that there is little risk of material prejudice to the interests of any of the clients if the contemplated resolution is unsuccessful; and

(3) The lawyer reasonably believes that the common representation can be undertaken impartially and without improper effect on other responsibilities the lawyer has to any of the clients.

(b) A lawyer should, except in unusual circumstances that may make it infeasible, provide both clients with an explanation in writing of the risks involved in the common representation and of the circumstances that may cause separate representation later to be necessary or desirable, the consent of the clients shall also be in writing.

(c) While acting as intermediary, the lawyer shall consult with each client concerning the decisions to be made and the considerations relevant in making them, so that each client can make adequately informed decisions.

(d) A lawyer shall withdraw as intermediary if any of the clients so request, or if any of the conditions stated in paragraph (a) are no longer satisfied. Upon withdrawal, the lawyer shall not continue to represent any of the clients in the matter that was the subject of the intermediation."

It is essential that each client fully understand the firm's role. Because the risks are great for the lawyer as well as the clients, a written explanation of the implications of common representation should be provided whenever feasible.[4]

Thus, although the firm would be precluded from serving as an advocate for any of the clients with respect to the allocation of the award among them, the interests of all the clients might be served by having the firm serve as an intermediary to facilitate agreement. "In considering whether to act as intermediary between clients, a lawyer should be mindful that if the intermediation fails the result can be additional cost, embarrassment, and recrimination." Rule 2.2, Comment [5]. As noted above, full disclosure to the clients would require discussion of the possible adverse consequences to each of the clients if the attempted intermediation is unsuccessful.

Prior Settlements. Finally, the inquiry refers to confidentiality agreements governing prior settlements. Whatever the firm's contractual obligations under previous confidentiality agreements, they are independent of the firm's ethical obligations under Rule 1.6, and we express no opinion on the effect of any such agreements on the firm's representation of any of the three clients. We note, however, that the body of knowledge possessed by a firm's lawyers, including the general terms on which disputes before the Copyright Royalty Tribunal have been resolved (as distinguished from the fact that a particular entity accepted particular terms), may not be a "secret" within the meaning of Rule 1.6.[5] In any event, Rule 1.6 expressly permits a lawyer to use or reveal client confidences or secrets with the consent of the client, after full disclosure. Cf. Opinion 158 (1985).

[4] The firm should carefully consider whether its prior representation of two of the three clients makes intermediation inappropriate. "Since the lawyer is required to be impartial between commonly represented clients, intermediation is improper when that impartiality cannot be maintained. For example, a lawyer who has represented one of the clients for a long period of time and in a variety of matters could have difficulty being impartial between that client and one to whom the lawyer has only recently been introduced." Rule 2.2, Comment [7]. The prior relationship certainly should be disclosed.

[5] In construing analogous provisions of the Code of Professional Responsibility, the Committee explained: "A lawyer is useful to his clients because of his knowledge of the law and how it can be applied to different factual situations. Such knowledge is not gained through formal legal training and postgraduate courses alone, but also from the everyday practice of the law while representing various clients. The Code of Professional Responsibility would surely place an unbearable burden upon every legal practitioner if it prohibited the use of such knowledge except for the benefit of the client whom he happened to represent when he acquired it. Legal expertise consists of layer upon layer of knowledge and experience gained gradually through the representation of many clients in many situations. It is not something that can be parsed and sold exclusively to any one client. The usual attorney-client relationship does not include such expectations." Opinion 175 (1986).

Inquiry

In Opinion 211, we decided that a law firm retainer agreement that provided for mandatory arbitration of all disputes between the lawyer and law firm, including disputes concerning lawyer malpractice, was improper unless the client is counselled by another attorney prior to entering into the retainer agreement. We specifically reserved the question of whether a retainer agreement requiring arbitration limited to fee disputes only would be a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct. Now we are asked to address that very issue.

The inquiry comes from the Attorney-Client Arbitration Board (ACAB, formerly known as the Fee Arbitration Board) which is concerned about the status under the new rules of agreements mandating arbitration of fee disputes in light of Opinion 211. The ACAB regularly receives requests for arbitration of fee disputes based on mandatory arbitration clauses providing for arbitration before the ACAB. We are informed that approximately 10 per cent of the arbitrations handled by the ACAB involve mandatory arbitration agreements. Of these, the majority of the arbitrations are initiated by the client.

Discussion

No provision of the Rules of Professional Conduct specifically prohibits retainer agreements providing for mandatory arbitration of fee disputes between lawyer and client. Comment 15 to Rule 1.5 recommends that lawyers consider submitting to arbitration or mediation of fee disputes where procedures have been established by the Bar. Rule 1.6(d)(5) encourages the lawyer to minimize disclosure of client confidences in a fee collection action. The comments suggest that the lawyer should file John Doe pleadings and seek protective orders to protect client confidences. Arbitration, which is not open to the public, furthers the purposes of 1.6(d)(5) by protecting the client from a public airing of confidential matters.

Rule 1.8(g)(1) prohibits a lawyer from making "an agreement prospectively limiting the lawyer's liability to a client for malpractice[.]" In Opinion 211, we determined that Rule 1.8(g)(1) was not applicable as a prohibition on mandatory arbitration provisions in a retainer agreement. Id., at n. 3. Even if 1.8(g)(1) were deemed to apply to arbitration provisions in a retainer agreement, a mandatory arbitration provision limited to fee disputes does not by its terms implicate Rule 1.8(g)(1) because a provision for mandatory arbitration of the lawyer's claim against the client for fees is not a prospective limitation of the lawyer's liability to the client for malpractice. The client's right to have malpractice claims determined by a court remains intact.

In Opinion 211, we determined that Rule 1.8(a) governs the use of mandatory arbitration provisions in retainer agreements. Rule 1.8(a) provides:

> (1) The transaction and terms on which the lawyer acquires the interest are fair and reasonable to the client and are fully disclosed and transmitted in writing to the client in a manner which can be reasonably understood by the client;
> (2) The client is given a reasonable opportunity to seek the advice of independent counsel in the transaction; and
> (3) The client consents in writing thereto.

The retainer agreement before us in Opinion 211 required mandatory arbitration of all disputes before either the ACAB or the American Arbitration Association (AAA), required the client to consent to the jurisdiction of the D.C. Superior Court for all purposes connected with the arbitration, and provided a two-year statute of limitations within which arbitration must be started. We concluded that the complex nature of the arbitration provided for by the retainer agreement in question could not adequately be disclosed to a lay client. Thus, we determined that mandatory arbitration agreements covering all disputes between lawyer and client are not permitted "unless the client is in fact counselled by another attorney." Id. at 9.

The concerns which led us to the conclusion we reached in Opinion 211 either do not exist where the retainer agreement provides for fee only arbitration or are adequately addressed by the procedures of the ACAB. For instance, the agreement in Opinion 211 provided for ACAB or AAA arbitration, but did not disclose the AAA fees, nor that AAA arbitrators must be paid, and that in some instances the costs of AAA arbitration can be substantial. Here we address a fee agreement providing only for arbitration before the ACAB where the fees are only $25 and the arbitrators are not compensated.

More importantly, we believed the lawyer entering into a retainer agreement with a client for arbitration of all disputes, including malpractice, could not adequately explain the tactical considerations of arbitration versus litigation to the lay client--considerations such as lack of formal discovery, lack of a jury trial, and the closed nature of arbitration proceedings. We are informed that the staff of the ACAB is equipped to advise clients who are asked to sign retainer agreements with mandatory arbitration provisions of the nature of fee arbitration, the advantages and disadvantages, and the alternatives to fee arbitration. Moreover, the ACAB's procedures are relatively simple and its rules, which are also relatively simple to understand, are readily available to interested lawyers and their clients. We believe the counselling provided by the ACAB staff and the ready availability of the ACAB's rules are sufficient to adequately inform the lay client of the information necessary to make a decision about whether to agree to a provision for mandatory arbitration of fees.

We therefore conclude that a fee agreement providing for mandatory arbitration of fee disputes before the ACAB is ethically permissible provided the agreement informs the client in writing that counselling and a copy of the ACAB's rules are available through the ACAB staff and further that the lawyer encourage the client to contact the ACAB for counselling and information prior to deciding whether to sign the agreement. Moreover, the client must consent in writing to the mandatory arbitration. Rule 1.8(a)(3).

A final issue to be addressed relates to the possibility that a fee arbitration arising from a mandatory arbitration provision could preclude the client from later raising a malpractice claim against the lawyer. In many fee disputes the client's defense is the lawyer's inadequate representation. Would the client, after having raised such a defense in a fee arbitration based on a retainer agreement, be precluded on res judicata or collateral estoppel grounds from later prosecuting a malpractice claim? The rules of the ACAB provide that the result of the arbitration is an award (or the denial of an award) without any written factual findings or conclusions. Moreover, no recording or transcription is made of the testimony presented to the arbitrators. It is difficult to see how a client in such an arbitration could later be precluded from prosecuting a malpractice claim based on an adverse award in the arbitration. However, this raises a question of law and the Legal Ethics Committee does not make rulings on questions of law.

Because the legal effect of an arbitration award to the lawyer is unclear, we conclude that a lawyer relying on a mandatory fee only arbitration agreement may not ethically use the existence of an arbitration award in the lawyer's favor in an attempt to preclude a subsequent malpractice claim unless the lawyer has complied with the dictates of Opinion 211.

Conflict of Ethical Obligations

• A lawyer is not precluded from revealing a fraud committed in the course of the representation by the client on a federal tribunal or another person if regulations of the tribunal having the force and effect of law require that the fraud be revealed and the client is first afforded a reasonable opportunity to investigate and pursue any good faith challenge to the regulations.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6(d) (2) (A) (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 3.3(d) (Candor Toward the Tribunal)
- Rule 4.1(b) (Truthfulness in Statements to Others)

Inquiry

A regulation of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, 37 C.F.R. § 10.85(b) (1), provides:

> A practitioner who receives information clearly establishing that . . . [a] client has, in the course of the representation, perpetrated a fraud upon a person or tribunal shall promptly call upon the client to rectify the same, and if the client refuses or is unable to do so, the practitioner shall reveal the fraud to the affected person or tribunal. [1]

The present inquiry seeks guidance on how to reconcile the requirements of this regulation with the ethical obligations of members of the District of Columbia Bar.

Discussion

The comments to Rule 8.5 of the Rules of Professional Conduct now in effect refer to problems arising from conflicts between inconsistent ethical requirements of different jurisdictions, including conflicts between the rules of the Bar and those of federal tribunals. However, there can be no such problem in the absence of a true conflict. That is the circumstance here.

Rule 3.3(d) of the Rules of Professional Conduct states:

> A lawyer who receives information clearly establishing that a fraud has been perpetrated upon the tribunal shall promptly reveal the fraud to the tribunal unless compliance with this duty would require disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6, in which case the lawyer shall promptly call upon the client to rectify the fraud. [2]

See also Rule 4.1(b) (prohibiting knowing failure to disclose material facts to third persons when necessary to avoid assisting a criminal or fraudulent act by the client except when disclosure is prohibited by Rule 1.6). Rule 1.6, in turn, generally requires the lawyer to maintain the confidentiality of the confidences and secrets of the lawyer's client, which Rule 1.6(b) defines to include "information gained in the professional relationship . . . the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client." Since this definition encompasses the existence of a fraud committed by the client during the representation, a member of the D.C. Bar normally would be precluded from disclosing such a fraud even if the client has refused to rectify it. [3]

There is an important exception, however. Rule 1.6(d)(2)(A) permits a lawyer to reveal client confidences and secrets when "required by law or court order." In the Committee's view, "law" for this purpose includes federal regulations having the force and effect of law. That is the normal understanding of the term. See, e.g., Chrysler Corp. v. Brown, 441 U.S. 281, 295-96 (1979). Moreover, the comments to the rules make clear that "law" within the meaning of a related provision, Rule 1.6(d) (2) (B), includes such regulations. [4] Accordingly, we conclude that if a client refused to rectify a fraud in accordance with regulations of a federal tribunal requiring disclosure with the force and effect of law, the lawyer could make the disclosure without contravening Rule 1.6 or Rules 3.3(d) or 4.1(b).

The question remains whether 37 C.F.R. § 10.85(b) (1) constitutes such a regulation. Although this is a question of law beyond the purview of the Committee, we believe that the lawyer would be required before making any disclosure pursuant to the regulation to notify the client and provide the client a reasonable opportunity to investigate and pursue any good faith challenge to the regulation. See Opinion 214 (lawyer may comply with a final judicial order enforcing an IRS summons without seeking appellate review of the order so long as the client is advised and given a reasonable opportunity to seek review independently).

Opinion No. 220

Threats To File Disciplinary Charges

- Threats to file disciplinary charges, either against an attorney with Bar Counsel or against a non-attorney with a relevant professional board, for the sole purpose of gaining advantage in a civil matter are a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Applicable Rule

- Rule 8.4(g)(Misconduct)

Inquiry

The Committee has before it three related inquiries. Two practitioners inquire about the ethical propriety of threatening to file disciplinary charges against attorneys with bar counsel in order to gain advantage in negotiating a civil settlement. A third inquires about the propriety of threatening to file a complaint with certain professional associations of realtors and appraisers for the same purpose.

The first inquirer is an attorney whose client wishes to bring a malicious prosecution action against another attorney and his client arising out of the conduct of the second attorney and client in a previous action. The inquirer asks to what extent he may threaten, or hint about, filing a disciplinary complaint against the opposing attorney in order to coerce a settlement of the malicious prosecution claim.

[1] According to the inquiry, the Patent and Trademark Office interprets fraud for this purpose to include non-compliance with 37 C.F.R.§ 1.56(a), which imposes a duty on the inventor and his or her attorney "to disclose to the Office information that they are aware of which is material to the examination of the application."

[2] We assume for purposes of this opinion that the Patent and Trademark Office constitutes a "tribunal" within the meaning of this rule. According to paragraph [12] of the Terminology section of the Rules, "tribunal" "denotes a court, regulatory agency, commission, and any other body or individual authorized by law to render decisions of a judicial or quasi-judicial nature, based on information presented before it, regardless of the degree of formality or informality of the proceedings."

[3] The lawyer would be required in that case to withdraw from the representation if the fraud is ongoing and thus otherwise would involve assistance by the lawyer. See Rules 1.2(e), 1.16(a) (1), 3.3(a) (2); Opinion 153. See also Rule 1.16(b) (1) and (2) regarding permissive withdrawal when the lawyer reasonably believes (but does not know) that fraud has been committed or the fraud is not ongoing, but has previously involved the lawyer's services.

[4] Rule 1.6(d) (2) (B) permits disclosure of client confidences and secrets by a government lawyer "when permitted or authorized by law." Comment [34] to Rule 1.6 states that disclosures by government lawyers pursuant to this subparagraph "may be authorized or required by statute, executive order or regulation, depending on the constitutional or statutory powers of the authorizing entity."

The second inquiry arises in the context of a collection action by the successor counsel of a law firm against a former client of the law firm. During settlement negotiations, the defendant's counsel informed the inquirer that his client had requested that he prepare a complaint to be filed with Bar Counsel. The inquirer asks whether this reference to filing disciplinary charges in the course of settlement negotiations is unethical.

The third inquirer is an attorney representing a real estate professional in a malpractice action. In the course of settlement negotiations, opposing counsel has stated that his client has asked him to consider the filing of a complaint with the relevant associations of realtors and appraisers to seek the suspension or revocation of the inquiring attorney's client's license. The inquirer asks whether this constitutes a violation of the disciplinary rules.

Discussion

The relevant disciplinary requirement in the Rules of Professional Conduct represents a change from that which governed in the Code of Professional Responsibility. Rule 8.4(g) provides that, "[i]t is professional misconduct for a lawyer to: . . . (g) seek or threaten to seek criminal charges or disciplinary charges solely to obtain an advantage in a civil matter." The earlier prohibition, found in DR 7-105, was limited to the filing of or threat to file criminal charges. Neither the history nor the published comments to Rule 8.4 address the reasons for modifying the rule to include disciplinary charges. Nor do they define or otherwise explain the meaning of the term "disciplinary charges" as it is used in the Rule.[1]

1. Filing or Threatening to File a Disciplinary Charge Against An Attorney

The prohibition against filing disciplinary charges encompasses, on its face, the threat to file disciplinary charges against attorneys as set forth in two of the inquiries.[2] The only question under Rule 8.4(g) is whether the charges were threatened or filed "solely to obtain an advantage in a civil matter." (emphasis added).[3]

The determination of for what purpose or purposes the disciplinary charges at issue were threatened is a factual question which this Committee is not equipped to decide. We do note, however, that Rule 8.3(a) creates an affirmative obligation upon a lawyer to inform the appropriate professional authority where the lawyer has "knowledge that another lawyer has committed a violation of the rules of professional conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness, or fitness as a lawyer in other respects."[4] The comments to Rule 8.3, at ¶ [3], explain that the use of the word "substantial" goes to the "seriousness of the possible offense and not the quantum of evidence of which the lawyer is aware." The comments also state that the report should be made to the Office of Bar Counsel. Id.

If a complaint or report is filed with Bar Counsel in a good faith effort to comply with the provisions of Rule 8.3 it cannot be said to be filed solely for the purpose of gaining advantage in a civil matter.[5] However, it is unlikely that a threat to file a disciplinary complaint could be viewed as a good faith effort to comply with Rule 8.3 since the obligation under that Rule is to report -- and not to threaten to report -- the relevant information.[6] As a result, a threat to file a disciplinary charge is not protected under Rule 8.3.

Disciplinary charges threatened or filed for purposes other than gaining advantage in a civil matter may implicate other rules. These include principally Rule 3.1 which prohibits a lawyer from bringing frivolous claims. In addition, the threat of a disciplinary charge could constitute a violation of the relevant extortion and blackmail statutes, a concern expressed by the Jordan Committee as discussed above. Again, the question of whether violations of these Rules are presented in the inquiries under consideration involve legal and factual determinations that are beyond our scope and regarding which we do not express an opinion.

2. Threats to File Disciplinary Charges Against Persons Other Than Attorneys

Rule 8.4(g), by its plain language, renders unethical any threat to file disciplinary charges solely in order to gain advantage in a civil matter. The type of disciplinary charge is not limited either in the Rule or in any published explanatory material. Indeed, interpreting the rule's prohibition to extend to filing charges against attorneys but not against non-attorneys would produce the anomalous result of permitting an attorney to file or threaten to file a disciplinary charge against an opposing party for the sole purpose of obtaining advantage in a civil matter but not against his or her attorney for the same reason. This Committee declines to endorse such a result. The rule applies equally to complaints threatened or filed against attorneys and non-attorneys.

Since the complaint referenced in the inquiry regarding the real estate profes-

[1] The only published explanation, which does not address why the words "disciplinary charges" were added to the prohibition, is contained in the statement which the Jordan Committee submitted to the Court of Appeals:

> The Committee also added a new paragraph (g), which is substantially similar to DR 7-105. The problem dealt with in paragraph (g) is not specifically addressed by any other provision in the proposed Rules. The Committee felt that the conduct prohibited by paragraph (g), which is tantamount to common law blackmail, was serious enough, and its occurrence frequent enough, that a rule clearly forbidding that conduct was needed.

[2] Prohibiting the threatened or actual filing of disciplinary charges against attorneys for the sole purpose of gaining advantage in a civil matter is in accordance with decisions of at least seven other jurisdictions. See Illinois State Bar Association Commmittee on Professional Responsibility, Opinion 87-7, 1/29/88; Indiana State Bar Association Legal Ethics Committee, Opinion 10 of 1985; the Professional Ethics Commission of the Board of Overseers of the Bar, Maine, Opinion 100 (10/4/89); Maryland State Bar Association Committee on Ethics, Docket 86-14; Massachusetts Bar Association Committee on Professional Ethics, Opinion 83-2; Michigan State Bar Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics; Opinion CI-695 (10/18/81); Wisconsin State Bar Committee on Professional Ethics, Opinion E-89-16 (9/8/89).

[3] Insofar as the first inquirer seeks to differentiate between threats and "hints" of threats, we find no relevant distinction. Any suggestion of filing a disciplinary charge for the sole purpose of gaining advantage in civil litigation falls within the scope of the rule.

[4] The only exception to this reqirement is where the information is confidential withing the meaning of Rules 1.6. Confidentiality concerns do not appear to be implicated in any of the inquiries under consideration here.

[5] The Michigan State Bar Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics has determined that in the face of a similar reporting requirement, the suggestion of not reporting violations in return for favorable settlement is improper. Opinion CI-695 (10/18/81).

[6] Rule 8.3 speaks in terms of "informing" the appropriate professional authority. Neither the Rule nor comments explain what precisely is meant by this term. Nonetheless, filing a disciplinary charge is clearly a method of informing the authority and thus falls within its plain meaning.

sional could result in the suspension or revocation of a license, it is a disciplinary charge within the meaning of the rule. Again, the matter of whether the complaint is filed solely to gain advantage in a civil matter is a factual question which this Committee is not equipped to decide.

Conclusion

In conclusion, the Committee finds that threats to file disciplinary charges against either attorneys or non-attorneys solely to gain advantage in a civil matter violate Rule 8.4 (g) of the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Opinion No. 221

Law Firm Employment Agreement

• An employment agreement allocating contingent fees on a percentage basis between a firm and a departing attorney who takes a firm client may be determined according to the amount of time the case was with the firm and the amount of time it was with the departing lawyer before the fee was realized. It may not include a provision restricting the attorney's right to send an announcement notifying clients of his or her departure, nor prohibit discussion of the departure should the client initiate the contact with the attorney.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.4 (Communication)
• Rule 5.6(a) (Restrictions on Right to Practice)
• Rule 7.1 (Communications Concerning A Lawyer's Services)

Inquiry

The inquirer asks about the propriety of several provisions of a law firm's employment agreement. Paragraph 5 of the agreement addresses the division of contingent fees between the firm and a lawyer who departs the firm and takes a firm client. It provides a sliding chart whereby the fee will be divided between the departed attorney and the firm based on a combination of length of time the case was with the firm before the attorney left and length of time it is with the attorney before the fee is realized. For example, if the firm was retained prior to two years before the attorney left the firm and the fee is realized within one year after the attorney's departure, the firm is entitled to 75% of the fee. The lowest percentage taken by the firm is 55% for cases in which the firm was retained within one year of the attorney's departure and where the fee is not realized until two to three years after the departure date.

Paragraph 3 of the agreement concerns notification to clients that a lawyer has left or will be leaving the firm. Under this provision, the firm agrees to send a standardized letter to the departing lawyer's clients not later than 3 days after the lawyer's departure.[1] This letter gives the client the option of remaining with the firm or going with the departing lawyer. In return, the lawyer agrees not to contact the client or discuss his/her departure until after the firm has received the client's response.

Discussion

Division of Fees.

The Committee concludes that the fee provisions of paragraph five of the employment agreement do not violate the Rules of Professional Conduct. This agreement differs from others considered and rejected by the Committee since it seeks compensation for work already performed for the client. Rejections have generally been based on DR 2-108(A), predecessor to Rule 5.6(a), which provides:

> A lawyer shall not participate in offering or making: (a) A partnership or employment agreement that restricts the rights of a lawyer to practice after termination of the relationship....

Opinion 65 rejected an agreement which required 40% of an attorney's net billings to any client of his former firm be paid to the firm for two years after termination. The Committee decided that this "economic disincentive", though not a direct prohibition on representation, was "nonetheless a restriction on the right of a lawyer to practice," in violation of DR 2-108(A). The agreement required a flat percentage of future hourly billings in an attempt to "impose a barrier to the creation of a lawyer/client relationship between the departing lawyer and clients of his former firm". Opinion 65. See also Opinion 194 (disapproving reduction of payments otherwise due to withdrawing partner if that partner entered into a competing practice within one year of withdrawal).

By contrast, the fee division agreement at issue in this inquiry seeks compensation for work already performed by the firm. One purpose of predetermined fee-sharing with a departing lawyer is to avoid the unseemly bickering and the potential for litigation over clients and fees that can occur when a departing lawyer takes clients whose matters are being handled on a contingent fee basis. The agreement here applies only in contingent fee personal injury cases in which significant costs may be incurred by the firm near the beginning of the attorney-client relationship.[2] Fees ultimately realized are divided on a percentage basis which varies according to the length of time the case was handled by the firm and the length of time it was handled separately by the departed lawyer.

The Committee can neither approve nor disapprove the specific percentages used by this firm. If the percentages represent a generally fair allocation of fees based on the firm's historical experience there is no violation of Rule 5.6(a). On the other hand if the firm's share is excessive, this would have the effect of restricting the right of the departing lawyer to practice after the termination of the relationship in violation of Rule 5.6(a). Opinion 65. The determination whether the percentages are generally fair under the varying circumstances addressed by the employment agreement is a factual determination. The Committee cannot make fact findings.

In sum, we conclude that in general a scheme for dividing contingent fees between a firm and a departing lawyer based on the length of time the case was with the firm and the length it was with the departed lawyer is ethically permissible. But we make no determination about the particular percentages used in the agreement before us.

Announcements.

We reach a different conclusion about paragraph three's provisions for client notification.

[1] The agreement provides that the letter may be sent sooner if the attorney so requests, though this remains at the firm's discretion.

[2] Rule 1.8(d) permits the lawyer to advance costs of litigiation even when the client is not ultimately liable for them.

This Committee has determined that direct personal solicitation of a firm's clients by a departing lawyer may be limited by agreement without running afoul of the predecessor to Rule 5.6(a). Opinion 77. In Opinion 97, which involved a similar agreement, the Committee stated that the right to mail announcements sufficiently protected the attorney's right to practice law and the client's ability to make an informed choice. "[I]f the right to send announcements is preserved, the firm may ethically enter into an employment agreement which limits direct solicitation by the associate after termination of his employment." Opinion 97 (emphasis added).

Though no employment agreement was involved, a similar conclusion was enforced by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court. That court let stand an injunction which prohibited attorneys from directly communicating with clients of their former firm. The injunction expressly permitted the attorneys to send announcements, and emphasized the client's right to choose counsel. Adler, Barish, Daniels, Levin & Creskoff v. Epstein, 482 Pa. 416, 393 A.2d 1175 (1978). At a minimum, it appears, the attorney retains the right to send announcements. Id. at 1179; see also Rule 7.1.

The present agreement, however, provides that the firm will control the content and timing of the notification letter, that the client will respond to the letter by contacting the firm, and that the attorney may not discuss his or her departure with the client until after the client has responded to the firm's notification. This creates a situation in which the firm controls all communication with the client relevant to the client's decision on continued representation.

The importance of the client's right to freely choose counsel is widely recognized. "An agreement restricting the right of partners or associates to practice after leaving a firm not only limits their professional autonomy but also limits the freedom of clients to choose a lawyer." Rule 5.6, Comment [1]. The Committee has declined to approve efforts which "prevent or unduly hinder clients from obtaining legal representation from attorneys of their own choosing who may have formed new associations." Opinion 181. This is consistent with opinions of other jurisdictions. See, e.g., Virginia Bar Opinion 1232 (lawyer may do nothing that restricts the client's right to counsel of his or her choice); Illinois Bar Opinion 86-16 (law firm may not restrict a client's right to choose his own legal representation, either generally or as between the firm and a departing associate).

Our opinions safeguard the client's ability to make informed decisions with regard to continued representation. This is done, at a minimum, by allowing the departing attorney to send announcements containing information sufficient to permit such decisions. Though the firm has argued that announcements are in fact being sent, its control over the announcement means that information received by the client may be biased in favor of the firm. Indeed, the firm's form notification to the client does not even tell the client where the departing lawyer can be contacted. The client's decision on representation may well be affected by the attorney's unexplained failure to communicate regarding his or her departure combined with a lack of information with which the client can contact the lawyer. Thus, we conclude the firm's form notification letter is insufficient as a substitute for the departed lawyer's right to send announcements after the termination of employment.[3]

Finally, we address the restrictions on the lawyer's right to speak with the client about the departure until after the client has responded to the notification letter. We have previously determined that Rule 5.6(a) (in its predecessor form) permits a firm to limit such contacts when initiated by the lawyer. Opinion 77; Opinion 97. This agreement goes beyond such a restriction, however, to prohibit truthful responses to client-initiated inquiries. As such it has the same effect as the one rejected in Opinion 181: "[T]he Agreement appears to prevent a departed lawyer from responding to unsolicited questions about the possibility of representation from firm clients... DR 2-108(A) clearly condemns these types of restrictions."[4] See also Rule 1.4.

Conclusion

In summary, the Committee finds that an employment agreement allocating contingent fees between a firm and a departing lawyer may be on a percentage basis determined according to the amount of time the case was with each. The firm may not restrict the attorney's right to send an announcement notifying clients of his or her departure, nor prohibit discussion of the termination should the client initiate the discussion with the attorney.

Inquiry No. 90-12-47
Adopted: October 15, 1991

Attorney's Obligation Under Rule 9.1 Does Not Apply To Lawful Acts Outside The District Of Columbia

- A member of the District of Columbia Bar who works in Virginia for a legal defense organization does not violate Rule 9.1 even though the lawyer engages in acts of employment discrimination in Virginia and Maryland that would violate that Rule and the D.C. Human Rights Act if done within the District of Columbia, because these acts are not unlawful in the states where committed.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 8.5 (Jurisdiction)
- Rule 9.1 (Discrimination in Employment)

Inquiry

The inquirer, a member of the District of Columbia bar, is an officer of a legal defense organization located in Virginia which provides legal counsel to persons involved in litigation of a constitutional and political nature relating to educational issues.

Although his office is located in Virginia, he is not licensed to and does not practice law there. The inquirer sits on the board of elders of his church and the board of directors of an international religious human rights organization. The church board of elders is located in Virginia, and the religious rights organization is located in Maryland. Both the church and the religious rights organization are opposed as a matter of principle to homosexuality and to those who condone or practice it. The inquirer does not provide legal counsel or services to his church or to the religious rights organization.

[3] Our prior Opinions have not decided, and we do not decide here, the question whether a firm has an ethical obligation to notify a client of the impending departure of a lawyer prior to the date of such departure. We note, however, that there may be situations in which notice of an impending departure is required to safeguard the client's right to make informed decisions with regard to his or her representation. In such circumstances, a firm that prohibits predeparture contact by the departing lawyer may itself be under an obligation to notify its clients of the impending departure.

Unlike the District of Columbia neither Virginia nor Maryland, nor the Federal law, expressly forbid discrimination in employment based on sexual orientation. The inquirer asks for the committee's views on the propriety of his participation and concurrence in hiring decisions by these boards of directors denying employment to homosexuals as a matter of policy. Specifically, the inquirer asks whether Rule 9.1 of the Rules of Professional Conduct, which became effective January 1, 1991, is applicable to a person licensed to practice in the District of Columbia but whose office is located in another jurisdiction in which discrimination in employment based on sexual orientation is not unlawful; and whether this Rule is applicable to a hiring decision "made outside the legal profession."

Discussion

Rule 9.1 of the Rules of Professional Conduct, effective January 1, 1991, provides that

> "[A] lawyer shall not discriminate against any individual in conditions of employment because of the individual's race, color, religion, national origin, sex, age, marital status, sexual orientation, family responsibility or physical handicap."

As noted in the commentary, this provision was modeled after the District of Columbia Human Rights Act, D.C. Code 1-2512 (1981), "though in some respects [it is] more limited in scope."[1] Comment [1]. The comment further notes that the "rule is not intended to create ethical obligations that exceed those imposed on a lawyer by applicable law."

Neither Virginia nor Maryland law, nor Federal law, expressly forbid discrimination in employment based on "sexual orientation."

The question raised by this inquiry is whether acts of discrimination, which are not committed in the lawyer's professional capacity and which are not specifically unlawful in the jurisdictions where they take place, may nevertheless be deemed to be professional misconduct under the standard set forth in Rule 9.1 governing members of the District of Columbia Bar, regardless of where this conduct occurs. A related issue is the extent to which a member of the District of Columbia bar is governed by the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, and subject to discipline for violations, for conduct occurring in another jurisdiction.

With regard to the latter issue, Rule 8.5 makes it abundantly clear that all lawyers admitted to practice in this jurisdiction are "subject to the disciplinary authority of this jurisdiction." As the comment to this rules notes (Comment [1]):

> "In modern practice, lawyers frequently act outside the territorial limits of the jurisdiction in which they are licensed to practice, either in another state or outside the United States. In doing so, they remain subject to the governing authority of the jurisdiction in which they are licensed to practice."

In the circumstances presented here, however, the principal question to be determined is whether Rule 9.1 is violated where the lawyer's conduct occurs outside the District of Columbia in jurisdictions that do not expressly forbid acts of discrimination based on sexual orientation. Comment [1] to Rule 9.1 recognizes that the law in other jurisdictions may be broader or narrower than the Rule, and states that "[t]he rule is not intended to create ethical obligations that exceed those imposed on a lawyer by applicable law."

Since neither Virginia nor Maryland, nor the Federal law, outlaw acts of discrimination in employment based on "sexual orientation", the inquirer has no obligation to ignore this factor when he participates in hiring or other employment decisions in those states.

The Committee concludes, therefore, that Rule 9.1 is not applicable in these circumstances and that the inquirer is not subject to discipline under Rule 8.5. The Committee notes, however, that if Maryland or Virginia law, or the Federal law, should be changed to include "sexual orientation" as a forbidden ground for employment discrimination, Rule 9.1 would then apply to such acts of discrimination by a member of the D.C. bar in those states, as well as in the District of Columbia.

In view of its determination that Rule 9.1 is not applicable to the fact situation presented here, the Committee believes that it is unnecessary at this time to consider the other question raised by the inquirer, namely, whether Rule 9.1 applies to employment decisions made by a member of the D.C. Bar "outside the legal profession" -- i.e., in connection with church-related or other non-legal organizations in which the lawyer is involved.

Dissent of One Member from Opinion No. 222

The Rules of Professional Conduct (Rules) are established by Order of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals as "the standards governing the practice of law in the District of Columbia." Order No. M-165-33 (3/1/90), p. v., D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. "They should be interpreted with reference to the purposes of legal representation and the law itself." (Scope, id. at p. ix, ¶ [1]) "The Rules do not, however, exhaust the moral and ethical considerations that should inform a lawyer ... The Rules simply provide a framework for the ethical practice of law." Id. ¶[2].

The Rules themselves provide a means for enforceable interpretation of the language of the Order.

Rule 8.4, relating to professional misconduct, proscribes activities which may occur outside the specific "practice" of law but which have a discernable relation to the lawyer's ability to practice law in accordance with the rules, e.g., the actions involve a moral or personality flaw or a characteristic which reasonably may be expected to assert itself in the lawyer's practice and so result in a violation of the Rules. However, in making determinations of application of the Rules, we must recall that it applies "only for offenses that indicate lack of those characteristics relevant to law practice." (Comment [1] to Rule 8.4) and "with reference to the purposes of legal representation and the law itself." (Scope, supra, at¶[1])

[1] The Rule is more limited than the D.C. Code in several respects. The acts prohibited by D.C. Code § 1-2512 (1981) include discrimination based upon "personal appearance" and "matriculation, or political affiliation of any individual", in addition to the factors specified in Rule 9.1. The D.C. Code provision also defines more comprehensively and specifically the nature of the employment practices against which it is directed, declaring that it is an unlawful discriminatory practice, among other things, "to fail or refuse to hire, or to discarge, any individual" based on the prohibited factors; or to discriminate for these reasons against any individual "with respect to his compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment, including promotion."

Thus, it is unclear whether the language used in Rule 9.1, ("in conditions of employment"), was intended to encompass all of the employment-related conduct covered by D.C. Code §1-2512. For purposes of this opinion, however, the Committee assumes that the Rule's phrase "conditions of employment" is coextensive with the employment-related determinations forbidden by the D.C. Code.

Rule 8.5, relating to jurisdiction, extends the reach of the Rules outside the territorial boundaries of the District of Columbia, presumably in parallel with Rule 8.4 that an action outside the local jurisdiction may affect practice "in" the District of Columbia. Comments to Rule 8.5 recognize that some limitations in application of the Rules may be appropriate where conformance to the rules is not compatible with obligations placed on the lawyer in the other jurisdiction. See Comments [2] and [3]. However, no limitations are imposed where the obligations in the other jurisdiction are compatible with the rules, where there are no obligations imposed on the lawyer in the other jurisdiction, or where the "acts" (Comment [1]) in the other jurisdiction cannot truly be "practice" in that jurisdiction. Under these conditions, there is no conflict and the reach of Rule 8.5 is limited only in terms of the reach of Rule 8.4.

Rule 9.1, relating to discrimination in employment, bars discrimination in employment due to sexual orientation and other specified factors not at issue here. Both the legislative history of the rule and Comment [1] make it clear that the rule is modeled after and enacted in consequence of the D.C. statute and the rule presumably is subject to modification in application as court rulings interpret the statute. It is more limited than the statute and defers to District government action. Any violation of Rule 9.1 inevitably violates the statute. Within the jurisdiction of the District government, therefore, there can be no conflict and neither Rule 8.4 nor Rule 8.5 is applicable.

That, however, is not true where the District statute does not apply. While the language of Rule 9.1 is clear and direct, it is no more so than other rules, and there is nothing to indicate that it stands in isolation of other rules. It is established committee practice that no rule is an isolate considered entirely of its own but each must be interpreted in accord with other relevant rules. Rules 8.4 and 8.5, speaking to the scope of the Order and the whole body of the Rules, are clearly applicable here. Indeed, in Comment [1] to Rule 9.1, the Court places Rule 9.1 within the limits of Rule 8.5, and there is no reason to believe it intended to exempt it from Rule 8.4. One may conclude that since Rule 8.5 does not apply within the District, the Court in its comment intended that 8.5, and by implication 8.4, applies to the interpretation of Rule 9.1 outside the District.

The inquirer is a lawyer licensed in the District of Columbia but not in any other jurisdiction. He is an elder in several religious organizations presumably participating in employment decisions. The religious organizations as a matter of conviction restrict employment based on sexual orientation. There is no color of legal practice in the lawyer's participation in these organizations, and there is no basis for believing that his participation colors his legal practice in the District of Columbia. We may assume that his participation in them reflects personal beliefs and, hypothetically, that these beliefs may affect the way he conducts his practice. However, many lawyers have deeply felt beliefs or convictions, religious or otherwise, which may influence their practice. Unless there is clear indication that conformance to such a conviction has resulted in actions within his practice that violate the Rules, we cannot say that he cannot practice law if he holds what may well be contentious or even offensive convictions. See ¶ 1 above.

In sum, it is my view that Rule 9.1 must in this instance be interpreted in light of Rule 8.4, and that under Rule 8.4 the lawyer's activities as a member of a religious organization outside the District of Columbia are not subject to application of the Rules.

The inquirer also asks about his employment practices in his law office which is located outside the territory of the District of Columbia, in this instance in Virginia. We do not know where the office is located, or whether the inquirer is in active practice, but he is a licensed member of the D.C. Bar, and he may engage in practice whenever and from wherever he wishes. He is not licensed in the jurisdiction in which his office is physically located, nor is he in practice in any jurisdiction other than the District of Columbia which is at issue here. The only function of the Virginia office is to support the practice of law in the District. Much, perhaps most, of what a lawyer does in the practice of law takes place in his office. Indeed, depending on the nature of his practice, all "acts" related to that practice may occur without the lawyer ever setting foot within the boundaries of the District. All people employed in that office, lawyers, paralegals, and clerks are in support of the lawyer's practice in the District. Quite aside from Rule 9.1, and prior to its enactment, we have found employment practices an integral part of the lawyer's legal practice and subject to the Rules (Opinion Nos. 65, 181, 209). There is no reason to believe that the obligations with respect to conditions of employment established in Rule 9.1 should be treated any differently than the obligations established under other rules. The only issue, therefore, is whether employment practices outside the territory of the District are subject to the Rules.

Rule 8.5, in extending application of the rules to lawyers "act[ing] outside the territorial limits of the [District of Columbia]" (Comment [1]) contemplates the possibility of conflicting obligations. However, there is no conflict here. There is no limiting language in Rule 9.1 itself; Comment [1] explains that "The rule is not intended to create ethical obligations imposed on a lawyer by applicable law." (Emphasis supplied) But there is no applicable law in Virginia and nothing is "imposed" on the lawyer except, in fact, Rule 9.1. The lawyer is in fact obligated to be aware that there is no federal law nor Virginia law or rule that affects his employment practices, but there is a body of rules that affects all of his practice of D.C. law. The lawyer does not practice in Virginia and, in any event, Virginia law is silent on the sexual orientation issue: the lawyer is free to discriminate in hiring or not to do so. His employment practices, therefore, are bound only by his conscience and the obligations placed on him as a condition of the practice of law in the District of Columbia.

Rule 8.5 clearly was established to make certain that lawyers do not escape the reach of the Rules and the disciplinary authority when practicing District of Columbia law. The lawyer, in this instance, is not subject to the rules of the jurisdiction in which he is located. If he is not subject to the rules in the jurisdiction in which he practices, any lawyer with a Metrocard may place himself in that limbo of lawyerly delight where he is subject to no rules.

I would have the opinion state that a member of the District of Columbia Bar who is not licensed to practice law elsewhere, but whose office in support of his practice in the District is located outside D.C. violates the prohibitions of Rule 9.1 if he discriminates in employment for that office, and that he is not subject to the provisions of Rule 9.1 if he participates in employment decisions as a member of religious organizations having no relation to his practice of law, and where such actions are not illegal.

Adopted: November 19, 1991

Opinion No. 223

Nondisclosure of Protected Information to Funding Agency

• Attorneys for a legal services support center must refuse to allow representatives of a funding agency to see materials that include confidences and secrets of clients assisted by the support center through consultation and advice to field program attorneys retained by the clients. Redaction of client names is insufficient to preserve confidentiality when unredacted information could link the confidence or secret revealed to the client.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)

Inquiry

The inquirers are attorneys employed by a non-profit organization that receives a grant from the Legal Services Corporation (LSC) to serve as the national support center for field legal services programs in a particular subject matter. When a field program accepts a client with a problem in that subject matter, a field attorney may call or write the inquirers' organization for assistance on the case.

In the course of a visit to monitor the organization's compliance with their LSC contract and with LSC laws and regulations, LSC requested to see log forms used by the organization to record requests for assistance from field attorneys and all notes and correspondence on contacts with field attorneys. The inquirers report that assistance logs are used to expedite follow-up conversations with field attorneys by providing a quick reference on the nature of the case and the substance of the previous discussion between the field and organization attorney. The inquirers report that logs often include case facts, discussion of possible legal theories, and notes on legal or factual research.

The support center provided to LSC time sheets and summary logs of requests for assistance. Time sheets account for hours charged to the LSC grant by functional category (e.g., legal services, public education). Time sheets do not identify individual clients. The summary log of requests includes the date assistance was requested, the caller's name, the legal services program with which the caller is affiliated, and the general subject matter of the inquiry. These summary logs are used to prepare quarterly reports to LSC. In a few instances, the local attorney's name was redacted when the summary logs were provided to LSC.

The inquirers deem information in the original logs (as distinguished from the time sheets and log summaries) to include information subject to confidentiality duties in D.C. Rule 1.6 (and predecessor DR 4-101) as well as to be protected by the attorney-client privilege. They thus refused to produce unredacted logs for LSC. LSC agreed to redacting client names, but the inquirers consider that insufficient to avoid a breach of the D.C. Rule's confidentiality duty and the attorney-client privilege. In response, LSC suggested limiting the notes that would be taken after looking at the logs or having a non-attorney member of the team look at the logs.

The organization provided some sample logs to LSC after redacting the name of the attorney requesting assistance, specifics of the problem, and specifics of the response. LSC has notified the organization that they consider this to be out of compliance with a grant assurance permitting LSC access to information not subject to the attorney-client privilege. (42 U.S.C. § 2996h(d) denies LSC, as well as the Comptroller General, access to any report or records subject to the attorney-client privilege.)

Discussion

One of the functions that legal services national support centers are funded to provide is:

> Support of legal services program staff and clients through individual service work, library and resource material, training, communications, the development of manuals and material, technical assistance and development of strategies for use by local program staff.[1]

National Senior Citizens Law Center v. Legal Services Corporation, 751 F.2d 1391 (D.C. Cir. 1985). For the purposes of this opinion, we assume that the confidential information conveyed to the support center attorney by the field attorney was communicated in confidence for the purposes of furthering representation of the client. Therefore, Rule 1.6 applies to the support center attorney to the same extent that it would apply to the field attorney.

D.C. Rule 1.6 (a) requires that "a lawyer shall not knowingly: (1) reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client." D.C. Rule 1.6 (b) says:

> "confidence" refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law, and "secret" refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental to the client.

Predecessor D.C. Code DR 4-101(A) contained identical language.

For this opinion, it is not necessary to resolve whether the client material that the inquirers wish to protect is a confidence or a secret since the same ethical duty in Rule 1.6 extends to both. When disclosure is sought by a court, the distinction may become relevant, but that situation is not before the Committee. Opinion No. 82 (undated) reminds that scope of the attorney-client privilege is a question of evidentiary law on which jurisdictions differ, and that the Committee does not resolve questions of law. Other bar associations have refused to allow disclosure of confidential client information about legal services clients to their funding sources. American Bar Association Informal Op. No. 1394 (Nov. 2, 1977) says that a legal services program would violate Canon 4 within the meaning of DR 4-101 if they allowed inspectors from a funding agency to examine files relating to client matters when the files contain confidences and secrets. The Washington State Bar recently prohibited a legal services office from disclosing original records or other information that contained client confidences or secrets to LSC or other third parties that provide funding without the informed consent of the client. Washington Op. No. 183 (1990), ABA/BNA Man. of Prof. Conduct 901:8901.

[1] In this context, "individual service work" refers to day-to-day consultants between support center and local program staff about client matters which do not rise to the level of joint representations. "Litigation, including serving as counsel for eligible clients and as co-counsel with local program staff; is specified as a distinct function in the same list of support center functions. Id.

The New Hampshire Bar said it would be unethical to disclose client names and addresses, information about client eligibility and client trust funds, information in grievance files, satisfaction questionnaires, or other program files that contain client identifying information unless the client consents after consultation. Their Committee went on to say that the issue of confidentiality could not be circumvented by requiring legal aid clients to waive their protection and furnish information to LSC. New Hampshire Op. No. 1988-9/13, (Feb.16, 1989), ABA/BNA Man. of Prof. Conduct 901:5901.

The Ethics Committee of the Mississippi State Bar Association expressed concern about LSC examination of agency files relating to particular clients because those files could contain "attorney's work product, including memoranda reflecting trial strategy and tactics in matters involving litigation or proposed litigation." Mississippi Op. No. 101, (Jan. 29, 1985), ABA/BNA Man. of Prof. Conduct 801:4855. The Committee went on to note that the agency represents clients in claims or suits against governmental agencies including LSC. The Committee found it to be futile to define "secret" in the context of an individual case beyond the reference in 4-101(A), but said "any information that would tend to identify the client in a given case, whether it be name, particulars of the case, objective sought, or other, is a secret within the meaning of DR 4-101(A)." (emphasis added)

Recognizing the legitimacy of audits by funding agencies, state ethics committees have approved the alternative of aggregate reports which restrict access to confidential information. Alabama Op. No. 90-17, (Feb. 21, 1990), ABA/BNA Man. of Prof. Conduct 901:1065. See also In Re Adv. Op. No. 544, 103 N.J. 399, 500 A.2d 609 (1986).

D.C. Rule 1.6 and previous opinions of this Committee also point to the inquirers' duty to refuse access to records that would reveal client confidences or secrets. In Opinion No. 214 (Sept. 18, 1990), the Committee recently reviewed D.C. rulings on confidentiality. In doing so, the Committee quoted Opinion No. 99 (Jan. 28, 1981):

> that where there is a "colorable basis" for asserting that statements made to an attorney are confidences or secrets protected from disclosure by DR 4-101 "the lawyer must resolve the question . . . in favor of preserving the confidentiality of the disclosures." Accord. D.C. Op. No. 186 (Oct. 20, 1987).

The Committee has applied the confidentiality duty broadly to several types of material. In Opinion No. 14 (Mar. 22, 1976), the Committee said the ethical duty to preserve a client's confidences and secrets extends to the attorney's work produced during the course of the representation.

The Committee has forbidden an attorney to submit to a regulatory agency bills requested when they would reveal "the fact of the attorney's representation, which, in some instances is a secret . . . the tasks performed by the attorney and the scope of his employment, which might reveal both confidences and secrets." D.C. Op. No. 58 (undated).

The Committee held that real estate transaction information which was a matter of public record or previously had been disclosed to third parties could be released to D.C. auditors, but other information could be revealed only with a client's informed consent. D.C. Op. No. 72 (July 31, 1979). In D.C. Opinion No. 124 (Mar. 22, 1983), the Committee said that voluntary disclosure of client identity to the IRS without client consent was impermissible when such disclosure likely would reveal confidences or secrets. In so ruling, the Opinion cited with approval ABA Informal Opinion No. 1287 (1974), finding the identities of legal service clients to be secrets within the meaning of DR 4-101(A). D.C. Opinion No. 214 (Sept. 18, 1990) reaffirmed an attorney's duty to resist disclosure of a client's identity to the IRS absent client consent when circumstances could render that information a client confidence or secret.

By linking some combination of legal services program name, representing attorney, legal theory, and client facts, it often would be possible to identify the case and client involved. There may be only one case of a particular type pending in a jurisdiction. Even more often, there may be only one case with a particular fact pattern. The Maryland bar recently cautioned participants in a volunteer program for senior attorneys to provide assistance in their fields to junior attorneys that not only names, but also facts, may disclose the identity of a client. Maryland Op. No. 86-51, (Feb. 18, 1986), ABA/BNA Man. of Prof. Conduct 901:4302.

Opinion No. 82 (undated) explicitly includes attorney work product in the confidentiality duty. Revelation of case facts, legal theory speculations, and legal or factual research could be embarrassing or detrimental to a client. As the previously cited opinions indicate, the Committee consistently has acted to forbid requests for information that could result in revelation of clients' confidences or secrets. Redaction of the client's name is insufficient to cure the potential breach when the combination of information revealed could link the client to the confidence or secret.

None of the possible exceptions to Rule 1.6 negates the confidentiality duty in these circumstances.

Clients have not consented to disclosure of these confidences and secrets after full disclosure.

Production of the logs is not specifically authorized under D.C. Rule 1.6 (d)(2)(A) allowing disclosure when "required by law or court order." This inquiry does not involve an order from a court of competent jurisdiction that compels revelation. Comment 26 to D.C. Rule 1.6 forbids a lawyer from complying even with the order of a court or other tribunal of competent jurisdiction requiring revelation of confidences or secrets until "the lawyer has personally made every reasonable effort to appeal the order or has notified the client of the order and given the client the opportunity to challenge it."

Opinion No. 214 defines compliance with agency requests that would be "required by law" as those under statutory authority that is "narrowly and specifically drawn to require disclosure" as distinguished from "general authority to examine 'relevant and material' books and records." Opinion No. 214 held the IRS's statutory authority for Form 8300, requiring disclosure of the identity of persons making cash payments in excess of $10,000, to flow from a sufficiently narrow and specific statutory grant to be "required by law." Nonetheless, the Committee held that the inquirer could not ethically disclose the requested client names until other questions regarding applicability of the statute were resolved definitively. The Opinion said that disclosure still had to be resisted because "substantial good faith arguments" existed regarding the statute's applicability to the lawyer-client relationship and whether Congress intended the statute to override traditional lawyer-client confidentiality.

LSC's statutory authority to seek information from grantees is insufficiently narrow and specific for requests under it to be considered "required by law" under D.C.1.6(d)(2)(A). 42U.S.C. §2996g grants the Legal Services Corporation authority to require reports (subsection a) and to have access to records in order to insure compliance with grant or contract terms (subsection b). §42U.S.C 2996h (c)(1) requires LSC to conduct or require grantees to provide for a financial audit of grantees each year.

LSC also has claimed that access to grantees' documents flows from LSC's general monitoring authority found in 42U.S.C. §2996f(d). National Clients Council v. Legal Services Corporation, 617 F. Supp. 480, 490 (D.D.C. 1985). This statutory authority, however, is more general than the previously cited sections pertaining to record access.

Even if the statutory grant had been narrowly drawn, a question would remain about congressional intent with respect to overriding the attorney-client privilege. 42 U.S.C. §2996h(d) says that nothing in the previously cited sections gives LSC access to any reports or records subject to the attorney-client privilege. No reported case law has interpreted the scope of this section.

Disclosure of facts about client cases, legal theories considered, and legal or factual research is not authorized by Comment 11 to D.C. Rule 1.6 allowing lawyers to "give limited information from client files to an outside agency necessary for statistical, bookkeeping, accounting, data processing, banking, printing, or other legitimate purposes."

The breach of confidentiality occurs in showing the logs in question unredacted logs to LSC monitors. An agreement by LSC to restrict the items on which notes would be taken or stipulating that a monitor who is not an attorney review the files would be of no effect in curing the breach.

Thus, the Committee holds that the inquirers have a duty under D.C. Rule 1.6 to withhold production of requested documents that would reveal confidences and secrets of a client. A funding agency's request for documents under a general statutory authority to request information is not sufficient to authorize disclosure. Disclosure could be authorized by the order of a court of competent jurisdiction or by a request under a narrow and specifically drawn statutory authority addressing the information requested. Even in those cases, a lawyer must give reasonable notice to the client to allow the client to consider an appeal of the order or request.

Inquiry No.90-4-16
Adopted: December 17, 1991

Misleading Firm Name

- A lawyer, all of whose partners die, retire, or otherwise leave the partnership, is not precluded from continuing to use the former partnership name, absent reason to believe that clients or potential clients are led by the firm name to believe that the lawyer practices in a partnership or with other lawyers.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 7.1(a) (false or misleading communications)
- Rule 7.5(a) (use of firm name violating Rule 7.1)
- Rule 7.5(b) (implying practice in a partnership)

The Inquiry

B is a name partner in "A, B & C," a partnership consisting of B and C. A is dead and C is considering either becoming "of counsel" or retiring. The question asked is (1) whether the firm may continue to use its present name if as result of C's changed relationship it is no longer a partnership.

Discussion

The relevant rules are 7.1 and 7.5. Rule 7.1 provides in relevant part:

> (a) A lawyer shall not make a false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services. a communication is false or misleading if it:
> (1) Contains a material misrepresentation of fact or law, or omits a fact necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading; or
> (2) Contains an assertion about the lawyer or the lawyer's services that cannot be substantiated.

Rule 7.5 provides in relevant part:

> (a) A lawyer shall not use a firm name, letterhead or other professional designation that violates rule 7.1. A trade name may be used by a lawyer in private practice if it does not imply a connection with a government agency or with a public or charitable legal services organization and is not otherwise in violation of rule 7.1.
> (d) Lawyers may state or imply that they practice in a partnership or other organization only when that is the fact.

If partner C were to assume "of counsel" status and were no longer to be a partner, it might be argued that the continued use of the firm name would appear to violate Rule 7.5(d) because it implied that B practiced in a partnership when that is not the fact.[1] See also Opinion No. 189. Similarly, if C were to have no further connection with the firm, it might be argued that the continued use of the name "A, B & C" would also appear to violate Rule 7.5(d) because it would imply the existence of a partnership where there was not one in fact.

[1] Of course, in order not to violate Rule 7.1, if C were to assume "of counsel" status his relationshi would have to satisfy the requirements applicable t that relationship. See Opinion Nos. 151, 197; ABA Formal Opinion No. 90-357 (1990).

However, the crucial question is whether the mere use of a firm name containing multiple names implies the existence of a partnership either among those in the name or otherwise. There are persuasive reasons for concluding that it does not. Thus, Comment 1 to Rule 7.5 observes that "any firm name including the name of a deceased partner is, strictly speaking, a trade name," which, like any trade name, may be used if not misleading. Prior to adoption of the Rules of Professional Responsibility, DR 2-102(B) permitted a firm to use in its name the names of one or more deceased or retired members "of the firm or a predecessor firm if otherwise lawful."[2] This suggests that a multiple name firm name is not necessarily read as implying a partnership among those named in the firm name.

The remaining question is whether use of a firm name including multiple names (most or all of whom may be dead or retired) implies that the firm is a partnership. If it did, a problem would arise for small firms when only one partner remains, if the firm name could no longer be used, particularly for an interim period during which the surviving partner considers whether to obtain a new partner or attempts to do so. We do not believe that such an implication necessarily follows from use of a multi-name firm name.

A related issue is whether a single lawyer's use of a firm name with multiple names in it would violate Rules 7.1 and 7.5(a) by being false or misleading in implying that the firm consisted of more than one lawyer, when only one of the partners remains and he or she practices alone. In Opinion No. 189 the Committee concluded that the name "John Doe & Associates" would have violated the predecessor provisions of DR 2-101(B)(3) and DR 2-102(A) and (B), prohibiting "deceptive" firm names, if the attorney did not normally employ two or more associates, but would not be inherently misleading if the attorney did normally employ two or more associates. The Opinion added that if the firm received legitimate indications that use of the name was in fact misleading it would have to take steps to remedy the problem.

However, if, as we conclude, the multi-name firm does not necessarily imply the existence of a partnership, nor would it necessarily imply that B practices with other lawyers. Nevertheless, we would expect that a lawyer continuing to practice alone under a multi-person firm name will promptly inform new clients that he or she practices alone.

Our analysis thus far considers no fact other than the lawyer's continued use of the name of his former partnership. We recognize that additional facts could lead to different conclusions. For example, if the lawyer learns that clients or potential clients have been led by the firm name to believe that he or she practices in a partnership or with other lawyers, the lawyer may have a duty to take steps to dispel such misapprehensions. What evidence would demonstrate that the firm name has been misunderstood is a factual issue beyond the Committee's authority to resolve.

Inquiry No. 90-12-52

Opinion No. 225

Prepaid Legal Services

• A law firm does not violate any Rule of Professional Conduct by participating in a prepaid legal services program under which a third-party (1) pays the law firm a fee for providing legal advice to individual subscribers and (2) markets the service to potential subscribers, if the individual subscribers consent to payment of the law firm's fees by the third-party after consultation.

The usual rules governing the attorney-client relationship are fully applicable to the firm's relationship with its clients, the individual subscribers, including, for example, the duty to represent the interests of its clients diligently and zealously, without interference from any third-party, to protect client confidences and secrets, and to avoid conflicting representations that will hamper adequate representation of the client. In addition, the interposition of the third-party marketing agent for the service does not relieve the law firm of its responsibilities under Rule 7.1 to avoid any false or misleading statements about the services offered under the program.

Inquiry

Company A, which publishes a bimonthly newsletter concerning legal and tax developments that affect churches and clergy and presents continuing education seminars for church leaders, proposes to offer a new service under which subscribers to the new service will obtain general legal advice about federal tax issues concerning matters such as (1) withholding, reporting, and depositing federal income and social security taxes, (2) the exclusion of a minister's housing allowance under §107 of the Internal Revenue Code, and (3) the deduction of contributions to a church under §170 of the Code. A relatively small annual fee of approximately $100 would entitle the subscriber to make unlimited inquiries through the service.

Company A will market the service to potential subscribers and keep records of the subscribers, but will not be involved in the provision of legal advice. Each subscriber will sign a contract specifying the nature of the services available; the types of services that are not available; the relationships among Company A, the law firm, and the subscriber; disclosing that the law firm's fee will be paid by Company A; prohibiting Company A from interfering with the attorney-client relationship between the law firm and the subscriber; and seeking the subscriber's consent to payment of the law firm's fee by Company A.

Specifically, we are advised that the subscriber agreement will include the following paragraph:

> "Lawyer-client relationship. [Company A] and the [subscriber] agree that any legal services provided to the [subscriber] under this Agreement will be provided by one or more licensed attorneys who are paid a fee by, but are not employees of [Company A], and who are familiar with the topics concerning which [Company A's publications] are available. Accordingly, the [subscriber] and [Company A] agree that:

[2] Similarly, ABA Opinion 90-357 states that a firm name can include a former partner who is now of counsel if the name was "long-established and well-recognized."

"(a) When services are obtained by the [subscriber], an attorney-client relationship will exist between the [subscriber] and the attorney or attorneys providing the services;

"(b) [Company A] will not interfere in any manner with the attorneys' independence of professional judgment or with the lawyer-client relationship described in paragraph (a);

"(c) Confidences and secrets disclosed by the [subscriber] to any attorney providing the services to the [subscriber] will not be disclosed by the attorney to [Company A] or any other person without the [subscriber's] prior consent;

"(d) [Company A] and any of its principals, partners, or employees shall not be liable for any claim for damages, penalties, or interest in any way on the provision of erroneous information or advice under this Agreement; and

"(e) Having read and understood the foregoing paragraphs (a) - (d), the [subscriber] consents to the payment of a fee for the services by [Company A] to the attorney or attorneys who provide the services under this Agreement."

After the subscriber contract is accepted by Company A, the subscriber will be given a telephone number and account number to use in obtaining services under the agreement.

The inquirer, a law firm in the District of Columbia, proposes to contract with Company A to make one or more of its experienced tax lawyers available to answer subscriber questions. The basis for the firm's fee has not yet been established. Individual subscribers would not pay the law firm directly for any services rendered under the contract, but Company A and the law firm recognize that the firm would be providing legal advice to individual calling subscribers and that the firm's client in each instance would be the subscriber and not Company A.

For services outside the scope of the contract, the subscriber would be advised to hire individual counsel. The subscriber would be free to retain the law firm on a "fee-for-service basis" or hire other counsel.

Discussion

Nothing in the Rules of Professional Responsibility purports to limit or discourage the use of innovative ways of providing basic legal services.[1] As the Committee explained in construing the Code, "there is nothing improper per se about the formation of a prepaid legal services plan. Innovative approaches and fresh ideas in this area may result in the availability of necessary low-cost legal services to individuals who could not previously afford to employ an attorney. This wider availability is a goal to which the profession is, and should be, committed. The committee encourages the development of new approaches to the provision of legal services, so long as those approaches conform to the general and accepted norms of ethical conduct designed to protect the public and the profession." Opinion No. 91 (1980).

Rule 1.8.

Since Company A will pay the law firm's fee for services under the contract, Rule 1.8 (e) requires that the client (i.e., the individual subscriber) "consent[] after consultation."[2] The heart of the proposal is that for a relatively small fee paid to Company A, subscribers will be entitled to limited, general legal advice concerning certain types of federal tax issues. As described above, the agreement between Company A and subscribers to the service explains that the law firm's fees for services under the contract will be paid by Company A, explains the nature of the relationship that will exist between the subscriber and the law firm, provides assurance that Company A will not interfere with the attorney-client relationship between the subscriber and the firm, and requires that the subscribers consent to the payment of fees by Company A. In this context, we believe the requirements of Rule 1.8(e) are satisfied by these provisions.

Rule 5.5.

In Opinion No. 182 we considered a very different sort of proposal under which lawyers who were both employees of a consulting firm and partners in a law firm provided legal services to law firm clients who had no relationship with the consulting firm. The clients paid the law firm at its standard rates, and the law firm proposed to compensate the consulting firm for the time spent by the lawyers employed by the consulting firm in serving the law firm's clients. In that context, we explained:

> "[W]hen a lay organization sells, loans or rents the time of lawyers to be engaged in the practice of law on behalf of clients unrelated to the lay organization at rates that are expected to return a profit to that organization, the lay organization is engaged in the unauthorized 'business' of practicing law. Likewise, a law firm that would assist or participate in such a procedure would violate DR 3-101(A) by aiding in the unauthorized practice of the law."

The critical facts in Opinion No. 182 were that (1) employees of a lay consulting firm (2) were to provide legal services to a law firm's clients, (3) for which the law firm was to pay a fee to the consulting firm. Opinion No. 94 is similar in that it involved a proposal to have lawyers employed in the general counsel's office of a trade association provide legal services to another association for a fee to be paid to the lawyers' employer. We approved the Opinion No. 94 proposal. In disapproving the proposal in Opinion No. 182, however, we distinguished the result in Opinion No. 94 on the ground that the entity to whom the in-house lawyer was to provide legal services was a related trade association.

In contrast to both of the proposals considered in Opinion Nos. 182 and 94, the attorneys who will provide legal services to Company A's subscribers are not employees of Company A. No employee of Company A will participate in providing legal services to anyone. Thus, compensation received by Company A is attributable solely to its efforts in establishing, marketing, and administering the service, and not to providing legal services. In these circumstances, Company A cannot be said to be engaged in the practice of law through the activities of any of its employees.

[1] The Committee considered several prepaid legal services proposals under the Code of Professional Responsibility. Opinion No. 170 (1986); Opinion No. 155 (1985); Opinion No. 91 (1980); Opinion No. 30 (1977).

[2] Rule 1.8(e) provides that "A lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless: (1) the client consents after consultation; (2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independence of professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and information relating to representation of a client is protected as required by Rule 1.6."

For purposes of the Rules, "'consent' denotes a client's uncoerced assent to a proposed course of action, following consultation with the lawyer regarding the matter in question." Terminology [2]. Similarly, "'consult' or 'consultation' denotes communication of information reasonably sufficient to permit the client to appreciate the significance of the matter in question." Terminology[3].

Rule 7.1.

Company A (and not the law firm) will solicit potential subscribers for the service. Nonetheless, Rule 7.1 governing communications concerning a lawyer's services is fully applicable.[3] Legal advice is the service being offered to potential subscribers. Interposition of a marketing agent does not diminish the lawyer's obligation to avoid false or misleading statements about his services. Accordingly, the law firm must satisfy itself that statements by Company A concerning the service are not false or misleading within the meaning of Rule 7.1. In particular, it is essential that both the limited nature of the services being offered and the possibility of additional expense be described clearly to avoid misleading potential subscribers as to what is being purchased. Cf. Opinion No. 91 (1980).

Other Rules.

As the parties recognize, the individual subscriber and not Company A will be the law firm's client. The lawyer's obligations to individual subscribers will include all of a lawyer's usual duties to his client including, for example, the duty (1) to maintain confidences and secrets, Rule 1.6, (2) to exercise independent professional judgment on behalf of the individual subscriber without interference from Company A or anyone else, Rules 1.8 (e) and 5.4(c), and (3) to decline any representation that may conflict with the duty of loyalty or zealous representation of the individual subscriber, Rule 1.7.

Accordingly, subject to the foregoing, we find nothing in the Rules of Professional Conduct that precludes a law firm's participation in offering the proposed service.

Service by Lawyer in Private Practice as In-House Counsel and Real Estate Broker

• Lawyer in private practice may serve as part-time, salaried in-house counsel for client, while continuing to represent that client in his private practice, so long as he complies fully with applicable Rules of Professional Conduct in both capacities. He may also serve as a licensed real estate broker for a client, compensated on an hourly-fee basis, so long as his work as a broker does not cause him to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct and so long as he clearly discloses to affected parties the capacity in which he is acting and obtains informed consent where he represents two related parties in a transaction as broker and lawyer.

Applicable Rules Provisions

• Rule 1.7(b) (Waivable Conflicts of Interest).

• Rule 1.7(c)(2) (Compliance with Other Rules as Condition of Waivability of Conflicts of Interest).

• Rule 7.1(a) (False or Misleading Communications About Legal Services).

Inquiry

The inquirer is a lawyer engaged in private practice representing an affiliated group of real estate partnerships, corporations, and entities organized under a single operating company (for purposes of this opinion, the "XYZ Company"). There are approximately 60 such related entities for which the inquirer performs legal services, all of which have substantial common ownership. (In some cases, the percentage of ownership by the common individual owners varies, and in some cases the entities are ventures including partners not otherwise affiliated with XYZ Company.) The inquirer represents XYZ and affiliated entities chiefly in real estate transactional matters. The inquirer represents that he complies fully with Rule 1.7 in dealing with the occasional engagement that involves a conflict or potential conflict of interest between XYZ and an affiliated entity.

XYZ Company has recently asked the inquiring lawyer to perform certain "in-house" services -- now performed by the inquirer as outside counsel -- as a part-time employee of its regional operating company, with the title of Regional General Counsel. The inquirer would, however, also continue to represent XYZ and affiliated entities on transactional matters as outside counsel. While the inquirer would conduct his work as Regional General Counsel out of his own law offices, he would use separate business cards and letterhead and maintain separate files. The inquirer states that he would not represent an XYZ-affiliated entity in any transaction in which the XYZ regional operating company had an interest without disclosing his role as in-house counsel for the operating company and obtaining the consents required by Rule 1.7(b) and (c). He also recognizes that in some such matters, he might be barred by Rule 1.7(a) or Rule 1.7(c)(2) from undertaking representation of the XYZ-affiliated entity.

The inquirer asks whether in these circumstances he may ethically continue to represent XYZ Company and its affiliated entities in real estate transactions while serving as a part-time, salaried in-house lawyer for XYZ's regional operating company.

[3] Rule 7.1 is, in pertinent part, as follows:

(a) A lawyer shall not make a false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services. A communication is false or misleading if it:

(1) contains a material misrepresentation of fact of law, or omits a fact necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading; or

(2) contains an assertion about the lawyer or the lawyer's services that cannot be substantiated.

(b) A lawyer shall not seek by in-person contact, or through an intermediary, employment (or employment of a partner or associate) by a nonlawyer who has not sought the lawyer's advice regarding employment of a lawyer, if:

(1) The solicitation involves use of a statement or claim that is false or misleading, within the meaning of paragraph(a);

(2) The solicitation involves the use of undue influence;

(3) The potential client is apparently in a physical or mental condition which would make it unlikely that the potential client could exercise reasonable, considered judgment as to the selection of a lawyer;

(4) The solicitation involves use of an intermediary and the lawyer knows or could reasonably ascertain that such conduct violates the intermediary's contractual or other legal obligations; or

(5) The solicitation involves the use of an intermediary and the lawyer has not taken all reasonable steps to ensure that the potential client is informed of (a) the consideration, if any, paid or to be paid by the lawyer to the intermediary, and (b) the effect, if any, of the payment to the intermediary on the total fee to be charged.

(c) A lawyer shall not knowingly assist an organization that furnishes or pays for legal services to others to promote the use of the lawyer's services or those of the lawyer's partner or associate, or any other lawyer affiliated with the lawyer or the lawyer's firm, as a private practitioner, if the promotional activity involves the use of coercion, duress, compulsion, intimidation, threats, or vexatious or harassing conduct."

At the request of his client XYZ Company, the inquirer has also become licensed as a real estate broker in Maryland. (The inquirer is a member of the bar of Maryland as well as the District of Columbia Bar). He has been asked by XYZ Company to serve as broker of record in connection with third-party leasing, sale and property management activities engaged in by a Maryland entity affiliated with XYZ. In that capacity, he would supervise associate brokers and licensed salespersons, as required by Maryland law.

The inquirer would be compensated for his brokerage services by XYZ's Maryland affiliate on an hourly-fee basis, and would not receive commissions or any other compensation based on the value or success of any transaction. The inquirer might also perform legal services for XYZ-affiliated companies in some transactions in which he also served as broker of record for XYZ's Maryland affiliate. In no case, however, would the fees received by the inquirer as broker of record duplicate fees received by him for legal services performed for XYZ's Maryland affiliate. And where the inquirer served as counsel for another XYZ affiliate in a transaction where he was also broker of record for XYZ's Maryland affiliate, he would disclose his brokerage role to the affiliated company and comply with the provisions of Rule 1.7 in the event of any potential conflict of interest.

The inquirer's activities as broker of record would be performed principally in the offices of XYZ's Maryland affiliate, separate from the inquirer's law office. He would use separate stationery, business cards and telephone listings as a broker.

The inquirer asks whether his performance of real estate brokerage services in the manner set forth above would be consistent with the Rules of Professional Conduct. [1]

Discussion

1. Role as In-House Counsel

There is no per se bar to a lawyer serving as in-house counsel to a business entity, on a part-time salaried basis, while continuing to represent that entity and affiliated entities as outside counsel on a fee-for-service basis. Of course, the lawyer must comply with all provisions of the Rules of Professional Conduct in both capacities.

In particular, it is important to ensure that no client or third party is misled as to the role of the lawyer and his status as an employee of a client. Rule 7.1(a).[2] The steps that the inquirer plans to take, as set forth above (separate letterhead and business cards, etc.) should go far to assure compliance with Rule 7.1(a). The lawyer should be careful to make an affirmative disclosure of his dual capacity as in-house and outside counsel whenever that fact would be of importance to another client or a third party.

The inquirer must also take care to comply fully with the provisions of Rule 1.7 (Conflicts of Interest). Thus, as the inquirer recognizes, under Rule 1.7(b), he may not be able to serve as counsel for another entity (including an XYZ-affiliated entity) in a transaction in which XYZ's regional operating company has a potential conflicting interest, without the consent of both parties after full disclosure of the possible conflict. There could even be situations in which the adverse consequences to XYZ's regional operating company from his representation of another party in a particular transaction would be serious enough that the lawyer himself might conclude that his ability zealously to represent the other party (as required by Rule 1.3) would be compromised. In such a case, representation of the other party -- even with consent -- would be improper. Rule 1.7(c)(2); Opinion No. 94.

2. Role as Real Estate Broker

The Rules of Professional Conduct erect no bar to a lawyer engaging in another business, separate from his or her law practice, so long as the lawyer's engagement in that other business does not result in violations of applicable provisions of the Rules. E.g., Rules 1.3 (duty of zealous representation); 1.7(b)(4) (professional judgment adversely affected by lawyer's responsibility to third party or lawyer's own financial interests; 1.8(a) (transactions with client). Moreover, where the inquirer is performing both professional roles (lawyer and broker) with respect to a single transaction, we believe that he should comply with applicable provisions of the Rules of Professional Conduct regardless of which "hat" he is wearing in particular aspects of that transaction.[3]

In any transaction in which the inquirer is serving as broker of record on behalf of one entity and lawyer on behalf of a related entity, he should take special care to ensure that there has been full disclosure of his dual roles to all affected parties. Rule 7.1(a). We also believe that, to assure full compliance with Rule 1.7(b), the inquirer should obtain informed consent from related entities which he represents as lawyer and broker in a particular transaction, because of the potential conflict of interest between the related entities and the potential conflict of interest created by the inquirer's financial interest in brokerage fees. While that financial interest is not as significant as it would be were the inquirer receiving a brokerage commission contingent on consummation of the transaction and tied to the transaction's value, we believe that the inquirer should obtain informed consent before proceeding.

Migratory Paralegals And Lawyers/ Imputed Disqualification/screening

Synopsis

• If a paralegal moves from Law Firm A to Law Firm B, and that paralegal

[1] The inquirer has made the same inquiry of the Committee on Legal Ethics of the Maryland State Bar. We do not address any question as to the rules in Maryland or, in the event of a conflict, whether the Maryland or D.C. rules should apply.

[2] Rule 7.1(a) provides that "a lawyer shall not make a false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services," and that a communication is false or misleading if, inter alia, it "omits a fact necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading."

[3] ABA Formal Opinon 328 (June 1972) goes further, holding that a lawyer who engages in another occupation must comply with legal ethical standards in his or her other professional capacity whenever that other occupation "is so law-related that the work of the lawyer in such occupation will involve, inseparably, the practice of law." We do not reach this broader question here, but merely hold that the Rules of Professional Conduct apply to a lawyer's conduct in another professional capacity where he is acting in that capacity as well as his capacity as a lawyer in the same transaction or matter. We note, however, that it is important as a general matter for the inquirer to assure that clients and third parties are not misled as to whether he is providing services as a real estate broker or as a lawyer.

is personally disqualified from a matter pending in Law Firm B because the paralegal worked on a substantially related matter at Law Firm A, Law Firm B ordinarily may avoid imputed disqualification by "screening" the paralegal from that matter in Law Firm B. However, it is not permissible for Law Firm B purportedly to "screen" the paralegal from only that portion of the matter that is related to the paralegal's previous work at Law Firm A, and assign the paralegal to work on other, assertedly unrelated aspects of that same matter. Absent informed consent from Law Firm A's client, the paralegal must be effectively isolated at Law Firm B from the entire matter, otherwise Law Firm B risks being disqualified from that matter. In general, in the case of a migratory lawyer (as distinguished from a nonlawyer), screening plus consent of the former client is required.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification: General Rule)
- Rule 5.3 (Responsibilities Regarding Non-Lawyer Assistants)

Inquiry

A paralegal has recently become employed by Law Firm B (the inquirer) after having worked the previous two years at Law Firm A. Law Firm B represents Wife in her divorce proceeding against Husband. Husband is the principal owner of the ABC Company. While at Law Firm A the paralegal worked on matters regarding the pension and profit-sharing plans (the "Plans") of the ABC Company. She had access to the terms of the Plans and on at least one occasion she assisted in preparing the Summary Plan Descriptions for the Plans. The inquirer represents that the paralegal "does not recall" having access to underlying financial and accounting data for the Plans, that Law Firm A did no other legal work for the ABC Company or Husband, and that the paralegal never met Husband while she was employed by Law Firm A. Law Firm A is not involved in the divorce proceeding brought by Wife against Husband.

The paralegal is the only litigation paralegal employed by Law Firm B, which wishes to assign her to work on the divorce matter between Wife and Husband. Law Firm B represents that the issues in the divorce case relating to the Plans "are a very small and easily segregated part of the [divorce] case." The inquirer therefore proposes to implement a protective "screening" procedure so that the paralegal would be isolated from all aspects of the divorce case relating to the Plans, and would assist only on the other aspects of the divorce case as if Husband was not involved in any pension or profit-sharing plans relevant to the divorce case.

Discussion

In the case of a nonlawyer moving from one law firm to another, the strict general rule of imputed disqualification reflected in Rule 1.10 does not apply because Rule 1.10 literally refers only to "lawyers." Nevertheless, Rule 5.3(a) requires a law firm to make reasonable efforts to ensure that the conduct of all nonlawyers "is compatible with the professional obligations of" the lawyers. One of the most fundamental obligations of the lawyers that must also be adhered to by the nonlawyers is the preservation of confidences and secrets of current clients and former clients. That leads to a consideration of "screening" or an "ethical wall" in the instant case within Law Firm B as a means of ensuring that Husband's confidences and secrets relating to the Plans will be preserved.

At the outset we hold that the work performed by the paralegal on the Plans at Law Firm A is a matter that is "substantially related" within the meaning of Rules 1.9 and 1.10(b) to the divorce matter pending at Law Firm B. See, e.g., our Opinion No. 158 (9/17/85). The relationship between the Plans and the divorce matter in this inquiry may not be quite as close and direct as the relationship between the two matters discussed in a similar context in Opinion No. 158. Nevertheless, it is clear that Husband, as the principal owner of ABC Company, has a significant interest in, and from Wife's point of view there is significant economic value associated with, the ABC Company's Plans.

It may be that at Law Firm A the paralegal did not actually have access to confidential information regarding the Plans or Husband's interest therein, and that in any event such sensitive and confidential information as may exist regarding Husband's interest in the Plans will be required to be disclosed by him as part of the normal discovery process in the divorce matter. If so, those facts nevertheless are irrelevant under Rule 1.9, which requires an end to the analysis if the two matters are "substantially related," which we hold they are.

The inquirer appears to recognize the foregoing principle by its proposal to cure the problem by screening the paralegal from all aspects of the divorce matter (namely, the Plans) that are substantially related to the paralegal's previous work at Law Firm A on the Plans. We conclude that a screening mechanism in the circumstances presented by this inquiry is permissible only if it effectively isolates the paralegal from the entire divorce matter at Law Firm B.

We have found no case law, legal ethics opinions, or other legal authority supporting the concept that, where screening is appropriate to cure imputed disqualification in a particular matter, the screen may exist only as to a portion of that matter, and that the personally disqualified individual may participate in other portions of that matter that are assertedly unrelated to that individual's prior work for the former client. As it is, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere there is considerable controversy regarding the propriety and practical effectiveness in general of a "screen" (also sometimes referred to as an "ethical wall" or "cone of silence") as a cure for imputed disqualification. We decline to approve the novel concept of a partial screen as to a portion of a matter without the former client's (in this case the Husband's) consent.

In the case of migratory nonlawyers generally, we approve the pro-screening approach reflected in Informal Opinion 88-1526 (6/22/88) of the ABA Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility, the official synopsis of which is as follows:

> "A law firm that employs a nonlawyer who formerly was employed by another firm may continue representing clients whose interests conflict with the interests of clients of the former employer on whose matters the nonlawyer has worked, as long as the employing firm screens the nonlawyer from information about or participating in matters involving those clients and strictly adheres to the screening process described in this opinion and as long as no information relating to the representation of the clients of the former employer is revealed by the nonlawyer to any person in the employing firm. In addition, the nonlawyer's former employer must admonish the nonlawyer against revelation of information relating to the representation of clients of the former employer."

Therefore, if the paralegal at Law Firm B is effectively isolated from all aspects of the divorce matter between Wife and Husband, Law Firm B may continue as counsel to Wife in that matter, whether or not Husband consents. In this connection, we suggest that Law Firm B consider one or more of the following precautionary techniques in order to satisfy its obligation under Rule 5.3 to ensure that the paralegal is effectively isolated from the divorce matter:

(a) On or before the date on which the paralegal reports for work at Law Firm B, (i) instruct the paralegal in writing not to discuss the divorce matter or the Plans with any partner or employee of Law Firm B, and (ii) conversely, instruct every partner and employee of Law Firm B in writing not to discuss the divorce matter or the Plans with the paralegal.

(b) All of Law Firm B's files relating to the divorce matter could be "stickered" with a legend containing the substance of the restrictions described in (a) above.

(c) Investigate whether the paralegal has brought with her from Law Firm A any files or other information relating to the Plans, or the ABC Company, or Husband.

We note that, if the facts were otherwise the same as described above except that the person who was a paralegal at Law Firm A had subsequently attended law school and become a member of the Bar by the time she reported to work at Law Firm B, there is a special provision -- unique to the District of Columbia -- included in Rule 1.10(b) that would cause our holding to be the same notwithstanding the fact that the person involved is actually a member of the Bar upon reporting for work at Law Firm B:

"The [imputed] disqualification of the firm does not apply [under Rule 1.10] if the lawyer participated in a previous representation or acquired information under the circumstances covered by Rule 1.6(g)."

Rule 1.6(g) explicitly extends the obligation of confidentiality imposed upon a lawyer to confidences and secrets obtained by a lawyer prior to becoming a member of the Bar "in the course of providing assistance to another lawyer."

Further, we observe that, if the facts were otherwise the same as described above except that the person involved was a member of the Bar while working on the Plans at Law Firm A, and was a member of the Bar when she reported for work at Law Firm B, a screening process of the kind approved above is not in itself effective to avoid the imputation of that individual's personal disqualification to the entire Law Firm B. Under the language of Rule 1.10, paragraphs (a) and (b), Law Firm B could avoid imputed disqualification from the divorce matter only by obtaining Husband's consent to its hiring (and screening) of that person. This Committee held to that effect in Opinion No. 174 (6/17/86) under the previous Code, and the District of Columbia Court of Appeals in Comment [15] under Rule 1.10 has explicitly confirmed that screening, without more, is not sufficient to avoid imputed disqualification under Rule 1.10(b) in the case of a migratory lawyer. In addition to screening, consent of the former client is required. The willingness of the former client to give such consent presumably will depend primarily on the extent to which that former client is satisfied that the migratory lawyer and his or her new firm are trustworthy, and that the screen will be effective. Finally, in the context of movement to a private law firm by former government lawyers and other public officials, including judges, see Rule 1.11, which generally permits screening subject to certain conditions.

Lawyer-Witness Participation in Pre-Trial Proceedings

• Although precluded from acting as trial counsel, a lawyer who is likely to be a necessary witness at trial ethically may assist substitute counsel in both pre-trial matters and trial preparation and may continue him/herself to represent the party in most pre-trial proceedings.

Applicable Rule Provisions

- Rule 3.7(a)(Lawyer As Witness)
- Rule 1.7(b)(Conflict of Interest)
- Rule 1.4(b)(Communication)

Inquiry

The inquirer has represented a client (the association) for several years. The association currently is involved in litigation in which opposing counsel successfully sought inquirer's disqualification from representation based on the opposition's intention to call inquirer as a witness. The association retained substitute trial counsel whom inquirer has assisted in preparing for trial.[1]

Opposing counsel objects to the assistance that inquirer has been providing to substitute counsel. Opposing counsel contends that this assistance violates Rule 3.7(a). Inquirer believes the court's disqualification of him as trial counsel does not affect his ability to assist his client in preparation for trial; he is limited only in his ability to represent the association at trial.

Discussion

Rule 3.7(a) provides that "A lawyer shall not act as advocate at a trial in which the lawyer is likely to be a necessary witness...." As Comment [2] explains, the advocate-witness rule is intended to prevent prejudice that could result from the lawyer's assumption of dual roles at trial: "A witness is required to testify on the basis of personal knowledge, while an advocate is expected to explain and comment on evidence given by others. It may not be clear whether a statement by an advocate-witness should be taken as proof or an analysis of the proof."

Beyond the confusion that this combination of roles might create, the rule is justified on at least three other bases: (1) it is necessary to prevent the possibility that, in addressing the jury, the lawyer will appear to vouch for his own credibility; (2) it will prevent the difficult situation that occurs when an opposing counsel must cross-examine a lawyer-adversary and seek to impeach his credibility; and (3) the rule also will prevent the implication that the testifying lawyer is distorting the truth for his/her client's benefit. Culebras Enterprises Corp. v. Rivera-Rios, 846 F.2d 94, 99 (1st Cir. 1988), citing Bottaro v. Hatton Associates, 680 F.2d 895, 897 (2d Cir. 1982); International Electronics v. Flanzer, 527 F.2d 1288, 1294 (2d Cir. 1975); MacArthur v. Bank of New York, 524 F.Supp. 1205, 1208 (S.D.N.Y. 1981). See also A.B.A., Annotated Model Rules Of Professional Conduct, at 387 - 389 (2d ed. 1992).

[1] The events in this inquiry occurred before the adoption of the Rules of Professional Conduct. Under the former Code of Professional Responsibility, the inquirer's disqualification under DR 5-102(a) was imputed to his law firm. Rule 3.7 removes this imputed disqualification. Assuming that the applicable court order would permit, the change effected by Rule 3.7 would allow previously-disqualified law firms to resume representations in which a firm member is a necessary witness.

All of the reasons underlying the rule relate to concerns that might arise only at trial. Indeed, Rule 3.7(a)'s reach is limited to the trial stage, i.e., the lawyer is prohibited from acting only as "advocate at a trial" when he or she is likely to be a necessary witness. Given the Rule's express limitation and the trial-stage purposes it is intended to serve, we conclude that a lawyer who is likely to be a necessary witness at trial may represent a client in most pre-trial matters. This includes, but is not limited to, taking witness depositions, pre-trial discovery and argument of most pre-trial motions, and also assisting in trial preparation.[2] It follows a fortiori that the lawyer-witness may assist substitute counsel in similar matters.

The American Bar Association Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility considered the same issue in Informal Opinion 89-1529 (10/20/89). In reaching the same conclusion under substantially the same rule,[3] the ABA committee found several reasons for permitting the lawyer-witness to represent the client advocate during the pre-trial stage: (1) the case may be settled in advance of trial so that the lawyer is not needed to testify; (2) the lawyer's testimony may be replaced with other evidence at trial; (3) the client may choose to forego the lawyer's testimony rather than lose the lawyer's services at trial; (4) there is little likelihood of prejudice to the client or the justice system since the Rules now permit the lawyer's partner to act as trial counsel; and (5) the lawyer-witness may have the most knowledge about the case, and it would be unfair to the client not to permit that lawyer to participate in pre-trial proceedings.

We agree, and add that the Rules should not be interpreted to interfere unnecessarily with a client's choice of counsel. Where none of the Rule 3.7's purposes are served by pre-trial disqualification, such a disqualification of the advocate-witness would serve only to deprive the client of the lawyer or firm which not only knows the case best but with whom the client most likely has an established relationship. See Norell, Inc. v. Federated Department Stores, Inc., 450 F.Supp. 127, 130 (S.D.N.Y. 1978).

Courts considering the issue of advocate-witness participation in pre-trial matters generally have permitted such participation. In Culebras Enterprises, supra at 99, the First Circuit squarely was asked and squarely refused to construe Rule 3.7 broadly: "The question is whether the prohibition against acting as 'advocate at a trial' should be read as broadly prohibiting the rendition of case-related out-of-court services prior to trial. We think not."

Even under the former and arguably broader rule, DR 5-102(B),[4] Courts permitted advocate-witnesses to participate in pre-trial proceedings though disqualified or likely to be disqualified from representation at trial. See Moyer v. 1330 Nineteenth Street Corp., 597 F.Supp. 14, 17 (D.D.C. 1984); Brotherhood Railway Carmen v. Delpro Co., 549 F.Supp. 780, 790 (D.Del. 1982); MacArthur v. Bank of New York, supra at 1211 ("The disqualified firm may consult with defendant's substitute counsel and assist in preparing for trial."); Norell,Inc., supra. But see Munk v. Goldane National Corp., 697 F.Supp. 784, 788 (S.D.N.Y. 1988)(interests of justice best served if advocate-witness disqualified from pre-trial proceedings); General Mill Supply Co. v. SCA Services, 697 F.2d 704, 716 (6th Cir. 1982)("The most acute evils we would foresee from failure to enforce [DR 5-102] in this instance would occur in the pretrial period....")

Although noting that Rule 3.7 applies "specifically to service 'as advocate at a trial'," the ABA ethics committee nonetheless believed "the policy behind the prohibition applies to any situation where the lawyer[-witness] is placed in the position of arguing the lawyer's own veracity" in a pre-trial proceeding. Inf. Op. 89-1529, supra note 1. The ABA thus felt that a lawyer should not argue, without the client's consent, a pre-trial motion where the lawyer's testimony is both disputed and material to a contested matter being decided before trial. In a single-sentence footnote, the Court in Brotherhood of Railway Carmen, supra note 20, also precluded the advocate-witness from participating in pre-trial motions that required him to testify to the matter at issue. Neither opinion cited an ethics rule or previous judicial opinion.

While in some instances it may be best for a lawyer-witness to decline representation of a client in a pre-trial motion requiring argument of his/her own testimony, D.C. Rule 3.7(a), by its terms, extends only to prohibit advocacy at a trial. Although it is identical to ABA Model Rule 3.7(a), we decline to extend the D.C. rule beyond its terms. Had the District of Columbia Court of Appeals intended the rule to apply beyond prohibition of courtroom representation, the rule could have been so written.[5] However, in any case in which the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of a client may be adversely affected by his/her role as a witness, the lawyer may not represent the client in pre-trial motions without the client's consent. Rule 1.7(b)(4). A lawyer-witness should carefully consider whether this is the case when his/her own testimony is at issue in a pre-trial motion.

Another representational issue that is raised concerns the lawyer-witness representing the client at the lawyer's own pre-trial deposition. While Rule 3.7 does not prohibit such representation, other ethical issues may be raised when a lawyer assumes both roles at his/her own deposition. Chief among these issues is whether the lawyer-witness will be able to protect his/her client's confidences and secrets diligently, as required by Rule 1.6. The ABA Committee, in cautioning against this practice, thought the "better practice is that another lawyer serve as counsel to the client at that deposition."

Once it becomes apparent that the lawyer likely will be a necessary witness

[2] This is subject to any applicable rules of court, including rules regarding witnesses.

[3] D.C. and Model Rules 3.7(a) are identical; subsection (b) of each rule is substantially the same.

[4] DR 5-102(A) provided that a lawyer "shall withdraw from the conduct of the trial" if the lawyer learns or it is obvious that the lawyer ought to be called as a witness; the lawyer's firm "shall not continue representation in the trial."

[5] For example, in Rule 3.4 (Fairness to Opposing Party and Counsel), subsections (d) and (e) clearly distinguish between pretrial and trial obligations.

at trial, it follows from Rules 1.4(b)[6] that the advocate-witness must inform his/her client of this development and seek the client's informed consent to the continued pre-trial representation. The client should understand the effect that withdrawal prior to trail will have, including the financial impact, if any, of retaining new counsel and the point at which new counsel should be retained. As with any withdrawal from employment, the advocate-witness is bound by the requirements of Rule 1.16(d).

Surreptitious Tape Recording by Attorney

• A lawyer who tapes a meeting attended by him, his client, and representatives of a federal agency investigating his client commits no ethical violation, even if he does not reveal that a tape is being made, so long as the attorney makes no affirmative misrepresentations about the taping. The agency reasonably should not expect that the preliminary phase discussions are confidential. The agency also should expect that such discussions will be memorialized in some fashion by the investigated party's attorney and that the record made may be used to support a claim against the agency.

Applicable Rule Provision

• Rule 8.4 (c) (Misconduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation)

Inquiry

The inquirer is employed in the inspector general's office of a federal agency. The agency was conducting a "formal administrative/employment investigation" concerning one of the agency's employees. The subject of the investigation was informed that no criminal ramifications would result from this investigation and had received a "non-prosecution assurance." The subject/employee chose to be represented by a member of the D.C. bar at an interview conducted by an investigator in the Inspector General's office.

The inquirer reports that, during the "preliminary phase" of the interview in which ground rules and guidelines for the participants were being explained, the interview was terminated. The inquirer ascribes this to the "disruptive actions" of the employee's attorney. No specific examples are given, but the inquirer seems to mean that the employee's attorney took a more adversarial approach to the "interview" than the agency thought appropriate.

The inquirer came to believe that the attorney had been surreptitiously tape recording the proceeding, including the informal "preliminary phase" of the meeting. The agency's investigator had agreed during the preliminary phase to tape the formal portion to follow, and the inquirer reports that a copy of this tape would have been provided to the subject/employee. The inquirer asks if surreptitious taping of the "preliminary phase" of such a proceeding is unethical.

Discussion

The Committee does not address questions of law outside the scope of the disciplinary rules. We assume for the purposes of this opinion that there was nothing illegal about the tape recording. We comment only on the legal ethics question involved in surreptitious tape recording in these circumstances.

In our Committee's Opinion 178, Attorney A gained permission from Attorney B to interview B's client as part of a criminal investigation. The Committee held that A's failure to disclose A's intention to record the interview meant that the consent obtained from Attorney B under DR 7-104(A)(1) was not a sufficiently informed one. The majority opined that the client would be "lulled into a false sense of security and confidentiality in the interview" because of having obtained the "shield and protect[ion]" of retaining an attorney and the attorney having consented to the interview. The opinion also said that the standard created by DR 1-102(A)(4) obligated Attorney A to inform Attorney B that the interview would be recorded.

Four concurring members of the Committee would have gone further and found the conduct to be "conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation" under DR 1-102(A)(4), now Rule 8.4(c). Four other members dissented, disagreeing on whether the witness was a party to the matter under DR 7-104(A)(1) and whether the conduct violated DR 1-102(A)(4).

No question concerning DR 7-104(A)(1) or its successor Rule 4.2 is involved here. This circumstance does not involve what was disclosed to an attorney in seeking permission to talk to his client. The agency representatives may be unaware that preliminary phase discussions are being taped. They, however, do not have any basis for being "lulled into a false sense of security and confidentiality" that their words will not be memorialized and used to support a claim against the agency.

In 1974, Opinion 337 of the American Bar Association Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility held that attorneys' taping of others was per se unethical in almost all circumstances.[1] The ABA Committee relied on Canon 9 of the Model Code of Professional Responsibility and the DR1-102(A)(4) prohibition on conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation. The broad holding of Opinion 337 has been criticized. Some states have elected to vary from the general rule stated in Opinion 337.

Ethics committees of several bars have excepted recording of witnesses by a criminal defense lawyer. Ariz. Bar Op. 90-02 (March 16, 1990); Ky. Op. E-279 (1984); Assn. of the City Bar of N.Y. 80-95 (undated); Tenn. Op. 86-F-14 (July 18, 1986). The Idaho bar recently opined that lawyers may not secretly record telephone conversations with other lawyers or potential witnesses but said it was permissible to record conversations

[6] Rule 1.4(b) states: "A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation."

[1] The only exception given by the ABA committee was:

> ...extraordinary circumstances in which the Attorney General of the United States or the principal prosecuting attorney of a state or local government or law enforcement attorneys or officers acting under the direction of the Attorney General or such principal prosecuting attorneys might ethically make and use secret recordings if acting within strict statutory limitations conforming to constitutional requirements. This opinion does not address such exceptions which would necessarily require examination on a case by case basis. It should be stressed, however, that the mere fact that secret recordation in a particular instance is not illegal will not necessarily render the conduct of a public law enforcement officer in making such a recording ethical.

between lawyer and client since these were confidential. Idaho Op. No. 130 (May 10, 1989) The Utah Bar has held lawyers may record surreptitiously by electronic or mechanical means communications with clients, witnesses, or other lawyers. (Utah Op. No.90, undated) A 1975 Arizona Opinion outlined four exceptions in vacating previous opinions stating an absolute ban on surreptitious tape recording.[2] Ariz. Op. No. 75-13 (June 11, 1975).

Although we do not necessarily concur with any of the preceding opinions, we, too, do not believe that a per se rule with respect to tape recording is appropriate. Rather, applicable circumstances should be evaluated to determine whether the particular conduct constitutes dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation.

Here the agency expects to tape at least the formal part of the hearing and will supply participating attorneys with a copy. The agency has no reasonable expectation that any statements made during the preliminary or formal phase of the hearing are secret or confidential as to the employee. Absent affirmative misrepresentations about taping the proceedings, we see nothing unethical in an employee's attorney having done so.

We find this to be a different circumstance than when Attorney A in our Opinion 178 sought permission for an informal interview with Attorney B's client without telling Attorney B that he intended to tape the interview. The conduct of a bar member in recording preliminary discussions in the type of proceedings involved in this opinion may be a prudent protection for the client. Absent affirmative misrepresentations to the contrary, we see no deceit in taping in these circumstances because the inquiring agency has reason to believe that the employee and his or her attorney may memorialize all discussions in some fashion and use that record to support a claim against the agency.

Assertion of Retaining Liens; Preservation of Confidences and Secrets of Trust Client in Dispute Between Former Co-trustee and Successor Trust.

• Effective January, 1991, Rule 1.8(i) prohibits an attorney from asserting a retaining lien as to the property of a client in his possession. An attorney whose client requests return of property in the attorney's possession after January, 1991 must return the property even if the attorney's initial assertion of a retaining lien respecting the property occurred prior to January, 1991 and therefore was proper under the District of Columbia Code of Professional Responsibility.

An attorney to a trust may not disclose confidential communications to a former trustee, over the objection of the current trustees, except as permitted by Rule 1.6.

Inquiry

In December, 1988, Inquirer was retained by one of two co-trustees ("Trustee A") to represent a trust located outside the District of Columbia. Inquirer served as counsel for the trust at the closing of a sale of real property, and was co-trustee under the promissory note securing the deferred purchase money deed of trust. Inquirer delivered copies of the closing documents, copies of two deferred purchase money promissory notes for $1.5 million and $100,000, and a copy of a $150,000 letter of credit to the Trust settlors and to another co-trustee ("Trustee B") of the trust.

In early 1989, after meeting the trust settlors, Inquirer concluded that he could no longer represent the trust. Inquirer orally advised the trust settlors as well as Trustee A and Trustee B of his intention to withdraw, and confirmed that decision in writing. Inquirer took appropriate steps to withdraw from all matters on behalf of the trust, including petitioning the District of Columbia Superior Court to permit him to withdraw as counsel for the trust in three other pending actions and drafting the papers necessary for his removal as trustee under the note securing the deed of trust in the real estate transaction.

Fees of approximately $14,000 due to the Inquirer remained unpaid by the trust. Inquirer asserted a lien against the client's files, including the original of the promissory notes and the letter of credit, and has refused several requests to turn over the files, pending satisfactory arrangements for payment. The most recent request for the files was made in January, 1992.

In June, 1991, Trustee B sought judicial instructions with respect to payment of $76,624.16 in legal fees due to five law firms, including Inquirer. Settlors of the trust then filed suit against Trustee B, claiming that Trustee B had breached its fiduciary duties, incurred unauthorized legal fees, mismanaged trust assets, and misused trust funds.

Apparently after Trustee B sought instructions from the court as to payment of the legal fees, the settlors terminated the trust and created a second trust, under which Trustee A and the settlors serve as co-trustees. The settlors assigned all of the assets of the initial rust to the successor trust.

Trustee B has advised Inquirer that his deposition may be taken in the pending litigation, and that it believes that information disclosed to Inquirer by Trustee A during the course of the professional relationship is not confidential as against Trustee B. Trustee A disagrees.

Discussion

Retaining lien.

The first question presented by the inquiry is whether assertion of a retaining lien is proper under the circumstances presented. Until January 1, 1991, the propriety of Inquirer's assertion of a retaining lien under the District of Columbia Code of Professional Responsibility was clear beyond any serious dispute.[1]

The District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct are no less clear, but require a contrary conclusion:

"In connection with any termination

[1] See Rule 5-103(A), District of Columbia Code of Professional Responsibility; Opinion 59 (undated); Opinion 90 (1980). See generally Opinion 107 (Oct. 27, 1981); Opinion 103 (1981). Indeed, the propriety of Inquirer's assertion of a retaining lien under the Code was confirmed by the Vice Chair of this Committee by letter dated September 14, 1989, and again by Assistant Bar Counsel in October 2, 1990, dismissing a complaint filed against the Inquirer in connection with his retention of the files.

of representation, a lawyer shall take timely steps to the extent reasonably practicable to protect a client's interests, such as giving reasonable notice to the client, allowing time for employment of other counsel, surrendering papers and property to which the client is entitled, and refunding any advance payment of fee that has not been earned. The lawyer may retain papers relating to the client to the extent permitted by Rule 1.8(i)."

The inquiry suggests no basis for concluding that the client is not "entitled" to the papers and property in his possession, except his retaining lien arising from the client's failure to pay his fee.[2]

As to retaining liens, Rule 1.8(i) is unequivocal:

> A lawyer shall not impose a lien upon any part of a client's files, except upon the lawyer's own work product, and then only to the extent that the work product has not been paid for. This work product exception shall not apply when the client has become unable to pay, or when withholding the lawyer's work product would present a significant risk to the client of irreparable harm."

The Comments to Rule 1.8(i) emphasize that it was intended to create only a "narrow exception" to the general rule stated in Rule 1.16(d), which "requires a lawyer to surrender papers and property to which the client is entitled when representation of the client terminates." Rule 1.8, Comment [8]. "Only the lawyer's own work product -- results of factual investigations, legal research and analysis, and similar materials generated by the lawyer's own effort -- could be retained," Rule 1.8, Comment [9], and then only if the client was able to pay and not facing jail or other serious and irreparable harm, Rule 1.8, Comment [10].[3]

Thus, without questioning the propriety of Inquirer's initial assertion of the retaining lien in accordance with the provisions of the Code, we conclude that the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, in effect since January 1, 1991, prohibit the refusal to turn over the original promissory notes and letter of credit, as well as any other documents in the file that are not Inquirer's work product, in response to a post-January, 1991 request from the former client. Rule 1.8, Comment [9].[4]

Client confidences and secrets.

The second question raised by the inquiry is whether Rule 1.6 precludes the disclosure of communications between Trustee A and Inquirer to Trustee B, over the objection of Trustee B's successor Trustees. Inquirer was counsel to the Trust, and not to the individual Trustees. We presume that the "assets" transferred to the successor trust included the right to assert any claim of privilege. See generally Commodity Futures Trading Commission v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 348-58 (1985). Accordingly, Inquirer's obligations are to the trust, and he can disclose the communications only with the consent of his client or its successor, acting through its authorized agents.

We assume that Trustee B would have been entitled to know what had been said to the Inquirer during the time that Trustee B was a co-trustee of the trust. The settlors terminated the initial Trust, effectively removing Trustee B as a trustee for the trust, and therefore terminated any power Trustee B might otherwise have had to demand disclosure of the privileged communications between Inquirer and the Trust acting through Trustee A.

Without the consent of the successor trust, Inquirer may not disclose the confidences or secrets of his former client, except in the circumstances described in Rule 1.6 (d), none of which appears applicable here.

Inquiry N. 92-6-14
Adopted: September 15, 1992

[2] The order of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, adopting the Rules of Professional Conduct states "that with respect to conduct occurring before January 1, 1991, the provisions of the Code of Professional Responsibility in effect on the date of the conduct in question are the governing rules of decision for this court, the Board on Professional Responsibility, its hearing committees, and the Bar Counsel." Order No. M-165-88 (Mar. 1, 1990). The "conduct in question" here is the attorney's refusal to turn over the documents in response to his client's post-January, 1991 request. Accordingly, the Code of Professional Responsibility is not applicable.

[3] The so-called Jordan Committee specifically rejected the ABA's proposed Model Rule 1.8(j), which would have continued the general approval of retaining liens expressed in the Model Code, and substituted the language of Rule 1.8(i) described above. Comments [9] and [10], which broadly construe Rule 1.16 and emphasize the limited reach of Rule 1.8(i) were added by the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia.

[4] The inquiry does not suggest any facts indicating that the client is unable to pay, as opposed to simply unwilling. Nor is there anything to suggest that the former client faces any risk of irreparable harm.

Inquiry

The inquirer is a member of the D.C. Council who is also a member of a law firm. The member's firm limits its practice to personal injury, workers compensation, medical malpractice and construction cases. The member asks whether and how the Rules of Professional Conduct apply to the member's role as a Council member, with particular reference to voting on legislation concerning liability of physicians. There is no suggestion that the legislation would affect any present client of the firm, although that may be a possibility, but it could have an adverse impact on the firm's practice in the future.

Discussion

The subject of legal or ethical constraints on the conduct of a practicing lawyer who is also an elected member of a legislative body is addressed specifically and primarily by legislation and regulations.[1] No Rule directly applies to or limits a lawyer's conduct, simultaneously, as a member of a law firm and a member of an elected legislative body. Given the frequency with which lawyers are also legislators, one would expect any additional ethical constraints on such a lawyer's activities or duties to be set forth expressly in the Rules. Accord-

[1] In Interpretative Opinion No. 91-20, dated May 31, 1991, the Director of the District of Columbia Office of Campaign Finance concluded that the member's vote in opposition to a bill limiting liability of physicians in free health care clinics could create the appearance that the member's official position had been used to obtain financial gain for the member's firm, in violation of D.C. Code 91-1461(b), which would require a written statement of potential conflict. The Opinion further found no law mandating recusal of the member. The Opinion noted that there is some question about the application of 18 U.S.C. § 208 to Council members, and requested an opinion from the United States Office of Government Ethics on that issue, but we are advised that no opinion has yet been provided.

ingly, we believe that the sometimes-vague provisions of general rules should not too readily be construed to impose such constraints unless clearly required by their language or purpose.

Rule 1.11, like its counterpart in the ABA Model Rules, applies only to "successive government and private employment." In Opinion No. 31, with reference to Congress, we noted that the former Code of Professional Responsibility applied "only to staff attorneys acting in their capacity as attorneys. It is not within our province to pass upon the propriety of conduct by congressmen, who may or may not be lawyers, but are acting in any event as congressmen."[2]

ABA Informal Opinion 1182 (1971) concluded that "[n]o Disciplinary Rules of the Code of Professional Responsibility contain a provision that will necessarily and always prohibit a lawyer's representing either an individual or an organization that is likely to be affected by the passage or defeat of proposed legislation, even though the lawyer also is a legislator." The Opinion noted that "[o]ur conclusions would be substantially the same under the former Canons. See Opinion 306 (1962)."

ABA Formal Opinion 306 (1962) concluded that, under the still-earlier ABA Canons of Ethics, it was permissible for a lawyer to appear before or lobby a legislative body of which a member of the firm was a member, where the applicable law expressly or by necessary implication permitted such action or provided for the member to disqualify himself. The rationale was that the consent needed to permit representation of conflicting interests under Canon 6 had been given. [3]

The Rules do impose specific obligations on a lawyer "representing a client" before a legislative body (see Rule 3.9), but they are not implicated here if, as we understand, neither the member nor others in the member's firm are representing clients before the Council concerning the legislation.

The conclusion that the Rules were not generally intended to reach the actions of a lawyer as a legislator is even stronger than under the former Code, in view of other provisions added to the Rules that distinguish between the role of a lawyer in representing clients and the lawyer's role as a citizen. For example, Rule 1.2(b), which had no counterpart in the Disciplinary Rules of the Code, provides that "a lawyer's representation of a client... does not constitute an endorsement of the client's political, economic, social, or moral views or activities." Similarly, Rule 6.4 encourages lawyers to engage in law reform activities, and permits a lawyer to serve a law reform organization even though the reform may affect the interests of a client of the lawyer. However, Comment 2 to Rule 6.4 notes that a lawyer participating in such activities should be mindful of obligations to clients under other rules, particularly 1.7.

Although there was no comparable rule under the Code, similar principles were reflected in EC 8-1, which the Committee addressed in Opinion No. 204, which was also stated to apply to present Rules 1.7 and 6.4 as then proposed. See id. n.1. There we concluded that a law firm that represents clients before an agency could in its own name file comments on a proposed rule, unless the comments, if adopted, could adversely affect pending or imminent filings by its clients. As the committee noted, "[l]awyers do not completely sacrifice their First Amendment rights by representing clients... ." Id., p. 5.

Opinion No. 204 also addressed DR 7-101(A)(3) under the Code, which was carried forward (in the D.C. Rules but not the ABA Model Rules) as Rule 1.3(b)(2). It provides that "a lawyer shall not intentionally... (2) prejudice or damage a client during the course of the professional relationship." The Committee found the meaning of "during the course of the professional relationship" clarified by EC 7-17 (id., p. 4, quoting EC 7-17):

> The obligation of loyalty to his client applies only to a lawyer in the discharge of his professional duties and implies no obligation to adopt a personal viewpoint favorable to the interests or desires of his client [footnote set forth below]. While a lawyer must act always with circumspection in order that his conduct will not adversely affect the rights of client in a matter he is then handling, he may take positions on public issues and espouse legal reforms he favors without regard to the individual views of any client (emphasis added).[4]

As noted, Opinion No. 204 concluded that the law firm could not submit its own comments if, were they adopted, they could prejudice applicants represented by the firm with respect to the subject matter of the comments. There the Committee treated "during the course of the professional relationship" as having only a temporal dimension and as applying to a lawyer's actions taken outside of the professional relationship. Applying the same reading here, there is an additional issue not specifically addressed in Opinion No. 204, i.e., whether a lawyer-legislator's vote on legislation adversely affecting a client's interests can be said to constitute "intentional[ ]... prejudice or damage." Where the prejudice in question results from a lawyer's actions as a legislator, in carrying out the obligations of that office, any such prejudice would seem an incidental consequence of the legislator's exercise of public duties. Accordingly, we would not regard the lawyer as having "intentionally" prejudiced the client, absent evidence of a subjective intent to do so.[5]

There remains the question whether the inquiry is affected by more general constraints of Rule 1.7. Since we understand that neither the Council member nor other members of his firm are "represent[ing] clients" with respect to passage of the legislative proposal, the rules concerning conflicts are implicated primarily with respect to their impact on representation by the member or his firm of clients who might be adversely affected by legislation on which the member may be called to upon to act as a legislator.

[2] Similarly distinguishing between the roles of lawyers qua lawyers and lawyers in legislatures, the Sims Committee Report on the Rules as proposed by the D.C. Bar concluded that "lawyers employed in the judicial and legislative branches of government...who are in fact employed and functioning as lawyers in the Judicial and Legislative branches should be governed by the same Rules as Executive branch lawyers. D.C. Bar Special Committee, Report on Government Lawyers and the Model Rules of Professional Conduct 17 (1988). This opinion addresses only the subject of lawyers who are also legislators.

[3] By contrast, Informal Opinion 1087 (1969) concluded that under Canon 6 neither a lawyer who is a member of the ABA House of Delegates nor a member of his firm could properly represent a client in seeking to influence passage or defeat of a proposal pending before that body, because no rule provided consent and the member was not free to abdicate his functions by not voting.

[4] The footnote to EC 7-17 includes the following explanation:

> No doubt some tax lawyers feel constrained to abstain from activities on behalf of a better tax system because they think that their clients may object. Clients have no right to object if the tax adviser handles their affairs competently and faithfully and independently of his private views as to tax policy.

[5] Opinion No. 204 involved a materially different situation, in which the lawyers had no obligation to participate personally, on their own behalf, in an administrative process that clearly would or could prejudice some of their clients.

Rule 1.7(b)(4) provides that, without the client's informed consent, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if:

> the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property or personal interests.

It is important to note that Rule 1.7(b)(4) does not address a situation where a lawyer's actions as a legislator could adversely affect the interests of a client or potential client. Rather, it only addresses situations where "the lawyer's professional judgment" on the client's behalf in a matter will or may be adversely affected. Even if the lawyer's position or responsibilities as a legislator could be deemed to involve responsibilities to or interests in "a third party" (e.g., constituents, the legislative body), or "the lawyer's own... interests" -- questions we need not decide -- nothing in the facts of the present inquiry suggests any adverse effect on the lawyer's professional judgment in the representation of clients. Accordingly, we find the situation not covered by Rule 1.7(b)(4) and hence that there is no need for client consent.

We conclude that, on the facts posed by the inquiry, no provision of the Rules would require client consent or preclude the Council member from voting on legislation that could affect the future business of the member's law firm, assuming that the member may do so consistently with applicable law, an issue we do not address.

Multiple Clients/Criminal Matter

• After full disclosure and consent by the client, a lawyer may represent a witness in a criminal matter who desires to assert his Fifth Amendment right not to testify even though a suspect in the criminal matter is being represented in another matter by the same firm. The lawyer may not, however, bargain with the government to obtain a benefit by giving testimony adverse to the firm's client without obtaining the consent of both clients and otherwise complying with Rule 1.7(c).

Inquiry

The Committee has been asked to decide whether a lawyer may represent a witness in a criminal homicide case, when the inquirer's partner has been representing client one, who is a principal suspect in the killing, in connection with two unrelated weapons possession charges. Client one is represented in the murder case by other counsel. We are told that the inquirer's client, client two, and the murder victim were riding in a car with three others, including client one, when the victim got out of the car, was chased by the car, and was ultimately killed by persons who were in the car.

Client two was originally charged in the homicide case, but the charge against him was dismissed at the initial hearing. The inquirer states that the government has decided not to charge client two because he was an innocent bystander in a murder planned and executed by client one and others. At the time of his arrest, and before client two was represented by counsel, he gave a statement to police which inculpated client one. The inquirer and the prosecutor state that the prosecutor would like to call client two to the grand jury to give testimony against client one. Client two will not testify unless he is given immunity and may not cooperate even then.

The inquirer states that he explained his partner's representation of client one to both client two and his family, and that each wished to proceed with the inquirer notwithstanding the potential conflict. In addition, the inquirer informed the prosecutor of the potential conflict and has kept the fee received from client two in escrow pending resolution of this matter. The inquirer's partner has not communicated with client one, who has been represented for some time by other counsel in the homicide matter and in other unrelated matters. The inquirer states that he and his partner will not share information about their respective clients, and this representation has been made to the prosecutor and to the court.

The inquirer asks three questions: (1) is there a per se conflict of interest which precludes representation of client two; (2) should the inquirer withdraw from the representation of client two and, if so, must his partner withdraw from further representation of client one; and (3) how should client one be contacted for his objection or consent to the inquirer's representation of client two?

Analysis

1. Disqualification from Representation of Client Two

Rule 1.10(a) of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct prohibits lawyers associated in a firm from representing a client if any lawyer in the firm, practicing alone, would be barred from representing both clients by Rules 1.7, 1.8(b), 1.9, or 2.2. To analyze whether the inquirer has a prohibited conflict, therefore, the inquirer and his partner must be treated as one.[1] See Rule 1.10(a); Comment [17] to Rule 1.7.

Rule 1.7(a) creates a nonconsentable conflict where a lawyer (or under Rule 1.10(a), a law firm) seeks to represent two clients taking adverse positions in the same "matter." Rule 1.7(b) creates four consentable conflicts in defined circumstances in which multiple representation may infringe a lawyer's duties of loyalty and zealous representation. Rules 1.7(a) and 1.7(b)(1) each deal with the situation in which a position to be taken for one client is adverse to a position to be taken for another client "in the same matter." They differ in that such a conflict is generally consentable under Rule 1.7(c) if the second client is represented by a different lawyer or firm.[2] Since client one is represented by separate counsel in the homicide case, only Rule 1.7(b)(1) is applicable here.

Applying Rule 1.7(b)(1) requires consideration of whether representation of client two, who is currently dismissed from the murder case, with respect to his grand jury testimony is (1) adverse to client one and (2) occurs in "the same matter" as the criminal trial against client one.[3] On the first issue, the inquirer states that client two will not testify without immunity (and may not testify then). In addition, client two apparently does not want to haggle with the prosecution to obtain immunity. Since client two's decision to invoke his Fifth Amendment rights is not adverse to client one, there does not at the present appear to be a disqualifying adversity of interests under Rule 1.7(b)(1).

[1] The inquirer and his partner have agreed not to share information relating to their respective clients. However, such an "ethical wall" has only been discussed once in dicta by our Court of Appeals, and any inference that such a wall would lessen the strict imputed disqualification stated in Rule 1.10(a) was removed by the Court when it promulgated Comment [15] to Rule 1.10(a). Thus, the existence of an "ethical wall" does not remove the obstacle of imputed disqualification presented by Rule 1.10(a).

2 Client consent is not effective if the lawyer is not able to comply with other applicable rules. See Rule 1.7(c)(2); see generally Opinion 217 (1991).

There is always a great risk in criminal matters, however, that positions can change as the prosecutor gathers evidence, winnows witnesses from targets, and selects potential charges.[4] Recognizing this, we note that should client two later decide that it is in his interest to bargain his testimony against client one for some advantage, then there would be sufficient adversity between client two and client one to require disqualification of the inquirer and his firm, absent consent under Rule 1.7(c), if such bargaining would occur "in the same matter."

The term "matter" is not precisely defined in the Rules. Outside of an "on-the-record adversary proceeding," the bounds of a "matter" become difficult to discern. See Comment [3] to Rule 1.7. The bounds given to the concept of a "matter" should, we believe, be informed by the purpose to be achieved by Rule 1.7. Comment [3] to Rule 1.7 implies that the problem to be avoided under the Rule is "seeking a result to which another client is opposed" from the same decision-maker. See id. Accordingly, where counsel seeks to gain an advantage for one client by offering to trade testimony inculpating a second client in the same criminal episode, such bargaining seeks, or at least facilitates, "a result to which [the second] client is opposed," and such bargaining should be considered to occur in a "matter" common to both clients. Should such bargaining take place, therefore, the inquirer and his firm would be disqualified from representing client two absent the consent of both clients one and two under Rule 1.7(c).[5]

Rule 1.7(b)(2) is also implicated by the facts of this inquiry. That rule prohibits representation of a client when such "representation will be or is likely to be adversely affected by representation of another client." When one lawyer represents multiple clients who may be able to inculpate each other in the same criminal episode, the government has frequently moved for disqualification on the ground that such representation creates two distinct conflicts. First, the lawyer's concern for one client may lead him to counsel a second to refuse to testify in circumstances where such refusal is not warranted by the Fifth Amendment (or otherwise) and may cause the second client to be held in contempt.[6] Second, the lawyer in such a situation is disqualified from bargaining for any one of his clients, which may be adverse to the best interests of clients who could exculpate themselves by inculpating others.[7] Although we are told it is not the case here, it could be argued that the inquirer's firm has an interest in protecting client one, even though they do not represent him in the homicide matter, which would cause them to counsel client two not to cooperate with the prosecutor to client two's detriment.

In any case, the inquirer is not disqualified under Rule 1.7(b)(2) so long as the inquirer can obtain client two's consent under Rule 1.7(c). While the inquirer states that he has spoken with client two and his family about the multiple representation situation and they still wish to go forward with the inquirer, it is not clear from the inquiry whether there has been full compliance with Rule 1.7(c). Rule 1.7(c) requires full disclosure of the possible adverse consequences of multiple representation. See, e.g., Opinion 217 (1991). In particular, the inquirer should advise client two that if circumstances change, the inquirer could be disqualified from continuing the representation unless client one gives consent as required by Rule 1.7(c).

2. Withdrawal

The inquirer and his firm are not currently disqualified from representing client two and client one simultaneously, and need not withdraw from either representation. Should circumstances change so that Rule 1.7(b)(1) comes into play, and consent under Rule 1.7(c) cannot be obtained from both client two and client one, then the inquirer would have to withdraw from the representation of client two. See Rule 1.16(a). Even if the inquirer were to withdraw from the representation of client two, we do not see any reason for the inquirer's partner to withdraw from the representation of client one in the unrelated weapons possession cases.[8]

3. Contact with Client one

If the inquirer decides to seek client one's consent to the representation of client two, the inquirer should seek that consent through client one's counsel in the homicide case. As discussed above, in those circumstances in which the interests of client two and client one could be adverse, client two and client one should be considered to be parties to the same "matter." Rule 4.2(a),[9] therefore, prohibits contact with client one on client two's behalf except through counsel representing client one in the homicide matter.[10]

Payment of "Success Fees" to Nonlawyer Consultants

• A law firm may agree with its clients that, depending on the outcome of a particular matter, a "success fee" will be

[3] The weapons possession charges against client one are clearly not the same matter as the murder charges at issue here.

[4] For example, the prosecutor has written the Committee that "it may be necessary to negotiate with [client two] regarding immunity and other sensitive issues." This suggests that the prosecutor has not made a final decision on whether to grant immunity to client two or whether to charge him with some crime.

[5] Even with consent, Rule 1.7(c)(2) requires withdrawal unless counsel can "comply with all other applicable rules with respect to such representation." On the facts provided to the Commmittee, we see no "other applicable rules" which would be violated by the proposed representation.

[6] See, for example, United States v. Dowdy, 440 F. Supp. 894 (W.D. Va. 1977) and In re Investigative Gran Jury Proceedings, 432 F. Supp. 50 (W.D. Va. 1977).

[7] See cases cited in footnote 6.

[8] This is not, for example, a situation in which confidences of client two would be used or revealed in the defense of client one on the weapons charges.

[9] This Rule states:

"During the course of representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party known to be represented by another lawyer in the matter..."

[10] While Rule 4.2(a) speaks of "parties" to a matter, it also applies to contacts with "any person, whether or not a party to a formal proceeding, who is represented by counsel concerning the matter in questions." Comment [4] to Rule 4.2.

paid to both the law firm and a consulting firm of nonlawyer experts retained by the law firm to assist it in connection with the matter. The fact that the portion of the "success fee" payable to the nonlawyer consultants flows from the client through the law firm does not result in a "sharing" by the law firm of legal fees with a nonlawyer proscribed by Rule 5.4.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)

Inquiry

The inquirer, a District of Columbia law firm, has developed a practice representing clients in connection with the litigation, arbitration and mediation of contract and other disputes in connection with international construction projects. In that connection, the law firm has built a close relationship with a consulting firm of professional engineers and other nonlawyer specialists who provide expert advice and opinions relating to analysis of construction delays, damage calculations, etc.

While the consulting firm occasionally is retained directly by the law firm's client, the more common arrangement is for the law firm to retain the consulting firm, compensating it on the basis of hourly rates. The law firm's own work for its clients in this area is typically charged on an hourly-rate basis, but with a "success payment" to the law firm in the event of a successful result.

The law firm wants to enter into a contractual arrangement with the consulting company pursuant to which the consulting company not only would be compensated by the law firm on an hourly basis, but also would participate in any "success fees" received by the law firm from its clients on the construction projects. The "success fees" would be shared with the consulting company in any given case only with the prior knowledge and consent of the law firm's client.

Discussion

The questions posed are (1) whether the law firm's proposed fee arrangement with its clients and the consulting firm constitute a sharing of legal fees by the law firm and the nonlawyer consultants that is proscribed by Rule 5.4(a); and (2) if so, whether the fee arrangement is removed from that general proscription if the consulting firm agrees to abide by the conditions set forth in Rule 5.4(b)(1)-(4).

The Committee does not reach the second question because we conclude that, so long as the client is fully informed and gives prior consent to the fee agreement in a particular matter, the payment of a success fee by the client to the law firm and, through the law firm, to the consulting firm does not constitute a sharing of legal fees proscribed by Rule 5.4(a).

The bans on fee-sharing and partnerships with nonlawyers have long been a feature of codes of legal ethics. They were motivated by a number of concerns, chiefly that nonlawyers might through such arrangements engage in the unauthorized practice of law, that client confidences might be compromised, and that nonlawyers might control the activities of lawyers and interfere with the lawyers' independent professional judgment. Opinion No. 146.

The Kutak Commission of the American Bar Association, which drafted the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, proposed a dramatically different approach that would have allowed a wide range of business associations between lawyers and nonlawyers. The Kutak Commission thus recognized the important and integral role that a variety of types of nonlawyers -- from paralegals to economists, social workers and accountants -- have come to play in modern law practice. Compare Opinion No. 93, in which this Committee in 1980 similarly recognized the increasing role of nonlawyers in law practice. The ABA's House of Delegates, however, rejected the Kutak Commission proposal and adopted, in Rule 5.4 of the Model Rules, general bans on sharing of legal fees with nonlawyers and on partnerships with nonlawyers paralleling those contained in Disciplinary Rules 3-102 and 3-103 of the old ABA Model Code of Professional Responsibility.

The Rules of Professional Conduct adopted in the District of Columbia, effective January 1, 1991, contain a version of Rule 5.4 that, like the Kutak Commission proposal, reflects a more liberal approach to the subject of fee-sharing and association of nonlawyers in the legal practice. Rule 5.4(a), the general ban on fee-sharing, contains not only the traditional exceptions for payments to a deceased lawyer's estate and inclusion of nonlawyer employees in a retirement plan based on profit-sharing, but also, in Rule 5.4(a)(4) and 5.4(b), an exception permitting the sharing of fees in partnerships or other organizations in which nonlawyers have an interest, provided that certain safeguards are observed.[1]

We believe that the more liberal approach embodied in the D.C. Rules, together with a recognition of the vital role that nonlawyer experts from many disciplines play today in assisting lawyers in providing legal services to their clients, counsels against a broad reading of the Rule 5.4 proscription of fee-sharing with nonlawyers in this context. We also think that the present inquiry must be viewed in the light of several propositions that, it seems to us, are incontestable. First, nothing in the Rules of Professional Conduct would prohibit a direct arrangement between the law firm's client and the consulting firm for the payment of a "success fee" to the consulting firm. Second, it is commonplace for lawyers to retain and pay outside consultants directly and to pass on their charges as an expense in billing their clients; no-one suggests that this constitutes the "sharing" by the lawyer of a fee with the nonlawyer consultant. Third, Comment 8 to Rule 3.4, reflecting another liberalization of the traditional approach in the District of Columbia, permits payments of contingent fees to expert witnesses so long as they are not based on a percentage of the recovery.

With these considerations in mind, the Committee concludes that, so long as the client is fully informed and consents to [1] Rule 5.4 provides, in pertinent part:

(a) A lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer, except that:

(4) Sharing of fees is permitted in a partnership or other form of organization which meets the requirements of paragraph (b).

(b) A lawyer may practice law in a partnership or other form of organization in which a financial interest is held or managerial authority is exercised by an individual nonlawyer who performs professional services which assist the organization in providing legal services to clients, but only if: (1) the partnership or organization has as its sole purpose providing legal services to clients; (2) all persons having such managerial authority or holding a financial interest undertake to abide by these rules of professional conduct; (3) the lawyers who have a financial interest or managerial authority in the partnership or organization undertake to be responsible for the nonlawyer participants to the same extent as if nonlawyer participants were lawyers under Rule 5.1; (4) the foregoing conditions are set forth in writing.

the arrangement, a success fee of the kind contemplated by the inquiring firm does not constitute a sharing of legal fees with nonlawyers proscribed by Rule 5.4.[2] The client would be agreeing at the outset of a matter that a success fee will be paid to both the law firm and the consulting firm. This is different from a situation in which the client pays a fee to a lawyer, unaware of the fact that the lawyer is obligated to share that fee with a nonlawyer.

The fact that the client's payment of the consulting firm's portion of the success fee flows through the law firm does not transform the payment into a legal fee being "shared" by the consulting firm any more than does the more typical arrangement in which a client reimburses a law firm for consulting fees paid by the law firm to a consultant. In substance, the transaction that results in a payment to the nonlawyer consulting firm is between the client and the consulting firm; the fact that the money passes through the hands of the law firm is a formality of no consequence for purposes of Rule 5.4.

Because of our disposition of this question, we have no occasion to decide whether the inquiring law firm's contractual arrangement with the consulting firm could qualify as a "partnership or other form of organization" within the meaning of Rule 5.4(a)(4) and 5.4(b).

Defense Counsel's Duties When Client Insists On Testifying Falsely

• Rule 3.3(a) prohibits the use of false testimony at trial. Rule 3.3(b) excepts from this prohibition false testimony offered by a criminal defendant so long as defense counsel seeks first to dissuade the client from testifying falsely and, failing in this, seeks to withdraw when this can be done without harm to the client. Where a defendant has been incarcerated before trial and a continuance on the eve of trial would cause an extended delay of trial, the obligation to withdraw is removed. Instead, defense counsel may call the client to testify in narrative form, but may not assist the client in framing the client's false testimony. Nor may defense counsel argue a perjurious client's credibility in closing unless the client has given at least some truthful, relevant evidence.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 3.3 (Candor Toward the Tribunal)

The Inquiry

A lawyer requests an opinion concerning his ethical responsibilities as defense counsel in a criminal case in which his client wants to present false testimony in support of a mistaken identity defense.

At the defendant's initial court appearance, the lawyer had taken written notes of the client's physical appearance, including a clothing description. After the hearing, the defendant was detained on bond and remained incarcerated until trial. On the eve of trial, the defendant told his attorney that he wished to present a mistaken identity defense and told him the location of the clothing worn at the time of arrest, which the jail had mailed to an address provided by the defendant. Upon examining the clothing, the lawyer became convinced that the clothing was not the same that his client had worn at the client's first appearance.

After the lawyer confronted his client with his guess that the defendant had switched clothing with someone in the jail, the defendant confirmed the attorney's suspicion but reiterated his desire to present testimony in support of a mistaken identity defense. Counsel attempted to dissuade the client from pursuing this course of action and advised him that he could not assist the defendant in presenting false testimony to the court. He also advised him that the testimony could be easily contradicted by police officers. The defendant remained set on presenting the testimony. The lawyer sought informal guidance from this Committee, but the case resolved itself before such guidance was given. Because District of Columbia Rule 3.3 differs from similar rules in most other jurisdictions, the Committee has decided to respond to the inquiry by full opinion.

This inquiry considers three related issues: (1) whether the lawyer should have moved to withdraw on the eve of trial; (2) what steps, if any, the lawyer might have taken to assist his client to prepare to testify before the jury; and (3) what could the lawyer have said in closing argument.

Discussion

The obligations of an advocate faced with a threat of perjured testimony by a criminal defendant have been hotly debated for decades. In the District of Columbia, this issue has been resolved by the promulgation of Rule 3.3 of the Rules of Professional Conduct.[1]

The District of Columbia rule evolved out of earlier ABA ethics principles. In 1969, the ABA adopted Disciplinary Rule 7-102[2] in its Model Code of Professional Responsibility ("Model Code"), which as amended in 1974, provided that a criminal defense attorney faced with the prospect of his client testifying falsely had to (1) withdraw in advance of the perjured testimony, or (2) report to

[1] Rule 3.3 provides in relevant part:

(a) A lawyer shall not knowingly:

(2) counsel or assist a client to engage in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent, * * * ·

* * * *

(4) offer evidence that the lawyer knows to be false, except as provided in paragraph (b).

(b) When the witness who intends to give evidence that the lawyer knows to be false is the lawyer's client and is the accused in a criminal case, the lawyer shall first make a good-faith effort to dissuade the client from presenting the false evidence; if the lawyer is unable to dissuade the client, the lawyer shall seek leave of the tribunal to withdraw. If the lawyer is unable to dissuade the client or to withdraw without seriously harming the client, the lawyer may put the client on the stand to testify in a narrative fashion, but the lawyer shall not examine the client in such manner as to elicit testimony which the lawyer knows to be false, and shall not argue the probative value of the client's testimony in closing argument.

[2] DR 7-102(A) provided that "a lawyer shall not . . . (4) Knowingly use perjured testimony or false evidence. . . . (6) Participate in the creation or preservation of evidence when he knows or it is obvious that the evidence is false. . . . (7) Counsel or assist his client in conduct that the lawyer knows to be illegal or fraudulent. . . ."

After a 1974 amendment, DR 7-102(B) provided that "a lawyer who receives information clearly establishing that: (1) His client has, in the course of the representation, perpetrated a fraud upon a person or tribunal shall promptly call upon his client to rectify the same, and if his client refuses or is unable to do so, he shall reveal the fraud to the affected person or tribunal, except when the information is protected as a privileged communication. . . . "

[2] In cases in which a member of the consulting firm will testify as an expert witness, the inquiring law firm should bear in mind that while the D.C. Rules permit payment of fees to expert witnesses contingent on the outcome of the litigation, such fees may not be based on a percentage of the recovery in the case. Rule 3.4, Comment [8].

the court the falsity of the testimony if the client insisted on so testifying.[3] See generally ABA Informal Opinion 1314 (Mar. 25, 1975).

At the time DR 7-102 was adopted, the ABA had under consideration draft Standards Relating to the Administration of Criminal Justice. In 1971 an ABA Advisory Committee on the Prosecution and Defense Functions submitted a tentative draft which offered new direction to the defense attorney faced with his client's intent to commit perjury. That solution, commonly referred to as the "narrative approach," sought to give more protection to the attorney-client privilege, while limiting the damage to the tribunal caused by perjured testimony. The narrative approach was embodied in Defense Function Standard 7.7:

> (c) If withdrawal from the case is not feasible or is not permitted by the court, or if the situation arises during the trial and the defendant insists upon testifying falsely in his own behalf, * * * the lawyer should make a record of the fact that the defendant is taking the stand against the advice of counsel in some appropriate manner without revealing the fact to the court. The lawyer must confine his examination to identifying the witness as the defendant and permitting him to make his statement to the trier or the triers of the facts; the lawyer may not engage in direct examination of the defendant as a witness in the conventional manner and may not later argue the defendant's known false version of facts to the jury as worthy of belief and he may not recite or rely upon the false testimony in his closing argument.

The narrative approach subsequently enjoyed judicial acceptance, although critics charged that this approach compromised all the important policies at issue. "The lawyer [is] sufficiently involved to be morally culpable, yet the sudden switch of tactics in mid-examination [is] tantamount to blowing the whistle on the client."[4]

In drafting Rule 3.3 of the Model Rules of Professional Responsibility,[5] however, the ABA, agreeing with the critics of the narrative approach, see Comment [9] to Model Rule 3.3, returned to the approach of DR7-102, requiring a lawyer to reveal the client's perjury if necessary to rectify the situation. See id. Comment [10]. In so holding, the ABA also rejected the "full advocacy" approach, promoted primarily by Professor Monroe Freedman,[6] under which a lawyer, to protect client confidences, may knowingly present perjured testimony if the lawyer cannot dissuade his client from committing perjury. See id. Comment [9].

In the District of Columbia, however, the Jordan Committee and the Board of Governors of the Bar rejected the ABA approach, opting instead for a rule similar to that advocated by Professor Freedman:

> If the lawyer is unable to dissuade the client or to withdraw without seriously harming the client, the lawyer may, among other things, go forward with the examination of the client and closing argument in the ordinary manner.

Submission of the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia Bar to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals 138 (November 19, 1986). Comment [9] to the proposed draft made it clear, however, that withdrawal was the preferred course and that only truly exigent circumstances would warrant the presentation of perjured testimony. Id. at 141. The Bar opted for this position because it felt that the ABA approach put too much strain on the attorney-client relationship in the criminal setting and would be detrimental to the effective representation of criminal defendants in the long run. Id. at 142-143. It rejected the narrative approach because the use of narrative had long been seen to be tantamount to disclosure. Id. at 142.

The recommendation of the Bar on this point was not, however, accepted by the Court of Appeals. Instead, the Court rejected both the ABA approach and the Jordan Committee approach, and opted instead for the present language of Rule 3.3, which implements the "narrative approach." See Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct and Related Comments 33 (September 1, 1988);[7] D.C. Rule 3.3(b). In addition, the Court struck comments 12 through 15A, which had explained the approach of the Jordan Committee, and amended comment 8 to make it clear that false testimony would seldom be condoned and, equally important, that the manner of its presentation would be solely by the narrative approach:

> [8] Paragraph (b) allows the lawyer to ~~offer the false testimony of~~ permit a client who is the accused in a criminal case to present false testimony in very narrowly circumscribed circumstances and in a very limited manner.

Id., at 34 (underlining shows Court's additions).

In response to the Proposed Rule, the Litigation Section of the Bar endorsed the position taken by the Court, but the majority of the Courts/Lawyers Section urged a return to the approach recommended by the Board of Governors. See generally Robert E. Jordan, III, Analysis of Comments Submitted to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals in Response to the Court's Order of September 1, 1988, at 59-60 (May 3, 1989). The final version of Rule 3.3 was not changed in response to these comments.

Application of the Rule to the Present Inquiry

With the history of D.C. Rule 3.3 in mind, its application to the inquiry at hand is not in doubt.

First, Rule 3.3(b) comes into play when a lawyer "knows" that his client, the accused in a criminal case, intends to testify falsely. That requirement is met here, as the attorney's own investigation was confirmed by his client's admission.[8]

Second, once the Rule comes into play, the lawyer must make a good-faith effort to dissuade the client from testifying falsely. This was done here, but to no avail.

Third, if the lawyer is unable to dissuade the client from giving false testimony, he must seek leave of the tribunal to withdraw unless withdrawal would seriously harm the client. Comment [8] to D.C. Rule 3.3 makes clear that withdrawal is strongly preferred to the presentation of false testimony, and must be attempted absent serious prejudice to the client. Here, the case settled prior to the filing of a motion to withdraw. We are asked, however, to render an opinion on whether such a motion should have been filed.

The facts here are close, but are sufficient to discharge a lawyer from attempting to withdraw. At the time the perjury issue surfaced, it was only a few days before trial, the client was incarcerated, unable to make bail, and had been incarcerated for some time. It was clear that withdrawal would have caused a delay and during the delay the continued incarceration of the client. While pretrial incarceration in and of itself is a hardship, it is not clear that it amounts to the sort of legal prejudice whose existence would excuse the obligation to withdraw.[9] Nonetheless, Comment [8] to Rule 3.3 does appear to contemplate that counsel need not move to withdraw on the eve of trial.[10]

Fourth, where counsel remains in the case, Rule 3.3(b) permits counsel to call the client to testify but such testimony must be solely in a narrative fashion with respect to any testimony that is false. Counsel may not examine his client in such a way as to elicit testimony the lawyer knows to be false, nor may he argue the probative value of the client's false testimony in closing argument. However, Rule 3.3(b) does not prevent the lawyer from engaging in normal examination -- question and answer style -- on subjects where the lawyer believes the client will testify truthfully.[11]

The inquirer asks whether he could assist the client in preparing the narrative statement he would make to the jury containing the perjurious testimony. The inquirer fears that refusal to assist defendant's preparation of the statement would impair the attorney-client relationship. Rules 3.3(a)(2) and 1.2(e) clearly prohibit such assistance, however. Both rules forbid a lawyer from assisting a client to engage in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent. To aid the defendant in preparing a statement containing false testimony would be assisting him to do just that. Indeed, we reached the same result under the Code of Professional Conduct. Our Opinion No. 79 (Dec. 18, 1979), which was based on DR 7-102(4),(6), and (7), held:

> a lawyer may not prepare, or assist in preparing, testimony that he or she knows, or ought to know, is false or misleading. So long as this prohibition is not transgressed, a lawyer may properly suggest language as well as the substance of testimony, and may——indeed, should——do whatever is feasible to prepare his or witnesses for examination.

The prohibition on assisting a client to commit perjury does not, of course, prevent counsel from discussing the legal consequences of the client's proposed course of action. See Rule 3.3(a)(2). Moreover, the lawyer can ask the client a general question on direct examination which would elicit the perjurious narrative statement.

Finally, the inquirer asks about the scope of restrictions on his ability to argue his client's case to the jury. Rule 3.3(b) states that the attorney shall not argue the probative value of the client's testimony in closing argument. From the context of this provision, it is apparent that the attorney is prohibited only from arguing the false testimony to the jury.[12]

[8] Courts have required a substantial level of knowledge before the attorney may take steps to avoid or remedy the purportedly false testimony. See, e.g., United States ex rel. Wilcox v. Johnson, 555 F.2d 115, 122 (3rd Cir. 1977) (requiring a "firm factual basis"); Shockley v. State, 565 A.2d 1373, 1379 (Del. 1989) (requiring knowledge "beyond a reasonable doubt" that client will commit or has committed perjury).

[9] In this regard, Comment [8] states:

> Serious harm to the client sufficient to prevent the lawyer's withdrawal entails more than the usual inconveniences that necessarily result from withdrawal, such as delay in concluding the client's case or an increase in the costs of concluding the case. The term should be construed narrowly to preclude withdrawal only where the special circumstances of the case are such that the client would be significantly prejudiced, such as by express or implied divulgence of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6. If the confrontation with the client occurs before trial, the lawyer ordinarily can withdraw. * * * In those rare circumstances in which withdrawal without such serious harm to the client is impossible, the lawyer may go forward with the examination of the client and closing argument subject to the limitations of paragraph (b).
> (emphasis added).

[10] Comment [8] provides in this respect:

> Withdrawal before trial may not be possible, however, either because trial is imminent, or because the confrontation with the client does not take place until the trial itself, or because no other counsel is available.

It is unclear whether the Comment simply makes the factual statement that many courts will not let counsel withdraw on the eve of trial or whether delay on the eve of trial is a harm sufficient to excuse a request to withdraw. If there is such harm, it is perhaps caused by the need for counsel seeking to withdraw on the eve of trial to give justification for such a motion, since justification sufficient to obtain a continuance from judges not prone to grant motions causing last minute trial delays, may itself risk improper disclosure of confidential information. See Rules 1.6 and 3.3(d). Indeed, a last minute motion accompanied by silence might well be tantamount to a statement that the client wishes to put on perjured testimony.

[11] ABA Proposed Standard 4-7.7(c) permitted the lawyer to identify his client as the defendant and to ask appropriate questions when counsel believed that the defendant's answers would not be perjurious. From an advocacy standpoint, the attorney may wish to ask specific questions on safe subjects both at the outset and conclusion of the testimony, sandwiching the narrative testimony in between, so as to avoid calling undue attention to the change in style. See generally People v. Lowery, 366 N.E. 2d 155, 158 (Ill. App. 1977) (holding that the defendant was not prejudiced by giving narrative testimony where counsel asked specific preliminary and concluding questions.)

[12] Proposed ABA Standard 4-7.7(c) provided that a lawyer may not "argue the defendant's known false version of facts to the jury as worthy of belief, and may not recite or rely upon the false testimony in his or her closing argument."

Since, according to the inquirer, the false testimony would have constituted only a small portion of the defense, the attorney could argue the weight of the non-perjurious portion of the testimony to the jury. In addition, defense counsel can always argue that the government has not sustained its burden of proving the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

The inquirer also asks whether it would be appropriate to say in closing argument: "You heard him [the defendant] say the police arrested the wrong man" or "If you believe the defendant you should vote not guilty." Whether such statements are permissible depends upon the remainder of the defendant's testimony, information this Committee lacks. If the defendant's testimony would have consisted solely of false statements regarding his clothing, then for counsel to argue for the client's credibility would be tantamount to an impermissible argument for the truth of the perjured testimony. If, on the other hand, the defendant offers some truthful testimony in his or her defense, counsel could argue the credibility of that testimony in closing even though to urge the defendant's credibility when some testimony is false is to some extent to further the client's perjury.

Registered Limited Liability Partnership/Limited Liability Company

• Members of the District of Columbia Bar may practice in the District of Columbia as partners and associates of a law firm headquartered outside the District that is organized under the law of a state as a "registered limited liability partnership" or as a "limited liability company." In any such case the formal name under which the law firm's District of Columbia office practices must include the words "registered limited liability partnership" or "limited liability company," as the case may be, not merely the abbreviation "L.L.P." or "L.L.C.," as the case may be, as the last words of its name.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.4(b)(Communication)
• Rule 1.8(g)(Prospective Limitation of Liability)
• Rule 5.4(b)(Professional Independence of a Lawyer)
• Rule 7.1(a)(Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services)
• Rule 7.5(b)(Firm Names and Letterheads)

Inquiry

In this Opinion we deal with two similar inquiries.

One of the inquirers is a Texas-based law firm (the "Texas Firm"), which is currently organized as a general partnership under the Texas Uniform Partnership Act (the "Texas Act"). The Texas Firm has offices in the District of Columbia and other locations. The Texas Firm is contemplating registering under Texas law as a "registered limited liability partnership" pursuant to recently amended provisions of the Texas Act. Under the Texas Act as amended, the Texas Firm would continue to be a general partnership. For our purposes the significant consequence of the Texas Firm's registration as a "registered limited liability partnership" is that the Texas Act as amended purports to limit in certain material respects the personal liability of a partner for legal malpractice committed by another partner or employee of the Texas Firm. Specifically, amended section 15 of the Texas Act includes new paragraphs (2), (3) and (4), which read in their entirety as follows:

> "(2) A partner in a registered limited liability partnership is not individually liable for debts and obligations of the partnership arising from errors, omissions, negligence, incompetence, or malfeasance committed in the course of the partnership business by another partner or a representative of the partnership not working under the supervision or direction of the first partner at the time the errors, omissions, negligence, incompetence or malfeasance occurred, unless the first partner:
> (a) was directly involved in the specific activity in which the errors, omissions, negligence, incompetence or malfeasance were committed by the other partner or representative; or
> (b) had notice or knowledge of the errors, omissions, negligence, incompetence or malfeasance by the other partner or representative at the time of occurrence.
> (3) Paragraph (2) does not affect the joint and several liability of a partner for debts and obligations of the partnership arising from any cause other than those specified in Paragraph (2).
> (4) Paragraph (2) does not affect the liability of partnership assets for partnership debts and obligations."

In summary, the above-quoted provisions of the Texas Act purport to absolve a partner (the "First Partner") from personal liability for the legal malpractice of another partner or employee of the Texas Firm if the First Partner:

> (a) was not the supervisor of the person who committed the malpractice;
> (b) was not directly involved in the activity in which the malpractice was committed by the other person; and
> (c) was not aware of the malpractice at the time it was committed.

As indicated by Paragraph (4) of section 15 of the amended Texas Act quoted above, the Texas Firm as an entity remains fully liable, and all of the assets of the Texas Firm (capital, billed and unbilled receivables from clients, malpractice insurance proceeds, etc.) are available without limitation to satisfy any liability for legal malpractice.

The Texas Act as amended requires that a registered limited liability partnership's name must contain the words "registered limited liability partnership" or the abbreviation "L.L.P." as the last words or letters of its name. The Texas Act also requires that such partnerships "must carry, if reasonably available, at least $100,000 of liability insurance of a kind that is designed to cover" the type of liability described in the new paragraph (2) of section 15 quoted above.

The Texas Firm inquires whether, if it becomes a "registered limited liability partnership" under the Texas Act, it is permitted to practice through its District of Columbia office under its current firm name, followed by the words "registered limited liability partnership" or the abbreviation "L.L.P." as the last words or letters of its name.

The other inquirer is a Colorado-based law firm ("the Colorado Firm") that proposes to reorganize itself as a "limited liability company" under the law of Delaware. The Colorado Firm advises us that Delaware and several other states have recently enacted legislation permitting a law firm or other professional firm to practice as a "limited liability company." We are advised that under those newly enacted state laws a limited liability company is not a corporate entity but is in substance a partnership having personal liability limitation features that are substantially the same as the personal liability limitations in those states' existing professional corporation statutes. Typically these limited liability company statutes require that a law firm's name include the words "limited liability company" or the abbreviation "L.L.C." as the last words or letters of its name.

The Colorado Firm inquires whether, if it becomes a "limited liability company" under Delaware law, it is permitted to practice through its District of Columbia office under its current firm name, followed by the words "limited liability company" or the abbreviation "L.L.C." as the last words or letters of its name.

Our research discloses that there are certain differences throughout the country between and among the various "limited liability partnership" statutes and the various "limited liability company" statutes (enacted and proposed, including a proposed "limited liability partnership" law that was under consideration by the District of Columbia Council on the date this Opinion was approved). Therefore, in the interests of clarity and simplicity, we shall address the issues by reference to the Texas Firm and the Texas Act, with the understanding that the guidelines contained herein will have general applicability, and may be relied upon by other similarly-situated law firms organized pursuant to a state law outside the District of Columbia, thus largely obviating the need for further Opinions of this Committee on this subject.

Discussion

As we have often observed, this Committee's jurisdiction extends only to matters of legal ethics. We therefore express no opinion on important questions of general law that are necessarily implicated in this inquiry (e.g., whether courts in the District of Columbia or elsewhere would give extraterritorial effect to the liability limitation contained in the Texas Act, or what force and effect the Texas courts themselves might accord to such limitation of liability provisions).

We hold that as a matter of legal ethics it is permissible for the Texas Firm to practice through its District of Columbia office under its current firm name, provided that the firm name is followed by the words "registered limited liability partnership," not merely the abbreviation "L.L.P.," as the last words of its name.

Basically, the limitation of liability for legal malpractice contained in the amended Texas Act is in substance the same as the limitation of liability that has been common, and has become accepted by the legal profession and the public, in many professional corporation statutes throughout the country, including the District of Columbia. Indeed, the Texas Act's limitation of liability is slightly narrower than the limitation of liability contained in section 11 of the District of Columbia Professional Corporation Act (see D.C. Code § 29-611) and in many other professional corporation statutes throughout the country in that mere knowledge of the malpractice of another is not a basis for personal liability under those statutes, whereas under the Texas Act it is.

As the movement toward incorporation of law firms, and the consequent diminution in partners' (or, more precisely, stockholders') personal liability, developed in the 1970's, the guiding principles remained those originally established in Formal Opinion 303 (November 27, 1961) of the ABA Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility: the practice of law in corporate form was ethically permissible provided:

> "(1) The lawyer or lawyers rendering the legal services to the client must be personally responsible to the client.
> (2) Restrictions on liability as to other lawyers in the organization must be made apparent to the client."

Typically both of the foregoing legal ethics requirements have been codified by explicit provisions in the various state professional corporation statutes. In particular, those statutes (including the District of Columbia Act) virtually without exception do not absolve a lawyer from personal liability for his or her own malpractice, and require that the name of an incorporated law firm include the words "professional corporation" or "professional association" or the abbreviations "P.C." or "P.A." or some similar indication of a law firm's corporate status. Consistent therewith, DR 2-102(B) of the District of Columbia Code of Professional Responsibility, which was in effect through December 31, 1990, provided that the name of a professional corporation or professional association could contain the abbreviation "P.C." or "P.A."

There is no literally exact successor to the previous DR 2-102(B) in the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, but Rule 5.4(b) expressly reconfirms the now well-settled and accepted principle that "[a] lawyer may practice law in a partnership or other form of organization . . . ." The Terminology section of the Rules defines a law firm "partner" as a member of a partnership or a shareholder in a professional corporation.

Thus, it is now beyond doubt that D.C. Rules 1.4(b) and 7.1(a) are satisfied by use of the abbreviation "P.C." or "P.A." in the case of an incorporated law firm. Further, D.C. Rule 1.8(g) (which proscribes prospective limitation of malpractice liability) is not violated if the individual lawyer who committed the malpractice remains personally liable to the client in all events, and if the client is made aware of the limitation of personal liability of the other lawyers in the law firm who were not involved in the malpractice. The Texas Act satisfies those conditions.

In summary, we conclude that it is ethically permissible for the District of Columbia office of the Texas Firm to practice as partners and associates of a Texas "registered limited liability partnership" because the limitation of liability under the Texas Act in substance is not broader than the limitation of liability contained in section 11 of the District of Columbia Professional Corporation Act:

> "An individual shall be personally liable and accountable only for any negligent or wrongful acts or misconduct committed by him, or by any individual under his supervision and control . . . ." (D.C. Code § 29-611 (1981 ed.))

The Texas Firm has advised us that, as permitted by the Texas Act, it intends to use merely the "L.L.P." abbreviation in Texas, and inquires whether the use of the initials "L.L.P." is permissible in the District of Columbia, or whether the somewhat more descriptive "registered limited liability partnership" is ethically required.

We conclude that, at least for the time being, the abbreviation "L.L.P." is not sufficient, and that the Texas Firm's name must include the words "registered limited liability partnership" as part of its name so that clients will be more likely to be alerted to and comprehend the limited liability features of that form of organization. The concept of a "registered limited liability partnership" (as well as the concept of a "limited liability company") is unfamiliar to citizens of the District of Columbia, including many experienced lawyers in the District of Columbia. There may come a time in the not too distant future when, either by District of Columbia Council action, or otherwise, the implications of the abbreviation "L.L.P." will be as well understood as the implications of the historically more common abbreviations "P.C." or "P.A.," but until that time comes we are not disposed to approve the use in the District of Columbia of the abbreviation. (We note that the abbreviations "L.L.P." and "L.L.C." are especially infelicitous in that they closely resemble the abbreviation "L.L.B.," which for decades until the 1970's the public and clients understood to be the description of a person who possessed a law degree).

We are not unmindful of District of Columbia Rule 7.5(b), which provides that "a law firm with offices in more than one jurisdiction may use the same name in each jurisdiction, ..." Nevertheless, we hold that this technical Rule was not intended to apply where there is a risk that District of Columbia clients will be misled or harmed.

The foregoing holding applies to the identification of the Texas Firm on whatever written material emanates from its District of Columbia office and/or from its lawyers who are based in the District of Columbia office: for example, but not by way of limitation, stationery, envelopes, The Legal Register, Martindale-Hubbell, business cards, professional announcements, brochures, and media advertisements. The only exceptions to the foregoing are the unpaid line item listings in the white and yellow telephone books, where because of space limitations and format we believe the use of the initials "L.L.P." is tolerable.

Further, when faced with the inevitable inquiries from clients, the Texas Firm must provide either orally or in writing a plain-English summary of the limitation of liability features of the Texas Act. We believe that for this purpose it would suffice to describe the limited liability features of the Texas Act in substantially the form set forth above in this Opinion immediately following the quoted provisions of amended section 15 of the Texas Act.

As indicated above, the fundamental principle on which this Opinion rests is that the limitation of liability under the Texas Act in substance is not broader than the limitation of liability that currently appears in section 11 of the District of Columbia Professional Corporation Act. We believe that in some states it is not completely clear on the face of the particular state's limited liability partnership statute or the state's limited liability company statute whether the limitation of liability in those statutes in substance is not broader than the District of Columbia Professional Corporation Act limitation of liability. It is not this Committee's function to interpret the numerous state laws that might be relevant as various law firms analyze and attempt to comply with this Opinion. We suggest that, if a relevant state statute is not clear on its face, a law firm would be well advised to seek an opinion from local counsel on the issue whether the limitation of liability in the jurisdiction is in substance not broader than the District of Columbia limitation of liability, and if necessary in appropriate cases clarify and confirm in the organic documents (certificate of partnership, statement of organization, etc.) precisely the circumstances under which the personal liability of individual members of the law firm is limited.

Divulging Client Confidences And Secrets In A Bankruptcy Proceeding In Order To Collect Fees Is Permitted In Limited Circumstances

- An attorney may divulge client confidences and secrets in order to collect fees but only where such disclosure is made in the course of a legal proceeding, is as narrow as possible and there is a good-faith expectation of more than a de minimis recovery.

Applicable Rule

- Rule 1.6 (d)(5) (Divulging Client Confidences And Secrets)

Inquiry

The inquirer presents the following situation. His firm was retained by a California resident for whom it provided services and by whom it is owed fees. Upon threat of a collection action, the client began to make monthly payments. The client subsequently filed a petition for bankruptcy seeking to discharge, among other debts, the debt to the inquiring law firm. This petition has pre-empted any effort by the firm to collect the fees which it is owed. The bankruptcy is being treated as a "no asset" proceeding. The inquiring firm has been instructed not to file a proof of claim with the trustee and it is quite unlikely, if the proceeding continues in this form, that the firm will recover any of its fee which is still outstanding.

As a result of its representation of the client, the firm has reason to believe that the client's representations to the bankruptcy court regarding the nature of her assets and liabilities may not be accurate or complete. This information is based on information supplied during the course of the representation although some of the information is also a matter of public record. The inquirer asks whether, as part of an effort to collect its fees, it is permissible to disclose through proceedings available in the bankruptcy court, the information in the firm's possession regarding the client's assets.

Discussion

Rule 1.6(d)(5) provides that:

> A lawyer may use or reveal client confidences or secrets . . . to the minimum extent necessary in an action instituted by the lawyer to establish or collect the lawyer's fee.

This stands as a limited but well-recognized exception to the general rule regarding the confidentiality of client information. It is based on "the principle that the beneficiary of a fiduciary relationship may not exploit it to the detriment of the fiduciary." Rule 1.6, Comment [24].[1] The exception has been applied to bankruptcy proceedings. For example, the Maryland Bar has construed the corresponding code section to permit an attorney to pursue an Application for Allowance of Fees and Disbursements to be paid by the bankruptcy estate under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code which could involve client confidences and secrets. Committee On Ethics of the Maryland State Bar Association Opinion 83-19 (9/27/82). The Los Angeles County Bar Association has determined that a lawyer who had represented a client in a bankruptcy case and was discharged by the client may file a claim for fees in the bankruptcy court as well as proceedings to have his debt declared non-dischargeable. Ethics Committee of the Los Angeles County Bar Association Opinion 452 (11/21/88).

[1] See also Cannon v. U.S. Acoustics Corp., 532 F.2d 1118, 1120 (7th Cir. 1976)(permits fee collection action to proceed based on this exception to attorney-client privilege); Nakasian v. Incontrade, Inc., 409 F. Supp. 1220, 1224 (S.D.N.Y. 1976)(attachment of client funds facilitated by use of confidential information permissible); ABA Center for Prof. Resp., Anno. Model Rules of Prof. Conduct (1991) at 88 ("A lawyer entitled to a fee is permitted. . .to prove the services rendered in an action to collect it") and at 96 (citing Cannon v. U.S. Acoustics Corp).

The comments to Rule 1.6 emphasize that any disclosure should be as narrow as possible and that the lawyer should seek the use of John Doe pleadings, in camera proceedings, and/or protective orders where possible to avoid the unnecessary disclosure of information. Id. See also "Annotated Model Rules of Professional Conduct" at 88 (". . . the lawyer must make every effort practicable to avoid unnecessary disclosure of information relating to a representation, to limit disclosure to those having the need to know it, and to obtain protective orders or make other arrangements minimizing the risk of disclosure.") Moreover, disclosure is not permitted in non-fee proceedings. See Florida Bar v. Ball, 406 So. 2d 459 (Fla. 1981)(lawyer suspended for disclosing to adoption agency that clients had not paid the lawyer's fee and thus might be a financial risk); Matter of Nelson, 327 N.W. 2d 576, 578-79 (Minn. 1982)(ethical violation where attorney, following fee dispute, reported client's alleged tax violations to state authorities).

The course of action proposed by the inquirer regarding the collection of his fees[2] is permitted under the governing Rule assuming several conditions are met.[3] First, so long as the proposed disclosure is made by the lawyer in a proceeding initiated by the attorney or otherwise in the context of an ongoing legal proceeding, it is properly considered to be part of an "action instituted by the lawyer." In the absence of any specific authority to the contrary, it is the view of the Committee that this language limits only disclosures made out of the context of formal proceedings.[4] Second, the proposed disclosure to the bankruptcy court must be as narrow as possible, providing only the minimal information necessary to establish or collect a fee. In addition, if possible, the inquirer should use protective orders, in camera proceedings, John Doe pleadings, and/or other appropriate mechanisms to protect the identity and interests of the client.

Finally, the inquirer must have a good faith expectation of recovering more than a de minimis amount of the outstanding fee. It must be emphasized that the exception in the Rule only goes to an attempt to "establish or collect" a fee. It does not permit the disclosure of client confidences or secrets for any other reason. This includes an effort to bring a potential fraud to the attention of the court, salutary as the underlying policy concern may be. Cf. Matter of Nelson, supra. As a result, if, for whatever reason, the lawyer does not have a reasonable expectation of more than a de minimis recovery, the disclosure would violate the rule.

In sum, the well-established but narrow exception to the general rule against revealing client confidences and secrets based in Rule 1.6(d)(5) permits the disclosure of such information in connection with actions to establish or collect fees in bankruptcy proceedings in limited circumstances.

Conflict of Interests: Previous Representation of Witness in Unrelated Matter

• An attorney may represent a defendant in a criminal case, even though another attorney in his or her office formerly represented an individual who is now a witness in that case if (1) the agency's representation of the person who is the witness was in an unrelated case; (2) the attorney involved in the current case does not actually possess any confidences or secrets of the former client; and (3) the agency takes adequate steps to screen that attorney from any such confidences and secrets.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
• Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
• Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
• Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification)

Inquiry

The Public Defender Service (PDS) has requested an opinion about the responsibilities of its attorneys in the following situation: PDS Attorney #1 represented Client #1, who was a defendant in a Burglary case. This case is now closed. PDS Attorney #2 is appointed to represent Client #2 in a separate Assault case. Attorney #2 discovers that Client #1 is the complainant or an essential government witness. Attorney #2 learned about this possible conflict in a way other than through discussions with Attorney #1 (e.g., by checking the court file or from discussions with the U.S. Attorney or with witnesses).

PDS has represented that if Attorney #2 is allowed to continue to represent Client #2, it will screen Attorney #2 from any information about Client #1 by preventing him or her from having access to Client #1's files and from discussing the case with Attorney #1.

Discussion

The Public Defender Service's inquiry raises the issues of: (1) whether there is a conflict of interest between the representation of the former client and the new client; and (2) the extent to which an attorney representing a new client will be subject to imputed disqualification because another attorney in the same office represented the former client.

Since the inquiry presumes the involvement of two attorneys, the analysis of the issues raised must begin with an understanding of the requirements of Rule 1.10. In general, this Rule prohibits one attorney in a "firm" from undertaking any matter for which any other member of the firm would be disqualified. The Commentary to Rule 1.10 states that the term "firm" encompasses legal services agencies. See Comment 1.[1] Assuming

[2] Neither the inquiry nor this opinion directly addresses the nature of client confidences and secrets that may be disclosed in order to establish a fee.

[3] This Committee does not decide factual questions; we therefore express no opinion regarding the underlying facts here.

[4] The earlier version of Rule 1.6(d)(5), which is found in DR 4-101(C)(4), permitted a lawyer to reveal "[c]onfidences or secrets necessary to establish or collect his fee or to defend himself or his employees or associates against an accusation of wrongful conduct." The history of Rule 1.6 does not explain this change in language.

[1] Although the Commentary also notes that "whether the lawyers should be treated as associ-that the attorneys at PDS are the equivalent of "lawyers [who] are associated in a firm," Rule 1.10(a) specifies that none of the agency's attorneys "shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rules 1.7, 1.8(b), 1.9, or 2.3."

Because the issue in this case is whether there is a conflict of interest involving a former client, Rule 1.9 applies. This Rule states:

> A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interest are materially adverse to the interest of the former client unless the former client consents after consultation.

Thus, Attorney #2 cannot represent Client #2 if his or her case is the "same" or "substantially related" to the case in which Attorney #1 represented Client #1. Under the facts set forth by PDS here, however, the representation of Client #1 was in Client #1's own case -- not as a participant in case #2. These two representations are clearly not in the "same matter."[2]

The more difficult question is whether the two representations are in "substantially related" matters. The Rules do not define "substantially related," other than to note that Rule 1.9 was "intended to incorporate federal case law" that defines the term. Rule 1.9, Comment 2. For guidance, the commentary points to T.C. Theatre Corp. v. Warner Brothers Pictures, Inc., 113 F. Supp. 265 (S.D.N.Y. 1953), aff'd, 216 F.2d 920 (2d Cir. 1954), and "its progeny."

The difficulty with this direction, however, is that the definition provided by this case law is still uncertain.

In Brown v. District of Columbia Board of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37 (D.C. 1984), the Court of Appeals indicated that the methodology to be used "for determining whether two matters are substantially related" begins with an analysis of the facts and legal issues to determine, in the first instance, whether the factual contexts of the two matters overlap. If they do, further analysis is required. 486 A.2d at 49; see also Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. Gulf Oil Corp., 588 F.2d 221, 225 (7th Cir. 1978).

In the facts as set forth by PDS, the subject matter of the two representations are not the same or substantially related. Thus, under Rule 1.9, Attorney #2 should be able to continue to represent Client #2.

Even if Rule 1.9 is satisfied, however, Rule 1.6 may prohibit the subsequent representation of Client #2 if Attorney #2's representation would violate any of Client #1's confidences or secrets. Rule 1.6 prohibits a lawyer from knowingly "us[ing] a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client to the disadvantage of the client . . . [or] for the advantage of the lawyer or of [another]."

Under the facts here, in all likelihood, Attorney #1 possesses confidences or secrets of Client #1 that might be helpful to Client #2, but Attorney #2 does not personally possess such information. Unlike the proscriptions of Rule 1.9, Rule 1.10 does not impute a disqualification to Attorney #2 based on Rule 1.6.

Comment 11 to Rule 1.10 explains that preserving confidentiality turns on the issue of whether there has been "an access to information" about a specific client. This issue, in turn, depends on the "fact[s] in particular circumstances." The commentary notes that some lawyers have general access to the files of all clients in the firm, and some do not. It concludes that "in the absence of information to the contrary, it should be inferred that such a lawyer in fact is privy to information about the clients actually served and not those of other clients." See also Brown, 486 A.2d at 42, n. 5.

In this case, Attorney #2 has not received any confidential information from Attorney #1 or Client #1's confidential files. The Public Defender Service has represented that when one of its attorneys learns that a past client may be a witness against a current client, an attorney supervisor will take custody of the past client's files and secure them in a locked file cabinet to which Attorney #2 does not have access. Both Attorneys #1 and #2 are instructed that they may not discuss their cases or clients with each other or in each other's presence. These efforts are consistent with the proscriptions of ABA Formal Opinion 342 (1975) and Brown, 486 A.2d at 42. Thus, Rule 1.6 will not serve to disqualify Attorney #2 since he or she has not actually gained confidential information nor will he or she be exposed to it.

Consistent with Rule 1.4, Client #2 should be informed about the fact that PDS represented the witness against him at an earlier point and the limitations on Attorney #2's ability to use any of Client #1's confidences or secrets that the office might have in its possession.[3]

Opinion No. 238

Written Fee Agreements

- When a written fee agreement is required, the agreement must adequately inform the client of the basis or rate of the fee. In addition, fixed fee agreements must cover all reasonably foreseeable services necessary to provide competent representation.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.1 (Competent Representation)
- Rule 1.4(a) (Communication Between Attorney and Client)
- Rule 1.5(b) (Written Fee Agreement Requirement for New Clients)

Inquiry

The inquiring attorney handles cases on what he describes as a "flat fee" basis for enumerated services. The retainer agreement at issue, which involves an immigration representation, states that the client is "entitled" to one "office visit, telephone conference, or other consultation with staff members." It further states that "additional office visits and/or telephone consultations not speated with each other can depend on the particular rule that is involved, and on the specific facts of the situation" (see Comment 3), in the circumstances presented in this case, the result will be the same whether or not the Public Defender Service is treated as a "firm".

[2] Clearly, an attorney could not represent Client #2 if he or she represented #1 in his capacity as a witness in the Assault case. See Opinion No. 232.

[3] There may be some who may detect "an appearance of impropriety" in the public defender service's attempt to impeach a former client. This standard is no longer found in the Rules of Professional Conduct. Rather, the Rules specify what conduct is allowed and what is not. Moreover, even if this standard still existed, it is "too slender a reed" to require disqualification. "United States v. Judge, 625 F. Supp. 901, 903 (D. Hawaii 1986).

cifically mentioned will be charged at specified hourly rates. A dispute has arisen between the inquirer and a client regarding the appropriate charges for additional consultations.

While the retainer agreement states that only one consultation is included in the "flat fee," the inquirer's letter to the Committee states that he will not make an additional charge if "we contact the client to perform those services [specified in the retainer agreement] or if the client contacts us when we would need that contact in an effort to perform the specific services for which we are retained." A third version of the operative rule appears in a letter from the inquirer to a second attorney who became involved in the fee dispute. This letter states that there is no charge when a client calls to get updated status information from a paralegal, nor is there a charge for a consultation when "milestones" in a case are reached.

Discussion

Fixed fee agreements serve the important purpose of making legal services available to persons who might otherwise not be able to afford an attorney. However, such agreements cannot be used to circumvent basic principles governing the relationships between attorneys and clients. This inquiry presents two issues, both of first impression. The first addresses the requirement, new in the Rules of Professional Conduct, that fee agreements must be reduced to writing. The second is whether, when a fixed fee agreement is entered into, there are certain services which must be covered by the fixed fee and not subject to additional charges.

1. When a Written Fee Agreement is Required, the Agreement Must Inform the Client of the Basis or Rate of the Fee

For clients "not regularly represented" by the lawyer, Rule 1.5(b) requires the lawyer to communicate to them, in writing the "basis or rate of the fee." The comments to Rule 1.5(b) explain that the requirement has been introduced in order to establish "an understanding as to the fee," Comment [1] and to reduce "the possibility of misunderstanding." Comment [2]. The Rule recognizes that "[i]t is not necessary to recite all the factors that underlie the basis of the fee, but only those that are directly involved in its computation." Comment [1]. The comments specifically recognize that fixed fee schedules may meet the requirement of the Rule, so long as the schedule "adequately informs the client of the charges to be imposed." Comment [3].

The facts presented by this inquiry amply demonstrate the importance of this Rule. In this case, it is simply not possible to discern how charges are assessed for consultations beyond the one consultation enumerated in the fee agreement. Indeed, it appears that the assessment of such fees is purely at the attorney's discretion. This has led to a breakdown of the attorney-client relationship, the introduction of a second attorney into the dispute, and a letter of inquiry to this Committee. While there is a written retainer agreement, it is more than apparent that such writing does not adequately explain the "basis or rate" of the fee. It is the Committee's view that the fee agreement at issue does not comport with the requirements of Rule 1.5.

2. Fixed Fee Agreements Must Cover, as Part of the Fixed Fee, Those Reasonably Foreseeable Services That are Necessary to Provide Competent Representation

The second question involves the extent to which services covered by a fixed fee may be limited. As with the agreement that is the subject of this inquiry, it is apparently common for fixed fee agreements to include certain services in the fixed fee and then to provide for further services at an additional hourly rate. It is the view of the Committee that the fixed fee must include those reasonably foreseeable services that are necessary to provide competent representation. See Rule 1.1(a) ("A lawyer shall provide competent representation to a client. Competent representation requires the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation.")

A fixed fee agreement is attractive precisely because it offers a predictable and affordable fee, typically for a routine legal matter. As Comment [3] to Rule 1.5 states, "[s]uch services as routine real estate transactions, uncontested divorces, or preparation of simple wills, for example, may be suitable for description in . . . a fixed fee schedule." If necessary services are billed at hourly rates in addition to the fixed fee, clients may not be able to afford such services or may choose to forego necessary legal services in order to achieve savings. Moreover, lawyers may not provide additional necessary services based on a concern that their clients may not be able to pay for them.

Comment [5] to Rule 1.5 explains that it is improper to enter into a fee agreement that might lead to the curtailment of necessary legal services. It states, in pertinent part:

> An agreement may not be made whose terms might induce the lawyer improperly to curtail services for the client or perform them in a way contrary to the client's interest. For example, a lawyer should not enter into an agreement whereby services are to be provided only up to a stated amount when it is foreseeable that more extensive services probably will be required, unless the situation is adequately explained to the client. Otherwise, the client might have to bargain for further assistance in the midst of a proceeding or transaction. However, it is proper to define the extent of services in light of the client's ability to pay.

A fixed fee agreement that does not provide for foreseeably necessary services runs afoul of this principle.

The Committee does not intend to suggest by this opinion that a lawyer is required to consult with a client at the client's whim or to provide services that are not reasonably necessary to the competent provision of the agreed-upon representation. See Rule 1.2(c) regarding permissible limitations on the scope of representation. However, the lawyer does have the responsibility, in drafting a fixed fee agreement, to anticipate those services that will be reasonably necessary to competently carry out the agreed-upon representation. Complications and unforeseeable events will occur in certain representations, and a lawyer is not precluded from making additional charges in such circumstances. The test is whether such events are reasonably foreseeable at the outset of the representation. If so, attendant legal services must be covered by the fixed fee.

We recognize that this opinion may result in increases in fixed fees charged for the provision of certain legal services. However, this result is preferable to the enticement of clients with an unreasonably low fee schedule and leaving them in mid-representation with unanticipated -- and possibly unaffordable -- legal fees.

Regarding the pending inquiry, the Committee is not a finder of facts and is not in a position to render an opinion as to whether limiting a client to a single consultation during the course of the particular representation is reasonable. We do note that the requirement in Rule

1.4(a) that "[a] lawyer shall keep a client reasonably informed about the status of a matter and promptly comply with reasonable requests for information," suggests that such a limitation may not be reasonable. Indeed, the lawyer's obligation in this regard is underscored in Comment [2] to Rule 1.4 which states that, "[a] client is entitled to whatever information the client wishes about all aspects of the subject matters of the representation unless the client expressly consents not to have certain information passed on." Moreover, "the lawyer must initiate and maintain the consultative and decision-making process if the client does not do so and must ensure that the ongoing process is thorough and complete." Id.

Of course, a lawyer is not limited to a single model for the required consultation and may, in appropriate circumstances, rely on paralegal or other staff members to communicate with the client rather than devote more costly attorney time. This may be particularly true in connection with those routine legal matters that are likely to be the subject of fixed fee agreements. See comment [4] to Rule 1.4 ("[w]here many routine matters are involved, a system of limited or occasional reporting may be arranged with the client.")

In sum, a written fee agreement, when required, must adequately inform the client of the basis or rate of the fee to be charged. In addition, fixed fee agreements must include, as part of the fixed fee, those reasonably foreseeable services that are necessary to provide competent representation.

Attorney-Client Relationship Between a Lawyer and Her Firm; Reporting of Professional Misconduct

• In preparing memoranda concerning her law firm's claim under a fee agreement with a client, at the request of the firm, a lawyer stands in an attorney-client relationship with the firm for purposes of the firm's fee claim. She therefore is prohibited by Rule 1.9 from subsequently representing the client against the firm in connection with that claim. She also may be precluded by Rule 1.6 from acting as a witness or otherwise assisting the client in the matter, if doing so would require her to disclose confidences or secrets gained in the course of her representation of the firm.

A lawyer is not required by Rule 8.3 to report to disciplinary authorities or to a client mere suspicions that another lawyer has engaged in unethical conduct.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
• Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
• Rule 8.3(a) (Reporting Professional Misconduct)

Inquiry

The inquirer formerly worked as an associate at a D.C. law firm. The matter that occasioned her inquiry involves a possible claim for attorneys fees by her former law firm under a fee agreement with a client originally brought by her to the firm. First, she asks whether either her work as an associate at the firm on the matter governed by the fee agreement, or her subsequent preparation of memoranda to be used by the firm in support of its claim against the client under that agreement, disqualifies her from appearing as a witness for the client or otherwise assisting him in the event he becomes involved in a dispute on the fee with her former firm. She also wishes advice as to her obligation under Rule 8.3(a) to report to bar disciplinary authorities certain activity by lawyers in her former firm.

1. Attorney-Client Relationship Between a Lawyer and her Firm - Conflict of Interest in Subsequent Representation

It is the Committee's view that, in preparing the memoranda on the law firm's claim under the fee agreement, at its request, the attorney was representing the law firm with respect to this matter, and stood in an attorney-client relationship with the firm. Rule 1.9 of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct provides that a lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same matter where that person's interests are adverse to those of the former client unless the former client consents after consultation. Accordingly, in these circumstances, the inquirer is prohibited from representing the client with respect to the firm's fee claim without the firm's consent.

The prohibition of Rule 1.9 is grounded in the lawyer's obligation under Rule 1.6 to protect confidences and secrets acquired in the attorney-client relationship, and this obligation continues after termination of the lawyer's employment. The lawyer's obligation to her former law firm under Rule 1.6 may thus also preclude her acting as a witness for or otherwise assisting the client in connection with the fee claim, if such assistance would entail disclosure of any confidences or secrets acquired in the course of performing work on the fee claim for the firm.

The inquirer makes no reference to any employment agreement she may have had with the firm, and the Committee expresses no views as to whether she may have some obligations in that context as well.

2. Reporting of Professional Misconduct

The lawyer also wishes to know whether she has an affirmative duty to report, to bar counsel or to the client, her belief that her former firm may have destroyed documents that would support the client's defense to a fee action brought by the firm. She does not specify what documents these might be, or when or how such destruction may have taken place; indeed, she specifically states that she is "not certain" that the destruction did in fact occur. She also asks whether she has a duty to report to bar counsel or to the client that one of the partners in her former firm may have used a recording device on his office telephone to record conversations with clients without their knowledge.

Rule 8.3(a) requires a lawyer to report to bar counsel if he or she has "knowledge that another lawyer has committed a violation of the rules of professional conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness, or fitness as a lawyer in other respects . . . ." A failure to report where there is a duty to do so may itself be grounds for discipline. While Rule 8.3(a) has not been the subject of interpretation in this jurisdiction, it has been interpreted in other jurisdictions to require reporting only where there is "specific knowledge" of a "clear violation" of the ethics rules; "mere suspicions" of misconduct or unethical behavior need not be reported. See e.g., New York City Ethics Opinion 1990-3; Williamson v. Council of North Carolina Bar, 46 N.C. App. 824, 266 S.E. 2d 391 (1980). Moreover, Rule 8.3(a) has been interpreted not to require reporting of all misconduct, but only that which raises "a substantial question" as to the other lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness.

Based on inquirer's description of the conduct at issue, the Committee cannot conclude that there is any duty on the lawyer's part under Rule 8.3(a) to report to bar counsel. The lawyer does not indicate specific knowledge of any facts that would make either the destruction of documents or the undisclosed tape recording a violation of any particular ethical rule. Indeed, by her own account she is not even certain that either activity in fact occurred. Moreover, even assuming that some documents were destroyed and some conversations surreptitiously tape recorded in violation of the ethics rules, we are not in a position, based on the limited facts before us, to say whether any resulting violation of the rules would present a "substantial question" about another lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness, or fitness. Finally, neither Rule 8.3(a) nor any other ethical rule would put the attorney under an obligation to report to the client.

Ethical Obligations of D.C. Corporation Counsel Attorneys Representing Custodial Parents in Social Security Act Title IV-D Cases

• Under Title IV of the Social Security Act of 1975, the District of Columbia Corporation Counsel provides legal assistance for the Child Support Enforcement Program mandated by Congress. Pursuant to this statute, D.C. Corporation Counsel represents both individual petitioners and the Government in actions against non-supporting spouses. (The Government becomes involved when it has been assigned a custodial parent's right to receive child support as a condition of the custodial parent's receiving benefits under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program.)

In response to an inquiry by D.C. Corporation Counsel, this opinion examines the various potential ethical conflicts that can arise during such representations. In particular, D.C. Corporation Counsel should be concerned with several possible ethical difficulties. First, Corporation Counsel should make sure each petitioner knows both when he or she is, or is not, a client and what the consequences of not being a client are. Second, when Corporation Counsel discovers that it is representing two petitioners against the same respondent, it is advisable under Rule 1.7 to have two different lawyers represent the two petitioners and to take measures to keep the two attorneys from sharing information. Third, when shifts in child custody occur, care must be taken to analyze who was the client, who is now the client, and whether waivers must be obtained under Rule 1.9. In general, given the complexities involved in this form of representation, it is desirable for Corporation Counsel to assign someone to be "Ethics Advisor" to advise the IV-D lawyers of the various ethical dilemmas that may arise in representing IV-D petitioners and to attempt to minimize potential conflicts.

Inquiry

Under Title IV-D of the Social Security Act of 1975, the states, including the District of Columbia, are required to provide child support enforcement services to complement their Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program.[1] Specifically, the states are required to maintain a child support program that provides four basic services: (1) locating absent parents, (2) establishing paternity, (3) obtaining child support orders, and (4) enforcing support obligations owed by absent parents to their children and (if applicable) former spouse. These services are provided free of charge to AFDC recipients, who must assign their child support rights to the welfare agency and must agree to cooperate with the agency.[2] For a nominal fee, these services must also be made available to custodial parents who are not eligible for AFDC.[3] In the District, the fee is $5.00.[4]

The current inquiry comes from the Office of the Corporation Counsel, Civil Division, Child Support Section, which provides the legal assistance required for the child support enforcement program.[5] The concern of the inquirer relates to the ethical obligations owed by its attorneys. Specifically, who is the client of a IV-D attorney, what obligations are owed to non-clients, and how can conflicts of interest be avoided? Answers to these questions require an understanding of the interactions among IV-D attorneys, the IV-D agency, and custodial parents (hereinafter referred to as "petitioners").

In general, three types of IV-D cases may arise.[6] In the first case, a custodial parent is an AFDC recipient and has assigned the right to receive child support to the state. In this category, the first $50.00 received goes to the petitioner and the balance -- up to the amount awarded as AFDC aid -- goes to reimburse the government. Any moneys received beyond go to the petitioner and may remove her from eligibility for AFDC aid. The second category includes custodial parents who are former AFDC recipients, now no longer need that aid, but for whom arrears are still owed to the state. Arrears accrue when support payments are insufficient to recompense the state for the AFDC payments laid out to the petitioner. The law provides that any moneys received go first to the petitioner for present support; the remainder, if any,

[1] 42 U.S.C. § 651 et seq. (1988).

[2] The assignment is required by statute, 42 U.S.C. § 602(a)(26)(A). The statute also requires the custodial parent, after the assignment of support claims, to cooperate with the IV-D office in establishing and enforcing the claims. 42 U.S.C. § 602(a)(26)(B). Aid recipients are required "to cooperate with the State (i) in establishing the paternity of a child born out of wedlock with respect to whom aid is claimed, and (ii) in obtaining support payments for such applicant and for a child with respect to whom such aid is claimed, or in obtaining any other payments or property due such applicant or such child, unless (in either case) such applicant or recipient is found to have good cause for refusing to cooperate as determined by the State agency ...." Id.

[3] 42 U.S.C. § 654(6) provides that the "child support or paternity determination services established . . .shall be made available to any individual not otherwise eligible for such services."

goes to repay the state.[7] The third category includes custodial parents who are not AFDC recipients and either have never received such aid or have received aid but for whom no child support arrears are owed.

A IV-D attorney may be assigned to handle any of these types of cases. Each situation may raise difficult questions as to the duties and responsibilities of a IV-D attorney vis a vis his employer (the government), the petitioner, and the noncustodial parent. The types of complexities that may arise include, inter alia, (1) the possibility of one IV-D attorney representing two petitioners against the same noncustodial parent; (2) a IV-D attorney representing a former obligor against a former aid recipient after custody has switched; and (3) a IV-D attorney representing a current AFDC recipient who previously utilized the agency's services as a non-AFDC recipient and vice-versa.

Addressing the various potential ethical issues that may arise requires an answer to the question: "Who is the client?" Generally, the Rules of Professional Conduct do not define who is the client and rely on outside substantive law to determine whether a client-lawyer relationship exists.[8] The one exception is Rule 1.6(i) which provides that the "client of the government lawyer is the agency that employs the lawyer unless expressly provided to the contrary by appropriate law, regulation, or order." Comment 36, however, recognizes that there may be situations in which government lawyers are assigned to provide counsel to individuals in such a way as to make it clear that an obligation of confidentiality runs directly to the individual.

Recognizing the various categories that can arise with IV-D actions, the Office of Corporation Counsel has attempted to answer "who is the client" in a policy statement entitled "Policy Statement No. 1":

> The client is the petitioner in all non-AFDC cases. The client is the Department of Human Services in all AFDC cases. If a non-AFDC client becomes a recipient of public assistance, the client becomes the Department of Human Services; if an AFDC recipient is removed from public assistance, the Department of Human Services remains the client until all arrears are paid to the Department; after full payment, the custodian of the minor child/ren becomes the client.[9]

For purposes of this opinion, we accept the Corporation Counsel's definition.[10]

Given this definition, we must now address the various potential ethical issues that can arise. Since it is neither possible nor practical to anticipate and answer all conceivable ethical problems that can occur, this opinion will try to address the most common and most difficult.

Discussion

Before we examine the various fact patterns that may develop, we note that it is our understanding that at present the Government maintains the Policy Statement simply as an internal document that is not discussed with or distributed to petitioners. In particular, the Government does not make clear to the petitioner whom it regards as the client. To the extent this is still the practice, we believe that it is a mistake; in particular, it does not assure compliance wit the Rules of Professional Conduct. As the following discussion will indicate, the IV-D attorney must make sure that, in all situations, the petitioner knows whether or not she [or he] is being considered the client.[11]

A. Confidential Information

(1) AFDC Recipient

Under the Policy Statement, the client in this situation is the Department of Human Services. The problem is that the petitioner may not know this. Thus, it is possible that the petitioner, thinking that the IV-D Attorney is her attorney, may reveal confidences concerning other sources of income. She may believe that the confidence is protected by the attorney-client privilege. In reality, however, she is simply an unrepresented person.

What can and should a IV-D lawyer do to avoid misleading a petitioner? The attorney must make it clear that he or she represents the government and not the petitioner. Rule 4.3(a) requires that an attorney not give advice to an unrepresented person if that person's interests might conflict with the interests of the attorney's clients.[12] Rule 4.3(b) requires that an attorney not state or imply to an unrepresented person that the attorney is disinterested even when the unrepresented person has no interest in conflict with the attorney's client.[13] Furthermore, it requires that when a lawyer "knows or reasonably should know that the unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to correct the misunderstanding." Hence, even where an aid recipient or former recipient has no actual conflict with the AFDC agency, a IV-D attorney is still obliged to inform the petitioner that the attorney represents only the interests of the state, not the custodial parent.

Giving the Policy Statement to the petitioner is therefore essential. But it is only a minimum. The IV-D attorney must make sure the petitioner understands the potential consequences of not being the client. Failure to fully apprise the petitioner may require that the communication be treated as if a client-lawyer relationship existed.[14]

(2) Non-AFDC Petitioner

[7] 42 U.S.C. § 657(c); 45 C.F.R. § 302.51; 50 Fed. Reg. 19642 (1985).

[8] See Rule 1.6, comment [7].

[9] Hereinafter "Policy Statement." This Policy Statement is an internal document given to the attorneys but not to the petitioners. As we noted below, we believe the statement should be made available to all petitioners.

[10] We note that it is consistent with the sparse case law on point. See, e.g., Gibson v. Johnson, 35 Ore. Ap. 493 (1978).

[11] Obviously a petitioner may be either male or female and, to be accurate, one should continuously use "he or she" in the discussion. However, in the interest of readability and in light of the fact that most petitioners are women, "she" will generally be used.

[12] Rule 4.3(a) states that a lawyer shall not "give advice to the unrepresented person other than the advice to secure counsel, if the interests of such person are or have a reasonable possibility of being in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client."

[13] Rule 4.3(b) states that a lawyer shall not "state or imply to unrepresented persons whose interests are not in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client that the lawyer is disinterested. When the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role in the matter, the lawyer shall make reasonable efforts to correct the misunderstanding."

[14] See e.g., A.B.A. Informal Opinion No. 89-1528 (June 5, 1989):

> If a client-lawyer relationship exists, information received by the lawyer from the client is protected by Model Rule 1.6 and may not be disclosed to the Director of the IV-D office. If there is no client-lawyer relationship, the information may be disclosed unless the lawyer has failed to make reasonable efforts to correct any misunderstanding on the part of the custodial parent that a client-lawyer relationship existed, as required by Rule 4.3 . . . .

Here there should be no problem with confidential information. The Corporation Counsel says that in this context the petitioner is the client. Thus, there is attorney-client privilege. There is no question that the attorney must competently represent the petitioner and protect all confidences.

(3) Former AFDC Recipient--Now Off AFDC But Still in Arrears

In this category, the Policy Statement says that the Department of Human Services is the client. Thus, the analysis here is the same as in the first category, an AFDC petitioner. The critical question is whether the petitioner understands that this lawyer is not her lawyer and any confidences she reveals may be disclosed.

B. Two Petitioners Seeking Support From Same Respondent[15]

(1) Both are Non-AFDC Recipients

Here both petitioners are clients of Corporation Counsel and having one lawyer represent both may present a conflict under Rule 1.7. Rule 1.7(a), where applicable, is an absolute bar, prohibiting a lawyer from representing a client with respect to a position "if that position is adverse to a position taken in the same matter by another client represented with respect to that position taken by the same lawyer."[16] It is not clear whether the actions of two petitioners against the same respondent are "the same matter." The fundamental questions in each proceeding -- whether this respondent is the parent of each of the children, what are the financial needs of each child -- are different. But there may well be common issues such as the financial resources available to the respondent. Moveover, given the practice of scheduling such matters jointly before the same Hearing Commissioner, it is certainly arguable that the two actions may appropriately be labelled "the same matter." If that is the case, Rule 1.7(a) prohibits one lawyer from representing two petitioners against the same respondent, if the representation requires the lawyer to take adverse positions for each petitioner.

But even if one concludes that the actions of the two petitioners against the same respondent are not "the same matter" and that the more discretionary rule of 1.7(b) is applicable, the committee believes that, in general, it will be very difficult for one lawyer to adequately represent two petitioners against the same respondent. Rule 1.7(b) is not an absolute bar.[17] It is waivable provided that the conditions of 1.7(c) are met. Rule 1.7(c) provides:

> A lawyer may represent a client with respect to a matter in the circumstances described in paragraph (b) above if: (1) each potentially affected client provides consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation; and (2) the lawyer is able to comply with all other applicable rules with respect to such representation.

Current agency practice, once it becomes known that Corporation Counsel is representing two petitioners against the same respondent, is to inform both petitioners and to have them sign a form entitled "Conflict of Interest Waiver." See Appendix I. We do not believe this waiver is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of Rule 1.7(c). At a minimum, Corporation Counsel should inform the petitioners of the risk of having one lawyer represent two potentially adverse petitioners. In addition, Corporation Counsel should also inform the petitioners of the right, described below, to have another IV-D attorney from the Corporation Counsel as their representative. Finally, someone in the office of Corporation Counsel, such as a specially designated Ethics Advisor, should examine the situation to insure that if the petitioners do want to waive their rights, the lawyer can, in fact, comply with "all other applicable rules" if he or she represents two different petitioners against the same parent.

As suggested above, the Committee believes that it is unlikely that one attorney will be able to adequately represent two petitioners against the same respondent. As noted, the practice is to schedule all cases against one respondent together. If, in that hearing, it is necessary for the lawyer representing petitioner A to make arguments that are adverse to the interests of petitioner B, we believe that it will be virtually impossible for the lawyer to comply with Rule 1.7(c)'s requirement that the lawyer be able to comply with all applicable rules of representation. If, for example, petitioner A argues that the respondent (the alleged father) is not the father of petitioner B's child, we do not see how one lawyer can represent both petitioners "zealously and diligently."

But this does not mean that the petitioners must then be deprived of representation or forced to pay significant fees for legal services. As suggested supra, even if one attorney cannot adequately represent two different petitioners against the same parent, it is possible that another attorney in the Office of Corporation Counsel may be able to represent the second petitioner. The question is whether, under the Rules, the disqualification of one attorney vicariously disqualifies all the attorneys in the Office of Corporation Counsel.

Rule 1.10 provides for imputed disqualification in a variety of circumstances but Comment 1 says that the Rule does not apply to a government agency.[18] [15] This was the type of problem that concerned one of the Hearing Commissioners and prompted the present inquiry. An Assistant Corporation Counsel was representing a non-AFDC petitioner and had refused to request an amount of support greater than the amount specified in the Child Support Guidelines. The Commissioner questioned whether the attorney was providing the zealous representation owed his client. Once convinced that the refusal was based on an assessment that the "law and facts did not permit a good faith argument for the [petitioner] to seek an order in excess of the Child Support Guidelines," the inquiry before Bar Counsel was apparently dropped. Conversation with Acting Chief of the Child Support Section of the Office of Corporation Counsel, Sylvia Larrabee, June 1991. As a result of the inquiry, however, Ms. Robinson, then the Head of the Child Support Section, initiated her request to this committee.

[17] Rule 1.7(b) provides:

> Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if: (1) a position to be taken by that client in that matter is adverse to a position taken or to be taken by another client in the same matter; (2) such representation will be or is likely to be adversely affected by representation of another client; (3) representation of another client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by such representation; or (4) the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibility to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.

[18] Comment 1 provides: "For purposes of [these rules], the term 'firm' does not include a government agency or other government entity." This comment was added because of a recommendation in the Report by the District of Columbia Bar Special Committee on Government Lawyers and the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, known as the "Sims Report." The committee "concluded that government agencies should be specifically excluded from the definition of 'firm' in the Comment, because of the potentially harsh result which would occur if all lawyers in a government lawyer's agency were disqualified under Rule 1.10." Sims Report, at 23.

Thus, when two petitioners cannot or do not waive their right to separate counsel, the comment suggests that they may be represented by two different attorneys in the same office. So long as Corporation Counsel makes sure that the second attorney does not talk to the first and does not have access to the first attorney's files, we believe there is nothing prohibiting the second attorney from representing the second petitioner.[19]

(2) Both Petitioners are AFDC Recipients

In this category, the client is the Department, not either of the petitioners. Thus, while there may appear to be a conflict, in fact there is none and Corporation Counsel need do nothing special in this case.

(3) One Petitioner is AFDC and the Other is Not

Here the Corporation Counsel is representing the private petitioner in the one case and the Department of Human Services in the other. There is some danger that the lawyer will favor the Department over the petitioner. The applicable rule is 1.7(b) and that provides that the attorney may proceed if he or she gets the consent of both the petitioner and the Department. Rule 1.7(c) defines the nature of the consent required. If the nonAFDC petitioner does not consent, it may be possible under Rule 1.10, comment 1, for two different attorneys in the Office to represent the two petitioners, as discussed above.

C. Custody Switches -- Former Obligor Obtains Custody Of The Child And Seeks Child Support From Former Petitioner Who Had Had Custody But Has Lost It

(1) Both are AFDC Recipients

In this category, the Department starts out as the client and remains the client even when custody of the child switches. Again, the critical issue is that the two people understand that (a) at no time is either one the client and (b) communications are not privileged.

(2) Neither is an AFDC Recipient

In this situation, the first petitioner was the client. Once he or she lost custody and the other parent sought help, the other parent would become the client. In general, the Ethical Rules would give the first client the right to veto the representation of the second petitioner. Rule 1.9 provides that "a lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interest of the former client unless the former client consents after consultation." Thus, it would seem that, unless the first petitioner consents, the same attorney should not represent the other parent. But does that mean that all the attorneys in the Corporation Counsel are vicariously disqualified? As noted above, Rule 1.10 does not apply to government agencies. The rationale for the exemption seems to be that such disqualifications would cripple the government. Therefore, we believe the Rules permit Corporation Counsel to represent the second parent, provided no exchange of information occurs between the two attorneys.

(3) One is an AFDC recipient and the Other is Not

If the initial petitioner was not on AFDC, then that petitioner was a client of the IV-D attorney. Once that person is no longer the custodial parent and a IV-D petitioner, and the other parent, on AFDC, becomes the IV-D petitioner, the Department becomes the client. In this situation, Rule 1.9 seems to give the first petitioner the right to veto the attorney's representation of the Department. Therefore in this situation as well as the previous one, we believe that, if the first petitioner does not agree to the attorney's representing the Department, the Rules require that Corporation Counsel provide the Department with another attorney.

If the initial petitioner was on AFDC, then he or she was not the client. Under Rule 1.9, there is no veto right for the first petitioner. Thus, it would appear that Corporation Counsel can represent the other parent, at least if the first petitioner was aware that she or he was never the client.

D. Department Seeking Money For Petitioner And Arrears For Itself

A potential conflict can arise here between the Department's interest in obtaining the arrears it is owed and the petitioner's interest in obtaining her money. Since the government does not get its money until the present needs of the petitioner are met,[20] the government has an incentive to seek at least enough money to cover both the petitioner's needs and the arrearage. But it is possible that the government might not have an incentive to seek more than that. The Policy Statement provides that in this category, the Department of Human Services is the client. The problem, however, is that the petitioner may not realize that and may not understand that if she wants to seek additional moneys she may have to go outside the system. So long as she is apprised of that, however, the potential conflict seems to be avoided.

E. IV-D Attorney Representing a Current AFDC Recipient Who Previously Utilized the Agency's Services as a Non-AFDC Recipient and Vice-Versa.

When a petitioner goes from being an AFDC recipient to a non-AFDC petitioner with no arrears owed, the petitioner moves from not being a client to being a client. Movement in that direction seems to raise no new ethical dilemmas.

But movement in the other direction – from client to non-client – may present problems. Here the attorney moves from representing the petitioner to representing the government. This suggests the relevance of Rule 1.9. Does that mean that the petitioner would acquire the power to veto the attorney's representation of the government? It seems that Rule 1.9, read in conjunction with Rule 1.10, requires only that a new, different lawyer in the Corporation Counsel represent the government. If, however, the former client consents under Rule 1.9, the same IV-D lawyer can represent the government.

Conclusion

The foregoing is not an exhaustive discussion of all the conceivable ethical dilemmas that can arise. It is not possible to anticipate all such dilemmas. The discussion should, however, suggest the approach we believe appropriate for these issues.

[19] We leave it to Corporation Counsel to decide how to assign attorneys in these cases. In making this decision, we recommend that Corporation Counsel consider the working and supervisory relationships within the sections in the Family Services Division which may preclude assigning two attorneys from the same section. These include the small size of the section and the likelihood that confidential information might be shared with a common supervisor.

The ethical questions that this program generates are difficult. There is ambiguity as to who is the client; moreover, the roles and relationships are complex and constantly changing. It would certainly be easier if every time a potential conflict arises, the petitioner or would-be petitioner would be told to hire another lawyer. But that is unrealistic. Hiring private practitioners is not a viable alternative for most IV-D petitioners. Thus, we must assess these issues with that reality in mind. At the same time, it is essential to realize that the petitioners are frequently not very sophisticated and care must be taken to make sure they are not misled or deceived. Not only must IV-D attorneys make sure that petitioners understand whether or not they are a client with client's privileges; they must also make sure that the petitioners understand what not being a client means.

To assist Corporation Counsel in its commendable effort to walk carefully through this thicket, the Ethics Committee has a suggestion. We believe that it would be helpful if the Office designated a person or persons, such as an Ethics Advisor, to be responsible for handling inquiries concerning ethics from both IV-D attorneys and petitioners. We believe that many of the potential problems discussed herein can be avoided and/or resolved in if someone within the Office of Corporation Counsel were responsible for 1) alerting lawyers to the ethical complexities that may arise; 2) advising individual lawyers who have questions about their obligations in a particular situation; 3) helping lawyers to provide adequate disclosure to avoid creating de facto lawyer-client relationships as discussed supra in section A(1); 4) screening cases initially to try to avoid having one lawyer represent two petitioners against the same respondent; 5) advising petitioners who are being asked whether they wish to waive their rights under 1.7(b) and insuring that different counsel are assigned in situations where the conditions of 1.7(c) cannot be met, many of the potential problems discussed herein can be avoided and/or resolved.

Financial Penalty Imposed on Departing Lawyer Who Engages in Legal Practice in D.C. Area

• A partnership agreement imposes a delay of up to five years in paying out funds from a partner's capital financial account where the partner leaves the partnership and engages in the practice of law in the Washington area. Such an agreement violates Rule 5.6(a) in imposing a penalty for opening a potentially competing practice.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 5.6(a) (Restrictions on Right to Practice Law)

Inquiry

Inquirer seeks an opinion concerning the propriety of delay in paying funds from a partner's capital financial account where the partner leaves the partnership and engages in the practice of law in the District of Columbia metropolitan area.

The partnership agreement provides that a withdrawn partner is entitled to payments from his capital financial account over a five year period without interest beginning on the last day of the first fiscal quarter of the year following the date of withdrawal. It limits payments, however, in the following circumstances:

> If a Withdrawn Partner who is otherwise entitled to receive payments prior to age 65 pursuant to the section of this Agreement captioned "Payments for Withdrawn Partners" engages in the private practice of law in the metropolitan District of Columbia area, such payments shall be delayed until the earlier of (i) the date such Terminated Partner attains age 65, (ii) the date such Terminated Partner ceases to engage in the private practice of law as aforesaid or (iii) five years after the date such payments were otherwise scheduled to commence pursuant to the section of this Agreement captioned "Payments for Withdrawn Partners."

Inquirer seeks an opinion whether this provision violates Rule 5.6(a).

Discussion

Rule 5.6 provides:

> A lawyer shall not participate in offering or making
> (a) A partnership or employment agreement that restricts the rights of a lawyer to practice after termination of the relationship, except an agreement concerning benefits upon retirement; . . .

The operative language of Rule 5.6 – "restricts the right of a lawyer to practice" – is identical to the language of the predecessor Code provision, DR 2-108(A).

The Committee has frequently been asked to define the scope of firms' authority to limit, through partnership or employment agreements, competition by lawyers who depart the firm. In Opinion 181, the Committee engaged in a thorough review of the purposes of the former Code provision, analyzing the case law, ABA opinions and prior Committee decisions. It concluded that these decisions "demonstrate a general hostility toward restrictive [employment] agreements and persuade this Committee that it should carefully examine any such agreements that come before it." The reasons are twofold: to protect the ability of clients to obtain lawyers of their own choosing and to enable lawyers to advance their careers. The changing nature of the bar and the practice of law in the District of Columbia, which is characterized by significant growth in the size of the bar, the opening of branches of out-of-town firms and relaxation of rules concerning solicitation and advertising, all reinforce the need for limiting restrictions on lawyer mobility.

The Committee has twice before held that employment and partnership agreements imposing direct financial penalties for practicing in a competing or potentially competing firm amount to forbidden restrictions on the right to practice. In Opinion 65, the Committee held that former DR 2-108(A) prohibited an employment agreement requiring that, for two years after departure, the departed lawyer pay to the former firm 40% of net billings deriving from clients previously represented by the firm. And in Opinion 194, the Committee found impermissible a provision that reduced by half the payment of unrealized accounts receivable if the departing partner opened any competitive practice within twelve months. These decisions are consistent with Gray v. Martin, 663 P.2d 1285 (Or. 1983), twice cited by the Committee (Opinions 181 and 194), where the court refused to enforce a clause in the partnership agreement eliminating the payments a partner was otherwise entitled to receive if the lawyer practiced in any of three designated counties.

By contrast, financial arrangements that do not penalize a lawyer for competing do not run afoul of Rule 5.6. In Opinion 221, the Committee considered an agreement used by a firm engaged in plaintiff personal injury litigation that specified the division of potential contingent fees in cases unresolved at the time of an attorney's departure from the firm.[1] The Committee held that to the extent the arrangement was simply an effort to establish a fair split based on work performed, the agreement was permissible; an excessive share to the firm would, however, amount to a restriction on the right to practice.

The Committee has upheld only one sort of restriction on the right to practice. These are reasonable -- not absolute -- limitations on the departing lawyer's solicitation of clients of the departing firm. In Opinions 77 and 97, the Committee upheld employment agreements prohibiting an associate leaving a firm from seeking to solicit business from clients of the firm, where the associate was free to mail announcements short of direct solicitation. The Committee recognized that the rule in each instance did constitute a restriction on the former associate's ability to obtain clients, but believed that solicitation of current clients raises special concerns that warranted at least regulation of the manner of such solicitations. As the Committee has often determined, however (see, e.g., Opinions 181 and 221), even in the case of direct solicitation of a firm's clients, where problems of interference in ongoing relationships are most sensitive, a firm may impose only the most narrow of restrictions.

The agreement here violates Rule 5.6. The financial penalties imposed on a departing lawyer serve no other purpose than restricting practice and insulating the firm from potential competition. The agreement plainly discourages a partner from competing against the former firm, or even representing clients at all, by forcing the partner to forego the payments otherwise payable for up to five years if the partner practices law in the Washington area.

One might argue that here the agreement provides for delay in payment rather than its elimination or diminution, so is not nearly so onerous as in other cases. Even putting aside the possibly significant sums at stake and the cost to the lawyer of the delay, the provision's broad application undoubtedly serves as a deterrent to opening a competing practice. It thus represents a restriction on the right to practice to limit competition even as to potential future clients of the firm. The fact that the restriction ends automatically if the terminated partner ceases the private practice of law reinforces this conclusion.

The Committee concludes that a partnership agreement that delays for five years payments otherwise due a departing partner from the partner's capital financial account if the partner engages in the practice of law in the Washington area is prohibited by Rule 5.6.

Ethical Obligations of Attorney Holding Documents Provided by Client That May Be Property of Third Party

• An attorney whose client provides documents that may be the property of the client's former employer should, upon the client's request, return the documents to the client if the client has a plausible claim to ownership of them. As to documents with respect to which the client has no such claim, the attorney should return them to the employer unless to do so would reveal confidences protected by Rule 1.6, in which event the attorney must preserve the documents and may not permit them to be used inconsistently with the attorney's fiduciary duty to the owner with respect to such property.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.15 (Safekeeping Property)
- Rule 1.2(e)(Scope of Representation)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 3.4(a) (Fairness to Opposing Party and Counsel)

Inquiry

Inquirer has custody of certain documents provided by the client, including internal company records of Client's former employer. Some of the documents are originals and some are copies, and at least some of the documents in both categories (originals and copies) do not arguably belong to the Client, while some of the copies may. The Company knows generally that Client or Inquirer has some documents, but not their identity; it claims they belong to it and wants them back. Client asserts that some are his and has asked Inquirer to return them to Client, not the Company. Client also wants access to all of the documents that Client provided to Inquirer so that Client can use them in writing a book about the Company, apparently one the Company would not welcome. The questions are whether Inquirer can return the documents to the Client, must turn them over to the Company, or should keep them in Inquirer's files, and, if Inquirer must keep the papers, whether Inquirer could permit the Client to have access so he can use the documents to write his book.

Discussion

Inquirer's obligations depend initially upon whether Client has any legitimate claim to custody or use of the documents, an issue of fact and law beyond the Committee's power to resolve.

In general, Rule 1.15 obliges a lawyer to return a client's property to the client upon the client's request. Rule 3.4(a) also provides that a lawyer shall not:

> (a) Obstruct another party's access to evidence or alter, destroy or conceal evidence, or counsel or assist another person to do so, if the lawyer reasonably should know that the evidence is or may be the subject of discovery or subpoena in any pending or imminent proceeding. Unless prohibited by law, a lawyer may receive physical evidence of any kind from the client or from another person. If the evidence received by the lawyer belongs to anyone other than the client, the lawyer shall make a good faith effort to preserve it and return it to the owner, subject to Rule 1.6. . . .(emphasis added)[1]

[1] For example, the agreement provided that if the client had retained the firm two years before the lawyer's departure and resolved within a year of departure, the firm would receive 75% of the fee. If the firm had been retained only a year before the lawyer's departure and the case was not resolved for two to three years thereafter, the firm would receive 55% of the fee.

[1] Rule 3.4(a) is based generally on Rule 3.4(a) of the ABA Model Rules, which provides:

> A lawyer shall not:
> (a) unlawfully obstruct another party's access to evidence or unlawfully alter, destroy or conceal a document or other material having potential evidentiary value. A lawyer shall not counsel or assist another person to do any

The Rules do not address the lawyer's obligations when it is unclear to whom the evidence "belongs." The comments refer generally to "the requirements of paragraph (a) with respect to return of property to its rightful owner ... ." Rule 3.4 Comment [3].

Comment [7] adds that:

> . . . if it is reasonably apparent that the evidence is not the client's property the lawyer may not retain the evidence or return it to the client. Instead, the lawyer must, under paragraph (a), make a good faith effort to return the evidence to its owner.

However, Comment [5] adds:

> Because the duty of confidentiality under Rule 1.6, the lawyer is generally forbidden to volunteer information about physical evidence received from a client without the client's consent after consultation. In some cases, the Office of Bar Counsel will accept physical evidence from a lawyer and then turn it over to the appropriate persons; in those cases this procedure is usually the best means of delivering evidence to the proper authorities without disclosing the client's confidences. . . .[2]

On the facts stated, we assume that disclosure of the copies to the Company would constitute disclosure of a confidence or secret of the Client within the broad definition of those terms in Rule 1.6, which includes "[i]nformation gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client."[3] If Rule 1.6 and the need for client consent preclude referral of the copies to Bar Counsel, and given Client's assertion of rights to the papers, we believe the obligations of Rules 1.6 and 1.15 require the lawyer to comply with the Client's request to return the papers to the Client insofar as the Client has a plausible claim to ownership of them. Although here it appears that Client desires to preserve the papers, rather than destroy them, the lawyer should appropriately advise as to Client's legal obligations concerning preservation, disclosure, and use of the copies, in view of the competing claims of the Company.[4]

As to papers for which the Client has no plausible claim of ownership, while Rule 1.6 may preclude return of the documents to the company, it would not preclude the Inquirer from "preserv[ing]" them. Accordingly, retaining custody would be the proper course of conduct, with future disposition to be governed or directed by a court order or by some agreement of the parties.

Where the lawyer retains custody of the documents, other rules are implicated. Rule 1.15(a) obliges a lawyer who is in possession of property of a client or a third person to hold it separately from the lawyer's property. Rule 1.15(b) further provides:

> Upon receiving funds or other property in which a client or third person has an interest, a lawyer shall promptly notify the client or third person. Except as stated in this Rule or otherwise permitted by law or by agreement with the client, a lawyer shall promptly deliver to the client or third person any funds or other property that the client or third person is entitled to receive and, upon request by the client or third person, shall promptly render a full accounting regarding such property, subject to Rule 1.6.

It is unclear how Rule 1.15 should apply here, if at all. Comment [7] states: "With respect to property that constitutes evidence, such as the instruments or proceeds of crime, see Rule 3.4(a)." This suggests that Rule 3.4 should govern when the property consists of "evidence," at least in the event of a conflict with Rule 1.15. In this case, however, it is not clear whether all of the documents in question would be deemed "evidence" under Rule 3.4, rather than mere third-party property under Rule 1.15. To the extent that there is a difference between the categories and rules, it would seem to relate more to the obligations the Inquirer has to the government or the court with respect to "evidence," while the obligations to third persons to whom the property belongs may be deemed essentially the same whether or not it is also "evidence."

The final clause, subjecting the obligations of Rule 1.15 to Rule 1.6, literally applies only to the delivery and accounting duties not to the notice duty in the first sentence. In this case it may be that Inquirer could comply with a generalized notice obligation without breaching Rule 1.6, so long as Inquirer is not obliged to identify the particular documents. As previously noted, the Client's former employer is aware that Client or Inquirer has some documents, but not which or how many, so that giving general notice might not itself require a disclosure contrary to Rule 1.6. This is a question of fact that we cannot resolve.

The requirements of Rule 1.15(b) to "promptly deliver" to a third person any "funds or other property" that the third person "is entitled to receive," and upon request of that person to "promptly render a full account," are both subject to Rule 1.6. To the extent that such an accounting would require disclosure of information protected by Rule 1.6, those requirements need not be satisfied, for the reasons noted in connection with the discussion of Rule 3.4 and its similar reference to Rule 1.6

Rule 1.15 and its comments shed light on the question whether Inquirer can keep custody of the documents belonging to the Company but give the Client access to the documents for use in writing his book. Comment [1] begins: "A lawyer should hold property of others with the care required of a professional fiduciary." Comment [4] elaborates:

> Third parties, such as a client's creditors, may have just claims against funds or other property in a lawyer's custody. A lawyer may have a duty under applicable law to protect such third-party claims against wrongful interference by the client, and accordingly may refuse to surrender the property to the client. However, a lawyer should not unilaterally assume to arbitrate a dispute between the client and the third party.

In addition, under Rule 1.2(e), if a lawyer knows that what the client proposes to do is "criminal or fraudulent," the lawyer may not "assist" the client.

Permitting the Client to use Company documents in Inquirer's custody for a book about the Company might well breach Inquirer's fiduciary duty. Similarly, Inquirer's cooperation with the Clisuch act . . . .

As the italicized provision of D.C. Rule 3.4(a) is not contained in the ABA Model Rules, they and opinions construing them provide little guidance here.

[2] The additional comments are directed primarily to concerns about alteration, destruction or concealment of evidence in the face of pending or imminent process, rather than competing claims of ownership or rights to use and disclose.

[3] Cf. Dean v. Dean, 607 So.2d 494 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1992).

[4] We need not address the situation that would be presented if the lawyer had obtained the copies form a person other than a client. Compare In re Shell Oil Ref., 143 F.R.D. 105 (E.D. La.), as amended, 144 F.R.D. 73 (E.D. La. 1992).

ent could subject the Inquirer to claims of wrongful interference, or participation in the Client's possible breach of fiduciary obligations, and possible tort liability. However, these are legal rather than ethical questions, and hence are beyond the Committee's jurisdiction.

Joint Representation In Divorce Cases

- A lawyer may not jointly represent a divorcing husband and wife who seek assistance in reaching agreement as to the terms of their divorce.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.7(a) (Simultaneous representation of clients with adverse interests)
- Rule 2.2 (Intermediary)

Inquiry

The inquiring lawyer, who is both a practicing lawyer and an ordained minister, has been working as a mediator in domestic relations for the Multi-Door Dispute Resolution Division of the Superior Court and as an arbitrator for the Attorney-Client Arbitration Board of the D.C. Bar. She proposes starting a private law practice that would in several respects go beyond her current mediation work. Under her proposal, she would establish a client-lawyer relationship with both spouses. As part of undertaking joint representation, the inquirer would provide legal information and limited legal advice to both spouses. At the same time, she intends to play an active role in helping the parties reach a detailed divorce agreement, which would cover such issues as property distribution, spousal support, child custody, and child support. Her role would include proposing solutions designed to advance the mutual interests of both parties, as she currently does in her mediation work. The inquirer further proposes drafting and filing the necessary agreements and representing both spouses before the Court.

The inquirer states that she would carry out the joint representation under the safeguards of Rule 2.2 of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct and the guidelines set forth in our Opinion No. 143 (1984), in the following manner. She would represent these clients solely in connection with the mediated divorce. She would undertake joint representation only after determining that each spouse is capable of making adequately informed decisions and that the matter can be resolved on terms compatible with the best interests of both clients. After providing the clients with a written explanation of the risks of joint representation and of the circumstances that might later cause separate representation to be necessary or desirable, she would obtain their informed written consent. The inquirer would withdraw from the representation if any of the above conditions ceased to be satisfied or if either client requested her to do so. Thereafter, she would not represent either of the clients in connection with the divorce or any other matter. At all times the clients would retain the right to seek their own private attorney to review the agreement.

Discussion

Opinion No. 143, decided under the former D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility, represents the only time this Committee has directly considered the issue of joint representation in divorce. In that opinion, we stated that "[a]s a general rule joint representation of a couple seeking a divorce is not ethically permissible," but nevertheless held that it was permissible under the limited and specific facts presented in that inquiry. The specific facts in that inquiry involved a divorce where the spouses had comparable employment status, salaries, and educational backgrounds; where no children were involved; and where the parties had already agreed upon a division of property and "all other substantial settlement terms before retaining counsel." (emphasis added). Assistance of counsel was sought solely for the purpose of implementing the couple's preexisting agreement.[1]

In several respects, the current proposal goes well beyond the joint representation permitted under Opinion No. 143. First, although the lawyer intends to represent only couples "contemplating a non-contested divorce," she does not intend to restrict her practice to couples who have already agreed upon a division of property and all other substantial issues before retaining her. Second, she seeks to represent couples with children as well as those without children. Third, she does not intend automatically to decline representation when the spouses have disparate employment status, salaries, and educational backgrounds, so long as both are able to make adequately informed decisions. In short, she proposes to undertake joint representation whenever the parties, despite different interests and views, seek to arrive at a non-contested divorce settlement.

Although Opinion No. 143 never stated that joint representation was unethical whenever the circumstances depart from the specific facts outlined in that inquiry, the opinion certainly suggests that joint representation in divorce cases is usually impermissible. We think that the Opinion's reasoning clearly precludes joint representation of husband and wife in the broad range of circumstances envisioned by the inquiry. We turn our attention, then, to whether the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct -- in particular Rule 2.2, a new rule on intermediation that had no counterpart in the Code -- so significantly change the governing law as to permit joint representation of husband and wife in divorce cases in the broad range of circumstances she contemplates. For the reasons stated below, we hold that they do not.

It must be emphasized at the outset that the Rules of Professional Conduct preserve and reinforce basic ethical standards about representation of parties with adverse interests. Rule 1.7(a) bars absolutely a lawyer's representation of clients with respect to adverse positions in the same matter.[2] On its face, the Rule would appear to prevent joint representation of a divorcing husband and wife who seek assistance in reconciling their differing interests and positions. And Comment [6] to Rule 1.7, noting that the absolute bar of Rule 1.7(a) applies only where there is an actual, as opposed to a nominal, adversity in the positions of the clients, cites Opinion No. 143 as setting forth "the limited circumstances" in which Rule 1.7(a) "would not preclude the representation of both parties in an uncontested divorce proceeding."

[5] Cf. GTE Prods. Corp. v. Steward, 414 Mass. 721, 610 N.E. 2d 892 (1993).

[1] In applying the Code, some other jurisdictions have permitted joint representation under similarly limited circumstances. See e.g., Kentucky Bar Association Opinion E-290 (1984); Oregon Bar Opinion No. 515 (1988).

[2] Rule 1.7(a) provides that "A lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a position to be taken in a matter if that position is adverse to a position taken or to be taken in the same matter by another client represented with respect to that position by the same lawyer."

To be sure, Comment [6] to Rule 1.7 does not refer explicitly to Rule 2.2. And Rule 2.2 envisions a lawyer, in appropriate circumstance, acting as an intermediary between two clients with potentially conflicting interests.[3] See Comment [1]. Where this is the case, Rule 2.2 permits common representation if the lawyer "reasonably believes" that she can represent both clients "impartially" and that their potentially conflicting interests can be resolved on terms compatible with both clients' best interests. In making this determination, the lawyer may proceed if all clients, after being fully informed, believe that they will secure greater overall benefit by choosing to develop mutual interests (perhaps at the cost of not exercising all their legal rights to the fullest) and if the lawyer reasonably believes that common representation will be successful in accomplishing this goal.

There are substantial reasons for caution, however, in approaching the question of whether Rule 2.2 permits joint representation in divorce cases in a broader range of circumstances than allowed in Opinion No. 143.

First, as already noted, the D.C. Court of Appeals, in Comment [6] to Rule 1.7(a), emphasized the "limited circumstances," described in that Opinion, in which Rule 1.7(a) permits joint representation in an uncontested divorce. Whether, as a matter of law, that Comment forecloses an interpretation of Rule 2.2 as permitting joint representation of a divorcing husband and wife in any set of circumstances beyond that set forth in Opinion No. 143 is a difficult question we need not resolve in the context of this Inquiry.

Second, we believe that Rule 2.2 was not drafted with divorce cases in mind. The Comment to the Rule never mentions divorce as an example of the situations in which the Rule might apply. Moreover, although the language of the Comment is not entirely free of ambiguity, we think that the Rule's approach to common representation is basically designed for "joint venture"-type situations. Several paragraphs of the Comment support this view. Comment [3] states that the Rule does not apply at all when the lawyer acts as a mediator between non-clients. Where mediation takes place outside the context of a client-lawyer relationship, the lawyer's conduct may be subject to other codes of ethics, but it is not subject to Rule 2.2.

Comment [6] states that the appropriateness of intermediation -- that is, the standard that must be met before a lawyer can act as intermediary under Rule 2.2 -- depends on the form that intermediation takes. The Comment thus draws a distinction between arbitration and mediation on the one hand and common representation on the other. In the former, the lawyer may be called upon to help resolve a dispute between existing clients without representing them and advising them with respect to the subject matter at issue. In arbitration, the lawyer may even decide the outcome after each client presents its case to the lawyer. In common representation, however, the lawyer represents the clients with respect to the subject matter at issue and thus has a wider range of duties to the clients. In particular, a lawyer commonly representing multiple clients still has a duty to be an advocate and advisor for each client. As stated in Comment [8], a lawyer jointly representing two clients has a duty both to keep each client adequately informed and to maintain confidentiality of information relating to the representation.

Because potential conflicts pose problems most acutely for the lawyer attempting common representation, the Comment to Rule 2.2 suggests that this form of intermediation should only be undertaken for clients whose mutual interests predominate over any apparent divergence of interests. Comment [6], for instance, indicates that the interests of commonly represented clients must be substantially compatible. Comment [7] voices a particular caution against common representation where the impartiality of the lawyer might be questioned. Comment [4] cites as examples several "joint venture"-type situations involving clients who have embarked upon a common goal, such as establishment of a new business or a financial organization. Although Comment 4 does refer to "mediating a dispute between clients," in context we think that this refers to disputes between pre-existing clients within the context of a joint venture of some type.

Third, it is important to remember that the Rules, like the Code, give expression to certain essential features of the client-lawyer relationship that cannot be dispensed with, even with a client's informed consent. As the Comment to Rule 2.2 reflects, a lawyer jointly representing divorcing spouses may not play an active role in the resolution of issues between them without running a high risk of failing to live up to the responsibilities the lawyer has to both clients -- to advise each of them, to represent their individual interests, and to preserve their confidences. As Comment [8] states, fulfilling these duties while acting as an intermediary requires a delicate balance and can be extremely difficult, even where the clients have reached substantial agreement on all material issues before retaining the lawyer.

These considerations lead us to the conclusion that -- at least in the case of divorce -- Rule 2.2 does not carve out any significant exception to Rule 1.7. Whether it enlarges the scope for joint representation in divorces at all beyond the "limited circumstances" of Opinion No. 143 is a difficult question we need not resolve here. For there can be no doubt, in our view, that Rule 2.2 does not permit the type of practice that is the subject of this Inquiry -- i.e., the joint representation of a divorcing husband and wife who seek assistance in resolving their disagreement as to the terms of the dissolution of their marriage. We believe that such joint representation would place too great a strain on the fundamental duty of loyalty to individual clients that undergirds our ethical rules. Whatever discretion Rule 1.2 gives clients to define the objectives of representation, it does not include the discretion to retain a lawyer under circumstances likely to cause the lawyer to act in ways (or to be perceived to act in ways) detrimental to the client-lawyer relationship.

We emphasize again, however, that a lawyer may act as a mediator for spouses seeking a divorce so long as no client-lawyer relationship is established. Such mediation is not governed by the Rules of Professional Conduct but may be subject to other relevant codes of ethics for mediators or arbitrators. In these circumstances, the lawyer has a duty at the outset to inform all parties that he or she is not establishing a client-lawyer relationship, and consequently that the parties may not assume that the lawyer is under the customary duty to protect their re-

Appendix

Rule 2.2 Intermediary

(a) A lawyer may act as intermediary between clients if:

(1)The lawyer consults with each client concerning the implications of the common representation, including the advantages and risks involved, and the effect on the attorney-client privileges, and obtains each client's consent to the common representation;

(2) the lawyer reasonably believes that the matter can be resolved on terms compatible with the clients' best interests, that each client will be able to make adequately informed decisions in the matter, and that there is little risk of material prejudice to the interests of any of the clients if the contemplated resolution is unsuccessful; and

(3) the lawyer reasonably believes that the common representation can be undertaken impartially and without improper effect on other responsibilities the lawyer has to any of the clients.

(b) A lawyer should, except in unusual circumstances that may make it infeasible, provide both clients with an explanation in writing of the risks involved in the common representation and of the circumstances that may cause separate representation later to be necessary or desirable. The consent of the clients shall also be in writing.

(c) While acting as intermediary, the lawyer shall consult with each client concerning the decisions to be made and the considerations relevant in making them, so that each client can make adequately informed decisions.

(d) A lawyer shall withdraw as intermediary if any of the clients so request, or if any of the conditions stated in Paragraph (a) are no longer satisfied. Upon withdrawal, the lawyer shall not continue to represent any of the clients in the matter that was the subject of the intermediation.

Inclusion of Name of Nonlawyer Partner in Firm Name

• Assuming compliance with the requirements of Rule 5.4(b), the name of a nonlawyer partner may be included in the name of a law firm. However, the firm must make clear on firm stationery, business cards and professional listings that the nonlawyer partner is not a lawyer.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 5.4(b) (Practice with Nonlawyers)
• Rule 7.5 (Firm Names and Letterhead)

Inquiry

The inquiring lawyer, whom we will refer to as Smith, is a sole practitioner in the District of Columbia. He proposes to form a partnership with a nonlawyer, whom we will refer to as Jones, to provide legal services to clients in personal injury and property damage cases. Jones, an experienced investigator, will provide various investigative services such as photographs of accident scenes and interviews of clients and witnesses. He will also perform nonlegal research and provide administrative assistance in preparation of cases for trial and settlement negotiations. These support services will be related solely to Smith's practice of law. Smith and Jones will enter into a written agreement that will specify that the sole purpose of the partnership is the provision of legal services to clients; that Jones will abide by the Rules of Professional Conduct; and that Smith will undertake to be responsible for Jones's compliance.

The proposed partnership will be called "Smith & Jones" or "Smith & Jones Associates." Alternatively, Smith may form a professional corporation, which would be called "Smith & Jones, P.A." Such a professional corporation would be owned by Smith, and Jones would contract with the corporate entity, as well as Smith individually, for the provision of his nonlegal services in return for a share of fees. Jones would be designated as "Chief Administrator" of the corporate entity.

Discussion

The questions posed by the inquiry are (1) whether the proposed arrangement comports with Rule 5.4(b); (2) whether the name of Jones, the nonlawyer, may be included in the firm name; and if so, (3) whether the firm must take affirmative steps to make clear to clients and prospective clients that Jones is not a lawyer.

First, we find that the proposed arrangement comports with Rule 5.4 (b), which provides:

A lawyer may practice law in a partnership or other form of organization in which a financial interest is held or managerial authority is exercised by an individual nonlawyer who performs professional services which assist the organization in providing legal services to clients, but only if:

(1) The partnership or organization has as its sole purpose providing legal services to clients;

(2) all persons having such managerial authority or holding a financial interest undertake to abide by these rules of professional conduct;

(3) the lawyers who have a financial interest or managerial authority in the partnership or organization undertake to be responsible for the nonlawyer participants to the same extent as if nonlawyer participants were lawyers under Rule 5.1;

(4) the foregoing conditions are set forth in writing.

This rule, unique to the District of Columbia, permits lawyers to form partnerships or other organizations in which nonlawyers have a financial interest -- as partners or otherwise -- so long as the specified conditions are met. On the basis of the representations made by the inquiring lawyer, it appears that those conditions are met in this case. The business of Smith & Jones will be limited to the provision of legal services to clients; Jones will undertake to comply with the Rules of Professional Conduct; Smith will undertake to assure that compliance; and these undertakings will be set forth in writing.

The next question is whether Jones's name may appear in the firm name. Nothing in Rule 5.4 or the Comment to the Rule suggests that the name of a nonlawyer partner may not be included in a firm name. The question remains, however, whether the inclusion of the name of a nonlawyer in the name of a partnership or other organization devoted to the provision of legal services is inherently misleading. Rule 7.5(a) provides that "a lawyer shall not use a firm name, letterhead, or other professional designation that violates Rule 7.1." Rule 7.1(a), in turn, provides in pertinent part that "a lawyer shall not make a false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services. A communication is false or misleading if it: (1) Contains a material misrepresentation of fact or law, or omits a fact necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading."

In Opinion No. 45 (1978), issued under the former Code of Professional Responsibility, we held that the name of a nonlawyer could not appear in a law firm name. However, that opinion was based on a construction of DR 2-102(B) as explicitly limiting firm names to those of "lawyers in the firm."[1] And it was also influenced by the explicit prohibition of DR 3-103(A), which provided that "a lawyer shall not form a partnership with a non-lawyer if any of the activities of the partnership consist of the practice of law."

Under the Rules of Professional Conduct now in effect, however, the situation is quite different. The traditional bar against partnerships with nonlawyers has been eliminated by Rule 5.4(b). And the detailed restrictions of the Code of Professional Responsibility with respect to names of firms have been replaced in Rule 7.1 with the general injunction not to mislead. In light of these changes, we believe that it is no longer misleading to include the name of a nonlawyer partner in the firm name of a partnership that is devoted to the provision of legal services to clients and that complies in all other respects with Rule 5.4(b). The firm name of a law firm constitutes an implicit representation that the firm is engaging in legal services, but, given Rule 5.4(b), it does not inherently constitute a representation that every partner in the firm is a lawyer.

Nonetheless, we believe that if the name of a nonlawyer partner is included in the firm name, there is some possibility of misunderstanding unless an appropriate disclosure is made. In such a case the firm must make an appropriate disclosure, on firm letterhead, business cards, and professional listings, that the firm includes a nonlawyer partner. If individual names are not listed on the letterhead, the fact that a nonlawyer is a name partner must be indicated in some fashion -- e.g., by adding the phrase "a partnership including a nonlawyer" after the firm name.[2] Of course, in any case, if individual names are listed on the letterhead, business card or firm listing, any listed nonlawyer partner should be identified in an appropriate manner -- e.g., "investigator," "firm administrator," "economist" -- that makes clear that he or she is not a lawyer. See Opinion No. 38 (July 19, 1977) (nonlawyer patent agent employed by law firm may be listed on firm letterhead followed by the designation "patent agent"); ABA Informal Opinion 89-1527 (Feb. 22, 1989) (nonlawyer executive director may be listed on firm letterhead and business cards, so long as listing makes clear that person is a nonlawyer or responsible only for administration of the office).

Payment of Referral Fee to a Lawyer For Recommendation of Registered Agent

• A lawyer may not retain a referral fee or commission for referring corporate clients to a firm that provides services as a statutory registered agent. Any payment offered to the lawyer for a referral of client's business must be disclosed to the client. The client must consent to the payment. The payment must be turned over to the client.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 1.7(b)(4) (Lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client shall not be affected by the lawyer's personal interest).

Inquiry

The inquirer is president of a company that offers services as a statutory registered agent for corporations in the District of Columbia. The inquirer wishes to solicit D.C. Bar members and offer a commission for listing his company as registered agent in articles of incorporation or in applications for certificates of authority for foreign corporations to transact business in the District. The inquirer asks if it is unethical for a D.C. bar member to accept such commissions.

Discussion

D.C. Rule 1.7(b)(4) forbids a lawyer from representing a client when the > lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.

Prior to adoption of the Rules, DR 5-101(A) stated the same rule.

In representing a client, a lawyer often may have reason to retain a third party to provide necessary services that will be paid by the client or recommend a third party to the client for the client to engage directly. Examples include title insurance companies, bonding companies, printers, court reporters, and expert witnesses.

In engaging or recommending such services, the lawyer must have paramount concern for the client's interests--a good product for the client at a fair price. The lawyer's judgment cannot be influenced by a promised payment to the lawyer from the third party.

This Committee has not considered previously an inquiry involving a commission or referral fee from a third party to a lawyer for referral or placement of a client's business. In Opinion 138, however, the Committee considered whether a lawyer could refer a client to a particular bank for a loan to cover legal services. The lawyer was to receive no payment from the bank. Rather the lawyer would pay the bank $25 for each client referred. The lawyer, however, benefitted from the arrangement because the $25 fee provided speedy processing of the client's loan request and the bank's agreement to notify the lawyer if the agreement was rejected. The Committee permitted the arrangement but said that the lawyer could have no interest in the bank, and the lawyer "must be satisfied that the credit arrangements are fair and in the client's interest."

[1] DR 2-102(B) at the time provided, in pertinent part, that "a lawyer in private practice shall not practice under a trade name, a name that is misleading as to the identity of the lawyer or lawyers practicing under such name, or a firm name containing names other than those of one or more of the lawyers in the firm." (emphasis added).

[2] We do not reach the question of what disclosure, if any, need be made in the case of a firm in which a nonlawyer is a partner but is not included in the firm name and is not listed on the letterhead.

In Informal Opinion 1020 (February 9, 1968), the American Bar Association forbade a lawyer from accepting remuneration for referrals of inventor clients to an investment company. The Committee rejected permitting the remuneration even with full disclosure to the client and consent. The Committee cited with approval unpublished Informal Opinion 278 which provided:

> A lawyer may not accept a gratuity from anyone without his client's knowledge and consent, and if he does so the gratuity really belongs to the client, who, of course, may make the attorney's fee more generous by reason of it, but is not bound to do so.

Philadelphia Bar Association Ethics Opinion 91-28 (1991) forbade a lawyer's acceptance of a referral fee from an expert witness because it might divert the lawyer from making the selection solely on who would do the best job for the client (as well as the possible impact on witness' credibility if the arrangement were revealed). Florida Ethics Opinion 70-13 (1970) holds the client, rather than the lawyer, must receive the benefit of a finder's fee for placing a client's investments. New Jersey Ethics Opinion 416 (1979) holds that a commission from a referral fee from a real estate company for listings obtained must be disclosed to the client. The client must consent, and the referral fee must be credited to the client.

We find that a lawyer may not retain a referral fee or commission from a third party for referring legal clients. Any payment offered to the lawyer for referral of a client's business must be disclosed to the client. The client must consent to the payment, and the payment must be turned over to the client directly or as a credit to the bill for legal services. A lawyer's judgment in referring a client for services from third parties must be based on assessment of the quality of the third party's services and fairness of the price, not on a potential financial benefit to the lawyer.

A Lawyer's Obligation to Report Another Lawyer's Misconduct

- A lawyer suing another lawyer for malpractice on behalf of a client is required by Rule 8.3 to report to bar disciplinary authorities the conduct that is the subject of the malpractice action, if she has sufficient knowledge of the pertinent facts, if her knowledge is not protected as a client confidence or secret, and if the conduct of the other lawyer both constitutes a violation of an ethical rule and raises a substantial question as to the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness in other respects.

Where a lawyer learns of another lawyer's misconduct in the course of representing her client, and the information about the misconduct constitutes a confidence or secret within the meaning of Rule 1.6, that Rule prohibits her reporting it without the client's consent. If, after having been made fully aware of any possible adverse consequences for his ultimate recovery, the client does consent, then neither Rule 1.6 nor Rule 1.3(b)(2) bars reporting. On the facts of this case, the Committee is unable to conclude that the misconduct at issue (failure to comply with the statute of limitations and representation of conflicting interests) gives rise to an obligation under Rule 8.3 to report.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.3(b)(2) (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 8.3 (Reporting Professional Misconduct)

Inquiry

The inquirer represents a client in his malpractice claim against another D.C. lawyer, arising out of the latter's representation of him in connection with a 1990 automobile accident. The malpractice claim is based on the lawyer's failure to file suit within the applicable two-year limitations period, and also on a putative conflict of interest in the lawyer's simultaneous representation in the same matter of certain members of the client's immediate family. The inquirer wishes to know whether the conduct that is the subject of the malpractice action gives rise to an obligation on her part under Rule 8.3 to report the lawyer to bar disciplinary authorities in the District. The inquirer expresses some concern that subjecting the other lawyer to disciplinary prosecution could limit his ability to pay any judgment that may ultimately be obtained against him in the malpractice action. On the facts presented, we cannot conclude that the inquirer has an obligation to report under Rule 8.3.

Procedural History

The Committee originally approved an opinion in response to this inquiry in April 1994. Subsequently, Bar Counsel raised certain questions relating to the interaction of Rules 8.3 and 1.6, particularly with respect to what information should be regarded as "secret" under Rule 1.6(b). After further deliberation, the Committee has concluded that its initial resolution of the apparent conflict between the two Rules in question is compelled by their language. Accordingly, notwithstanding the legitimate policy concerns raised by Bar Counsel, we are constrained to reaffirm the conclusions of the earlier opinion. This revised opinion elaborates further on the issues raised by Bar Counsel.

Discussion

A lawyer's obligation to report misconduct by another lawyer arises under Rule 8.3(a) when the lawyer "h[as] knowledge that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness, or fitness as a lawyer in other respects. . . ." If the Rule applies, then failure to report would itself be an ethical violation.

A 1992 opinion of the New York State Bar Association's Committee on Professional Ethics, Opinion No. 635 ("New York State Bar Opinion"), outlines the following four step process for determining whether mandatory reporting is required, which we adopt.

1. "Knowledge"

Consistent with the interpretation given the reporting requirement in other jurisdictions, we believe Rule 8.3(a) should be read to require a lawyer to report misconduct only if she has a clear belief that misconduct has occurred, and possesses actual knowledge of the pertinent facts.

> Although absolute certainty is not required, see Rotunda, The Lawyer's Duty to Report Another Lawyer's Unethical Violations in the Wake of Himmel, 1988 Ill. L. Rev. 977, 986, a mere suspicion that misconduct has occurred does not give rise to an obligation to report.

New York State Bar Opinion, id. at 4. See also New York City Ethics Op. 1990-3; Alabama Ethics Op. 85-95; Arizona Op. 90-13; Nebraska Op. 89-4; Williamson v. Council of North Carolina

2. Client Confidences or Secrets

Next, the lawyer must consider whether the knowledge of misconduct she possesses is a client "confidence" or "secret" as those terms are defined in Rule 1.6.[2] If information is protected by Rule 1.6, it is specifically exempted from the mandatory reporting requirement of Rule 8.3(a). See Rule 8.3(c).[3] We believe the exemption in Rule 8.3(c), read together with Rule 1.6 itself, means that a lawyer may not report misconduct where this would entail a disclosure of information protected by Rule 1.6.[4] Rule 1.3(b)(2) may also preclude reporting if it would "prejudice" or "damage" the client, even if the client does not object.[5]

Under Rule 1.6, information gained by a lawyer "in the professional relationship," even if not privileged, may be protected as a "secret," in which case it may not be disclosed without the client's consent. See note 2, supra. Comment [6] of Rule 1.6 confirms that the Rule's protection extends "not merely to matters communicated in confidence by the client (i.e., confidences) but also to all information gained in the course of the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or would be likely to be detrimental to the client (i.e., secrets)." Comment [6] goes on to explain:

> This ethical precept, unlike the evidentiary privilege, exists without regard to the nature or source of the information or the fact that others share the knowledge. It reflects not only the principles underlying the attorney-client privilege, but the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the client. (Emphasis added.)

In the instant case, because the information about the other lawyer's failure to file within the limitations period and his possible conflict of interest came to the lawyer "in the course of the professional relationship," it falls within the definition of a "secret" under Rule 1.6 either if the client requests that it be "held inviolate" or if its disclosure would be "likely to be detrimental to the client." As Comment [6] makes clear, the information does not lose its protected status as a "secret" simply because "others share the knowledge."

Even if it could be argued that the client's direction to disclose the information in public court filings removes it from the Rule's definition of information "that the client has requested be held inviolate," the information still may be entitled to protection as a client "secret" if its disclosure would be "detrimental to the client," without regard to its already having been made public. Thus, if reporting the other lawyer's misconduct to disciplinary authorities may lessen the client's ultimate chances of recovery, the lawyer may be constrained by Rule 1.6 from doing so.

We have considered an argument that the client waived any expectation of confidentiality under Rule 1.6 respecting the other lawyer's misconduct when he authorized his lawyer to file a lawsuit about it, because he had in effect consented to disclosure, at least to the extent that the facts had been made a matter of public record in the court filings. See Rule 1.6(d)(1). We believe, however, that the mere fact that certain information has in this fashion been made a matter of public record by the lawyer at the client's direction does not permit the lawyer to disregard altogether her confidentiality obligations to the client under Rule 1.6 where disclosure in another forum is at issue. In a word, we believe that a client's consent to disclosure under Rule 1.6(d) may be a limited one, and that the client retains the option, even where information has been disclosed for one purpose at his own direction, to limit whether and to what extent his lawyer otherwise discloses it.[6] This construction of Rule 1.6 is confirmed by Comment [6], which points out that the Rule reflects "not only the principles underlying the attorney-client privilege, but the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the client." Thus, even if the client has authorized the lawyer to file a lawsuit charging another lawyer with malprac-

[1] In Doe, the court of appeals, in analyzing the analogous disclosure obligation under Rule 3.3(b) to reveal fraud to a tribunal, stated that a lawyer must disclose information he "reasonably knows to be a fact" and which "clearly establishes" the existence of a fraud. The court stated that "proof beyond a moral certainty" is not required, but that a lawyer "must clearly know, rather than suspect, that a fraud on the court has been committed before he brings this knowledge to the court's attention." 847 F. 2d at 62.

[2] Rule 1.6 defines client "confidences" and "secrets" as follows:

> 'Confidence' refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law, and 'secret' refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client.

[3] Rule 8.3(c) provides:

> This rule does not require disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6.

[4] A similar conclusion respecting the interaction of Rules 1.6 and 8.3(a) has been reached in several other jurisdictions. See, e.g., In re Ethics Advisory Panel Opinion No. 92-1, 627 A.2d 317 (R.I., 1993) (lawyer prohibited by Rule 1.6 from reporting fact that client's former lawyer had embezzled and subsequently repaid a substantial amount of his client's money); Ariz. State Bar Ass'n Comm. on Ethics, Op. No. 89-46 (1989) (client instruction not to report breach of fiduciary duty precludes reporting); Conn. Bar Ass'n Comm. on Professional Ethics, Informal Op. 89-14(1989)(in-house corporate lawyer may not disclose other corporate lawyer's misconduct if disclosure could be adverse to corporation's interests); Wis. State Bar Comm. on Professional Ethics, Formal Op. E-89-12, (1989)(disclosure prohibited if it would entail revelation of any client information, whether or not it would prejudice client). But see In re Himmel, 533 N.E. 2d 70 (Ill. 1989) (lawyer's failure to report another lawyer's embezzlement of client funds was grounds for suspension even though his knowledge of the embezzlement may have been protected as a client "secret"; reporting rule exempted only "privileged information"); Md. State Bar Ass'n Comm. on Ethics, Op. No., 89-36 (Feb. 14, 1989) (lawyer representing other lawyers must report their misconduct if he has actual knowledge thereof which has already been revealed to a court and, therefore, is a matter of public record); Philadelphia Bar Ass'n Professional Guidance Comm., Op. 83-23 (1988), (lawyer who receives communication directly from another party to a pending litigation alleging unethical conduct by that party's lawyer must report the information to the disciplinary board of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court. Confidentiality does not apply, as the information came from another party to the litigation, not from the lawyer's client.).

[5] Rule 1.3(b) states:

> A lawyer shall not intentionally:
> (2) prejudice or damage a client during the course of the professional relationship.

[6] We recognize that there is some support in the case law for an argument that a client waives his right to assert attorney/client privilege to the limited extent that specific facts are disclosed in public pleadings, filed by his lawyer at his direction. See, e.g., Industrial Clearinghouse, Inc. v. Browning Mfg. Div. of Emerson Elec. Corp., 953 F. 2d 1004 (5th Cir. 1992). However, we do not believe the case law interpreting the attorney/client privilege controls an attorney's ethical obligation to report another lawyer to disciplinary authorities against her client's wishes, since, as is made clear by Comment [6] to Rule 1.6, the protection afforded a client's confidences by Rule 1.6 is broader than that accorded by the evidentiary privilege, and "reflects not only the principles underlying the attorney-client privilege, but the lawyer's duty of loyalty to the client."

tice, this does not mean that the client cannot expect the lawyer to keep the matter confidential for other purposes.

In the instant context, our conclusion respecting the interaction of Rules 1.6 and 8.3 means that a client may ask his lawyer not to file a misconduct charge with disciplinary authorities where doing so would require the lawyer to disclose information gained in the professional relationship, even though he has previously authorized the lawyer to file a malpractice action based on that same conduct, and the lawyer has done so. Under these circumstances, the lawyer is under no obligation under Rule 8.3(a) to report the other lawyer and indeed would be precluded from doing so by Rule 1.6.[7]

Of course, if the client consents to disclosure, Rule 1.6 would pose no bar to reporting. And, in this regard, we note that the commentary to Rule 8.3 states that a lawyer should "encourage" a client to consent to disclosure, unless this would "substantially prejudice" the client's interests. See also Rule 1.3(b)(2), supra note 5. Accordingly, before seeking the client's consent, the lawyer has an obligation to disclose to the client her concerns about the effect reporting may have on his chances of ultimate recovery. The possibility that reporting would prejudice the client's case should be brought to his attention in seeking his consent to disclosure. If the client does consent, after having been made fully aware of the possible adverse consequences for his ultimate recovery, neither Rule 1.6 nor Rule 1.3(b)(2) bars reporting under Rule 8.3(a).

[7] We express no views on the desirability of this outcome as a matter of policy, although we appreciate the concerns expressed by Bar Counsel noted earlier in this opinion. See Procedural History, supra at 62. These same concerns were expressed by the Rhode Island Supreme Court in In re Ethics Advisory Panel Opinion No. 92-1, supra, 627 A. 2d at 323 (allowing Rule 1.6 to "trump" the obligation to report misconduct represents "a failure of the legal profession to regulate itself effectively," and "fuels the perception that . . . the legal profession is engaged in a coverup of attorney misconduct."). See also Olsson, Reporting Peer Misconduct: Lip Service to Ethical Standards is Not Enough, 31 Ariz. L. Rev. 657, 675 (1989). We are aware that some jurisdictions have promulgated a confidentiality rule that allows disclosure in a broader set of circumstances than is permitted under the District of Columbia's version of Rule 1.6. See 2 Hazard & Hodes, The Law of Lawyering, §§ AP4:103-AP4:105 at 1259-1266. However, given the broad protection afforded client confidences under the District's Rule 1.6, we feel constrained here to conclude as we do. The same result would appear to obtain under the ABA Model Rules, notwithstanding the different wording of Model Rule 1.6.

3. Violation of a Disciplinary Rule

Once the lawyer has concluded that she "knows" the relevant facts, and that her reporting will not require disclosure of information protected by Rule 1.6, she must satisfy herself that the conduct in question rises to the level of a disciplinary violation. Here, for example, the inquirer must believe that the other lawyer engaged in conduct clearly violative of her ethical obligation to represent a client competently and diligently, as required by Rules 1.1 and 1.3. Willful or unexcused failure to file within the applicable limitations period may well constitute a basis for sanctioning a lawyer for incompetence or neglect, or for prejudicing the client during the course of the professional relationship. So may representation without regard to or in spite of conflicts of interest among her clients. On the other hand, conduct that is merely negligent may not involve an ethical violation, particularly if there are circumstances that would excuse or explain the negligence. If the inquirer has doubts as to whether a disciplinary rule has been violated by the other lawyer, apart from the alleged malpractice claim, she probably does not have the requisite degree of certainty to activate her own ethical obligation to report under Rule 8.3(a).

4. "Substantial Question" as to Honesty, Trustworthiness or Fitness to Practice Law

Finally, even if a lawyer concludes that she has the requisite knowledge of another lawyer's clear violation of the Disciplinary Rules, and that she may reveal that knowledge without violating Rule 1.6, she is required by Rule 8.3(a) to do so only if the violation "raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer in other respects. . . ." This "significant limitation" on the reporting requirement means that "not all violations of the disciplinary rules must be reported, only the most serious ones." New York State Bar Opinion, supra at 8. The commentary to the Rule further explicates the basis for this limitation:

> If a lawyer were obliged to report every violation of the rules, the failure to report any violation would itself be a professional offense. Such a requirement existed in many jurisdictions but proved to be unenforceable. This Rule limits the reporting obligation to those offenses that a self-regulating profession must vigorously endeavor to prevent. A measure of judgment is, therefore, required in complying with the provisions of this Rule. The term 'substantial' refers to the seriousness of the possible offense and not the quantum of evidence of which the lawyer is aware.

Whether a particular violation of the disciplinary rules meets the "substantial question" test must be determined on a case-by-case basis, using "a measure of judgment" rather than a clear litmus test. Advisory opinions from other jurisdictions are somewhat helpful in this regard but suggest no bright line test. Compare Arizona Op. 87-26 (failure to file tax returns should have been reported), Alabama Op. 90-97 (same for misappropriation of escrow funds), and New Mexico Op. 1988-8 (same for attempt to bribe witnesses); with Illinois Op. 90-36 (threats to bring criminal charges to gain advantage in a civil suit need not be reported), Virginia Op. 962 (1987) (same for attempt to persuade clients to change wills to detriment of Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals), and Pennsylvania Op. 88-225 (same for failure to comply with statute of limitations).

It would seem reasonable to conclude that a one-time negligent failure to comply with a limitation period, without more, would not evidence a lack of fitness to practice law. Similarly, simultaneous representation of several family members with arguably conflicting interests in a personal injury context would not seem on its face necessarily to present a clear and serious violation of the disciplinary rules. In the end, however, it is for the inquiring lawyer to determine, in light of all the facts of the situation as she knows them, whether in her judgment a particular disciplinary violation raises a "substantial question" about another lawyer's fitness, so as to trigger her own ethical obligation to report it. It is and should be a solemn and unenviable task.

We note that the mere filing of the malpractice lawsuit does not relieve the inquirer from any independent obligation she may have under Rule 8.3(a) to report the conduct at issue to bar disciplinary authorities. This obligation is not satisfied by whatever public notice may be implied from filing suit in court. On the other hand, as noted previously, the fact that the lawyer has filed a lawsuit over another lawyer's misconduct does not relieve her of her obligations to keep client confidences under Rule 1.6, and in these circumstances the client's wishes still control.

Conclusion

On the facts outlined in the instant inquiry, we cannot determine conclusively whether all or indeed any of the four elements necessary to trigger the reporting requirement under Rule 8.3(a) are present in this case. The inquirer must herself decide, based upon the guidance herein provided, whether she has sufficient knowledge of the other lawyer's misconduct, whether that knowledge may be disclosed consistent with Rule 1.6 and Rule 1.3(b)(2), and whether the conduct at issue in the malpractice action also constitutes a clear violation of the ethics rules. Finally, assuming the inquirer concludes that a violation of the Rules has occurred, she must also decide whether the violation is sufficiently serious as to raise a substantial question about the other lawyer's fitness to practice law.

We stress that Rule 8.3(a) deals only with situations in which a lawyer is obligated to report another lawyer's misconduct, so that her failure to report will itself violate the Rules of Professional Conduct and subject her to disciplinary action. The Rule neither limits the circumstances in which a lawyer is permitted to make such a report (except where Rule 1.6 precludes disclosure), nor defines those situations in which reporting might be appropriate if not mandatory. In this regard, the New York State Bar Opinion, supra at 4, notes:

> A lawyer is always free to report evidence of what might constitute improper conduct by another attorney, subject to the obligations to protect client confidences and secrets. The lawyer need not have actual proof of misconduct; a good faith belief or suspicion that misconduct has been committed is a sufficient basis for making a report.

It should go without saying, of course, that it would be improper for a lawyer to make a report of misconduct and subject another lawyer to investigation without having a reasonable basis for doing so, or solely to gain a tactical advantage in a matter. See D.C. Bar Op. 220 (1991) (threats to file disciplinary charges solely to gain advantage in a civil matter violate Rule 8.4(g)). The inquirer did not ask the Committee's views about whether or not it would be permissible or appropriate in these circumstances for her to report the other lawyer's conduct, and we express none.

Whether Settlement Lawyer Selected by Real Estate Purchaser has a Sufficient Lawyer-Client Relationship with Seller to Warrant Disqualification; Conflict of Interest if Adverse Party Formerly was Represented by a Firm to Whom Lawyer Is "Of Counsel"

• When a lawyer who performed some services for both seller and purchaser in a residential real estate transaction did not notify the seller that he represented only the purchaser and did not specify his relationship to the seller, the lawyer should not represent the purchaser against the seller in a subsequent dispute concerning the sale. This disqualification is imputed to a lawyer who listed himself as "of counsel" to the real estate lawyer at the time of the transaction.

Inquiry

The Inquirer's firm shares office space with Lawyer A and Inquirer is listed on Lawyer A's letterhead as "of counsel" to Lawyer A's firm. The Inquirer has been asked to represent the purchaser of a house in a potential lawsuit against the seller. Lawyer A conducted the settlement of the house in question in 1983.

The standard form real estate contract used in the transaction gave purchasers the opportunity to select the real estate lawyer. At settlement, the sellers paid $100 of Lawyer A's "closing fee" and the purchasers paid $125. The purchasers also paid $100 to Lawyer A for a title examination. The sellers paid $90 to Lawyer A for notes and deeds of trust drafted for two $9000 trusts taken back on the property. The purchasers also paid $75 for the title abstract to the title insurance company. Lawyer A was the only lawyer involved in the transaction.

The "of counsel" designation and shared space arrangements between Lawyer A and the Inquirer have been in place from prior to 1983 through the time of the Inquiry. The Inquirer says that his relationship with Lawyer A always has been to render occasional advice on matters outside real estate practice and that he had no knowledge of the 1983 real estate transaction in question.

Lawyer A employs the receptionist in the office suite, and the Inquirer contributes a percentage of her salary. The single receptionist greets guests to the office and directs Inquirer's clients to him or to his secretary. She takes phone messages for the Inquirer and his partners in the secretary's absence. She answers Inquirer's phone number with the name of Inquirer's firm. She answers Lawyer A's separate phone lines as "Law Offices." She sorts mail and leaves it unopened for the Inquirer's secretary. The receptionist is the only employee of Lawyer A who does any work for the Inquirer or his firm. (In 1983, the receptionist was employed by the Inquirer's firm with a salary contribution from Lawyer A, but the office procedure was the same.)

Files are kept completely separate. The two firms are on different computer systems that are not compatible. The firms have different phone numbers but share a common fax machine. No fees are shared between the firms. The two firms have had tenant and subtenant arrangements on the lease as well as being joint tenants on the current sublease. The relationship has been solely legal advice on cases when useful and case referrals. At the beginning of the relationship, Lawyer A was a solo practitioner, and the three partners in Inquirer's firm were all "of counsel" to him. Today, Lawyer A has four associated lawyers, and Inquirer's firm has two lawyers after one's retirement.

In 1993, the purchasers in the 1983 transaction retained the Inquirer in a claim for damages against the sellers in the 1983 transaction alleging latent defects in the property. Lawyer A had referred them to the Inquirer on a zoning matter a couple of years after the 1983 closing. Inquirer had done a couple of hours work for the purchasers then. When the current dispute arose, Lawyer A again suggested that purchasers consult the Inquirer.

Inquirer's letter is accompanied by a letter from Lawyer A that recounts the following additional information. Before the purchasers retained the Inquirer, one of the sellers called Lawyer A and asked some questions. After some conversation, Lawyer A asked whom the transaction involved. When he was told, Lawyer A said that he remembered settling the property and still knew the purchasers. He said he would not discuss the matter further in any detail with the seller in that there was a dispute between the parties. He said that he assured the seller that he would not discuss his comments with the purchasers and would not represent them. He says he took this position because he preferred to err on the side of caution although he was not sure that he was disqualified from representing the purchasers based on the conversation or the past representation.

Lawyer A says that, in his opinion, he did not enter into a lawyer-client relationship with the Sellers that would have disqualified him from representing the purchasers. He characterizes his relationship to the sellers as "the fiduciary relationship to properly record documents of record and to disburse funds from escrow exactly as indicated in the contract and on the agreed-upon Settlement Statement." In a subsequent conversation, Lawyer A says that, as a settlement lawyer, he considers himself to represent the purchaser up through closing. Up to that time, he will act for the purchaser in a manner that might be adverse to the interests of other parties, e.g., advising them on how to break the contract. He says that he informs the purchaser that, once the point of closing is reached, he undertakes a fiduciary obligation to the other parties as well which requires him to prepare and record documents and other things necessary to properly effect the agreements. He says his relationship to purchasers never involves asking them for information or otherwise acquiring confidential information nor the provision of legal advice. He does not use informed consent waivers with real estate settlement clients nor distribute any type of written notice on his role and relationship to the parties.

The seller has challenged the Inquirer's representation. Inquirer asks if his "of counsel" relationship is sufficient to impute disqualification to the Inquirer from representing the purchasers in the 1983 transaction. In the alternative, he asks whether Lawyer A's relationship to the 1983 sellers was sufficient to create a disqualification of Lawyer A that could be so imputed.

Discussion

The inquiry raises four possible issues:

1. Does Lawyer A's relationship with the sellers in the 1983 real estate closing create a conflict such that he would be barred from representing the purchasers in the subsequent dispute over latent defects in the property?

2. If such a conflict exists for Lawyer A, should this conflict be imputed to the Inquirer who is listed as "of counsel" to Lawyer A's firm and shares space with Lawyer A?

3. Even if Lawyer A were not barred from representing the purchasers under the previous analysis, would he be barred because of the seller's 1993 phone call to Lawyer A?

4. If Lawyer A were barred because of the phone call, would this bar be imputed to the Inquirer?

Issue #1.

Numerous bar associations have opined on representation of multiple interests (buyer, seller, mortgagor, title insurance company) in real estate transactions, but our Committee has not commented previously. Some of these opinions from other jurisdictions also address representation if a subsequent dispute arises among the parties to the transaction.[1]

Representation in real estate transactions also has been discussed in cases concerning whether real estate closings conducted by settlement companies or other non-lawyers are the unauthorized practice of law. See In re First Escrow, Inc., In re Best Escrow, Inc., __ Mo. __, 840 S.W.2d 839 (1992), reviewing case law in multiple jurisdictions. In addition to reviewing these two lines of authority, the Committee heard from several lawyers experienced in residential real estate closings as part of its deliberation.

State Op. 576 (6/5/86) and Op. 611 (6/20/90); Pa. Op. 88-95 (undated); Philadelphia, Op.86-46 (4/10/86) and Op. 89-16 (6/16/89); S.C. Op. 86-9 (undated); Suffolk County, New York Op. 88-6 (undated); Tex. Op. 448 (9/11/87); Va. Op. 824 (10/9/86), Op. 1000 (11/12/87), Op. 1089 (6/8/88), and Op. 1149 (12/19/88); W.Va. , Op. 89-1 (undated).

There is debate about how the role of a single lawyer at closing should be characterized. 1. The lawyer is performing activities that are not the practice of law since the functions are also performed by non-lawyers. 2. The lawyer represents multiple clients (buyer, seller, and lender) with potentially differing interests. 3. The lawyer represents only one party (usually the buyer who has the contractual option to elect counsel) with fiduciary obligations that arise to the other parties at closing. These fiduciary obligations require that certain actions be taken, e.g., recording of documents, distribution of funds, but do not constitute a lawyer-client relationship with those other parties. 4. The lawyer functions as an intermediary between clients.

Lawyer A uses the third characterization to describe the 1983 representation. The seller disagrees and would choose the second characterization to describe the representation.

This inquiry does not ask for guidance on how lawyers in residential real estate closing should deal with the multiple parties involved. The Committee does not think it wise to address that question in an inquiry in which the matter comes up only indirectly. We do not reach a conclusion on which characterization(s) of the lawyer role in a residential closing are permissible and which should apply to the 1983 transaction involved here.

Without choosing among competing characterizations, we direct attention to provisions of Rules 2.2 (lawyer as intermediary for common clients) and 4.3 (lawyer who deals with an unrepresented person on behalf of a client). Both rules emphasize the importance of making the lawyer's role, duties, and non-duties clear when those matters could be misunderstood by multiple participants in a matter.

In this case, we understand that Lawyer A gave no oral or written notice that explicitly stated to the seller the lawyer's view that he represented the purchasers, not the sellers, and only had fiduciary obligations for completing the transaction to the seller. Lawyer A points out that the seller who has questioned the representation also is a lawyer. Lawyer A says that, when the second trust was needed, he asked the seller whether he wished to draft the trust himself, use another lawyer, or have Lawyer A produce one (for which he used a standard form from the federal insurer).

We do not speculate what the seller understood or should have understood about this matter, given his legal training. This opinion considers the relationship of the attorney to the parties in the 1983 transaction solely to determine whether under Rule 1.9 Lawyer A may represent the purchasers against the sellers in a substantially related matter. On that issue, we hold that, in the absence of a clear contemporaneous statement that Lawyer A represented only the purchasers and not the sellers, Lawyer A may not represent the purchasers against the sellers in a subsequent substantially related matter. Whether such an omission would be sufficient to impose duties on Lawyer A to the sellers in the 1983 transaction under other Rules will depend on the policies underlying those Rules. We express no opinion on such issues that may arise in future inquiries.

The Committee's consultation with residential real estate lawyers suggested that some lawyers routinely provide a written notice to parties explaining the lawyer's scope of representation, obligations, non-obligations, and course that will be followed if a dispute arises among the parties. This seems wise no matter which characterization of the relationship to multiple parties a lawyer assumes or which characterization a court might find to exist as a matter of law.

Issue #2.

Having decided that Lawyer A should not represent the 1983 purchaser against the seller in a substantially related matter, we reach the question of whether the Inquirer who is "of counsel" to Lawyer A also is disqualified.

Rule 1.10(a) says that

> [w]hile lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rules 1.7, 1.8(b), 1.9, or 2.2.

In the previous section, we declined to decide whether a single lawyer in a residential real estate closing should be characterized as representing multiple clients with potentially different interests governed by Rule 1.7, an intermediary among clients governed by Rule 2.2, or two other possibilities. We held that the lack of notice clarifying the lawyer's role with respect to the seller allowed sufficient ambiguity that Lawyer A should not later take on an adverse representation in a substantially related matter over the seller's objection. The relationship between lawyer and seller was sufficient to result in a disqualification under Rule 1.9. Since the relationship to the seller, absent clarifying notice, was sufficient to trigger a disqualification of Lawyer A, it is also sufficient to disqualify a lawyer "associated in a firm" under Rule 1.10.

We now turn to whether Lawyer A and the Inquirer should be considered "associated in a firm" within the meaning of Rule 1.10(a). Until now, Opinion 151 (1985) on fee splitting was our only statement on the implications of the term "of counsel." Opinion 151 held an of counsel relationship could be sufficiently like that of a partner or associate to permit fee splitting limited to "partners" and "associates" under the language of DR 2-107(A).

Here we consider whether lawyers who hold themselves out to the public as "of counsel" could be found to have a sufficiently distant relationship to avoid imputed disqualification under Rule 1.10(a). As Opinion 151 mentions, the imputed disqualification rule then in effect (DR 5-105(D)) explicitly extended imputed disqualification beyond partners and associates to "any other lawyer affiliated with him or his firm." Rule 1.10(a) hinges disqualification on whether lawyers are "associated in a firm."

Opinion 192 (1988) considers whether members of "associated" or "correspondent" firms should be disqualified for conflicts on this basis. The Committee held that these terms foster an impression of an "ongoing and regular relationship" and create the "reasonable impression attorneys in the firms will not represent conflicting interests."

ABA Formal Opinion 90-357 (1990) reasons likewise that the term "of counsel" holds out to the public a "close, regular, personal relationship" among the lawyers that is a "general and continuing" one. It holds that there "can be no doubt" that an of counsel lawyer or firm is "associated" for purposes of imputed disqualification under Model Rule 1.10 (as well as 1.11 (a) and 1.12 (c)).

Comment [1] to Rule 1.10 says that two practitioners who share space and occasionally consult will be regarded as a firm for purposes of the Rules if they hold themselves out to the public in a manner that suggests they are a firm. The previously cited sections of Opinion 192 and ABA Opinion 90-357 are consistent with our holding that an "of counsel" designation gives a public impression of a sufficiently close relationship among lawyers that they should be treated as if they were in the same firm for imputed disqualification analysis under Rule 1.10(a).[2]

Issues #3 and #4.

Having reached the previous conclusions on Issues #1 and #2, we do not reach Issue #3. As to Issue #4, if Lawyer A were disqualified on Issue #3 (the 1993 phone call with seller), the Inquirer would have been disqualified on the same reasoning on the "of counsel" designation discussed in Issue #2.

Inquiry No. 93-11-31
Adopted: May 24, 1994

Opinion No. 248

Whether Lawyer May Represent Multiple Plaintiffs Claiming Employment Discrimination in Selection of Other Person for Position They Sought

• A lawyer is not necessarily precluded from representing multiple candidates for the same position who claim that the selection of another was tainted by unlawful discrimination, provided that, after consultation about the other serious risks in such representation, the clients consent to any necessary limitation on the scope of the representation and the potential future need for separate representation, and that the lawyer will be able to zealously represent each client.

[2] This opinion imputes disqualification to attorneys sharing space because of their repesentations to the public. ABA Formal Op. 90-357 disapproves the use of the term "of counsel" for relationships involving an individual case, a forwarder or receiver of legal business, occasional collaborative efforts among otherwise unrelated lawyers or firms, or the relationship of an outside consultant. It lists four other situations where it deems the term to be properly applied. It does not discuss lawyers who call themselves of counsel on the basis of sharing space alone, but the implication is that would be considered ethically impermissible.

D.C. Op. 151 refers to the definition of "of counsel" as an "evolving concept." It cites, as one possibility, an of counsel lawyer who merely shares office space and other facilities. We do not reach whether Op. 151's approval of the term" of counsel" to describe an arrangement to share space should be reconsidered.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)

Inquiry

Lawyer has been approached by two people who applied for, but did not get, a job and who believe that the selection was based on prohibited discriminatory practices. In asking whether he can represent both plaintiffs, Lawyer states that to establish liability he need only prove that each plaintiff was better qualified than the person selected;[1] he does not address the subject of relief.

Discussion

The principal standard governing conflict of interest is Rule 1.7, which provides:

> (a) A lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a position to be taken in a matter if that position is adverse to a position taken or to be taken in the same matter by another client represented with respect to that position by the same lawyer.
> (b) Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if:
> (1) a position to be taken by that client in that matter is adverse to a position taken or to be taken by another client in the same matter;
> (2) such representation will be or is likely to be adversely affected by representation of another client;
> (3) representation of another client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the representation of another client;
> (4) the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibility to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.

Rule 1.7(c) permits representation under Rule 1.7(b) if:

> (1) each potentially affected client provides consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation; and
> (2) the lawyer is able to comply with all other applicable rules with respect to such representation.

"Full disclosure" requires "a detailed explanation of the risks and disadvantages to the client." In re James, 452 A.2d 163, 167 (D.C. App. 1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1038 (1983). Comment [12] to Rule 1.7 addresses the disclosure needed for consent:

> Adequate disclosure requires such disclosure of the parties and their interests in positions as to enable each potential client to make a fully informed decision as to whether to proceed with the contemplated representation. If a lawyer's obligation to one or another client . . . precludes making such full disclosure to all affected parties, that fact alone precludes undertaking the representation at issue. Full disclosure also requires that clients be made aware of the possible extra expense, inconvenience, and other disadvantages that may arise if an actual conflict of position should later arise and the lawyer be required to terminate the representation.

In addition, Rule 1.2(c) provides:

> (c) A lawyer may limit the objectives of the representation if the client consents after consultation.[2]

As the Court of Appeals recently explained, "Rule 1.7(a) mandates an absolute prohibition of dual or multiple representation when the lawyer would represent clients with 'adverse' 'position[s]' in the 'same matter.' Client consent cannot cure such a conflict." Griva v. Davison, No. 92-CV-992 (D.C. Ct. App. Feb. 10, 1994), 122 Wash. D.L. Rep. 441, pet. reh. pending.

However, Rule 1.7(b) outlines another category of cases in which dual representation is not absolutely forbidden. Comment [4] to Rule 1.7 elaborates, stating that under paragraph (b), if a lawyer would not be required to take adverse positions for two clients in the "liability phase" of a case, but might in the damages phase, the lawyer could agree to represent both in the liability phase and then one or the other in the damages phase.[3] However, Comment [5] cautions that the ability to continue to represent either party may be limited because the lawyer learns confidences or secrets protected by Rule 1.6, absent consent of the party who confidences or secrets are implicated.

The inquiry raises questions similar to those the Committee addressed in D.C. Bar Op. No. 131, concerning the prior Disciplinary Rules. There the Committee concluded that a firm representing a plaintiff class in a discrimination action against a federal agency could not also represent an employee-grievant at that agency in an unrelated administrative action to remove certain performance evaluations in the employee's file, including some prepared by a supervisor who was a class member in the other action. In ruling that such representation constituted a non-waivable conflict in violation of DR 5-105, the Committee concluded that success in representing the employee would amount to a successful attack on the supervisor/class member's judgment, and such a ruling could be used to deny the supervisor relief. Among the Committee's reasons were "the very real possibility that in representing the employee-grievant, the firm might (indeed, should) be reluctant to do what is necessary to succeed; that is, attack the judgment and actions of one of its clients, the unnamed class member." A further concern was "a very real danger that the inquiring firm may make disclosures of confidences of the employee-grievant in the course of representing the appraising official with respect to indi-

[1] We do not address the legal question whether Lawyer is correct in this premise.

[2] The Terminology section of the Rules defines "consent" as denoting "uncoerced assent to a proposed course of action, following consultation with the lawyer regarding the matter in question," and defines "consultation" as denoting "communication of information reasonably sufficient to permit the client to appreciate the significance of the matter in question."

[3] Comment [4] states in part:

> The absolute prohibition of paragraph (a) applies only to situations in which a lawyer would be called upon to espouse adverse positions in the same matter. It is for this reason that paragraph (a) refers to adversity with respect to a "position taken or to be taken" in a matter rather than adversity with respect to the matter or the entire representation. This approach is intended to reduce the costs of litigation in other representations where parties have common, nonadverse (or contingently or possibly adverse) positions with respect to other issues. If, for example, a lawyer would not be required to take adverse positions in providing point representation of two clients in the liability phase of a case, it would be permissible to undertaken such a limited representation. Then after completion of the liability phase, and upon satisfying the requirements of paragraph (c) of this Rule, the lawyer could represent either one of those parties as to the damages phase of the case, even though the other, represented by separate counsel as to damages, might have an adverse position as to that phase of the case.

vidual relief for her in the class action. . . Although the grievant could consent to disclosure of confidential information, the grievant would have little incentive to do so."[4]

Comment [4] to Rule 1.7 posits a clear bifurcation of proceedings into liability and damages phases which may or may not occur. While such a division has been common in employment discrimination cases in the past, the recent amendments to the Civil Rights Act permitting jury trials and compensatory damages create the prospect that one side or the other may benefit from and be entitled to insist on a unified trial of all issues, covering liability and relief.

The inquirer has not addressed the possibility that the clients' interests would be adverse as to relief. For example, the defendant might argue that, since there was only one opening and only one of the plaintiffs could have been selected, even if there were a violation only one plaintiff can be held entitled to the job or to back pay and damages. With or without bifurcation, moreover, the relief issues are likely to arise at any stage of the case in the context of settlement discussions, e.g., with respect to either compensation or an offer of a position.

Lawyer could not represent both plaintiffs under circumstances where it might be in the interests of each plaintiff to show that he or she rather than the other plaintiff would have been selected. Moreover, there is a substantial likelihood that, when issues requiring separate representation arise, Lawyer would have obtained information as to each client protected by Rule 1.6. It is thus difficult to see how Lawyer could conclude that representation of one client would not be "likely to be adversely affected by" representation of the other, or that the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of one client might not "be adversely affected by the Lawyer's responsibilities to . . . a third party," i.e., the other client. It also seems quite possible that Lawyer will end up having to take "adverse positions" for the two clients in the same matter (e.g., as to their relative qualifications). It is difficult to expect that, if any such potentially disqualifying conditions existed and were understood, the clients would provide informed consent to permit the same lawyer to represent their differing, competing interests as to relief. An alternative might be for Lawyer and the clients to limit the objectives of the representation to establishing liability, as permitted by Rule 1.2(c), but it is problematic whether that would often be feasible.

To satisfy the requirements of consultation or consent under Rules 1.2(c) or 1.7(c), Lawyer would have to explain the various ways in which the clients' interests could come into conflict, the possible hampering of both of their respective claims if they were to agree not to take conflicting positions, the possible added cost and disruption if it were necessary for either or both to get new counsel later, and the complications concerning compensation if a contingent fee were contemplated, etc. We note, moreover, that in Griva, supra, the Court of Appeals recently rejected a contention that, as a matter of law, consent to dual representation cannot be withdrawn when an actual conflict arises.

It is, of course, possible that Lawyer could represent both clients without having to take antagonistic positions: Lawyer's evident premise of bifurcated proceedings might prove correct; the plaintiffs might agree not to attack each other in the liability phase; both plaintiffs might lose in the liability phase; if they win, they might agree on joint representation with limited objectives to obviate a conflict, or on separate representation of one or both (assuming the complications as to fees could be resolved), etc. Accordingly, we are not prepared to say that Rule 1.7 precludes such representation.

Even if the clients provided meaningful consent to representation after Lawyer's full disclosure, Lawyer would still have to "comply with all other applicable rules with respect to such representation" of each client. Rule 1.7(c)(2). As explained in Comment [15] to Rule 1.7,

> Disclosure and consent to representation do not diminish a lawyer's obligations to comply with the other Rules of Professional Conduct. For example, even if a client provides informed and uncoerced consent, a lawyer may not undertake or continue a representation if the lawyer is unable to comply with the obligations regarding diligence . . . provided in [Rule 1.3].

Rule 1.3(a) states: "A lawyer shall represent a client zealously and diligently within the bounds of the law."[5] It is well-settled that this duty of zealous representation cannot be compromised, even with the consent of the client. Indeed, this Committee has concluded several times that the representation of a party — even with consent — would be improper where "the lawyer himself . . . conclude[s] that his ability zealously to represent th[at] . . . party (as required by Rule 1.3) would be compromised" by a conflict of interest. D.C. Bar Op. No. 226 (1992).[6] Thus, Lawyer will have to determine whether, in view of the scope of representation agreed to by the clients, his obligations to them will limit his ability to represent each of them zealously and diligently.

The Committee has doubts about whether a client, if adequately informed of the possible constraints on Lawyer's representation, would consent to such joint representation. The Committee also has concerns whether properly informed clients would agree to limit the scope of the representation in such a way that Lawyer could reasonably conclude that he would be able to satisfy his duty of [4] This opinion is not dispositive because of significant language differences between DR 5-105 and Rule 1.7. D.C. Rule 1.7 differs substantially from ABA Model Rule 1.7, which was itself a substantial revision of DR 5-105 and 5-101 (concerning "appearance of impropriety"). However, although the revision was intended to facilitate a somewhat wider range of multiple representation, the changes were intended largely to clarify, to eliminate ambiguity, and to apply objective rather than subjective standards, without necessarily changing the results in cases under the old Rules. Proposed Rules of Prof. Conduct & Related Comments as recommended by the D.C. Bar Bd. of Governors (Nov. 19, 1986) at 66-69 ("Yellow Book"); see Griva v. Davison, supra. In particular, Rule 1.7 does not expressly carry forward the requirement of DR 5-105 that it be "obvious" that the lawyer could provide "adequate representation" to both clients. However, Rule 1.7(c)(2) points in the same direction by permitting representation only if the lawyer "is able to comply with all other applicable rules." See Yellow Book, id.

[5] Rule 1.3 states more fully:

> "(a) A lawyer shall represent a client zealously and diligently within the bounds of the law.
> (b) A lawyer shall not intentionally:
> (1) fail to seek the lawful objectives of a client through reasonably available means permitted by law and the disciplinary rules, or
> (2) prejudice or damage a client during the course of the professional relationship.

[6] See also D.C. Bar Op. No. 210 (1990) ("The Committee has previously recognized that the obvious ability to provide adequate representation, which pursuant to DR 7-101 [the predecessor to Rule 1.3] must be zealous, is an independent requirement which must be met even though consent is provided."); D.C. Bar Op. No. 163 1986)(same); D.C. Bar Op. No. 49 (1978)(same).

zealous representation. However, the Committee does not believe that the possibility of such representation should be wholly precluded. But cf., Rule 1.7 Comment [16] ("It is much to be preferred that a representation that is likely to lead to a conflict be avoided before the representation begins, and a lawyer should bear this fact in mind in considering whether disclosure should be made and consent obtained at the outset.") Thus, Lawyer can proceed, but only with informed consent of all clients after they are fully informed of the possible risks, consequences, and costs of joint representation, including the risk that each client may need new counsel at a later phase of the proceeding, and that even with the clients' consent the court might disqualify Lawyer,[7] and only if he concludes that he can provide zealous representation to each client.

We note that the same problem can arise in a variety of contexts. While the particular issues may vary depending upon the governing laws, the nature of the claims, and the relief sought, the need for informed consent and the duty of zealous representation will always be present. Whether consent to joint representation will be permitted will depend upon the particular circumstances.

Lawyer Advertising

• Rule 7.1(a) permits truthful claims of lawyer specialization so long as they can be substantiated. Claims that a lawyer can help a client "when others cannot" are inherently incapable of substantiation and are prohibited by Rule 7.1(a)(2), as is a claim in a print advertisement that a lawyer "can help YOU."

Applicable Rule

• Rule 7.1(a)(Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services)

Inquiry

A practitioner has sent us draft advertising copy for the "yellow pages directory" and asks: "I would appreciate receiving a written opinion from the Ethics committee regarding the advertisement."

The inquirer does not draw our attention to any particular portion of or statement in the advertisement. The ad appears designed to fill half a page. It features a stylized Statue of Liberty in the lower left corner and a picture of the practitioner in the upper right. At the top of the ad, in display type, the ad states: "Nationally known IMMIGRATION attorney Can Help YOU Too!" The ad continues in smaller type:

> A visa application once denied, may be denied forever! You need an expert in immigration law. [The practitioner] knows the system and the people, so he can help you when others can't. In 28 years of practice, he and his associates have solved more than 2,150 immigration problems.
> [The practitioner] has made his reputation at the I.N.S! And has learned how to cut through red tape to speed your application. Simple cases and tough ones to . . . he knows where to turn.
> Fast, efficient, economical solutions to all types of immigration problems . . .

Under the practitioner's picture there is a statement "Call me now, I'll discuss your case with you by phone for FREE!" The ad states at the bottom "SE HABLA ESPANOL" and repeats this sentiment in the language and alphabets of three other countries. The ad also indicates that the practitioner has been "LICENSED SINCE 1963" and formerly was a government trial attorney.

Discussion

The portion of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct applicable to this inquiry is Rule 7.1(a), which provides:

> (a) A lawyer shall not make a false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services. A communication is false or misleading if it:
> (1) contains a material misrepresentation of fact or law, or omits a fact necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading; or
> (2) contains an assertion about the lawyer or the lawyer's services that cannot be substantiated.

Relevant commentary to this Rule states:

> [1] It is especially important that statements about a lawyer or the lawyer's services be accurate, since many members of the public lack detailed knowledge of legal matters. Certain advertisements such as those that describe the amou t of a damage award, the lawyer's record in obtaining favorable verdicts, or those containing client endorsements, unless suitably qualified, have a capacity to mislead by creating an unjustified expectation that similar results can be obtained for others. Advertisements comparing the lawyer's services with those of other lawyers are false or misleading if the claims made cannot be substantiated.

In determining whether the advertisement in question violates Rule 7.1(a), the primary test, therefore, is whether the advertisement, or any portion of it, is misleading.

The thrust of the instant ad is that the practitioner has become expert through experience in dealing with immigration law problems and that his expertise in dealing with the Immigration and Naturalization Service allows him to be "fast, efficient [and] economical." While such claims of special expertise are prohibited in some jurisdictions, the District of Columbia does not prohibit such statements. Indeed, the Court of Appeals, at the recommendation of the Bar, expressly rejected Rule 7.4 of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, which had attempted to regulate claims of specialization. Moreover, nothing in the commentary to D.C. Rule 7.1 suggests that the Court of Appeals intended to prevent statements claiming specialization or expertise in a particular area of the law. Accordingly, we conclude that statements of expertise in immigration law in the advertisement before us are not to be deemed inherently misleading even though such statements are to some extent incapable of substantiation.

The specific claim of expertise made in the ad does not appear to be misleading in fact. The basis of the claim of experience is disclosed in the ad, namely that the practitioner and his associates have handled 2,150 representations in I.N.S. matters over 28 years. As required by Rule 7.1(a)(2), this claim is capable of substantiation and, we assume, that the practitioner will, as he must, be able to substantiate this claim with documentation upon request by a client.[1] Therefore,

[7] To assure that there has been adequate consultation and consent, it may be advisable for the consent to be memorialized in writing. Cf., e.g., Doyle & Blumenthal, The Defendants' Perspective: Ethical Considerations in Representing and Counseling Multiple Parties in Employment Litigation, 10 Labor Law . 19, 38-39 (1994) (same consent).

[1] Similarly, we assume that the practitioner's claim to be "nationally known" can be documented.

in the absence of a factual record suggesting that this practitioner's claims of expertise are false or will be understood by the public to go beyond "what reasonably may be inferred from an evaluation" of this practitioner's stated years of practice and the number of INS cases he has handled, Peel v. Attorney Registration and Disciplinary Comm'n, 110 S. Ct. 2281, 2288 (1990), we have no reason to believe that this particular ad is inherently or potentially misleading in its claim of expertise.

We have more concern with two other matters. First, the statement that the practitioner "can help you when others can't" is precisely the sort of comparative claim that is prohibited by Comment [1][2] and Rule 7.1(a)(2), since it is incapable of substantiation. Second, practitioner's claim that he "can help YOU" is also misleading, since there is no way that such a claim can be accurate in the abstract and the practitioner cannot know whether or not he can help any client until some facts are known about the client's case.[3]

Whether the proposed advertisement is misleading in any other way, this Committee has no way of knowing. Here, we have no facts — hypothetical or real — concerning consumers' reactions to claims made in the ad, and we have no process by which we can ascertain whether the statements made in the advertisement are accurate or whether the public to which this advertisement is directed will be mislead in any material manner by the advertisement.[4] In the absence of specific proof that consumers would be mislead by the advertisement, it would be folly for this Committee to venture further guidance. Cf., e.g., Ibanez v. Florida Department of Business and Professional Regulation, ___ U.S. ___, No. 93-639, slip op. at 5 (June 13, 1994) (to regulate commercial speech, state must demonstrate that its concerns about such speech are "real and that its restriction will in fact alleviate them to a material degree," quoting Edenfield v. Fane, 507 U.S. ___, slip op. at 9).

[2] "Advertisements comparing the lawyer's services with those of other lawyers are false or misleading if the claims made cannot be substantiated."

[3] In reaching the conclusion that this advertisement violates Rule 7.1(a)(2) and is therefore prohibited, the Committee takes no position on whether Rule 7.1(a)(2) is itself constitutional as so applied.

[4] Under this Committee's charter from the Bar, we are to decide cases on hypothetical facts and, accordingly, this Committee has no factfinding authority or procedures. See Rule E-4 of the Rules of the Legal Ethics Committee of the District of Columbia Bar.

Duty To Turn Over Files Of Former Client To New Lawyer When Unpaid Fees Are Outstanding

- Assertion of a retaining lien on work product to secure payment by a former client of unpaid fees is disfavored and should be undertaken only where it is clear that all the conditions of Rule 1.8(i) have been met.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.8(i) (Lien on Client Files)
- Rule 1.16(d) (Termination of Representation)

Inquiry

From 1988 until 1993, Inquirer was a partner or counsel to a law firm in the District of Columbia, specializing in representing clients before the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). In 1993, he left that law firm and established a practice as a sole practitioner. Many of the clients served by Inquirer at his former law firm have "followed" him to his new sole practice and have authorized Inquirer to tell his former law firm that they instruct the firm to turn their files over to Inquirer. However, at least some of these clients have outstanding unpaid balances of fees owed to Inquirer's former firm.

Inquirer raises a number of questions as to whether particular types of documents in the files of clients with unpaid fees owed to the firm must be turned over to him, per the client's request, under Rule 1.16(d), or whether his former firm is entitled to withhold such materials as "work product" under Rule 1.8(i).

Discussion

The rules governing disposition of client files when a representation is terminated are reasonably clear. Under Rule 1.16(d) a lawyer is required to "take timely steps to the extent reasonably practicable to protect a client's interests" in connection with termination of representation, including "surrendering papers and property to which the client is entitled." Rule 1.16(d) also provides, however, that the lawyer "may retain papers relating to the client to the extent permitted by Rule 1.8(i)."

Rule 1.8(i), in turn, permits a lawyer to impose a lien (often called a "retaining lien") upon a client's files[1] to secure payment of fees — but only to a very limited extent. Under DR 5-103(A) of the Code of Professional Responsibility, in effect in the District of Columbia through 1990, lawyers were broadly permitted to assert a retaining lien on a client's files to secure payment of fees. But even this rule was interpreted narrowly by this Committee, which went so far as to suggest, in one opinion, that retaining liens should not be permitted. See D.C. Bar Op. 59 (undated), note 13. See also D.C. Bar Op. 119 (1988), in which we described the retaining lien as "an unattractive and potentially quite harmful tool."

These concerns were reflected in the adoption of the District of Columbia's version of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, effective in 1991. While Rule 1.8(j) of the ABA's Model Rules broadly permits the assertion of liens on client files to secure payment of fees, the parallel provision of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.8(i), is much narrower. It bars imposition of a lawyer's lien on a client's files, "except upon the lawyer's own work product, and only to the extent that the work product has not been paid for." Rule 1.8(i) further provides that the exception permitting a lawyer to withhold work product from the client does not apply when the client has become unable to pay the outstanding fee or when withholding the work product "would present a significant risk to the client of irreparable harm." As discussed in our recent Opinion No. 230 (1992), the comments to Rule 1.8(i) and its "legislative history" emphasize that surrender of all files to the client at the termination of a representation is the general rule, and that the work product exception should be construed narrowly. Thus, Comment [9] emphasizes that only "materials generated by the lawyer's own effort" are included within the work product exception and that not all work product can be withheld "merely because a portion of the lawyer's fees had not been paid." Similarly, Comment [10] notes that the possibility that a client "might irretrievably lose a significant right or become subject to a significant liability because of the withholding of the work product" constitutes irreparable harm, requiring that the work product be surrendered even if the fees are unpaid.

In sum, it seems clear to us that retaining liens on client files are now strongly disfavored in the District of Columbia, that the work product exception permitting such liens should be construed narrowly, and that a lawyer should assert a retaining lien on work product relating to a former client only where the exception is clearly applicable and where the lawyer's financial interests Opinion No. 59, "clearly outweigh the adversely affected interests of his former client." D.C. Bar Op. 59, supra.

With these principles in mind, we turn to the specific questions raised by the Inquirer.

The Inquirer asks first whether particular categories of client files fall within the work product exception of Rule 1.8(i). We agree with the Inquirer that files containing copies of applications filed with the FCC and amendments and correspondence relating to those applications — also filed with the FCC — are not within the work product exception. Regardless of their initial status, once such materials are filed with a public agency, they are not work product. Similarly, we agree with the Inquirer that files containing pleadings filed with the FCC and authorizations issued by the FCC do not constitute work product. We also agree that documents prepared by persons outside the law firm (e.g., pleadings filed by other parties, newspaper articles, press releases) and correspondence from the client or third parties to the law firm obviously do not constitute work product, since they were not prepared by lawyers or other personnel of the law firm. Finally, copies of correspondence previously sent to the client should not be withheld, in our view, even though such copies might technically be considered work product.[2]

On the other hand, we believe that materials such as drafts of pleadings, applications or other documents, notes of meetings and research memoranda and materials constitute work product eligible for the Rule 1.8(i) exception so long as they were prepared by a lawyer or other employee of the law firm.

The Inquirer also asks about the scope of the work product lien when a client, at the time of termination of the representation, has paid some but not all of the lawyer's or law firm's fees. As Comment [9] makes clear, not all of the work product can be withheld merely because a portion of the lawyer's fees has not been paid. Where the unpaid fees can be identified on a temporal basis, it is relatively easy to apply Rule 1.8(i): only work product produced during the period for which fees remain unpaid may be withheld. Thus, for example, if a terminated client has paid fees through 1992, and outstanding fees relate only to work done in 1993, the law firm may withhold only work product produced in 1993. Where the time period covered by unpaid fees cannot be clearly identified, the lawyer may withhold only work product that clearly has not been paid for.

Finally, the Inquirer notes that some of his clients have advised his former firm that, because of the Inquirer's "continuing need to respond to FCC inquiries and requirements in a timely fashion (in the client's behalf), your withholding any portion of the work product of the [client's] files would present a significant risk of irreparable harm to my interest." The Inquirer asks whether this assertion by the client is binding on the former firm, precluding it from invoking a Rule 1.8(i) lien on unpaid work product. We believe that, while such an assertion by a former client must be given great weight by the firm, it is not conclusive. A lawyer must make his or her own judgment as to whether the client will be irreparably harmed if the work product is withheld. Of course, the lawyer must give the client the benefit of the doubt if the question is a close one.

Safekeeping of Settlement Proceeds Claimed Both by the Client and a Third Person

- When both the client and a third person claim an interest in settlement proceeds held by a lawyer in his IOLTA account, the portion of the proceeds in dispute should not be disbursed to the client if the lawyer reasonably believes that the third party has a just claim to such portion. These disputed proceeds should be retained in the account until the dispute is resolved. Any undisputed portion of the settlement proceeds must be distributed promptly to the parties entitled to receive such portions.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.15 (Safekeeping Property)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)

Inquiry

The inquirer represents a client in a personal injury case who was treated at D.C. General Hospital. The District of Columbia Government paid the client's medical expenses. The litigation was settled favorably for the client and the inquirer has received the settlement monies. The District Government, under D.C. Code § 3-507, et. seq., [Health Care Assistance Reimbursement Act] has asserted a Medicaid lien over the settlement proceeds, seeking reimbursement of medical benefits paid by the District on the client's behalf. Following settlement, the lawyer requested the District to reduce the amount of its lien because (1) some of the amounts reflected in the lien were for charges unrelated to his client's accident-related injuries and medical care; (2) some of the accident-related charges were deemed excessive in a deposition given by the client's D.C. General Hospital treating physician; and (3) the lien is subject to compromise under D.C. Code § 3-507(b). Either the District has refused, or has not responded to, this request. Inquirer's client has asked inquirer to disburse all of the settlement proceeds directly to him. Inquirer notes that he expects his client to spend the money once it is received and asks whether he can, under the rules, hold the funds that are subject to the District's lien in his IOLTA account.

Discussion

Rule 1.15, Safekeeping Property, generally requires a lawyer to deliver promptly to the client or a third person any funds or other property that the client or a third person is entitled to receive.[1] Comment [4] to Rule 1.15 acknowledges that other parties "may have just claims against funds or other property in a lawyer's custody." The comment states further that the lawyer "may have a duty under applicable law to protect such third party claims against wrongful interference by the client, and accordingly may refuse to surrender the property to the client." In the case at issue, the District government has asserted a statutory lien over a portion of the settlement proceeds. District law provides that, after receipt of a notice of a perfected Medicaid lien (presumably the case here), if certain persons dispose of funds without paying the amount necessary to satisfy the lien, that person is personally liable for one year for any amount that the District is unable to recover.[2]

[2] If the lawyer wishes to keep copies of files sent to a former client, the lawyer must bear the cost of making such copies. See D.C. Bar Op. 168 (April 15, 1986).

Whenever the lawyer holds funds that he reasonably believes are subject to a perfected statutory lien, the lien should be considered to be a third party "just claim" against the funds held in the lawyer's custody, as that term is used in Comment [4] to Rule 1.15. Under such circumstances, the lawyer should refuse to disburse the contested settlement proceeds to the client. Instead, the lawyer should hold the disputed funds until the dispute has been resolved.[3] Of course, the uncontested portion of the proceeds should be promptly delivered to the client pursuant to Rule 1.15(b). Rule 1.15 and the comment thereunder recognize that, although the lawyer has a paramount obligation to the client, there may also be an ethical duty to third parties as to funds, in the lawyer's possession, to which the third parties may be entitled.[4]

In cases where the lawyer holds disputed funds, he may at the client's request attempt to resolve the dispute by negotiating with the party asserting the claim to the funds. Pending disposition of the disputed funds by an agreement of the parties or by court order, the inquirer must hold the contested proceeds pursuant to Rule 1.15(a). Upon request of the third party (or the client), the lawyer must render a full account as to the proceeds, subject to the confidentiality rules of Rule 1.6.

Conclusion

A lawyer may distribute to a client only those settlement funds that the client is entitled to receive.

Obligations of a Lawyer Appointed Guardian Ad Litem in a Child Abuse and Neglect Proceeding with Respect to Potential Tort Claims of the Child

• A lawyer who is appointed guardian ad litem in a child abuse and neglect proceeding does not have an obligation to initiate tort claims on behalf of the child. If, however, the lawyer/guardian ad litem identifies significant potential claims the child has against third parties, the lawyer is obligated to notify the child or those responsible for the child's care of the potential claims. When necessary to preserve these claims, the lawyer also is obligated to take reasonable steps to file notices that are required by statute.

A lawyer/guardian ad litem cannot enter into a retainer agreement in a tort action on the child's behalf or represent the child after the retainer is signed unless a proper third party represents the child's interests in that case.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
- Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
- Rule 1.4 (Communication)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest)
- Rule 1.14 (Representing a Client with a Disability)

Inquiry

Inquirer seeks advice on the authority and obligations of a lawyer appointed as guardian ad litem for a child in abuse and neglect proceedings with respect to potential tort claims arising in connection with the child's placement. For example, inquirer asks whether the lawyer must (or may) bring a claim for negligence on the child's behalf for injuries sustained from scalding water in a foster home in which the child has been placed as a result of the neglect proceedings.

Inquirer asks a number of subsidiary questions relating to injuries to the child resulting from someone's negligence. Inquirer asks whether the guardian ad litem can retain counsel, including herself or himself, and if so, whether approval of the child's parents must be sought and obtained. Inquirer also asks whether the guardian ad litem has immunity for improperly pursuing or failing to pursue a claim on behalf of the child.

Discussion

Inquirer presents questions of substantive law as well as questions of legal ethics under the Rules of Professional Conduct. The Committee only addresses the ethical questions, but must do so in the context of the role and authority of the guardian ad litem in child abuse and neglect proceedings in the District of Columbia.

Background: The Guardian Ad Litem's Role in Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings

The Superior Court has jurisdiction to adjudicate allegations of child abuse and neglect. The court has authority to alter the custodial placement of a child, terminate parental rights and take other actions designed to protect a child's well-being.

Where a child is alleged to have been abused or neglected, and proceedings

[1] Rule 1.15(b) states:

Upon receiving funds or other property in which a client or third person has an interest, a lawyer shall promptly notify the client or third person. Except as stated in this Rule or otherwise permitted by law or by agreement with the client, a lawyer shall promptly deliver to the client or third person any funds or other property that the client or third person is entitled to receive and, upon request by the client or third person, shall promptly render a full accounting regarding such property, subject to Rule 1.6.

[2] D.C. Code § 3-507 provides:

If after receiving notice of the lien under paragraph (2) of subsection (d) of this section a beneficiary, third party, or an insurer of a third-party tortfeasor disposes of funds covered by a lien perfected under this section without paying the District the amount of its lien that could have been satisfied from those funds after paying off any prior liens, that beneficiary, third party, or insurer shall, for a period of 1 year from the date the funds were improperly disposed of, be liable to the District for any amount that, because of the disposition, it is unable to recover.

The court concluded that the rule explicitly created ethical duties to third parties with respect to funds, held by the lawyer, to which the third parties may be entitled.

commence in Superior Court, the parent(s) or other involved adults are represented by counsel. In addition, the Court appoints "a guardian ad litem who is an attorney to represent the child in the proceedings." D.C. Code §16-2304(b).[1] See also Super. Ct. Neg. R. 27. The role of the guardian ad litem in neglect proceedings has been subject to a great deal of discussion in the legal literature.[2] As the District of Columbia Court of Appeals has observed, "[t]he definition of the precise roles of the attorney and the guardian ad litem is still evolving and not without difficulty." S.S. v. D.M., 597 A.2d 870, 877 (D.C. 1991) (footnote omitted). The Committee understands that, in the absence of a conflict, in the District of Columbia, the guardian ad litem acts as lawyer for the child.[3]

The responsibilities of the guardian ad litem are quite broad. The Practice Standards mandate that the guardian ad litem engage in ongoing review of the child's well-being and report to the court. The guardian ad litem is also expected to "ensure that realistic goals are set in the case and that appropriate time periods are set for reviewing progress toward those goals." Id. In the event of an order for termination of parental rights, the guardian ad litem is responsible "for following the case and scheduling in-court reviews to ensure that prompt adoptive action is taken." Id. In In re L.H., the court held that the guardian ad litem even had the authority to file a petition for termination of parental rights.

The duration of the appointment is open-ended. Although the appointment stems from a single judicial "proceeding" in which custody, an adjudication of neglect or termination of parental rights is at issue, D.C. Code §§16-918(b), 16-2304(b), the obligations deriving from the appointment may continue until the child turns twenty-one because of the duty to monitor the progress of the child and periodically report to the court. The Superior Court Rules governing the duration of the appointment reflect these expectations, and may be contrasted to the duration of appointment of lawyers for children in custody matters brought in domestic relations proceedings. As to the latter, Super. Ct. Dom. Rel. R. 17 provides that the appearance of an attorney is deemed to have terminated when a judgment or final order is entered from which no appeal has been taken. In neglect proceedings, by contrast, until the case is closed the appearance continues and withdrawal may only be accomplished with leave of court. Super. Ct. Neg. R. 27. Attorneys from Counsel for Child Abuse and Neglect have advised the Committee that a lawyer may act as a guardian ad litem for a child involved in neglect proceedings for many years.

1. Does the guardian ad litem appointed in the abuse and neglect proceeding have an obligation to initiate tort claims on behalf of the child?

No. Scope of representation is usually governed by agreement between lawyer and client.[4] Comment [4] to Rule 1.2(a) of the Rules of Professional Conduct, however, addresses situations where the scope of representation is determined in a fashion other than by lawyer-client agreement. Comment [4] states that "The objectives or scope of services provided by the lawyer may be limited by agreement with the client or by the terms under which the lawyer's services are made available to the client" (emphasis added). The comment goes on to give examples: a retainer defining the scope of representation, a legal aid agency limiting its work to certain types of cases and an insurer restricting representation to matters involving insurance coverage.

Thus, where a lawyer is appointed to represent an individual in a particular proceeding, the lawyer's obligation will be defined by the statute, regulation or orders governing the appointment. For example, a lawyer appointed for a criminal defendant is not required to represent the defendant with respect to landlord-tenant matters, nor even regarding alleged constitutional violations in connection with the defendant's conditions of confinement (except to the extent relevant to the disposition of the criminal charge itself). Here, the guardian ad litem is appointed to represent the child "in the [neglect] proceeding," D.C. Code §2304(b). However broad the responsibilities attendant to representation in those proceedings may be, the scope of the appointment nevertheless is limited to matters concerning custody and placement. In the absence of a statutory obligation to represent the child in other matters, then, we believe the lawyer has no ethical obligation to represent the child regarding other claims the child may have, including independent actions in tort, even for injuries inflicted during a placement made as a result of the neglect proceedings.

2. Does the guardian ad litem have an obligation to advise the child or responsible adults of potential claims against third parties the child may have?

A lawyer ordinarily is not required to provide advice about matters or potential claims not within the scope of the retainer agreement or appointment. In In-

[1] The statute provides, in relevant part:

> The Superior Court shall in every case involving a neglected child which results in a judicial proceeding, including the termination of the parent and child relationship pursuant to subchapter III of this chapter, appoint a guardian ad litem who is an attorney to represent the child in the proceedings. The guardian ad litem shall in general be charged with the representation of the child's best interests.
> The role and responsibilities of a guardian ad litem in other proceedings may differ.

[2] Some commentators argue that the guardian ad litem in a neglect proceeding should be an independent advisor to the court on the question of the child's best interests, while others contend that the guardian ad litem should advocate for the child in the same way as a lawyer represents any other client. Yet a third group take a view that where the guardian ad litem's assessment of the child's best interests is consistent with the child's wishes, the guardian ad litem should act as the lawyer for the child; if the views of the guardian and the lawyer conflict, the guardian ad litem adheres to the "best interests" standard, but another lawyer is appointed to represent the child. The question has been the subject of opinions of legal ethics committees, see, e.g., Ariz. Op. 86-13 Wis. Op. E-89-13 (1989), as well as discussion in the literature on child advocacy. See generally M. Soler et al., Representing the Child Client (1993).

[3] The Court of Appeals has noted that while the guardian ad litem is expected to make an independent investigation of and make a judgment about the child's best interests, so long as the views of the guardian ad litem and child coincide, the guardian ad litem acts is expected to "represent and advocate for" the child's best interests. In re L.H., 634 A.2d 1230 (1993); see also S.S., supra at 876. Counsel for Child Abuse and Neglect, a branch of the Family Division of Superior Court, has issued Practice Standards for Attorneys in Neglect Cases in the District of Columbia Superior Court. Those standards suggest that unless the guardian's assessment of best interests conflict with the child's wishes, the role of the guardian ad litem in neglect proceedings is as an advocate for the child

In the event that the guardian ad litem's assessment of the child's best interests conflict with the views of the child, the Practice Standards advise that counsel notify the court and ask that separate counsel be appointed. The court may appoint a second attorney to serve as the child's counsel, representing the child's views, while the guardian ad litem notifies the court of the his or her assessment of the child's best interests. In the Matters of A.S. and J.S., 118 D.W.L.R. 2221, 2227 n. 15 (Super. Ct. Oct. 11, 1990).

[4] Rule 1.2 appears to incorporate the substantive law that governs the lawyer-client representaiton agreement.

formal Opinion 1465 (1981), the ABA Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility addressed the question whether a public defender representing a criminal defendant on appeal has an obligation to advise the client of a potential civil claim for malpractice against the lawyer who represented the client at trial. The Committee held that the ABA Model Code neither prohibited nor required such advice. It noted that under Ethical Consideration 2-2 of the ABA Model Code,[5] which advises lawyers "to assist lay-persons to recognize legal problems because such problems may not be self-revealing and often are not timely notice," it is "proper" for appellate counsel to advise the client of a possible malpractice claim. The Committee found that there was no obligation, however, to do so.

The D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct contain similar advice. Comment [4] to Rule 2.1 notes that "In general, a lawyer is not expected to give advice until asked by the client." The Comment goes on to note, however, that "A lawyer ordinarily has no duty to initiate investigation of the client's affairs or to give advice that the client has indicated is unwanted, but a lawyer may initiate advice to a client when doing so appears to be in the client's interest." (Emphasis added.)

The circumstances here, however, are not ordinary. Although Comment [4] gives no clue when the lawyer has an obligation to initiate advice to the client even in the absence of a request for it, we believe this is one such circumstance. The unique role of the guardian ad litem in abuse and neglect cases leads us to conclude that if the lawyer for a child identifies significant potential claims of the child against third parties, the lawyer has the obligation to notify the child or those responsible for the child's care (and in appropriate cases, the court) of the potential claims and, when necessary to preserve them, take reasonable steps to file notices required by statute.

There exist a number of elements of the role of the guardian ad litem plays that lead us to this conclusion. The guardian ad litem is responsible for monitoring many aspects of the child's life under circumstances where others have been alleged to fail in that responsibility; because of the child's youth and isolation from the family, the guardian ad litem is likely to be the only possible source of legal advice available to the child concerning potential claims; and the duration of the appointment puts the guardian ad litem in a good position to make reasonable judgments about potential claims. The lawyer, accordingly, should exercise judgment whether investigation or action may be warranted and, if so, what steps should be taken.

This limited duty finds support as well from Rule 2.1, describing the lawyer's role as adviser, Rule 1.3, requiring diligent representation, and Rule 1.4, mandating communication with clients. Rule 2.1 provides that when representing a client, "a lawyer shall exercise independent professional judgment and render candid advice." As indicated above, this duty is generally limited to the matter in which representation is provided, but where there is no other likely source of advice, a narrow reading of the duty does nothing more than guarantee that rights will be lost.

Comment [8] to Rule 1.3 is also relevant. That Comment addresses the situation where, as here, the lawyer serves a client "over a substantial period in a variety of matters." In such circumstances, the Comment advises, "the client sometimes may assume that the lawyer will continue to serve on a continuing basis unless the lawyer gives notice of withdrawal." The Comment goes on to state that it is the responsibility of the lawyer to assure that the client understands the limits of the representation.

Finally, Comment [3] to Rule 1.4 states: "The guiding principle is that the lawyer should fulfill reasonable client expectations for information consistent with (1) the duty to act in the client's best interests, and (2) the client's overall requirements and objectives as to the character of the representation."

These comments, read together, suggest that the lawyer has an obligation at least to assure that colorable claims for compensation do not simply drift away because no one else is aware of them, especially in a situation where the child is unlikely to turn elsewhere for help. The guardian ad litem is responsible for understanding and reporting on the client's well-being during the pendency of the neglect proceeding and may be the only person who has knowledge of the potential claim or is in a position to take steps to protect the client's interests regarding the claim. The child can reasonably expect the lawyer not to allow strong claims to be abandoned. Accordingly, we believe the Rules impose an obligation to inform the child or responsible adult of potential claims for injuries the lawyer is aware of, and, where statutory notice requirements exist, to preserve potential claims the lawyer reasonably believes warrants preservation.

We stress the narrowness of this obligation to advise and to preserve. It is not a duty to investigate potential claims. Nor is it a duty to take steps to preserve all potential claims, but only those that come to the lawyer's attention and which the lawyer reasonably believes may be colorable. Nor, finally, is there any duty to provide representation in these matters. In all cases the lawyer is expected to exercise reasonable judgment whether the potential claims should be the subject of advice and preservation.

3. May the guardian ad litem appointed in the neglect proceeding initiate tort claims on behalf of the child?

When the guardian ad litem seeks to initiate actions beyond the scope of the appointment, the guardian ad litem's actions must be governed by the more general rules applicable to the representation of children. This Committee has not previously addressed these questions. Three rules in particular, Rules 1.2, 1.7 and 1.14, are especially relevant to the determination whether the guardian ad litem may proceed with a tort action on behalf of the child.

Rule 1.2 provides that the client and the lawyer mutually agree on the objectives of representation. Unless the child is too young to consult, the child's minority does not obviate the obligation to consult with the client concerning the bringing of a tort claim as an element of the normal lawyer-client relationship. Rule 1.14(a) provides:

> When a client's ability to make adequately considered decisions in connection with the representation is impaired, whether because of minority, mental disability, or for some other reason, the lawyer shall, as far as reasonably possible, maintain a normal client-lawyer relationship with the client.

Comment [1] to Rule 1.14(a) elaborates on the obligation to seek to maintain a normal lawyer-client relationship with a child or a person with a disability. It recognizes generally that "a client lacking in legal capacity often has the ability to understand, to deliberate upon, and reach conclusions about matters affecting the client's well-being." The Comment goes on to recognize that children "as young as five or six years, and certainly those of ten or twelve" are entitled to have their opinions concerning custody given some legal weight.

Rule 1.14 thus embraces research on child development suggesting that children often have the capacity to, and therefore should, participate in legal decisions affecting them. The extent of their involvement and decision-making role depends on the age and individual characteristics of the child. The lawyer therefore must make an assessment of the client's ability to participate, and "as far as reasonably possible", invite the child to make decisions about the potential claim. Rule 1.14(b) admonishes the lawyer to seek appointment of a guardian or take other protective action only if the lawyer "reasonably believes that the client cannot adequately act in the client's own interest." Thus, if the child is able to participate in the decision whether to bring a tort claim, she must be given an opportunity to do so in a manner appropriate to the child's age and stage of development.

If, after consulting with the child as appropriate, the guardian ad litem and the child agree that a tort action should be brought, may the guardian ad litem represent the child?

We believe that Rule 1.7 precludes the guardian ad litem from entering into a retainer agreement on the child's behalf and acting as lawyer for the child in tort actions unless an additional guardian ad litem is appointed for that case. Rule 1.7(b)(4) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client "where the lawyer's professional judgment could be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibility to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial interests."

The conflict in this situation is obvious, since in entering an agreement to represent the child, the guardian ad litem would be acting on behalf both of the child and on behalf of herself in a transaction where the lawyer's financial interests are directly at stake and are adverse to those of the child (e.g., what fee should be charged?). The situation is similar to the one this Committee considered in Opinion 156 (1985), where a guardian ad litem sought to consent, on behalf of the child, to simultaneous representation of the child and prospective adoptive parents. We observed there that the "lawyer cannot provide disinterested consent [on behalf of the child] to his own employment by the prospective parents." Similarly here, the guardian ad litem cannot consent on the child's behalf to bringing a case or entering a financial arrangement with the guardian ad litem. Further, post-retainer conflicts problems, e.g., making decisions in the litigation, particularly about settlement, preclude the guardian ad litem from acting as both guardian ad litem and lawyer for the child in the tort action. See Mich. Standing Comm. on Professional and Judicial Ethics Op. RI-213 (1994).

Accordingly, the guardian ad litem cannot consent, on behalf of the child, to her own retention to bring tort litigation on behalf of the child. Even if consent to proceed in the litigation has been obtained elsewhere,[6] the guardian ad litem cannot proceed in the dual roles of lawyer in the tort case and guardian ad litem in the abuse or neglect case[7] unless another decision-maker is available to direct the litigation in the tort case. This requires a third party decision maker, e.g., a parent, a guardian ad litem separately appointed for that tort case, or referral to another lawyer for the tort litigation. Even with third party participation, the guardian ad litem who proceeds with representation in the tort case must be vigilant about potential conflicts between representation in the tort litigation and responsibilities as guardian ad litem in the abuse and neglect case. Without additional facts, we are not prepared to say that the potential conflicts in the two roles require a per se rule precluding representation in both proceedings so long as a separate guardian ad litem is appointed for the tort case.[8] The consequences of a per se rule, moreover, would be to further limit access to legal representation to children who already have the greatest difficulty obtaining counsel. In addition, the guardian ad litem is likely to be in the best position to learn the facts of the alleged tort action and make appropriate judgments about its chances of success and financial value.

4. If the lawyer acting as guardian ad litem brings a case on behalf of the child, does he or she have immunity for improperly pursuing or failing to pursue a claim for legal action on behalf of the child?

This question is one of substantive law beyond the purview of the Committee.

Referral Fee Arrangement Between Law Firms and Insurance Companies

• A law firm that (1) pays an insurance company a referral fee for clients referred from the company, (2) subleases office space on the premises of the insurance company, and (3) maintains a line of credit from the principals of the insurance company, may satisfy Rule 7.1, which requires that the potential client be informed of payments made to intermediaries, by disclosing these facts, but still not satisfy Rule 1.7, which sets forth the more detailed disclosure required when potential conflicts of interest exist. Moreover, even if the disclosure satisfied the rigorous requirements of Rule 1.7, and even if the client provided meaningful consent to the arrangement as would be required by Rule 1.7, the law firm would not be able to provide the zealous representation required by Rule 1.3 in cases involving a direct conflict of interest between the insurance company and the referred client.

[6] See also Superior Court Civil Rule 17(c), governing bringing suits on behalf of children. Whether the parents need to be involved in the decision is a matter of substantive law that the Committee does not address.

[7] Ethics committees in other jurisdictions have opined that to act as guardian ad litem and lawyer does not pose an inherent conflict, but these opinions did not address the special problems in tort cases. Wis. Legal Ethics Op. E-89-13 (1989), Ariz. Ethics Comm. Op. 86-13 (1986).

N.Y. State Bar Ass'n Ethics Op. 648 (1993), decided under the Model Code's "appearance of impropriety" standard, advised that law guardians, the equivalent of guardians ad litem here, should "take particular care to avoid even the appearance that he or she has taken advantage of the fiduciary relationship between guardian and child to obtain valuable subsequent employment as counsel."

Inquiry

The inquiring lawyer represents a Law Firm that proposes to pay an Insurance Company for clients the Company referred to the Firm. Payment would be due upon settlement or judgment in the referred cases and would be based upon a fee of $300 for each of the first three hundred cases referred, $425 for each of the next hundred cases, and $500 per case thereafter. In addition, the Insurance Company offered to sublease office space on its premises to the Law Firm for use as a satellite office and to arrange for a line of credit from principals of the Company to the Law Firm.

The Insurance Company provides liability insurance to members of a specific industry in which civil claims for damages are common. The Insurance Company's liability plan covers claims made against industry members, but does not cover claims made by industry members. Nonetheless, industry members often ask the Insurance Company to help them select a lawyer to handle cases in which they intend to assert, rather than, defend against, a claim.

As part of the contemplated referral process, the Insurance Company would advise potential Law Firm clients of (1) the advisability of consulting legal counsel, (2) their right to seek legal counsel of their own choice, and (3) the availability of counsel in the Law Firm's satellite office on the Insurance Company's premises. The Insurance Company would also provide such potential clients with a brochure to be produced by the Law Firm; the Law Firm would be responsible for the brochure's compliance with Rule 7.1(a) of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules" or "Rules"). Upon contacting the Law Firm, each referred client would receive written disclosure concerning the referral fee plan, the sublease arrangement, and the line of credit. This written notice would also include a statement that payment of the referral fee (which would be paid by the firm from its percentage contingency fee) would have no effect on the total fee charged to the client.

The inquirer framed the request as an inquiry under D.C. Rule 7.1, which governs the use of intermediaries in soliciting business for lawyers. While Rule 7.1 is relevant, it is not independent of the other Rules, and the inquiry also implicates D.C. Rule 5.4(a) dealing with the sharing of legal fees with nonlawyers; D.C. Rule 1.7 relating to conflicts of interest; and D.C. Rule 1.3 setting forth the duty of zealous representation.

Discussion

A. Rules 5.4 and 7.1

D.C. Rule 5.4 flatly prohibits lawyers from sharing legal fees with nonlawyers (except in a limited situation not applicable here). However, without any reference to Rule 5.4, Rule 7.1(b)(5) allows a lawyer to pay an intermediary to solicit clients if the lawyer takes > reasonable steps to ensure that the potential client is informed of (a) the consideration, if any, paid or to be paid by the lawyer to the intermediary, and (b) the effect, if any, of the payment to the intermediary on the total fee to be charged.

There is therefore considerable tension between D.C. Rule 5.4, which prohibits lawyers from sharing fees with nonlawyers, and D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(5), which recognizes that lawyers may pay intermediaries for referrals. This tension is alleviated in the Model Rules of Professional Conduct ("Model Rules") because Model Rule 7.2(c) absolutely prohibits a lawyer from "giv[ing] anything of value to a person for recommending the lawyer's services," except that a lawyer may "pay the usual charges of a not-for-profit lawyer referral service or legal service organization." In adopting the D.C. Rule 7.1, the D.C. drafters > decided not to retain the prohibition in ABA proposed Rule 7.2(c) concerning the use of paid intermediaries to contact prospective clients. ... The Board of Governors agreed that the ABA's prohibition against paid intermediaries should not be retained, but added, in subparagraph (b)(5), certain disclosure requirements. ... The use of paid intermediaries may assist lawyers in making their availability known to those who might not otherwise be able to secure the legal representation they desire. Proposed D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, Comment [17] to Rule 7.1 (Nov. 19, 1986).

While commentary to the Proposed D.C. Rules does not specifically address how replacing Model Rule 7.2(c) with D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(5) – thereby allowing lawyers to pay referral fees to intermediaries – can be reconciled with Rule 5.4's prohibition against sharing legal fees with nonlawyers, it is our view that D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(5) was intended to be a narrow exception to Rule 5.4. Therefore, only those lawyers who disclose to their clients the information required under Rule 7.1(b)(5) can escape Rule 5.4's general ban against the sharing of legal fees with nonlawyers.

The Law Firm in this inquiry would satisfy all the requirements of D.C. Rule 7.1(b)(5) by disclosing information on the referral fee, the sublease arrangement, and the line of credit, along with the statement that the payment of the referral fee would have no effect on the total fee for the client. Because the inquiry states that the Law Firm intends to make all of these required disclosures, the referral arrangement between the Insurance Company and the Law Firm would not run afoul of D.C. Rule 7.1.[1] Yet the analysis does not end here. Rule 7.1 does not address the more complicated situation where the lawyer and the intermediary have a business relationship that could lead to a conflict of interest between the lawyer and the referred client. For guidance in this case, we must consider Rule 1.7 dealing with conflicts of interest.

B. Rule 1.7

Resolving the issues arising under Rules 5.4 and 7.1 does not resolve the question whether the proposed business relationship between the Insurance Company and the Law Firm would hinder independent and aggressive legal representation in situations where the referred client's interests conflict with the Insurance Company's interests within the meaning of D.C. Rule 1.7(b)(4). Generally, insurance companies agree to pay for a lawyer to represent the insured for claims on which the insurance company may be liable; in exchange, the insured agrees to relinquish his right to control

[1] Of course, if the consideration paid by the lawyer to the intermediary who referred the client has any effect on the total fee that the lawyer charges to the client, then the referral fee would have to be "reasonable" pursuant to D.C. Rule 1.5. This is not a concern in the present inquiry because we are assuming that the Law Firm would pay the Insurance Company from its percentage of the contingency fee, so the referral fee would have no effect on the total attorney's fee charged to the client and that the Law Firm bases its contingency fee on well-established standards within the profession.

the defense and settlement process.[2] In this typical situation, the insurance company usually hires one attorney to represent both itself and the insured.

There are, however, situations where it would be inappropriate for one attorney to represent both the insurance company and the insured policyholder, including where: (1) the insurer takes the position that its policy does not cover the claim; (2) a potential conflict of interest exists between the insurer and the insured;[3] or (3) the insurer represents two or more insureds with potentially adverse interests.[4] The inquiry does not contemplate that the Law Firm will represent the Insurance Company on any of the latter's matters so that these situations, which concern conflicts of interests between clients, are not directly applicable. Rule 1.7(b)(4) nonetheless forbids, except as permitted through disclosure and consent, a lawyer from representing a client when the lawyer has financial or business interests in a third party (here the Insurance Company) that "reasonably may" adversely affect the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client,[5] notwithstanding the fact that the third party Insurance Company will not also be a client of the Law Firm.

The referral arrangement at issue here anticipates a mutually beneficial long-term relationship between the Law Firm and the Insurance Company: the Company does not receive maximum benefits until the 401st referred case. Moreover, the Law Firm further commits to the relationship by renting office space on the Insurance Company's premises. Such a plan involves substantial commitments between the Insurance Company and the Law Firm, with business incentives for the Law Firm to please the Insurance Company on its handling of referred claims. A lawyer's judgment may be adversely affected, as defined in Rule 1.7(b)(4), by conflicts between the Insurance Company and a referred policyholder, which may arise in the following ways.

According to the inquiry, the Insurance Company intends to refer to the Law Firm for legal consultation current policyholders who belong to a specific industry in which civil claims for damages are common.[6] It is likely that such a policyholder would ask for referrals from the Insurance Company regarding disputes arising out of the policyholder's business, which might include matters for which the policy issued by the Insurance Company arguably should provide coverage or legal representation. This might lead to a direct conflict by requiring the Law Firm to decide whether the policy requires the Insurance Company to provide coverage and/or legal representation and to press those claims against the Insurance Company should they prove meritorious. For instance, counsel for a policyholder in a case involving denial of coverage by the Insurance Company would have to confront the Insurance Company on the issue of whether the policy properly covered the policyholder's claim.

Moreover, where the Insurance Company insures two or more policyholders with adverse interests, counsel for a referred policyholder might be obliged to press the claim that the Insurance Company should pay for independent legal representation on behalf of the policyholder.

In addition, many such referrals from the Insurance Company likely touch upon the policyholder's business, for which the Insurance Company provides liability insurance. They thus present the threat of a counterclaim alleging liability on the part of the client that might trigger the Insurance Company's duty to defend and provide coverage under the policy and possibly necessitate a third-party action against the referring Insurance Company. For instance, a policyholder might seek a referral in order to press a claim, for which the liability policy issued by Insurance Company would not provide coverage. If the policyholder's claim arises out of its business activities, however, the threat exists that the defendant may file a counterclaim triggering coverage under the policy. These kinds of cases would necessarily involve a direct conflict of interest that could tempt the attorney to balance the client's interest in receiving coverage and being the beneficiary of the company's duty to defend against those of the Insurance Company in denying coverage and/or a duty to defend.

There may be situations when client referrals from the Insurance Company to the Law Firm would involve no direct conflicts of interest. For instance, an art insurance company that insures only rare paintings could refer one of its customers to a law firm with which it had entered into the proposed referral arrangement to pursue a medical malpractice claim. Because the subject of the proposed representation would bear no relationship to any coverage provided by the insurer, there is no possibility that the suit would involve claims, counterclaims or third-party claims that might trigger coverage provided by the insurance company. We suspect, however, that these kinds of referrals would be very uncommon because [2] "Liability insurance policies typically provide that the insurer (the company) will pay any judgment for damages entered against the insured and will bear the cost of providing a defense against a claim for damages, including the cost of hiring a lawyer to present the interests of the insured. In return for those protections, the company typically retains the right to control the defense of the action and the decision whether to settle any claims." Charles W. Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics 428 (1986).

Bar Op. 173 (1986) ("[T]he lawyer cannot continue to represent the insured where the insurer has a different interest and the lawyer's performance for the insured will be affected adversely by that different interest, unless each client consents after full disclosure and it is 'obvious' the attorney adequately can perform.")(citation omitted).

The following list describes other situations where the interests of the insurer and insured interests may be adverse:

1. Complaint alleges claims against the insured which may or may not potentially fall within the insurance policy;

2. Potential damages exceed insurance policy limitations;

3. The insurer has provided inadequate representation for the insured;

4. A conflict of interest arises between the insured and the insurer in settlement negotiations.

The D.C. courts have not ruled on whether the insurance company must reimburse insureds who are entitled to and do obtain independent counsel. With the law ambiguous, D.C. insurance companies may require the policyholder to pay for independent counsel. The Committee takes no position on this practice at this time.

(b) Except as permitted by paragraph (c) below, a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if:

(4) The lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interest.

[6] The inquiry does not specify the precise nature of the cases that the Insurance Company would refer to the Law Firm, but because the facts indicate that the Insurance Company intends to refer clients in the specific industry who are also policyholders, we discuss only situations involving clients referred to the Law Firm who are also policyholders.

insurance companies would not generally have the expertise to select lawyers for claims completely unconnected to matters for which the insurers provide coverage.[7]

If the conflict is direct, 1.7(c)(1) nonetheless permits a lawyer to represent a client if that client consents after "full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation."[8] This "full disclosure" goes far beyond the cursory disclosure requirements of Rule 7.1(b)(5). Full disclosure requires "a detailed explanation of the risks and disadvantages to the client." In re James, 452 A.2d 163, 167 (D.C. App. 1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1038 (1983).

The Law Firm in this inquiry would not meet the strict disclosure requirements of Rule 1.7. To understand the nature and extent of a possible conflict, a referred client must know whether the firm receives a substantial amount of business pursuant to a referral agreement with an adversary or potential adversary, such as the Insurance Company. That information should at the very least include the percentage of the Law Firm's total income derived through referrals from the Insurance Company. The Law Firm does not propose to reveal to the referred client this or other relevant information concerning the referral arrangement.

Furthermore, after full and meaningful disclosure, Rule 1.7(c)(1) requires the client to consent to representation from the lawyer despite the potential conflict of interest. See, e.g., In re James, 452 A.2d at 167; see also D.C. Bar Op. 210 (1990). Consent "must not be coerced either by the lawyer or by any other person." D.C. Rule 1.7, Comment [14]. Even if a referred client provided meaningful consent to representation after the Law Firm's full detailed disclosure of the potential conflict of interest, the Law Firm would still have to "comply with all other applicable rules with respect to such representation" of the referred client. Rule 1.7(c)(2). As explained in Comment [15] to Rule 1.7:

> [D]isclosure and consent to representation do not diminish a lawyer's obligations to comply with the other Rules of Professional Conduct. For example, even if a client provides informed and uncoerced consent, a lawyer may not undertake or continue a representation if the lawyer is unable to comply with the obligations regarding diligence ... provided in Rule 1.3.

D.C. Rule 1.3(a) states: "A lawyer shall represent a client zealously and diligently within the bounds of the law."[9] It is well-settled that this duty of zealous representation cannot be compromised, even with the consent of the client. Indeed, this Committee has concluded several times that the representation of a party – even with consent – would be improper where "the lawyer himself conclude[s] that his ability zealously to represent th[at] party (as required by Rule 1.3) would be compromised" by a conflict of interest. D.C. Bar Op. 226 (1992). See also D.C. Bar Op. 210 (1990) ("The Committee has previously recognized that the obvious ability to provide adequate representation, which pursuant to DR 7-101 [the predecessor to Rule 1.3] must be zealous, is an independent requirement which must be met even though consent is provided."); D.C. Bar Op. 163 (1986) (same); D.C. Bar Op. 49 (1978) (same).

In cases involving a direct conflict, the Law Firm's proposed arrangement with the Insurance Company necessarily raises a serious obstacle to the zealous representation of referred clients. Use of the referral scheme in such situations raises the same concerns as in a case where an insurance company appoints counsel to represent a policyholder to avoid a potential conflict between the insurance company and the policyholder. In such cases, "[a]lthough [some] courts seem to trust the insurer and attorney to act in the best interests of the insured, the more common view is that the longstanding ties that defense counsel has with the insurer will inevitably influence his conduct of the case." Berg, Losing Control of the Defense – The Insured's Right to Select His Own Counsel, 26 For the Defense 10, 15 (July 1984).[10]

In short, the Law Firm would always be tempted to sacrifice the client's interests due to the Firm's long-term financial relationship with the Insurance Company in any matter involving a direct conflict between a potential client and the Insurance Company. We therefore conclude that when the referred client's interests in the matter for which representation is sought involves conflicts with the interests of the Insurance Company, the Law Firm cannot provide the zealous representation required by Rule 1.3.[11]

[7] Cases where a referred client's action falls completely outside of the Insurance Company's field of coverage could still involve "positional" conflicts of interest. Positional conflicts arise where a lawyer's clients hold different views on what the law or public policy ought to be, even though the clients' interests and positions do not clash in a particular matter. For instance, in our example involving rare paintings and medical malpractice, the referring art insurance company might favor an interpretation of the law on punitive damages that would conflict with the position beneficial to the referred medical malpractice claimant. Four sources discussing positional conflicts at greater length, see, e.g., Model Rule 1.7; ABA Formal Op. 93-377 (Dec. 9, 1993).

[8] D.C. Rule 1.7(c) reads:

> "(c) A lawyer may represent a client with respect to a matter in the circumstances described in paragraph (b) above, if:
> (1) Each potentially affected client provides consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation; and
> (2) The lawyer is able to comply with all other applicable rules with respect to such representation."

[9] Rule 1.3 states more fully:

> (a) A lawyer shall represent a client zealously and diligently within the bounds of the law.
> (b) A lawyer shall not intentionally:
> (1) fail to seek the lawful objectives of a client through reasonably available means permitted by law and the disciplinary rules; or
> (2) prejudice or damage a client during the course of the professional relationship.

[10] See, e.g., Bohna v. Hughes, Thorsness, Gantz, Powell & Brundin, 828 P.2d 745, 749-50 (Alaska 1992) (appointed counsel proposed to put insured through bankruptcy in order to reduce insurer's liability to plaintiff); San Diego Navy Fed. Credit Union v. Cumis Ins. Soc'y, Inc., 208 Cal. [11] The Committee is aware that the D.C. Court of Appeals is considering a proposal to amend the D.C. Rules. See Proposed Amendments to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct Review Committee, F. Whitten Peters, Chair (Dec. 8, 1993). The proposed amendments would delete Rule 1.7(c)(2) and would add commentary to Rule 1.3 stating that "Rule 1.3 is not meant to govern conflicts of interest." Under these Proposed Amendments, a Law Firm that obtains the consent

Conclusion

Although the Law Firm in this inquiry would satisfy the disclosure requirements of D.C. Rule 7.1, it would fall short of the more demanding disclosure required by Rule 1.7 in cases of direct conflict. Moreover, even if the client provided meaningful consent under Rule 1.7, this would not cure the Law Firm's inability to provide the zealous representation required by Rule 1.3 in cases of direct conflict. The Committee believes that, when referrals will be on behalf of policyholders whose business activities are covered by the Insurance Company's liability insurance, the Law Firm's ability to accept such referrals would be limited by D.C. Rule 1.7 and D.C. Rule 1.3.

Opinion No. 254

Use of Abbreviations by Limited Liability Companies, Limited Liability Partnerships and Professional Limited Liability Companies

• In light of recent legislation that has been adopted in the District of Columbia, law firms organized as limited liability companies, limited liability partnerships, or professional limited liability companies are no longer limited to using the designation, "limited liability company", "limited liability partnership", or "professional limited liability company", as the case may be, as the last words of their formal name. These companies may now alternatively use the abbreviations "L.L.C.", "L.L.P.", or "P.L.L.C.", respectively.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 7.1(a) (Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services)
• Rule 7.5(a) and (b) (Firm Names and Letterheads)

Inquiry

In 1993, this Committee adopted Opinion No. 235, which permitted D.C. Bar members to practice in local offices of out-of-state firms that were organized under state law as "limited liability companies" or "registered limited liability partnerships." Because these forms of business organization were foreign to this jurisdiction, however, the Committee concluded that the formal name under which these law firms practice must identify in full, not merely by abbreviation, the limited liability business form.

Since Opinion No. 235 was adopted, the Registered Limited Liability Partnership Amendment Act and the Limited Liability Company Act of 1994 have been enacted in the District of Columbia. Numerous lawyers have contacted the Committee to determine whether it remains necessary to identify their form of business organization in full or if abbreviations are now acceptable.

Discussion

In Opinion No. 235, the Committee stated "[t]here may come a time in the not too distant future when, either by District of Columbia Council action, or otherwise, the implications of the abbreviation 'L.L.P.' [or 'L.L.C.'] will be as well understood as the implications of the historically more common abbreviations 'P.C.' or 'P.A.', but until that time comes we are not disposed to approve the use in the District of Columbia of the abbreviation." In October 1993, the Registered Limited Liability Partnership Amendment Act was enacted in the District of Columbia.[1] D.C. Code §41-144 states that "[t]he name of a registered limited liability partnership shall contain the words 'Registered Limited Liability Partnership' or the abbreviation 'L.L.P.' as the last words or letters of its name." (emphasis added).

More recently, on May 3, 1994, the District of Columbia Council passed the Limited Liability Company Act of 1994.[2] Under D.C. Code § 29-1304, "a limited liability company name shall contain the words 'limited liability company' or the abbreviation 'L.L.C.'" (emphasis added). The Limited Liability Company Act of 1994 also provided guidance for "professional limited liability companies" which are limited liability companies organized solely for the purpose of rendering professional services through its members, managers, or employees. Pursuant to D.C. Code §29-1304, a "professional limited liability company name shall contain the words 'professional limited liability company' or the abbreviation 'P.L.L.C'." (emphasis added)

In light of these recent legislative enactments, we see no reason to disallow the use of the abbreviations, "L.L.P.", "L.L.C.", or "P.L.L.C." Therefore, the Committee revises its position taken in Opinion No. 235 regarding the use of abbreviations by law firms organized under limited liability statutes. A law firm so organized will satisfy the requirements of Rules 7.1(a), and 7.5(a) and (b) by identifying its form of business organization either in full or by use of the appropriate abbreviation.

Use Of Former Firm Lawyer On A Contract Basis

• A law firm and a former firm lawyer employed by the firm by contract on a case-by-case basis are not regarded as a single entity for conflicts purposes so long as clients of the firm are accurately informed about the nature of the relationship between the firm and the contract lawyer and so long as no impression is created that there is a continuing relationship between the firm and the lawyer.

Inquiry

The Inquirer is a law firm (the Firm) that is engaged in the practice of law in the District of Columbia and is incorporated under the D.C. Professional Corporations Act. One of its shareholder lawyers, whom we will refer to as B, is terminating his employment agreement with the Firm and his general association with the Firm as a practicing lawyer, although he will remain a shareholder in the Firm (as permitted by D.C. Code § 29-608) unless and until his shares are bought out by the Firm. B will no longer, however, share in any profits or losses of the Firm, and his name will not appear in the Firm's letterhead or in any lists of Firm lawyers in Martindale-Hubbell required by Rule 1.7 would not be barred in advance from representing referred clients on matters involving a conflict between the clients and the Insurance Company. This proposed change would not diminish Rule 1.3's duty of zealous representation.

B will become an officer of Corporation X, but his position with Corporation X will not involve the provision of legal services. Corporation X will sublease space from the Firm and B will occupy that subleased space. The sublease contains a provision obligating Corporation X and its employees, including B, to refrain from listening to or examining matters pertaining to firm clients or firm business. The Firm has also established a screening system and taken other steps to assure that no confidential information of the Firm or its clients is made available, without authorization, to Corporation X or to B. In addition, B will be excluded from the Firm's conflict clearance system and will thus not have access to information about new client matters of the Firm.

Because of B's expertise in a specialized area of the law in which the Firm will continue to practice, the Firm contemplates an arrangement with B, to which Corporation X has consented, in which it proposes to employ B from time to time, as an independent contractor, to assist the Firm as a lawyer or expert witness in providing legal services to the Firm's clients. The Firm and B contemplate entering into a general contract, under which B would agree to consider serving in particular matters as a contract attorney (designated as "special counsel") or as an expert witness, or individual matter-specific contracts on each matter on which B is retained by the Firm. B will not be guaranteed any particular amount of payments from the Firm.

The Firm also proposes to include in promotional materials and letters to clients representations that B's services are available to the Firm in his field of expertise when such services may be ethically provided and subject to his obligations to Corporation X.

On the basis of these facts, the Firm requests our advice as to (1) whether the arrangements it contemplates will result in imputation to the Firm under Rule 1.10 of any disqualification of B flowing from his status as an executive of Corporation X in matters in which B is not assisting the firm as an independent contractor; and (2) whether the representations that the Firm intends to make in promotional letters to clients are consistent with Rule 7.1.

Discussion

When B becomes an employee of Corporation X, he will not be acting as a lawyer for Corporation X. Most of the provisions of Rule 1.7, therefore, would not apply to work done by B as a contract lawyer for the Firm because they are triggered by a lawyer representing clients in more than one matter. However, B's position with Corporation X could result in B's disqualification, under Rule 1.7(b)(4),[1] from representing a client in a situation in which his professional judgment on behalf of that client would, or reasonably might, be adversely affected by B's responsibilities to Corporation X or his interest in Corporation X created by his high-level executive position.

In any case in which B would be disqualified from representing a client under Rule 1.7(b)(4) because of his responsibilities to or interest in Corporation X, the Firm clearly would also be disqualified under Rule 1.10(a) if B were associated with the Firm in that representation as a contract lawyer.[2] The question posed by the Inquiry is whether the Firm's contemplated relationship with B is a sufficiently ongoing alliance or association to impute to the Firm B's disqualifications even on Firm matters on which B is not working as a contract lawyer.

We think not. To be sure, both this Committee and the ABA Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility have held that a continuing "of counsel" relationship between a lawyer and a firm or a continuing relationship between two firms (as in the case of a "correspondent" law firm) result in the lawyer and the Firm, or the two firms, being treated as a single entity for conflicts purposes. See D.C. Opinion No. 192 (May 17, 1988); ABA Formal Opinion No. 84-351 (October 20, 1984). But, in our view, the association of a lawyer with a firm on an ad hoc, case-by-case basis does not create that kind of continuing relationship, triggering imputation under Section 1.10 of the individual lawyer's disqualifications to the firm, except with respect to the individual matters on which the lawyer is associated with the firm – so long as the firm does not create the impression among its clients or the public at large that such a continuing relationship exists.

Here, B will not be included on the Firm's letterhead or in other listings of firm lawyers. He will be screened from confidential information about Firm clients and matters on which he is not employed as an independent contractor. And promotional materials and letters to clients that mention his availability will make clear that he is available to work on specific matters on a case-by-case basis and that he does not have a continuing relationship with the Firm. We believe these steps are sufficient to avoid a general imputation of B's disqualifications to the Firm. See ABA Formal Opinion 88-356 (Dec. 16, 1988).

We add, however, a cautionary note. We believe that the term "special counsel" should not be used to describe B's relationship to the Firm. While the term might be appropriately thought to denote a relationship for the particular case only, we note that the term "special counsel" is also used by many law firms more or less interchangeably with terms such as "counsel" and "of counsel," to denominate a continuing relationship. See ABA Formal Opinion 90-357 (May 10, 1990). While it may be true that all these terms have an evolving rather than a fixed meaning (see D.C. Opinion No. 151 (April 16, 1985)), we think that the Firm in this case would be well-advised to refer to B as a "consultant" or "contract lawyer" rather than a "special counsel."

The same caveat applies to the second question raised by the Inquiry. We see no violation of Rule 7.1[3] in the Firm's plans to describe for prospective clients, in promotional materials and letters, the availability of B as a contract lawyer or expert witness in particular cases. The key here is full and accurate disclosure. As the ABA Committee had occasion to observe recently in the context of discussing networks or alliances between law firms, "It is critical, no matter what words are used to describe the relationship between firms, for clients to receive information that will tell them the exact nature of the relationship and the extent to which resources of another firm will be available in connection with the client's retention of the firm that is claiming the relationship." ABA Formal Opinion 94-388 (December 5, 1994). The mandate of Rule 7.1 can be met only if a full description of the relationship is provided to all prospective and present clients for whom the relationship may be relevant. Id.

[1] Rule 1.7(b)(4) provides that a lawyer shall not, without the consent of the client, represent a client where "the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests."

[2] Since B will be employed and compensated by the Firm, this situation is different from the common one in which two lawyers in different firms are co-counsel in a case. In such situations, conflicts of one lawyer are not imputed to the other, at least in the absence of an exchange of confidential information. E.g., Richers v. Marsh & McLennan Group Associated, 459 N.W. 2d 478 (Iowa 1990); Brennan's Inc. v. Brennan's Restaurants, Inc., 590 F.2d 168 (5th Cir. 1979).

[3] Rule 7.1 bars false or misleading communications about a lawyer's services.

The same principles apply here, and we conclude that the planned representations by the Firm as to its relationship with B are adequate to assure compliance with Rule 7.1. We again recommend, however, that the Firm not use the term "special counsel" to describe B's relationship to the Firm.

Opinion No. 256

Inadvertent Disclosure of Privileged Material to Opposing Counsel

- Where a lawyer has inadvertently included documents containing client secrets or confidences in material delivered to an adversary lawyer, and the receiving lawyer in good faith reviews the documents before the inadvertence of the disclosure is brought to that lawyer's attention, the receiving lawyer engages in no ethical violation by retaining and using those documents. Where, on the other hand, the receiving lawyer knows of the inadvertence of the disclosure before the documents are examined, Rule 1.15(a) requires the receiving lawyer to return the documents to the sending lawyer; the receiving lawyer also violates Rule 8.4(c) if the lawyer reads and/or uses the material.

Depending on the facts, the lawyer making the inadvertent disclosure may, by so doing, violate Rule 1.1, requiring a lawyer to use diligence and care in a representation.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.1 (Competence)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.15 (Safekeeping Property)
- Rule 8.4(c) (Misconduct - Dishonesty, Fraud, Deceit, or Misrepresentation)

Inquiry

The inquirers are opposing lawyers in a securities arbitration. During the course of discovery in the arbitration proceeding, the lawyer for the respondent was given unrestricted access by claimant's lawyer to a substantial volume of documents. After their review, respondent's lawyer identified documents for copying; the copying was accomplished by claimant's lawyer and the copies were delivered to respondent's lawyer.

After copying and delivery of the documents, claimant's lawyer informed respondent's lawyer that one or more documents, consisting of handwritten notes, contained privileged attorney-client communications. The documents themselves, on their face, did not contain any indication of their privileged status.

Lawyers for both the claimant and the respondent have inquired whether the disclosure of the privileged material, under the circumstances described above, constitutes a waiver of the attorney-client privilege and whether respondent's lawyer may, without violating ethical rules, use the assertedly privileged material which he now has in his possession.

Discussion

The inquiry raises for the first time in this jurisdiction the ethical issues raised by the no longer infrequent occurrence of inadvertent disclosure of confidential documents to opposing counsel.[1] The situation can occur, as here, in the context of a document discovery, through a secretarial error in mailing or, as an unfortunate (but not uncommon) consequence of an increasingly electronic world, as when a facsimile or electronic mail transmission is mistakenly made to an unintended recipient.

While the question of waiver of an evidentiary privilege is beyond our authority,[2] the inquiry does present two important questions of legal ethics:

(1) What are the ethical obligations of a lawyer who receives confidential material inadvertently disclosed by opposing counsel; and

(2) Whether an inadvertent disclosure of information which a lawyer is ethically obliged to protect itself constitutes an ethical violation.

Ethical Obligations of a Lawyer Who Receives Inadvertently Disclosed Confidential Material

There are several different scenarios under which a lawyer might inadvertently be sent another party's confidential information. In the inquiry presented to us, the information was included with other documents intended to be provided the lawyer. The confidential information was not marked as such, and contained no indication that it was not freely provided to the receiving lawyer; and the receiving lawyer did not learn of the assertedly confidential nature of the documents until after he had read them.

In other situations, confidential information might be received by a lawyer who knows that it was not intended for him. This could occur, for example, when the sending lawyer specifically communicates to the receiving lawyer, before that lawyer reads a document that bore no indication of confidentiality, that the document was misdirected and should be returned unexamined.

Between these two poles – of complete lack of awareness of the inadvertence of the disclosure and actual knowledge of it – lies a continuum of fact situations in which there may be differing levels of indication of the possibility of an inadvertent disclosure.

1. Inadvertently Disclosed Documents — Where There Is No Indication of Confidentiality

No Rule of Professional Conduct directly addresses the conduct in issue in this inquiry. However, if we dissect the individual components of the activity we are examining, substantial guidance emerges. First, where the confidential document is received by opposing counsel with no indication that the disclosure was inadvertent, and is read by opposing counsel before being otherwise informed of these circumstances (as through a communication from the sending lawyer), we see no ethical violation if the receiving lawyer retains the documents and uses the disclosed information. Such a situation would arise under the facts of this inquiry, where privileged documents (containing no indication of such status) were included in a large document production and were reviewed in the ordinary course by receiving counsel before being notified of the inadvertent disclosure.

[1] We assume for the purpose of this inquiry that the disclosure of the privileged documents was truly inadvertent: that is, it was not specifically intended by plaintiff's counsel.

[2] Legal Ethics Committee opinions are limited to issues arising under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. The question of whether any particular facts and circumstance constitute a waiver of the attorney-client privilege is one under the law of evidence. We therefore decline to respond to that part of the inquiry which seeks our opinion on whether, under the facts presented to us, there has been a waiver of the attorney-client privilege. See Ethics Committee Rule C-5, and Ethics Opinion No. 83. See also Comment [5] to Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information): "This Rule is not intended to govern or affect judicial application of the attorney-client privilege or work product doctrine . . . ."

We begin our analysis with the belief that a lawyer (no different than any other person) should be able to presume that materials delivered to him or her in the ordinary course were intended to be so delivered. Such a presumption accords with both common sense and experience; moreover, the absence of such a presumption would place the unreasonable burden on a lawyer of examining the circumstances of the delivery of all mail, faxes and other material before reading them.

And so, in the situation described above, the documents were freely provided by the sending lawyer, the receiving lawyer could reasonably presume the documents were intended for that lawyer, the documents themselves did not inform the receiving lawyer that their disclosure was inadvertent, and the documents were examined by opposing counsel in good faith before being informed of the claim of privilege. Under these circumstances, we see nothing improper or unethical about counsel's use of the disclosed document. Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information) is obviously inapplicable to the conduct of the receiving lawyer, as it only governs a lawyer's disclosure and use of confidences and secrets of the lawyer's client. We see no other Rule applicable to this situation which would prohibit use of the document.

Indeed, we do not see how the receiving lawyer could be prohibited from using the information acquired during the document review. First, and most importantly, under case law likely applicable in this jurisdiction, the facts we have assumed – an inadvertent disclosure of confidential documents – constitute a waiver of the attorney-client privilege. Such a waiver occurs when the privileged communication is disclosed to a third-party, and the law in this jurisdiction appears to be that even an inadvertent disclosure to a third-party operates as a waiver. See, e.g., Wichita Land & Cattle Co. v. Amer. Fed. Bank, 148 F.R.D. 456 (D.D.C. 1992); In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C. Cir. 1989).[3] In Wichita Land & Cattle, the facts were similar to those presented in the inquiry described above: allegedly privileged materials were inadvertently included in a document production and were reviewed by opposing counsel before their privileged status was ascertained and asserted. The court found a waiver, holding that any uncompelled disclosure of otherwise privileged information is inconsistent with the evidentiary privilege, and therefore results in its loss.

In In re Sealed Case, the document in issue was a memorandum of a corporate vice-president to the company's chief accountant containing the advice of the company's lawyer. During a routine audit of the company's defense contracting business, the memorandum was given to a government auditor. When, many months later, the company resisted a subpoena for this document on the ground of attorney-client privilege, the government argued that the prior disclosure constituted a waiver of the privilege. The court agreed, holding that the possessor of privileged information must guard it carefully – "like jewels" – and that any uncompelled disclosure will waive the privilege. Id. at 980.

Thus, where (as in this jurisdiction) the underlying law holds that inadvertently disclosed information is no longer protected, there would appear to be no justification for requiring the receiving lawyer to accord it special treatment.[4]

Second, once read, the inadvertently disclosed information becomes part of the body of knowledge residing in the mind of the receiving lawyer, who may wish to use it to further the interests of that lawyer's client. For example, under the facts of this inquiry, if the assertedly privileged information revealed that the securities arbitration claimants (whose lawyers produced the documents) possessed actual knowledge of the truth of matters alleged to have been misrepresented to them, and if this were relevant to the defense of their claims, respondent's counsel (the receiving lawyers) would not likely be able to accord confidential status to the information and still properly represent their client.[5] Should those lawyers take action, such as directing discovery to the claimant, seeking to develop evidence of that party's prior knowledge of allegedly fraudulent representations, the lawyers would be courting an ethical violation unless they could establish that their litigation strategy derived from some source other than the inadvertently disclosed information.

An interpretation of the ethical rules that required the receiving lawyer to protect the confidentiality of these materials would, we believe, place too much of a burden on the exercise of a lawyer's obligation to represent his client zealously and diligently (Rule 1.3). As the ethics committee of another jurisdiction observed in concluding that a lawyer may use inadvertently disclosed confidential information:

> Once confidential material has been examined even if briefly, the information cannot be purged from the mind of the attorney who inadvertently received it.[6]

Indeed, if the receiving lawyer were under some ethical inhibition from using that information, the lawyer could have a prohibited conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)(4), which could require withdrawal under Rule 1.16(a). Rule 1.7(b)(4) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client in a matter if "the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by . . . the lawyer's own financial, business, property or personal interests." If the receiving lawyer were under some ethical inhibition from using the inadvertently disclosed information to the fullest in a particular case, his professional judgment "reasonably may be adversely affected" in that case. In the example just noted, if the receiving lawyer in the securities arbitration learned from the disclosed document of a possible defense of "actual knowledge" to a misrepresentation claim, and was ethically inhibited from using that information in defense of his client, it is probable that his professional judgment "reasonably may be adversely affected" by a concern that his pursuit of this avenue of defense could result in a breach of professional ethics.[7]

[3] These federal court decisions are federal question cases where, under Fed. R. Evid. 501, the existence of evidentiary privileges is governed by federal law. We are aware of no reported decisions on this subject under District of Columbia law.

Many (but not all) other jurisdictions have reached the same conclusion about the consequence of an inadvertent disclosure of privileged information. See, e.g., Granada Corp. v. First Court of Appeals, 844 S.W. 2d 223 (Tex. 1992); In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 727 F.2d 1352 (4th Cir. 1984); and Aerojet-General Corp. v. Transport Indemnity Ins. 22 Cal. Rptr. 862 (Ct. App. 1993).

Cases in which the courts have examined other factors in deciding whether to find a waiver from an inadvertent disclosure include Mendenhall v. Barber-Greene Co., 531 F. Supp. 951 (ND Ill. 1982); and Berg Electronics, Inc., v. Molex, Inc., No. 94-470, (D. Del., Feb. 8, 1995).

[4] In some jurisdictions, an inadvertent disclosure does not ipso facto, waive the attorney-client privilege. See supra note 3. Were we in such a jurisdiction, our conclusion might be different.

[5] Actual knowledge of the truth of a misrepresented matter is usually a defense to a claim of fraud. See, e.g., Mayer v. Oil Field Systems Corp., 803 F.2d 749 (2d Cir. 1986).

[6] Ohio Supreme Court Bd. of Comm'rs on Grievances and Discipline, Op. 93-11 (Dec. 3, 1993).

[7] By this conclusion, we do not imply that a lawyer must retain and/or use inadvertently disclosed materials that are not subject of ethical restraints. As a matter of courtesy or reciprocity, a lawyer may decline to retain or use documents that the lawyer might Precedent from other jurisdictions is in accord with our conclusion that no ethical violation arises from a lawyer's use of inadvertently disclosed material, where the receiving lawyer had no knowledge that the materials were inadvertently disclosed before they were read. Aerojet-General Corp. v. Transport Indemnity Ins., 22 Cal. Rptr. 862 (Ct. App. 1993), involved a situation where a lawyer for one party to litigation received a memorandum prepared by opposing counsel describing a witness interview. The document had been sent by the preparing lawyer to his client's insuror, which had mistakenly sent it to another insured, who happened to be the receiving lawyer's client. The memorandum bore no indication that it was priviliged.

The court allowed the document to be used by the receiving lawyer, finding no ethical violation in his reading or use of it. According to the court:

> Once [the receiving lawyer] had acquired the information in a manner that was not due to his own fault or wrongdoing, he cannot purge it from his mind. Indeed, his professional obligation demands the he utilize the knowledge about the case on his client's behalf. Id. at 867-68.

A similar conclusion was reached in Granada Corp. v. First Court of Appeals, 844 S.W. 2d 223 (Tex. 1992), where privileged materials were included in a document production. Eleven months after the disclosure, and after the documents had been reviewed by the receiving lawyer, the disclosing lawyer sought their return and an order prohibiting their use. The court declined to do so, holding that the privilege had been waived and that the receiving lawyer engaged in no misconduct in reading and using the documents. See also Ohio Supreme Court Bd. of Comm'rs on Grievances and Discipline Op. 93-11 (Dec. 3, 1993) (decided under the Code of Professional Responsibility).

2. Inadvertently Disclosed Documents — Where the Receiving Lawyer Knows of the Inadvertence

On the other hand, where the receiving lawyer has not examined the misdirected material before gaining knowledge of the inadvertence of the disclosure, it is our opinion that the lawyer should, at a minimum, seek guidance from the sending lawyer and, if that lawyer confirms the inadvertence of the disclosure and requests return of the material, unread, the receiving lawyer should do so.

In our view, a failure to do so would be a dishonest act, in violation of Rule 8.4(c).[8] A document received by a lawyer under these circumstances comes to the lawyer with "notice" that it does not belong to him. In that sense, it is little different than a wallet found on the street: the finder knows that it does not belong to him, and should he appropriate to himself the wallet's contents, the finder engages in the tort of conversion.[9]

Moreover, under such circumstances, there really has been no "disclosure" such as to invoke the holdings of Wichita Land & Cattle and In re Sealed Case. In reaching its decision in Wichita Land & Cattle, the District Court referred approvingly to Chubb Integrated Systems, Ltd., v. Nat. Bank of Washington, 103 F.R.D. 52 (D.D.C. 1984), which held that a disclosure of a document does not occur until some outsider to the asserted confidentiality learns the "gist" of its contents. Id. at 63. The District Court for this District recently applied Chubb in a case in which several boxes of privileged documents were inadvertently disclosed as part of a large document discovery. Disclosing counsel discovered the inadvertence one week after the document production, and moved for their return. The court, in order to determine whether receiving counsel could use the documents, ordered a hearing to determine whether receiving counsel had learned their gist. In re United Mine Workers of Amer. Employee Benefit Litigation, 156 F.R.D. 507, 512 (D.D.C. 1984). Presumably, if receiving counsel could establish that he had learned of the gist of the documents before being informed of the inadvertence of the disclosure, the court would allow their use; otherwise, it would not.

Applying this interpretation to the matter before us, there would be no "disclosure" to a receiving lawyer who has possession of a document and has not read it when the lawyer learns that the document was only inadvertently provided. Reading the materials under these circumstances should be treated as the equivalent of a lawyer opening the closed file folder of his adversary in a conference room, while the adversary was out of the room. Such conduct has been found in other jurisdictions to be dishonest. Cf., Lipin v. Bender, 644 N.E. 2d 1300 (N.Y. 1994).[10]

We also ground our opinion on Rule 1.15 (Safekeeping Property). Documents (separate from the information contained in them) which are inadvertently delivered to a lawyer and which the lawyer knows are not his are the property of another and therefore subject to that Rule. Under Rule 1.15(a), the lawyer must safeguard that property, and under Rule 1.15(b), the lawyer must notify the sending lawyer of his possession of the documents and return them (if so requested). We reached precisely this conclusion in our Opinion No. 242, concerning a lawyer's receipt from his client of documents belonging to a third party.

This different ethical result, when the receiving lawyer does know that documents were inadvertently disclosed, also finds otherwise be entitled to use, although (depending on the significance of the documents) this might be a matter on which consultation with the client may be necessary. See Rules 1.2(a) and 1.4(b).

[8] In In re Shorter, 570 A. 2d 760 (D.C. App. 1990), a disciplinary case, the Court of Appeals defined "dishonesty" as including "conduct evincing a lack of honesty, probity or integrity in principle; [a] lack of fairness and straightforwardness . . . . Thus, what may not legally be characterized as an act of fraud, deceit or misrepresentation may still evince dishonesty." Id. at 768.

[9] At common law, a finder of lost property, if he takes custody of it, is responsible to the owner of the property for its safekeeping and return. Cf. Costello v. Ten Eyck, 49 NW 152 (Mich. 1891); Fisher v. Klingenberger, 576 NYS 2d 476 (Rochester City Ct. 1991). See also, 1 Am. Jur. 2d Abandoned, Lost and Unclaimed Property, § 21 (1994); 36A C.J.S. Finding Lost Goods §§ 7, 8 (1961).

[10] Where the lawyer knows that a document was inadvertently disclosed, Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information) presents no barrier to disclosure to the sending lawyer by the receiving lawyer of the fact of receipt of the inadvertently disclosed document. Rule 1.6(b) protects "confidences" (defined as information protected by the attorney-client privilege) and "secrets" (defined as "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client").

Under these circumstances, the fact of receipt of the inadvertently disclosed document is plainly not a "confidence" under Rule 1.6, as it was not part of an attorney-client communication. Nor is it a "secret": the client has made no request for inviolability, the disclosure would not be embarrassing to the client, and the disclosure could not be detrimental to the client, since the receiving lawyer has no right to use the information anyway.

Nor need the client be consulted about the course of action when the receiving lawyer is required to return the inadvertently disclosed documents, since such a requirement derives from an affirmative ethical obligation of the lawyer. Client consent is not necessary for the lawyer to fulfill this ethical obligation, and the client may not insist that the lawyer not return, unread, the subject documents any more than a client may not insist that her lawyer overlook a conflict of interest that, under the Rules of Professional Conduct, require withdrawal from representation. Of course, there is no reason why the lawyer may not inform the lawyer's client of the fact of receipt of the documents and the lawyer's actions in response thereto.

support elsewhere. In Resolution Trust Corp. v. First American Bank, No. 4:94-CV-83 (W.D. Mich. 1994), a lawyer received a privileged document, known to be inadvertently disclosed. The court held that receiving counsel's reading of such a document was improper.

ABA Formal Opinion 92-368 (Nov. 10, 1992) also addresses this issue. The specific situation it discusses is one where the inadvertently disclosed confidential material was received "under circumstances where it is clear that the materials were not intended for the receiving lawyer." Id. at 1. The Opinion concludes that the receiving lawyer should not examine the materials once the inadvertence is discovered, should notify the sending lawyer of their receipt, and should abide by the sending lawyer's instructions as to their disposition. That conclusion is in accord with ours. [11]

We disagree, however, with the discussion in the ABA Opinion (at pp. 4-5) that its conclusion would also apply even where the receiving lawyer did not become aware of the inadvertance until after the lawyer read the documents. The Opinion overlooks the other important considerations that apply in such a circumstance (i.e., the fact that the information cannot be purged from the mind of the receiving lawyer, the lawyer's obligation to his client of zealous representation, and the potential conflict of interest under Rule 1.7(b)), and may have been mistaken in its view that most courts do not treat inadvertent disclosure as a waiver of the privilege. The courts in this jurisdiction, and several others, have reached a contrary conclusion.

The line we have drawn between an ethical and an unethical use of inadvertently disclosed information is based on the receiving lawyer's knowledge of the inadvertence of the disclosure. Thus, for example, where the document has no facial or contextual indication of privilege and the receiving lawyer has not learned of its inadvertent disclosure, the receiving lawyer who reads such a document commits no breach of ethics.

At the other extreme is the document for which the inadvertence of the disclosure is actually known to the lawyer before he reads it. Such a situation would exist, for example, when a confidential letter to a lawyer's client is inadvertently mailed to opposing counsel, and opposing counsel is specifically informed of the mailing error before the letter is delivered to his office. Opposing counsel's reading of the letter would be unethical.

Many situations will fall somewhere between these two clear examples, i.e., there may be some indication on the document or in its context that the disclosure was inadvertent, but there may also be good reason for the receiving lawyer to conclude otherwise.[12] Whether a particular set of facts and circumstances constitutes dishonesty will depend on whether it shows the requisite knowledge on the part of the receiving lawyer (see paragraph [6] in the Terminology section of the Rules for the definition of "knows").[13]

Did the Inadvertent Disclosure Itself Constitute an Ethical Violation?

The facts of this opinion also raise the question of the ethical obligations of a lawyer to protect confidential documents from inadvertent disclosure. District of Columbia Rule of Professional Conduct 1.6(a) establishes the obligation of a lawyer to protect confidential and secret client information. It provides as follows:

> Except when permitted under paragraph (c) or (d), a lawyer shall not knowingly:
> (1) Reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client;
> (2) Use a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client to the disadvantage of the client;
> (3) Use a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client for the advantage of the lawyer or of a third person. (Emphasis added.)

Rule 1.6(a) only prohibits disclosures of client confidences and secrets made "knowingly", a term is defined in the "Terminology" section of the Rules as denoting "actual knowledge of the fact in question. A person's knowledge may be inferred from the circumstances."

In a situation where the disclosure was truly inadvertent, that is, where it did not proceed from any actual knowledge that privileged material was contained in the production of discovery documents, from any actual knowledge that it was included in a mailing to opposing counsel, etc., we do not believe that Rule 1.6(a) is violated. Thus, a negligent disclosure of confidential or secret information would not violate this Rule.

There remains, however, the question whether the inadvertent disclosure of confidential or secret information violates some other ethical provision. Where the disclosure occurred through the conduct of a subordinate lawyer or employee in the sending lawyer's firm, a violation of Rule 1.6(e) may result. That Rule requires that:

> A lawyer shall exercise reasonable care to prevent the lawyer's employees, associates, and others whose services are utilized by the lawyer from disclosing or using confidences or secrets of a client . . . .

Where, for example, a lawyer entrusts an associate lawyer or a non-lawyer employee with a document production, and fails to use reasonable care in instructing such person about the identification or handling of confidential or secret material, such supervising lawyer may violate Rule 1.6(e) if such material is improperly disclosed. See also Rules 5.1(b) and 5.3(b).

Where, however, the disclosure is solely the product of the lawyer's own inadvertence, Rule 1.6(e) would appear to be inapplicable. But the lawyer's inadvertence could violate Rule 1.1 (Competence), which provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer shall provide competent representation to a client. Competent representation requires the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness, and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation.
> (b) A lawyer shall serve a client with skill and care commensurate with that generally afforded to clients by other lawyers in similar matters.

[11] We disagree with the ABA Opinion only as to the legal basis for the conclusion that the described conduct is unethical. The ABA Opinion found no Rule or Professional Conduct governing the activity in question, and so based its conclusion on general "precepts underlying the Model Rules." Id. at 2. We believe that Rules 8.4(c) and 1.15 govern.

[12] For example, a document when created may have been marked "Confidential" or "Privileged", without regard to whether the document was actually entitled to some legal evidentiary privilege. A copy of document so marked in a document production would not, in many circumstances, establish the receiving lawyer's knowledge of an inadvertent disclosure of privileged material. Such marking, as noted, is often indiscriminately used and, therefore, of no legal significance; also, the receiving lawyer may be entitled to assume that any privilege that did exist with respect to the document was being voluntarily waived, to further the interests of the sending lawyer, by inclusion in the document production.

[13] There will be, we expect, some situations in which the receiving lawyer believes that his/her right to examine a document is ambiguous, because there are conflicting indications as to inadvertence. In such a situation, the prudent receiving lawyer would either contact the sending lawyer for instructions before examining the document, or have another person not working on the matter to which the document relates examine it to assist in clarifying its status.

Because we are not in a position to determine the precise facts that led to the inadvertent disclosure in the matter presented to us, we cannot say whether it constitutes a violation of Rule 1.1. If, for example,the disclosure occurred because counsel failed to review the documents to be made available to possessing counsel with the thoroughness and preparation required under Rule 1.1(a) or the skill and care required under Rule 1.1(b), the inadvertence could be an ethical violation. On the other hand, the fact of an inadvertent disclosure would not itself be evidence of a violation of Rule 1.1, as such disclosure could well occur even in the presence of appropriate levels of attention and skill.

Opinion No. 257

Disclosure Obligations of Criminal Defense Lawyer Charged with a Crime by the Prosecutor

• A lawyer who specializes in the defense of criminal cases in the Superior Court who is charged with a crime by the United States Attorney's office may continue to represent existing criminal clients and may accept new criminal defense representations, but only if the lawyer makes full disclosure to his existing and potential clients and obtains their consent.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.3 (Diligence and Zeal)
• Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)

Inquiry

An attorney's practice is limited to defending clients charged with criminal offenses in the Superior Court. The attorney has himself been charged with possession of marijuana by the United States Attorney's office, and the lawyer's case is pending in the Superior Court. The question presented is whether the lawyer may continue to represent his existing clients and may accept new clients during the pendency of his criminal case without making disclosure to the clients of the criminal charges against him. The lawyer feels that his judgment on behalf of his clients will not be affected by the pendency of the criminal charges against him, and he feels that he ought not to be obliged to make any disclosure to his clients as a result.

Discussion

This inquiry is governed by Rule1.7(b)(4) of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct. That rule states that, without consent:

> ...a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if: ...(4) the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.

The consent referred to above is explained in Rule 1.7(c) as follows:

> A lawyer may represent a client with respect to a matter in the circumstances described in paragraph (b) above if: (1) each potentially affected client provides consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation; and (2) the lawyer is able to comply with all other applicable rules with respect to such representation.

We have no hesitation in finding that Rule1.7(b) applies to the inquirer's situation and that it compels disclosure to the inquirer's clients and the seeking of their informed consent.

The exact question presented is whether the inquirer's status as a criminal defendant in his own personal case gives rise to a question whether his professional judgment in defending his clients in criminal cases will be or reasonably may be adversely affected. We think, on the facts presented to us, that it does. The inquirer is in the process of being prosecuted by the same office that prosecutes his clients. The temptation for the inquirer either to become less aggressive – to his clients' detriment – in the hopes of currying favor with his adversary in his clients' cases or to become increasingly and excessively aggressive – to his clients' detriment – as a result of his own status as a criminal defendant is undeniable.

The inquirer forcefully states in his inquiry that he sincerely believes that neither the manner in which he represents his clients nor the manner in which he exercises his professional judgment on behalf of his clients will be or could reasonably be affected by his status as a criminal defendant. We believe that, despite the inquirer's undoubtedly heartfelt beliefs in this regard, an objective observer might reasonably believe that the inquirer's professional judgment on behalf of his clients would be colored by his personal situation. Therefore, his clients must be informed under Rule1.7(b)(4).[1]

In D.C. Opinion No. 210 (April 17, 1990), this Committee had an opportunity to examine an analogous situation. In that opinion, we considered the situation of a lawyer principally engaged in criminal defense work who applied for a position with the United States Attorney's office. Opinion No. 210 was decided under the Code of Professional Responsibility then in effect and specifically under DR 7-101 (representing a client zealously) and DR 5-101 (refusing employment when the interests of the lawyer may impair his independent professional judgment).

When this Committee published its Opinion No. 210, the Court of Appeals had already adopted the District of Columbia's Rules of Professional Conduct, which were to become effective at the beginning of the following year. The Committee found that a criminal defense attorney thus situated was obliged to divulge to her clients the fact of her job application and to seek their consent to her continued representation in light of her pending job application. In so doing, this Committee explicitly held that it would reach the same result under Rule 1.7.

Now that the Rules of Professional Conduct have come into effect, we observe that the principles set forth both here and in Opinion No. 210 were and are the principles that continue to govern a conflict of this type. Opinion No. 210 speaks in some detail of the types of pitfalls that might arise:

> ...The lawyer may perceive the particular prosecutor handling a case or matter she has been retained to defend as having some influence over her employment prospects. She may also believe that her advocacy skills as demonstrated in that case or matter will provide a principal basis upon which she will be evaluated. If so, she likely will seek to make a favorable impression. It is difficult to know whether these subjective feelings will compromise her zealous representation of her client. They may or they may not. In some circumstances, the lawyer may work even harder in her client's behalf in order to demonstrate her competence and ability.

[1] It is worth pointing out that the ABA Model Rule 1.7 speaks in terms of a more subjective standard. That rule talks about the lawyer's reasonable belief that the representation will not be adversely affected by the lawyer's own interests. Despite the apparently subjective nature of the test set forth in the ABA Model Rule and its predecessor in the ABA Model Code, courts have consistently taken the view that the test was in fact an objective one. In any event, under the District of Columbia version of Rule 1.17, the test in the District of Columbia is a more overtly objective one.

Thus, the lawyer may redouble the effort and time she previously gave to the client's cause, working more vigorously to master the applicable law and facts of the case. Obscure tactics and defenses may receive greater attention than otherwise, and the lawyer, in an effort to perform well, may conduct a more thorough discovery to better anticipate the prosecution's attack. At trial, the attorney may put forth her defense and counter the prosecution more energetically than otherwise. All of this activity, though driven by the lawyer's personal interest in performing well and enhancing her employment prospects, would benefit the client also. The interests of the lawyer and the client in this situation, therefore, could very well be consistent.

On the other hand, when representing clients in criminal proceedings, the lawyer is often required to make judgments as to courses of action and to assert rights that heavily burden the prosecution and create difficult obstacles to conviction of the lawyer's clients. The prosecutor may view some of defense counsel's tactics as unwarranted, technical, unreasonable or even personally offensive.

Moreover, criminal investigations and trials are the most adversarial of all litigation. It is to be expected that the prosecutor will vigorously contest, in his effort to obtain a conviction, virtually all of defense counsel's requests for discovery, pre-trial motions, and trial tactics. In the context of such hotly contested and adversarial proceedings, relation-ships between opposing counsel may become strained. Nevertheless, defense counsel is obligated to take whatever lawful and ethical measures are required to vindicate a client's cause without regard to opposition, obstruction, or personal interest, such as a desire not to offend or irritate members of the prosecutor's office from which he is seeking or may have recently received favorable job consideration. Where concern for jeopardizing her employment opportunities interferes with a lawyer's representation of her client, an impermissible conflict of interest exists.

The difficulty, therefore, is that, while the lawyer may react in this situation in a manner entirely consistent with her client's best interests, she could also perceive her own interest to be in conflict with those of her client.

Those considerations apply with equal force to the situation of a criminal defense lawyer who finds himself charged by his adversary[2] with having committed a crime.

In closing, we emphasize that, as the rules point out and as this Committee has observed on several prior occasions, the disclosure to be made to the client must be full and complete. The rule itself talks about "full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation." We think it is difficult for a lawyer to make an adequate disclosure in a situation like this in which the lawyer's own personal interests are involved. There is obviously a strong temptation to minimize the consequences of the adverse relationship in discussions with the client and to soft-pedal the potential disadvantages to the client if the client should consent.

The lawyer presumably wants to be retained by the client. The lawyer genuinely believes that his judgment will not be affected, although we have found that to a reasonable observer, it might be. It is therefore difficult – but nevertheless required – for the lawyer to summon up for the client the full range of possible negative consequences to the client before the client can effectively consent and waive the conflict. The lawyer must be particularly scrupulous to make sure that the client has a fair and impartial assessment of the likelihood of any such adverse consequence occurring.

As the Court said in a related context: "Full disclosure . . . requires a detailed explanation of the risks and disadvantages to the client entailed in the agreement, including any liabilities that will or may foreseeably accrue to him." In re James, 452 A.2d 163 (D.C. 1982). Because the situation here is so fraught with difficulty for the lawyer, we observe that the better practice may well be for the lawyer to make the disclosure of the potential adverse consequences to the clients in writing so that the clients will have a fair opportunity to reflect upon that disclosure at their leisure and so that there will be no dispute at a later date between the lawyer and the clients as to what disclosure was in fact made. While a written disclosure is not required in these circumstances by the rules, it is undoubtedly desirable.

[2] The nature of the relationship between the prosecutor and a criminal defense lawyer is particularly acute because the prosecutor's client is the government. Therefore, in many ways, the prosecutor becomes nearly a party to the proceeding himself; in some jurisdictions prosecutions are even brought in the name of the prosecutor and not in the name of sovereign.

Inquiry No. 92-10-37
Adopted: September 20, 1995

Opinion No. 258

Application of Rule 4.2(a) to Lawyers as Parties Proceeding Pro Se

- A lawyer who is a party in a matter and is proceeding pro se cannot communicate directly with another party who is known to be represented by counsel in the matter without first obtaining consent from the other party's lawyer.

Applicable Rule

- Rule 4.2 (Communication Between Lawyer and Opposing Parties)

Inquiry

The inquirer, a private practitioner, requests an opinion concerning whether an attorney who is a party in a matter and who is proceeding pro se may, under Rule 4.2, communicate directly with another represented party in the same matter without first obtaining the consent of the other party's lawyer.

Rule 4.2(a), the "no contact" rule, provides that, "[d]uring the course of representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party known to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other party or is authorized by law to do so." However, Comment [1] to Rule 4.2 plainly states that "parties to a matter may communicate directly with each other" (emphasis added).

This inquiry, therefore, poses the novel question of how, if at all, the freedom of parties to communicate directly with each other without the permission or presence of counsel is altered or nullified by the fact that one of the parties to the matter is, herself, a lawyer.[1]

Discussion

For the purposes of this inquiry, the Committee assumes that (1) the contemplated communication is directly with a party[2] in the matter, not a non-party employee or other non-party individual; (2) the dispute is a "matter" for purposes of Rule 4.2(a); (3) the other party is represented by counsel; (4) the communication is about the "subject of the representation;" and (5) the direct communication is not otherwise "authorized by law."

[1] This opinion addresses only the situation in which the lawyer-party is proceeding pro se. We do not address the situation in which the lawyer-party is represented by counsel.

The Committee recognizes that neither the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct nor the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct speaks directly to pro se representation issues.[3] This gap does not end our inquiry, however, nor does it create a professional ethics vacuum for lawyer-parties who choose to proceed pro se.

The Committee has considered the societal interests and purpose behind Rule 4.2 and its commentary, and has read Rule 4.2 and its commentary in the context of all the professional conduct rules.[4] In light of these principles and the language of Rule 4.2, we conclude that a lawyer proceeding pro se in a matter must not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the matter with a party known to be represented by another lawyer in that matter, unless the lawyer-party has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other party.

To avoid absurd results, however, the Committee excludes from the reach of this opinion situations in which the other party, if not a lawyer, ordinarily would not consult a lawyer or retain a lawyer to represent him. For example, a lawyer-consumer whose suit has been damaged by the dry cleaners should be free to address the problem directly with the manager, rather than having to contact the lawyer for the dry cleaners. Similarly, a lawyer-neighbor may deal directly with a neighbor about a noisy pet or a tree that fell on the lawyer's property, without concern whether the neighbor has a lawyer. Or a lawyer-citizen may write to the chief executive of a corporation protesting its planned theme park. It would be unreasonable to suggest in these types of situations that a lawyer-party cannot deal directly with the other person or entity. However, when a dispute has matured to the point where a person would ordinarily retain counsel, the lawyer-party must treat herself as covered by Rule 4.2.

Rule 4.2 has at its core the concern that lawyers generally are in a better position, by education and training,[5] to overwhelm a lay party and exploit his lack of legal knowledge in the course of communicating directly with the lay party. Courts and this Committee have noted that the Rule is intended to protect against the lawyer who might coax a statement or settlement or otherwise take advantage of the unsuspecting and momentarily uncounseled lay person.[6] Thus, courts have noted the "difficulty the uncounseled layperson has in marshalling the information and foresight required to conduct negotiations about complex legal issues with a lawyer representing [an adverse party]."[7]

Courts also have observed that Rule 4.2 helps prevent the inadvertent disclosure of privileged information[8] and has "preserved the proper functioning of the legal system"[9] by protecting the integrity of the lawyer-client relationship. These societal concerns and interests have no less validity when the lawyer positioned to do the coaxing is a lawyer-party proceeding pro se.

Comment [1] to Rule 4.2, which permits direct, interparty communications, does not create an exception to Rule 4.2. The comment merely reflects the American jurisprudential tradition that parties generally are free to communicate directly with each other. This tradition is based on the belief that parties have a right to settle their disputes without the involvement or consent of their lawyers.

However, this right of the parties is not absolute. A party cannot achieve a settlement from another uncounseled party through "duress, harassment, or overbearing conduct."[10] It is precisely this limitation on traditionally allowable interparty communications that takes precedence over the commentary to Rule 4.2 when one of the parties is a lawyer.

A lawyer, like a lay person, has the unqualified right to represent herself in a matter, even if, as the old adage has it, she thereby acquires a fool for a client. But, unlike the lay party, the pro se lawyer brings her professional skills and legal knowledge with her whenever she deals with her lay

[2] In so assuming, the Committee notes that the term "party" is not limited to formal parties in litigation. Rule 4.2, Comment [4]. See also Rule 4.2(c), which, for purposes of this rule, defines "party" to include "any person, including an employee of a party organization, who has the authority to bind a party organization as to the representation to which the communication relates." We also note that Rule 4.2(d) excludes from the Rule's scope communications by a lawyer with government officials who can redress a client's grievances.

[3] In fact, the Rules appear to embody two assumptions– that the lawyer is (1) representing (i.e., acting as lawyer for) a (2) third party (i.e., a client other than herself). Some courts have specifically held that certain disciplinary rules are inapplicable to the situation where a lawyer is representing herself. Lawson v. Nevada Power Co., 739 F. adversary. The lawyer-party, no matter whether she is acting in her "lawyer" or her "party" capacity, still retains a presumptively unfair advantage over an opposing party. We therefore conclude that a lawyer must comply with the requirements of Rule 4.2(a) when she represents a client, be that client the lawyer herself or another party.

Conflict Issues in Representations Involving Estates

- Under the substantive law of the District of Columbia, a lawyer retained by a personal representative or conservator for a representation in connection with a decedent's or ward's estate represents the personal representative or conservator rather than the estate. The lawyer may not, therefore, bring an action adverse to the personal representative or conservator without his or her consent.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- Rule 1 .9(Conflict of Interest: Former Client)

Inquiry

The inquiring lawyer has raised an issue concerning her representation of the estate of an incapacitated person. A court appointed X, Y, and Z as conservators[1] for A's estate. In addition to serving as a conservator for A's estate, X also served as one of the two trustees for a trust established in A's name. One of the beneficiaries of the trust was A's estate.

The two trustees initially retained the inquirer to perform an audit of the trust, paying her fees from funds in the trust. At the completion of the audit, the inquirer met with the trustees, as well as the conservators of A's estate, to discuss issues identified in the audit. After the inquirer's work for the trust had been completed, the conservators asked her to serve as counsel to A's estate[2], and she accepted. The inquirer's fees were paid by the conservator from the estate, subject to court approval.

Approximately three years after the inquirer began her representation with respect to the estate, Y and Z (two of the three co-conservators) asked her to look into the question whether the fees of the two trustees of the trust – including X, the other conservator of A's estate – were excessive. The inquirer prepared an opinion letter as to the propriety of the trustees' fees and provided legal representation to Y and Z in their effort to remove X as a conservator. The court subsequently removed X as conservator. The question posed by the inquirer, at the direction of the court, is whether her continuing representation of the estate represents an impermissible conflict of interest because she had previously taken a position that is adverse to X.

Discussion

The answer to the immediate question posed by the inquirer is that, after the removal of X as a co-conservator, her representation of the estate or the remaining conservators does not present a conflict of interest under Rule 1.7 or Rule 1.9. Under the law in the District of Columbia, as discussed below, the inquirer had an attorney-client relationship with X. Accordingly, Rule 1.9 prohibits her, without consent, from now taking a position adverse to X in the same matter or one substantially related to a matter on which she previously represented X[3]. As we take the facts, though, X is no longer a conservator of the estate, and the inquirer is therefore no longer involved in any action that is adverse to X. Accordingly, the inquirer's current representation of A's estate or the remaining conservators does not present a conflict of interest.

The inquiry does, however, lead us to address a second question of greater significance to the trusts and estates bar: whether a conflict of interest existed when the inquirer took a position adverse to X at a time when X was still a co-conservator of A's estate. The critical issue for answering that question is the identity of the client.

The inquirer believed that it was permissible for her to take action adverse to X while X was still a conservator because the inquirer's client was the estate and not the conservators. Underlying her position is the premise that the existence of a conflict in a matter involving an estate should be analyzed under Rule 1.13 (Organization as Client). Just as a corporation can hire a lawyer only if its constituents (e.g., president or general counsel) take steps to do so, an estate cannot hire a lawyer except through its constituents – in this case the conservators. Although X and the other conservators hired her and interacted with her, the inquirer believed that since she had been retained to represent the estate and her fees were being paid out of the estate, the estate was her client. Indeed, in a recent case in Michigan, the court analyzed whether an estate is a client within the scope of Rule 1.13, and concluded that it was. See Steinway v. Bolden, 460 N.W.2d 306 (Mich. Ct. App. 1990).

Similarly, the inquirer also believed that X was not a former client with respect to her representation of the trust. Although X was a trustee at the time the inquirer provided advice concerning the trust, the inquirer understood her client to be the trust rather than the individual trustees.

The position urged by the inquirer is by no means without force or logic. In general, the fact that the constituents of an organizational client interact with the client "does not mean, however, that constituents of an organizational client are the clients of the lawyer."Rule 1.13, Comment 3. Although the lawyer communicates with the organization through its constituents, the client is the organization, not its constituents. Indeed, "[t]he principle that a lawyer represents the entity and not its individual shareholders or other constituents applies even when the shareholders come into conflict with the entity." Opinion No. 216 (Jan. 15, 1991).[4] Since the inquirer believed X's actions were harmful to the estate – which

[1]The D.C. Code defines "conservator" as "a person who is appointed by the court to manage the estate of a protected individual." See D.C. Code Ann. §21-2011(3).

[2]While the inquirer understood that she was being asked to represent the estate, not the conservators, there was no formal engagement letter reflecting that understanding. Moreover, as we discuss below, the law in the District of Columbia is that the client in such situtations is the conservator, not the estate.

[3]Rule 1.9 provides that "A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client consents after consultation."

[4]A prior opinion, decided under the former D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility, as well as a number of court cases, have recognized that a lawyer representing an organization may take a position adverse to one of its constituents even where the lawyer has interacted with the constituent. See Opinion No. 159 (Sept. 15, 1985); Bobbitt v. Victorian House, Inc., 545 F. Supp. 1124, 1126 (N.D. Ill. 1982); U.S. Industries, Inc. v. Goldman, 421 F. Supp. 7, 11 (S.D.N.Y. 1976); Wayland v. Shore Lobster & Shrimp Corp., 537 F. Supp. 1220, 1223 (S.D.N.Y. 1982).

she understood to be her client – she considered it appropriate to take actions adverse to X in order to benefit the estate.

The critical flaw in the inquirer's reasoning, however, is that under the substantive law of the District of Columbia, as well as the law of most jurisdictions, the client of a lawyer representing an estate is the fiduciary – in this case the conservator – and not the estate.[5] On two recent occasions, the D.C. Court of Appeals has addressed the identity of the client in estates law. In a 1987 decision involving the question of compensation for the attorney for a decedent's estate, the court stated:

> The general purposes of the Reform Act, however, support the propositions that it sought to enhance the efficiency of these proceedings by increasing, at least with regard to undisputed matters, the power of the personal representative, and that counsel for the estate was viewed as an employee of the personal representative.

Poe v. Noble, 525 A.2d 190, 193 (D.C. 1987) (emphasis added). In a 1993 case, Hopkins v. Akins, 637 A.2d 424, 428 (D.C. 1993), which involved facts closer to those before us, the court considered the obligations of an attorney when the personal representative of a decedent's estate is depleting the assets of the estate. The Hopkins court relied on the language from Poe quoted above to conclude that the attorney had no legal duty to the beneficiaries of the estate because the client was the personal representative of the estate and not the estate.

Thus, even though the inquirer's view that the estate was the client is a plausible one, that question is one of substantive law and this Committee has no authority to alter the result dictated by settled law in the District of Columbia. It is worth noting, moreover, that the law in the District of Columbia on this point is in accord with the law in most other jurisdictions. See American College of Trust and Estate Counsel, ACTEC Commentaries on the Model Rules of Professional Conduct 3 (2d ed. 1995) ("Under the majority view, a lawyer who represents a fiduciary generally with respect to a fiduciary estate stands in a lawyer-client relationship with the fiduciary and not with respect to the fiduciary estate or the beneficiaries."); Jeffrey N. Pennell, Representations Involving Fiduciary Entities: Who is the Client?, 62 Fordham L. Rev. 1319, 1321 ("A majority of authorities addressing this issue conclude (more or less) that the personal representative is the client . . . ."); see, e.g., Goldberg v. Frye, 266 Cal. Rptr. 483 (Ct. App. 1990); Rutkoski v. Hollis, 600 N.E.2d 1284 (Ill. App. Ct. 1992). Although we have not located any D.C. case applying the approach of Poe and Hopkins to a ward's estate as opposed to a decedent's estate, we see no reason why the D.C. Court of Appeals would reach a different result concerning such estates. See ACTEC Commentaries at 133 ("The lawyer retained by a fiduciary for a disabled person, including a guardian, conservator, or attorney-in-fact, stands in a lawyer-client relationship with respect to the fiduciary.").

Once it is recognized that the inquirer represented the conservators of the estate, and not the estate itself, it is apparent that she should not have assisted two of the conservators – Y and Z – in taking actions adverse to the third conservator – X – since X was a current client of hers. Specifically, Rule 1.7(b)(1) provides that a lawyer is conditionally prohibited from representing a client with respect to a matter if "a position to be taken by that client in that matter is adverse to a position taken or to be taken by another client in the same matter." In the present case, the position of Y and Z was unquestionably adverse to X's position since Y and Z were challenging the fees that X had been paid as a trustee. And X did not consent to the inquirer's representation of Y and Z with respect to that issue.

We note that commentators have struggled to find some justification for permitting a lawyer for an estate at least to be permitted – if not required – to disclose when he or she learns that the fiduciary is taking actions detrimental to the estate. See ACTEC Commentaries at 34 ("[I]n some circumstances the lawyer may be obligated to take affirmative action to protect the interests of the beneficiaries. Some courts have characterized the beneficiaries of a fiduciary estate as derivative or secondary clients of the lawyer for the fiduciary."); Pennell, Who is the Client? at 1321-22 ("many [authorities] also state that a duty – akin to a fiduciary duty – runs from the attorney directly to the beneficiaries of the fiduciary entity"). Indeed, Rule 1.6(d)(2)(A) provides that a lawyer may use or reveal client confidences or secrets "when permitted by these rules or required by law or court order."

In these circumstances, though, we can find no basis for a lawyer taking action adverse to a fiduciary client. To begin with, we are not aware of any rule of law in the District of Columbia permitting a lawyer for a fiduciary to disclose client confidences because the fiduciary may have breached some legal obligation.[6] In addition, even if such a rule existed, that rule would not mean that the inquirer would be permitted to take a position adverse to X concerning that conduct. Indeed, a recent opinion by the ABA Committee on Professional Responsibility concerning counseling of a fiduciary explains that all of the Rules of Professional Conduct should apply in the context of estates law in the same manner that they would apply in any other situation. ABA Formal Op. 94-380 (May 9, 1994). Under the Rules, there was no basis for the inquirer to ignore the prohibition on taking actions adverse to another of her clients.

We therefore conclude that when Y and Z approached the inquirer concerning X's actions as trustee, the inquirer should have declined to provide legal advice, absent X's consent, because X was a client. However, to the extent that the estate and the remaining conservators are no longer in a position adverse to X, we see no problem with the inquirer's continued representation of the conservators.

[5] A comment to the Model Rules, which was not included in the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, explicitly contemplates that the identity of the client will depend on the underlying law of the jurisdiction. See Model Rule 1.7, Comment [13] ("In estate administration the identity of the client may be unclear under the law of a particular jurisdiction. Under one view, the client is the fiduciary; under another view the client is the estate or trust, including its beneficiaries."). We accord no significance to the omission of this comment from the D.C. Rules.

[6] In Hopkins, the court in describing the facts noted that after Hopkins learned that the personal representative of the estate was apparently stealing money from the estate, she disclosed the representative's actions to both a former Register of Wills and the current Register of Wills. However, at the time that the lawyer in Hopkins disclosed her client's confidences, the D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility was in effect, and it permitted a lawyer, without client consent, to reveal "[t]he intention of his client to commit a crime and the information necessary to prevent the crime." DR 4-101(C)(3). Current D.C. Rule 1.6(c), by contrast, permits such a disclosure without consent only to prevent a criminal act likely to result in death or substantial bodily harm or to prevent bribery or intimidation of persons involved in judicial proceedings.

Opinion No. 260

Agreements Limiting the Professional Liability of Lawyers to Former Clients

• A lawyer may not condition settlement of a pending fee dispute on the agreement of the lawyer's unrepresented former client to release the lawyer from malpractice liability unless, prior to negotiating such a release, the lawyer advises the former client of any facts and circumstances known to the lawyer that he reasonably believes might give rise to a claim of malpractice liability.

A lawyer may agree to forego full payment of fees in exchange for a release from or waiver of liability to a client as to a malpractice claim that the lawyer knows might have been resolved in the client's favor, providing the lawyer first gives timely written notice to the client that independent counsel should be obtained prior to negotiating such a settlement or release. Under no circumstances may a lawyer ask a former client to execute a release prohibiting the client from filing a complaint with Bar Counsel.

Inquiry

The Inquirer has requested an opinion based on the following hypothetical fact situation:

A retained lawyer provides substantial legal services for a client over an extensive period of time. When a disagreement occurs, the client discharges the lawyer. The lawyer then sues the client for non-payment of fees. During settlement discussions, the lawyer agrees to accept a portion of the fee that the lawyer believes is due in exchange for a written release from the client. That release states: "I agree to waive and release this firm, including the lawyers employed by the firm, from all claims, complaints or causes of action of any nature as a result of or relating to this firm's representation of and billings to me through the date of this agreement."

Based on this hypothetical, Inquirer asks the following questions:

(1) Is this a violation of the ethical standards in the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct?[1]

(2) Are the following factors outcome determinative:

a) whether the client was represented by different counsel at the time the release was executed;
b) whether the lawyer has filed suit against the client for non-payment of fees;
c) whether the lawyer was aware of any potential malpractice claims against him?

(3) Can a lawyer agree to forego full payment of fees in exchange for a release or waiver of the lawyer's liability to the client in a malpractice suit that the lawyer knows may have resulted in a verdict favoring the client?

(4) Under what circumstances, if any, may a lawyer ask a client to execute a release prohibiting the client from filing a complaint with Bar Counsel?

We conclude that the lawyer in the hypothetical would violate Rule 8.4(c) if: (i) the former client was not represented at the time the release was executed; (ii) the former client was executing the release in consideration for the lawyer's release of the former client from any liability arising out of the lawyer's claim for unpaid fees; and (iii) the lawyer was aware of facts and circumstances that the lawyer reasonably believed might give rise to a claim of malpractice. We further conclude that a lawyer may agree to forego full payment of fees in exchange for a release from or waiver of liability to a client in a malpractice claim that the lawyer knows might have been resolved in the client's favor, providing the lawyer first gives timely written notice to the client that independent counsel should be obtained prior to negotiating such a settlement or release. Finally, we conclude that under no circumstances may a lawyer seek to execute a release that would bar a lawyer's client from filing a complaint with Bar Counsel. The bases of these conclusions are discussed below.

Discussion

A. Rule 8.4(c): Conduct Involving Dishonesty, Fraud, or Misrepresentation

Rule 8.4(c) provides that a lawyer engages in professional misconduct when he or she engages "in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation." In D.C. Bar Op. 79 (1979), we interpreted the term "fraud" as including a false or misleading statement, and we have recognized "that 'fraud' almost always means acts of affirmative representation rather than failure to disclose material facts."[2] Where a lawyer is seeking to settle a claim filed for unpaid fees against a former client who is unrepresented in exchange for the former client's release of malpractice liability, the former client must be able to compare the value of the offered fee reduction with the value of the lawyer's potential malpractice liability in order to determine whether the settlement offer is fair. The lawyer's failure to disclose facts of which he has knowledge that would reasonably give rise to malpractice liability would violate the prohibition in Rule 8.4(c) against dishonest or fraudulent conduct. Absent such a requirement, the former client might not be fully apprised of potential malpractice claims where, as in the hypothetical presented, the client waives rights to pursue "all claims, complaints or causes of action of any nature," and the drafting lawyer seems intent on obfuscating the meaning of the agreement, and not merely limiting malpractice liability. To find otherwise would allow a lawyer to provide the former client with "false or misleading" information about the agreement.

In reaching our conclusion that the facts presented in the hypothetical would run afoul of Rule 8.4(c), we wish to stress that each of the factors raised in Inquirer's second inquiry is outcome-determinative. First, Rule 8.4(c) would not require disclosure if the lawyer had not filed suit to collect unpaid fees. Otherwise, there would be no consideration to support the former client's promise to release the lawyer from any future malpractice liability. Second, Rule 8.4(c) would not apply if the former client were represented, because the client's new counsel would be capable of evaluating the existence and value of the client's malpractice claim through discovery. And third, Rule 8.4(c) would only require disclosure of facts known to the lawyer that the lawyer reasonably believes would give rise to malpractice liability, since one cannot withhold or misrepresent information about which one has no knowledge or that one does not reasonably believe is relevant.

Finally, the Committee wishes to emphasize that its opinion about a lawyer's duty under Rule 8.4(c) is limited to the facts presented in this hypothetical: whether disclosure is required in the context of a negotiation between a lawyer and a former client to settle a fee dispute between them. The Committee is not concluding that a lawyer has a general duty to disclose malpractice liability to a former client in the absence of these circumstances.

[1] See D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct (hereinafter "Rule ___"), D.C. Court Rules Ann., app. A (1994).

[2] D.C. Bar Op. 119 (1983) at 203 (quoting Note, Legal Ethics and the Destruction of Evidence, 88 Yale L.J. 1665, 1667 (1979)).

B. Rule 1.8(g)(2): Agreements Limiting a Lawyer's Malpractice Liability to an Unrepresented or Former Client.

Rule 1.8 prohibits certain lawyer-client transactions as conflicts of interest, including the making of certain agreements with a client to limit a lawyer's professional liability. Rule 1.8(g). Under Rule 1.8(g)(2), "[a] lawyer shall not settle a claim for . . . [malpractice] liability with an unrepresented client or former client without first advising that person in writing that independent representation is appropriate in connection therewith." This provision refers to the negotiation and execution of an agreement to limit or release a lawyer's professional liability once representation has commenced or has been terminated.

A lawyer "settling a claim" under Rule 1.8(g)(2) owes certain duties to a former client. For example, a discharged lawyer must advise a former client in writing that independent representation is appropriate. When a former client has already filed a claim for malpractice and has already obtained independent counsel for that action, the discharged lawyer need not provide this notice, as discovery will unearth the relevant facts.

A discharged lawyer also must allow the former client a reasonable period of time to consult and/or retain new counsel regarding the effect of a release of malpractice claims and, if needed, to negotiate and execute such a settlement or release on the former client's behalf. Where a former client opts not to retain independent counsel after receiving such notice, the discharged lawyer has nonetheless fulfilled this obligation.

Therefore, a lawyer may agree to forego full payment of fees in exchange for a release or waiver of the lawyer's liability to the client in a malpractice suit that the lawyer knows might have resulted in a verdict favoring the client if the lawyer first gives timely written notice to the client that independent counsel should be obtained prior to negotiating such a settlement or release and allows the client a reasonable period of time to retain new counsel.

C. Rule 8.4(d): Agreements Limiting a Lawyer's Exposure to Disciplinary Action

Rule 8.4 makes subject to discipline several types of behavior characterized as "professional misconduct," including conduct that "seriously interferes with the administration of justice." Rule 8.4(d).[3] We believe that an agreement whereby an unrepresented client or former client executes a release in which the client agrees not to file a complaint with Bar Counsel against the lawyer constitutes conduct that "seriously interferes with the administration of justice."

The organization of the Bar of the District of Columbia serves, inter alia, "to aid the Court in carrying on and improving the administration of justice; to foster and maintain on the part of those engaged in the practice of law high ideals of integrity, * * * and high standards of conduct; * * * to the end that the public responsibility of the legal profession may be more effectively discharged." District of Columbia Court Rules Ann., D.C. Bar Rule I (1994) (hereinafter "D.C. Bar Rule __"). To accomplish these goals, the Bar has adopted the Rules of Professional Conduct and established procedures by which members of the Bar who violate those Rules shall be disciplined. D.C. Bar Rules X, XI. Allowing a lawyer to bargain with a client to avoid those procedures, would significantly impair the Bar's ability to regulate its members as well as protect the courts, the legal profession, and the public's confidence in the integrity and competence of the judicial system, thereby "seriously interfere[ing] with the administration of justice."[4]

It is irrelevant, in our opinion, that a lawyer seeks to preclude the filing of a complaint by a client or negotiates for the withdrawal of an existing complaint as part of an agreement to settle a malpractice claim or fee dispute with a former client.[5] Under no circumstances may a lawyer seek to thwart the Bar's duty to oversee, regulate and discipline its members by eliciting a former client's agreement not to file a complaint with Bar Counsel.

Of course, where the former client has obtained counsel for the settlement agreement, the former client's counsel has a duty to report any unprivileged misconduct that is discovered to Bar Counsel if the conduct fits within the standards set forth in Rule 8.3(a). Rule 8.3(a) requires that:

> A lawyer having knowledge that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness, or fitness as a lawyer in other respects, shall inform the appropriate professional authority.

In this Committee's Opinion No. 246 (1994), we determined that Rule 8.3(a) imposed an absolute duty on a lawyer to report another lawyer's misconduct. To be sure, a lawyer's "failure to report would itself be an ethical violation." Id. at 62. This rule allows Bar Counsel to help maintain the Bar's integrity and prevents the use of such information as a threat during negotiations to obtain a bargaining advantage.[6]

Inquiry

Inquirers are the Director and two members of an organization that provides pro bono legal assistance to battered women. The organization, which is staffed by law students and supervised by a law professor, has developed a new Program that will provide legal information to battered women in the emergency room of a local hospital. This information will include advice on the availability of legal remedies and representation. In addition, if a patient requests, one of the Program's counselors will refer the patient to sources of legal assistance. If the patient has financial resources that render her ineligible for pro bono assistance, she will be referred to fee-charging attorneys. None of the Program's counselors will be affiliated with these fee-charging attorneys. If the patient is eligible for pro bono assistance, the counselors will refer her to pro bono legal clinics with which some of the counselors may be affiliated. No referrals will be made unless the patient specifically requests one. Counselors will only provide patients with the names of sources of legal assistance; patients will pursue these referrals on their own volition after they have left the emergency room.

The inquirers have asked the Committee whether the Program's emergency room referrals would violate Rule 7.1(b)(2) and (3) of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules" or "Rules").[1] We conclude that they would not.

Discussion

D.C. Rule 7.1 provides that

> "(b) A lawyer shall not seek by in-person contact, or through an intermediary, employment . . . by a non-lawyer who has not sought the lawyer's advice regarding employment of a lawyer, if:
> . . .
> (2) the solicitation involves the use of undue influence;
> (3) the potential client is apparently in a physical or mental condition which would make it unlikely that the potential client could exercise reasonable, considered judgment as to the selection of a lawyer . . . ."

In order to determine whether the Program's referrals would violate Rule 7.1(b)(2) and (3), we must divide the referrals into two categories – those to lawyers or legal clinics with which the Program's counselors are not affiliated and those to legal clinics with which some of the counselors may be affiliated.

Beginning with the first category, Rule 7.1(b)(2) and (3) would not apply to referrals to unaffiliated lawyers. Rule 7.1(b) governs a lawyer's attempt to solicit, that is, to "seek . . . employment," from a potential client either directly or through an intermediary. Thus, this Committee has previously applied Rule 7.1(b) to an arrangement in which a law firm planned to pay a per-client fee to an insurance company for referrals[2] and to one in which a law firm planned to retain a marketing agent to solicit clients.[3] In both cases, the law firms engaged intermediaries for the specific purpose of obtaining clients. In contrast, an attorney who receives a referral from a counselor who is not the attorney's agent, who receives no consideration for the referral,[4] and who is not acting under the attorney's direction[5] is not actively "seeking employment" within the meaning of Rule 7.1(b). Rather, the attorney is the passive beneficiary of a recommendation. Rule 7.1(b), therefore, would not apply to a referral to any attorney with which the Program's counselors are not affiliated.[6]

It is a closer question whether Rule 7.1(b) applies to referrals made by counselors to lawyers or legal clinics with which some of the Program's counselors may be affiliated. The circumstances surrounding the referrals in this particular inquiry, however, lead us to conclude that the provisions of Rule 7.1(b) do not apply. Here, a counselor is providing a patient with a list of clinics and attorneys that may include an attorney or clinic with which some of the Program's counselors are affiliated, but the counselor is not encouraging the patient to select an affiliated clinic or attorney over the other clinics and attorneys on the list. Thus, the Program is not "seeking employment" for an affiliated clinic or attorney, and Rule 1.7(b) would not apply.

The conduct that is the subject of this inquiry is, therefore, quite different from the in-person solicitations that were at issue in In re Gregory, 574 A.2d 265 (D.C. 1990), where the D.C. Court of Appeals found that a lawyer's aggressive, in-person solicitations of criminal defendants in a courthouse may have violated DR 2-103(A)(3) of the Code of Professional Responsibility of the District of Columbia, the nearly identically worded predecessor to Rule 7.1(b)(3).[7] Unlike the respondent in In re Gregory, who was soliciting clients for only himself, the counselors in this inquiry are merely providing patients with a list of

[1] The inquirers also requested an opinion on whether the Program would involve the unauthorized practice of law within the meaning of Rule 5.5 of the D.C. Rules and D.C. Court of Appeals Rule 49(b)(2) and (3). The definition of the practice of law is a question of law, see Rule 5.5 cmt. 1, and, under Committee Rule C-5, the Legal Ethics Committee does not provide opinions on questions of law. Therefore, the Committee does not address this aspect of the inquiry.

St. Romain*, 560 So. 2d 820, 823 (La. 1990) (solicitation rule does not apply because there was insufficient proof that a lawyer solicited "clients through a non-lawyer who is rewarded for the solicitation."); In re Appert, 315 N.W.2d 204, 214 (Minn. 1981) (solicitaiton rule does not apply to lawyer's attempt to contact prospective client who had been referred to him by a student researcher at a law school because "no exchange of value took place" between the student and the lawyer).

[6] See D.C. Bar Op. 51 (1978) ("it is clearly permissible for [an insurance agent] to refer clients to the inquiring party as a result of his own independent deliberation.").

[7] DR 2-103 (A) provided that:

> "A lawyer shall not seek by in-person contact, or through an intermediary, his or her employment (or employment of a partner or associate) by a non-lawyer who has not sought his or her advice regarding employment of a lawyer, if:
> . . .

legal clinics and attorneys; they are not in any way suggesting to these patients that the latter select one attorney or clinic on the list over another or that they select any of the clinics or attorneys on the list.

Moreover, in contrast to In re Gregory, which found that courthouse solicitation is likely to exploit a vulnerable group of potential clients, in violation of DR 2-103, the program at issue here would minimize the possibility that a patient would feel pressured in her choice of an attorney by providing the patient with a list of clinics and attorneys only if the patient requests one and by permitting the patients to pursue these referrals on their own volition after they have left the emergency room and have had more time for additional reflection.[8]

The activities performed by the counselors here are significantly more like the activities approved by the Committee in D.C. Bar Op. 64 (1979). In that opinion, this Committee concluded that the Law Students in Court Program, which operated an information booth in the Landlord-Tenant Branch of the Superior Court that informed tenants about the free legal assistance that the program offered, did not violate DR 2-103 of the Code of Professional Responsibility.

Conclusion

The Committee concludes that the Program's emergency room referrals would not violate Rule 7.1(b)(2) and (3). When the Program refers patients to attorneys and clinics with which the Program's counselors are not affiliated, the referrals are mere recommendations to which Rule 7.1(b)(2) and (3) does not apply. When the Program referrals include attorneys or clinics with which some of its counselors may be affiliated, Rule 7.1(b)(2) and (3) also does not apply, since the patients are not being pressured to select the affiliated attorneys and clinics over the other attorneys and clinics in the referrals.

Application of Rule 1.5(d) to Receipt of a Contingent Fee in a Writ of Error Coram Nobis Proceeding

• Rule 1.5(d), prohibiting contingent fees in criminal cases, does not apply to a writ of error coram nobis proceeding. Therefore, a lawyer may accept a contingent fee to represent an individual in such a proceeding.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 1.5(d) (Ban on Contingent Fees for Representing a Defendant in a Criminal Case)

Inquiry

The inquirer, a private lawyer, requests an opinion whether a lawyer may enter into a contingent fee agreement to represent a person, who was previously convicted by a court-martial and has been released, in an effort to have the prior criminal conviction set aside by a writ of error coram nobis. If successful, the individual will be entitled to back pay and allowances from which the lawyer's contingent fee will be paid.

Discussion

Rule 1.5 provides that a "[a] lawyer shall not enter into an arrangement for, charge, or collect a contingent fee for representing a defendant in a criminal case." Comment [6] to the Rule notes that this provision continues the prohibition imposed under the previous Code of Professional Responsibility. According to Ethical Consideration 2-20 of that Code, "[p]ublic policy properly condemns contingent fee arrangements in criminal cases, largely on the ground that legal services in criminal cases do not produce a res with which to pay the fee."

A Writ of Error Coram Nobis ("Writ") originally was a common law writ brought to correct a judgment that the court would not have made had it known of an error of fact at the time of the original proceeding. The Writ was brought in an independent civil proceeding governed by civil rules.[1] Today, the Writ is the only post-conviction remedy that can be used to vacate a federal conviction after the petitioner has been released from custody. It will be granted only where necessary to correct errors of such a fundamental character as to render the previous court proceeding invalid.[2] Such errors include a violation of the right to counsel; incompetency of counsel; insanity or incompetency of the petitioner at trial; and a subsequent Supreme Court or appellate decision holding unconstitutional the federal statute under which petitioner was convicted. In other words, the Writ will be granted only where the circumstances compel such action to achieve justice.[3]

For the reasons discussed below, we conclude that Rule 1.5(d) does not apply to a Writ proceeding. We believe that Rule 1.5(d) is intended to apply to criminal cases in which the government proceeds against a criminal defendant. By comparison, the petition for a Writ is filed by an individual who, after release from custody, claims error in the previous criminal proceeding. The individual is not identified as a defendant, but rather as the petitioner.

Although many reasons have been given for the ban on contingent fees in criminal cases, and the precise rationale is somewhat murky, we find that none of these reasons apply to a Coram Nobis proceeding. One reason often given is that if contingent fees were permitted, lawyers would be less likely to accept less meritorious cases. In a Writ proceeding, however, the concern that lawyers will be discouraged from representing criminal defendants does not apply, since the criminal proceedings are already complete.

A second rationale for the ban was that "legal services in criminal cases do not produce a res with which to pay the fee."[4] Even if that rationale were still relevant, we note that the Writ in a court-martial conviction may generate a res (back pay and allowances) from which a fee can be paid. Finally, it is argued that contingent fees are not necessary in criminal cases because there is a constitutional guarantee of counsel for indigent criminal defendants. In a Writ proceeding, however, there is no such right to counsel. Contingent fees thus may enable individuals to secure counsel when they might otherwise lack the necessary financial resources to do so.

Whether a Writ proceeding is a civil or criminal proceeding has not been clearly decided. A confusing footnote to a Supreme Court opinion[5] and a division among the circuits[6] have served to muddy the waters in this regard.

[3] A Writ is an important remedy because of certain negative collateral consequences that result from a conviction, e.g., denial of certain rights (voting, holding office); expulsion from, or denial of access to, certain professions; sentence enhancement for recidivism; and the social and economic stigma of a conviction.

But even if the Writ proceeding were deemed to be a criminal proceeding, the petitioner in the proceeding would have to be a "defendant," in our view, to bring the proposed transaction within Rule 1.5(d). Although he was the defendant in the original criminal case, the Committee believes that, at this stage of the legal proceedings, the coram nobis petitioner is not a "defendant." As we noted above, Rule 1.5(d), by its terms, applies only to representation of a "defendant in a criminal case." In our view, the representation of an individual in a Writ proceeding, where the individual allegedly wronged, i.e., the petitioner, initiates the legal action, is plainly not covered by the Rule. Thus, a lawyer may accept a contingent fee in a Writ proceeding.

Contacts With Persons Represented by Counsel; Application of Rule 8.4(g) to Criminal Contempt Proceedings

• Where Lawyer A purports to limit his/her representation of a party in litigation to a particular aspect of that litigation, opposing Lawyer B, under Rule 4.2(a), may not communicate directly with Lawyer A's client on other aspects of the litigation without Lawyer A's consent, where there are issues in common in the represented and unrepresented aspects of the case. Where consent is withheld, Lawyer A must nevertheless receive the communication from Lawyer B and transmit it to the client.

The bringing of a motion for criminal contempt of a domestic relations civil protection order, in order to gain advantage in the underlying domestic relations case, is not seeking criminal charges to gain advantage in a civil matter, as prohibited by Rule 8.4(g).

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.4(a) (Keeping Client Informed of Status of a Matter)
• Rule 4.2(a) (Communications Between Lawyer and Opposing Parties)
• Rule 8.4(g) (Seeking or Threatening Criminal Charges to Obtain Advantage in Civil Matter)

Inquiry

The Inquirer is a lawyer who represents victims of domestic violence in proceedings in Superior Court. We are informed by the Inquirer that one legal remedy for a victim of domestic violence is a Civil Protection Order (CPO), a court order issued against the perpetrator of the domestic violence. Among other things, the CPO prohibits the respondent-perpetrator from coming into physical proximity of the petitioner-victim. See D.C. Code §16-1005.

If a CPO is violated, the petitioner may bring a motion for criminal contempt against the respondent. Under District of Columbia Superior Court practice, the criminal contempt proceeding is initiated by motion in the action which led to the issuance of the CPO. See Rule 12, D.C Superior Court Family Division Rules on Intra-Family Proceedings. See also D.C. Code, §16-1005(f). The petitioner may also separately move the court to modify the terms of the CPO to give greater protection from the perpetrator.

If the respondent in a CPO proceeding is indigent, the Superior Court will appoint counsel to represent that person in a criminal contempt proceeding. We are advised that appointed counsel for the respondent usually limits his representation to the contempt motion, most likely because his Criminal Justice Act appointment is so limited, and does not provide representation in the motion to amend the CPO order. Comment [4] to Rule of Professional Conduct 1.2 approves such limited representation, where the "scope of services provided by the lawyer may be limited . . . by terms under which the lawyer's services are made available to the client. "Nevertheless, the CPO modification proceeding and the criminal contempt proceeding typically involve some common facts, i.e., those relating to the alleged violation of the CPO.

One question posed by the Inquirer concerns the situation where counsel appointed to defend the criminal contempt motion does not, in fact, consider his representation to include the CPO modification proceeding. The Inquirer acknowledges that the lawyer for the petitioner/victim cannot communicate directly with the respondent concerning the contempt matter, since counsel has been appointed for the respondent in that proceeding; but she asks if it is ethical for her to communicate directly with the respondent concerning the CPO modification proceeding.

The Inquirer also asks whether it is ethical for a criminal contempt motion to be filed in a CPO matter so that, among other things, its pendency (and the consequent risk to the respondent of a fine or imprisonment) may be used to obtain the respondent's consent to a modification of the CPO to afford greater protection to the petitioner-victim.

Discussion

Communications With a Party Represented By Counsel

The ethical propriety of communication by a lawyer for a party with another party to a matter is governed by subpart (a) of Rule of Professional Conduct 4.2 ("Communication Between Lawyer and Opposing Parties"), which reads as follows:

> During the course of representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party known to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other party or is authorized by law to do so (emphasis added).

The Rule 4.2(a) question presented to us depends upon whether the CPO modification proceeding in which the lawyer seeks to communicate directly with the respondent is the same "matter" as the contempt proceeding, in which the respondent has legal representation. If it is, then Rule 4.2(a) prohibits direct communication from the petitioner's lawyer to respondent without the consent of respondent's counsel. Under the facts of this Inquiry, we believe that the litigation in which the two motions have been filed is a single "matter" for purposes of Rule 4.2(a), and that this direct communication is prohibited without the requisite consent.

[5] U.S. v. Morgan, 346 U.S. 502 (1954) (Writ available to challenge criminal judgments under the all writs section of the Judicial Code, construing 28 U.S.C. §1651(a).) The referenced footnote is quoted in relevant part: "Such a motion is a step in the criminal case and not, like habeas corpus where relief is sought in a separate case and record, the beginning of a separate civil proceeding . . . . This motion is of the same general character as one under 28 U.S.C. §2255." id. at 505 n.4. (At the time, courts viewed §2255 motions as civil proceedings.)

[6] There has been much litigation in this area because the nature of the proceeding (whether civil or criminal) determines which rules of procedure apply in the federal courts.

The term "matter" is used in several other provisions of the Rules of Professional Conduct, including Rules 1.7 and 1.9 (conflicts of interest), and Rule 1.10 (imputed disqualification). It is nowhere defined, but Comment [3] to Rule 1.7 states, with reference to when a lawyer is adverse to a client in a "matter," that:

> [t]he concept of "matter" is typically apparent in on-the-record adversary proceedings or other proceedings in which a written record of the position of parties exists.

This Comment suggests that, at least with respect to litigation, a particular litigation is a "matter."

ABA Opinion 95-396 (July 28, 1995) discusses Rule 4.2(a). Concerning the meaning of the term "matter" and its scope, the ABA Opinion offers this example from criminal law:

> [I]f the communicating lawyer represents a client with respect to a separate and distinct crime B and wishes to contact Defendant regarding that crime, the representation by counsel in crime A does not bar communications about crime B.... By prohibiting communication about the subject matter of the representation, the Rule contemplates that the matter is defined and specific, such that the communicating lawyer can be placed on notice of the subject of representation. Thus, if the representation is focused on a given matter, such as one involving past conduct, and the communicating lawyer is aware of this representation, she may not communicate with the represented person absent consent of the representing lawyer.

The quoted language, while not addressing the specific situation in the Inquiry before us, is consistent with an interpretation of "matter" as a particular litigation. Moreover, we believe that such an interpretation is the only one which makes any sense. While litigation may have many facets to it, those facets typically have at least some facts, evidence and legal principles in common. Activities or developments in one facet of a case rarely fail to have implications in others. That circumstance is well-illustrated in the Inquiry before us, where the core question in a CPO modification motion and in a criminal contempt motion is the same: what, if anything, did the respondent do in violation of the CPO.

If, for purposes of Rule 4.2(a), "matter" were interpreted to mean that the CPO modification proceeding and the contempt proceeding were different "matters," then a communication by the petitioner's lawyer to the respondent concerning the CPO modification proceeding would not violate Rule 4.2(a), because the respondent would be unrepresented in that "matter."Yet, because of the common facts in the two motions, a communication concerning the modification motion from the petitioner's lawyer directly to the respondent would involve all of the concerns Rule 4.2(a) addresses, such as the lawyer's use of the advantages of the lawyer's training and experience to secure concessions or admissions from the adverse party. Clearly, such direct contact could influence, in a way that Rule 4.2(a) was intended to prevent, the ability of respondent's lawyer to represent his client in the contempt motion. As one court observed in a case concerning Rule 4.2(a)'s predecessor, DR 7-104(A)(1):

> The purpose of this prohibition is to prevent a person from being deprived of the advice of retained counsel by the bypassing of such counsel.... Disciplinary Rule 7-104(A)(1) preserves the attorney-client relationship as well as the proper functioning of the judicial system and at the same time safeguards the opposing party from an approach that may be improper or from an approach that may be well intended but misguided.

Carter v. Kanaras, 430 A.2d 1058, 1059 (R.I. 1981). A respected commentator puts the reason for the Rule 4. 2(a) prohibition more bluntly:

> The prohibition is founded on the possibility of treachery that might result if lawyers were free to exploit the presumably vulnerable position of a represented but unadvised party.

Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics (1986). Thus, our conclusion is that the relevant "matter" is the legal proceeding brought by the domestic violence victim, with the CPO modification and contempt motions being but different aspects of that proceeding. [1]

Since we believe that there is just one matter in the type of domestic violence case the Inquirer describes, we believe that Rule 4.2(a) would require the lawyer representing the domestic violence petitioner to seek the consent of the lawyer representing the respondent in the contempt proceeding before communicating with the respondent directly concerning the CPO modification. Where consent is given, the communication obviously may occur without ethical consequence under Rule 4.2(a).

Yet we can envision situations in which consent might not be given as, for example, when respondent's lawyer is concerned that his client might say something in a CPO modification discussion with opposing counsel that might be used against the client in the contempt proceeding. But where consent is not given by the appointed lawyer, that lawyer cannot use Rule 4.2(a) and the limited scope of the engagement to prevent any CPO modification communications between the petitioner's lawyer and the respondent. The petitioner's lawyer needs to be able to communicate in some way with the respondent concerning the CPO modification motion, be it directly or through counsel. The subjects of such communication could be as routine as scheduling matters, or could involve settlement, evidence or other more substantive matters. There must be a way for these to occur. If the respondent's lawyer refuses to allow such communication with the respondent directly, then the lawyer must accept the communication from the petitioner's lawyer and take appropriate steps in response, such as transmitting the information to his client and acting on his client's wishes.

In other words, where respondent's lawyer invokes Rule 4.2(a) to prevent a direct communication between petitioner's lawyer and his client, respondent's lawyer must receive that communication as occurring within the scope of his representation of the respondent, and report the communication to his/her client.[2] To fail to do so would, in our opinion, constitute a violation of Rule 1.4 (requiring a lawyer to keep his client informed about the status of a matter).[3]

In summary, under the facts of this case,

[1] A different conclusion might result if the represented and unrepresented aspects of a litigation were completely unrelated, such that there would be no way that a direct communication from a lawyer to the opposing party could prejudice the ability of that party's lawyer to represent his client. Cf. ABA Op. 93-396 (1993).

[2] Where the respondent's lawyer advises petitioner's counsel that he is not in a position to give or withold consent because he does not represent the respondent in the CPO modification motion, the petitioner's lawyer may treat that as consent under Rule 4.2(a) to a direct communication with the respondent. In this circumstance, petitioner's lawyer may reasonably conclude that respondent's counsel has evaluated the consequences to the criminal contempt motion of a direct communication with his client concerning CPO modification, and has concluded that he has no objection to it.

[3] Rule 1.4 requires that:

> (a) A lawyer keep a client reasonably informed about the status of a matter and shall promptly comply with reasonable requests for information.

the petitioner's lawyer may not initiate direct communication with the respondent before contacting that party's lawyer. The response of respondent's lawyer will then inform the petitioner's lawyer to how to proceed. If the respondent's lawyer does not object to communication by petitioner's lawyer with the respondent directly, petitioner's lawyer may do so without violating Rule 4.2(a). If, on the other hand, respondent's lawyer advises petitioner's lawyer not to communicate directly with the respondent, the petitioner's lawyer may not do so, but respondent's lawyer thereby assumes the obligation to transmit information from petitioner's lawyer to his/her client and to take such further steps as may be necessary under the circumstances.

Use of the Contempt Proceeding to Gain Advantage under the CPO

The second question presented to us is whether the petitioner's lawyer, after filing a motion for contempt, may offer not to prosecute the motion in order to negotiate a modification of the CPO that would be more favorable to the petitioner. The applicable ethical principle is found in Rule of Professional Conduct 8.4(g), which states:

> It is professional misconduct for a lawyer to:
> . . .
> (g) seek or threaten to seek criminal charges or disciplinary charges solely to obtain advantage in a civil matter.

The inquiry raises two potential questions:is a criminal contempt proceeding in a CPO matter a "criminal charge" under Rule 8.4(g) and, if it is, under the facts of the inquiry, is it raised solely to gain advantage in the CPO-modification matter.

There are no prior Legal Ethics Committee opinions concerning this aspect of Rule 8.4(g) or its predecessor in the Code of Professional Responsibility, DR 7-105.[4] As regards the meaning of the term "criminal charges", we see no reason why we should not interpret it as having its ordinary meaning in substantive law. And, according to clear authority in this jurisdiction, a criminal contempt proceeding is not a criminal prosecution. See Beckham v. United States, 609 A. 2d 1122 (D.C. 1992); Matter of Wiggins, 359 A. 2d 579 (D.C. 1976). It follows, then, that seeking or threatening criminal contempt is not seeking or threatening criminal charges under Rule 8.4(g).

This is, we believe, the correct conclusion.In an underlying civil matter in the District of Columbia, a criminal contempt motion may be brought by a party for the specific purpose of enforcing an order of the court in that proceeding. It is, then, by its very nature, a remedy that is available for the specific purpose of furthering the ends of a civil matter. To interpret Rule 8.4(g) to apply to such a proceeding would, effectively, make it a disciplinary violation for a lawyer to seek this particular remedy, a clearly illogical and anomalous result, and one we do not believe was intended by the drafters of this Rule.

Refunds of Special Retainers; Commingling of Such Funds with the General Funds of the Law Firm Upon Receipt

• A retainer that is tied directly to provision of legal services, rather than designed solely to ensure availability, constitutes a special retainer which is earned upon provision of the contemplated services rather than upon receipt. A law firm must refund unused portions of such a retainer. Under the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, a special retainer or fee advance becomes the property of the law firm upon receipt; may be commingled with the law firm's own funds; and must not be commingled with client funds in a client trust account. Such an arrangement must not prevent an accounting to the client or a refund if required.

Inquiry

The Inquirer is a law firm that wishes to place into effect a legal services plan in the government contract field for small business concerns. As explained by the Inquirer, "companies desiring to enroll in the [Plan] would pay a fixed fee of $4,500 for up to 40 hours of government contract legal services during the ensuing year. (There is also a one-time 20 hour, six-month trial plan for $2,500.) Except where conflicts arise subsequent to enrollment and no waiver is received, the enrollment fee would not be refundable." The Inquirer states that the hourly fee under the plan (assuming full utilization of the contemplated hours) is substantially lower than its normal hourly rates. Enrollment in the plan would be contractual, pursuant to a written agreement containing the following terms:

> For a one-year period of enrollment, [Inquirer] will provide up to 40 hours of legal services to the Company on any federal government contract matter(s). For the six-month trial period of enrollment, [Inquirer] will provide up to 20 hours of legal services, to the Company on any federal government contract matter(s). These hours of legal services may include any combination of legal consultation (by telephone or in [Inquirer's] Washington, D.C. office), legal research, or drafting and filing of documents.....
> If the Company requires services beyond the number of hours covered by the Plan, such services will be performed by [Inquirer] only with the advance written consent of the Company, and will be billed to the Company at [Inquirer's] regular hourly rates, plus all out-of-pocket expenses.
> Because the enrollment fee for the Plan is a retainer to ensure the availability of [Inquirer's] government contracts legal services, the fee is not refundable in whole or in part if the Company requests fewer than the applicable hours of legal services during the enrollment period (40 hours for one year of enrollment, 20 hours for a six-month trial period).

The Inquirer has asked for advice on two aspects of this plan:

A. Can the enrollment fee be non-refundable?

B. If such a fee must be refundable, must it be segregated and treated as funds of the client?

Discussion

A. Refundability

The refundability issue turns on whether the contemplated arrangement constitutes a special retainer, which is a species of fee advance, or a general retainer. A general (or "true") retainer is a "fee[] paid solely for availability and therefore do[es] not involve

(b) A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation.

Since, under the facts of this Inquiry, we have concluded that the entire litigaiton is the "matter," the lawyer's obligation to keep the client "reasonably informed about the status of a matter" would oblige him to keep the client informed about developments in the CPO modification proceeding.

[4] D.C. Op. 220 (1991) concerned a different aspect of Rule 8.4(g), to wit, whether the filing of disciplinary charges against a lawyer can be threatened in order to influence the settlement of a civil matter in which the lawyer is involved as a party or counsel.

an advance fee but a fee that is fully earned when paid."[1] In many jurisdictions, a general retainer is deemed earned when paid and therefore is not refundable.[2] The traditional justification for a general retainer is that the fee secures the lawyer's availability to perform legal services during a specified period, a commitment that normally requires the lawyer to forego other representations and commit exclusively to the cause of the retaining client.[3] A general retainer is paid solely for availability and a promise of exclusivity, and is not related to time expended on a particular matter. By contrast, a "special" retainer is an advance fee payment that is consumed by the performance of legal services. Such a retainer is not "earned" upon receipt but rather is tied to the performance of services.[4] Any part of the retainer that the lawyer has not earned by her services must be refundable to the client, in line with the general rule that a lawyer's normal remedy for unpaid fees lies in quantum meruit.[5]

Refusal to refund unused portions of a special retainer or fee advance traditionally has been thought to burden a client's right to discharge the lawyer. Our Rules allow a client broad rights to discharge counsel without financial penalty. Rule 1.16(d) thus states that "in connection with any termination of representation, a lawyer shall take timely steps to the extent reasonably practicable to protect a client's interests, such as . . . refunding any advance payment of fee that has not been earned." Comment [4] to Rule 1.16 explains that "[a] client has a right to discharge a lawyer at any time, with or without cause, subject to liability for payment for the lawyer's services" (emphasis added). Comment [4] to Rule 1.5 underscores the proposition that "[a] lawyer may require advance payment of a fee, but is obliged to return any unearned portion." If the liability of the discharging client is only for payment for the services actually rendered by the lawyer, the client is not liable for the full amount of a special retainer designed to encompass services that have not yet been rendered.

Courts in other states have concluded that nonrefundable special retainers violate public policy by burdening a client's right to discharge counsel. In In re Cooperman, 611 N.Y.S. 2d 465 (Ct. App. 1994), for example, the New York Court of Appeals concluded that a nonrefundable special retainer burdens the client's right to discharge her attorney because the client will be less likely to terminate the lawyer if the retainer is nonrefundable. The court therefore held that nonrefundable special retainers are against public policy:

> We hold that the use of a special nonrefundable retainer fee agreement clashes with public policy because it inappropriately compromises the right to sever the fiduciary services relationship with the lawyer. . . . If special nonrefundable retainers are allowed to flourish, clients would be relegated to hostage status in an unwanted fiduciary relationship -- an utter anomaly. Such circumstance would impose a penalty on a client for daring to invoke a hollow right to discharge.

Another problem arising from nonrefundable special retainers arises under D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct Rule 1.5, which commands that "[a] lawyer's fee shall be reasonable," and enumerates a number of factors to be considered in determining the reasonableness of a fee, including, inter alia, the time and labor required. In the case of a nonrefundable special retainer, the fee may be unreasonable, and thus void, if it does not correspond to the actual services provided by the lawyer. For example, if a lawyer is discharged by his client shortly after receiving a nonrefundable special retainer, having performed very little legal work for the client, the retainer may constitute an unreasonable fee because it would bear little relation to the work performed. In the instant situation, for example, a dissatisfied client might end up paying an hourly fee of $4,500 if the Inquirer performs only one hour of legal work prior to discharge. Our ethical rules therefore preclude a lawyer from retaining all of a special retainer when the attorney-client relationship is quickly and unexpectedly severed.[6]

These principles compel the conclusion that special retainers or fee advances in this jurisdiction must be refundable. Moreover, we conclude that the retainer in question in this case is a special retainer which cannot be nonrefundable. The classic element of a nonrefundable general retainer is missing from the plan; the need to ensure the availability of a particular lawyer or law firm during a given period of time. There is no exclusivity inherent in Inquirer's proposed plan; instead, the plan makes the Inquirer's services available to a virtually unlimited universe of clients who seek representation. It is difficult to understand how a client, under this plan, could preclude a rival or competitor from also retaining the Inquirer for government contract representation during the relevant period, in the absence of a conflict of interest under our rules. The proposed plan does not require that the Inquirer commit its time and resources exclusively to a particular client, or forego any opportunities for further representation during the period in question.

Although not in itself determinative, we find it significant that the arrangement contemplates that a specific amount of time will be reserved, and a specific amount of legal work will be performed in exchange for the retainer: $4,500 for "40 hours of assistance on any federal government contracts matter(s)," meaning payment for such legal services as "legal consultation . . ., review of documents, legal research, or drafting and filing of documents." The advance fee thus is not remitted "solely to ensure the availability" of the firm and its lawyers. Indeed, the draft brochure describing the legal plan states that "[t]he basic Plan fee of $4,500 represents a significant discount from [Inquirer's] regular rates for government contract legal services," indicating that the fee is actually targeted to compensate for services performed.[7] This conclusion is reinforced by the plan's provision allowing a potential client to enroll in a "trial plan" for twenty hours of services at a reduced fee, which provides further evidence that the payment is tied directly to time expended.

The Inquirer suggests that D.C. Bar Opinion 155 demonstrates that the fee in this case can properly be made nonrefundable. Opinion 155 concerned a prepaid legal services plan providing corporate, tax and general business law services on a reduced hourly fee basis to a non-profit organization's tax-exempt member organizations. The members paid a set monthly amount to reserve up to ten hours of legal services per month. A member requiring more than ten hours per month was charged an hourly rate based upon the member's yearly income. The members could accrue unused hours from month to month, but no refunds would be made for unused guaranteed hours.

Opinion 155 does not address the issue of refundability, and thus provides little guidance in the instant case. Instead, the Committee in Opinion 155 was concerned about the risk that under the plan clients might be charged an excessive fee, because the monthly amount was paid whether or not the member actually used the hours for which it had paid. The Committee found this risk mitigated by the small maximum hour limitation (ten hours) and because members could accrue unused hours and retain them. On this basis, plainly not applicable here, the Committee upheld the validity of the fee arrangement.[8]

Our conclusion is not inconsistent with freedom of contract, nor do we intend to inhibit lawyers from negotiating alternative fee arrangements that are meant in whole or in part to compensate for availability, exclusivity or concomitant lost opportunities. Although "'[s]ophisticated lawyers and clients ought to be able to use . . . a reasonable nonrefundable fee' as an alternative billing method . . .,"[9] authority in other jurisdictions establishes that when an attorney is employed under a contract stipulating a specific fee for specific services, the attorney is entitled to recover only in quantum meruit for services performed prior to discharge.[10] This conclusion harmonizes "the right of an attorney to recover for services he provided with the policy of instilling public confidence in the members of an honorable profession whose relationship to clients is personal and confidential."[11]

Although we conclude that a special retainer must be non-refundable when the lawyer's services are terminated before completion of the professional engagement, this does not mean that the refund must be a proportionate amount of the advance fee paid. In the inquiry before us, if a client who had contracted for 40 hours of legal services for $4,500 (i.e., $112.50 per hour) terminated the engagement after 20 hours of service, or half the engagement period, Rule 1.16(d) would not necessarily require a refund of one-half the retainer. Under these circumstances, it would not be unreasonable for the law firm to deny the client the benefit of the original "volume discount", and charge the client for 20 hours at its usual hourly rate. Other factors listed in Rule 1.5(a) could also be relied on in determining the fee in the event the contract is not completed. Of course, both the fee to be charged if the contract is not terminated and the fee chargeable on early termination must be reasonable under Rule 1.5(a). In addition, the basis of both fees must be communicated in writing to the client in advance under Rule 1.5(b). Reasonableness and the requirement of an advance writing may apply to general retainers as well. We do not address ethics limitations applicable to general retainers in this opinion, as the issue is not presented by this inquiry.

Finally, merely stating in a contract that the retainer fee is a general retainer or nonrefundable does not necessarily make it so.[12] In order to be considered a true general retainer, and hence nonrefundable, there must be a clear indication that the retainer fee in fact is being paid to secure the exclusive availability of the lawyer or firm and is not intended to pay for specific services to be rendered.

B. Segregation of Funds

In Opinion 113, the Legal Ethics Committee rejected the view that fee advances are "funds of a client" under DR 9-103, and therefore concluded that such advances do not need to be placed in a separate account. The Committee reasoned that the "funds" referred to in DR 9-103 did not include any fees paid to the lawyer, because that provision did not include any reference to "fees" despite the widespread usage of that term throughout the Code. The Committee added: "Any escrow or trust requirement over the fee advance would defeat the objective of the fee advance: to take the attorney away from the financial mercies of the client." Finally, the Committee noted that policy considerations, including the lack of discontent over the placing of advance fees in the law firm's general account, supported continuing the policy of allowing commingling of advance fees.

> Rule 1.15 makes this practice more explicit. Rule 1.15(d) states: Advances of legal fees and costs become the property of the lawyer upon receipt. Any unearned amount of prepaid fees must be returned to the client at the termination of the lawyer's services in accordance with Rule 1.16(d).

[7] In In re Hathaway Ranch Partnership, 116 Bankr. 208, 216 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1990), the court stated that:

> [a] true earned upon receipt retainer is one paid to a lawyer for which the only consideration exchanged is the promise to represent the client and no other party in the particular matter. The consideration cannot include logically the provision of future services if the retainer is truly earned upon receipt (citing In re C&P Auto Transport, Inc., 94 Bankr. 682, 687 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 1988)).

[8] D.C. Op. 155 also is distinct from this case in that the lawyer-client relationship was with an organization to which individual members belonged, rather than directly between the law firm and an individual client. Such arrangements commonly arise in pre-paid legal services plan maintained by labor unions, under which the union pays a specific fee to ensure the availability of its law firm to represent union members on certain matters. We are not confronted by that situation in this case, and do not address it. Inquirer also relies on D.C. Op. 113, which deals with the safekeeping of fee advances and not with refundability. We do not view D.C. Op. 113 as pertinent to the issue placed before us on this occasion.

[11] Cohen, 645 A.2d at 1259.

[12] Kin Cheung Wong V. Kennedy, 853 F. Supp. 73, 81 (E.D.N.Y. 1994) ("Merely reciting the language 'shall be deemed earned' does not convert the Retainer Agreement into a general retainer . . there is nothing in the Retainer Agreement to indicate that the payment was made in exchange for [the lawyer's] availability."); State Bar of Tex. Professional Ethics Comm. Op. 431 (June 1986) ("A fee is not earned simply because it is designated as nonrefundable.")

It is clear from Rule 1.15(d) that any advance payment, regardless of whether it is denominated as a general retainer, or a special retainer or advance fee, becomes the property of the lawyer upon receipt and does not have to be placed in an account separate from the firm's general account. This conclusion in no way qualifies the duty to refund fees where appropriate, as Rule 1.15(d) itself states.

For this reason, in this jurisdiction fee advances and general retainers should not be commingled with client funds contained in a client trust account. Indeed, our Rule 1.15(a) specifically prohibits commingling. We would caution, however, that other jurisdictions may take the opposite approach and require that fee advances be placed in a trust account until earned. Therefore, where several jurisdictions are involved in the representation, prudent lawyers may wish to adopt a conservative approach and segregate fee advances from both the law firm's assets and from assets of other clients which may be contained in a client trust account.

Possibly conflicting approaches to this question highlight the need for a lawyer to decide which ethical rules apply to the situation. Our Rule 8.5 embodies the notion that traditional choice of law principles may apply to the determination of what ethical rules apply to a given situation. Where the lawyer is licensed to practice only in this jurisdiction, performs work only in this jurisdiction for clients in this jurisdiction, and both receives and maintains bank accounts within this jurisdiction, it is clear that the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct apply and fee advances may be considered the lawyer's property upon receipt. As the situation diverges from this exclusively District of Columbia paradigm, however, members of our Bar should take care to ensure that they are in compliance with the rules of any other jurisdiction which may control the situation.

Adopted: February 14, 1996

Positional Conflicts of Interest in Simultaneous Representation of Clients Whose Positions on Matters of Law Conflict With Other Clients' Positions on Those Issues in Unrelated Matters.

- When a lawyer is asked to represent an entity that takes positions on matters of law in a subject area in which the lawyer practices regularly on behalf of other clients, the lawyer may not, without the informed consent of all affected parties, accept simultaneous representation of both clients where such representation creates a substantial risk that representation of one client will adversely affect the representation of the other.

Applicable Rule

- Rule 1.7 (Conflicts of Interest)

Inquiry

The inquirer is a lawyer in private practice who regularly represents children committed to the District of Columbia child welfare system. In addition, the inquirer from time to time represents foster parents who are interested in adopting their foster children. An association of foster parents has approached the inquirer and asked her to serve as their outside general counsel. The inquirer asks what ethical considerations bear upon her decision whether to undertake the general counsel engagement on behalf of the association client.

Discussion

The present inquiry raises subtle and difficult ethical issues. It does not focus on the more ordinary situation where the interests of two of a lawyer's clients may clash in the same matter; instead it focuses on situations where the conflicts arise because positions taken by two clients in two unrelated matters are at variance.

The problem that prompts the inquiry is at its heart a conflicts problem. The foster parents' association, which has asked the inquirer to be its outside general counsel, may from time to time wish the inquirer to take positions on matters of law that conflict with positions that the inquirer's individual clients – either neglected children or adopting foster parents – may wish to take in their individual cases. The rules of ethics make it clear that the inquirer could not take conflicting positions on behalf of the foster parents' association in the very same cases in which the inquirer's clients are involved. The more difficult question arises in the context of positions taken by the inquirer's proposed client in unrelated cases or in legislative activities that are inconsistent with positions taken by the inquirer's other clients in their cases. The inquirer asks what ethical precepts are relevant to her proposed conduct.

1. The District of Columbia Conflicts Rules

The inquirer's conduct in this instance is principally controlled by Rule 1.7. The format of the District of Columbia's Rule 1.7 is unique. It divides the world of conflicts into two broad categories – the waiveable and the nonwaiveable. Nonwaiveable conflicts are covered in subpart (a). Where a lawyer attempts to represent two or more adverse interests in the same matter, the conflict is said to be unwaiveable and therefore never ethically permissible regardless of whether the clients would consent if asked.[1] The present inquiry does not focus on this type of situation but, rather, on those situations where the adversity does not occur in a single matter.

The District of Columbia rule speaks of those conflicts that can be waived in Rule1.7(b). Three distinct concepts are involved. The first concept is embodied in Rule1.7(b)(1), which gives expression to the basic notion that a lawyer ought not, without the client's consent, to oppose the lawyer's own client, even where that client is represented by another lawyer in that matter. Rule1.7(b) applies to this situation even though the matter that the lawyer seeks to undertake is entirely unrelated to the other matter on which the lawyer represents the client. That notion is not involved here.[2]

The rules that control the question before us are Rules 1.7(b)(2-4). Those rules recognize a conflict of interest where, in the case of Rules 1.7(b)(2) and (b)(3),[3] the representation of the one client may interfere with the representation of another. Rules 1.7(b)(2) and 1.7(b)(3) express two faces of the same concept, which is that where the

[1] Rule 1.7(a) states: "A lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a position to be taken in a matter if that position is adverse to a position taken or to be taken in the same matter by another client represented with respect to that position by the same lawyer."

[2] Rule 1.7(b)(1) is phrased in terms of the "positions" to be taken by the lawyer's client being adverse; the word "position" is not used in the remaining sections of Rule 1.7(b).

[3] Rules 1.7(b)(2) and (b)(3) state that without disclosure and consent: ". . . a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if: . . .

> (2) such representation will be or is likely to be adversely affected by representation of another client: [or]
> (3) representation of another client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by such representation. . . "

representation of one client interferes in some substantial way with the representation of another, the lawyer is prevented from representing at least one and perhaps both of the clients unless there is full disclosure and unless both clients consent.

Finally, Rule 1.7(b)(4)[4] addresses itself more to the independence of a lawyer's judgment on behalf of the lawyer's client than to the unfettered effectiveness of the lawyer's representation, which is more directly addressed in Rules 1.7(b) (2 and 3).

2. Positional Conflicts in General

A traditional notion in the law of legal ethics holds that there is nothing unseemly about a lawyer's taking directly opposing views in different cases so long as the lawyer does not do so simultaneously. Thus, a lawyer who is a prosecutor may urge that the death penalty be imposed in appropriate criminal cases. If the lawyer then leaves the government and moves to a private firm, there would be nothing improper about the lawyer's subsequently urging that the death penalty was unconstitutional in all cases despite having argued the contrary as a prosecutor.

The movement from one office to another is not necessary to legitimize this change of positions on a particular issue. A lawyer engaged by a plaintiff in a particular personal injury case may be called upon to argue that punitive damages should be awarded in copious amounts. Once that engagement has been concluded, the same lawyer may urge on behalf of a subsequent civil defendant that punitive damages ought to be eliminated entirely. Lawyers are hired by clients to take positions and are not necessarily expressing their own personal views when they advocate on behalf of clients. See Rule 1.2(b).

However, a different sort of problem may arise when the lawyer simultaneously argues inconsistent positions on behalf of two different clients. The lawyer's credibility, and therefore the lawyer's ability to represent the lawyer's two clients effectively, may be undermined by the lawyer's appearing simultaneously, or virtually simultaneously, to argue two totally inconsistent positions. Moreover, a successful outcome for one client could prejudice the other.

The paradigm case is that of the lawyer who argues a case to a court of appeals, arguing that the court ought to reach a certain conclusion of law. In this paradigm, the oral argument in the first case is concluded, the clerk calls the next case, and the same lawyer returns to the podium representing another client, this time on the opposite side of the identical issue, to urge a position that is flatly inconsistent with the one that the lawyer took five minutes ago before the same appellate panel. In that situation, one or both of the clients is thought to have been deprived of effective representation.

While these concepts are fairly easy to perceive in the paradigm example given, they become more attenuated and less easy to define as one moves away from the paradigm example given above. Can a lawyer simultaneously urge inconsistent positions before two different appellate panels in the same court? Generally, it is thought that the lawyer cannot do so because of the communication that goes on between members of different appellate panels and because of the deference that one panel would give to the decision of another.

The commentary to the American Bar Association conflicts rule would seem to limit this problem to appellate courts. ABA Model Rule 1.7, Comment [9]. However, legal scholars have widely criticized this comment, pointing out that a functional analysis is more appropriate than one that turns entirely upon the nature of the court, Underwood & Fortune, Trial Ethics § 3.4.3 at 84 (1988), Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics 355 n.41 (1986); the ABA's Ethics Committee has indicated that the comment cannot be read literally (see ABA Opinion 93-377); and the comment was dropped from the District of Columbia version of Rule 1.7.

What if one of the representations is in the trial court and the other is in a directly superior appellate court? It is possible that a lawyer may not be fully effective in this circumstance since a favorable decision for one client in the appellate court could directly undermine the lawyer's efforts on behalf of the other client in a subordinate trial court. A third and more difficult situation is posed where the lawyer simultaneously takes inconsistent positions before two different judges of the same trial court. Even in this case, simultaneous inconsistency may in some cases be undesirable because co-ordinate judges of the same trial court, while not strictly bound by the decisions of their fellow judges may, nevertheless, pay considerable deference to them, and one or the other of the lawyer's two clients may thereby be adversely affected.

The conflicts rules implement ethical norms that are contained in other rules. For instance, Rule 1.3 speaks of a lawyer being diligent and zealous on behalf of his client. It is difficult to know how a lawyer could be equally diligent and equally zealous on behalf of two clients when simultaneously taking inconsistent positions before the same court, where the results of the lawyer's representation of one client will directly and adversely impact another client of the same lawyer.[5]

The answer to the problem posed turns upon the likelihood that the representation of one client will, in some foreseeable and ascertainable sense, adversely affect the lawyer's effectiveness on behalf of the other. The mere possibility that a result in one representation will affect the outcome of another is not enough to trigger a conflict as to which waiver must be sought. But if an objective observer can identify and describe concrete ways in which one representation may reasonably be anticipated to interfere with the other, then a cognizable conflict arises under our rules, and disclosure must be made and a waiver sought.

Central to deciding whether adverse effect, and therefore a conflict, exists will be issues such as: (1) the relationship between the two forums in which the two representations will occur; (2) the centrality in each matter of the legal issue as to which the lawyer will be asked to advocate; (3) the directness of the adversity between the positions on the legal issue of the two clients; (4) the extent to which the clients may be in a race to obtain the first ruling on a [4] Rule 1.7(b)(4) states that without disclosure and consent: . . . a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if: . . .

(4) the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.

[5] Rule 1.1 requires a lawyer to be competent. Some commentators have raised the question whether it is possible to be fully effective on behalf of one client when the lawyer is at the same time advancing a contrary position on behalf of another client that will impact adversely on the first client even if the two matters are wholly factually unrelated. See Dzienkowski, Positional Conflicts of Interest, 71 Tex. L. Rev. 457, 485 at n. 130 (1993).

question of law that is not well settled; and (5) whether a reasonable observer would conclude that the lawyer would be likely to hesitate in either of her representations or to be less aggressive on one client's behalf because of the other representation.[6] In sum, we believe that the focus of the analysis ought not to be on formalities but should be on the actual harm that may befall one or both clients.[7]

3. Application of the Rules to the Present Inquiry

Turning now to the facts before us, the inquirer in this case may well be asked by the foster parents association to take positions on issues of law, either legislatively[8] or in litigation, that are inconsistent with positions taken by individual clients of the inquirer – whether neglected children or foster parents – in unrelated matters. As our discussion above indicates, under Rules 1.7(b)(2-4), the lawyer may not take such conflicting positions – even in unrelated matters – without making full disclosure and seeking the consent of all affected clients.

Inasmuch as the inquirer's practice is limited to the District of Columbia, most of her litigation is conducted in the Family Division of the Superior Court and, to a lesser extent, in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. It would be ethically impermissible for her to take simultaneously inconsistent positions on issues of law on behalf of different clients in those two courts without the informed consent of all of her affected clients where the representation of one client creates a substantial likelihood that her success on behalf of that client might substantially impact another client adversely. On the other hand, in a wide variety of routine cases where no concrete adverse effect by one representation on another is foreseeable, the inquirer is not obliged to make disclosure or to seek consent. No general opinion from this Committee can anticipate every such eventuality. We can only direct the inquirer's attention to the factors set forth above and urge her to weigh them carefully in each case.

Even if no actual current inconsistency exists at the outset of the representation, the inquirer may be well advised to alert her individual clients at the time that they retain her (or that she is appointed by the court) that she regularly represents the association of foster parents and that she might in the future be asked to take a position on behalf of that group that would be inconsistent with a position that the individual client wished to take. Indeed, there may be some circumstances where such a disclosure would be required by Rule 1.4, governing a lawyer's obligation to keep her client reasonably informed. To the extent that such conflicts are likely to arise during the course of her representation and to the extent that the inquirer may become identified in the eyes of the court as the usual or ordinary spokesperson for the foster parents association, prospective clients may be entitled to be made aware of the circumstances at the time they are deciding whether to retain the inquirer.

Beyond simply informing the individual client that she might be asked to take an adverse position, the inquirer will need to consider whether she wishes to try to seek a prospective waiver from an individual client at the time she is retained. Such a prospective waiver is often, by definition, not fully informed since the precise nature of the future conflict may not be known at the time that the prospective waiver is obtained. See ABA Opinion 93-372. The enforceability of such a waiver is open to some doubt, especially where the client is not a sophisticated consumer of legal services and therefore not well equipped to foresee the future costs and benefits of such a decision.

On the other hand, a prospective waiver by the foster parents association may be of greater weight – if fully informed – inasmuch as the association may be better positioned to make judgments concerning the desirability of entering into a prospective waiver.[9]

4. Relevance of ABA Model Rule 1.7

We point out that even though District of Columbia Rule 1.7 – the general rule dealing with conflicts of interest – is, at least on its face, quite different from the ABA model rule on the same subject,[10] we would reach the same result under the language of that rule that we do under the District of Columbia's rule. The drafters of the District of Columbia conflicts rule found the ABA formulation unclear because they thought that the ABA Model Rule could be read to mean that all conflicts were potentially waivable. The design of the District of Columbia version of the rule was intended in part to emphasize that some conflicts are intolerable, even if full disclosure is made and even if client consent is obtained. See Paragraphs [38] and [39] of the Explanation of Committee and Board Revisions to Rule 1.7 of Submission in Connection with a Petition of the Board of [6] Comment [3] to Rule 1.7 points out that Rule 1.7: "is not violated by a representation that eventuates in the lawyer's unwittingly taking a position for one client adverse to the interests of another client." In other words, the positional conflict rule does not require that the lawyer make an inquiry of every one of the lawyer's clients as to every position that those clients may be taking in unrelated matters – an obviously impossible task for most, if not all, lawyers. The rule focuses on those conflicts that would be apparent to a reasonably conscientious lawyer.

[7] For a lawyer in a firm, the problems discussed here may be attenuated if two or more lawyers are involved. The analysis will depend in substantial part on the nature of the conflict. The representation of a client by a D.C. partner in a large national law firm might not be adversely affected by a representation of a client by the same firm's Los Angeles office where the problem arises because the D.C.. partner is a well-known spokesman for her client on a given issue as to which the Los Angeles client takes a contrary position. But if the California and D.C. clients are both in federal court racing to obtain the first ruling from the United States Supreme Court on an open question of substantive law, the imputed disqualification rules would clearly come into play.

[8] Comment [3] to the District of Columbia Rule 1.7 makes it clear that that rule applies to efforts "to influence policy or achieve a legislative result."

[9] To the extent that the general philosophy and the types of positions that the foster parents association tends to take are well known and predictable, more detailed advance disclosure may be possible, and the prospective waiver may to that extent have more force and effect. Beyond the scope of this opinion is the question of what the inquirer's responsibilities are where such a conflict later arises and is not fully consented to by all affected parties; specifically, we do not discuss here when the inquirer will be able to cure such a conflict by withdrawing form representing one of the parties as opposed to when she will be obliged to withdraw from representing both. Her prospective waiver agreement may attempt to address these issues by having the clients agree in advance that she may withdraw from representing one and continue on behalf of the other.

[10] ABA Model Rule 1.7 states:

(a) A lawyer shall not represent a client if the representation of that client will be directly adverse to another client, unless:

(1) the lawyer reasonably believes the representation will not adversely affect the relationship with the other client; and

(2) each client consents after consultation.

(b) A lawyer shall not represent a client if the representation of that client may be materially limited by the lawyer's responsibilities to another client or to a third person, or by the lawyer's own interests, unless:

(1) the lawyer reasonably believes the representation will not be adversely affected; and

(2) the client consents after consultation. When representation of multiple clients in a single matter is undertaken, the consultation shall include explanation of the implications of the common representation and the advantages and risks involved.

Governors of the District of Columbia Bar to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, November 19, 1986.

Despite these facial differences, the drafters of the District of Columbia's Rule 1.7 were at some pains to point out that, although they took a different drafting approach than did the ABA, they did not believe that the different form of words they used would lead to significantly different results in actual cases fromthe results that would be achieved under the ABA's model rule or the old model code on conflicts.

"Indeed, we believe that the Rule we propose would lead to substantially the same conclusions in actual fact situations as would the ABA draft. We, likewise, do not believe that the general Rule we have proposed would result in any substantive changes in the results reached in the conflicts cases that have arisen under the present DR5-101 and in the application to date of the 'appearance of impropriety' test." Paragraph [33] of the Explanation of Committee and Board Revisions to Rule 1.7 of Submission in Connection with a Petition by the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia Bar to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, November 19, 1986. Nothing to the contrary having been said during the process of adopting the rule, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals apparently had the same intention when it adopted the District of Columbia's unique Rule 1.7.

We make the point in the current context because the ABA's Legal Ethics Committee arrived at substantially the same conclusion that we take here today in its formal Ethics Opinion No. 93-377 (Oct. 16, 1993). Inasmuch as the District of Columbia rule and the ABA model rule are intended to achieve the same results, albeit through different drafting approaches, the ABA's Opinion No. 93-377 is persuasive in helping us to reach the result embodied in this opinion.

5. Legislative History of District of Columbia Rule 1.7

Interestingly, the draft of Rule 1.7 initially recommended to the Court by the District of Columbia Bar contained a Rule 1.7(b)(5) together with commentary. Proposed Rule 1.7(b)(5) would have required a lawyer to make full disclosure and to seek client consent where "other interests of a client will be or are likely to be adversely affected by the lawyer's assumption of such representation, and the proposed commentary said that the protected client interests could be as broad as business rivalry or personal difference[s] between two potential clients.

The publication of proposed Rule 1.7(b)(5) by the Court drew protest on the grounds that the rule would have erected an extremely broad positional conflict rule that would have hampered lawyers and firms from undertaking varied representations and would have given existing clients broad veto powers over their lawyers' ability to accept new clients, thereby endangering the independence of lawyers and their willingness and ability to represent unpopular and pro bono clients.

Upon further reflection, the Bar filed a second petition with the Court withdrawing its proposed Rule 1.7(b)(5) and the accompanying comment, and the Court did not include it in the final rule that was adopted. This legislative history convinces us that the Court did not intend to extend the positional conflicts rule in the District of Columbia beyond the effective reach of the ABA Model Rule and that for us to interpret the rule that the Court did promulgate any more broadly than we do today would be contrary to the Court's intention.

Withdrawal from Representation Requiring Court Approval; Withdrawal Conditioned on Disclosure of Client's Whereabouts

- Where the rules of a tribunal require a lawyer to seek leave of the tribunal before withdrawing from a representation, the Rules of Professional Conduct also require the lawyer to seek such approval. It is insufficient for a withdrawing lawyer merely to inform the client of upcoming proceedings in his or her case and to advise the client to secure new counsel.

Where the Immigration Court will grant unconditional leave to withdraw only if the lawyer discloses confidential client information, the lawyer may not disclose the information without client consent. Rather, the lawyer must remain in the case for acceptance of service on behalf of his client.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6(Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation)
- Rule 3.4(c)(Obligation To Obey Tribunal Rules)

Inquiry

In 1986, the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) promulgated rules that require a lawyer who is seeking to withdraw from a case to obtain leave from the immigration judge. Before this rule change, the inquirer reports, some lawyers did not file withdrawal notices because it was thought that the notices might trigger the scheduling of a hearing, a result usually not desired by clients in deportation proceedings.

The inquirer asks what ethical obligations are imposed upon a lawyer who receives a hearing notice after he no longer represents the client but before he has formally withdrawn as counsel. The inquirer first asks whether the lawyer must seek leave from the Immigration Court to withdraw or whether his obligation to the former client is discharged upon informing the client of the hearing notice and date and recommending to the client that he or she secure new counsel. The inquirer also asks whether, in seeking to withdraw from a representation, a lawyer must comply with a Board of Immigration Appeals ruling that requires a lawyer to provide the client's last known address to the immigration judge before leave to withdraw will be unconditionally granted.

Matter of Rosales, Bd. of Immigration App. Interim Decision No. 3064 (April 21, 1988), articulates the requirements for granting a motion to withdraw from a representation before the Immigration Court. Rosales holds that a lawyer, when seeking to withdraw, must provide the court with the client's "last known address, assuming it is more current than any address previously provided to the immigration judge." The lawyer also must show that he attempted to advise his client, at the client's last known address, about the scheduled hearing. Provided both of these requirements are met, the lawyer's motion to withdraw will be unconditionally granted. If, however, the lawyer fails to provide the requisite information, the lawyer's withdrawal will be granted on the condition that the lawyer remain responsible for acceptance of service.

Discussion

The inquirer is unclear about his intention to file the notice of withdrawal required by the INS rules. For purposes of this opinion, we assume that the inquirer intends not to file a notice of withdrawal out of concern that the notice would trigger a hearing. Thus, the question is whether the Rules of Professional Conduct are violated if a lawyer fails to file a notice of withdrawal as required by agency or court rules.

Rule 1.16, Declining or Terminating Representation, provides the bases upon which a lawyer is required or permitted to withdraw from a representation and obligates a lawyer, whenever a representation is terminated, to take various steps "to protect [the] client's interests."[1]

The rule also obligates a lawyer to continue to represent a client if so ordered by the tribunal. Thus, subsection (c) states:

> When ordered to do so by a tribunal, a lawyer shall continue representation notwithstanding good cause for terminating the representation.

Rule 1.16 is the counterpart provision to former District of Columbia Code of Professional Responsibility Disciplinary Rule (DR) 2-110, Withdrawal From Employment. In particular, DR 2-110(A) provided:

> If permission for withdrawal from employment is required by the rules of a tribunal, a lawyer shall not withdraw from employment in a proceeding before that tribunal without its permission.

While the language of Rule 1.16(c) is less direct than that of former DR 2-110(A), it is clear that Rule 1.16(c) also was intended to require that leave to withdraw be obtained from a tribunal when so required by the tribunal's rules:

> [Rule 1.16(c)] allows for court rules which, in many instances, condition withdrawal by any counsel of record on court approval. DR 2-110(A)(1) of the predecessor Model Code expressly correlated the condition of court approval with the existence of rules of a tribunal (citations omitted).

Annotation, ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, 276 (2d ed. 1992).

We therefore conclude that Rule 1.16(c) requires a lawyer to seek leave to withdraw if the rules of a tribunal require such approval.[2] It is insufficient merely to inform a former client of a pending hearing date and advise him or her to secure new counsel. Whenever a representation has terminated and approval to withdraw is required, the lawyer's obligations are not discharged until he or she has secured such leave of the tribunal. See In re McKennett, 349 N.W.2d 29 (N.D. 1984) (notification of client and opposing counsel regarding withdrawal insufficient; local rules required lawyer to notify court as well); compare with In re Coe, 731 P.2d 1028 (Or. 1987) (lawyer's failure to seek permission was not an ethical violation since probate court rules did not require permission to withdraw).

The risk that a client may be harmed by his or her lawyer's compliance with the rules of a tribunal is not a consideration. See Rule 3.4(c) (lawyer cannot "knowingly disobey an obligation under the rules of a tribunal except for an assertion that no valid obligation exists"). In any event, where a lawyer does not know the location of his or her client, the client should not be harmed if, when the lawyer seeks leave to withdraw, the immigration judge asks the withdrawing lawyer for the client's location. The lawyer can truthfully answer "no."

The more difficult issue arises when the lawyer knows the client's whereabouts. Information regarding the client's location may, in some cases, be protected as a confidence and would, in many circumstances, be protected as a secret under Rule 1.6(b).[3] While "confidence" is defined by the more narrow attorney-client privilege, "secret" is given a broader meaning to include all "other information gained in the professional relationship...the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client" (emphasis added). In the context of a deportation proceeding, where a deportation order cannot be effected without the authorities' knowing the client's whereabouts, it would be to the client's obvious detriment for his or her lawyer to disclose the client's last known address or where the client could be found.

In this regard, the ruling in Rosales, supra, does not, in and of itself, force a lawyer to reveal his client's last known address. Rather, it gives the lawyer who seeks to withdraw from a representation a choice: (1) to withdraw unconditionally, the lawyer must disclose the client's last known address; or (2) if the lawyer does not provide this information, the withdrawal will be granted only conditionally, i.e., the lawyer must continue to accept service on his client's behalf.

Given this choice, we believe that the lawyer would violate Rule 1.6(a)(1) if he revealed his client's whereabouts without the client's consent. A lawyer in this position is limited to seeking conditional withdrawal, which does not require disclosure of a client confidence or secret.

Disclosure of Billing Practices: Billings Based on Time and "Attorney Charge"

- When a client is informed that he will be billed on a time basis, it is a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct to impose additional fees that are not disclosed to the client and are not calculated on the disclosed basis. The proposed "attorney charge" billing procedure does not violate the Rules where the client is informed of the hourly rates of the attorneys likely to work on the client's matter, and he is given a range of estimated total charges and a statement that the range may be exceeded in certain circumstances.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.5 (Fees)
- Rule 7.1(a)(1)(Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services)

(a) except when permitted under paragraph (c) or (d), a lawyer shall not knowingly:

(1) reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client; . . . .

(b) "Confidence" refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law, and "secret" refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be helf inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client. . . .

(d) A lawyer may use or reveal client confidences or secrets:

Inquiry

The inquirer requests an opinion as to the ethical propriety of charging clients in the manner described in the following two hypothetical billing practices.

1. Time Basis and Value Billing Practices

Firm clients are provided with a written fee schedule. The schedule lists matters for which a flat or standard fee is charged and identifies some other matters that will be billed on a "time basis." The schedule does not identify the "time basis" rates that will be applied. When work is performed on a time basis, the client receives a statement for "services rendered." The statement gives only a brief generic description of these services. It then specifies an amount for services, a separate amount for expenses, and a total.

The amount charged for services may incorporate a number of different charges, in addition to the time charges of the responsible attorney(s), i.e., the attorney(s) who actually worked on the matter. In one circumstance, the "services" amount includes a set fee that is described within the firm as an administrative or processing fee. This fee may amount to between 10-20% of the time charged amount, depending on the number of hours worked by the responsible attorney. The statement also may include a levy that is based on the hourly rate of the originating attorney (i.e., the attorney who brought the client to the firm) although it may not reflect time actually worked on the matter by that attorney. In still other instances, the firm may employ a procedure it characterizes as "value billing." Under this procedure, a premium of 20-200% may be added to the "time basis" amount charged by the responsible attorney This additional amount is included in the services portion of the client's bill.

In all instances, the client is not informed that he is being charged for services on other than a time basis. The additional levies, whether described internally as an administrative fee, processing fee or value premium, are not identified or explained in the statement, and they are added to the statement, regardless of the amount of time, if any, that the originating attorney may actually have expended on the matter.

2. "Attorney Charge" Basis

In a different billling arrangement, the client receives a letter enclosing a written fee schedule. The schedule lists matters for which a flat or standard fee is charged and identifies some other matters or types of proceeding that will be billed on an "Attorney Charge" basis.

The letter explains the firm's procedures for handling client matters, e.g., it states that the originating attorney reviews and forwards incoming matters to the responsible attorney and the originating attorney's secretary checks to ensure that the work is performed in a timely manner. The letter then explains the manner in which fees are calculated for certain types of work. In particular the letter provides that the fees charged for this particular type of work will take into account the effort involved; the expertise and efficiency of the responsible attorney; whether the matter is handled on an expedited basis; and the originating attorney's charge for supervision or administration. (This charge is not based on time, if any, worked by the originating attorney.) The letter further advises that the resulting fee will be within a general range, e.g., $800-$2000, but that it may be higher depending on the complexity of the matter and whether there are issues that require unusual time and effort.

Discussion

The hypothetical billing practices described above raise two questions: what is an attorney obliged to tell clients about (1) the fees they are charged, and (2) the manner in which those fees are calculated? The answer is addressed in Rules 1.5, 7.1(a)(1), and 8.4(c) of the Rules of Professional Conduct (referred to hereinafter as "Rules"). In the circumstances presented, the time basis and value billing practices described in section 1. above violate the Rules. The billing practices described in section 2. are generally adequate, although in certain circumstances, they also may violate the Rules.

1. Time Basis and Value Billing Practices

(i) Rule 8.4 (c)

This Committee has stated previously that, "when a lawyer bills a client, there should be no hidden meaning." See D.C. Bar Opinion No. 185 applying DR 1-102(A)(4) (the predecessor to Rule 8.4) to an analogous billing question. This simple precept applies, as well, to the instant Inquiry. In the scenario presented, the client is informed that he will be billed on a "time basis." This term is commonly understood to mean that the bill will be calculated by multiplying the number of hours worked by the per hour charge. Accordingly, when the client receives a statement, the client is entitled to expect that the amount billed will reflect attorneys fees for time actually expended on legal work. The inclusion of unidentified administrative or processing fees, or any other unspecified or "value" billed levies that are not calculated on the agreed basis, violates the prohibition in Rule 8.4(c) against engaging "in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation."

(ii) Rule 7.1(a)(1)

The ethical impropriety of the hypothetical billing procedures is reinforced by Rule 7.1(a)(1). Rule 7.1 governs "all communications about a lawyer's services." See Rule 7.1, Comment [1] (emphasis added). It provides that "a lawyer shall not make a false or misleading communication about . . . the lawyer's services" and specifies that a communication is false or misleading if it contains "a material misrepresentation . . . or omits a fact necessary to make a statement considered as a whole not materially misleading. . . . " Rule 7.1. Comments to the Rule note the importance of ensuring that statements about a lawyer's services are accurate.

On the facts presented, the information given to the client is inaccurate and misleading. The bill is not based on time expended, and it does not apprise the client of this fact. The client is affirmatively misled because the bill fails to differentiate between the firm's time charges and other fees about which the client has not been informed. It merely describes the attorney's fees and other assorted surcharges as "services." The client, thereby, is left to assume, predictably and erroneously, that the total is calculated on the basis that was disclosed to him.

(iii) Rule 1.5(b)

Rule 1.5 recognizes that attorneys' fees may be calculated in many different ways. The Committee is not commenting here on the concept of "value billing."[1] Rather, the question at issue is whether the attorney properly may impose a premium that is not time based, when that premium is not disclosed to the client, and is contrary to the manner in which the client was told his bill would be calculated. ABA Formal Opinion

[1] The Committee also is not commenting on the reasonableness, under Rule 1.5(a), of the ultimate sum that a client may be asked to pay under the firm's value billing calculation, or as a result of the other unspecified levies that are added on.

93-379 (Nov. 3, 1993) concluded in analogous circumstances that:

> It goes without saying that a lawyer who has undertaken to bill on an hourly basis is never justified in charging a client for hours not actually expended. If a lawyer has agreed to charge the client on this basis (i.e., hourly), and it turns out that the lawyer is particularly efficient in accomplishing a given result, it nonetheless will not be permissible to charge the client for more hours than were actually expended on the matter. When that basis for billing the client has been agreed to, the economies associated with the result must inure to the benefit of the client.

See ABA/BNA Laws. Man. on Prof. Conduct §1001:207, 213. This Committee agrees with that conclusion.

Rule 1.5(b) provides that the lawyer who "has not regularly represented the client" shall give written advice of the "basis or rate" of the fee the client will be charged. The Rules assume that lawyers regularly representing a client will have reached "an understanding concerning the basis or rate of the fee," i.e., the lawyer is not expressly required to provide such a client with written advice. See Rule 1.5, Comment [1]. Thus, all clients, whether new or existing, whether receiving fee advice orally or in writing, are entitled to know the basis or rate of the fee.

The information provided to the Inquirer's hypothetical clients does not satisfy this requirement. The term "time basis" is simply not an adequate description. Where the fee is based on an hourly rate, the client is entitled to know the rate or range of rates applicable to his work. Where the fee is calculated by reference to factors other than time, and for example, includes an additional administrative or processing charge, the attorney has an obligation to explain the basis of that fee – what the fee is for, and how it is calculated. Moreover, the client must be accorded an appropriate opportunity to consider this information.

In inquiries about fees and billing matters, this Committee has held, repeatedly, that the attorney owes his client the "utmost duty of candor and fair dealing" (D.C Bar Opinion No. 185); that "the attorney bears the responsibility for seeing that there is no misunderstanding as to fee arrangements. (D.C. Bar Opinion Nos. 4, 25, and 29); and that, when a lawyer seeks to impose "atypical requirements in a fee agreement, ... the lawyer must explicitly bring the matter to the attention of the client at the time the agreement is presented." D.C Bar Opinion No. 211. We reaffirm these guiding principles and conclude, with respect to the instant inquiry, that they have been violated.

2. Attorney Charge" Basis

Unlike "time basis" or value billing, the term "attorney charge" has no widely understood meaning. In the example posed in the inquiry, the letter to the client does supply some explanatory detail. It states that fees for matters described in the fee schedule as "Attorney Charge" will take into account several of the factors listed in Rule 1.5(a) and an administrative or processing fee. Additionally, it gives a range of possible costs and advises that, in unusual circumstances, that range may be exceeded.

Rule 1.5(b)

The ethical propriety of the "attorney charge" billing practice is determined by reference to Rule 1.5(b). The Committee's conclusion in this regard is premised on the assumption that the letter sent to the client accurately describes the manner in which fees are calculated. If the letter does not accurately describe the firm's billing practices, Rules 8.4(c) and 7.1(a)(1) would also apply, for the same reasons that were discussed in Section 1 above.

The information contained in the client letter, i.e., the hourly rates of the attorneys likely to work on client matters, a range of estimated total charges, and a cautionary statement that, in certain circumstances, the range may be exceeded, satisfies the Rule 1.5(b) requirement that there be a clear communication of the basis or rate of the fee. It gives the client an adequate basis on which to decide whether he will pursue the matter or retain that particular attorney. With respect to the letter's advice that the estimated range of fees may be exceeded for matters that are unusually complex or time consuming, it should be noted that the attorney has an ongoing obligation to ensure that the client has a clear understanding with respect to the basis or rate of the fee. When a cost estimate becomes substantially inaccurate, "a revised estimate should be provided to the client." See Rule 1.5, Comment [1].

Conflict of Interest Issues Where Private Lawyers Provide Volunteer Legal Assistance to the D.C. Corporation Counsel; Reconsideration of Opinion 92

• Under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, a lawyer may give volunteer legal assistance to the D.C. Corporation Counsel and continue simultaneously to represent private clients against the City and its agencies, as long as the requirements of Rule 1.7 are met. Under Rule 1.7(b)(1), a lawyer who wishes to represent a private client against the same City government client that she is representing while working for the Corporation Counsel on an unrelated matter, may do so if she obtains the informed consent of both her private client and her City government client. Similarly, the lawyer may agree to volunteer her services to represent the same City government client that she or her firm are opposing on behalf of a private client in an unrelated matter, if both clients consent after full disclosure. Client notification and consent are not required, however, where the lawyer is not opposing her own City government client but some other agency of the City that is not her client.

The City government client is not always the City as a whole, but may be more narrowly defined as one of the City's constituent agencies. The identity of the government client for conflict of interest purposes will be established in the first instance between the lawyer and responsible government officials in accordance with the general precepts of client autonomy embodied in Rule 1.2. In agreeing to undertake a particular representation, the lawyer must take steps to recognize and respect the reasonable expectation of her other clients, protected by Rule 1.7, that they will receive a conflict-free representation.

Even if Rule 1.7(b)(1) does not apply, because the lawyer's government client is not considered the same government entity she is opposing on behalf of private parties, Rule 1.7(b)(2)-(4) may require that the lawyer obtain client consent if her representation of one client will be or is likely to be "adversely affected" by her representation of the other, or if the independence of her professional judgment will be or is likely to be adversely affected by her responsibilities to third parties or by her own personal interests.

Inquiry

The Committee has been asked to reconsider several conclusions of D.C. Bar Opinion 92 (1980)("Propriety of Private Attorneys Handling Municipal Cases on a Pro Bono Basis"). Opinion 92 examined the ethical propriety, under the D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility, of a program in which "private attorneys acting on a pro bono basis would assist the City in managing its severely crowded civil docket."[1] The Committee opined in Opinion 92 that the program would be ethically permissible as long as certain conditions were met. The inquirer has asked the Committee to reconsider the continuing validity of two of those conditions, given the intervening adoption in 1991 of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.[2] The two conditions in question are as follows:

1. A lawyer or firm performing volunteer representational work for the City or any of its agencies may simultaneously represent a private party against the City or any of its agencies only with full disclosure to and consent of both the City and the private party; and

2. Under no circumstances may a lawyer or firm volunteer to represent a particular agency of the City government while at the same time handling a private matter involving the same agency, or another matter that is or appears to be "closely related," even with client consent.

Summary of Conclusions

For reasons discussed more fully in Part I below, the Committee believes that the conclusion in paragraph 2 above is no longer mandated under the Rules of Professional Conduct. Thus a lawyer may represent a particular City government agency in a matter at the same time she is opposing that agency on behalf of a private client in an unrelated matter, as long as she makes full disclosure to and obtains the consent of both the City government agency and the private client. See Rule 1.7(b)(1) and 1.7(c). Moreover, as explained in Part II below, we disagree with the assumption of Opinion 92 that the entire City and all of its constituent agencies must always and necessarily be considered the lawyer's client for conflict of interest purposes. Thus, a lawyer may under certain circumstances perform services for a particular City agency client without having to notify and obtain the consent of private clients that she is representing against another City agency that is not considered the same client. Nevertheless, even if Rule 1.7(b)(1) does not apply because the lawyer is not opposing her own client, she may be required by Rule 1.7(b)(2)-(4) to notify and seek the consent of one or both clients if her representation of one would substantially interfere with her representation of the other, or if her independent judgment in either client's behalf would be adversely affected by her responsibilities to a third party or by her own personal interests.

Discussion

I. Prohibited Representation of Private Parties Against Particular City Agencies or in Particular Matters

Opinion 92 imposed an absolute prohibition against a lawyer's representing a private party against the same particular City agency for which she is performing volunteer services, or in a matter "closely related" to the one she is handling for the City. This absolute prohibition was derived from the "appearance of impropriety" standard of Canon 9 rather than the "conflict of interest" rules of Canon 5. The "appearance" standard was dropped entirely from the Rules of Professional Conduct, and the conflict of interest rules provide that conflicts may generally be waived by the client. See Rule 1.7(b) and (c). Under the current rules, the only conflict that cannot be relieved by client consent is the one that arises where a lawyer seeks to take "adverse" positions on behalf of two different clients in the same matter. See Rule 1.7(a). We therefore conclude that the absolute prohibition on opposing one's own City agency client set forth in paragraph 2 above is no longer applicable.

While a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(1) would arise if the volunteer lawyer attempted to represent a private client against the City in one matter at the same time she (or one of her partners) was representing the City for the Corporation Counsel in another matter, since the lawyer would in effect be opposing her own client, that conflict could in most circumstances be cured by making full disclosure to both affected clients and obtaining their consent. Thus, a lawyer may represent a private party against a City government agency while simultaneously representing that same City agency in an unrelated matter, as long as both the private client and the agency client are informed of the existence and nature of the lawyer's conflict and do not object to the continued representation. See Rule 1.7(b)(1) & (c). See also Rule 1.7(b)(2)-(4). A lawyer may not, however, represent both the City and a private client in the same matter if they are adverse to each other in that matter, even if both clients consent. See Rule 1.7(a).

The fact that the lawyer is volunteering her services to the City, as opposed to serving under a paid retainer, is irrelevant to these conclusions, as it is to the conclusions reached in the remainder of this opinion.

[1] Under the program described in Opinion 92, private law firms were encouraged to donate the services of attorneys to assist the Corporation Counsel in a variety of legal matters, generally on a part-time basis. This program reportedly yielded little by way of relief for the Corporation Counsel's Office, at least in part because of the conditions on lawyer participation (particularly the requirement of obtaining waivers from other clients) set forth in Opinion 92. In 1992, a second and more formal effort was made to encourage lawyers from private firms to volunteer their services to the City, this time by granting them a special dispensation from the imputation rule. The amendments enacted in that year to Rules 1.10 and 1.11 provided that conflicts resulting from one lawyer's voluntary service to the Corporation Counsel need not be imputed to all other lawyers in her firm. See Rule 1.10(e) and Comment [19]; Rule 1.11(h) and Comments [12] and [13]. (The 1992 amendments to Rules 1.10 and 1.11 were made permanent in 1994 and extended to the D.C. Financial Control Board in 1996). According to the commentary to Rule 1.10, this special dispensation from the imputation rule depends upon the volunteer lawyer's working full-time for the Corporation Counsel (there must be a "temporary cessation" of a volunteer lawyer's practice with the firm, "so that during that period the lawyer's activities which involve the practice of law are devoted fully to assisting the Office of Corporation Counsel"). Thus, when a private lawyer is detailed full-time to the Corporation Counsel's Office under the so-called "Rule 1.10 program," her firm will not be regarded as representing the City, and will not need to alert and obtain consent from those of its clients who "might reasonable consider the representation of its interests to be adversely affected" by the firm's representation of the City. See Comment [7] to Rule 1.7. (It follows by necessary implication that where a lawyer is volunteering for the City on a less than full-time basis, or does not otherwise meet the requirements of a "Rule 1.10 detail," the conflicts resulting from her government service are imputed to all lawyers in her firm." We understand that the Rule 1.10 program has attracted few volunteers, and has accordingly provided no more benefit for the Corporation Counsel Office that did the pre-1992 part-time details discussed in Opinion 92.

[2] Amendments to the Rules issued, by the D.C. Court of Appeals on October 16, 1996, make a number of revisions to the text and commentary of Rule 1.7, none of which affect the conclusions of this opinion. We would note, however, the extensive attention paid in new Comments [13] - [18] to conflicts of interest where the client is a "corporation, partnership, trade organization or other organization-type client." While not directly applicable to situations in which the client is a governmental entity, cf. , Comment [7] to Rule 1.13, we believe this discussion may provide a useful supplement to the discussion of conflicts under Rule 1.7(b)(2) - (4) in Part II B(2), infra.

II. Conflicts of Interest Where Volunteer Services Are Performed for the City or One of its Agencies

We now address the holding of Opinion 92 based on the then-applicable conflict of interest rules, described in numbered paragraph 1 above. Opinion 92 construed the conflict of interest provisions of the former Code, derived from Canon 5, to permit a lawyer to participate in the Corporation Counsel's volunteer program "notwithstanding his or her involvement in other matters affecting the City," as long as two conditions were met: first, it must be "obvious" that the lawyer can adequately represent "both the interests of the City and his or her other private clients;" and, second, "each affected client must consent to the multiple representation after full disclosure."

A. Defining the Client for Conflict of Interest Purposes

Before turning to an analysis of how the current conflict of interest rules apply in this situation, we must deal with one important threshold issue, involving an unexamined assumption made by the drafters of Opinion 92 about the identity of the City government client. That assumption is that the client of the volunteer lawyer working for the Corporation Counsel is always and necessarily "the City" as a whole rather than one or more of the City's constituent agencies.[3] This definition of the government client gives the conflict rules a considerably broader application and effect than they would have if the City government client were more narrowly defined. Under Rule 1.7(b)(1), a lawyer may not take a position in a matter on behalf of one client that is adverse to a position taken in the same matter by another client (not represented by her) unless she obtains consent from both clients.[4] If the client of the volunteer lawyer is the City as a whole, as opposed to one or more of its constituent agencies, Rule 1.7(b)(1) would require the lawyer to obtain consent to the City representation from each and every one of the private clients that she is currently representing against the City or any of its agencies, and from the City to each and every adverse private representation the lawyer may currently be involved in against it or any of its agencies, without regard to whether there is any real possibility that the substantive concerns animating the conflicts rules are implicated.[5]

Concerned that the breadth of this definition of the City government client will effectively discourage, if not preclude, private law firms from volunteering to assist the Corporation Counsel, the inquirer has asked the Committee to consider whether the volunteer lawyer's client may be defined as a particular City agency as opposed to the City as a whole, so as to ameliorate the sweeping requirement of notice and consent imposed by Rule 1.7(b)(1) read in the light of Opinion 92. We agree with the inquirer that the definition of the City government client contained in Opinion 92 is too broad, and that the City government client may sometimes be defined as narrowly as a single agency. As discussed more fully below, we also believe that the identity of the City government client depends upon a number of discrete considerations and must be decided on a case-by-case basis.

Simply as a matter of common sense it seems apparent that the client of the volunteer lawyer will not always be the entire City, but may sometimes be a smaller part of it. Much like a large modern corporation, the District of Columbia government is a complex and many-faceted entity that sometimes acts through its individual constituent parts (like the subsidiaries of a corporation) and sometimes acts as a single entity, depending upon the particular facts and circumstances. Sometimes a legal matter or issue is relevant only to a single City agency and is of no substantial interest to other agencies or the City as a whole. Sometimes a matter or issue directly affects or is otherwise significant to a number of agencies or the overall City government. In some situations the broad set of interests at stake will be apparent at the outset; in others the broader concerns may emerge during the course of the representation.

Whatever general principles about client identity in the government context can be drawn from our common sense analysis of the governmental interests implicated by particular cases, at bottom the identity of the City government client (like the identity of the corporate client) is not primarily a question of legal ethics. The identity of the government (or corporate) client for all ethical purposes is established in the first instance between the lawyer and responsible public (or corporate) officials in accordance with the general precepts of client autonomy embodied in Rule 1.2.[6] Cf. ABA Formal Opinion 95-390 ("Conflicts of Interest in the Corporate Family Context") (a corporate client may specify, when engaging a lawyer, whether or not "the corporate client expects some or all of its affiliates to be treated as clients for purposes of Rule 1.7").

The ethics rules provide at least one important limitation on what a lawyer can agree to with a client under Rule 1.2, and that is her other clients' right to be protected from conflicts of interest under Rule 1.7. In agreeing to represent a particular government client, a lawyer must take into account the countervailing rights of her other clients whose interests may be adversely affected by this new representation to know of and object to it — just as she must consider the similar rights of the new government client to know of and be able to object to any conflicting existing representations. In working with officials who are authorized to speak for the government client to define the scope of the representation (and hence the identity of the [3] Opinion 92 does not say in so many words that the client of the volunteer lawyer is always and necessarily the entire City for Canon 5 conflict of interest purposes. Nevertheless, this has been the generally accepted interpretation of the opinion since its issuance more than 16 years ago, and there appears to be little support in the text for a contrary position. Moreover, the fact that the absolute bar under the "appearance" standard of Canon 9 is clearly applicable only to representations involving particular City agencies is further evidence that the drafters of Opinion 92 intended a very broad definition of the City client for conflict of interests purposes.

[4] Where a conflict arises under Rule 1.7(b)(1) because the lawyer is opposing her own client on behalf of another client, both clients are presumed to be "potentially affected" under Rule 1.7(c)(1) and both must therefore consent to the representation after full disclosure.

[5] Opinion 92 advises a firm wishing to participate in the Corporation Counsel's volunteer program to "send a standardized letter to all clients identified as having present of potential future dealings with the City, describing the program and explaining in general how the judgment of the firm's attorneys might or might not be affected by the firm's participation in the program." This suggests an even broader application for the condition, requiring the lawyer to obtain consent from clients with present or potential City business without regard to whether the lawyer or her firm is actually representing the client in connection with that City business. We see no basis in the current rules for such an expansive reading of the conflict of interest rules. Even in a case when the entire City is considered the lawyer's client, consent must be obtained only from clients who the lawyer is currently representing against the City (or one of its agencies) or those who have actually asked her so to represent them.

[6] We do not regard the definition of the government client contained in Rule 1.6(i) ("the client of the government lawyer is the agency that employs the lawyer") as dispositive for conflict of interest purposes. And, there is no indication that this or any other a priori definition of the government client was intended to apply in this context in the otherwise thorough consideration of the "government lawyer" issue by the Sims Committee in 1988. See Report by the District of Columbia Bar Special Committee on Government Lawyers and the Model Rules of Professional Conduct (1989).

government client for conflict of interest purposes), the lawyer may defer to the government client's wishes only as long as she is able to fulfill her basic responsibilities to her other clients under Rule 1.7, including in particular her obligation not to take a position adverse to them on behalf of another client without their consent. This is the basic right secured to every client by Rule 1.7(b)(1).

The lawyer may not, by agreeing to a narrow definition of the government client, seek to defeat the reasonable expectation of her other clients, arising from and protected by Rule 1.7(b), that they will get a conflict-free representation from their lawyer. Accordingly, the volunteer lawyer must assure herself that the definition of the government client ultimately arrived at in discussions with authorized government officials both recognizes and respects her private clients' right to object when their lawyer proposes to represent interests directly adverse to their own. Her government client has the same right to object to any potentially conflicting private representations.

Thus, we believe that the lawyer who wishes to perform volunteer work for the Corporation Counsel's Office has an obligation to work with that office to develop a clear understanding of the scope of her representation of the City, and to make certain that the agreed upon definition of the government client is a reasonable one in light of all the facts and circumstances, including in particular each of her clients' right to know about, and to give or withhold consent to, her representation of adverse interests.

Ideally, the identity of the government client should be specifically agreed upon between the volunteer lawyer and the government officials who are authorized to speak for the client at the outset of the representation, and committed to writing. In those instances where the identity of the client is not clearly defined, it may be inferred from the reasonable understandings and expectations of the lawyer and those officials. These in turn may be gleaned from such functional considerations as the organizational structure of the City and the extent to which its constituent parts are related in form and function, and from the facts and circumstances of the particular matter at issue in the representation — including the general importance of the matter to the City as a whole and to other particular components whose programs or activities are not directly involved.

There may be situations in which it can be agreed at the outset that the volunteer lawyer will represent only a single City agency in a relatively discrete matter (e.g., a particular contract) or in a relatively discrete category of cases (e.g., child abuse and neglect cases). In such a case, the lawyer would be free to agree to take on a private representation in which she would be opposing another City agency on an unrelated matter, without having to notify or obtain the consent of either her existing government client or her new private client. That is the easiest case. Another fairly clear case is the one in which the volunteer lawyer represents a City agency in a matter that plainly has City-wide impact or public importance, so that it can fairly be said to implicate the interests of the City generally. In such a case, it would be unreasonable not to regard the lawyer's client as the City as a whole, and she therefore could not undertake a private representation against any City agency without informing and obtaining the consent of the City and, subsequently, the private client. There are dozens of permutations on these basic scenarios, in which the general City-wide interest is sometimes clear and sometimes not so clear. However, the mere fact that a matter is captioned "X v. District of Columbia" is not dispositive of the identity of the government client. Rather, as noted previously, the answer depends upon the reasonable understanding reached between the volunteer lawyer and responsible public officials based upon all relevant facts and circumstances. Of course, as with all representations, the lawyer must be alert to the need to deal with any conflicts that may arise during the course of the representation.[7]

The Corporation Counsel — as chief legal officer for the District and controller of its litigation — asserts that he has legal responsibility for determining the identity of the City government client for purposes of the conflict of interest rules. The Corporation Counsel has indicated his intention to issue guidelines for dealing with conflict issues posed by the volunteer program, that will address the identity of the client and the circumstances in which the District will waive any potential conflicts. We expect that these guidelines, when issued, will be useful to volunteer lawyers not only in determining what kinds of legal assistance they may give to the Corporation Counsel without creating a conflict with their existing private representations, but also in determining the scope of any conflicts. The guidelines may also be useful in determining what new private clients or matters a lawyer may subsequently take on in light of her responsibilities to her City government client(s).

In summary, we conclude that the Rules of Professional Conduct do not identify the City government client, and for the most part provide only general guidance for the lawyer and responsible government officials in reaching an understanding in this regard. The one clear limitation on the lawyer in this context derived from the ethics rules is her other clients' reasonable expectation that they will be allowed to object to their lawyer's representation of interests that would impinge upon her ability to zealously represent their own. Thus we believe that the private lawyer who wishes to perform volunteer work for the Corporation Counsel's office must work with that office to develop a clear understanding of the scope of her representation of the City, and hence the identity of the government client for conflicts purposes, and must take steps to protect all of her clients' right to know about and withhold consent to their lawyer's representation of interests that are adverse to their own.

B. Applicable Conflict of Interest Rules

Assuming that the relevant City government client has been identified, it remains to explain how the current conflict of interest rules apply in this situation.

1. Direct Conflicts under Rule 1.7(b)(1)

As noted, Rule 1.7(b)(1) prohibits a lawyer from taking a position on behalf of one client that is directly adverse to a position taken by another client in the same matter (represented of course in this matter by another lawyer) without the consent of both clients. See note 4, supra. Thus, if a lawyer wishes to undertake a volunteer representation of a particular City agency that she or her firm is already opposing on behalf of a private client, the lawyer may do so only if she informs both the private client and the new City agency client of the "existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation," and they give their consent. Rule 1.7(c)(1). The conflicts of each lawyer in a firm are imputed to all other lawyers in the firm. Rule 1.10.

[7] The provisions of Rule 1.7(d)(1996 amendment) govern conflicts arising after the representation commences that are "not reasonably foreseeable at the outset of a re-presentation." As we read this provision, it subjects such unforeseeable late-arising conflicts to the provisions of Rule 1.7(b)(2) through (4) only, and not to those of Rule 1.7(b)(1).

For example, if a volunteer lawyer is considering taking on a matter for the Corporation Counsel that involves defense of a suit brought against the Mayor and/or the City Council, or a suit attacking some City-wide program or regulation (so that the client must be deemed to be the City as a whole), the lawyer must make full disclosure to and seek consent from each of her firm's private clients who have matters pending against the City or any of its agencies. She must also inform the Corporation Counsel of any conflicting private representations being pursued by her or by other lawyers in her firm. Conversely, if a volunteer lawyer is working on a City-wide matter and is then asked to represent a private party against the City or one of its agencies, she must inform the Corporation Counsel and seek his consent.[8] Consent must also be obtained from the new client.

On the other hand, Rule 1.7(b)(1) does not apply, and client notification and consent are not required, if a lawyer is not opposing her own City government client but some other agency of the City that is not her client. For example, if a lawyer hired to defend a program or action of a particular City agency, such as the Housing Department, were representing only the Housing Department in this matter, she would be required to disclose the fact of her Housing Department representation and seek consent from those of her firm's private clients who had matters pending against the Housing Department or against the City as a whole.[9] But she would not be required to disclose her Housing Department representation to private clients who had matters pending against other particular City agencies whose functions were unrelated to the Housing Department and that otherwise had no interest in the issues involved in the Housing Department representation and would be unaffected by its outcome.

Thus, in a case where a lawyer is representing the City as a whole, she is obliged to obtain the City's consent before opposing one of its constituent agencies, as well as the consent of any of her private clients who have interests adverse to the City (or, of course, the particular agency she would be representing). Similarly, if the lawyer is representing a private client against the City as a whole, she must obtain the private client's consent before undertaking any City government representation, even one involving a discrete agency program with no functional or programmatic relationship to the City-wide matter she is otherwise involved in. The only situation in which the lawyer may cabin her conflict and avoid having to conduct a broad canvass of all clients with City-related business is where both her public and her private representations involve discrete agency programs with no City-wide implications.

2. Indirect Conflicts under Rule 1.7(b)(2)-(4) - Even if Rule 1.7(b)(1) does not apply because the lawyer's City government client is not considered to be the same City client that she is opposing, her representation of a City agency may still raise an "indirect" conflict of interest under subsections (2) through (4) of Rule 1.7(b) if it "interferes in some substantial way with the representation of another" client. D.C. Bar Opinion 265 (1996) ("Positional Conflicts"). This would as a practical matter result in the same need to determine that both clients could be adequately served, and then to make full disclosure to and obtain the consent of "each affected client" to the multiple representation. Under Subsections (2) and (3) of Rule 1.7(b), if the lawyer believes that her representation of the City agency "will be or is likely to be adversely affected" by her representation of a private client, or vice versa, the lawyer must obtain the consent of the affected client or clients. Under subsection (4), client consent must be obtained if the lawyer believes that the independence of her professional judgment on behalf of a client "will be or reasonably may be adversely affected" by her responsibilities to a third party or by her own personal interests.

In contrast to the situation involving a direct conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(1), where disclosure and informed consent are mandatory once it is apparent that the lawyer will be opposing her own client, a lawyer has some discretion in deciding whether an indirect conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(2)-(4) exists. Whether a particular volunteer representation will "adversely affect" the lawyer's representation of another client (or vice versa) depends upon the particular facts and circumstances and is in the first instance essentially a matter for the lawyer to decide. Likewise, the existence of a conflict arising from the lawyer's responsibilities to third parties or her own personal interests is primarily a question of fact. The lawyer may decide that she should make disclosure to and seek consent from one client but need not do so from the other.

The "adverse effect" inquiry under subsections (2) through (4) is primarily a functional one, generally involving both the relative importance of the representation to the respective clients or to their lawyers and the directness of the adverseness between them. It may require inquiry into the nature of the issues, the amount of money at stake, and the likelihood that either client would otherwise be substantially and foreseeably affected by the outcome of the other's matter. Sometimes, the "adverse effect" inquiry will also involve the particular role the volunteer lawyer is expected to play in the matter, and the "intensity and duration" of her relationship with the lawyers she is opposing. Cf. Formal Opinion 1996-3 of the Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics of The Association of the Bar of the City of New York (1996)(conflicts of interest where one lawyer represents another lawyer).

Without attempting to exhaust the kinds of situations that would give rise to an adverse effect under Rule 1.7(b)(2)-(4), we offer the following examples to illustrate the kinds of circumstances that in this Committee's view could require a lawyer to obtain consent from one or both clients under these provisions. 1) A volunteer lawyer whose firm is handling a matter for private clients against one City agency, and who is subsequently asked by the Corporation Counsel to defend another City agency in a matter whose outcome will have a substantial and foreseeable impact on the outcome of the firm's private clients' matter, may be required to obtain one or both clients' consent. 2) A volunteer lawyer who represents one City agency and wishes to make certain arguments about that agency's authority that are inconsistent with arguments she is making on behalf of a private client against another City agency in an unrelated matter, may be required to obtain consent from one or both clients if the success of her arguments on behalf of [8] The government client can generally decide what information it needs or wants about the volunteer lawyer's potentially conflicting representations, in the context of deciding its own identity. Thus, the process of self-definition functions for the government client as a way of consenting to the volunteer lawyer's conflicting private representations to which it would be entitled to object if it chose to define its identity more broadly. In this fashion, the government client may decide that it has no interest in knowing about any conflicts that might otherwise be imputed to the volunteer lawyer under Rule 1.10 by virtue of representations by other lawyers in her firm.

[9] Given the decision-making structure of government entities, we believe that the conflicts of the City are necessarily attributed to its constituent parts, and that the conflicts of the constituent parts of the City are necessarily attributed to the City as a whole — though the conflicts of one of the City's constituent agencies may or may not be attributed to other City agencies.

one client "will, in some foreseeable and ascertainable sense, adversely effect the lawyer's effectiveness on behalf of the other" client. See Opinion 265, supra. 3) A volunteer lawyer performing work for one City agency who wishes to take a leading role representing a private party in a controversial matter involving another City agency should anticipate having to obtain consent from both clients if she believes it likely that one representation will have an adverse effect on the independence of her professional judgment or her credibility in the other. 4) A volunteer lawyer who works closely and for extended periods of time with full-time Corporation Counsel lawyers, or is closely supervised by Corporation Counsel lawyers, may find it difficult to exercise independent professional judgment in opposing the same lawyers with whom she is working or who are supervising her, and in such a situation she may decide that she should not accept a private representation in which she would be opposing her colleagues, without notifying and seeking the consent of both the Corporation Counsel and her private client.[10]

The above examples are not intended to be exhaustive, but merely to suggest the possibilities for "indirect" conflicts to develop in the context of a volunteer program such as the one described in Opinion 92.

Conclusion

The conclusion of Opinion 92 that, under the former Code of Professional Responsibility, a lawyer may never oppose a City agency that she is also representing on behalf of another client in an unrelated matter, is no longer mandated by the Rules of Professional Conduct. Under Rule 1.7(b)(1), a lawyer may oppose her own City government client on behalf of a private client in an unrelated matter as long as she makes clear the nature of the conflict to both clients and obtains their consent.

Moreover, we believe that in certain limited situations a lawyer may represent a City agency without having to notify or obtain the consent of private clients that she is representing against other discrete City agencies. Opinion 92's apparent assumption that the client of the Corporation Counsel lawyer is always and necessarily the City as a whole is incorrect, and in any event has no foundation in the ethics rules. The rules contemplate that the identity of the City government client for conflict of interest purposes will be decided on a case-by-case basis between the lawyer and responsible government officials, taking into account the reasonable expectation of the lawyer's other clients that they will receive a conflict-free representation. Their decision will generally be based on functional considerations derived from the structure and relationship of the government entities involved and from the facts and circumstances of the particular matter at issue in the representation. Even if the lawyer would not be opposing her own client, she may be required by Rule 1.7(b)(2)-(4) to obtain client consent if her representation of one client would interfere in some substantial way with her representation of the other, or if the independence of her judgment in either client's behalf would be compromised by her responsibilities to or interests in a third party or by her own personal interests, including her personal and professional relationships with the lawyers on the other side.

Inquiry No. 95-5-17
Adopted: October 31, 1996

Opinion No. 269

Obligation of Lawyer for Corporation to Clarify Role in Internal Corporate Investigation

- A lawyer retained by a corporation to conduct an internal investigation represents the corporation only, and not any of its constituents, such as officers or employees. Corporate constituents have no right of confidentiality as regards communications with the lawyer, but the lawyer must advise them of his position as counsel to the corporation in the event of any ambiguity as to his role.

A corporation may hire and pay the fees of a lawyer to represent corporate constituents, so long as there is no interference with, or diminution of, the lawyer's obligations to his constituent client. Where the lawyer proposes to represent the corporation and a constituent, or two or more constituents, the general conflict provisions of Rule 1.7 must be applied to determine the propriety of the dual representation, and appropriate client disclosures must be made and consents received.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.7(Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- Rule 1.8(e)(Conflict of Interest: Prohibited Transactions)
- Rule 1.13(Organization as Client)
- Rule 4.3(Dealing with Unrepresented Person)

Inquiry

This inquiry presents several questions concerning the obligations of a lawyer conducting an investigation of possible wrongdoing by a corporate client or its employees. Such investigations are not uncommon today. A corporation may, for example, investigate itself as part of a routine regulatory compliance program, it may do so in response to information received from some source suggesting that a violation of law may have occurred, or it may do so in the course of, or in anticipation of, a government proceeding. During such an investigation, counsel for the corporation will likely review records and files maintained by various corporate officials and employees, and may interview such persons at various levels of seniority within the corporation.

The inquirer asks whether an attorney-client relationship is created between the corporate counsel performing the investigation and corporate employee-interviewees; what professional obligations, if any, are owed by the lawyer to the employees in such a circumstance; and what is the nature and extent of confidentiality which applies to information acquired by the lawyer from the employees. The inquiry also raises, inferentially, a question about the general obligations of counsel retained by the corporation to represent the interests of its employees.

Although the inquiry poses its questions in the context of outside counsel performing the legal work, in-house counsel may perform similar activities. Our opinion extends to both types of counsel.

Discussion

Attorney-Client Relationship

Under the former Code of Professional Responsibility, the relationship of a lawyer for a corporation to corporate officials was addressed in Ethical Consideration (EC) 5-18, but not in the Code itself. EC 5-18 read, in relevant part, that:

[10] Because this conflict is in the nature of a personal conflict, as opposed to one derived from the lawyer's representation of another client, we doubt that is would be imputed to other lawyers in the firm. See ABA Formal Opinion 96-400 ("Job Negotiations with Adverse Firm or Party") (Rule 1.10 "cannot be construed so broadly as to require that all lawyers in a firm be presumed to share their colleague's personal interest in joining the opposing firm in a matter," though each lawyer must individually evaluate whether his "'responsibilities to . . . a third person' — i.e., his colleague — or his own interest in her colleague's interest, may materially limit the representation.")

> A lawyer employed or retained by a corporation or similar entity owes his allegiance to the entity and not to a stockholder, director, officer, representative or other person connected with the entity.

That ethical principle was elevated in stature in the Rules of Professional Conduct, where it (and related principles) were incorporated in Rule 1.13.[1]

Subpart (a) of Rule 1.13 makes clear that, when a lawyer is retained to represent a corporation, the lawyer's client is the corporation only, acting through its duly authorized constituents (such as its officers and employees).[2] The situation was no different under the Code of Professional Responsibility. See Opinion No. 159. In this circumstance, then, the lawyer does not have, by reason of the lawyer's representation of the corporation, attorney-client responsibilities to the corporate constituents with whom he may be dealing in the course of his investigation.

Nevertheless, in some settings, a lawyer for the corporation may have an incentive, grounded in the lawyer's desire to further his client's interests, to minimize any perception by the corporate constituent that the corporation and the constituent may have differing interests in the subject matter of the representation, lest such perception affect the willingness of the constituent to be candid and forthcoming with the lawyer. While a lawyer's obligation to represent a client zealously (Rule 1.3(a)) might suggest that the client's need for information from the constituent is the lawyer's only concern, the Rules specifically require that the lawyer be mindful of the interests of the constituent.

Subpart (b) of Rule 1.13 makes clear the obligation of the lawyer to inform corporate constituents of the identity of the lawyer's client when there is a potential for conflict between the position of the corporation and that of the constituent. Such a potential for conflict is a possibility where, for example, the person being interviewed was more than a passive observer of some act or omission which may be attributable to the corporation, but was instead a person who may have been directly or indirectly responsible for the questioned conduct. Such person's interests may be in conflict with those of the corporation, which may want to discipline or terminate him/her or which may, vis-a-vis a third-party (such as a government agency or a civil litigant), endeavor to distance itself from the person's conduct, such as by acknowledging the conduct but denying responsibility for it, or by characterizing the conduct as that of an employee acting contrary to company policy or direction.

The corporate constituent being interviewed by a lawyer for the corporation, however, may consider the lawyer as also representing the employee's personal interests, absent a warning to the contrary. The employee could understandably conclude that, since he is employed by the corporation and the lawyer has been retained to serve the interests of the corporation, the lawyer would not be pursuing interests adverse to those of the employee. Rule 1.13(b) specifically addresses this potential for misunderstanding by the corporate constituent by requiring the lawyer to explain the identity of the lawyer's client "when it is apparent that the organization's interests may be adverse to those of the constituents with whom the lawyer is dealing." [3] Comment [8] to Rule 1.13 advises the lawyer in such a situation to > advise any constituent . . . of the conflict or potential conflict of interest, that the lawyer cannot represent such constituent, and that such person may wish to obtain separate representation. Care must be taken to assure that the individual understands that, when there is such adversity of interest, the lawyer for the organization cannot provide representation for that constituent individual, and that the discussions between the lawyer for the organization and the individual may not be privileged.

Disclosure is required not just when an actual conflict exists between the interests of the corporation and those of the employee (for example, when the corporation has already confided to the lawyer that it will concede wrong-doing by the employee but will attempt to avoid corporate responsibility for any illegality). Disclosure is also required when there "may be" an adverse between the interests of corporation and employee. There "may be" an adverse when the corporation has not yet irretrievably committed itself to a position in the matter, but where one such position might be adverse to the employee. Such a possible adversity would almost always arise, then, when the corporation is able to take a position adverse to the employee.

On the other hand, Rule 1.13(b) applies only when the possible conflict is "apparent," which we interpret to mean actually apparent to the lawyer or apparent to a reasonable lawyer under the circumstances.[4] As so interpreted, the obligation of disclosure would not arise in those situations where the lawyer had no reason to believe that there was any possibility of adversity

[1] District of Columbia Rule 1.13 reads as follows:

(a) A lawyer employed or retained by an organization represents the organization acting through its duly authorized constituents.

(b) In dealing with an organization's directors, officers, employees, members, shareholders, or other constituents, a lawyer shall explain the identity of the client when it is apparent that the organization's interests may be adverse to those of the constituents with whom the lawyer is dealing.

(c) A lawyer representing an organization may also represent any of its directors, officers, employees, members, shareholders, or other constituents, subject to the provisions of Rule 1.7. If the organization's consent to the dual representation is required by Rule 1.7, the consent shall be given by an appropriate official of the organization other than the individual who is to be represented, or by the shareholders.

[2] Such constituents may, however, hire counsel to represent their interests in matters concerning the corporation. A plant manager, for example, may obtain personal representation during an investigation of possible illegal waste disposal at a facility under his supervision.

In the event of any ambiguity concerning whether the lawyer is being hired by the constituent to represent the corporation or constituent, the lawyer should clarify the client's identity at the outset of his dealings with the constituent, as any uncertainty is likely to be resolved in favor of a reasonable expectation of the constituent that an attorney-client relationship has been established with it. Cf., Westinghouse Elec. Corp. v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 580 F. 2d 1311 (7th Cir. 1978).

A representation of the corporation does not preclude representation of a constituent, and vice versa, even in the same matter. See Rule 1.13(c). Such additional representation, discussed later in this Opinion, would be governed by the conflicts provisions of the Rules of Professional Conduct, including Rules 1.7 and 1.9.

[3] That disclosure obligation derives, in part, from Rule 4.3, concerning a lawyer's obligations when dealing with unrepresented persons generally. Under that Rule, a lawyer representing a client shall not give advice to an unrepresented person (other than advice to secure counsel) where the interests of that person may be in conflict with the interests of the lawyer's client, and shall not, even with respect to a person whose interests are not in conflict with those of the lawyer's client, leave the impression that the lawyer is disinterested. Thus, even apart from any special circumstances that might exist when a lawyer for a corporation interviews a corporate employee, Rule 4.3(b) requires the investigating lawyer to clarify his position "[w]hen the lawyer knows or reasonably should know that the unrepresented person misunderstands the lawyer's role in the matter . . . ."

[4] Limiting the disclosure obligation of Rule 1.13(b) to situations where the possible conflict was actually apparent to the lawyer would frustrate the protective purpose of the Rule by allowing a lawyer to be willfully blind to certain circumstances to avoid their "appearance" to him.

between corporation and employee when the interview was conducted.[5]

Confidentiality

As Comment [3] to Rule 1.13 notes, communications between the lawyer and the person being interviewed are protected by Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information), but the protection accorded is for the benefit of the client corporation, not the interviewee. See also Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383 (1981). Thus, the interviewee has no right to expect that disclosure or use of the information provided by him or her to the lawyer will be subject to his/her control under Rule 1.6, as the corporation will have the right to use the information to serve its purposes. In this regard, it makes no difference whether the interviewee is an employee performing routine services, or a corporate director or officer entrusted with more significant responsibilities. Both are persons with interests potentially separate from those of the corporation.

Notwithstanding the law on this subject, a corporate interviewee might reasonably conclude that the information she provides to the investigating lawyer will be treated as confidential by the lawyer, perhaps because she mistakenly believes that the lawyer is representing her also. This, then, is another situation in which Rules 4.3(b) and 1.13(b) may require the lawyer to clarify his role and the status of the information to be provided by the interviewee.[6]

Representation of Constituents

A further question presented in the inquiry concerns the obligations of a lawyer who is retained by a corporation to represent one of its constituents, such as a corporate officer, director or employee. Such retentions, under which the corporation is typically responsible for the lawyer's fees, are not unusual when the representation concerns a matter arising from the constituent's work for the corporation. One aspect of the ethical concerns in such an arrangement is addressed in Rule 1.8(e), which permits a lawyer to accept compensation from someone other than the client (which, in this case, is the corporate employer of his client), but only where the client consents to the arrangement, where the arrangement does not interfere either with the exercise of the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of his client or with the attorney-client relationship, and where client confidences are protected.

Where such representation is of the constituent alone, that person is the lawyer's sole client, just as the lawyer representing the corporation has that entity as his sole client. The lawyer has no attorney-client relationship with the person paying the lawyer's fees, and the lawyer must take care that his activities on behalf of his client are not influenced by that person. Id. And as regards attorney-client confidentiality, that obligation is owed to the constituent-client only, and not to the person paying the lawyer's fees. Id.

The lawyer retained by the corporation to represent the employee also may have a conflict of interest concern under Rule 1.7(b)(4), which applies when the lawyer's work on behalf of a client will or reasonably may be affected, not by obligations to another client, but by the lawyer's financial or personal interests. Such interests could include continuing referral or unrelated other work for the corporation, which could be influenced by the manner in which the lawyer represents the employee. For example, it is not unthinkable that a lawyer who is regularly paid by a stock brokerage to represent its brokers individually may have a financial disincentive to represent a broker in a manner which implicates the brokerage in wrong-doing. Where a situation like that will or may arise, the lawyer could represent the individual client only with the client's informed consent to this potential conflict of interest.[7]

Multiple Representation

Finally, where the lawyer is asked to represent in the same matter a constituent and the corporation, or two constituents, the same types of conflicts may arise as in any other situation where a lawyer (or law firm) represents more than one party in the same matter.[8] Where the potential clients are directly adverse (or become directly adverse after commencement of the dual representation), the dual representation is absolutely prohibited under Rule 1.7(a). But even where the parties are nominally aligned together, there may be a risk that the representation of one will adversely affect the representation of the other. For example, one client may wish to settle a matter in litigation, while the other may not and might perceive his/her litigation position to be prejudiced by a settlement by the other client. In such a situation, the clients represented by the same lawyer are not advancing interests adverse to one another so as to invoke the unqualified prohibition of dual representation under Rule 1.7, but Rules 1.7(b)(2) and (3) are clearly implicated in such a situation, since one client's interests cannot be zealously pursued without likely adverse effect on the interests of the other client. Such dual representation could only be accomplished, then, with the consent of both clients, "after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation . . . ." Rule 1.7(c). The nature and content of the disclosure will obviously be determined by the facts and circumstances of the matter and the lawyer's representation of the potentially adverse clients. Among the subjects of disclosure that may be unique to a lawyer's representation of a corporation and an employee, or two employees of the same corporation, are the lawyer's pre-existing relationship with the two clients, whether one of the clients is an expected source of additional, unrelated legal work for the lawyer, and who will be paying the lawyer's fees (if not the client).

The disclosure should also address the fact and consequences of a possible disqualification of the lawyer from further representation of the client in the event the dually-represented clients later plan to take positions actually adverse to each other in the same matter. One of those consequences could be the inconvenience, expense and possible legal risk associated

[5] The only Rule 1.13 Comment relevant to the obligation to make a disclosure to corporate constituents is [9], which is not particularly helpful: "Whether such a warning should be given by the lawyer for the organization to any constituent individual may turn on the facts of each case."

[6] Where the lawyer, through act or omission, reasonably leaves the constituent with the impression that there is an attorney-client relationship between them, the constituent's communications will be given protection under Rule 1.6. That was the situation in Westinghouse Elec. Corp. v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 580 F. 2d 1311 (7th Cir. 1978), where lawyers for a trade association gave some individual members of a trade association the impression that they were also representing them when collecting information from the members. When a matter later arose for another client in which the information collected from the members might be used against them, the law firm was required to withdraw from representation because of its conflicting confidentiality obligations to the members.

[7] Conflict of interest issues are similarly raised when representation of the corporate constituent is being provided by an in-house lawyer. The in-house lawyer, like outside counsel, has a concern under Rule 1.7(b)(4), in this case whether his representation of the corporate constituent will or reasonably maybe affected by his personal employment interests with the corporation. He also has a multiple-client concern under Rules 1.7(b)(2) and (3), because of his continuing service as counsel to the corporation. See discussion herein under "Multiple Representation."

[8] Rule 1.13(c) specifically authorizes the representation of a corporation and one or more constituents, subject to satisfaction of the requirements of Rule 1.7, concerning conflicts of interest generally.

with the need for the client to retain new counsel.

It would not be impermissible for the lawyer in such a dual representation to seek the consent of one of the clients to continue representation of the other client in the event of an actual adversity under Rule 1.7(a) that requires termination of the dual representation. But such consent must be based on disclosure of the consequences to that client of granting such consent, and disclosure to the client for whom the representation would continue of any limitations on that continued representation. Perhaps the most significant area to be addressed in disclosures to both clients is how the lawyer's confidentiality obligation to the client to be terminated will be protected, and how the representation of the continuing client will be affected by the lawyer's continuing confidentiality obligation to the terminated client. In circumstances where the dual representation cannot be continued, Rule 1.9 (Conflict of Interest: Former Client) may prevent the lawyer from continuing to represent either client unless one of the clients has granted this particular consent.

On the other hand, there may be many dual representations where the interests of the two parties have no reasonable likelihood of becoming adverse, in which case Rules 1.7(b)(2) and (3) would not be applicable, and client consent would not be needed. But the existence of the Rule 1.7(b) criteria may not always be apparent or readily determinable at the outset of a representation, and a lawyer should be careful not to resolve unilaterally close conflict questions against the interests of clients or prospective clients. Comment [7] to Rule 1.7 describes the situation as follows:

> The underlying premise [of Rule 1.7(b)] is that disclosure and consent are required before assuming a representation if there is any reason to doubt the lawyer's ability to provide wholehearted and zealous representation or if a client might reasonably consider the representation of its interests to be adversely affected by the lawyer's assumption of the other representation in question. Although the lawyer must be satisfied that the representation can be wholeheartedly and zealously undertaken, if an objective observer would have any reasonable doubt on that issue, the client has a right to disclosure of all relevant considerations and the opportunity to be the judge of its own interests.

Thus, in judging whether one representation is "likely" to affect adversely another representation, the lawyer must look at the proposed dual representation from both an objective perspective and from the perspective of the potentially affected client's reasonable expectation of loyalty. Each case will, obviously, turn on the particular facts and circumstances presented.

Whether Subordinate Lawyer Must Alert Client and Report Superior's Misconduct After Lawyer Has Left Practice

• Where a subordinate lawyer learns that an employing lawyer has sent a client what purports to be copies of correspondence written on the client's behalf, but where the letters were, in fact, never sent, the subordinate lawyer has a duty to assure that the client is informed of the deception and to report the employing lawyer to disciplinary authorities. These duties continue after the subordinate lawyer resigns upon learning of the deception.

Inquiry

Inquirer, a lawyer, was hired through a temporary employment agency to work for a sole practitioner on a particular matter. In the course of the first few days of inquirer's work, the employing lawyer informed her that his client in the matter had recently insisted that he write an aggressive letter to a third party, despite the lawyer's advice that sending such a letter was imprudent. The employing lawyer further advised inquirer that when the client made such demands in the past, his practice was to draft a letter that would satisfy the client's wishes but not send it to the addressee. Instead, the employing lawyer sent a copy of the letter to the client to make it appear to the client that the letter had been sent to the addressee. The employing lawyer did not explain when these events had taken place and did not ask inquirer to draft a fictitious letter.

Inquirer informed the employing lawyer that she felt uncomfortable about this practice, and at the end of the first week of her placement withdrew from the matter and resigned the temporary position. Some weeks later inquirer informed the employing lawyer that she believed that he had committed a serious violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct, and requested that the client be informed of the deceptions. As a result of these conversations, the employing lawyer informed the client of the falsity of the prior letters and withdrew from representation of the client.

Inquirer raises two questions: 1) After leaving the firm, does inquirer have a duty to assure that the client is informed of the employing lawyer's misrepresentations? 2) Upon leaving, does inquirer have a duty to report the violation to disciplinary authorities? In our opinion, the answer to both questions is yes.

Discussion

The conduct of the employing lawyer destroyed the heart of the lawyer-client relationship. A client must be able to trust a lawyer and be confident that the lawyer is sharing relevant information and dealing forthrightly and honestly with the client. Deceiving the client about the lawyer's own actions in the matter destroys this fundamental aspect of the lawyer-client relationship.

Dishonesty and deceit are professional misconduct under Rule 8.4(c). Rule 1.4, moreover, enshrines a lawyer's duty of honest communication with the client.[1] It demands that the lawyer keep the client "reasonably informed of the status of a matter." In this case, the failure to keep the client informed took the form of deliberately misleading the client about the lawyer's actions in the case.

Lawyers sometimes have clients who are obstreperous or demand that the lawyer take actions that are inconsistent with the lawyer's best judgment. There are accepted ways of responding to the difficulties such clients present, but affirmatively leading the client to believe the lawyer has taken an action he has not in fact taken is not among them. The harms that could befall a client who has received a fictitious letter from a lawyer are easily imagined. But even if no specific harm occurs, sending a fictitious letter to the client so damages the professional relationship as to require condemnation of the lawyer's conduct.

1. Disclosure to the client.

Had inquirer remained in the employ of the offending lawyer and continued to represent the client beyond the mere week she did, she would have had an obligation to assure that the client was represented consistent with the Rules of Professional Conduct, including the duty of open and honest communication under Rule 1.4.[2] The requirement of truthfulness in the representation that is part of the Rule 1.4 obligation would have required her to take action to see to it that no further fictitious letters be sent and that the client be informed about the fictitious letters sent in the past.

Inquirer, however, no longer represents the client, and we must ascertain what duty to inform, if any, she owed to the client upon her withdrawal. Usually, withdrawal from representation terminates the relationship with the client, leaving only limited residual obligations, such as to protect client confidences and to avoid certain conflicts. See Rules 1.6(f) and 1.9. The duty of communication is not among these residual obligations. Inquirer did, however, have the duty upon withdrawal to "take timely steps to the extent practicable to protect a client's interests, . . ." Rule 1.16(d). In the unique circumstances presented in this case, we believe that one of those timely and practicable steps is to assure that the client is informed of the deceptions. The brevity of the representation by inquirer left little time to fulfill the duty to notify the client of the misrepresentation during the course of inquirer's participation in the representation. The only way to remedy the wrongdoing and prevent disadvantage to the client was to act promptly to assure that the client became aware of the deception.

We recognize that Rule 1.16(d) seems intended to address the common situation where a lawyer or entire firm terminates representing a client, not the instance where a single lawyer among two or more on a matter withdraws. Nevertheless, both the language and what we discern as the underlying purpose of the rule — to assure that the client is not disadvantaged by the lawyer's departure — apply equally in both instances. Comment [10] of the Rule states that even when a lawyer is unfairly discharged by a client, the lawyer still must take "all reasonable steps to mitigate the consequences." Surely, then, a lawyer who leaves on account of another lawyer's misconduct has a similar duty to mitigate. Mitigation here means assuring that the client learn the truth about the fictitious letters.

Inquirer should, however, exercise her obligation under Rule 1.16(d) in a manner least disruptive to the existing lawyer-client relationship. Here, inquirer acted appropriately by approaching the employing lawyer and securing his commitment to disclose his acts to the client. If the employing lawyer had refused to inform the client or raised substantial doubt in inquirer's mind whether he would do so, inquirer would have had a duty to inform the client directly.

2. The obligation to report to disciplinary authorities.

The next question is whether inquirer has any additional obligation to report the employing lawyer's misconduct to Bar Counsel. Rule 8.3 requires reporting of violations of the Rules of Professional Conduct "that raise a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer . . ." In Opinion 246, we adopted the four-part test adopted by other jurisdictions for determining whether this standard is met: (1) whether the reporting lawyer has knowledge of the violation; (2) whether reporting can be accomplished without disclosure of client confidences or secrets; (3) whether the violation involves a disciplinary rule; and (4) whether the violation raises a substantial question as to honesty, trustworthiness or fitness to practice law.

All four elements are met in this case. The first element —whether a lawyer has "actual knowledge" of a violation — turns on two factors: a "clear belief" that misconduct occurred and "actual knowledge of the pertinent facts." Opinion 246. There is no question here that inquirer clearly believed misconduct occurred. The fact that inquirer left the temporary placement after just a week because of her discomfort with the employing lawyer's conduct confirms that she believed the employing lawyer had in fact engaged in serious wrongdoing.

We also conclude that inquirer had "actual knowledge" of the violation through the admissions the employing lawyer made directly to her. One might argue that inquirer did not have "actual knowledge" in the sense of witnessing first-hand the behavior of the employing lawyer whom she would be reporting. She did not see the letters or know when and to whom the letters were written, or what they said. But we do not interpret the requirement of "actual knowledge" in Rule 8.3 to require direct observation of the underlying facts that constitute a violation. One of the purposes of Rule 8.3 is to require that lawyers report misconduct when the victim is not in a position to discover it. Rule 8.3 does not require that a lawyer report every hunch about wrongdoing. But neither should it require a lawyer to conduct an independent investigation. The frank and unambiguous admission by the employing lawyer that he had sent multiple fictitious letters to this client in connection with this litigation is sufficient.

The remaining elements of the test are easily met. It is clear that the subordinate lawyer could report the violation without disclosing client confidences or secrets. The only "secret" here was that the employing lawyer was deceiving the client. The third and fourth tests, involving the violation of a disciplinary rule that affects the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness, or fitness to practice, are also clearly met. The employing lawyer's agreement to notify the client of the fictitious letters does not alter this conclusion, since the violation involved the very serious offense of deliberately lying to the client. Inquirer therefore must report the employing lawyer to Bar Counsel.

Conclusion

In Opinion 246, we recognized that the judgment whether another lawyer's conduct raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness is a "solemn and unenviable task." Here, inquirer's knowledge of serious misconduct not only required that such a judgment be made, but imposed additional duties on her.

Inactive Members: Business Cards and Letterhead

• A lawyer who is licensed to practice in three jurisdictions, including the District of Columbia, and who plans to become an inactive member of the D.C. Bar cannot indicate that he is admitted to the D.C. Bar on his letterhead and business cards without further elaboration. To avoid misleading the public about his present ability to practice law in the District of Columbia, the lawyer must note his inactive status once it becomes effective.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 7.1(Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services)
- Rule 7.5(Firm Names and Letterheads)

Inquiry

A lawyer is currently an active member of the New Jersey, Pennsylvania and District of Columbia bars. The lawyer is considering becoming an inactive member of the District of Columbia Bar in order to be exempt from the annual District of Columbia Professional License Fee. The lawyer has never had the occasion to practice law in the District of Columbia since becoming a member of the D.C. Bar.

The lawyer inquires whether he can state "Admitted to N.J., P.A. and D.C. bars" on his business cards, business announcements, and letterheads after he becomes an inactive member of the D.C. Bar.

Discussion

This inquiry poses the question whether the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct permit an inactive member of the D.C. Bar to indicate "Admitted to N.J., P.A. and D.C. bars" on his business cards and letterhead without any further explanation. The Committee concludes that it would be misleading if the lawyer does not indicate his inactive status on his business cards and letterhead. This omission would violate Rules 7.1 and 7.5.

Rule 7.5 prohibits lawyers from using firm names, letterheads, or other professional designations that violate Rule 7.1. Rule 7.1, in turn, prevents a lawyer from making a false or misleading communication about the lawyer or his services. A communication that is false or misleading "contains a material misrepresentation of fact or law, or omits a fact necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading" or "contains an assertion about the lawyer or the lawyer's services that cannot be substantiated." Rules 7.1(a)(1); 7.1(a)(2).

In Opinion 244, this Committee held that the name of a nonlawyer partner may be included in the name of a law firm so long as business cards and letterhead clearly indicate that the nonlawyer partner is not a lawyer. Similarly, in ABA Informal Opinion 89-1527 (Feb. 22, 1989), the ABA Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility determined that the listing of nonlawyer personnel on a law firm's letterhead and business cards is permissible so long as these materials make it clear that the nonlawyer personnel are not licensed to practice law and do not exercise control over the law firm's professional legal practice. The rationale underlying both Opinion 244 and ABA Informal Opinion 89-1527 is that failing to distinguish those persons who are presently permitted to practice law and those who are not, is misleading under Rule 7.1(a)(1).

Similarly, in Nevada Ethics Opinion 14 (Oct. 8, 1993), the Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility held that a lawyer may list the states where she is currently inactive on her letterhead so long as it includes a qualification indicating the lawyer's inactive status. The Standing Committee recognized that it would be potentially misleading to the public for the lawyer not to note her inactive status.

The same rationale applies to the present inquiry. Once a lawyer becomes an inactive member of the D.C. Bar, it would be misleading to state, on his letterhead and business cards, that he is "Admitted to N.J., P.A. and D.C. bars" because this statement implies a present ability to practice law in this jurisdiction. Rule II, sec. 4, of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals Rules Governing the Bar, provides that "[n]o judicial or inactive member shall be entitled to practice law in the District of Columbia." The statement "Admitted to N.J., P.A. and D.C. bars" suggests that the lawyer is presently permitted to practice in all three jurisdictions. As Rule II indicates, however, once the lawyer opts for inactive status, he will no longer be permitted to practice law in the District of Columbia. It would be misleading for the lawyer to state that he is admitted to the D.C. Bar without saying anything more. This would create the impression that the lawyer is presently permitted to practice in D.C. when indeed he is not. Therefore, a lawyer must note his inactive status on letterhead and business cards so as not to violate Rule 7.1 and Rule 7.5.

Conflict of Interests: "Hot Potato"

- A law firm may continue to represent a client, which it has long counselled on regulatory matters, in an adversary proceeding before the relevant administrative agency, even after a second client that it represents on unrelated matters hires separate counsel and unexpectedly initiates adversary litigation in that administrative agency against the first client and refuses to waive the conflict.

Where a lawyer-client relationship is on-going, conflict of interest issues involving that client are governed by Rule 1.7(b), not Rule 1.9, and thus the lawyer may not take a position adverse to that client on behalf of another. However, the lawyer may withdraw from the representation of the client if he may do so in accordance with the provisions of Rule 1.16, and after he has done so, the lawyer's obligations to that client are governed by Rule 1.9.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.7(Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- Rule 1.9(Conflict of Interest: Former Client)
- Rule 1.16(Declining or Terminating Representation)

Inquiry

A law firm has requested our opinion concerning its ability to represent two clients of the firm who are adverse in an administrative proceeding. The firm has represented Client A for a considerable period of time with respect to matters that are regulated by that agency. The firm successfully represented Client A in a completed, non-adversarial matter before the agency and thereafter continued to provide advice regarding matters regulated by that agency. The firm also represents Client B in unrelated contract matters, but has not done any work for Client B in some months. Client B represented by separate counsel, has initiated an adversarial action against Client A before that administrative agency. Client B refuses to consent to the law firm's representation of Client A in the administrative matter.

The question posed is whether and under what conditions the law firm, consistent with the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, may represent Client A in the administrative proceeding initiated by Client B. The Committee concludes that the law firm may represent Client A in that proceeding if the firm is ethically permitted to withdraw from the separate, unrelated representation of Client B. We find that in the circumstances presented by this inquiry withdrawal is permitted under Rule 1.16.

Discussion

The inquiry focuses on the conflict between the firm's two clients, A and B, in the regulatory proceeding, a conflict that arose through no action of the law firm and that was not reasonably foreseeable at the outset of the firm's representation of either of the two clients. Fundamental to the resolution of the questions presented is the difference in the standards applicable under the Rules where a lawyer wishes to oppose a present client and where he wishes to oppose a former client. The first issue to be addressed is whether the lawyer may consider his representation of Client B as having ended for purposes of the conflict of interest rules. The second issue, assuming the answer to the first is in the negative, is whether the lawyer may withdraw as counsel to Client B in order to be free to litigate against that party under the less stringent rules governing conflicts of interest with former clients.

Governing Conflict of Interest Rules

Rule 1.7(b)(1) of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct provides that, without the fully informed consent of the affected clients, a lawyer may not represent a client in a matter if a position to be taken by that client in that matter is adverse to a position of another client in the same matter. This rule deals with a situation in which the lawyer is representing one client in a matter, such as a litigation or an administrative proceeding, in which another client, which the lawyer represents only in unrelated matters, takes a position adverse to the first client. Rule 1.7 is designed to ensure that an attorney will act with undivided loyalty to all existing clients. Undivided loyalty to a client is, of course, a fundamental tenet of the attorney-client relationship. See Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics, 146 (1986).

A lawyer's duty to a former client is somewhat different and is governed by Rule 1.9. Under this rule, a lawyer may sue or otherwise take positions antagonistic to a former client, without disclosure and without the former client's consent, if the new representation is not substantially related to the matter in which the lawyer had represented the former client. The purpose of this rule is to assure the preservation of attorney-client confidences gained in the prior representation and to preserve the reasonable expectations of the former client that the attorney will not seek to benefit from the prior representation at the expense of the former client.

If the fact situation presented by the inquiry were governed by Rule 1.7(b), it is clear that the law firm could not undertake the representation of Client A in the regulatory proceeding in which the firm's Client B was a party with separate representation, without the informed consent of both Clients A and B. On the other hand, if the firm's representation of Client B were at an end at the time Client A sought the firm's assistance against B, the situation would be governed by Rule 1.9 instead of Rule 1.7. In that situation, there would be no impediment to the firm's representing Client A against former Client B as long as the regulatory proceeding was unrelated to the firm's prior representation of former Client B.

Whether Client B Should Be Regarded as a Current Client

In light of the difference in the conflict of interest rules governing present and former clients, it is important to determine at the outset whether B should be regarded as a current or a former client. In many instances, such a question can be easily answered from objective facts. If the lawyer had previously withdrawn from the representation of Client B under Rule 1.16, the withdrawal would have terminated the relationship and converted the client into a former client. Or, if the firm had completed the single discrete task for which it had been retained, the client is a former one. Such is the situation envisioned in Comment [8] to Rule 1.3: "If a lawyer's employment is limited to a specific matter, the relationship terminates when the matter has been resolved." That could be the situation presented to us in this inquiry, as the law firm completed all tasks for Client B and there has been no communication between them for some months.

On the other hand, certain facts are presented which suggest that the attorney/client relationship is continuing in this situation with respect to Client B. We are informed that the inquiring law firm is from time to time consulted by B on contract matters, which may indicate a continuing relationship punctuated by periods of inactivity. B appears to have a subjective belief that it continues to be a client of the firm. Since a reasonable subjective belief can be the basis for the formation of an attorney/client relationship (see Westinghouse Elec. Corp. v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 580 F.2d 1311 (7th Cir. 1978)), it may also be the basis for the continuation of the relationship. The inquirer, moreover, refers to B as a client in its inquiry, and the inquirer sought B's consent to the representation of A in the administrative proceeding. With additional facts which may or may not be present here, another sentence of Comment [8] to Rule 1.3 could apply and lead to the conclusion that B remains a client:

> If a lawyer has served a client over a substantial period in a variety of matters, the client sometimes may assume that the lawyer will continue to serve on a continuing basis unless the lawyer gives notice of withdrawal. Doubt about whether a client-lawyer relationship still exists should be eliminated by the lawyer, preferably in writing, so that the client will not mistakenly suppose the lawyer is looking after the client's affairs when the lawyer has ceased to do so.

While additional facts might affect our determination, we assume, on the facts presented and for purposes of this analysis, that B is a current client of the inquiring law firm.

Whether the Lawyer May Withdraw From Representing Client B

If B is a current client, the question then arises whether the lawyer may withdraw from representing Client B and invoke the more lenient conflict of interest provisions of Rule 1.9 to determine his obligations to his former client. Rule 1.16(b) provides, in relevant part, that a lawyer may withdraw from representing a client only if withdrawal can be accomplished without "material adverse effect" on the interests of the client.

Under the facts presented here, we conclude that the firm may withdraw under Rule 1.16(b) because it appears that withdrawal as counsel from Client B can be accomplished without "material adverse effect" on Client B. All projects for Client B have apparently been completed; no work had been done on the unrelated contract matters for several months; no outstanding projects appear to be contemplated imminently; and Client B was able to obtain different counsel, as reflected by the fact that B retained other counsel to represent it in connection with the administrative proceeding.

Relevance of Rule 1.7(d)

Our conclusion respecting the permissibility of the firm's representation of Client A against Client B is consistent with newly promulgated D.C. Rule 1.7(d). While this provision does not in terms apply in this situation, we believe it provides guidance and support for our resolution of this matter under Rule 1.16.

Rule 1.7(d) deals with the situation in which a law firm is representing two clients simultaneously in unrelated matters, and thereafter adversity between the clients' positions in a particular matter develops or for the first time becomes apparent.[1] Thus, under this Rule, if the law firm had been representing Client A in an ongoing administrative proceeding and Client B, represented by separate counsel, unexpectedly intervened in the administrative proceeding taking positions adverse to Client A, then the law firm would be able to continue both representations so long as it reasonably concluded that neither representation would interfere with the other.[2]

If the lawyer is currently representing both Client A and Client B, why then does Rule 1.7(d) not control in this situation, since one client has retained other counsel and preemptively sued the other? The answer is that when Rule 1.7(d) speaks in terms of a conflict not foreseeable "at the outset of a representation," we believe that this means representation in a particular discrete matter, as contemplated in Rule 1.7(b).

While it would not be unreasonable to interpret the phrase "outset of a representation" to mean the client's initial retention of the lawyer on any matter, it is clear from the context of Rule 1.7(d) that the drafters had in mind the outset of representation in the discrete matter in which the unforeseen conflict arises. The narrow exception to Rule 1.7(b) carved out by the new subsection (d) addresses the situation in which one client potentially has the power to disable the law firm from its ongoing representation of another client in a particular matter already in progress, simply by intervening in the proceeding with separate counsel, which would of course result in substantial prejudice to the client deprived in midstream of its lawyer.[3]

It would be a considerable step beyond this narrow class of "thrust upon" conflicts to extend Rule 1.7(d) to situations where, as here, there is a current general "representation" of a client but the matter in which adversity develops has not yet begun. Such an expansive reading of Rule 1.7(d) would, we believe, make a larger inroad into the protections of Rule 1.7(b) than the drafters of Rule 1.7(d) intended. Thus, we believe that Rule 1.7(d) does not apply where a law firm represents two clients on unrelated matters and thereafter one client decides to sue the second client in a new matter. In this situation, the law firm may represent one of the clients in the new matter only with the informed consent of both clients.

We believe the facts of the instant inquiry take it outside the terms of Rule 1.7(d), since there was no discrete matter in existence prior to the time that Client B initiated the proceeding against Client A. On the other hand, the concerns underlying the enactment of Rule 1.7(d) are clearly implicated here, since Client B's initiation of an action against Client A in a forum in which Client A would reasonably have expected to be able to avail itself of the services of its long-standing lawyers, would work precisely the same sort of "substantial prejudice" towards Client A about which the drafters of the "thrust upon" rule were concerned. We are thus reassured that our conclusion in this situation, that the firm should be able to represent Client A by withdrawing from its representation of Client B if allowed by Rule 1.16, is consistent with the overall policies of the rules.

In sum, we believe that the law firm should be able, under the circumstances presented, (i) to withdraw as counsel to Client B, rendering it a former client; and (ii) to continue thereafter, consistent with Rule 1.9, to represent A in the administrative proceeding, taking positions adverse to former Client B provided that the matter is not substantially related to the work that the law firm did for Client B.

Analysis of Precedents

In reaching our conclusion, we are mindful of a line of judicial authority and opinions of Bar committees in other jurisdictions that severely limit a lawyer's ability to terminate a client once a potential conflict arises in order to be able to take positions adverse to the erstwhile client. See, e.g., Picker Intl., Inc. v. Varian Assoc., Inc., 869 F.2d 578 (Fed. Cir. 1989); Unified Sewerage Agency v. Jelco, Inc., 646 F.2d 1339 (9th Cir. 1981); Penn Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Cleveland Mall Associates, 841 F. Supp. 815 (E.D. Tenn. 1993); Harte Biltmore Ltd. v. First Pennsylvania Bank, 655 F. Supp. 419 (S.D. Fla. 1987). These cases have been cited for the broad proposition that "a law firm may not withdraw from a representation where the purpose is to undertake a new representation adverse to the first client, even in an unrelated matter, and apparently even if the withdrawal would not have an adverse impact on the client." Hazard & Hodes, The Law of Lawyering: A Handbook on the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, p.480.1 (1996). As noted in the Hazard & Hodes handbook, this rule has come to be called the "hot potato" rule as a result of the colorful statement by District Court Judge Aldrich in Picker Intl., Inc. v. Varian Assoc., Inc., 670 F. Supp. 1363, 1365 (N.D. Ohio 1987), aff'd 869 F.2d 578 (Fed. Cir. 1989): "A firm may not drop a client like a hot potato, especially if it is in order to keep happy a far more lucrative client."

We believe this line of authority does not govern the instant inquiry, for several reasons. In the first place, none of these cases was decided by a District of Columbia court; none was interpreting the D.C. Rules; and none of the cases arose in the District of Columbia. We are not aware of a District of Columbia court decision that addresses the issue. Second, and more important, we believe that the cases and bar opinions from the other jurisdictions are distinguishable on the facts presented by this inquiry, as well as by differences in the applicable rules.

We believe that the facts presented here make clear that the broadest statement of the so-called "hot potato rule" is too categorical to apply in all circumstances and is inconsistent with the optional withdrawal provisions of the D.C. Rules. As Professors Hazard and Hodes noted: "The ['hot potato'] rule will not wash if applied uncriti-

[1] Made effective by the D.C. Court of Appeals as of November, 1996, Rule 1.7(d) provides:

> If a conflict not reasonably foreseeable at the outset of a representation arises under paragraph (b)(1) after the representation commences, and is not waived under paragraph (c), a lawyer need not withdraw from any representation unless the conflict also arises under paragraphs (b)(2), (b)(3), or (b)(4).

[2] Under new Rule 1.7(d) and its commentary, the law firm should promptly inform both clients of the situation and seek their informed consent. Comment [22] to the Rule states: "Where a conflict is not foreseeable at the outset of the representation and arises only under Rule 1.7(b)(1), a lawyer should seek consent to the conflict at the time that the conflict becomes evident, but if such consent is not given by the opposing party in the matter, the lawyer need not withdraw."

Accordingly, even if the client/opposing party does not consent, the law firm may continue both representations if it concludes that neither representation will be adversely affected by the simultaneous representation of the clients in the separate matters. Of course, either client is free to terminate the representation of it by the law firm.

[3] The prototypical situation covered by Rule 1.7(d) is where a lawyer represents a client in a litigation in which a second client, represented on unrelated matters, is at the outset neither a party nor a contemplated party. If, without any reasonable foreseeability, the second client takes an adverse position in that litigation, it would be quite unfair to disqualify the lawyer from representing the client that he had been representing in the ongoing litigation. Thus, under Rule 1.7(d), even if the second client refuses to consent, the lawyer may continue to represent the first client in the litigation.

cally, whenever a lawyer drops a client for the purpose of suing that client on behalf of someone else." Id. at 480.2 (emphasis in original). These noted ethics professors further observe that the approach is "certainly inconsistent with the permissive withdrawal scheme of Rule 1.16(b)" and that a definition of loyalty broad enough to encompass the mere act of dropping a client "would convert the client-lawyer relationship into one of perpetual servitude." Ibid

In each of the cited cases in which a lawyer was disqualified from continuing a representation of a client, the lawyer had affirmatively undertaken action — such as initiating a law firm merger — which created the potential conflict. In each of the cases, the representation of the client, whose termination was proposed, was active. Further, each jurisdiction involved had adopted Canon 9, of the former Code of Professional Responsibility, which provides that in all matters an attorney must avoid even the "appearance of impropriety." The D.C. Rules deliberately do not include any provision focusing on the appearance of impropriety. See Paragraph [32] Explanation of Committee and Board Revisions, Rule 1.7 of Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct submitted to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, Nov. 19, 1986, by the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia Bar. Finally, none of the jurisdictions had a "thrust-upon" conflicts rule like D.C.'s Rule 1.7(d), which allows an attorney to remain in a matter after an unforeseeable conflict has arisen. In all of these respects, these cases from other jurisdictions are distinguishable.

It does not appear from the facts of this Inquiry that the law firm had any role in creating the conflict between the two clients, and indeed it had no reason to anticipate that such a conflict would develop when it undertook the representation of A in the administrative agency matters. Nor was the firm currently actively engaged in representing Client B in any particular matter, such that its withdrawal might work some prejudice to Client B.

We believe that the approach taken by the Alabama Supreme Court in AmSouth Bank v. Drummond Company, Inc., 589 So.2d 715 (Ala. 1991) is instructive. In that case, a firm represented Client A in a litigation and Client B, a bank, in unrelated securities matters. During the course of the litigation, Client B, in its fiduciary capacity as a trustee, retained separate counsel and joined the lawsuit against Client A. Client A agreed to waive the conflict, but Client B refused. The law firm promptly withdrew as counsel for Client B and continued to represent Client A in the lawsuit. Former Client B then moved to disqualify the law firm. The Alabama Supreme Court held that the law firm had acted properly in withdrawing as counsel to Client B in the suit because the litigation was not related to the matters on which the firm had represented Client B.

In considering the interplay among Rules 1.7, 1.9 and 1.16 of the Alabama Rules of Professional Conduct — which are similar, but not identical, to the provisions under which we operate in the District of Columbia — the AmSouth Court stated that the Rules of Professional Conduct are "rules of reason," and that it had always employed a "common sense" approach to questions concerning the professional conduct of lawyers. The Court emphasized four factors in reaching its conclusion that the law firm acted properly in withdrawing as counsel to Client B and thereby treating Client B as a former client for purposes of the conflict rules:

1. The law firm did not by its actions create the conflict of interest; rather, Client B had taken the initiative;

2. Client A would be substantially prejudiced by the withdrawal of the law firm, which had already devoted hundreds of hours to the defense of A in the litigation

3. The law firm, after failing to obtain consent, promptly withdrew from representing Client B; and

4. Client B would not be materially prejudiced by the withdrawal of the firm as its counsel on the unrelated matters which had consumed very few hours to that point.

While the fact patterns are diverse, a number of other courts have taken a common sense approach to conflict issues in analogous circumstances, permitting the matter to be resolved by withdrawal from representation of a client, where little or no prejudice will result to that client. See, e.g., Monaghan v. S2S 33 Associates, L.P., 1994 WL 623185 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 9, 1994); In Re Wingspread Corp., 152 B.R. 861 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1993); Pearson v. Singing River Medical Center Inc., 757 F. Supp. 768 (S.D. Miss. 1991); Gould, Inc. v. Mitsui Min. & Smelting Co., 738 F. Supp. 1121 (N.D. Ohio 1990); Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co. v. RJR Nabisco, Inc., 721 F. Supp. 534 (S.D.N.Y. 1989); Penwalt Corp. v. Plough, Inc., 85 F.R.D. 264 (D. Del. 1980).

In responding to the instant inquiry, we adopt the "common sense" approach of the Alabama Supreme Court in AmSouth, encouraged in this course by the recent adoption of D.C. Rule 1.7(d). We believe that the same four factors used by the AmSouth Court should be analyzed and balanced in cases when the conflict between two clients is unforeseen and does not arise during the course of a discrete ongoing matter.

On the other hand, we also strongly agree that the important values of client loyalty and confidence of the public in the bar preclude an interpretation of the rules that would enable a lawyer or a law firm to abandon a client during an active representation in anticipation of pursuing another, perhaps more lucrative, conflicting representation. If, for example, a lawyer were in the midst of representing a client when a prospective client came along seeking the lawyer's assistance in bringing a potentially rewarding lawsuit against the existing client in an unrelated matter, we believe that withdrawal from the existing representation under those circumstances would not be permissible under Rule 1.16. Our analysis of such a situation would be that virtually by definition the existing client would suffer material adverse harm by the withdrawal.

Thus we would view the situation quite differently if A were a prospective new client who had approached the law firm to seek the firm's services in a suit against B, an existing client of the firm. In that situation, there is the specter that the law firm was chosen precisely because it had represented the prospective defendant and thus the firm may presumptively be aware of certain facts or attitudes of the prospective defendant that could be useful to the potential new client. Second, in such a situation there is by definition no prior relationship between the prospective client and the law firm and thus there would be no apparent prejudice in requiring the prospective client to find other counsel. Third, the withdrawal of the firm from providing ongoing services for the existing client would almost certainly result in some prejudice, disruption or additional expense for the existing client. Each situation must be analyzed on its facts. In general, we suggest that the more the potential conflict was caused by the actions of the attorney for the benefit of the attorney and/or a prospective or other client, the less justifiable will be the firm's effort to withdraw and to treat the conflict under the principles applying to former clients. If, as a result, the firm is unable to withdraw, the conflict will have to be analyzed under Rule 1.7. Where, however, as here, A is an existing client with a legitimate and longstanding claim to his lawyer's loyalty and services; where the unrelated matters for Client B had been completed, and the withdrawal can be made without material adverse effect on Client B; where the conflict was precipitated by Client B without any participation by the law firm; and where Client A would suffer material adverse effect by withdrawal, we believe a common sense reconciliation of the competing principles of professional responsibility permits the lawyer to terminate representation of Client B and to treat B as a former client under Rule 1.9. Of course, the withdrawal would have to be effected in a manner conforming to Rule 1.16, which includes a clear communication to the former client. It is also assumed that no confidential information obtained from Client B would be used in any way in the representation of Client A.

It is important to emphasize that in the question presented by the inquiry it is clear that the law firm was required to withdraw from at least one representation. The law firm either had to forego representing Client A in the administrative proceeding or cease representing Client B in the unrelated matters. Because the firm faced that choice and because at least one client was going to lose the firm's services for some purposes, it is pertinent to consider the competing equities, including the relative potential prejudice to each client from withdrawal of the representation of that client.

Practical Considerations

The inquiry highlights the importance of distinguishing between existing and former clients. We are aware that in many situations the relationship between an entity and a lawyer or law firm is ambiguous. For example, a corporation, not providing a retainer, may call upon a law firm from time to time for legal advice, paying on a per hour basis for services rendered. During the hiatus between the last call and before another possible request for advice, it may be unclear whether the corporation is an existing client or simply a former and prospective client. Absent an express termination, a court will likely examine the subjective expectations of both parties, as evidenced by their relevant conduct, to determine whether the attorney-client relationship continues. See, e.g., Manoir-Electroalloys Corp. v. Amalloy Corp., 711 F. Supp. 188 (D.N.J. 1989); Derrickson v. Derrickson, 541 A.2d 149 (D.C.App. 1988).

For a variety of reasons, including but not limited to the differing conflict rules applicable to existing and former clients, lawyers would be well advised to take steps to delineate the relationship clearly. This may be addressed in part by clearly defining in writing the project or services to be rendered at the outset of the retention. A termination clause may be included in the engagement letter, providing that upon completion of the described services and payment, the attorney-client relationship will be concluded. Alternatively, a law firm may deem it advisable to send close-out letters, politely concluding the relationship, when the assignment is completed. Similarly, it may be prudent for a law firm to comb its client list periodically and advise in writing entities or individuals for whom it has not performed legal work for a substantial period of time that the law firm deems the person or entity to be a former client. While such clarity, even if diplomatically communicated, may not always serve the best business interests of the law firm, an unambiguous statement of the relationship prior to the development of a potential conflict will serve both parties' interests better when a potential conflict is raised in the courts or before an ethics committee.

Conclusion

For the reasons discussed above, we believe that after Client B initiated an administrative proceeding with separate counsel against Client A, the law firm was entitled to withdraw from the unrelated representation of Client B, to treat Client B as a former client under the conflict rules and to continue to represent Client A, which it had long counselled in this area of the law, in the administrative proceeding.

Inquiry No. 96-5-14
Adopted: May 21, 1997

Opinion No. 273

Ethical Considerations of Lawyers Moving From One Private Law Firm to Another

• Lawyers who depart one law firm for another, and those law firms, must be attentive to ethical concerns arising from such changes in affiliation. Most importantly, client files must be made available to the lawyer or law firm continuing the client representation, clients must receive suitable notification of their lawyer's change in professional affiliation, and conflict of interest inquiries must be made by the new law firm based on the new lawyer's current and prior representations.

Inquiry

The increasing movement of lawyers between firms creates a number of ethical issues that are the frequent subject of inquiries to the Bar's ethics counsel. These issues, addressed in this Opinion, principally concern communications and relations with clients, possession and custody of files, conflicts of interest, confidentiality and recruitment of legal and other personnel.

Discussion

Communications and Relations With Clients

The questions most frequently asked of the Bar's ethics counsel in this area concern what communications with clients of the law firm may be had by the departing lawyer prior to the departure. Typically, a lawyer planning to change law firms will be interested in having the clients to whom the lawyer has provided professional services accompany him/her to the new law firm, and may want to make arrangements to that end before the actual departure.

Under the Rules of Professional Conduct, a lawyer responsible for a client's matter would be obligated to inform that lawyer's clients of his/her planned departure and of the lawyer's prospective new affiliation, and to advise the client whether the lawyer will be able to continue to represent it. Rule of Professional Conduct 1.4, "Communication", obligates a lawyer to keep a client informed "about the status of a matter" and to "explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation." In most situations, a lawyer's change of affiliation during the course of a representation will be material to a client, as it could affect such client concerns as billing arrangements, the adequacy of resources to support the lawyer's work for the client, and conflicts of interest. See, e.g., D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 221 (1991); D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 181 (1987); D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 97 (1980). Accord North Carolina Bar Ethics Op. RPC 200 (1995); Oregon Bar Ethics Op. 1991-70 (1991); Illinois Bar Ethics Op. 84-13 (1985).

Thus, not only does Rule 1.4 require the lawyer to communicate his prospective change of affiliation to the client, but such communication must occur sufficiently in advance of the departure to give the client adequate opportunity to consider whether it wants to continue the representation by the departing lawyer and, if not, to make other representation arrangements.

Advance communication is also necessary when the departing lawyer does not intend to continue a representation in his post-departure affiliation, as Rule 1.16(d) requires a lawyer, when terminating a representation, to give "reasonable notice to the client", and to allow "time for employment of other counsel . . . ." (This discussion assumes that the departing lawyer's withdrawal is otherwise proper under Rule 1.16(a) and (b).)[1]

The lawyer's communication to the client should include the fact and date of the change in affiliation, and whether the lawyer wishes to continue the representation. The lawyer should also be prepared to provide to the client information about the new firm (such as fees and staffing) sufficient to enable the client to make an informed decision concerning continued representation by the lawyer at the new firm. The client would also need to be informed of any conflict of interest matters affecting its representation at the new firm. Any communication which exceeds that required by ethical rules — for example, an active solicitation of the client to leave the lawyer's current firm and join the lawyer at the new firm — could run afoul of the lawyer's obligations under partnership law (for departing partners), corporate law (for shareholders of a professional corporation) and the common law of obligations of employees (for lawyers who are employees of a firm). For example, solicitation of clients by a departing partner (i.e., activity going beyond neutrally informing a client of the lawyer's planned departure and new affiliation) may be a breach of a partner's fiduciary obligations to other partners and may constitute tortious interference with the law firm's business relations. See, e.g., Adler, Barish, Daniels, Levin & Creskoff v. Epstein, 393 A. 2d 1175 (Pa. 1978); Graubard, Mollen, Dannett & Horowitz v. Moskovitz, 653 N.E. 2d 1179 (N.Y. 1995). Under partnership or other law, a departing lawyer may also be obliged to inform the lawyer's firm, at or around the time the lawyer so notifies clients, of his/her planned departure from the firm. (There appears to be no ethical significance to whether the client or the law firm is first informed of the lawyer's planned departure.)

We note these other legal considerations without commenting on their applicability, as they are not questions of ethics law. There may be a cloudy area between communications required by ethics principles and communications that violate the lawyer's obligations under other law. Because we cannot opine on the nature and limits of such other law, we can do no more than note that such a hazy border exists.

Files and Other Documents

Lawyers departing a firm to practice elsewhere will often have an interest in bringing with them files and other documents. These documents may relate directly to client representations, such as litigation pleadings, fact memoranda or transactional materials. Or they may be of a more general nature, such as name and address lists, general research memoranda or correspondence unrelated to specific client representations. May the departing lawyer take these materials with him/her when the lawyer leaves the firm?

This question is only partially answered by the Rules of Professional Conduct. Regarding client files - materials relating to the representation of a client - an initial inquiry is who will continue to represent the client after the lawyer's change of affiliation. That inquiry is important because if the change of affiliation involves the termination of one representation (whether by the departing lawyer, or by the lawyers he/she leaves behind), then the lawyer(s) terminating a relationship must "surrender. . . papers and property to which the client is entitled . . . " (Rule 1.16(d)), meaning that the client files must remain with or be transferred to the lawyer(s) who will be continuing the representation. See also D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 168 (1986) (decided under DR 2-110(A)(2), the predecessor of Rule 1.16(d)). Accord Utah Bar Ethics Op. 132 (1993); Oregon Bar Ethics Op. 1991-70 (1991).

Where the lawyer or law firm whose relationship with the client is being terminated in this process is owed money for legal services provided, a retaining lien against client files is available only to a very limited extent in the District of Columbia. Under Rule of Professional Conduct 1.8(i):

> A lawyer may acquire and enforce a lien granted by law to secure the lawyer's fees or expenses, but a lawyer shall not impose a lien upon any part of a client's files, except upon the lawyer's own work product, and then only to the extent that the work product has not been paid for. This work product exception shall not apply when the client has become unable to pay, or when withholding the lawyer's work product would present a significant risk to the client of irreparable harm.

See also D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 250 (1994) ("it seems clear to us that retaining liens on client files are now strongly disfavored in the District of Columbia, that the work product exception permitting such liens should be construed narrowly, and that a lawyer should assert a retaining lien on work product relating to a former client only where the exception is clearly applicable and where the lawyer's financial interests . . . 'clearly outweigh the adversely affected interests of his former client.' ") (citing D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 59 (undated)). Thus, a retaining lien may be asserted against client files only in the narrowest of circumstances — against unpaid work product where the client is able to pay and where assertion of the lien will not risk irreparable harm to the client.[2]

It would not be unethical for the lawyer terminating the representation to retain copies of documents from the client's file, although these (like any documents of a former client that contain confidential or secret information under Rule 1.6) would need to continue to be accorded the status and protection due them. We have previously opined that a law firm may, at its expense, make and retain copies of documents that it is obligated to provide to a former client. D.C. Bar Opinions 168 (1986) and 250 n.2 (1994).

[1] If neither the departing lawyer nor the former firm wishes to continue the representation of a client after the lawyer leaves the firm, the lawyer responsible for the representation must insure that such complete withdrawal from representation can be accomplished consistent with Rule of Professional Conduct 1.16. Most importantly, such withdrawal must be capable of being accomplished "without material adverse effect on the interests of the client...." Rule 1.16(b).

[2] The availability in the District of Columbia of retaining lien against client files is substantially narrower that under the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct. ABA Model Rule 1.8(j)(1) permits a lawyer to "acquire a lien granted by law to secure the lawyer's fee or expenses" and ABA Model Rule 1.16(d) permits a lawyer, when terminating a relationship with a client, to "retain papers relating to the client to the extent permitted by other law."

Other questions of ownership of files vis a vis a client, and questions of ownership of files and other written materials as between departing lawyers and their former law firms, are not governed primarily by the Rules of Professional Conduct. Some ownership and control questions may be resolved by reference to statutory and common law rules of personal property. And, where the departing lawyer is a partner, partnership law principles would be relevant. Our Committee does not opine on such questions of law. Nevertheless, a lawyer should think carefully about whether the lawyer may take such materials with him/her, because a lawyer's removal or copying, without the firm's consent, of materials from a law firm that do not belong to the lawyer, that are the property of the law firm, and that are intended to be used by the lawyer in his new affiliation, could constitute dishonesty, which is professional misconduct under Rule 8.4(c).

Conflicts of Interest

When a lawyer departs one firm to affiliate with another, conflict of interest issues are raised for both firms. For the firm that the lawyer joins, conflict of interest concerns are raised whether the lawyer arrives with or without clients. The relevant Rules of Professional Conduct are 1.10(b) and 1.7. For the lawyer who arrives without clients, the work the lawyer performed at the former firm may affect the ability of the new firm to represent its clients. Rule 1.10(b) extends a variation of the "former client" provisions of Rule 1.9 to the new firm by prohibiting it from representing a person in a matter:

> which is the same as, or substantially related to a matter with respect to which the lawyer had previously represented a client whose interests are materially adverse to that person and about whom the lawyer has in fact acquired information protected by Rule 1.6 [Confidentiality] that is material to the matter.

The Rule applies a four-part conjunctive test for disqualification based on the newly arrived lawyer's former legal work: (1) the lawyer must have formerly represented the client; (2) the new matter must be the same as or substantially related to the prior representation; (3) the position of the prospective new client must be adverse to that of the former client; and (4) the lawyer must actually (not just imputedly) have learned information confidential to the former client which is material to the new representation. One notable feature of the Rule is that it leaves open the possibility that a lawyer, such as an associate who had only a peripheral involvement in a matter (as by preparing a research memorandum on a point of law), would not subject his new law firm to a disqualification under Rule 1.10(b) because that lawyer did not learn any client confidences in the course of the representation.

As we noted in D.C. Bar Opinion 174 (1986) (decided under the former Code of Professional Conduct), a conflict of interest disqualification of a firm cannot be cured by screening from a matter the lawyer whose prior representation created the conflict. The affected former client may, however, consent to the new law firm's representation of the new client (Rule 1.10(d)), and might seek such screening as a condition to its consent. See also Brown v. District of Columbia Bd. of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37, 48-49 (D.C. 1984) (en banc) for a discussion of the meaning of "substantially related" as that term is used in Rule 1.10.

A different conflict scenario is presented with respect to clients who accompany a lawyer to a new firm. The new firm must treat each of those representations as new ones for it, testing its ability to undertake those representations against the requirements of Rules 1.7 and 1.9.

Finally, the firm from which the lawyer departed is subject to an ethical constraint in respect of the representations of persons who became former clients when the lawyer departed. Under Rules 1.9 and 1.10(c), the firm may not represent persons with interests materially adverse to those of a former client in matters which are the same or substantially related to those in which the formerly associated lawyer represented the client while at the firm. The firm also has continuing obligations under Rule 1.6 to preserve the confidences of its former clients.

Confidentiality

Former clients, whether they become so because a representation has been completed, because the client terminates the relationship or because the lawyer departs the firm at which the representation arose, are entitled to the same protection of secrets and confidences as current clients. See Rule 1.6(f). And so, where a lawyer who departs one firm for another, leaving the representation of certain clients with the former firm, that lawyer must insure that he/she continues to guard against unauthorized use or disclosure of information protected under Rule 1.6. Where the lawyer brings files of a former client to the new law firm, care must be taken not to reveal confidential information in those files to others, including the lawyer's new professional colleagues.

Efforts to Interest Other Lawyers or Staff in Changing Firms

Another question frequently posed to the Bar's ethics counsel is whether a departing lawyer may, prior to departure, recruit lawyers or non-lawyer personnel to accompany the lawyer to the new firm. We believe that this issue is resolved primarily, if not entirely, under law other than ethics law, such as the common law of interference with business relations and fiduciary obligations.[3]

Law Firm Name

Lastly, what must the departing lawyer's firm do if that lawyer's name appears in its firm name and/or on its stationery? The answer is found in Rule 7.5(a), which prohibits the use of a firm name or letterhead which is false or misleading. Where a lawyer has departed one firm to practice elsewhere, it would plainly be misleading for the law firm to continue to use that lawyer's name in written materials used for external communications. See Rule 7.5, Comment [1]: "[I]t is misleading to use the name of a lawyer not associated with the firm or a predecessor of the firm."

Government Agency Attorneys May Participate in a Public Meeting at Which Claimants Who Are Represented By Counsel Are Present

[3] In an extreme case, where deception and/or dishonesty were employed by the departing lawyer in inducing other law firm personnel to depart their current employer, the lawyer's conduct might run afoul of Rule 8.4(c), under which it is professional misconduct for a lawyer to "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation." Recruiting activity, however, would not ordinarily constitute an ethics violation.

explain the program, explain agency policies, and respond to questions.

A lawyer who represents a group of claimants cannot prevent the agency from conducting the meeting on the ground that the meeting constitutes an unauthorized contact by the agency's counsel with represented parties under Rule 4.2(a). This is true regardless of the fact that the agency's lawyers may attend, and even participate in, the meeting.

Inquiry

The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation ("PBGC") is a corporation owned by the United States Government and established pursuant to the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 ("ERISA"), 29 U.S.C. §1302. PBGC administers, among other things, a pension plan termination insurance program. When an under-funded pension plan terminates, PBGC is generally appointed as a statutory trustee of the plan. As trustee, PBGC has powers analogous to those of a trustee under Section 704 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. §704, and PBGC is responsible for paying benefits under the plan in accordance with requirements of Title IV of ERISA. 29 U.S.C. §1342(d)(3).

In the circumstances giving rise to this inquiry, PBGC was appointed to be trustee of a Colorado-based plan having approximately 4300 participants at the time of its termination. Pursuant to the agency's established practice, PBGC sent a notice to the known plan participants inviting them to attend a meeting convened by PBGC.

The purpose of the meeting was to provide general information about the PBGC insurance system, to describe the general limitations of the ERISA guarantee, and to answer questions. At meetings of this type, PBGC employees discuss the procedures for filing claims, the nature and extent of these types of benefits that are guaranteed by PBGC, and the agency's policies and procedures for handling claims. The meetings are thought to be an efficient method of disseminating information to claimants and of answering recurrent questions that claimants tend to raise with the agency.

Before the time of the meeting, 300 of the plan beneficiaries retained counsel to assist them in obtaining payment of certain specific claims. PBGC had responsibility for determining in the first instance whether the beneficiary's claims would be paid.

The attorney representing 300 of the beneficiary/claimants wrote to PBGC and demanded that the agency not hold the meeting. Counsel asserted that the proposed meeting was an attempt to side-step or undermine her representation of her 300 claimant clients in violation of Rule 4.2(a). Counsel demanded that PBGC deal directly and exclusively with her with regard to the claims of her clients.

PBGC meetings of this type are conducted by a non-lawyer employee of PBGC. However, a PBGC staff attorney attends the meeting for the purpose of providing advice to the non-lawyer concerning the conduct of the meeting. The staff attorney typically does not address the meeting, although it is possible that if a question beyond the legal competence of the non-lawyer PBGC employee who is conducting the meeting were asked, the PBGC staff attorney might give part or all of the response to the question.

The Inquirer, a staff attorney for PBGC, has requested the Committee's opinion on the application of Rule 4.2(a) to the circumstances described above. Specifically, the Inquirer asks whether: (1) PBGC was obliged to cancel the meeting in response to counsel's demand; (2) PBGC was required to direct its attorneys not to attend the meeting; and (3)PBGC should invite or direct counsel's 300 beneficiary/claimant clients to leave the meeting.

The Inquirer has also requested the Committee's opinion on the application of Rule 4.2(a) to PBGC's practice of using contractors to perform administerial functions for PBGC. These contractors operate as "field benefit administrators" in locations where PBGC does not have employee representatives. The contractors work under the supervision of non-lawyer employees of PBGC and provide most of the front-line services to plan participants. For example, such services may include collecting of plan records, applications, and personal data from claimants and explaining plan provisions and PBGC guarantee limitations. In this capacity, the contractors receive numerous telephone inquiries and office visits from participants who may, or may not, be represented by counsel.

Discussion

Rule 4.2(a) provides that:

> During the course of representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate, or cause another to communicate, about the subject of the representation with a party known to be represented by a another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such party or is authorized by law to do so.

It is first worth noting the purpose of the rule at issue here. Rule 4.2(a) is designed to prevent a lawyer from communicating directly with opposing counsel's client. Among its main purposes is the protection of the adversary system. A client who receives a communication from opposing counsel without the participation of his own counsel may not be able to evaluate the correctness of statements of law made by opposing counsel. Without the participation of his lawyer, an unprotected client may be induced by opposing counsel into making admissions, waiving confidentiality, or taking positions detrimental to the client's interest without the client's realizing it because the client's lawyer is not aware of, and not participating in, the communication. See D.C. Bar Op. 258 (1995), particularly text at nns. 5-10. Rule 4.2(a) is, by its very terms, waivable by counsel (and only by counsel) in the sense that, in appropriate circumstances, a lawyer can authorize opposing counsel to contact his client without the lawyer's participation.

There are a number of reasons why the Committee believes that Rule 4.2(a) does not prevent PBGC's conduct at issue in this inquiry. In the first place, the meetings that are described by Inquirer are initiated by PBGC itself as part of its functions as trustee, and the attendance of the PBGC's staff attorney is incidental. There is no indication that PBGC's staff attorneys are using non-lawyer employees of the agency to accomplish indirectly anything that the staff attorneys would themselves be prevented by Rule 4.2(a) from accomplishing directly.

The rule does not by definition apply to non-lawyers and therefore by extension does not apply to the clients of lawyers unless there is some indication - not present here -that lawyers are using non-lawyers to circumvent the rules. To the extent that PBGC is the client of its in-house lawyers in this situation, the ethics rules for lawyers would not prevent the non-lawyer employees of the agency from conducting meetings of this type.

The inquiry, seen in this light, resolves into a question of whether the non-lawyer employees of PBGC who conduct these meetings can be accompanied to the meetings by the agency's counsel when some (but probably not all) members of the audience may be represented by counsel. We discern no valid reason why PBGC's non-lawyer employees should be deprived of the advice of the agency's counsel in these circumstances.

Finally, when the lawyer representing the claimants is aware in advance of the meeting - which she undoubtedly was in this case - the lawyer representing the claimants has a number of choices: she can consent to her clients' attendance at the meeting; she can attend the meeting with her clients; or she can counsel her clients not to attend. The lawyer for the claimants, however, seeks to convert a prophylactic rule, which prevents unconsented contact with her clients by opposing counsel, into an offensive weapon by which the lawyer can prevent PBGC from conducting its public meeting.

PBGC does not discuss the facts and circumstances of individual claimants at such meetings. Rather, as we understand it, the purpose of these meetings is to give general information concerning the outlines of the agency's program and the types of benefits that the agency guarantees and to answer general questions along these lines. The rules of ethics for lawyers should not interfere with the right of non-lawyer employees and staff attorneys for a government agency from communicating this kind of useful information to the interested public absent a very clear reason to do so.

It may be possible to imagine circumstances in which a question from the floor was so specifically idiosyncratic to the questioner in a particular case where the agency staff attorney knows that the questioner is represented by counsel, that prudence would dictate deferring a response to such a question to the ordinary course of the claims adjudication process.

However, so long as the focus of the meeting remains on the provision of general information to the interested public, nothing in Rule 4.2(a) impinges on the conduct of non-lawyer employees of the agency, and lawyer employees of the agency can participate in the process unless they know that they are being drawn into a discussion of an individualized subject as to which a potential claimant is represented by counsel.

As to the second branch of the inquiry concerning the field benefit administrators, these contractors are, by definition, not lawyers, and therefore nothing in Rule 4.2(a) impinges on their conduct. Only in a circumstance where an agency attorney sought to communicate with a represented client through the intermediary of a field benefit administrator with the purpose of circumventing the claimant's attorney would Rule 4.2(a) come into effect. However, on the facts of the inquiry presented to us, there is no indication that such conduct is present here.

Receipt of Confidential Information Bars Subsequent Representation of Another Client in the Same or a Substantially Related Matter Unless Screen Can be Erected

• A law firm which is contacted by a potential class action plaintiff and which receives confidential or secret information from the potential client may not, after the law firm and the potential client fail to agree on the terms of the engagement, seek to identify another client to represent in the same or substantially related matter unless the attorneys who received the confidential information from the first potential client can be screened from the subsequent representation or the first potential client consents to the subsequent representation.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality)
- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification)

Inquiry

A law firm was contacted by a potential client interested in serving as a representative of a plaintiff class in a contingent fee antitrust class action. The potential client and various firm lawyers had discussions concerning the facts on which the client's claim might be based, and the potential client provided the firm with numerous materials relating to the client's claim. Most of these materials were publicly available, consisting in part of litigation pleadings, public reports of governmental regulatory bodies, and newspaper articles. However, not all of the materials were publicly available; some of them consisted of the prospective client's business records, correspondence, and handwritten notes. The client has emphatically stated in writing that he expected the inquiring firm to hold the materials he provided to the firm in confidence.

Negotiations with the potential client concerning fees were unsuccessful, and the law firm now wishes to seek a different person to represent the class on whose behalf the firm could undertake litigation in the same subject area. The law firm has asked if it may do so consistent with its obligations under the ethics rules.

Discussion

The point of departure for our analysis is Rule 1.6, which states in part:

> (a) [A] lawyer shall not knowingly ... (1) reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client; (2) use a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client to the disadvantage of the client; (3) use a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client for the advantage of the lawyer or of a third person.
> (b) "Confidence" refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law, and "secret" refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client.

Comment [6] to Rule 1.6 further states that the rule of attorney-client confidentiality applies not merely to matters communicated in confidence by the client, but also to all information gained in the course of the professional relationship that the client requests be held inviolate. "This ethical precept . . . exists without regard to the nature or source of the information or the fact that others share the knowledge." Id.

The Law Firm Received Confidential Information

The inquiry in this case focuses heavily on the notion that many of the materials presented to the law firm by the first potential client are "publicly available." Because there is no attorney-client privilege as to publicly available materials, the inquirer contends that there is no ethical proscription against the law firm's use of those materials in connection with the second representation.

However, the confidentiality rule of ethics is broader than the attorney-client privilege. See Rule 1.6, Comments [5] and [6]. The Rule also protects "secrets," which can include information divulged by a client to a lawyer that the client asks be kept confidential. For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that, on the particular facts of this inquiry, the confidentiality rule prevents the inquiring attorneys from seeking or accepting a second representation on behalf of the class that was identified for the law firm by the first potential client.

First, the facts of the inquiry before us argue strongly that the inquiring lawyers have bound themselves to keep the information divulged by the first potential client confidential. Unlike many other obligations of an attorney that arise only after the attorney-client relationship is fully formed, a lawyer's confidentiality obligations begin as soon as a potential client consults with a lawyer. Rule 1.6, Comment [7]. Thus, the fact that the potential client never became an actual client of the inquiring law firm does not release the inquiring law firm from its confidentiality obligations. Second, not all of the information imparted by the first potential client was publicly available. Among the records provided to the law firm and reviewed by it were business records, handwritten notes, and correspondence, none of which were "publicly available" as that term is used in Rule 1.6.

Furthermore, the potential client, in the course of discussing the claim that he wished to assert with the assistance of the inquiring firm, divulged to the firm's lawyers facts and circumstances that the potential client had developed through other litigation. Thus, the potential client had paid for assembling and developing material that indicated the potential of a cause of action on behalf of a class of plaintiffs. The potential client wished to become a named plaintiff on behalf of the class with the possibility of being compensated for serving as such, and he clearly stated in writing that he expected the firm to keep the materials that he submitted to it confidential. The materials are therefore "secrets" of the potential client under our Rules. It follows that the inquiring lawyers may not, after failing to reach an agreement on fees with the potential client, exploit information developed at the potential client's expense for the advantage of the law firm or the law firm's subsequent client.

Of course, what a lawyer learns about the law in general, about how a particular industry operates, or about how legal principles may apply to certain kinds of cases in the course of doing professional work for a client may be used by the lawyer in representing another client. See our Opinion No. 175 (1986).[1] The general principles announced there do not apply to this case because the law firm in this inquiry is not proposing to use general knowledge, but instead wishes to use a specific set of facts brought to the firm's attention and developed in part by the potential client. The assembly and presentation of those facts is the product of the first potential client's efforts. To allow the firm to appropriate that knowledge and exploit the specific body of information assembled by the potential client to his detriment is not the sort of generalized use that is contemplated by the principles discussed in Opinion No. 175.

Imputed Disqualification

We turn now to the question whether the whole of the inquiring law firm is disqualified because of the contact of some of the firm's lawyers with the first potential client. Rule 1.10 addresses the imputation of a disqualification to all members of the same firm. The Rule does not explicitly refer to Rule 1.6 as one of the rules that gives rise to an imputed disqualification, but new Comments[7] through [9] make it clear that there is an interplay between Rule1.10(a) and Rule1.6. Those comments make explicit that the loyalty obligations of each lawyer in the firm, which are imputed under Rule 1.10(a), would be implicated when individual lawyers had acquired confidential information from a potential client but, because of Rule 1.6, could not share that information with another client as to whose matter the information is relevant. The lawyers who met with the first potential client and reviewed his materials would be disqualified from representing a second class plaintiff and, by operation of Rule 1.10, so would all of the firm's lawyers.

As of November 1, 1996, however, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals amended Rule 1.10(a). The new proviso in Rule 1.10(a) establishes an exception to the imputation rule, which would otherwise disqualify all lawyers in the law firm from representing a client simply because a single lawyer or a specific group of lawyers in the firm acquired confidential information during an initial interview with a prospective client. Thus, even if the firm cannot share the confidential information of the potential client with an existing or future firm client, in those situations where the integrity of the confidential information can be maintained by walling off the lawyer or lawyers who interviewed the prospective client, the firm may continue to represent its existing client or may thereafter acquire other adverse clients in the same matter.

But the new proviso does not cover the present inquiry because the inquiring firm cannot now effectively wall off the lawyers who consulted with the first potential client. As we understand the facts, given the amount of time that passed between the initial interview and the end of the fee negotiations (several months), too many lawyers (virtually the whole litigation section) had been exposed to the potential client's confidential information, and too many discussions around the firm had occurred before the firm broke off its negotiations with the potential client to make walling off a practical and effective solution. Therefore, the inquiring firm cannot avail itself of the new exception to Rule 1.10.

We believe that the law firm must honor its confidentiality obligations to the first potential client and must refrain from seeking a second client to initiate the very same litigation that was presented to it by the first client, absent an informed waiver from the first client. The same result could apply even if a second client sought out the firm without its taking any initiative. The information that the firm received from the first potential client is: (1) protected by the confidentiality rule; (2) directly relevant to the representation of the second client; but (3) may not be used by the law firm or revealed to the second client, a limitation that could conceivably violate the firm's duties of zeal and loyalty to the second client. Furthermore, the use of the confidential information in the representation of the second client would arguably disadvantage the first potential client who wishes to be the class representative, thereby violating Rule 1.6(a)(2).

ties to the mediation in order to ensure that the lawyer's exercise of professional judgment on behalf of her clients is not adversely affected by service as a mediator. Our Rules do not require, however, that a lawyer/mediator conduct a conflict-of-interest investigation of officers, directors, or stockholders of affiliated corporate entities when serving as mediator in a case involving corporate parties. Rule 8.4, which forbids misrepresentation, further requires that a lawyer holding herself out as a neutral in a mediation must disclose to the parties the results of the required conflict check, if the lawyer or her firm represents one of the parties before her or a client adverse to one of the parties to the mediation.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 2.2 (Intermediary)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest)
- Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Inquiry

The Inquirer, a law firm, has been asked by the District of Columbia Superior Court to make its lawyers available to mediate cases under the court's Alternative Dispute Resolution ("ADR") program. Lawyers participating in the ADR mediation program provide their professional services to the Superior Court for a nominal fee, paid by the court, to assist the court with its congested docket. Lawyers in the inquiring firm wish to participate in this program.

As stated by the Inquirer, the attorneys participating in this program do not provide legal services or representation to either side in the dispute. They are assigned by the court rather than chosen by the parties. An attorney assigned to a case is supposed to act "as a neutral third party" to assist "parties in a dispute to communicate their positions on issues and to explore possible solutions or settlements. The mediator does not give an evaluation or opinion of the case, but rather prompts the parties to assess their relative interests and positions and to evaluate their own cases by the exchange of information, ideas and alternatives for settlement." 1996 Program Summary on Alternative Dispute Resolution, Superior Court of the District of Columbia, at 5. In this task, they do not receive confidential information from the parties in the context of a lawyer-client relationship. They may, however, receive confidential information from the parties in the context of the mediation, and they agree to keep that information confidential.

The Inquirer states that its firm has found it "extremely burdensome" to conduct a conflict-of-interest check for the parties in the mediation and also as to the officers, directors, and stockholders of corporate parties, and for the affiliated entities, spouses, and partners of non-corporate entities. In lieu of such a procedure, which the Inquirer apparently conducts in connection with the firm's engagements for its clients, the Inquirer seeks to conduct a less extensive conflict-of-interest search that would determine only if the firm is currently representing any party to the mediation or any client whose interests are adverse to one of the parties to the mediation. The lawyer would advise the parties to the mediation that no effort has been made to determine if the firm is representing any officer, director, or stockholder of a corporate party, any affiliated entity, or any spouse or partner of a party. The Inquirer asks whether the firm's attorney's obligations under the Rules are met by this less extensive conflict-of-interest check.

Discussion

Our Rules address primarily the duties of a lawyer representing clients, and not the duties of a lawyer acting as a mediator or arbitrator between non-clients.[1] Our Rules require, however, that a lawyer avoid client conflicts arising from "the lawyer's responsibilities to . . . a third party . . ." Rule 1.7(b)(4); and see Rule 1.3. Because service as a mediator in a case involving a client or a client's adversary could easily compromise a lawyer's ability to represent existing clients, we believe that some form of conflict check is required prior to service as a mediator.[2]

The potential for conflict in such a situation is evident. For example, in order to serve effectively, mediators normally become privy to confidential information about the positions of the parties to the litigation. Should the mediator acquire confidential information through the mediation that would be helpful or harmful to her firm's existing clients, she (as well as other members of her firm) might be obliged to use such information in order to satisfy her ethical duty of zealous representation. See generally Rule 1.3; and see Rule 1.10: Rule 1.6 (protecting from disclosure only client confidences).

Yet the lawyer/mediator would be barred from using that information by virtue of her promise of confidentiality to the parties to the mediation. The standard Statement of Understanding applicable to the civil mediation program in the Superior Court, executed prior to mediation by the parties and the mediator, provides that "[t]he parties, individuals and attorneys whose signatures appear below [including the mediator] agree that all proceedings . . . including any statement made or document prepared . . . are privileged and shall not be disclosed in any subsequent proceeding or document . . . ."[3]

Given the substantial potential for adverse impact upon the interests of existing firm clients, we believe that a lawyer is required by Rule 1.7 to conduct a conflicts check to ascertain whether she or her law firm represents any party to the mediation or any party whose interests are adverse to the parties to the mediation.

We do not believe that a conflicts check of corporate constituents is normally required of lawyer/mediators under our Rules, however. Rule 1.13 provides generally that a lawyer representing an organization represents the organization and not the directors, officers, shareholders, or employees of that organization. Where this is true, the possibility of obtaining confidential information through service as a mediator and yet being unable to use that information on behalf of one's clients affects only the client organization, and not its non-client constituents. In such situations, no broader conflict check is required.

[1] Rule 2.2 (Intermediary) specifically addresses the role of a lawyer acting as mediator, but it applies only to situations in which a lawyer attempts to mediate between two or more of the lawyer's clients with actual or potentially conflicting interests. Lawyers participating in the ADR program do not represent as clients the parties who appear before them and therefore do not intermediate between clients.

[2] We note that our Rules prohibit conflicts of interest but do not by their express terms require a law firm to have a conflicts checking system. In a firm of any size, some system for avoiding conflicts would seem mandatory under Rules 1.7 and 1.10. Cf. DR 5-105(E) of the Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility of the New York State Bar Association (requiring lawyers to have a conflicts checking system in place). We assume for purposes of discussion that the firm in question is of sufficient size to require a conflict check system.

[3] When acting as an arbitrator or a mediator, confidentiality also may be required by applicable codes of ethics, such as the American Arbitration Association/American Bar Association Code of Ethics for Arbitration in Commercial Disputes and the Commercial Mediation Rules of the American Arbitration Association. Such codes impose more extensive ethical requirements, as discussed in subsequent portions of this opinion.

Our Rules, however, recognize situations in which some particular structure of the client or the reasonable expectations of the constituents of the client alters the normal organizational representation principle set forth in Rule 1.13. See Comments [13], [14] and [15] to Rule 1.7. In such cases, because the lawyer represents a broader range of interests and of clients, a broader conflict check would be ethically required to avoid compromising the interests of the lawyer's clients.[4]

If the conflict check required by our Rule 1.7 discloses that the mediator or her firm represents or is adverse to any of the parties to the mediation (whether those parties are the organizations directly involved or their officers, directors, and stockholders in appropriate situations), that information must be disclosed to the affected client(s) unless the mediator withdraws of her own accord, and client consent is sought to the activity that raises a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(4).

Additionally, Rule 8.4(c), which precludes a lawyer from engaging "in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation," prevents a lawyer from misrepresenting her status as a neutral if she knows in fact that she is not neutral due to representation of a client which is a party or adverse to a party, involved in the proceeding, or knows of some other circumstance (such as a personal relationship with a party to the arbitration) which could affect her neutrality. To avoid misrepresentation of neutral status, this Rule requires disclosure of the results of the conflict check to the parties to the mediation.[5] We do not believe, however, that Rule 8.4(c) requires every lawyer acting as a mediator to investigate information about law firm clients of which she is not actually aware that arguably could call into question her "neutrality."[6]

Thus we conclude that, absent unusual circumstances, a lawyer/mediator satisfies her ethical duties by conducting a conflicts check as to the immediate parties to the mediation and by disclosing the results to the parties.

Retention by Former Law Firm of Withdrawing Partner's Name

- A law firm may retain in its name the name of a former partner, except where the former partner is practicing law elsewhere or where the firm is prohibited by law from retaining the name.

Applicable Rules

Inquiry

Lawyer B was a founding partner of the law firm "A & B", and now plans to sever her relationship with the firm. She is unsure whether she will continue to practice law after she resigns from "A & B" but, regardless, wants her name removed from the firm's name after she departs. She inquires whether the Rules of Professional Conduct require the law firm, at her request, to remove her name from the firm name once she resigns.

Discussion

This inquiry presents a particular aspect of a broader question concerning the circumstances under which a law firm may ethically retain in its name the name of a lawyer no longer associated with the firm. The pertinent Rule of Professional Conduct is 7.5(a), providing that:

> A lawyer shall not use a firm name, letterhead, or other professional designation that violates Rule 7.1. A trade name may be used by a lawyer in private practice if it does not imply a connection with a government agency or with a public or charitable legal services organization and is not otherwise in violation of Rule 7.1.

The relevant portion of Rule 7.1 incorporated in Rule 7.5(a) is as follows:

> (a) A lawyer shall not make a false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services. A communication is false or misleading if it:
> (1) Contains a material misrepresentation of fact or law, or omits a fact necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading; or
> (2) Contains an assertion about the lawyer or the lawyer's services that cannot be substantiated.

Taken together, these provisions can be distilled to a prohibition on the use of a law

[4] For mediators serving in other contexts and for arbitrators, a broad conflict check might be required by other ethical rules governing mediators and arbitrators. The Commercial Mediation Rules of the American Arbitration Association provide, for example, that no person shall serve as a mediator in any dispute in which that person has any financial or personal interest in the result of the mediation, except by the written consent of all parties, Commercial Mediation Rule 5, and that prior to accepting appointment as a mediator, the prospective mediator shall disclose any circumstance likely to create a presumption of bias. Id. A similar requirement is imposed upon arbitrators under the Code of Ethics for Arbitrators in Commercial Disputes promulgated by a Joint Committee of the American Arbitration Association and the American Bar Association. Canon II of that Code requires that "[a] n arbitrator should disclose any interest or relationship likely to affect impartiality or which might create an appearance of partiality or bias," and further specifies that disclosure should extend to "relationships involving members of their families or their current employers, partners or business associates." While lawyers acting as mediators and arbitrators should consult and observe all governing ethical codes, we decline to find embedded in our Rules of Professional Conduct any blanket ethical obligations to comply with such codes.

[5] Situations may arise in which the lawyer's confidentiality obligations to her firm's clients may preclude disclosure of relevant results of a conflicts check to the parties to a mediation. The firm's representation may in and of itself be confidential or the nature of the representation may be confidential. In such a case, the lawyer/mediator would have no choice but to resolve the problem by withdrawing as mediator without further comment.

[6] We note that in commercial arbitration,where the arbitrator generally acts as a private judge with substantial authority to bind to parties, the extent of mandatory investigation and disclosure has been litigated frequently. Even so, no clear line exists between relationships likely to affect an arbitrator's neutrality and trivial or irrelevant relationships. See generally Commonwealth Coatings Corp. v. Continental Casualty Co., 393 U.S. 145, 151-52 (1968) (distinguishing between relationships likely to affect arbitrator's judgment from relationship that are merely "trivial"); and see A.A.A./A.B.A. Code of Ethics Canon II (noting that the "provisions of the Code are intended to be applied realistically so that the burden of detailed disclosure does not become so great that it is impractical for persons in the business world to be arbitrators, thereby depriving the parties of the services of those who might be best informed and qualified to decide particular types of cases." See also Al-Harbi v. Citibank, N.A., 85 F.3d 680 (D.C. Cir. 1996); Oversees Private Investment Corp. v. Anaconda Co., 418 F. Supp. 107, 112 (D.D.C. 1976); but see Schmitz v. Zilveti, 20 F. 3d 1043 (9th Cir. 1994) (vacating arbitration award where arbitrator's law firm had extensively represented parent company of entity involved in arbitration and arbitrator had run conflict check only on the subsidiary entity, in case arising under NASD rules specifically requiring investigation of possible conflicts of interest). We do not decide whether and to what extent these principles apply to mediation, a non-binding procedure that is substantially different from arbitration. We merely conclude that the lawyer's duty under Rule 8.4 to avoid misrepresentation does not require that every mediator in every case investigate and disclose every conceivable relationship that a party might claim affects her neutrality.

firm name that is false or misleading. As regards lawyers who have departed a law firm, Comment [1] to Rule 7.5 states that, "it is misleading to use the name of a lawyer not associated with the firm or a predecessor of the firm."

From Comment [1], and its apparent premise that the use of a lawyer's name in a firm name would imply the presence there of that lawyer, one could conclude that it is unethical to include in a firm name the name of any lawyer no longer associated with the firm, whether by withdrawal, retirement or death. In each of these situations, the firm may be falsely implying that such lawyer remains associated with the firm.

But at least as regards retired or deceased partners, ethics law has been clear since at least the time of the predecessor Code of Professional Responsibility that the names of such partners could ethically be included in law firm names. Former Disciplinary Rule 2-102(B) provided that "if otherwise lawful, a firm may use as, or continue to include in, its name the name or names of one or more deceased or retired members of the firm or a predecessor firm in a continuing line of succession." Former EC (Ethical Consideration) 2-11 expanded on this provision as follows:

> For many years some law firms have used a firm name retaining one or more names of deceased or retired partners and such practice is not improper if the firm is a bona fide successor of a firm in which the deceased or retired person was a member, if the use of the name is authorized by law or by contract, and if the public is not misled thereby. However, the name of a partner who withdraws from a firm but continues to practice law should be omitted from the firm name in order to avoid misleading the public.

The current Rules of Professional Conduct continue this acknowledgement that it is not false or misleading per se to include in the firm name the name of a partner no longer associated with the firm, although they do so by characterizing such usage as a trade name. Rule 7.5(a) specifically recognizes that a lawyer may practice under a trade name, and Comment [1] thereto notes that "any firm name including the name of a deceased partner is, strictly speaking, a trade name. The use of such names to designate law firms has proven a useful means of identification."

So, at least for deceased and retired "name partners", Rule 7.5(a) recognizes that its concern about falsely implying the presence of a lawyer no longer associated with the firm does not cover all situations, and must yield in some circumstances to another consideration — that a firm name often only identifies a group of lawyers practicing together in a definable group, and does not necessarily imply that the name partners are themselves practicing there.[1]

Ethics opinions, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, have long recognized that it is permissible for law firms to use trade names that include the names of deceased or retired partners. In Opinion No. 224 (Dec. 17, 1991), this Committee determined that a lawyer is not precluded from continuing to use a former partnership name, where his partners had retired or otherwise left the firm. Similarly, in Formal Opinion No. 90-357 (1990), the ABA recognized that if a lawyer, who is a name partner in a law firm, is retiring to become "of counsel," the lawyer's name may be retained in the firm's name. Other jurisdictions have reached the same conclusion. See Ethics Comm.of the Mass. Bar Assoc., Op. No. 81-5, (April 14, 1981); and Comm. on Professional and Judicial Ethics of the State Bar of Mich., Informal Op. CI-1001 (April 30, 1984).

To fall under the "trade name" exception, however, the use of the deceased or retired partner's name must be permitted under the law applicable to one's property value in the commercial use of his or her name. Such use could, depending on the circumstances, be governed by common law or partnership or corporate law. See, e.g., Nercessian v. Homasian Carpet Enterprises, Inc., 60 N.Y. 2d 875, 458 N.E. 2d 822 (1983). If the law firm, under such law, does not have the legal right to use the deceased or retired lawyer's name, then inclusion of the lawyer's name in the firm name would not be lawful, and it would therefore be misleading for the firm to use it as such. See, e.g., Cunetto House of Pasta v. Tuma, 689 S.W. 2d 690 (Mo. Ct. App. 1985); Saltzberg v. Fishman, 462 N.E. 2d 901 (Ill. App. 1984). See also Code of Professional Responsibility EC 2-11 (quoted above).

In this regard, the consent of a retired partner or the estate of a deceased partner to continued use of the lawyer's name is an ethical consideration only if such consent is necessary to provide the law firm with the necessary legal authority to continue to use the name. Such specific consent may not be required under the applicable law if, for example, a partnership agreement gives the law firm the continuing right to use the lawyer's name after his departure from the firm, or the firm has acquired a common law right to continued use of the lawyer's name.

The continued use of the name of a withdrawn partner not practicing elsewhere is akin to that of a deceased or retired partner — neither is associated with the law firm, and neither is practicing law. If it is ethical to include the name of a deceased or retired partner in the firm's name, we cannot see why the situation is otherwise for a withdrawn partner. In both situations, the law firm's name is a trade name, and not one which asserts the presence of the name partners as practicing lawyers with the firm.

It is, however, misleading (and therefore a violation of Rule 7.5(a)) to include in a firm name the name of a lawyer practicing elsewhere. Under such circumstances, according to the Rule, the possible identifying value of the firm name as a trade name yields to the greater possibility that the public will be misled by retention of the departed lawyer's name in the firm name.

In the specific inquiry before us, then, the ethical propriety of the law firm's continued use of the inquirer's name after her departure from the firm (and over her objection) would depend on:

(1) whether such use was authorized under common law, the firm's partnership agreement or otherwise, and

(2) whether the lawyer did not practice elsewhere.

[1] The New York Court of Appeals even rejects the premise that inclusion of a lawyer's name in a firm name implies anything about that lawyer's practice. In New York Criminal and Civil Courts Bar Ass'n v. Jacoby, 472 N.Y.S. 2d 890 (1984), New York bar authorities sought to restrain the use in New York of a law firm name that did not include the name of any lawyer licensed to practice in New York, contending that it was misleading to do so. The court rejected the contention:

> We . . . conclude as a matter of law that use of a firm name comprised of surnames, without more, does not constitute any holding out that there are individual partners bearing those surnames who are admitted to practice in New York, or indeed that there are partners in the firm who bear such surnames,wherever admitted. . . . [T]he firm name is an institutional description and its use constitutes no representation that anyone bearing a surname corresponding to the names in the firm title is available to render professional services. Id. at 893. (Emphasis added.)

If both conditions are satisfied, then the inquirer's lack of acquiescence in the use of her name is ethically irrelevant.

Partnership with Foreign Lawyer

• A lawyer who is licensed to practice in the District of Columbia may join in a partnership or in other forms of professional association with a foreign lawyer who is not licensed to practice in any jurisdiction in the United States so long as the partnership or association will not compromise the D.C. lawyer's ability to uphold ethical standards.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 5.1 (Responsibilities of a Partner or Supervisory Lawyer)
• Rule 5.5 (Unauthorized Practice of Law)
• Rule 7.5(b) (Firm Names and Letterheads)
• Rule 7.5(d) (Implying Practice in a Partnership)

Inquiry

A member of the D.C. Bar inquires whether, under the D.C. Rules of the Professional Conduct, he and other members of his firm may join in a partnership to practice law with a lawyer licensed to practice law only in Sweden. The lawyer licensed in Sweden will be resident and practicing in the firm's London office, which, the inquiry asserts, the lawyer may do in accordance with the rules of practice governing the provision of legal services in the United Kingdom.

This inquiry requires us to determine whether a member of the D.C. Bar may practice law in a partnership or other form of professional association with a foreign lawyer who is licensed to practice law in a non-U.S. jurisdiction but is not licensed to practice law in any jurisdiction in the United States.

Discussion

In the United States multi-jurisdictional law firm partnerships — formed by attorneys licensed to practice and physically located in more than one state — are accepted without question. As the practice of law increasingly assumes an international dimension, it is becoming equally commonplace to encounter multinational law firm partnerships and other forms of professional associations that cross international borders. Because of their international scope, these partnerships may involve affiliations with attorneys licensed only by jurisdictions outside the United States.

Just as our ethical standards have evolved to permit multi-jurisdictional law partnerships involving U.S. lawyers, they also, with appropriate safeguards, similarly accommodate partnerships or other forms of professional association with foreign lawyers. For the reasons explained below, we conclude that members of the D.C. Bar may practice law in partnership with foreign lawyers who are not licensed in any jurisdiction in the United States so long as appropriate steps are taken to ensure the association will not compromise the D.C. Bar member's ability to uphold ethical standards.[1]

In this jurisdiction, we have long accepted, without ever expressly addressing the issue, the existence of partnerships between D.C. Bar members and attorneys who are admitted only in U.S. jurisdictions other than D.C. Such associations are permissible, however, only to the extent that they do not impair the D.C. Bar member's ability and obligation to uphold ethical standards. For example, when a D.C. lawyer practices law in association with others, he or she must ensure that all individuals involved in providing legal services adhere to fundamental ethical requirements such as client confidentiality. See, e.g., Rules 5.1, 5.2, 5.3.

The same considerations are equally applicable in reviewing the ethical implications of partnerships with foreign attorneys who are not licensed to practice in any U.S. jurisdiction.[2] The critical inquiry will be whether any aspect of the association is likely to impair the D.C. attorney's ability to satisfy the applicable ethical requirements that govern the delivery of legal services.

In this regard, it would be necessary to consider the general similarity of the foreign lawyer's educational requirements as well as the compatibility of the standards of professional conduct and discipline that govern the foreign lawyer's provision of legal services. If the foreign lawyer's education and training were materially less than that of a U.S. lawyer or if the professional standards governing the foreign lawyer's conduct were so incompatible with those established by the D.C. Bar, any partnership with such an attorney might impair the D.C. lawyer's ability to uphold the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct or to adhere to ethical standards such as the need to maintain client confidentiality and to avoid conflicts of interest. Cf. Rule 5.1(a) (law firm partner "shall make reasonable efforts to ensure that the firm has in effect measures giving reasonable assurance that all lawyers in the firm conform to the rules of professional conduct").

This is an inquiry that must be undertaken on a case by case basis. By identifying issues relating to client confidentiality and conflicts of interest as areas of special concern, we do not mean to suggest that these are the only ethical issues that need to be considered. Rather, the D.C. attorney must ensure that the proposed association does not in any way impair or frustrate his ability to meet his ethical obligations.

Another basic requirement that must be satisfied in forming any professional association with a foreign-licensed attorney is that the association not conflict with any of the D.C. attorney's ethical obligations. Lawyers not admitted to practice in the District of Columbia are, of course, subject to restrictions against the unauthorized practice of law in this jurisdiction (D.C. App. R. 49), and Rule 5.5(b) prohibits D.C. lawyers from assisting a person who is not a member of the bar in the performance of an activity constituting the unauthorized practice of law. Any partnership with a foreign attorney must comply with these obligations.

In addition, D.C. lawyers and law firms must continue to satisfy the ethical requirements relating to use of letterheads and firm names. See Rule 7.5(b) ("a law firm with offices in more than one jurisdiction may use the same name in each jurisdiction, but identification of the lawyers in an office of the firm shall indicate the jurisdictional limitations on those not licensed to practice in the jurisdiction where the office is located."). Thus, like any multi-jurisdictional partnership, a partnership with foreign attorneys must ensure that its letterhead identifies appropriately the jurisdictions in which individual attorneys are licensed to practice.

[1] This opinion assumes without deciding that the proposed arrangement described in the inquiry complies with all aspects of D.C. substantive law and with applicable Swedish and United Kingdom law and ethical rules; it therefore addresses only the ethical issues under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct presented by the proposed arrangement.

[2] Of course, a foreign attorney who also is admitted to practice in one or more U.S. jurisdictions is subject to the supervisory authority and disciplinary system of the U.S. jurisdiction(s) in which he is admitted. Because of this fact, it is unnecessary to consider such attorneys as "foreign" lawyers for purposes of this analysis.

Finally, members of the D.C. Bar may state or imply that they practice in a partnership or other organization only when that is the fact. Rule 7.5(d). In forming a partnership with a foreign attorney, the D.C. lawyer should confirm, both as a matter of U.S. and foreign law, that the relationship created is properly described and held out to clients.

In reaching the conclusion that a D.C. lawyer may join in a partnership or other form of professional association with a foreign lawyer not licensed to practice in any jurisdiction in the United States so long as the partnership or association will not compromise the D.C. lawyer's ability to uphold ethical standards, we join several other jurisdictions that have considered similar issues and reached the same result. See, e.g., N.Y. State Op. 658 (Feb. 14, 1994) (New York law partnership may enter into a partnership with a Swedish firm provided the partnership will not compromise the lawyers' ability to uphold ethical standards); Utah Op. 96-14 (Jan. 24, 1997) (lawyer may form partnership or otherwise associate with non-Utah lawyers who are authorized to practice law in other jurisdictions within the United States or to engage in the functional equivalent in a foreign country). We are aware of no jurisdiction that has concluded otherwise.

Availability of Screening as Cure for Imputed Disqualification

• Screening of a disqualified lawyer can cure imputed disqualification of her law firm only where the disqualified lawyer (1) was not a lawyer when involved in the previous matter on behalf of the now-adverse party, (2) was a government employee (including volunteer service in certain District of Columbia offices) when involved in the related representation, or (3) acquired information regarding the now-adverse party in connection with a prospective client who did not become a client. Even where available, a screen is effective only if established in a timely manner.

Inquiry

The District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct disqualify an individual lawyer from participating in a matter in a number of circumstances. Under many of these circumstances, the disqualification of an individual lawyer is imputed to all the other lawyers in that lawyer's firm. The Committee has received numerous inquiries as to when, if ever, such imputed disqualification can be cured or avoided by the erection of a screen (sometimes referred to as an "ethical wall") between the disqualified individual lawyer and the matter in question.

Discussion

We address below the circumstances in which individual lawyers are disqualified,[1] the subset of circumstances in which such disqualification is imputed to the lawyer's entire firm, the three instances where imputed disqualification can be cured by screening, and the requisites of such a screen.

1. Individual Lawyer Disqualification

An individual lawyer is disqualified from participating in a matter where—

(1) the interests that the lawyer would advance on behalf of one client conflict, or are likely to conflict, with those of another existing client or of the lawyer, Rule 1.7, D.C. Rules of Prof. Conduct (hereinafter "D.C. Rule ____");[2]

(2) the representation would involve preparation of an instrument giving the lawyer or her relative a substantial gift or legacy from a client who is not her relative, D.C. Rule 1.8(b);

(3) the lawyer's opposing counsel is her parent, child, sibling, or spouse, D.C. Rule 1.8(h);

(4) the interests that the lawyer would advance on behalf of one client are materially adverse to those of the lawyer's former client and the matter is the same as, or substantially related to, a matter in which the lawyer represented that former client, D.C. Rule 1.9;

(5) the matter is the same as, or substantially related to, a matter involving a specific party or parties in which the lawyer participated while a government employee or a volunteer in several D.C. government offices, D.C. Rules 1.11(a), (h);

(6) the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a neutral arbitrator in the same matter, D.C. Rule 1.12;

(7) the representation will result in a violation of law (including the Rules of Professional Conduct), D.C. Rule 1.16(a)(1);

(8) the proposed representation is as an intermediary between two or more clients and one or more of the conditions in Rule 2.2(a) cannot be met; or

(9) the lawyer is likely to be a necessary witness at trial, in which case the lawyer, with limited exceptions, is disqualified only from serving as an advocate at trial. D.C. Rule 3.7; D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 228 (1992).

Some of these causes for disqualification can be waived by clients after full disclosure of the existence, nature, and possible consequences of the conflict or other impairment. E.g., D.C. Rule 1.7(c); D.C. Rule 1.9 & Comment [3].

2. Imputed Disqualification—Currently Associated Lawyers

[1] This opinion does not address situations where an individual lawyer is not disqualified even though in a conflict situation. See, e.g., D.C. Rule 1.7(d) (midstream conflicts); D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 272 (1997) (situation wherein representation of one client can be terminated to avoid conflict with another).

[2] Disqualification for this reason can include instances where the lawyer's inability (because of the strictures of Rule 1.6) to impart or make use of secrets or confidences gained from another client or potential client substantially inhibits the lawyer's ability to represent her client. See D.C. Rule 1.10 cmt. [7]; D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 237 (1992).

Where currently associated lawyers[3] are involved and an individual lawyer is disqualified under Rule 1.7, 1.8(b), 1.9, or 2.2, the disqualification is imputed to the lawyer's entire firm.[4] D.C. Rule 1.10(a) & Comment [6]. Imputed disqualification thus does not extend to all the individual disqualification situations set out above. In the remaining situations listed, there is no imputation of the individual lawyer's disqualification to the rest of the firm, though the voluntary erection of a screen may help ensure that a disqualified individual lawyer does not inadvertently participate in, or disclose confidences or secrets relating to, a matter from which she is disqualified.

Disqualification of an individual lawyer as trial counsel because that lawyer is likely to be a necessary witness, see D.C. Rule 3.7(a); D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 228 (1992), is imputed to the lawyer's firm only if the individual lawyer also is disqualified by reason of conflict of interest Rule 1.7 or 1.9 (for example, the individual lawyer is expected to give testimony that is adverse to the client). D.C. Rule 3.7(b).

3. Imputed Disqualification—Lawyers Changing Jobs

Private sector job to private sector job. Imputed disqualification also may occur when a lawyer moves from one private sector position to another. First, a law firm with which a disqualified lawyer is newly associated is disqualified in a matter where the disqualified lawyer personally represented the adverse party while a lawyer at a different firm, and the disqualified lawyer actually acquired confidences or secrets of the adverse party in that capacity that are material to the matter at the new firm, and that matter is the same as, or substantially related to, the matter at the former firm. D.C. Rule 1.10(b) & Comments [16], [19].[5] Second, where the individual lawyer subject to disqualification has left a law firm, that firm is disqualified in a new matter that is the same as, or substantially related to, the matter in which the departed lawyer represented the firm's now adverse former client. D.C. Rule 1.10(c) & Comment [20]. Where the disqualified lawyer was a nonlawyer at the time of the prior representation, there is no imputed disqualification, D.C. Rule 1.10(b) & Comment [21], but a screen must be established between the disqualified lawyer and the other lawyers in the firm, D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 227 (1992). In the case of both currently associated lawyers and lawyers changing jobs, imputed disqualification under Rule 1.10 can be waived "under the conditions stated in Rule 1.7" (for example, full disclosure of the conflict and potential adverse consequences thereof). D.C. Rule 1.10(d).

Public sector to private sector. When the move is from a public sector to a private sector job, imputed disqualification of the private firm occurs where the disqualified lawyer participated personally and substantially while a public officer or employee (including work as a volunteer for the D.C. Corporation Counsel or the D.C. Financial Responsibility and Management Assistance Authority)[6] in the same or a substantially related matter involving a specific party or parties, even if the private firm is not adverse to the lawyer's former agency. D.C. Rule 1.11. Imputed disqualification does not occur, however, if the disqualified lawyer's involvement with the now-adverse party was solely as a judicial clerk. D.C. Rule 1.11(b) & Comment [6]. There accordingly is no screening requirement in such a situation, D.C. Rule 1.11 Comment [6], though erection of a screen nevertheless may be prudent.

4. Screening as a Cure for Imputed Disqualification[7]

Screening over the objection of an affected client generally cannot cure a firm's imputed disqualification where the disqualified individual attorney was in private practice when the disqualifying representation occurred.[8] Screening typically is available where the disqualified individual lawyer was a government employee when the disqualifying representation occurred.

Disqualification under Rule 1.10. With two exceptions, screening does not avoid imputed disqualification under Rule 1.10. The first exception occurs where:

> the individual lawyer's disqualification results solely from the fact that the lawyer consulted with a potential client for the purpose of enabling that potential client and the firm to determine whether they desired to form a client-lawyer relationship, but no such relationship was ever formed.

D.C. Rule 1.10(a) (eff. Nov. 1, 1996).[9]

To avoid disqualification of the entire firm in such a situation, the firm:

> must take affirmative steps—as soon as an actual or potential conflict is suspected—to prevent the personally disqualified lawyers from disseminating any information about the potential client that is protected by Rule 1.6, except as necessary to investigate potential conflicts of interest, to any other person in the firm, including non-lawyer staff.

D.C. Rule 1.10 Comment [9] (eff. Nov. 1, 1996).[10]

The disqualification of individual lawyers will extend not only to those who met with the potential client but also to all firm lawyers who have received confidences or secrets of the potential client. Id. Comment [8]. In some instances, disqualification of a substantial proportion of a firm's lawyers

[3] The Rules regarding imputed disqualification distinguish between lawyers and nonlawyers, e.g., D.C. Rule 1.10(b); D.C. Rule 1.6(g); D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 227 (1992), but do not distinguish among partners, associates, and of counsel. For a discussion of imputation where the disqualified lawyer is a temporary or contract lawyer, see our Opinion 255.

[4] Outside the private practice context, a "firm " includes the legal department of a corporation or other organization and the lawyers in a given unit of a legal services organization (though not necessarily the entire legal services organization), but not necessarily the entire government or even an entire government agency. D.C. Rule 1.10 cmts [1]-[4].

[5] We address the treatment of this issue under the now-superseded D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility in our Opinions 164 (1986) and 174 (1986).

[6] Rule 1.11 applies regardless of whether the government position was nominally as a lawyer.

[7] As noted above, certain individual and imputed disqualification can be waived by the affected clients. D.C. Rule 1.10(d). Firms sometimes erect screens voluntarily in connection with such waivers.

[8] This is the rule in most United States jurisdictions. Task Force on Conflicts of Interests, Section on Business Law, A.B.A., Conflicts of Interest Issues, 50 BUS. LAW. 1381, 1402 (1995). A recent survey suggests that the contrary probably is the case only in Illinois, Michigan, Oregon, Pennsylvania, and Washington, and possibly is the case in Louisiana, Ohio and Tennessee. THOMAS D. MORGAN & RONALD D. ROTUNDA, 1998 SELECTED STANDARDS ON PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY 143-53. Massachusetts recently altered its rules to permit screening where the lateral arrival (a) "has no material information protected by Rule 1.6 or Rule 1.9" or (b) neither had substantial involvement nor acquired substantial material information about the matter while with her previous firm. Rule 1.10(d), Mass. Rules of Prof. Conduct (eff. Jan.1, 1998). The draft Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers would permit screening where the client confidences or secrets communicated to the individually disqualified lawyer are "unlikely to be significant" in the new matter. may require disqualification of the entire firm. See D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 275 (1997); Kala v. Aluminum Smelting & Refining Co., Inc., 81 Ohio St. 3d 1, 10, 688 N.E.2d 258, ___ (1998); *Watson v. Rule of Prof. Conduct 1.10 Comment [10] (eff. Jan. 1, 1998) (may be difficult to screen information successfully in small firm).

The second circumstance in which screening cures imputed disqualification under Rule 1.10 is where the disqualified individual was not a lawyer when she acquired the confidences or secrets of the now-adverse party. D.C. Rule 1.10(b) (cross referencing D.C. Rule 1.6(g) & Comment [21]). Screening is required whether the disqualified individual subsequently has become a lawyer, D.C. Rule 1.10(b) & Comment [21], or remains a nonlawyer (e.g., a summer law clerk, a paralegal, or a clerical employee), D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 227 (1992) (citing ABA Informal Op. 88-1526 (1988)). In the latter case, screening is required to protect client confidences and secrets. In the former case, issues regarding loyalty are present as well.

Rule 1.10 does not indicate what specific actions constitute a sufficient screen. Our Opinion 227 suggests the use of one or more of the techniques that are discussed later in this opinion. A screen created under this exception generally must be erected at or before the time the conflict—whether caused by the arrival of a lateral lawyer or nonlawyer or by the acceptance of a new matter—occurs. LaSalle Nat'l Bank v. County of Lake, 703 F.2d 252, 259 (7th Cir. 1983); Schiessle v. Stephens, 717 F.2d 417, 421 (7th Cir. 1983); Nelson v. Green Builders, Inc., 823 F. Supp. 1439, 1451 (E.D. Wis. 1993).

Disqualification Under Rule 1.11. Disqualification of a former government employee, including someone who worked as a volunteer for the D.C. Corporation Counsel or the D.C. Financial Responsibility and Management Assistance Authority, is imputed to her firm only upon failure to follow the requirements set out in paragraphs (c) through (f) of Rule 1.11. D.C. Rule 1.11(b) & Comment [3]. First, the personally disqualified lawyer must be "screened from any form of participation in the matter . . . and from sharing in any fees resulting therefrom." D.C. Rule 1.11(c). This "does not prohibit a lawyer from receiving a salary or partnership share established by prior independent agreement," but it does prohibit a firm from "directly relating the attorney's compensation in any way to the fee in the matter in which the lawyer is disqualified." D.C. Rule 1.11 Comment [11]. That is, where a lawyer's percentage share of a firm's profits is determined or decided upon after the fact, the total firm profits need not be recalculated by subtracting the fee for the particular matter but the determination of her percentage should not take that fee into account.

Second, the disqualified lawyer and her firm must notify the lawyer's former agency and the parties to the matter in writing before the firm begins the representation. D.C. Rule 1.11(d) & Comment [6]. The individually disqualified lawyer must state that she will not participate in, discuss with any other lawyer in her firm, or share in any fees for, the matter. D.C. Rule 1.11(d)(1). One other firm lawyer must state that all affiliated lawyers are aware of the screen and must "describ[e] the procedures being taken to screen the personally disqualified lawyer." D.C. Rule 1.11(d)(2). Paragraphs (e) and (f) prescribe an alternate procedure for instances where the client "requests in writing that the fact and subject matter of a representation" not be disclosed as required by paragraph (d).

As with the second exception under Rule 1.10, a Rule 1.11 screen should be in place not later than the time the conflict—whether occasioned by the arrival of a lateral lawyer or nonlawyer or by the acceptance of a new matter—occurs. D.C. Rule 1.11 Comment [7]; LaSalle Nat'l Bank, 703 F.2d at 259; Schiessle, 717 F.2d at 421; Nelson, 823 F. Supp. at 1451.

"Compliance with the Rules of Professional Conduct does not necessarily constitute compliance with all of the obligations imposed by conflict of interest statutes or regulations." D.C. Rule 1.11 Comment [13]. The Rules note the potential applicability of such other provisions of law as 18 U.S.C. §§ 207 and 208 to the conduct of former government employees. D.C. Rule 1.11 Comment [13]. Some agencies also have their own separate rules. E.g., 16 C.F.R. § 4.1(b) (1997) (FTC).

5. Particular Elements of a Screen

Beyond the requirements of Rule 1.11(d)(1) that a disqualified individual lawyer not participate in the matter, discuss the matter with her colleagues, or share in the fees for the matter, neither any reported decision of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals[11] nor the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct[12] specify the particular elements of a screen when one is required or permitted under the Rules.

Our Opinion 227 and court decisions elsewhere, however, suggest that a screen should prohibit (1) involvement in the matter by the individually disqualified lawyer, (2) discussion of the matter between the individually disqualified lawyer and any firm personnel involved in the representation, (3) access by the disqualified lawyer to any files (including electronically stored files) of the matter from which she is screened, and (4) access by the lawyers working on the matter to any files of the disqualified lawyer relating to the matter. See, e.g., LaSalle Nat'l Bank, 703 F.2d at 259; Armstrong v. McAlpin, 625 F.2d 433, 442-43 (2d Cir. 1980) (en banc), vacated on other grounds, 449 U.S. 1106 (1981); Kesselhaut v. United States, 214 Ct. Cl. 124, 555 F.2d 791 (Ct. In addition, there should be written notification to all personnel of the firm and to the clients of the fact and elements of the screen. Kala, 81 Ohio St. 3d at 10, 688 N.E.2d at ___; see Rule 1.10(e), Mass. Rules of Prof. Conduct (eff. Jan. 1, 1998); D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 227 (1992). In appropriate circumstances, such as where the disqualified lawyer works near those handling the matter, the file protection element can include labeling files to reflect the access prohibition, see D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 227 (1992), or even maintaining files in a secure location, e.g., Kesselhaut, 214 Ct. Cl. at 127-28, 555 F.2d at 793 (files maintained in locked cabinet with keys controlled by two partners and issued only on a need-to-know basis); In re Del-Val Finan-

[11] One decision suggests that where a screen is permitted, the individually disqualified lawyer must be screened "from participation in counseling and compensation arrangements." Committee for Washington's Riverfront Parks v. Thompson, 451 A.2d 1177, 1192 (D.C. 1982). A United States District Court ruling ordered the disqualified lawyer not to "discuss with [his partner representing the codefendant] any information" that the disqualified lawyer received from his former client. United States v. Childress, 731 F. Supp. 547, 554 (D.D.C. 1990).

[12] Cmt. [9] to Rule 1.10 requires that protected confidences and secrets not pass in either direction between the disqualified lawyer and others in the firm but does not offer further particulars.

[13] This local rule also requires that the disqualified lawyer be "isolated from all contacts with the client or any agent, officer or employee of the client and any witness for or against the client." Rule 1.10(e)(2), Rules of Prof. Conduct, U.S. Dist. Ct., N.D.Ill.

Direct Communication Between a Lawyer Representing a Client and Members of a Local Government Board

• Under Rule 4.2(d), a lawyer who represents a client before a D.C. professional licensing board can properly contact individual board members to discuss the board's action against the lawyer's client. The lawyer also can discuss the board member's alleged dissatisfaction with the board staff and internal operations as they affect the lawyer's client.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 4.2(d) (Communication By Lawyer With Government Officials)

Inquiry

The inquirer, a private practitioner, requests an opinion addressing whether, under Rule 4.2(d), an attorney may communicate directly with government officials on a licensing board without first obtaining consent of the board's lawyer. The inquirer represents a client who reached an unsatisfactory consent order with a D.C. health professional licensing board concerning the client's chiropractic license. The inquirer believes that the administrative and legal staff assigned to support the licensing board both determined the outcome and acted improperly in his client's case. In addition, it is his understanding that many members of the licensing board are unhappy about the staff imposing its will on the board with respect to a number of matters. Consequently, the inquirer is interested in contacting the individual board members to discuss two topics: (1) his client's consent order; and (2) board member's alleged dissatisfaction with the board staff and with other internal operational matters affecting both his client and other clients' matters. Rule 4.2 generally prohibits contact between an attorney and opposing parties, unless the attorney has the prior consent of the lawyer representing the opposing party or is authorized by law to make contact. Paragraph (d) of Rule 4.2, however, provides that the Rule "does not prohibit communication by a lawyer with government officials who have the authority to redress the grievances of the lawyer's client, whether or not those grievances or the lawyer's communications relate to matters that are the subject of the representation, provided that in the event of such communications the disclosures specified in (b) are made to the government official when the communication is made."[1] The inquiry requires that we define the scope of this section.

Discussion

Rule 4.2(d) authorizes a broad range of substantive communications between a lawyer for a private party and government officials. Based on the legislative history and Comment [7] to Rule 4.2[d], we conclude that neither of the communications proposed would violate Rule 4.2.

In enacting Rule 4.2, the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia Bar concluded that ABA Model Rule 4.2 should be amended to exclude entirely communications between attorneys and governmental officials from the "no contact" rule.[2] The drafters recognized that contacts with governmental parties should be treated differently from contacts with non-governmental parties. Consistent with D.C. Bar Op. No. 80, the drafters rationalized that many considerations different from those found in private litigation apply where the government is the opposing party.[3]

For example, Rule 4.2 has at its core the societal concern that lawyers are better positioned, by education and training, to overwhelm the lay person and exploit his or her lack of legal knowledge in the course of communicating directly with the lay party. Such a concern is not fully applicable in the governmental context because government officials generally are presumed to be sufficiently capable of resisting legal or policy arguments that are not proper and genuinely persuasive. Moreover, government officials, by virtue of their experience and expertise, should be competent to decide whether to engage in such discussions with opposing counsel without seeking legal advice or having a lawyer present.

The drafters also recognized that in litigation involving a governmental party, the authority to make decisions is not, like private litigation, entirely that of the client; rather, decisions may be shared by the government and counsel, and in some instances may rest solely with counsel. Under such circumstances, responsible government officials may not know of positions taken by government counsel. Prohibiting direct communications with the governmental party, therefore, may hinder rather than advance the goal of client control of the proceedings.

Another difference between private and governmental parties noted by the drafters is that the government represents the public. Therefore, the public interest is not just that the government win a case but that the government advance the public interest. Permitting direct communication with government officials — "those who are best versed in the competing policy considerations and most experienced in analyzing, choosing among, and reconciling" a variety of public interests — facilitates such a result. Yellow Cover Legislative History at 188.

In addition to the different considerations applicable to governmental parties, the drafters of Rule 4.2 acknowledged that prohibitions on contacting government officials may infringe upon the freedom to [14] Sample forms for screens appear in Task Force on Conflicts of Interest, Section on Business Law, A.B.A., Conflicts of Interest Issues, 50 BUS. LAW. 1381, 1402-21 (1995).

[1] Rule 4.2(b) allows an attorney to contact lower-level employees of an adverse organizational party without the consent of the organization's attorney. The rule requires that a lawyer disclose his or her identity and identify his or her adversary position against the employee's organization prior to communicating with any nonparty employee of the opposing party.

[2] The explicit governmental exception to Rule 4.2 departs significantly from the predecessor provision DC 7-104(A)(1), see Opinion No. 80 (restricting access to government officials under DR 7-104(A)(1)), and the rules of most state bars. California is the only other jurisdiction that provides a specific exception to the no-contact rule for governmental parties, see California Rules of Professional Conduct 7-103, although a number of jurisdictions have interpreted their rules barring contacts between a lawyer and an opposing party to allow some contacts with adverse government officials so as not to infringe the First Amendment right to petition the government for redress of grievances. See generally A.B.A. Opinion No. 97-408 (1997) at n. 7.

petition the government for redress of grievances guaranteed by the First Amendment. Id. At 188-189. First Amendment concerns recently led the ABA Ethics Committee recently to alter its position and issue an opinion under Model Rule 4.2 (which does not contain an explicit exception for government contacts) that permits a lawyer representing a private party in a controversy with the government to communicate about the matter with government officials who have authority to take or to recommend action in the matter, provided that the sole purpose of the lawyer's communication is to address a policy issue . . . ." ABA Formal Opinion 97-408 (8/2/97).[4]

Comment [7] our Rule 4.2, however, indicates that the right of a private party's attorney to communicate directly with government officials is not absolute. The commentary notes: [p]aragraph (d) does not permit a lawyer to bypass counsel representing the government on every issue that may arise in the course of disputes with the government." The comment further clarifies that the rule "is not intended to provide direct access on routine disputes such as ordinary discovery disputes, extensions of time or other scheduling matters, or similar routine aspects of the resolution of disputes." The examples provided by Comment [7] indicate that the drafters excluded only communications about procedural matters from the range of direct contact permitted with government officials, presumably to allow government counsel full control over the day-to-day conduct of litigation without preventing substantive communications between the public and government officials.[5]

In the instant situation, both types of communications proposed by the inquirer appear to fall within the scope of permissible communications under paragraph (d). Indeed, contact with members of the licensing board about the conclusion reached in a particular matter as well as the alleged improper conduct of governmental personnel, i.e., the board's counsel and staff, is directly addressed by the commentary to paragraph (d). Specifically, comment [7] to the Rule explains that paragraph (d):

> is intended to provide lawyers access to decision makers in government with respect to genuine grievances, such as to present the view that the government's basic policy position with respect to a dispute is faulty, or that government personnel are conducting themselves improperly with respect to aspects of the dispute.

We therefore conclude that the proposed communications are consistent with the broad scope of direct communications with adverse government officials permitted by Rule 4.2(d).

Transmission of Confidential Information by Electronic Mail

- In most circumstances, transmission of confidential information by unencrypted electronic mail does not per se violate the confidentiality rules of the legal profession. However, individual circumstances may require greater means of security.

Applicable Rule

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality)

Inquiry

We take this opportunity to consider whether Rule 1.6 of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct would be violated by a lawyer who communicates concerning confidential matters with clients, and/or other lawyers jointly representing clients, via unencrypted electronic mail transmitted over commercial services or directly across the Internet. We conclude that the use of unencrypted electronic mail is not, by itself, a violation of Rule 1.6.

Discussion

Rule 1.6 provides, in relevant part, as follows:

> . . . a lawyer shall not knowingly . . . reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client . . . .

Furthermore, Rule 1.6(e) requires lawyers to ensure that persons working for the lawyer use reasonable means to ensure the confidentiality of protected client information.

The recent explosion in the use of electronic mail as a method of communicating between lawyer and client[1] has raised a question whether a lawyer is acting responsibly to protect his client's confidences when he transmits them electronically.

A number of the early ethics opinions that considered this subject reached the conclusion that unencrypted electronic transmission violated Rule 1.6. See, e.g., Iowa Supreme Court Bd. of Professional Ethics Op. 96-1 (8/29/96); South Carolina Bar Ethics Advisory Comm. Op. No. 94-27 (1/95); and Colorado Ethics Op. No. 90 (11/14/92). A number of those opinions were based on the notion that electronic communications are impermissibly susceptible to interception and access by third parties, making transmission of client confidences by such means inappropriate in the absence of specific client consent. E.g., North Carolina State Bar Ethics Op. No. RPC 215 (7/95).[2]

However, as the technology involved in electronic transmission has become better understood and as the law concerning telecommunications has developed, the prevalent view, which this Committee adopts, is that electronic transmission is in most instances an acceptable form of conveying client confidences even where the lawyer does not obtain specific client consent. See e.g., State Bar Ass'n of North Dakota Ethics Comm. Op. No. 97-09 (9/4/97); Illinois State Bar Ass'n Advisory Op. on Professional Conduct No. 96-10 (5/16/97); Arizona State Bar Ass'n Formal Op. No. 97-04 (4/4/97); South Carolina Bar Ethics Advisory Comm. Op. No. 97-08 (6/97) (overruling South Carolina Bar Ethics Advisory Comm. Op. 94-27, supra); and Vermont Advisory Ethics Op. No. 97-5.

In discussing these issues, it is useful to define a number of terms. We set forth three definitions from Vermont Advisory Ethics Op. No. 97-5:

[4] The ABA's opinion requires that the lawyer give government counsel "reasonable advance notice of an intent to communicate," a restriction that we do not adopt. We specifically do not intend this opinion to address whether and to what extent our Rule 4.2 prohibits government counsel from approaching represented individuals. See Cmt. [8] to D.C. Rule 4.2.

[5] We note D.C. Rule 3.5(b) provides that lawyers are prohibited from communicating ex parte with judges, jurors, prospective jurors or other officials "except as permitted by law", reiterating that under our Rules applicable prohibitions on ex parte contacts must be observed. See generally Rule 106(b) of the Rules of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia (prohibiting letters directly to court unless so directed by a judge). We are unaware of any such rules applicable to the situation considered in this opinion.

[1] This opinion does not consider the security aspects of communications with opposing or adverse parties or counsel because those communications are, almost without exception, not subject to the lawyer confidentiality rules.

> "Electronic mail" or "e-mail" is a message sent from one user's computer to another user's computer via a host computer on a network, or via a private or local area network (which we defined to mean a network wholly owned by one company or person which is available only to those persons employed by the owners or to whom the owner has granted legal access) or via an electronic mail service such as America Online (a public network), via the Internet, or by a combination of these methods.
> "Encrypted e-mail" is e-mail that has been electronically locked to prevent anyone but the intended recipient from reading it using a "lock and key" technology.
> The "Internet" is a world-wide super network of computers consisting of individual computers and private and public networks owned by various persons and entities including business, schools, governments, and non-secure military computers. Individual users connect to the Internet through a local "host" computer. The local host computer communicates with other computers throughout the world over the phone lines or privately owned high-speed fiber optic lines using a collection of well-defined common protocols.

Finally, it is important to understand how e-mail travels over the Internet. Here, we quote from State Bar Ass'n of North Dakota Ethics Comm. Op. No. 97-09 (9/4/97):

> E-mail sent over the Internet does not go directly from the sender's computer over a land-based line to a password-protected "mailbox." The message is broken into two or more "packets" of information by the sending computer or host computer, which are then sent individually over the lines and ultimately reassembled back into the complete message at the recipient's "mailbox." The mailboxes may exist on the recipient's computer or may exist on the host computer that the recipient uses to connect to the Internet. These information packets must pass through and be temporarily stored in other computers called "routers" operated by different firms known as "Internet Service Providers" which assist in distributing e-mail over the Internet.

It seems to us that the pre-1997 opinions holding that electronic transmission did not adequately protect client confidences overlooked three key factors. First, all methods of transmission of information are, to one degree or another, subject to interception. A conference room could be subject to electronic eavesdropping; a telephone line may be tapped; or a fax may be intercepted in the fax room of its intended recipient. These risks do not mean that these methods of communication may not be used to transmit confidential information. Indeed, when one considers the possibility of conference room bugs, mail tampering, wire taps, and fax interception, it seems to us that the question under Rule 1.6 is whether the method of transmission is such that one might reasonably expect the message sent to remain confidential. The rule does not require absolute security in protecting confidentiality; it requires reasonable effort to maintain confidentiality.

Second, a number of the pre-1997 opinions on this subject overlooked the fact that while a message is actually traveling over the Internet, having been disassembled into a number of packets which may not travel in parallel routes, it is extremely difficult to trap all of the relevant information packets and to reassemble them in a readable form. We do not ignore the fact that e-mail transmissions are at certain points along the way more vulnerable to interception. Particularly at the point of transmission and at the point of reassembling in the recipient's mailbox, hackers or careless and dishonest employees of Internet service providers can access this information. But it seems to us that this risk is not appreciably greater than the risk that careless or dishonest employees of the phone company will have access to telephone messages, and yet we know of no authority holding that discussing client confidential information by telephone, at least over land-based lines, is a violation of Rule 1.6.

Third, as the law concerning telecommunications has developed, it has been made clear that interception of electronic transmissions over the Internet (like telephone conversations) is illegal under the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986 as amended in 1994. See 18 U.S.C. §2511. Furthermore, Congress specifically provided in 18 U.S.C. §2517(4) that:

> No otherwise privileged wire, oral, or electronic communication intercepted in accordance with, or in violation of, the provisions of this chapter shall lose its privileged character.

This legal background has given rise to several opinions in which, for purposes of search and seizure law under the Fourth Amendment, persons transmitting electronic messages are held to have a reasonable expectation of privacy. See United States v. Keystone Sanitation Company, 903 F.Supp. 803 (M.D.Pa. 1995); United States v. Maxwell, 43 Fed. R. Serv. 24 (U.S.A.F. Ct. Crim. App. 1995).

Thus, we hold that the mere use of electronic communication is not a violation of Rule 1.6 absent special factors. We recognize that as to any confidential communication, the sensitivity of the contents of the communication and/or the circumstances of the transmission may, in specific instances, dictate higher levels of security. Thus, it may be necessary in certain circumstances to use extraordinary means to protect client confidences. To give an obvious example, a lawyer representing an associate in a dispute with the associate's law firm could very easily violate Rule 1.6 by sending a fax concerning the dispute to the law firm's mail room if that message contained client confidential information. It is reasonable to suppose that employees of the firm, other lawyers employed at the firm, indeed firm management, could very well inadvertently see such a fax and learn of its contents concerning the associate's dispute with the law firm. Thus, what may ordinarily be permissible — the transmission of confidential information by facsimile — may not be permissible in a particular factual context.

By the same analysis, what may ordinarily be permissible — the use of unencrypted electronic transmission — may not be acceptable in the context of a particularly heightened degree of concern or in a particular set of facts. But with that exception, we find that a lawyer takes reasonable steps to protect his client's confidence when he uses unencrypted electronically transmitted messages.

Duties of Lawyer Employing a Social Worker Who is Obligated to Report Child Abuse

• A lawyer who engages a social worker to provide services in connection with the representation of a client must inform the client that the social worker may be obligated under law to report suspected child abuse or neglect. The lawyer should inform the client that while the Rules of Professional Conduct require the lawyer to assure that persons employed by the lawyer in the representation of a client preserve client secrets and confidences, other laws may require the social worker to report child abuse or neglect.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)

• Rule 5.3 (Responsibilities Regarding Nonlawyer Assistants)

Inquiry

An association of social workers seeks guidance regarding the obligations of a social worker employed by or consulting with a lawyer in the representation of a client where the social worker receives information that the client has engaged in child abuse. Under D.C. Code §2-1352, social workers and certain other professionals who reasonably suspect that child abuse or neglect has taken place must "immediately" report the suspected abuse to the Metropolitan Police Department or to the Child Protective Services Division of the Department of Human Services.[1] The statute makes clear that the social worker so obligated has no discretion to refuse to report once the social worker knows or has reasonable cause to suspect that child abuse or neglect has taken place. The statute does not include lawyers among those professionals required to report child abuse or neglect.[2]

Inquirer presents no specific facts or incidents out of which the inquiry arises. We assume that the social worker is either employed by or acting as a consultant to a lawyer or law firm in the course of its representation of a client. The inquiry also does not state whether the information about child abuse came directly from the client or from another source, but in our view the analysis does not change depending on the source of the information.

The Committee is limited to expressing opinions concerning lawyers' ethics and therefore cannot decide the scope of the social worker's obligations under the mandatory reporting law. We focus, first, on whether Rule 1.6 of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct (the "Rules") authorizes a social worker employed by a lawyer to disclose client confidences and secrets and, second, the obligations of the lawyer employing the social worker.

Discussion

As an employee of or consultant to a lawyer representing a client, the social worker is a nonlawyer assistant under Rule 5.3 in that the social worker "acts for the lawyer in rendition of the lawyer's services." Rule 5.3, Comment [1]. Rule 5.3 requires the lawyer to assure that nonlawyer assistants understand and comply with the Rules of Professional Conduct. To assure that the nonlawyer assistant abides by the Rules, a partner in a law firm must put into "effect measures giving reasonable assurance that the person's conduct is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyer." Rule 5.3(a). The failure to put these measures into effect, or allowing the nonlawyer assistant to violate the obligations imposed by the Rules, can result in discipline of a lawyer supervising the employee so long as the lawyer has knowledge of the conduct and fails to take action to avoid or mitigate the violation. Rule 5.3(c). Moreover, Rule 1.6(e) specifically requires a lawyer to exercise reasonable care to prevent employees, associates, and others working for the lawyer from disclosing or using confidences and secrets of a client unless the client consents or an exception applies.

One of those exceptions is contained in Rule 1.6(d)(2), which provides that the lawyer may reveal the confidences or secrets of a client when "required by law." This provision continues practice under former Disciplinary Rule 4-101(C)(2) and follows a provision of the American Bar Association 1980 discussion draft of Model Rule 1.6, which was dropped from subsequent versions of the model rule by the ABA. During the drafting of Rule 1.6 in the District of Columbia, there was considerable debate concerning the scope of the exception to the lawyer's duty to refrain from disclosing confidences and secrets to prevent harm to third parties. By contrast, the exception for disclosure obligations required by law received very little attention. The unqualified language of the exception, though, appears to recognize the authority of the legislature to subordinate the obligation to preserve client confidences and secrets to other social objectives.

Like the duty to preserve confidences and secrets, this exception extends to employees, associates and "others whose services are utilized by the lawyer." Rule 1.6(e). They "may reveal information permitted to be disclosed by paragraphs (c) and (d)." Id. The question is whether this exception authorizes the social worker to reveal confidences and secrets pursuant to a law that does not apply to the lawyer.[3] We conclude that it does not.

The exception in Rule 1.6(e) allowing persons employed by the lawyer to disclose confidences or secrets is strictly derivative of the exception for disclosures by the lawyer. That is, it is defined by referring to Rules 1.6(c) and (d), which contain exceptions to the lawyer's obligation to keep client confidences and secrets. In other words, under Rule 1.6(e), client confidences and secrets can be disclosed by an employee only in circumstances where the lawyer may disclose. The Rule does not authorize disclosure of client confidences and secrets by an employee where the lawyer is prohibited from so disclosing.

We would reach a different conclusion if Rule 1.6(e) contained language authorizing an employee to disclose client confidences and secrets independently of the disclosure rules applicable to the employing lawyer. In the absence of such language, we conclude that in the circumstances presented here Rule 1.6(e) allows no exception to the duty to ensure that the social worker preserves the confidences and secrets of the lawyer's client. We believe this interpretation of Rule 1.6 is consistent not only with its strict limitations on disclosures of client confidences and secrets but also with its recognition that lawyers require assistance of other professionals and lay people to represent their clients properly.

We acknowledge that this interpretation of Rule 1.6 creates a quandary both for the social worker and for the lawyer.[4] The

D.C. Code §2-1352(a).

[2] The class of persons required to report includes, in addition to a social worker, a physician, psychologist, medical examiner, chiropractor, dentist, registered nurse, licensed practical nurse, person involved in the care and treatment of patients, law-enforcement officer, school official, teacher, social service worker, day care worker, and mental health professional. D.C. Code §2-1352(b).

[3] There may be circumstances where the lawyer may report child abuse under Rule 1.6(c)(1), but only where it amounts to "a criminal act that the lawyer reasonably believes is likely to result in death or substantial bodily harm absent disclosure of the client's secrets or confidences by the lawyer." The District of Columbia child abuse and neglect reporting requirement is far broader, both in referring to past acts and in using a lower threshold of harm to the child to trigger the reporting obligation.

[4] The relationship between mandatory child-abuse reporting rules and the duty of confidentiality obligations has been the subject of considerable discussion. Rosencrantz, Rejecting "Hear No Evil Speak No Evil:" Expanding the Attorney's Role in Child Abuse Reporting, 8 Geo. J.L. Ethics 327 (Winter 1995); Mosteller, Child Abuse Reporting Laws and Attorney-Client Confidences: The Reality and the Specter of Lawyer as Informant, 1992 Duke Law J. 203; Stuart, Child Abuse Reporting: A Challenge to Attorney-

Rules of Professional Conduct cannot insulate a social worker from obligations otherwise imposed by law. Thus, the lawyer's duty to exercise "reasonable care" to assure that employees do not disclose client confidences and secrets cannot include preventing the social worker from reporting child abuse or neglect as mandated by law.[5] An alternative interpretation of Rule 1.6, though, would create the anomaly that the social worker working for the lawyer would be mandated to make disclosures that the lawyer is forbidden from making.

The one prior decision of the Committee interpreting Rule 1.6(d)(2) does not shed light on the question before us. In D.C. Bar Op. 219, a regulation of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office required practitioners to reveal a fraud perpetrated on a "person" or "tribunal" during the course of the representation of the client, a disclosure that might otherwise be prohibited by Rule 3.3(d).[6] We held that the exception for disclosures required by law applied, subject only to the additional requirement that the client be informed of the lawyer's obligation and be given an opportunity to challenge the regulation. But that opinion concerned only an obligation to disclose placed directly on the lawyer, not on a person employed by the lawyer.

The inconsistent duties of the social worker and the lawyer — the social worker to report under the child abuse and neglect law, the lawyer to assure that confidences and secrets of a client are preserved — require that the lawyer take steps to assure that the client understands the inconsistency. See Rule 1.4(b).[7] Before bringing a social worker into the representation, the lawyer should inform the client that the social worker may have a statutory duty to report child abuse or neglect that is inconsistent with the duty of both the lawyer and the social worker to preserve confidences and secrets imposed by the Rules of Professional Conduct. The lawyer should further explain that, as a result, the social worker may in fact report information supplied by the client or the lawyer to relevant authorities. It is then the client's decision whether to proceed with the use of a social worker in the case.

It is also appropriate for the lawyer to inform the social worker of the lawyer's obligations under Rule 1.6 to preserve confidences and secrets of the client and to assure that the social worker does the same. The lawyer should not, however, provide legal advice to the social worker regarding reporting obligations under the statute because the lawyer's duty to the client to assure protection of confidences and secrets precludes giving any contrary opinion to the social worker. See Rule 1.7(a). Nor should the lawyer request that the social worker ignore the provisions of the law mandating reporting of child abuse or neglect.

Conclusion

The dilemma faced by the lawyer, the client, and the social worker is not easily resolved, and the Rules do not appear to have contemplated the situation we confront. Given the lack of clarity in the relationship between Rule 1.6 and laws mandating reporting of child abuse and neglect by certain professionals, the lawyer's obligations under the circumstances discussed in this opinion are twofold: first, to inform his client of the possible implications of sharing information about child abuse or neglect with a social worker working for the lawyer; and second, to inform the social worker of the obligations imposed by Rule 1.6.

Inquiry No. 97-7-36
Adopted June 17, 1998

Client Confidentiality, 1 Geo. J.L. Ethics 243 (1987).

It is arguable that the social worker has no mandatory reporting obligation in these circumstances. A court might interpret D.C. Code §2-1352 as excluding a social worker from mandatory reporting obligations when working for a lawyer. The legislative history of the Prevention of Child Abuse and Neglect Act of 1977 contains no discussion of the impact of the law on lawyers or on health professionals working for lawyers. The committee report states only that the statute is intended to apply to "a broad range of medical, educational, social service and law enforcement professionals." Council of the District of Columbia, Report on Bill 2-48, Mar. 30, 1977.

[5] See also Rule 1.6, Cmt. [27], expressing a presumption against other laws superseding a lawyer's obligation of confidentiality. Absent a judicial interpretation of the applicability of the statute to a social worker working for a lawyer, however, the lawyer must ensure that the client understands the potential inconsistency between the lawyer's duty to protect the information and the social worker's apparent statutory duty to report it.

[6] Rule 3.3(d) provides that a lawyer need not disclose a fraud perpetrated by a client upon a tribunal where doing so "would require disclosure of information otherwise protected by Rule 1.6. . ."

[7] Rule 1.4(b) provides that "A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation."

Opinion No. 283

Disposition of Closed Client Files

• A lawyer who is entrusted with the property of a current or former client has certain ethical obligations with respect to its disposal: (1) valuable client property must be promptly delivered to the former client or safeguarded indefinitely; (2) other client property may, based on the former client's direction, be delivered to the former client, stored or destroyed; (3) if it is not possible to locate the former client, non-valuables that are not reasonably necessary to protect a client's interest may be destroyed five years after the termination of representation; and (4) non-valuables not belonging to a former client or third party may be destroyed at any time.

• Rule 1.15 (Safekeeping Property)
• Rule 1.16(d) (Declining or Terminating Representation)
• Rule 1.8(i) (Conflict of Interest: Prohibited Transactions)
• Rule 3.4(a) (Fairness to Opposing Party and Counsel)

Inquiry

The inquirer is a solo practitioner in Washington, D.C. who represented a multinational corporate client for more than twenty years before the representation was terminated and another law firm began representing the client. Upon termination of representation, the inquirer transferred to the successor law firm all client files relating to pending matters as well as corporate documents and originals of documents provided to him by the client. The inquirer retained in an off-site commercial storage facility the former client's closed or "dead files" including notes, memoranda, pleadings, and other items prepared by him in the course of the twenty-year representation as well as research files containing opinions, articles and other publicly available material, duplicate copies of correspondence between the attorney and former client, and materials received from third parties. According to the inquirer, the client was provided during the course of representation with copies of these materials. Furthermore, the inquirer states that there are no valuable items in the former client's closed files, and asserts there would be "no foreseeable prejudice or harm to the former client's interests if the files are not returned to the client."

The inquiring attorney has begun to phase out his law practice, and no longer wishes to continue to pay storage fees for his former client's closed files. Accordingly, the attorney recently wrote his former client and indicated his desire to dispose of the closed files, suggesting three possible alternatives: (1) delivery of the files to the former client's successor law firm in Washington, D.C.; (2) retention of the files in the off-site storage facility with the former client responsible for paying the storage fees; or (3) destruction of the files under secure conditions.

The former client responded that it wished to have the files shipped from Washington, D.C. to its New York office. The inquirer asserts that complying with this request would cost him considerable time, effort and expense. Thus, the attorney asks whether he may ethically require the client to: (a) reimburse him for all direct costs associated with the transfer of the closed files; and (b) compensate him for the time expended in reviewing, and/or preparing the closed files for delivery.

Discussion

The Legal Ethics Committee last addressed a lawyer's ethical obligations relating to the disposition of former clients' closed or "dead" files in 1989, prior to the effective date of the current D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct ("D.C. Rules"). Given the subsequent adoption of the D.C. Rules, numerous inquiries by members of the Bar, and recent ethics opinions in other jurisdictions, the Committee believes it appropriate to revisit a lawyer's responsibilities in this regard. Specifically, this opinion attempts to clarify the parameters of a "client file," to suggest reasonable guidelines to ensure the ethical disposition of closed client files in accordance with the D.C. Rules, and to address concerns regarding the costs of transferring, storing, reviewing, or destroying former client files.[1]

Lawyers do not have a general duty to preserve permanently all files of their former clients. D.C. Bar Opinion 206 (1989); ABA Informal Op. 1384 (1977). Obviously, neither solo practitioners nor the largest law firms have unlimited office space or other resources to accommodate all former client files on an indefinite basis.[2] On the other hand, a lawyer has an ethical obligation to current and former clients to prevent the premature or inappropriate destruction of client files. D.C. Bar Opinion 206 (1989). Attempting to balance these two legitimate interests has created understandable uncertainty among members of the Bar, particularly with respect to closed files of a former client.

The Committee has noted in the past, and continues to believe, that the overriding consideration when disposing of closed files must be the lawyer's responsibility to protect his former client, and not the former client's property interests in any particular item or document in such files or issues of the lawyer's personal convenience. D.C. Bar Opinion 206 (1989), D.C. Bar Opinion 168 (1986). However, in light of the fact that the D.C. Rules governing the disposition of client files are drafted in terms of the "property to which the client is entitled," see D.C. Rule 1.16(d); D.C. Rule 1.15(b), some discussion of the major categories of property that may constitute a client file is necessary to clarify the lawyer's ethical responsibilities.

Defining Client File

In a previous opinion interpreting the D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility, we adopted the "entire file" approach to the disposal of a client file. D.C. Bar Opinion 168 (1986). Under this approach, before a lawyer withdraws from representation he must deliver to the client (or his or her legal representative) the entire contents of the client's file unless withholding any items would "not result in foreseeable prejudice to the former client."[3] Id. D.C. Bar Opinion 206 retained the "foreseeable prejudice to the former client" standard, but also explained that not all materials within the client file necessarily impose the same ethical obligations on a lawyer. This opinion divided the closed client file into three categories: valuable property, work product and other client property. D.C. Bar Opinion 206 (1989). In order to avoid the potential for confusion arising from reliance on property law concepts, we now define a more workable means of segregating property within a client file that conforms with the standards used in several other jurisdictions.

1. Valuable Property Subject to Rule 1.15(b)

The disposition of property in a client file that has intrinsic value or that directly affects valuable rights, such as securities, negotiable instruments, deeds, settlement agreements, and wills,[4] is governed by D.C. Rule 1.15(b), Safekeeping Property, which provides:

> Upon receiving funds or other property in which a client or third person has an interest, a lawyer shall promptly notify the client or third person. Except as stated in this rule or otherwise permitted by law or by agreement with the client, a lawyer shall promptly deliver to the client or third person any funds or other property that the client is entitled to receive and, upon request by the client or third person, shall promptly render a full accounting regarding such property, subject to Rule 1.6.

In D.C. Bar Opinion 206, we noted that implicit in this duty to promptly deliver valuable property to the client or third person to whom it belongs is the obligation to retain such property indefinitely until it can be returned to its rightful owner, the owner's legal representative, or a successor in interest. Thus, it would be unethical for a lawyer to destroy valuables contained in a client file.[5] We also recognize, however, that it may be impractical for a lawyer to store valuable property indefinitely. Therefore, after termination of representation and a lawyer's diligent but unsuccessful effort to deliver promptly valuables contained in a client file to the client or a third party (or their legal representatives or successors), the lawyer may invoke any state law procedures for escheat funds or unclaimed prop-

[1] This opinion is intended to replace our previous opinions regarding the retention of client files. See D.C. Op. 206 (1989); D.C. Op. 168 (1986). Many of the views expressed in those earlier opinions, however, have been incorporated here.

[2] It has been recognized that the "substantial storage costs can affect the cost of legal services, and the public interest is not served by unnecessary and avoidable additions to the cost of legal services." ABA Informal Op. 1384 (1977).

[3] In contrast, some jurisdictions have adopted the "end-product" approach, whereby the client only owns the final result of the attorney's work, i.e., pleadings, contracts, reports, etc., and the attorney owns the rest of his work product. See, e.g., Corrigan v. Armstrong, Teasdale, Schlafy, Davis & Dicus, 824 S.W. 2d 92 (Mo. Ct. App. 1992); ABA Informal Op. 1376 (1977).

The "entire file" approach in the District of Columbia is consistent with D.C. Rule 1.8 (i), which does not permit a lawyer to acquire a lien on any of the contents of the client file except that portion of work product within the file that has not been paid for. See Rule 1.8(i); D.C. Op. 250 (1995).

[4] While there is no indication in earlier opinions that deeds, wills and settlement agreements constitute the "other property" referred to in 1.15(b), due to the intrinsic value of such items, we find this interpretation is reasonable. Other jurisdictions have reached the same conclusion. See Wis. Ethics Op. E-98-1 (1998); 58 Ala. Law. 368 (1997); Mich. Ethics Op. R-12 (1991)

[5] This is the case regardless of whether the valuables belong to the client or to a third person, as Rule 1.15(b) makes clear.

erty depositories.[6] In the absence of such alternatives, the lawyer is obligated to maintain the valuables until they can be delivered to the client or third party or appropriate representative.[7]

2. Other Client Property Subject to Rule 1.16(d)

Rule 1.16(d) governs all other client property in a former client's closed file. Rule 1.16 (d), Declining or Terminating Representation, provides:

> In connection with any termination of representation, a lawyer shall take timely steps to the extent reasonably practicable to protect a client's interests, such as giving reasonable notice to the client, allowing time for employment of other counsel, surrendering papers and property to which the client is entitled, and refunding any advance payment of fee that has not been earned. The lawyer may retain papers relating to the client to the extent permitted by Rule 1.8(i).

In order to avoid uncertainty regarding the treatment of client files, it is sound law practice management for lawyers to make arrangements with their clients for the disposal of clients' files either in the initial representation agreement or in the agreement terminating the attorney-client relationship. See Wisconsin Ethics Op. E-98-1 (1998). Consistent with the remainder of this opinion and Rule 1.16 (d), such an agreement may provide for the immediate delivery of the client's files upon termination of the representation, storage of the closed files for a specified period of time and then destruction of the files, or the immediate destruction of the files following completion of the representation. Similarly, the parties' respective obligations regarding delivery, storage or destruction costs may be set forth in this agreement.

In the absence of such an agreement, however, the lawyer must be guided by the provisions of Rule 1.16(d). Upon termination of representation the lawyer should make a reasonable and good-faith effort to notify the former client of the existence and contents of the client's files and follow the client's instructions whether to hold, return or destroy the files. See D.C. Bar Opinion 206.[8] This process is obviously easiest to implement if undertaken immediately following the termination of the representation, but there may be circumstances where this is not possible.

More difficult problems associated with the disposal of former clients' files arise when some period of time has passed since the end of the representation and either the client cannot be located or the client simply declines to respond to the lawyer's request for instructions regarding the disposition of the client's closed files. Because the ethical responsibility to do what is "reasonably practicable to protect a client's interests" persists even in the case of a former client, see Rule 1.16(d), there is no hard and fast rule that resolves this issue in all cases. Many jurisdictions, however, have recommended a minimum time period in which a lawyer should maintain the closed files belonging to his former client.[9]

We believe, absent special circumstances,[10] that a five year retention period beginning at the termination of representation is generally sufficient to protect the client's interests with respect to closed files.[11] Therefore, after unsuccessfully attempting to obtain instructions from the former client or his or her legal representative,[12] a lawyer who concludes that further retention of a former client's closed files is not "reasonably practical to protect a client's interest" may destroy the files five years after the termination of representation. Relying on ABA Informal Op. 1384 (1977), we suggest that the following guidelines should be considered when determining which materials in the closed files should not be destroyed but retained under Rule 1.16(d) beyond the five year period:[13]

- A lawyer should use care not to destroy any document that the lawyer has a legal obligation to preserve.
- A lawyer should use care not to destroy or discard information that the lawyer knows or should know may still be necessary or useful in the assertion or defense of the client's position in a matter for which the applicable statutory limitations period has not expired.
- A lawyer should use care not to destroy or discard original documents provided by the client when they are not otherwise

[6] The availability of such procedures is a matter of state law. See., e.g., N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 22, §1200.46(f-1) (1996)(money payable to a missing client may, by court order, be directed to the state's Lawyers' Fund for Client Protection): 58 Ala. Law. 368 (1997) (valuables belonging to a missing client preferably should be deposited with the court.)

[7] The language in Rule 1.15(b) is significant in this regard because it requires the lawyer to affirmatively "deliver" the valuable property. See D.C. Op. 206. We believe this word choice implies that, absent an agreement to the contrary, the lawyer should be responsible for any reasonable costs associated with promptly returning the valuable property to its owner, or storing the valuables for a reasonable time period should prompt delivery not be possible.

Additionally, we note that the requirement in Rule 1.15(a) that "complete records of such account funds and other property shall be kept by the lawyer and shall be preserved for a period of five years after termination of the representation," refers only to the records of such property described in Rule 1.15(a) that were delivered to the client or other owner. This provision should not be construed as suggesting that the valuable property itself, if unable to be delivered in accordance with Rule 1.15(b), should only be preserved for five years following the termination of representation.

[8] Even if the client chooses to destroy the file, the lawyer still must review the files and withhold any documents that he may have a legal obligation to preserve. See, e.g., Rule 3.4 (lawyer shall not destroy evidence "if the lawyer reasonably should know that the evidence is or may be the subject of discovery or subpoena in any pending or imminent proceeding"); D.C. Op. 119 (1983).

[9] See, e.g., Wis. Ethics Op. E-98-1 (1998) (recommending six year retention period); 58 Ala. Law. 368 (1997) (recommending six year retention policy); N.C. Revised Proposed RPC 209 (1995) (recommending six year minimum retention period for closed files); Ill. Ethics Op. 94-19 (1995) (recommending five year retention period for former client files of legal aide agencies); Md. Ethics Op. 93-39 (1994) (recommending five year retention policy); Mich. Ethics Op. R-12 (1991) (recommending five year retention period for public defenders).

[10] Special circumstances that require a longer retention period may include, but are not limited to: files relating to a matter involving a minor who will not attain the age of majority within the next five years; estate planning files that may need to be maintained until after the death of the client and the expiration of the probate period; or tax files that may need to be retained longer. See Martin, How Long Do I Have to Keep Those Client Files Anyway, 21-Mont. Law. 5 (Sept. 1995); Inge, Handling & Retention of Clients' Documents, Virginia Lawyer 10 (Dec. 1995).

[11] Several state bars apparently chose a retention period consistent with their jurisdictions' preservation period for records of account funds as provided for in rules similar to D.C. Rule 1.15(a). The District of Columbia requires a five year retention period for such records of account funds. Thus, we believe that a five year period for the retention of former client files is sufficient, subject to the limitation described above.

[12] At a minimum, a reasonable attempt to reach the former client should include sending a letter to the client's last known address and "wait[ing] a suitable period of time (perhaps six months)" for a response. Wis. Ethics Op. E-98-1 (1998).

[13] In previous opinions, the Committee, quoting language in former DR 2-110(A)(2) stated that the lawyer must consider whether destruction of documents would be "likely to prejudice the former client's interests." See D.C. Op 206. We believe instead that the new language in Rule 1.16(d) requiring a lawyer to retain or to return to the client or legal representative all materials "reasonably practicable to protect the client's interest" is a more workable standard when applied consistent with the factors described above. Not only does this rule protect the former client's best interest, but it also allows lawyers to account for the practical problems associated with the unnecessary retention of former clients' files.

filed or recorded in the public records.

- Copies of documents that previously have been delivered to the client in the course of representation may be destroyed if reasonable within the context of all the circumstances.

- Documents that are otherwise publicly available to the client may, if reasonable, be destroyed.

- Paper copies of documents that are stored on computer disk, CD-ROM, microfilm or a similar technology may be destroyed, provided the stored information is retrievable and the technology is not rendered obsolete over time by the fact that the equipment or hardware required to retrieve such document is no longer available.

- Any documents that the client would have no reasonable expectation for the lawyer to indefinitely preserve may also be destroyed.

Additionally, the following practical considerations also suggested in ABA Informal Op. 1384 should be noted in undertaking the actual destruction of former client files:

- In disposing of a client's closed file, a lawyer should take care to protect the confidentiality of the contents. See Rule 1.6 Confidentiality of Information (lawyer shall not knowingly reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client).[14]

- A lawyer should preserve, perhaps for an extended time, an index or identification of the files that the lawyer has disposed of or destroyed.[15]

3. Non-Client Materials

Adopting an approach similar to the New York Bar, we believe that absent a legal obligation to the contrary, non-valuable property in the client's closed file that does not clearly or probably belong to the client or a third party may be destroyed without consultation or notice to the client or third party.[16] See New York Ethics 623 (1991). This Committee, however, is not authorized to answer questions of law regarding the ownership of, or the property interest in, the contents of a closed client file. See "Preserving Client Files," 27 Maryland Bar J. 52 (May/June 1994); Kentucky Ethics Op. E-300 (1985); ABA Informal Op. 1384 (1977). This decision should be made by the lawyer in accordance with the applicable laws of the governing jurisdiction.

Costs Related to the Disposal of Client Files

The inquirer here specifically has asked whether he may charge the former client for the direct costs associated with returning closed client files pursuant to the client's directive. We believe the lawyer does not have an affirmative duty to pay for the delivery of files relating to the representation of a former client when the materials in the files are not reasonably necessary to protect the former client's interest.[17] Because the language in Rule 1.16 (d) as distinguished from Rule 1.15(b) obligates a lawyer to merely surrender the client's files, this means, absent an agreement to the contrary, that the lawyer may, in the case of files not necessary to protect a client's interests or otherwise needed for continued representation,[18] make the files available for pick-up or delivery at the client's expense. Similarly, a lawyer instructed by the client to store any such files may charge the client for the costs of such storage.

The second specific inquiry is whether a lawyer may charge the former client for the time and effort expended segregating or reviewing materials in closed files upon termination of representation. As noted in New York Opinion 623, a lawyer has an ethical obligation to inspect the contents of closed files prior to disposition. Nonetheless, review of the files is being undertaken for the benefit of the client and, like other forms of client services, may be compensated by a reasonable fee. Thus, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, a lawyer may charge the client a reasonable fee for the time incurred and other costs associated with file review. This is particularly appropriate when such review is made more complicated by the need to fulfill specific client instructions regarding the treatment of certain materials that may be contained in the client files. Good management practices during the course of the client representation, however, should be employed to minimize time and expense associated with reviewing voluminous client files. For example, detailed records kept during the course of representation by an attorney may prevent the need for a page-by-page review of all the former client's files prior to disposition. If further review is necessary after the conclusion of the representation, non-lawyers working under the supervision of a lawyer also may assist in reviewing files or otherwise preparing them for disposition.

Conclusion

Under Rule 1.15 (b), upon termination of representation, a lawyer should deliver promptly items of intrinsic value that belong to the former client or a third party. If such valuable property cannot be delivered, the lawyer must safeguard the valuables until they can be delivered, or if necessary, utilize available state law procedures for escheat funds or unclaimed property depositories.

Under Rule 1.16 (d), upon termination of representation, a lawyer should notify the client of any other client property in the former client's closed files and ascertain whether to retain, surrender or destroy such materials. In implementing the client's instructions in this regard, absent agreement to the contrary, the lawyer may require the former client to pay the costs of delivery or storage of the files. If the client fails to respond to the lawyer's request for instructions, after five years and a final attempt to notify the client, the attorney may destroy any materials "not reasonably necessary to protect a client's interest."

[14] Merely throwing the client files into the garbage presumably would not protect client confidentiality. On the other hand, shredding, incinerating or employing a commercial service that guarantees confidential disposal of documents would be sufficient. See Montaña, Retention and Destruction of Client Files in a Law Firm, 25 Colo. Law. 47, 48 (Apr. 1996); Martin, supra note 10; Thar, How Long Should You Retain Client Files?, 83 Ill. Bar J. 649, 650 (Dec. 1995).

[15] Such an index should be sufficient to "provide the firm and any other investigators with all pertinent information regarding both protection of the client's interests and the ultimate disposition of the file and its contents." See Montaña, supra note 14. Therefore, in addition to a list of files destroyed, the lawyer should at least retain a copy of the returned notice sent to the former client regarding the disposition of his or her closed files, or if applicable, a letter of consent from the client. See id.

[16] The lawyer still has a duty to preserve the confidentiality of these materials in accordance with D.C. Rule 1.6. See supra note 14.

[17] In the case of materials reasonably necessary to protect the former client's interests, the lawyer may, for clients unable to pay for delivery of the files, have an obligation to pay the delivery charges. Cf. D.C. Rule 1.8(i) (attorney work product lien does not apply when client becomes unable to pay or when withholding work product would present a "significant risk to the client of irreparable harm").

Advising and Billing Clients for Temporary Lawyers

• Whether a lawyer must disclose to the client the use of a temporary lawyer on the client's matter depends on the nature of the work, the reasonable expectations of the client, and the nature of the relationship between the employing lawyer and the "temporary" lawyer. The employing lawyer generally need not disclose to the client the temporary lawyer's cost to the lawyer or law firm, and the lawyer may bill the client for the temporary lawyer's work at any reasonable rate mutually agreeable to the lawyer and client. Agency fees or other fees associated with the hiring of a temporary lawyer may not be billed to the client at greater than the amount actually disbursed or at a specifically agreed to markup.

Inquiry

Ethics opinions from the American Bar Association[1] and from various state jurisdictions,[2] together with recent articles in legal periodicals,[3] indicate that changes in the legal workforce and legal marketplace have increased demand by lawyers and clients for "temporary" lawyers to assist in legal representations on a short-term basis. As this phenomenon has become more common, it has become necessary to apply traditional ethical considerations to a form of practice that may not easily fit into traditional models. Because we believe that there has been some confusion among lawyers and clients as to the ethical questions relating to: (1)requiring disclosure to the client of the use of temporary lawyers, and (2)billing the client at a markup for the temporary lawyer's work, we seek to clarify application of the Rules in the District of Columbia to these issues.

Discussion

A review of the literature on this subject suggests that there is a wide variety of employment arrangements between law firms and "temporary" lawyers. In essence, a temporary lawyer is one who is not a partner and who is employed by a practitioner or a law firm to work on either a specific project or matter or for a fixed or otherwise limited period of time. If the relationship is expected to last indefinitely, regardless of whether it actually does, the employment does not fall within the category that we discuss in this opinion. Nor does this category include part-time lawyers, whose employment may be less than full-time but who work for one law firm exclusively and the duration of whose employment is expected to be indefinite. The temporary lawyer may work for one law firm at a time or for several law firms simultaneously. The temporary lawyer may be hired directly or through an employment agency for a fee, and may be paid directly by the law firm or by the agency.

Temporary lawyering offers benefits to clients as well as to the lawyers who use them. Yet, temporary lawyering also poses a number of complex ethical issues, including those relating to competence, independence, undivided loyalty, conflicts of interest and confidentiality. As noted, in 1988, the American Bar Association issued a formal opinion, 88-356 (Dec.16, 1988), which addressed a number of these issues. Its analysis of the conflicts, undivided loyalty, and confidentiality issues as they pertain to temporary lawyers has met with uniform acceptance and is persuasive. In essence, a temporary lawyer has the same ethical obligations as any other lawyer to be competent to handle the matter tendered, to exercise independent professional judgment, to devote undivided loyalty to the client, and to preserve the client's confidences and secrets. Temporary lawyers and their employing lawyers each have an obligation to ensure that the appropriate standards and requirements are met.

However, the ABA's resolution of the issue relating to client disclosure has not been uniformly followed by courts or ethics committees in subsequent decisions. The ABA opinion concluded that the use of a temporary lawyer had to be disclosed to a client only if the temporary lawyer is not working under the close supervision of a regular lawyer at the firm. This conclusion has been rejected by the Supreme Court of Kentucky and bar associations in Illinois, New York, and Ohio.[4] These authorities have concluded that under the ethical rules in those jurisdictions a lawyer should invariably disclose to a client the proposed use of a temporary lawyer on the client's behalf and receive consent from the client.

In this opinion, we address the question of whether a lawyer must disclose to the client the proposed use of a temporary lawyer on a client's matter and the billing obligations of the lawyer for the temporary lawyer's work and any related agency fees.

Our disciplinary rules do not explicitly address the issues of disclosure and billing practices relating to temporary lawyers. Rather, there are a number of rules that, when considered in concert, in our judgment, lead to a middle ground between the ethical opinions (such as Illinois, New York and Ohio) that require an lawyer to disclose to the client any time that the lawyer proposes to use a temporary lawyer on the client's matter and the ABA opinion which limits disclosure only to the situations where the employing lawyer is not closely supervising the work of the temporary lawyer. In our view, Rules 1.2(a) and 1.4 dictate that the temporary status of a lawyer working on a client's behalf should be disclosed to the client whenever that status may reasonably be likely to be material to some aspect of the representation of the client.

On the other hand, our rules do not require that the client be advised of the temporary lawyer's cost to the lawyer or the law firm. The lawyer may bill the legal services provided by a temporary lawyer at any reasonable rate mutually agreed to by the lawyer and by the client, provided any disbursements associated with hiring a temporary lawyer (such as agency fees, if they are to be billed to the client) are billed at the amount of the disbursement or an agreed upon markup.

1. Disclosing the Use of "Temporaries"

There are a number of rules that bear on this issue. Rule 1.4 requires that in all matters the lawyer must keep the client reasonably informed so the client can make decisions regarding the representation. Similarly, Rule 1.2(a) provides that "a lawyer . . . shall consult with the client as to the means by which [the objectives of the representation] are to be pursued." Rule 7.5(c) provides that a lawyer may not mislead the client as to the lawyer's practice "organization." Finally, Rule 1.5(e)(2) provides that where a lawyer divides the client's fee with any outside lawyer, including a temporary lawyer, disclosure to the client is required. Thus, where there is to be a division of fees (as opposed to the payment of a salary or time-based payment by the law firm to the temporary employee), the rule mandates that "the client [be] advised, in writing, of the identity of the lawyers who will participate in the representation, of the contemplated division of responsibility, and of the effect of the association of lawyers outside the firm on the fee to be charged." The rule also requires that the client consent to the arrangement. See also Rule 1.5, Comment [14].

Read together, these provisions illustrate the requirements that lawyers actively advise clients of critical matters, including important staffing issues, and that they not mislead clients as to the associations in which they practice, including affiliations between themselves or their firms and lawyers outside of the firm hired to work on a particular matter. These rules establish that the client is reasonably entitled to expect that it will be informed of any matter that is material to the representation.

Often the temporary status of a lawyer who has been assigned to work for the client may well be material to the representation. For example, if the client's matter is expected to last for a considerable period of time but the temporary lawyer's involvement is to be limited to a shorter period because her employment is scheduled to end, then the client is entitled to know that fact. The client may not wish to employ and educate a lawyer to work on his case who will not reasonably be expected to be able to finish out her responsibilities regarding the case. Similarly, a client whose adversaries in unrelated matters have retained a particular law firm may well want and expect to know whether a temporary lawyer is currently or has in the recent past worked for that law firm. Finally, when the client is relying on the expertise and talents of the employing lawyer (or partners and associates of the lawyer or the reputation of the law firm) and the temporary lawyer will have important responsibilities and will not be closely supervised by such lawyers, then clearly the employing lawyer has a duty to disclose the temporary status to the client and to obtain consent for the temporary lawyer's work. Indeed, we agree with the ABA opinion that where the work of the temporary lawyer will not be closely supervised by the employing lawyer or law firm, the client should usually be advised of the proposed role to be played by the temporary lawyer and her status as a temporary lawyer. Exceptions would include when the temporary lawyer's work does not require the substantial exercise of judgment, such as the digesting of deposition transcripts.

On the other hand, there are situations in which the temporary status of the lawyer will be irrelevant to the client's interests. For instance, if a temporary lawyer is employed to write a single memorandum on a specific legal subject in the case without any expectation that the temporary lawyer would continue to be involved in the client's matter, then it is irrelevant that the employment of the temporary lawyer is limited in time where that time is as long or longer than the assignment for the client is expected to last.

There may be other circumstances that suggest that a client should be informed of the temporary status of the lawyer. For example, the client may have stated or manifested a desire that it have available to it a regular cadre of lawyers who will develop expertise and be available to work on a series of expected matters. Such a client would not likely wish to employ and educate a lawyer who is unlikely to be available to work on the client's future matters. In such a circumstance, the temporary status of a lawyer would be material to the client and the employing lawyer would have a duty to disclose at the outset of the temporary lawyer's assignment to the project.

In short, in our view, the combination of rules that we have cited mandates that a lawyer should advise and obtain consent from the client whenever the proposed use of a temporary lawyer to perform work on the client's matter appears reasonably likely to be material to the representation or to affect the client's reasonable expectations.[5]

The disclosure of the temporary lawyer's role does not necessarily mean that the financial arrangement between the firm and the temporary lawyer must be disclosed. That is a wholly separate issue to which we now turn.

2. Billing Clients for Temporary Lawyers

The billing for services of a temporary lawyer raises the issue of whether the charge is more akin to seeking reimbursement for out-of-pocket disbursements or to charging for the time of a regular associate, whose salaries and benefits are not required to be, and are not generally, disclosed to the client. If the employing lawyer's payments to a temporary lawyer are considered to be out-of-pocket disbursements, there would have to be disclosure to the client of the costs, which could not be marked up without the client's consent. (See D.C. Bar Op. 185).

All of the precedents in other jurisdictions and our analysis of the D.C. Rules convince us that the charges to be billed to the client for the services of a temporary lawyer are, like the services of a regular associate, a matter to be determined by mutual agreement between the lawyer and client. We find that fees generated by a temporary lawyer are, for purposes of the disciplinary rules, equivalent to fees generated by any other lawyer in a law firm working on the client's matter. Accordingly, the only disciplinary restriction on the fee billed to the client for the temporary lawyer's time is that it be "reasonable." See Rule 1.5(a).

No court decision or bar association opinion has suggested that the employing law firm must disclose to the client the salary it pays to the temporary lawyer or the markup the firm charges the client for the temporary lawyer's time. It is, of course, usually the case that the law firm does not disclose to clients the compensation arrangements of partners, contract partners, of counsel, or regular associates. We see in the rules no reason for a distinction for the compensation paid to a temporary lawyer, unless there is an actual division of fees. As noted, when there is an actual division of fees, Rule 1.5(e) requires notice to the client and the client's consent. In the absence of fee splitting, the only requirement is that the billing rate charged by the firm for the temporary lawyer's time be reasonable and be agreed to by the client. If there is in fact an agreed division of a client's payment for the services of a temporary lawyer between the temporary lawyer and the employing the law firm, we believe that the requirements of 1.5(e), including notice and the client's consent, must be met. The payment of a salary to a temporary lawyer, of course, just like the payment of the salary of a regular employee would not be considered a division of fees.

[5] Because we recognize that there may be different considerations relating to temporary nonlawyers, employed to assist a lawyer, our analysis and this opinion is limited to temporary lawyers.

Finally, in addition to the charges incurred by the law firm for work done by a temporary lawyer, in some instances the firm might make payments to a "placement agency" or other referral firm in connection with finding and hiring the temporary lawyer. As the ABA formal opinion concludes, these expenses are disbursements and are not salary for purposes of billing the client. In accordance with Rule 7.1's requirements that a lawyer not make false or misleading statements about the lawyer's services and Rule 8.4 prohibiting a lawyer from any misrepresentations, if these disbursements are billed to the client, they must be limited to no more than the actual disbursement amount or any mark-up that is specifically disclosed to and agreed to by the client. See also D.C. Bar Op.185 (1987) (finding that under the former Code of Professional Responsibility, provisions regarding integrity and honesty required that disbursements for third party services be billed to clients at cost). The payment to the agency may not be based on the amount of the fees paid by the client to the firm for the legal services rendered because no fee splitting is permitted with non-lawyers. See Rule5.4(a).

Inquiry No. 97-3-15
Adopted: September 15, 1998

Opinion No. 285

Nonlawyer Former Government Employee Working for a Lawyer

- A lawyer who employs a nonlawyer former government employee must screen that person from matters that are the same as, or substantially related to, matters on which the nonlawyer assisted government lawyers in representing a government client. In addition, Rules 4.4 and 8.4 preclude the lawyer from inducing the former government employee to reveal certain other types of confidential information.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.11 (Successive Government and Private Employment)
- Rule 4.4 (Respect for Rights of Third Persons)
- Rule 5.3 (Responsibilities Regarding Nonlawyer Assistants)
- Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Inquiry

An ethics official in a department of the federal government inquires about "the application of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct to law firms that employ or use nonlawyers who are former employees of the Department . . . ." A "principal concern is the risk that confidential government information may be disclosed or abused," particularly when former government employees work as consultants in legal matters related to their former government duties. In posing this general concern, the inquirer invites comment on four different scenarios: (1) the nonlawyer worked directly with government attorneys on a matter in which the law firm is now involved; (2) the former employee had no direct contact with government lawyers but was exposed to confidential government information; (3) the government is not a party to a case but still may be harmed by the abuse of confidential government information; and (4) the consultant formerly participated in government policy making.

Discussion

We emphasize at the outset that the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct have no direct application to the conduct of nonlawyers.[1] In some instances, however, the Rules require lawyers to be responsible for the conduct of their nonlawyer assistants. For example, Rule 5.3, in both subsections (a) and (b), requires a lawyer to make reasonable efforts to ensure "that the [nonlawyer's] conduct is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyer." Moreover, under certain circumstances, a lawyer will be responsible for the conduct of a nonlawyer employee or associate that would be a violation of the rules of professional conduct if engaged in by a lawyer. Rule 5.3 (c). Rule 8.4 (a) also provides that it is professional misconduct for a lawyer to "violate or attempt to violate the rules of professional conduct . . . through the acts of another."

Thus the professional obligations of lawyers provide a necessary background for our analysis. Although there is nothing improper per se about a lawyer communicating with a former employee of an opponent, see ABA Formal Op. 91-359 (1991), it is important to consider the rules dealing with "side-switching" and imputed disqualification of lawyers. The government lawyer who moves to the private sector is precluded from accepting employment "in connection with a matter which is the same as, or substantially related to, a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee," Rule 1.11 (a), and he must be "screened" from any such matters being handled by his law firm. Rule 1.11 (c). See generally D.C. Bar Op. No. 279 (1998) (discussing availability of screening as a cure for imputed disqualification).

Although rules requiring screening do not apply by their own terms to nonlawyers, screening has often been required when nonlawyers move from one law firm to another.[2] For example, the ABA Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility considered the ethical issues presented when a paralegal who worked on litigation matters for one law firm was hired by an opposing law firm and concluded that screening would be adequate to avoid imputed disqualification of the new employer. ABA Informal Op. 88-1526 (1988). The official synopsis explains:

> A law firm that employs a nonlawyer who formerly was employed by another firm may continue representing clients whose

[1] The primary restrictions on former officers and employees of the federal government are found in the Ethics in Government Act, see, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 207, which applies to lawyers and nonlawyers alike. This committee has no authority to interpret the requirements of this law and similar laws.

[2] We do not address the related issues that would be presented if the former government employee were now a lawyer. See D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct 1.6(g) and 1.10(b).

> interests conflict with the interests of clients of the former employer on whose matters the nonlawyer has worked, as long as the employing firm screens the nonlawyer from information about or participating in matters involving those clients and strictly adheres to the screening process described in this opinion and as long as no information relating to the representation of the clients of the former employer is revealed by the nonlawyer to any person in the employing firm. In addition, the nonlawyer's former employer must admonish the nonlawyer against revelation of information relating to the representation of clients of the former employer.

Looking for guidance to Model Rule 5.3's requirement that supervising lawyers make reasonable efforts to ensure that the conduct of their nonlawyer employees "is compatible with the professional obligations of the lawyer," the ABA Committee nevertheless recognized that "[i]t is important that nonlawyer employees have as much mobility in employment opportunity as possible consistent with the protection of clients' interests. . . . Accordingly, any restrictions on the nonlawyer's employment should be held to the minimum necessary to protect confidentiality of client information." The Committee noted as well that the standards for screening adopted in its opinion "apply equally to all nonlawyer personnel in a law firm who have access to material information relating to the representation of clients and extend also to agents who technically may be independent contractors, such as investigators."[3]

In Opinion No. 227 our committee also addressed the case of a paralegal who moved from one law firm to another. The new firm was handling a matter "substantially related" to one on which the paralegal had worked at the former firm. Applying Rule 5.3, we concluded that the new firm must not exploit any confidences or secrets[4] that the paralegal had obtained during former employment but could avoid imputed disqualification by "screening" the paralegal from that matter. "In the case of migratory nonlawyers generally, we approve[d] the pro-screening approach reflected in ABA Informal Op. 88-1526."

Many other legal ethics committees have also required screening when nonlawyers move from one law firm to another. See, e.g., Prof. Resp. Comm., Chicago Bar Ass'n, Op. 93-5 (1993) (screening applied to secretary who moved from one law firm to another); Michigan Ethics Op. RI-284 (1996)(screening applied to secretary); Michigan Ethics Op. RI-115 (1992) (screening applied to secretary); New Jersey S. Ct. Advisory Comm. on Prof. Ethics Op. 665 (1992) (screening applied to paralegal); North Carolina Ethics Op. RPC 176 (1994) (screening applied to paralegal); South Carolina Bar Ethics Advisory Op. 93-29 (1993) (screening applied to secretary).

We similarly conclude that a screen must be used when the nonlawyer former government employee worked directly with government attorneys on a matter which is the same as, or is substantially related to, a matter in which his law firm employer is now involved. However, this conclusion is based on the fact that the nonlawyer worked directly with government attorneys who were representing a client. The obligation to preserve client confidences and secrets has no application if there is no underlying lawyer-client relationship. Thus, Rule 1.6 does not govern the situation described by the inquirer where the former employee did not work with government lawyers, but was otherwise exposed during his employment to confidential government information.[5]

Nor is there any bar to employment (or obligation of screening) under the Rules when the former government employee participated in government policy making. It is quite common for lawyers and nonlawyers alike to use expertise acquired in government employment to enhance their marketability in the private sector. "The making of rules of general applicability and the establishment of general policy will ordinarily not be a 'matter' within the meaning of Rule 1.11." D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.11, Comment [3]. Similarly, matters will be deemed "substantially related" "only if specific information (as distinct from general agency expertise or contacts) that a former government lawyer may have had access to in one matter is likely to be useful in a subsequent matter . . . ." Brown v. District of Columbia Board of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37, 48 (D.C. 1984) (en banc) (emphasis added). Thus, neither a lawyer nor a nonlawyer will be disqualified simply because he or she participated in government policy making or is intimately familiar with the workings of a government agency.

In limited circumstances, however, the Rules of Professional Conduct may preclude the law firm that currently employs the nonlawyer former government employee from inducing him or her to violate obligations of confidentiality not derived from assisting government lawyers in representing a client. Rule 4.4 provides in pertinent part that, "[i]n representing a client, a lawyer shall not . . . use methods of obtaining evidence that violate the legal rights of [a third] person." We have not previously interpreted this provision, and there is no helpful commentary in our rules, but there is some explanation of its scope in opinions from other jurisdictions.

For example, in Formal Op. 91-359 (1991), the ABA Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility concluded that Rule 4.2 does not preclude contact with former employees of an opposing corporate party. The committee cautioned, however, that the attorney "must be careful not to seek to induce the former employee to violate the privilege attaching to attorney-client communications to the extent his or her communications as a former employee with his or her former employee's counsel are protected by the privilege . . . . Such an attempt could violate Rule 4.4 (requiring respect for the rights of third persons)." See also ABA Formal Op. 97-408, n.14 (1997) ("Gaining from a former government employee information that the lawyer knows is legally protected from disclosure for use in litigation nevertheless may vio-

[3] Similarly, the conclusions we reach in this opinion do not depend on there being an employer/employee relationship between the nonlawyer and the lawyer, but apply equally when the nonlawyer former government employee has been hired as a consultant by a lawyer opposing the government.

[4] Rule 1.6(b) explains that the term "confidence" refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege. The term "secret" is defined much more broadly to refer to "other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client."

[5] In many cases brought to our attention by the inquirer, disqualification or screening was required only because the nonlawyer had worked directly with lawyers in his or her former employment. See, e.g., Camden v. State of Maryland, 910 F. Supp. 1115 (D.Md. 1996) (lawyers disqualified because they "had listened in at the legal confessional"; former government employee had been extensively exposed to confidential client information of the other interested party); MMR/Wallace Power & Industrial v. Thames Assoc., 764 F. Supp. 712 (D. Conn. 1991) (attorneys disqualified; nonlawyer who had consulted on litigation, had extensive contact with plaintiff's counsel, and had access to confidential litigation materials switched sides and become a trial consultant for defendants); Kapco Mfg. Co. v. C & O Enter., 637 F. Supp. 1231 (N.D. Ill. 1985) (disqualified denied; law firm secretary/office manager who moved to opposing law firm had been effectively screened); Williams v. TWA, 588 F. Supp. 1037 (W.D. Mo. 1984) (plaintiffs' law firm disqualified because they also represented a client who, while employed by defendant, assisted one of defendant's attorneys with the defense of plaintiffs' claims and had access to confidential information about these cases).

late Model Rules 4.4, 8.4(c) and 8.4(d) . . . ."); Conn. Bar Ass'n, Informal Op. 96-4 (1996) (Rule 4.4 precludes lawyer from reviewing and copying psychiatric records of client's ex-wife made confidential by statute); Pa. Bar Ass'n, Informal Op. 93-135 (1993) (Rule 4.4 prohibits lawyer from conducting surreptitious inspection of psychiatric records of major witness against client; although information would be very useful in impeaching witness, Pennsylvania caselaw makes such records absolutely confidential); New Jersey S. Ct. Advisory Comm. on Prof. Ethics, Op. 680 (1995) (if lawyer had surreptitiously copied confidential documents in possession of attorneys for adverse party, and items of evidence were involved, it would constitute a violation of Rule 4.4). While we do not believe that Rule 4.4 precludes a lawyer from attempting to learn all information which the government would deem confidential, it does preclude attempts to induce a present or former employee to reveal information known to the lawyer to be protected from disclosure by statute or a well-established common law privilege.

Conclusion

A lawyer must screen a nonlawyer former government employee from matters the same as, or substantially related to, matters on which he or she assisted government lawyers in representing a client. On the other hand, the nonlawyer will not be disqualified from working on a matter simply because he or she is intimately familiar with the workings of a government agency or participated in relevant government policy making. Rules 4.4 and 8.4 preclude attempts to induce the former government employee to reveal information made confidential by statute or a well-established common law privilege.

Inquiry No 97-2-8
Adopted: November 17, 1998

Opinion No. 286

Contingent Referral Fees

• A payment by a lawyer to another person for the referral of legal business, which is contingent on the lawyer's receipt of fees from the referred legal business and is tied to the amount of those fees, constitutes the sharing of legal fees. Such sharing can only be done with another lawyer, and only if certain client disclosure and other conditions are satisfied.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.5(e) (Restrictions on Division of Fees Between Lawyers Not In the Same Firm)
• Rule 5.4(a) (Lawyer may not Share Legal Fees with a Nonlawyer)
• Rule 7.1(b)(5) (Consideration May Be Paid by a Lawyer to an Intermediary for the Referral of Legal Business)

Inquiry

Legal ethics rules in the District of Columbia have long contained restrictions on the sharing of fees by one lawyer with another lawyer, and prohibitions on the sharing of legal fees with nonlawyers and on the payment by a lawyer of something of value to another person for the referral of legal work. Under DR 2-107 of the former Code of Professional Responsibility, a division of fees between lawyers not in the same firm could only be made in proportion to the services performed and responsibility assumed by each lawyer; under DR 3-102, legal fees could not be shared with nonlawyers (except under one of several very narrow exceptions concerning the estate of a deceased lawyer and law firm retirement plans). And under DR 2-103(C), payments to others for the referral of legal business could only be made if for advertising or for the fees of a lawyer referral service.

Most of these restrictions continue in the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct ("the Rules"), which became effective in 1991. Rule 1.5(e) establishes conditions under which lawyers not in the same firm may divide legal fees between themselves, and Rule 5.4(a) generally prohibits the sharing of legal fees with nonlawyers. Regarding payments to others for the referral of legal business, the Rules liberalized some of the restrictions of the former Code, as they now permit a lawyer to pay consideration to a person for the referral of business to the lawyer, subject to certain disclosure obligations to the client. This provision, contained in Rule 7.1(b)(5), is unique to the District of Columbia.[1]

In this inquiry, we address a question which touches each of these Rules – whether a payment to a lawyer or nonlawyer for the referral of legal business, which payment is contingent on, and tied to, the lawyer's receipt of revenue from the referred matter, is a sharing of legal fees governed by Rules 5.4(a) and 1.5(e) (and therefore permitted only between lawyers), or is a Rule 7.1(b)(5) referral fee (and therefore payable to anyone). We addressed contingent referral fees in an earlier Opinion (No. 253), where we noted a "tension" between the fee-sharing prohibition of Rule 5.4(a) and the referral fee authorization of Rule 7.1(b)(5). In that Inquiry, this Committee was presented with a situation in which a law firm proposed to pay an insurance company for clients referred to the firm. The payment — a pre-determined specified sum — would be due on settlement or judgment in the case.

In Opinion 253, we concluded that such an arrangement was permissible under the Rules of Professional Conduct. The apparent tension or conflict between the fee-sharing prohibition of Rule 5.4 and the referral fee authorization of Rule 7.1(b)(5) was resolved in the Committee's observation that Rule 7.1(b)(5):

> was intended to be a narrow exception to Rule 5.4. Therefore, only those lawyers who disclose to their clients the information required under Rule 7.1(b)(5) can escape Rule 5.4's general ban against the sharing of legal fees with nonlawyers.

After careful consideration of Opinion 253, the Committee has decided to issue this Opinion to clarify the reach of Rule 7.1(b)(5) and the status of contingent referral fees under the Rules.

Discussion

The central factor that determines the legality of contingent referral payments is whether they are payments to an intermediary for the referral of legal business (permitted under Rule 7.1(b)(5) to any recipient) or the division or sharing of a legal fee (lawful under Rule 5.4(a) only if between lawyers and subject to the requirements of Rule 1.5(e) if between lawyers practicing in different firms).

A non-contingent payment for the referral of legal business, i.e., one that is paid regardless of the success or outcome of the representation, is not a division of legal fees. Such payments are simply part of a lawyer's marketing expenses, payable whether or not they produce revenue for the lawyer. Such payments, once prohibited in the District of Columbia (and still prohibited in most other jurisdictions), are lawful under Rule 7.1(b)(5) of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct. We believe that such non-contingent payments – such as a cash payment or gift certificate given to a person for each potential client referred to the lawyer —are the ones contemplated by that Rule.[2] Because they are like payments from the general funds of the lawyer for advertising or other marketing expenses, and not from the proceeds of a particular representation, such payments (whether made to a lawyer or nonlawyer) do not run afoul of Rules 1.5(e) and 5.4(a) because they do not involve a division or sharing of legal fees.[3]

[1] The ABA Model Rules, in Rule 7.2(c), are more akin to the District of Columbia's former DR 2-103(C), permitting only payments for advertisements and lawyer referral service membership.

On the other hand, the payment of a contingent referral fee, tied to the amount of the lawyer's fees or recovery on behalf of the client, is not a marketing expense unconnected to the realization of income; rather, it is more akin to a commission, which directly reduces the fee income of the lawyer making the payment. The lawyer making such a payment is, in practical effect, paying some of the proceeds of a specific legal representation to another person.

When so viewed, such a payment is a form of fee sharing, which is prohibited except as between lawyers and except as the requirements of Rule 1.5(e) are satisfied. There is direct support for this conclusion in Florida Bar Professional Ethics Committee Opinion 89-4 (a commission paid by a law firm to a marketing agent tied to legal fees derived from referred business is an unethical division of fees), and indirect support in Son v. Margulius, Mallios, Davis, Rider & Tomar, 709 A. 2d 112 (Md. 1998); Trotter v. Nelson, 684 N.E. 2d 1150 (Ind. 1997); In Re Drakulich, 908 P. 2d 709 (Nev. 1995); and Texas State Bar v. Tinning, 875 S.W. 2d 403 (Tex. App. 1994).

We conclude, therefore, that a payment to a nonlawyer for the referral of business, tied to the amount of revenue received by the lawyer from the referred business, is not permitted under the Rules. If paid to a lawyer, the payment must conform to the requirements of Rule 1.5(e).

[2] Subpart (b)(5) of Rule 7.1 was added by the Board of Governors of the District of Columbia Bar to the recommendations of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct Committee. No similar provision was contained in the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct. In fact, Model Rule 7.2 (not adopted in the District of Columbia) generally prohibits the payment of anything of value to a person for referring legal business to a lawyer.

[3] Under some circumstances, the referral fee could be passed on to the client, a circumstance which would have to be included in the required disclosure under Rule 7.1(b)(5).

We do not believe that Rule 7.1(b) (5) is an exception to the long-standing prohibition of the sharing of legal fees with nonlawyers, because it does not concern the sharing of legal fees. The Rule did mark a departure from prior ethics law in this jurisdiction, but only in its authorization of certain payments to others for the referral of legal business to a lawyer. When such payments are not contingent on and tied to the receipt of fee revenue by the lawyer, they are not a sharing of legal fees. Under this view of Rule 7.1(b) (5), there is no tension with Rule 5.4, as we do not interpret the former to apply to contingent referral payments to nonlawyers.

Thus, the conclusion (discussed above) and much of the discussion of Opinion No. 253 remain undisturbed. We only reach that conclusion by the reasoning of this Opinion, i.e., that the payment of a fixed sum as a referral fee is not the sharing of a legal fee.

Ex Parte Contact With Former Employees of Party-Opponents

- A lawyer may contact unrepresented former employees of a party-opponent without obtaining consent from that party irrespective of the position formerly held by the ex-employee in the opposing organization. Prior to any substantive communication, the lawyer must disclose to the former employee the lawyer's identity and the fact that the lawyer represents a party adverse to the ex-employee's former employer. During the communication the lawyer may not solicit privileged information of the party opponent.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 4.2 (Communication Between Lawyer and Opposing Parties)
- Rule 4.3 (Dealing with Unrepresented Person)
- Rule 4.4 (Respect for Rights of Third Parties)

Inquiry

The inquirer is a lawyer representing a client in an action against a corporation. He has asked the Committee whether, and under what circumstances, he may contact former employees of his party-opponent without first obtaining that party's consent.

Discussion

District of Columbia Rule of Professional Conduct 4.2 (a) generally prohibits communication about the subject of a representation between a lawyer and a party known to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has prior consent of opposing counsel to the communication or is authorized by law to do so. The Rule does not expressly address the propriety of ex parte contact between a lawyer and a former employee of a party-opponent. The provisions and commentary of Rule 4.2, however, lead to the conclusion that ex parte contact between a lawyer and a former employee of a party-opponent is permitted, subject to observance of certain safeguards.

Significantly, Rule 4.2 does not bar all communications between a lawyer and nonparty employees of an opposing party. Rather, only communications with nonparty employees who have the authority to bind the opposing party in the matter are proscribed. Toward that end, Rule 4.2 provides in pertinent part:

> (b) During the course of representing a client, a lawyer may communicate about the subject of the representation with a nonparty employee of the opposing party without obtaining the consent of that party's lawyer. However, prior to communicating with any such nonparty employee, a lawyer must disclose to such employee both the lawyer's identity and the fact that the lawyer represents a party with a claim against the employee's employer.
> (c) For purposes of this rule, the term "party" includes any person, including an employee of a party organization, who has the authority to bind a party organization as to the representation to which the communication relates.

D.C. Rule 4.2 (1996).[1] Comment [3] to Rule 4.2 elucidates the meaning of "person

[1] D.C. has adopted a unique version of Model Rule of Professional Conduct 4.2. The Model Rule, in force and effect in a majority of states, does not contain sections (b) and (c), providing only that "[I]n representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate about the subject of the representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the consent of the other lawyer or is authorized by law to do so." See ABA Formal Op. 91-359 (1991) (Rule 4.2 prohibits contacts by a lawyer with employee of an opposing corporate party if the employee (a) has "a managerial

... who has the authority to bind a party organization," providing that "[t]he Rule does not prohibit a lawyer from communicating with employees of an organization who have the authority to bind the organization with respect to the matters underlying the representation if they do not also have authority to make binding decisions regarding the representation itself. A lawyer may therefore communicate with such persons without first notifying the organization's lawyer." As a result, Rule 4.2 prohibits communication only with those employees of a party opponent who hold or exercise the power or authority to decide, by conduct or admission, the organization's position(s) in the matter.

Rule 4.2 effectively memorialized the view expressed in Opinion 129. In that Opinion — decided under DR7-104, the predecessor to Rule 4.2. — this Committee found that the prohibition against communication with adverse parties did not prohibit contact with current employees who could not bind an organization with regard to the litigation. See D.C. Bar Op. 129 (1983). In Opinion 129, and before that in Opinion 80, we noted that several policies supported the prohibition of contact with adverse parties:

> (1) the presumed imbalance of skill between a lawyer and a layman, giving one an unfair advantage over the other; (2) the risk that an uncounseled party will make admissions or concessions or reach judgments from which his lawyer could protect him; and (3) the risk that a lawyer might be compelled to become a witness in a case or forced to choose between advancing his client's interests and not overreaching in communicating with an unprotected adverse party.

In both Opinions, we balanced these policies with the broad policy that litigants should have access to all relevant, non-privileged information regarding a matter and, derivatively, lawyers should be allowed to find facts as quickly and inexpensively as possible. We found that the potential dangers of ex parte contacts were outweighed by the additional burden to litigants of an expansive prohibition on ex parte contacts with all employees of an adverse party. This interpretation was subsequently embodied in the narrow restriction of Rule 4.2.

A similar approach is warranted for former organizational employees. Indeed, neither the text nor the underlying policies of Rule 4.2 provide a basis for extending its prohibition to former employees. Because former employees, as a general rule, cannot bind the organization by decisionmaking, by conduct, or by admission with respect to a pending or prospective matter, Rule 4.2 does not prohibit ex parte contacts with these individuals. That former employees may possess information prejudicial to their former employer, or may have engaged in conduct creating potential liability for that employer, is a matter of historical fact. It does not, without more, place those former employees in a position to bind the organization in the manner contemplated by Rule 4.2.

Consistent with this approach, a majority of state and federal courts that have considered this issue have concluded that ex parte contact with former employees of a party opponent is permissible. See, e.g., Spencer v. Steinman, 179 F.R.D. 484, 491 (E.D. Pa. 1998); H.B.A. Management Inc., v. Estate of Schwartz, 693 So. 2d 541, 543-46 (Fla. 1997); Aiken v. Business and Industry Health Group, Inc., 885 F. Supp. 1474, 1478-79 (D. Kan. 1995); United States v. Western Electric Co., 1990 WL 39129, at *I (D.D.C. Feb. 28, 1990) (interpreting Model Rule 4.2); Wright v. Group Health Hospital, 691 P.2d 564, 569 (Wash. 1984). The ABA has also interpreted Model Rule 4.2 to permit ex parte contacts with former employees. See ABA Formal Op. 91-359 (1991).

Consideration of the policies underlying Rule 4.2 supports the conclusion that lawyers may make ex parte contact with unrepresented former employees of party-opponents. As the ABA noted in Formal Opinion 95-396 (1995), Rule 4.2 is not designed to protect against disclosure of prejudicial facts. Instead, the Rule is targeted at protecting the attorney-client relationship and safeguarding against a litigant being injured by binding ex parte disclosures. Since a principal purpose of Rule 4.2 is to foster and protect the lawyer-client relationship, not to restrict the flow of relevant, non-privileged information, interpreting Rule 4.2 to forbid ex parte contacts with former employees would require parties to spend more time, money, and resources by utilizing formal discovery to obtain information that could have been obtained informally. Such an expansive reading of Rule 4.2 would place too heavy a burden on the fact gathering process without protecting any legitimate interest sought to be safeguarded by the Rule.

At the same time, a lawyer does not have carte blanche with respect to the scope of communications with former employees of a party opponent. The most significant concern in such communications is the possibility that the former employees were privy to privileged information and that, without counsel present, they might be inclined to reveal this information to the opposing lawyer.[2] This concern is serious and a lawyer may not solicit information when communicating with former employees of a party-opponent that is reasonably known or which reasonably should be known to the lawyer to be protected from disclosure by statute or by an established evidentiary privilege.[3] We base this conclusion on Rule 4.4, which requires lawyers to refrain from using "methods of obtaining evidence that violate the legal rights of [third parties]." These rights include the former employer's right to protect its privileged information from disclosure.[4] responsibility" on behalf of the employer-corporation, or (b) is one whose act or admission in connection with the matter that is the subject of the potential communicating lawyer's representation may be imputed to the corporation, or (c) is one whose "statement may constitute an admission" by the corporation).

[2] See., e.g. Zachair, Ltd., v. Driggs, 965 F. Supp. 741 (D.Md. 1997), aff'd, 141 F.3d 1162 (4th Cir. 1998) (disqualifying counsel for, inter alia, violating Maryland Rule 4.2 by engaging in ex parte contact with the former general counsel of a corporate defendant whom counsel knew or should have known possessed substantial privileged information); Camden v. State of Maryland, 910 F.Supp. 1115 (D.Md. 1996) (holding under Maryland Rule 4.2 that a lawyer may not have ex parte contact with the former employee of an organizational party when the lawyer knows that the former employee was extensively exposed to privilege information.)

[3] In Op. 256 we concluded that where a lawyer receives documents containing client secrets or confidences of an adversary, and knows prior to examining the documents that the disclosure was inadvertent, Rule 1.15(a) requires the receiving lawyer to return the documents to the sending lawyer; the lawyer also violates Rule 8.4(c) if the lawyer reads and/or uses the material. Whether a lawyer has received a party opponent's privileged information during communications with a former employee may be considerably more ambiguous than is the case with the receipt of privileged documents from opposing counsel, which itself is not always a model of clarity. In situations where counsel knows that a former employee's disclosure of clearly privileged information is not authorized by the entity holding the privilege, however, a lawyer may violate Rule 8.4(c) if the lawyer uses the privileged information.

[4] For example, in Formal Op. 91-359 (1991), the ABA Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility concluded that Rule 4.2 does not preclude contact with former employees of an opposing party. The committee cautioned, however, that the attorney "must be careful not to seek to induce the former employee to violate the privilege attaching to attorney-client communications to the extent his or her communications as a former employee with his or her former employee's counsel are protected by the privilege. . . . Such an attempt could violate Rule 4.4 (re-

In order to reduce the possibility that protected information is revealed in the ex parte communication or the occurrence of other hazards that Rule 4.2 is designed to prevent, a lawyer must at the outset disclose the lawyer's identity and the fact that the lawyer represents a party that is adverse to the ex-employee's former employer in pending or prospective litigation. Comment [3] to Rule 4.2 states that it is preferable to give this notice in writing. Rule 4.3 reinforces this protection by requiring the lawyer to take affirmative steps to avoid misunderstandings and assure that the former employee correctly understands the lawyer's role in the matter.

Suffice it to say, a lawyer should proceed cautiously in communicating with former employees of a party opponent. Certain former employees may be involved on an ongoing basis with the matter concerning which the contact is sought, or they may be engaged, on the basis of their knowledge and experience, to consult with organizational management or with legal counsel in the matter. Of course, if the former employees are represented by their own counsel in the matter, the bar against communication without consent of that counsel applies unless that communication is authorized by law.

Conclusion

A lawyer may communicate with unrepresented former employees of a party opponent without consent from that party. At the outset, the lawyer must make the disclosures required by Rule 4.2. Throughout the communication, the lawyer must follow the dictates of Rules 4.3 and 4.4.

Compliance with Subpoena from Congressional Subcommittee to Produce Lawyer's Files Containing Client Confidences or Secrets

• In response to a Congressional subcommittee's subpoena for a lawyer's files pertaining to the representation of a current or former client and containing confidences or secrets that the client does not wish to disclose, the lawyer has a professional responsibility to seek to quash or limit the subpoena on all available, legitimate grounds to protect confidential documents and client secrets. If, thereafter, the Congressional subcommittee overrules these objections, orders production of the documents and threatens to hold the lawyer in contempt absent compliance with the subpoena, then, in the absence of a judicial order forbidding the production, the lawyer is permitted, but not required, by the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct to produce the subpoenaed documents. A directive of a Congressional subcommittee accompanied by a threat of fines and imprisonment pursuant to federal criminal law satisfies the standard of "required by law" as that phrase is used in D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct 1.6(d)(2)(A).

Inquiry

The inquirer, a managing partner of a law firm in the District of Columbia, requests an opinion regarding the propriety of his compliance with a Congressional subcommittee subpoena duces tecum for the firm's files and records relating to its representation of a client.[1] The inquirer seeks to know how far he and the firm must go to meet their obligations to protect the client's confidences under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. Implicitly, he raises the question of whether a lawyer must stand in contempt of a subcommittee and face the prospect of a criminal conviction, imprisonment and fines in order to vindicate the client's interest in confidentiality.

[1] Throughout this opinion, we refer to actions by a Congressional subcommittee since these are the facts with which we are presented. However, the same reasoning and principles would apply to the appropriate response of a lawyer to subpoenas and directives of a Congressional committee, a House of Congress, or the full Congress.

The Congressional subcommittee issued a subpoena duces tecum requiring the firm to produce "all records that relate to the services, efforts, lobbying or other work undertaken or provided, or to be undertaken or provided" to one of the firm's clients. The subpoena also demanded all records relating to the fees the firm charged that client, "including but not limited to all records that relate to the nature, negotiation, agreement, billing, payment, structure, purpose or allocation of such fee."

The law firm and the client maintain that the subpoenaed documents contain client confidences and secrets. The law firm filed written objections to the request and advised the client of the subpoena. The subcommittee overruled the objections and demanded compliance with the subpoena. When threatened by the chairman with contempt of Congress and possible criminal prosecution and sanctions, the subpoenaed partner produced the documents, despite protests and a threat of suit by the client.

Even though this particular matter has been concluded, we address the ethical issues arising from these facts because of the disturbing increase in incidences of Congressional subpoenas being sent to lawyers in their professional capacity seeking information relating to the activities of their clients and legal services provided to them.

Relying on prior interpretations of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct and its predecessor, the Code of Professional Responsibility, in the analogous area of compliance with judicial and administrative subpoenas to lawyers for confidential client information, we conclude that a lawyer has an obligation to make all appropriate objections to the Congressional subpoena. We also suggest that the lawyer may be well advised to discuss with the client the opportunities and prospects of seeking a court order to prevent disclosure. Thereafter, if the subcommittee overrules the objections, orders the documents be produced and threatens to hold the lawyer in contempt for failure to comply, and if no judicial intervention is obtained by the client, then, we conclude, the lawyer may comply with the directive as if it were a court order to comply with a subpoena after all appeals have been exhausted.

Discussion

1. A Lawyer May Disclose Client Confidences or Secrets Against the Client's Will When Required by Law or Court Order

Under Rule 1.6(d)(2)(A) of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct ("Rules" or "Rule"), a lawyer may reveal a client confidence or secrets only when expressly permitted by these rules or when "required by law or court order." See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [10]. Client confidences are protected by state and federal law as set forth in the governing attorney-client privilege and the work-product doctrine as well as by the ethical constraints on lawyers imposed by the D.C. Rules on confidentiality. See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [5]. The rules and the comments reflect the critical importance that preserving client confidences and secrets has to the attorney-client relationship and to the ability of the client to receive effective legal advice and representation. Accordingly, the comments to the Rules recognize that the doctrines of privilege and confidentiality "apply in judicial and other proceedings in which a lawyer may be called as a witness or otherwise required to produce evidence concerning a client." Id. They also recognize that the rule applies to "all information gained in the course of the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or would . . . likely . . . be detrimental to the client . . . ." See Rule 1.6, Cmt. [6].

Thus, the ethical obligation of the lawyer to take all necessary steps to protect client information is broader than the confines of the attorney-client privilege or the work product doctrine. As stated by a leading legal ethicist, "[e]xtending a reach that includes all of those protections – and encompassing much of what they omit – is the professional regulation requiring a lawyer to keep a vast array of client information confidential and not to use it against the interests of the client. We will call that obligation the principle of confidentiality." Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics § 6.7.1, at 296 (Practitioner's ed. 1986). Echoing the language in our own commentary, Professor Wolfram states that this principle of confidentiality applies in all contexts, including legislative hearings. Id. § 6.3, at 255. We agree and believe that a lawyer's obligations to protect client confidences in the Congressional context are the same as those in the judicial or administrative context.

This Committee has repeatedly addressed the lawyer's obligations to maintain the client's confidences and secrets in judicial and administrative proceedings. See, e.g., D.C. Bar Ops. 214, 180, 124, 99 and 14. These opinions essentially hold that a lawyer has an ethical obligation to raise all available, legitimate objections to a judicial or administrative subpoena for protected information and, as reflected in Comment [26] to Rule 1.6, either to make "every reasonable effort" to appeal an order demanding compliance with a subpoena or at least to notify the client of the order and provide the client every opportunity to challenge it. On the other hand, our opinions and all of the other authorities we can identify bearing on the question suggest that a lawyer is not required to stand in contempt of a court order and risk criminal prosecution in order to protect the subpoenaed information.

For example, in D.C. Bar Opinion 83, we stated that a lawyer "is not obliged to run the risk of being held in contempt of court because of the client's desire that confidences and secrets not be disclosed." Similarly, in D.C. Bar Opinion 14, we stated that "the attorney is . . . free to comply with whatever directive the trial court gives." In D.C. Bar Opinion 214, we stated "we conclude that the law firm . . . may comply with a final judicial order enforcing an IRS summons without seeking appellate review of that order, but only after giving its client notice of the court's order and a reasonable opportunity to seek review independently of the firm."

The American Bar Association's Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility similarly has concluded that if a lawyer's efforts to seek to limit a subpoena to protect client confidences or secrets are "unsuccessful, either in the trial court or in the appellate court (in those jurisdictions where an interlocutory appeal on this issue is permitted), and she is specifically ordered by the court to turn over [the subpoenaed files]," then the lawyer may do so consistently with the Model Rule of Professional Conduct 1.6. ABA Formal Op. 94-385 (1994). The American Law Institute's Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers: Confidential Client Information § 115 (Proposed Final Draft No. 1, 1996)[2] also concludes that in such a situation the lawyer may "but is generally not required" to be held in contempt to protect such information.

While there are obvious similarities in the procedures available in the judicial and legislative contexts to register and argue objections to subpoenas, there are two important differences. First, there is no recognized available appellate procedure in the legislative process as there is in the judicial system. As we understand the Congressional procedures and the judicial enforcement of the federal criminal contempt statute, as set forth below, once a witness is found in contempt by a Congressional body, there is no appeal permitted and the offending conduct may not be cured by a later disclosure.[3] If a witness refuses to comply with a Congressional subpoena, any mistake of law, including, reliance on the good faith but mistaken advice of counsel, is not a defense in a later criminal prosecution for contempt of Congress. See, e.g., Yellin v. United States, 374 U.S. 109, 123 (1963). Second, due to the Speech or Debate Clause of the Constitution, the federal courts, in general, will not enjoin members of Congress or their staffs from issuing or attempting to enforce a Congressional subpoena that is "within the sphere of legitimate legislative activity." See Eastland v. United States Serviceman's Fund, 421 U.S. 491, 501 (1975) (internal quotations omitted). Under Eastland, therefore, only the most blatant effort of a Congressional committee to inquire into personal affairs that do not implicate matters of legislative policy will be quashed by the federal courts.

Thus, in the absence of a generally available effective judicial remedy, the question we must address is at what stage of the Congressional process is there a "requirement of law" to comply with a Congressional subpoena for purposes of Rule 1.6.

2. When a Congressional Subcommittee Directs Compliance with a Subpoena and Threatens to Hold a Lawyer in Contempt for Noncompliance, Disclosure Is "Required by Law" as That Term Is Used in D.C. Rule 1.6(d)(2)(A)

The Congressional subpoena does not, in itself, create the legal requirement that the lawyer disclose confidential information or a client's secrets. Like a subpoena issued by a party in a judicial proceeding or a grand jury subpoena, a Congressional sub-

[2] The final version of the Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers is expected to be published in late 1999 with no substantive changes to § 115.

[3] While no appeal is available to the respondent, under current House Rules, a subcommittee needs a full committee vote to support a referral for a contempt prosecution. See House Rule XI, cl. 1(a)(2). If before the full committee votes to uphold the contempt, the lawyer discloses the subpoenaed documents, the full committee may, but need not necessarily, consider the matter moot.

poena is not self-executing. As with subpoenas in the judicial or administrative process, objections can be raised, argued and resolved in the legislative process. Negotiations with the subcommittee chairman, members or staff may lead to modifications or even withdrawal of all or part of a Congressional subpoena.

All of the authorities of which we are aware that have addressed this question uniformly suggest that a lawyer has an obligation in the legislative process to raise all available, legitimate objections to a Congressional subpoena for confidential client information. For example, the Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers, supra, asserts that the lawyer has an obligation in the legislative process to object on all legitimate grounds to such a subpoena: "The scope of the protection afforded by the attorney-client privilege and the work-product immunity may be debatable in various circumstances. Similar issues may arise . . . in supplying evidence to a legislative committee, grand jury, or administrative agency. . . . A lawyer generally is required to raise any reasonably tenable objection to another's attempt to obtain confidential client information . . ., unless disclosure would serve the client's interests . . ." Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers: Confidential Client Information § 115 (Proposed Final Draft No. 1, 1996) (emphasis added). Similarly, the American Bar Association's Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility in its Formal Opinion 94-385 (1994) suggests that the requirement to make "every reasonable effort" to quash or limit a subpoena applies in the legislative arena. That opinion stated that "if a governmental agency, or any other entity or person, subpoenas . . . a lawyer's files and records relating to the lawyer's representation of a current or former client, the lawyer has a professional responsibility to seek to limit the subpoena . . . on any legitimate available grounds so as to protect documents that are deemed to be confidential . . . ."

In addition to making all appropriate objections to the Congressional body issuing the subpoena, a lawyer would be well advised to discuss with the client the possibility of a judicial action by the client against the lawyer to prevent compliance with the Congressional subpoena. While, as noted, courts will generally not enjoin members of Congress or their staffs from issuing or seeking to enforce a legislative subpoena, it is an open question whether an action might lie against a third party such as a lawyer or a law firm to enjoin compliance with a Congressional subpoena. See Eastland at 516 (Marshall, J., concurring) ("The Speech or Debate Clause cannot be used to avoid a meaningful review of Constitutional objections to a subpoena simply because the subpoena is served on a third party. Our prior cases arising under the Speech or Debate Clause indicate that only a member of Congress or his aide may not be called upon to defend a subpoena against Constitutional objection, and not that the objection will not be heard at all."). In United States v. AT&T, 567 F.2d 121 (D.C. Cir. 1977), the court upheld an action by the Department of Justice to enjoin AT&T from complying with a Congressional subpoena to provide telephone records that, according to the Executive Branch, implicated national security. See also Grabow, Congressional Investigations § 3.2[c] at 85 and n.31 (1988).

To prevent any possible appearance of collusion or other impropriety, it may well be prudent for the lawyer to suggest to the client that the client seeks separate counsel regarding such a possible course of action and to be advised of the prospects of such an option by counsel other than the subpoenaed lawyer.[4]

Once the process of objections, negotiations and a ruling by the Congressional subcommittee has been exhausted, and assuming the absence of any judicial intervention, the subcommittee may demand that certain enumerated documents be produced under pain of contempt. At that point, there is effectively no further recourse available to the subpoenaed lawyer. Based on our understanding of Congressional procedures, judicial precedents enforcing the criminal contempt of Congress' statutory provisions and analyses by recognized experts, we conclude that the point at which the lawyer becomes "required by law" to disclose any client confidences is the point at which the Congressional subcommittee specifically directs compliance with the subpoena and threatens to use its statutory authority, 2 U.S.C. § 192, providing criminal sanctions for contempt of Congress.

Current Congressional rules expressly permit any subcommittee of a House Committee to hold hearings and "to require by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of . . . documents as it considers necessary." Rules of the House of Representatives, 106th Cong., 1st Sess., Rule XI, cl. 2(m)(1)(B) ("House Rules") reprinted in 145 Cong. Rec. H6-10 (daily ed. Jan. 6, 1999). Compliance with a subpoena issued by a subcommittee may be enforced as authorized by the House. House Rule XI, cl. 2(m)(2)(B).[5] A contempt of Congress may be prosecuted, following a referral from the House, by the U.S. Attorney pursuant to 2 U.S.C. § 192.[6] Under this statute, contempt may be prosecuted against any individual who willfully failed to comply with a subpoena issued pursuant to the authority of either House or any Committee of the [4] The lengths to which the lawyer must go to protect the attorney-clinet privilege and confidentiality of the client raise the collateral issue of the lawyer's entitlements to fees and expenses from the client for these efforts. While this may be a subject in the first instance for negotiations between the client and lawyer, we note that, as set forth in our prior Opinion 214, the lawyer has obligations to preserve the privilege and confidentiality of client information even if it is evident that the lawyer will not be compensated for those efforts by the client. As we stated in Opinion 214:

> The ethical obligation of lawyers to protect the confidences and secrets of their clients is not a matter of contract between the lawyer and client; the obligation arises because "confidentiality is essential to the role of the lawyer in the administration of justice," Opinion No. 180, and because, under Canon 1, every lawyer has a duty "to assist in maintaining the integrity and competence of the legal profession."

We interpret this to mean that if no agreement on fees and expenses is reached regarding the efforts to protect the confidential information, the lawyer must nevertheless take all ethically required steps to protect the privilege even if not compensated for the services by the client. Whether a suit in quantum meruit for the services rendered in such a situation may succeed under District of Columbia law is a subject on which we express no view.

[5] Under current House Rules, after the relevant chairman has ruled against any objections or challenges to a subpoena, the relevant Committee or subcommittee may vote on whether to hold the party in contempt. If the initial contempt was voted by a subcommittee, then the contempt finding will reach the House floor only if the full Committee also votes the witness in contempt. See House Rule XI, cl. 1(a)(2). Under these Rules, if the House is in session, a vote of the full House is required to refer the matter to the U.S. Attorney for prosecution. However, when the House is not in session, the speaker may refer a finding of contempt by the full Committee to the appropriate U.S. Attorney. 2 U.S.C. § 194.

[6] 2 U.S.C. § 192 provides:

> Every person who having been summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter under inquiry before either House, or any joint committee established by a joint or concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress, or any committee of either House of Congress, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the question under inquiry, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100 and imprisonment in a common jail for not less than one month nor more than twelve months.

In addition, theoretically, either chamber of Congress may exercise its "self-help" contempt power House. Since a subcommittee subpoena is authorized by the Rules of the House, a contempt of Congress may lie against anyone who willfully failed to comply with a subcommittee subpoena. This interpretation is buttressed by the fact that the statute that authorizes certification from the Congress to the U.S. Attorney for prosecuting an alleged contempt to a grand jury specifically includes the willful failure to comply with a subcommittee subpoena. 2 U.S.C. § 194.

As the General Counsel to the Clerk of the House of Representatives noted, "In the Congressional context, the ruling by the Subcommittee chair that the privilege will not be accepted is the legal and functional equivalent [of] a legal requirement or a court order. Failure to answer at that point constitutes a criminal violation. Disclosure at that stage does not violate the Canons of Ethics nor the Bar Code of any jurisdiction." Memorandum Opinion from Steven R. Ross, General Counsel of the Clerk of the House of Representatives to Congressman Stephen J. Solarz (Dec. 11, 1985) reprinted in 132 Cong. Rec. 3036, 3038 (1986). Similarly, in a memorandum from the American Law Division to the Office of the Clerk of the House in 1986, the conclusion was reached that where a committee issues a subpoena, "the contempt of Congress is complete when a committee rejects all claims of privilege and demands that a witness respond. The obligation of law attaches at that time." 132 Cong. Rec. 3044, 3047 (1986). In connection with this same matter, New York University Law School ethics professor Stephen Gillers stated that with regard to privileged information "an order to answer a question, coming from a body with legal power to issue the order, imposes a legal duty that overrides the ethical duty." Memorandum from Professor Gillers to Congressman Solarz (February 19, 1986) reprinted in 132 Cong. Rec. 3042, 3043 (1986).

At the heart of these conclusions is the recognition that a lawyer may face criminal conviction, imprisonment and fines for refusing at that point in the Congressional process to provide the demanded information. A violation of the contempt of Congress provisions of 2 U.S.C. § 192 carries with it the possibility of imprisonment of up to one year as well as a monetary fine.

which involves a trial before the relevant body and confinement upon conviction for as long as the term of the current Congress. Such a confinement is subject to judicial challenge through a writ of habeas corpus. See Grabow, supra, § 3.4[a] at 87. This alternative procedure has not been utilized in modern times.

The Supreme Court has held that a contempt of Congress cannot be cured by the lawyer's later compliance with the subpoena. Jurney v. MacCracken, 294 U.S. 125, 148 (1935) ("[w]here the offending act was of a nature to obstruct the legislative process, the fact that the obstruction has since been removed, or that its removal has become impossible, is without legal significance.") As noted, the Supreme Court has also held that when a witness refuses to answer a question in a mistaken, good faith belief that it would violate his rights to be compelled to answer, his mistake of law will be no defense at a trial on the criminal contempt charge. Yellin v. United States, 374 U.S. 109, 123 (1963).

Compounding the dilemma faced by the lawyer is the uncertainty of the applicability or force of the attorney-client privilege or work-product immunity in Congressional proceedings. While we have no doubt that the salutary purposes of the attorney-client privilege and work-product doctrine (as recognized by Congress itself in the Federal Rules of Evidence, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure) would be severely undermined if they were not fully applicable in Congressional proceedings, individual senators and representatives have repeatedly suggested that these privileges may not apply, or not apply with full force, in Congressional hearings. See, e.g., Beard, Congress vs. The Attorney-Client Privilege: A Full and Frank Discussion, 35 Am. Crim. L. Rev. 119 (1997); Rich, The Attorney-Client Privilege in Congressional Investigations, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 145 (1988). The matter has never been resolved definitively in the courts.[7] An incorrect prediction of the law could result in the imprisonment of a lawyer who was held in contempt of Congress for refusing to produce documents on the ground of the attorney-client privilege.

The cited Supreme Court cases suggest that if a court upholds the view of a subcommittee — either that the attorney-client privilege or the work-product doctrine does not apply in Congressional proceedings or does not cover the subpoenaed documents — the lawyer will have no valid defense and could be ordered to serve a term of imprisonment. Since it is the unanimous ethical view that a lawyer need not stand in contempt, with the risk of imprisonment, to protect privileged confidential or secret information, it follows that the lawyer may comply with the directive of the subcommittee to produce the required documents without risking a citation for contempt of Congress.

[7] While far beyond the purview of this Committee and while recognizing the complexity of the issue, we believe it would be extremely beneficial to both clients and lawyers throughout the country for Congress to pass legislation clarifying the applicability of the attorney-client and perhaps other privileges in Congressional proceedings. Such legislation could also provide for procedures in which the privilege may be invoked, considered and resolved.

The fact that a lawyer may deem himself or herself "required by law" to produce the documents at the point the subcommittee demands it does not mean that the lawyer must produce the documents at that time. It was noted at the time that the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct were proposed that Rule 1.6(d)(2) and its commentary "do not advise a lawyer how far the lawyer must go in protecting client information." Analysis of Comments submitted to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals in response to the Court's order of September 1, 1988, Docket No. M-165-88, Proposed Rules of Professional Conduct and related comments, 21 (1989). In reviewing these comments at the request of Chief Judge Rogers, the former chairman of the D.C. Bar Model Rules of Professional Conduct Committee, Robert E. Jordan, III responded, "I suggest that judgments on these points be left to the lawyer who is ordered to disclose. It seems difficult to specify the proper course of action for such a lawyer given a myriad of factual circumstances which may exist." Notwithstanding the authorization granted by Rule 1.6(d)(2)(A), the lawyer retains the discretion to risk being held in contempt and litigate the issue in the courts, based on the totality of the circumstances.

Conclusion

At the point that the lawyer has made and pressed every appropriate objection to the Congressional subpoena and has no avenues of appeal available, and in the absence of any judicial order to the contrary, a lawyer faced with a Congressional directive and a threat of contempt of Congress may deem himself or herself "required by law" to comply with the subpoena within the meaning of D.C. Rule 1.6(d)(2)(A). A lawyer has satisfied his or her professional obligation to maintain client confidences once all objections have been made and exhausted and is not required by the Rules to stand in contempt of Congress if the subcommittee overrules the objections.

Opinion No. 289

"Cause" Litigation By A Non-Profit Foundation Run By Non-Lawyers; Prospectively Restricting Clients' Right To Waive Attorneys' Fees Or Agree To A Confidential Settlement

• Lawyers in the General Counsel's office of a non-profit, public interest organization are forbidden by D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct 5.4 from participating in, managing or directing litigation brought on behalf of individual third parties with whom they do not have a lawyer-client relationship. By doing so, the organization, which employs and compensates the lawyers, improperly directs or regulates the independent professional judgment of the lawyers acting on behalf of the parties in litigation, and threatens the duty of confidentiality owed to such parties. A client's right to accept or reject a settlement offer cannot be contracted away in advance through a provision in a retainer agreement that precludes the client from accepting any settlement that waives the client's right to recover attorneys' fees, or that prevents the client from agreeing to a confidential settlement.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.2 (Scope of Representation)
• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
• Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
• Rule 1.8 (Conflict of Interest: Prohibited Transactions)
• Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)

Inquiry

A non-profit membership organization ("the Organization"), whose activities consist of legislative lobbying and public education efforts on behalf of a particular population group, also seeks to advance its public policy purposes through so-called "cause" litigation — litigation intended to establish what it views to be useful legal precedents, or to challenge those which it believes are undesirable. To this end, the Organization relies upon staff lawyers to represent it as amicus curiae and, in certain cases, as a plaintiff.

The Organization now desires to expand its litigation efforts to represent third persons, who also may be members of the Organization. It would do so through the auspices of a companion non-profit, charitable foundation ("the Foundation") it has created to carry on activities other than lobbying. The Foundation is funded by the Organization and by governmental grants. The Organization's lawyers who would be involved in this effort have been placed in a separate unit within the Foundation ("the Unit"). The Unit, however, is not a separate legal entity from the Foundation.

The Organization, recognizing some of the ethical issues discussed in this opinion, has undertaken various measures to insulate the Unit's lawyers from lay control and interference with their conduct of third-party representation.

• First ,the personnel of the Unit are all either lawyers or legal support personnel.

• Second, while the lawyer in charge of the Unit will report to the Foundation's Administrator and Board of Directors, all of whom are non-lawyers, they purportedly will exercise no role in the conduct of third party representation cases. Non-lawyers outside of the Unit, however, will participate in the Unit's selection of cases to be undertaken, in order to determine whether the Unit's litigation efforts would be consistent with the Organization's public policy goals, the Organization's representation of other clients, and its relationships with other entities.

• Third, the Unit has a charter and litigation guidelines, which have been formally adopted by the Foundation's Board, a set of written procedures, and a standard retainer agreement. Among other things, these documents state that no director, officer, employee or agent of either the Organization or the Foundation who is not a staff lawyer of the Unit or a lawyer in the office of general counsel of the Organization (who are also general counsel to the Foundation) will interfere in the selection, management or conduct of litigation involving the representation of third persons, and that no staff lawyer will permit any person or entity outside the Unit to interfere with or attempt to influence her independent professional judgment regarding the selection, management or progress of such a case. The documents ensure that client confidences and secrets will not be shared with nonlawyers other than those providing support services to the lawyers.

• Fourth, with client consent, the scope of the Unit's representation of a particular client may be limited, as specified in a signed retainer agreement. Once such an agreement is executed, however, neither the Organization, the Foundation, nor any of their directors, officers, employees or agents outside the Unit staff will influence or interfere with the management or conduct of litigation involving the representation of third persons. The standard retainer agreement specifies that if it is to the client's advantage to take a legal position in conflict with the Organization's or the Foundation's policies, then the client has the last word as to whether the position will be taken. If the client chooses to adopt such a position, the Unit's lawyers may seek leave to withdraw.[1]

According to the Organization, the clients in the Unit's third person representation cases will not be responsible for payment of any fee for the services of the Unit's lawyers, but the Unit and cooperating counsel will seek such fees in cases where court-awarded attorneys' fees may be available. Fee awards will be split between the Unit and cooperating counsel in proportion to the respective time their lawyers have spent on the case.[2] Any fees obtained by Unit lawyers will be placed in a separate account, to be used solely for the purpose of supporting other "cause" litigation in which the Unit's lawyers are engaged.

While the retainer agreement provides that the Unit's legal representation will be without fee to the client, it obligates the client to cooperate a) in obtaining an award of attorneys' fees in cases where they are available, b) in obtaining fees from the defendants in connection with settlement, and c) in publicizing the case. In this connection, the agreement specifically commits the client, as a condition of the representation, not to accept a settlement offer conditioned on the client's waiver of his or her right to pursue court-awarded attorneys' fees. It also specifically commits the client not to accept a settlement offer conditioned on keeping the fact and/or terms of the settlement confidential, so that the Unit (or perhaps the Foundation or the Organization) is permitted to publicize the results of the case.

[1] The Organization advises that this will not leave the party without representation, as other cooperating counsel will be involved and remain able to provide representation. We presume that any lawyers involved in such representation will comply fully with the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct addressing withdrawal from representation, see Rule 1.16, as well as with all applicable rules of the court(s) in which the representation takes place.

[2] We were not advised whether fee apportionment will be discussed with the client or will be part of the standard retainer. We presume again that the lawyers involved will follow those portions of our Rules which address division of fees, see Rule 1.5(e), including appropriate notice to the client and client consent.

The inquirer asks whether the above-described activities of the Unit's lawyers will be in compliance with the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

Discussion

A. Lay Interference with a Lawyer's Independence of Judgment: Rules 1.6, 1.8, and 5.4

Although the Organization has taken a number of steps designed to insulate the Unit's lawyers from lay control, the arrangement as presented to the Committee does not do so in compliance with governing provisions of our Rules, several of which reflect the importance of preserving a lawyer's independent judgment. Rule 5.4 is specifically designed "to protect the lawyer's professional independence of judgment." See Rule 5.4, Comment [1]. Rule 5.4(c) thus prohibits a person who employs or pays a lawyer to render legal services to another to direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services. Rule 1.8(e)(2) also specifically provides that "a lawyer shall not accept compensation for representing a client from one other than the client" unless "there is no interference with the lawyer's independence of professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship".

The inquirer advises that "no director, officer, employee or agent of either the Organization or the Foundation who is not a staff lawyer of the Unit or a lawyer in the office of general counsel of the Organization (who are also general counsel to the Foundation) will interfere in the selection, management or conduct of litigation involving the representation of third persons" (italics supplied). The implication of this representation, confirmed through conversation with the inquirer, is that lawyers in the Organization's general counsel's office (who are agents of a lay entity and have no lawyer-client relationship with the individual party) will be permitted to participate in the day-to-day management of third party representation conducted by the Unit's lawyers (and presumably by lawyers of cooperating firms who also have direct lawyer-client relationships with the represented individual). Therefore, the lay organization, although acting through counsel, improperly will be regulating the Unit lawyer's professional judgment in violation Rules 1.8 and 5.4.[3]

This conclusion is consistent with prior opinions of this Committee. In Opinion No. 93, for example, we examined a similar question under our prior Rules and concluded that "the non-lawyers involved [in a legal service organization] must not direct or regulate the exercise of professional judgment of lawyers in the performance of legal services." The rule was followed in Opinion No. 135, another case dealing with a lawyer working for a corporation, which stressed again that "non-lawyers involved in the corporation must not exercise any control or influence over the exercise of the inquirer's professional judgment in performing legal services for the corporation's clients" (italics supplied).

The instant inquiry poses a slightly different question: whether lawyers (as opposed to lay individuals) employed by a corporation may exercise control or influence in third party litigation where they have no attorney-client relationship with the party. We have no doubt that the barriers applicable to lay persons in this setting are equally applicable to lawyers. Indeed, the proposition that lawyers acting on behalf of lay individuals may seek to exercise such control over litigation brought by parties to whom they do not owe the lawyer's obligations of undivided loyalty raises even more significant questions than having lay individuals exercise such control or influence. We conclude that this exercise of control is inconsistent with the our Rules of Professional Conduct.[4]

B. Waiving the Right to a Confidential Settlement: Rules 1.2, 1.6, 1.8, and 5.4

As noted above, the standard retainer agreement applicable to the Unit's third party clients commits the client not to accept a settlement offer conditioned on keeping the fact and/or terms of the settlement confidential. The inquirer asserts that this commitment is necessary because the Unit's cases are undertaken for public policy objectives that will not be served if a favorable disposition of the case is deprived of precedential or educational value.

Regardless of the Unit's laudable objectives, however, this commitment interferes with the client's ability to settle a case. Rule 1.2, governing scope of representation, specifically provides, in relevant part, "[a] lawyer shall abide by a client's decision whether to accept an offer of settlement of a matter." Rule 1.2(a). This rule is designed to preserve the client's right to accept or reject a settlement offer, and it requires that a client be able to exercise his or her judgment at the time a settlement offer is communicated. See also 1.4 (c) (requiring that settlement offers be communicated promptly).

Rule 1.2 (c) allows a lawyer and client to limit the objectives of the representation if the client consents after consultation. We do not believe it is possible, in this situation, for a client to offer informed consent to the advance condition in question. The client's consent is sought in this instance at the outset of the litigation, before he or she is likely aware of the particular confidences and secrets that may emerge in the litigation process, and well before he or she can understand clearly the effect of publicizing a settlement which has yet to be proposed. He or she may desire confidentiality terms in the settlement agreement in order to preclude public access to personally embarrassing or detrimental facts that may have emerged during the litigation process, but which had been shielded from public disclosure, such as through a protective order. Lawyers are ethically bound not to reveal such facts. See Rule 1.6(a)(1)-(3) (prohibiting a lawyer from knowingly revealing client confidences or secrets, from using confidences or secrets to the client's disadvantage, and from using confidences and secrets to the lawyer's own advantage or the advantage of a third person).

In the analogous area of prospective waiver of conflicts of interest under Rule 1.7, the ABA Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility, in Formal Op. 93-372, persuasively observed:

3 The inquirer further indicates that client confidences and secrets will not be shared with nonlawyers other than those providing support services to the lawyers. We are troubled by the implication of this representation; that client confidences and secrets may be shared with lawyers outside of the Unit, namely, lawyers in the Organization's general counsel's office. Such information sharing, should it occur, would run afoul of Rules 1.8 and 5.4, to the extent confidences are shared for purposes of managing the litigation and influencing the professional judgment of the Unit's lawyers. We note further that the proposed standard retainer agreement clarifies that the third-parties are clients of the Unit's lawyers, not the Organization or the Unit. Sharing of confidential information with the Organization's lawyers, with whom the clients will have no attorney-client relationship, may breach the Unit's lawyers' duty of confidentiality under Rule 1.6. See Rule 1.6(a)(1) (providing, with limited exceptions, that a lawyer shall not knowingly reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client).

4 Additionally, the lawyers may be acting in contravention of Rule 5.5(b), which prohibits a lawyer from assisting a person who is not a member of the D.C. Bar (such as the lay leaders of the Organization who employ the lawyers in the general counsel's office) from the unauthorized practice of law. While the inquirer asserts that Rule 5.5(b) "would not come into serious question" because only the Unit's lawyers are representing clients, this assertion may be inconsistent with having lawyers in the Organization's general counsel's office involved in managing, directing or influencing these clients' litigation.

> [A waiver of future conflicts] must meet all the requirements of a waiver of a contemporaneous conflict of interest, and if a waiver is to be effective with respect to a future conflict, it must contemplate that particular conflict with sufficient clarity so that the client's consent can reasonably be viewed as having been fully informed when it was given.

A lawyer's generalized disclosure of a potential future conflict can be considered "full" only if, based on such a disclosure, the client can appreciate what it will mean down the road to have waived confidentiality. See ABA Formal Op. 93-372 (Apr. 16, 1993) ("Since the prospective waiver is sought at a time when the scope of the services the lawyer will provide the client may not be fully defined, ... we conclude that a client's prospective waiver of conflicts cannot be presumed to waive objection to disclosure or use of confidential client information subject to Rule 1.6."). We see no way for the proposed advance waiver of confidentiality, which is analogous to a prospective waiver of a conflict of interest, to meet this exacting standard. Accordingly, it is impermissible for the retainer agreement categorically to preclude any settlement agreement with a confidentiality provision (whether or not the provision is at the defendant's insistence), because such preclusion amounts to an improper prospective waiver of the client's right to maintain the confidentiality of information protected by Rule 1.6.

Moreover, to the extent that non-lawyer personnel of the Organization and the Foundation require the Unit's lawyers to impose this settlement limitation in every third-party representation, the Unit's lawyers are subject to improper lay interference with their independence of professional judgment and their client-lawyer relationships. See Rules 1.8(e)(2) and 5.4(c). This lay interference also is improper to the extent it fails adequately to protect client confidences and secrets protected by Rule 1.6 (see Rule 1.8(e)(3)).[5]

C. Waiving the Right to Accept a Settlement without Attorneys' Fees: Rules 1.2, 1.7, 1.8 and 5.4

As noted, the Unit's standard retainer agreement also commits the third-party client, as a condition of the representation, not to accept a settlement offer conditioned on the client's waiver of his or her right to pursue court-awarded attorneys' fees. The inquirer asserts that this provision is only a "slight impingement" on the client's right to accept a settlement in "cause" litigation, an impingement which allegedly is justified by fee-shifting statutes and by the "public interest" served by providing financing for further "cause" litigation.

Ensuring the recovery of attorneys' fees in a settlement has taken on substantial importance in civil rights cases since the Supreme Court held, in Evans v. Jeff D, 475 U.S. 717 (1986), that defendants in cases where a court may award fees may condition settlement upon a waiver of fees.[6] Where a settlement offer provides full relief to the plaintiff but is conditioned upon a waiver of attorneys' fees, a tension may arise between the interests of the lawyer and the client. There are several clearly ethical ways of dealing with this dilemma from the viewpoint of a plaintiff's counsel. For example, the lawyer and client may agree in advance that the client shall cooperate in obtaining fees; that fees will be sought if available; and that the client will be required to pay counsel fees (either contingent or hourly) in the event the such fees are not sought or recovered from the defendant. Such an agreement removes the conflict between counsel and client arising in the event of a fee-waiver settlement offer.

The course proposed here, however, is not consistent with our Rules. An agreement designed to mitigate the impact of such a settlement offer by committing the client in advance to reject it, or by insisting that the client assign to the attorney his or her right to fees, raises very serious questions under our Rule 1.2(a). While the Committee is aware of a split in opinion between Bar associations and commentators who have considered this issue, we find persuasive the opinions of those Bar associations that have condemned advance agreements of this type regarding settlement terms because they infringe upon a client's absolute right to accept or reject a settlement offer.

The Ethics Advisory Opinion Committee of the Utah State Bar has found, for example, that it would be unethical for an attorney to insist in advance that a client cede to him the right to veto a particular offer in settlement of a case because it did not provide for payment of attorneys' fees. Utah Op. No. 98-05 (Apr. 17, 1998). According to the Utah Committee, the client must always have the final say whether or not a settlement will be accepted and that this "ultimate client authority cannot be contracted away." Id.[7]

The Committee on Professional Ethics of the Connecticut Bar Association has reached the same conclusion. In Informal Op. 97-31 (Nov. 3, 1997), the Connecticut Committee withdrew its earlier opinion (Op. 85-19) providing that a lawyer and a client could agree that the lawyer would have a right to veto a settlement otherwise satisfactory to the client, but that did not provide for a legal fee acceptable to the lawyer. The Committee found that "[a] lawyer may not reject a settlement agreement that a client wishes to accept." Although the Committee did not determine whether a client may assign her right to a fee award to her lawyer, leaving this decision to the federal courts, it did note that such an assignment not only could place the lawyer in a position to veto a settlement acceptable to his client, but also would create a financial conflict between a lawyer who insists on a particular fee award and the desires of the client, thus violating Rule 1.7. See Informal Op. 97-31.

Similarly, in Opinion Number 93-09 (June 28, 1993), the State Bar Association of North Dakota addressed the propriety of a retainer agreement in which a plaintiff agreed not to accept an offer of settlement conditioned on the waiver of attorneys' fees. The Ethics Committee found that the retainer agreement created a conflict of interest between the attorney and the client. See North Dakota Op. 93-09 at 3. While such a conflict theoretically can be waived after disclosure and consent, the Committee concluded that the "attorney should refrain from use of this type of agreement, in light of the serious questions that could be raised about the adequacy of the consultation and the voluntariness of the client's consent." Id. A retainer agreement can make clear the client's responsibility for [5] This arrangement also may violate Rule 5.5's prohibition on the unauthorized practice of law. See note 4, above.

[6] Jeff D in essence overruled D.C. Legal Ethics Opinion No. 147 (1985), which had concluded that it was unethical to condition settlement upon an explicit waiver of a statutory award of attorneys' fees.

[7] Many other jurisdictions have recognized the client's exclusive authority to settle a case. See, e.g., Nebraska State Bar Ass'n Advisory Comm., Op. 95-1 (interpreting EC's 7-7 & 7-8, the predecessors to Rule 1.4(a)-(c); "the committee's opinion is that any provision limiting the client's ultimate authority to settle a matter will be unenforceable and improper"); New York County Lawyers' Ass'n Comm. on Professional Ethics, Op. 699 (Mar. 10, 1994) (interpreting EC 7-7; "[a] provision in a retainer agreement requiring the lawyer's consent to settle an actions is prohibited...."); North Carolina State Bar Op. RPC 145 (Jan. 15, 1993) (interpreting North Carolina Rule 7.1(C)(1) which requires a lawyer to abide by a client's decision whether to accept settlement; "a lawyer cannot divest a client of his exclusive authority to settle a fees and costs, but "that agreement may not restrict the client's right to receive and accept settlement offers." Id.

In contrast, the California State Bar's Standing Committee on Professional Responsibility and Conduct has found that a lawyer ethically may contract with a client for the right to apply for and receive an award of attorneys' fees, provided clear disclosure of the potential conflicts are made in advance. See California State Bar Comm. Op. 1994-136 (1994), 1989 WL 253262. Although the California Committee agreed that vesting the right to pursue fees in the lawyer "creates an actual conflict between the attorney and client because it allows the lawyer to pursue a course of action that may not be in the client's best interests," it also observed that "[a]ssignment by the client of the statutory right to attorney's fees appears fair" and that "[s]uch an assignment is consistent with the purposes of the attorney's fees award in civil rights cases." Accordingly, the California Committee found that such an assignment was ethically permissible so long as the lawyer met stringent disclosure requirements.[8] See also Hazard & Hodes, The Law of Lawyering, § 1.5.107 (2d Ed. 1998 Supp.).

The Committee, like the other jurisdictions that have faced this issue, recognizes that a client's right to accept or reject a settlement offer is absolute, as confirmed by our Rule 1.2(a). Moreover, an advance waiver of this right in the context of a fee award would create an actual conflict between the lawyer and client when and if the client were called upon to honor the settlement restriction, seriously impairing the lawyer's ability to render full and candid advice regarding the propriety of accepting the settlement offer and raising serious issues regarding the client's ability to provide a voluntary consent to the lawyer's continued representation. For this reason, we conclude that an agreement of the sort proposed here is not consistent with the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

Finally, to the extent that non-lawyer personnel of the Organization and the Foundation require the Unit's lawyers to impose this settlement limitation in every third-party representation, the Unit's lawyers are subject to improper lay interference with their independence of professional judgment and their client-lawyer relationships. See Rules 1.8(e)(2) and 5.4(c).

Conclusion

The Committee finds laudable the Organization's desire to pursue so-called "cause" litigation in order to protect what it views as the public interest. The Committee also notes many of the measures the Organization has implemented in an effort to safeguard the professional independence of the Unit's lawyers, such as (1) the placement of lawyers who will be conducting the third-party representations into a separate Unit, (2) a standardized retainer agreement clarifying the scope of representation, the independence of the Unit's lawyers, and the client's right to confidentiality, and (3) a policy of funneling any fees derived from such representations into a separate fund to be used solely by the Unit's lawyers.[9] Nonetheless, third party clients represented without fee by lawyers engaged in "cause" litigation remain clients and are entitled to be treated no less favorably by counsel than any other client. Their rights in litigation cannot be subject to outside control, they cannot be required to waive their right to confidentiality, and their right to accept or reject a settlement offer must be inviolate.

Inquiry No. 98-6-15

Date Issued: March 16, 1999

Opinion No. 290

Disclosure of Protected Information of Insureds to Insurers and Outside Auditing Agencies

A lawyer may release an insured client's confidential or secret information, including detailed work descriptions, to the insurer or an auditing firm hired by the insurer, only after the lawyer has made appropriate disclosure to the insured and obtained consent. Client consent to disclose confidential or secret information to the insurance company does not provide a basis to infer client consent to disclose the same information to the insurer's auditing firm.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.8(e) (Conflict of Interest: Accepting Compensation from one Other than the Client)

Inquiry

The inquirer is a law firm that defends insureds and is paid by an insurer. The law firm requests the Committee's opinion regarding a lawyer's ethical obligations to the insured when the insurer has retained an outside agency to audit its legal bills. To facilitate these audits, the insurer requires that the law firm submit detailed billing information to the outside auditing agency. In turn, the auditing agency has requested that the law firm's billing invoices contain descriptions of activities that are "specific enough to allow a person unfamiliar with the case or billing attorney to determine what function they are performing." The auditor also has requested that the law firm provide in support of its invoices detailed information and materials that appear to be protected by Rule 1.6. Examples of the level of detail the auditors expect the law firm to provide include the identity of participants, the content of all communications (telephone calls, correspondence, meetings), specific issues researched, the specific trial preparation performed, and the identity of material or documents reviewed and written work product generated in the representation of the client.

The first question we turn to is whether and under what conditions, consistent with the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, the law firm may release a client's confidential information directly to an insurer. The Committee concludes that the law firm ethically may submit an insured's detailed bills that contain protected information to the insurer only after the lawyer has informed the insured about the nature and potential consequences of both the requested disclosure and non-disclosure and the insured has consented to the release of the information. Disclosure of such information to an independent auditing agency also

[8] These included, in addition to the generic disclosure attendant upon any conflict waiver, specific disclosure that the lawyer might attempt to override the client's desire to settle the case if the settlement offer depends upon a waiver of attorneys' fees, and that in the event the defendant offers complete relief contingent upon waiver of fees, the lawyer's interest and the client's in the settlement would differ, with the result that the lawyer might be forced to withdraw. Additionally, the Committee noted that even with such disclosures, "there is no guarantee that such agreements are enforceable" because "[a] member may not agree to settlement without the client's consent" and because "[t]he client always has the right to determine whether or not to accept a settlement."

[9] See Am. Fed'n of Gov't Employees v. Fed. Lab. Relations Auth., 944 F.2d 922, 937 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (holding that a "separate operating account for legal services provides sufficient protection against the unauthorized practice of law by a lay organization") (quoting Curran v. Dep't of Treasury, 805 F.2d 1406, 14087 (9th Cir. 1986)).

may occur only with consent of the insured after disclosure. Consent to disclose confidences and secrets to the insurer may not provide a basis to infer consent to disclose the same information to another entity who performs work for the insurer.

Discussion

1. The Applicable Rules

D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct 1.6 and 1.8(e) control the relationship among a lawyer, a client, and a third party who is paying for the lawyer's representation of the client.

Rule 1.8(e) prohibits a lawyer from accepting compensation for representing a client from one other than the client unless: 1) the client consents after consultation; 2) there is no interference with the lawyer's independence of professional judgment or with the client-lawyer relationship; and 3) information relating to a client's representation is protected as is required by Rule 1.6. Comment [6] to the Rule reiterates the need, when a third party is responsible for payment of the client's legal fees, to protect the client's confidences and secrets from unauthorized disclosure and emphasizes the requirement that the lawyer may not represent a client under such circumstances if a conflict of interest arises. Thus merely because an insurer is paying the insured's legal expenses does not alter the lawyer's duty to protect his clients' confidences and secrets under Rule 1.6.

When an insurer requests that an attorney furnish it with information concerning representation of the insured, a lawyer representing the insured must determine, as a threshold matter, whether client confidences or secrets are involved. Whether a billing statement contains client confidences (information protected by the attorney-client privilege) or client secrets (information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would likely be detrimental to the client) will depend on the content of the statement. While some billing statements may not reflect protected information, at least some of the information and materials described by the inquirer clearly fall within the protection of Rule 1.6.

Under Rule 1.6, a lawyer may not knowingly reveal a confidence or secret of the client or use a confidence or secret of a client for the benefit of a third party unless one of three relevant exceptions is met: 1) the client consents after full disclosure 2) the lawyer has "reasonable grounds for believing that a client has impliedly authorized disclosure in order to carry out the representation"; or 3) disclosure is permitted by these Rules, or "required by law." Rule 1.6 (d)(1),(2), and (4). With respect to the exception for implied authorization, the set of facts presented to the Committee does not suggest that divulging the information to the insurer is necessary to performing the job for which the lawyer was retained. Therefore, the Committee concludes that the circumstances of the retention by the insured do not imply authorization to disclose. While payment for legal services is no doubt important to the client, the Comments to the Rules compel a narrower interpretation of this exception. To illustrate the scope of the implied authorization exception, the Comments provide two examples: "a lawyer may disclose information by admitting a fact that cannot properly be disputed or in negotiation by making a disclosure that facilitates a satisfactory conclusion." Comment [9]. As these examples suggest, implied authorization is limited to situations in which disclosure is essential to the purpose of the representation. Moreover, given the express mandate of Rule 1.8(e) requiring protection of client confidences and secrets from disclosure to third party payers, this general exception should not be construed to so easily negate those protections.

Nor do other provisions of the Rules or the requirements of any laws permit disclosure of an insured's confidences and secrets to the insurer for auditing purposes. Comment [11] indicates that "[u]nless the client otherwise directs," a lawyer is permitted to reveal "limited information from client files to an outside agency necessary for statistical, bookkeeping, accounting, data processing, banking, printing, or other legitimate purposes, provided the lawyer exercises due care in the selection of the agency and warns the agency that the information must be kept confidential." Comment [11] covers the lawyer's use of third parties such as accountants to perform business functions, where the lawyer has the power to select and control the third party. Comment [11] is not applicable where, as here, the information sought is substantive and the lawyer neither selects the auditor nor controls its use of the information.

Other provisions of the Rules that allow divulging confidences or secrets — for example, to defend against allegations by the client concerning the representation, to prevent imminent serious bodily harm or when required by law or court order — are inapplicable. Thus, a lawyer may only share confidential information of the type described by the inquirer with the insurer with the consent of the client after full disclosure.

2. Effect of the Contract of Insurance

The insurance contract or other agreements the insured entered into in submitting the claim may grant the insurer access to confidential or secret information. The lawyer's duty to the insured, however, is governed by the Rules of Professional Conduct, not by the insurance contract. The lawyer will need to review these provisions with the client to determine whether they constitute the informed consent for disclosure required by Rule 1.6.

Consent is defined by the Rules to mean "a client's uncoerced assent to a proposed course of action, following consultation with the lawyer regarding the matter in question." Rules, Definitions section. Neither Rule 1.6 nor the Comments elaborate on what is meant by full disclosure. However, the Rules define consultation to mean "communication of information reasonably sufficient to permit the client to appreciate the matter in question". The commentary to Rule 1.7, dealing with disclosure of and consent to waivable conflicts of interest, notes that "disclosure and consent are not mere formalities." Rule 1.7, Comment [19].

In the matter before the Committee, the lawyer must evaluate the reasonably foreseeable adverse consequences of disclosure and inform the client of the adverse effects that may result, in a manner consistent with the client's level of sophistication. In re James, 452 A.2d 163-167 (D.C. 1982). The consequences of disclosure and the adequacy of any general consent by the client in the insurance contract will inevitably turn on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. For example, if the information sought is subject to an evidentiary privilege, the consequences of disclosure to a third party are potentially far more serious than if the information involves client secrets that would be subject to discovery in any event. Furthermore, the risk of losing privileged status for the confidential information sought may be diminished by the nature of the relationship between the insurer, insured, and lawyer which may have a colorable basis of joint privilege. Even if waiver of privileged material is likely to occur, in some cases the negative effects of such a waiver may be negligible.

Similarly, the consequences to the insured of not consenting to disclosure must be evaluated with the client. For example, the insurance contract may require the insured to cooperate in the defense of the claim or allow disclosure of confidential information and failure to agree to disclosure could risk loss of insurance coverage.

In seeking client consent to the release of information to the insurer, an attorney should be cognizant of the possible conflict between his interests and the client's interests. See 1.7(b)(4). The lawyer may have a financial interest in avoiding an audit of his billing practices, and should avoid exaggerating the risks of disclosure to a client whose consent to disclosure is sought. Conversely, a lawyer may have an interest in cooperating with the insurance company to preserve the lawyer's business relationship with the insurance company. In sum, the disclosure to the client in order to obtain adequate consent within the meaning of Rule 1.6 must adequately and fairly identify the effects of disclosure and non-disclosure on the client's interests and will depend on the facts and circumstances of each case.

It has been suggested that the existence of legal privilege provides a basis to infer consent to disclosure or implied authorization. Communications among the insurer, insured and lawyer may be privileged, at least in part, because the lawyer is representing both parties, because there is a joint defense agreement or because a legal doctrine governing the "tripartite" relationship of insurer-insured-attorney applies. This is a matter of substantive law beyond the scope of the Committee's opinion. In any event, the mere existence of a possible privilege among insurer, insured and counsel does not in and of itself provide a basis to infer client consent to disclosure of confidences or secrets. Except as allowed by Rule 1.6, a lawyer may not release information relating to the representation of a client to anyone, including a co-client, unless the first client consents after disclosure or an exception is met. To the extent it is relevant, the existence of a joint privilege may bear on the consequences of disclosure of which the client must be apprised before consenting.

3. Release to an Auditor

The inquirer has also asked whether it would be ethically permissible to provide the same detailed billing information and work product directly to the outside auditing agency. If the auditor is an independent entity from the insurance company, disclosure to the auditor is only permissible if the provisions of Rule 1.6 have been met. Even if disclosure to the insurance company has been consented to by the client, that consent should not be assumed to include consent to disclosure to a third party auditor. The Rule 1.6 considerations we have described with respect to insurance company disclosure should be separately addressed when disclosure to an auditor is requested.

We note that many other jurisdictions have issued opinions addressing the same or similar facts and have concluded that the insured's consent after disclosure is necessary before a lawyer may disclose protected information to outside auditing agencies. See Utah State Bar Opinion 98-003; Florida Bar Staff Opinion 20591, December 31, 1997; Alabama State Bar (unnumbered); South Carolina Ethics Advisory Opinion 97-22; Kentucky Bar Association, KBA E-404; North Carolina Proposed 98 Formal Ethics Opinion 10; Louisiana State Bar Association (unnumbered); Indiana State Bar Association, Opinion 4 of 1998, Virginia Legal Ethics Opinion 1723, Maryland State Bar Association, Inc., Committee on Ethics Docket No. 99-7. A number of these decisions specifically address the different status of the insurer and the third party auditing agency. See, e.g., Virginia Opinion 1723, Indiana Opinion 4 of 1998, Maryland Opinion No. 99-7, Alabama State Bar Opinion RO-98-02.

The Massachusetts Bar Ethics Committee has taken a somewhat different approach, concluding that if a client has consented to disclosure of protected information to the insurer, the information may be disclosed to an independent auditing company retained by the insurer without further client consent if the lawyer is satisfied that the auditor has taken reasonable steps to protect confidentiality of the disclosed information. Mass. Bar Opinion, November 22, 1997. We do not adopt this approach. We find nothing in the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct that supports the conclusion that consent to disclosure to the insurer may be used to infer consent to disclosure to other third parties whose purpose it is to assist the insurer in ts business, not the attorney in representing the client's interests. Even if disclosure to the insurance company has been consented, to, the Rule 1.6 considerations that we have described with respect to insurance company disclosure should be separately addressed when disclosure to an auditor is requested. For example, where applicable law affords privileged status to communications among the insurer, insured and the insured's attorney, disclosure by the insurer to a third party could effectively waive the privilege. See Indiana State Bar Opinion No. 4, 1998. In this regard we note that if disclosure to a third party without client consent has the effect of waiving the privilege, other ethical provisions become relevant. See, e.g., Rule 1.1 (Competency), Rule 1.4(b) (Communication) and Rule 1.6 (interference with professional judgment and attorney-client relationship by person paying rather than client).

The inquirer also asked whether the Rules of Professional Conduct apply if the lawyer provides the protected information to the insurer, who then sends it to the outside auditor. The Rules of Professional Conduct do not apply to an insurer and insurance companies are therefore not bound by this opinion. Prior to disclosure of protected information to the insurer, however, the lawyer should instruct the insurer not to release the protected information and should designate all such information clearly. If there is reason to believe that the insurer will not follow this instruction, the lawyer should so advise the client, prior to disclosure, explaining any additional risks that would result from disclosure by the insurer to a third party.

Conclusion

The requirements of Rules 1.6 and 1.8 need not be impediments to effective representation of insured clients or to the interests of insurers. Identification of each party's interests and informed disclosure at the outset of the representation should allow a workable relationship that meets the insured and insurer's needs and the ethical obligations of the lawyer. For example, at the outset the attorney could identify with the insurer and auditing agency the type of information that would be requested during the representation and discuss with the client the legal effects of such disclosure. In assessing the legal effects, the lawyer may wish to evaluate the agreement between the auditor and the insurer regarding procedures to protect confidential materials. Where agreement is reached at the outset regarding the scope of disclosure to the insurer or auditor, the lawyer must continue to be vigilant throughout the representation to the scope of the consent and obtain new or updated client consent where appropriate.

Inquiry No. 98-6-17
Adopted: April 20, 1999

Opinion No. 291

Contracts with Temporary Lawyers: Restrictions on Subsequent Employment

• A lawyer seeking temporary employment or a lawyer seeking the temporary services of another lawyer may not enter into a contract with a lawyer placement agency that requires the temporary lawyer to agree not to apply for or to accept subsequent employment with a firm to which he was assigned or with a client of the firm. Such restriction would violate Rule 5.6. A lawyer seeking temporary employment may agree to notify the placement agency if within a stated period the lawyer accepts subsequent employment at the firm to which he was assigned on a temporary basis.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 5.6(a) (Restrictions on Right to Practice)

Inquiry

The committee received an inquiry from a lawyer who had been working as a temporary lawyer under contract with various temporary agencies in the DC area. The inquirer asked whether the following provision in one placement agency contract would violate DC Rule 5.6:

> Except as provided by this Agreement, or as may be consented to by the [placement agency] in writing, Attorney agrees as a condition of this Agreement and [of] assignments of Attorney to Firm that Attorney will not solicit or accept an offer of employment, or otherwise directly or indirectly, on a full-time, part-time or temporary basis, provide services to Firm, its clients or their respective affiliates until the expiration of one year after termination of this agreement. Attorney shall immediately notify the [placement agency] if Firm or any affiliate solicits Attorney with an offer of employment or other services.

The inquirer also asked whether the following provision in another contract between a placement agency and a temporary lawyer would violate Rule 5.6:

> The Employee shall not accept employment from or offer him/herself to be employed by the Client, for a period beginning with the date the Company first contacts the Client regarding the Employee and concluding ninety (90) days following completion of any assignment, unless the Client first agrees to pay [the agency] a fee in an amount determined by [the agency]. . . .
> In the case of a permanent placement, the Employee shall not accept a position which has been offered to the Employee as a result of a referral by the Company directly from the Client for a period of one year, commencing with the date the Company first contacts the Client regarding the Employee, it being understood and agreed to by the Employee that the Company is entitled to a placement fee to be paid by the Client as consideration for the Company's efforts on behalf of the Employee and the Client.

The Committee reviewed some other contracts between temporary lawyer placement agencies and temporary lawyers and noted that they impose similar restrictions on subsequent employment.[1] This inquiry presents several questions:

1. Would a lawyer violate Rule 5.6 by signing an agreement with a temporary lawyer placement agency that:

   a) flatly prohibited the temporary lawyer from accepting an offer of subsequent employment[2] from a firm where the lawyer had been placed or from a client of the firm for a designated period of time?

   b) prohibited the lawyer from accepting subsequent employment unless the firm agreed to pay a fee to the agency?

2. Would a lawyer violate Rule 5.6 by agreeing to notify the temporary agency of any offer of employment by a firm subsequent to a temporary placement, to allow the agency to collect an agreed placement fee from the firm?

3. Would a lawyer violate Rule 5.6 by signing an agreement with a temporary lawyer placement agency that prohibited the lawyer for a specified period of time from applying for subsequent employment:

   a) at a firm where the lawyer had been placed as a temporary lawyer or

   b) with a client of the firm in question, or that

   c) prohibited the lawyer from applying for subsequent employment unless the firm agreed to pay a fee to the agency?

4. Would a lawyer seeking to employ a temporary attorney violate Rule 5.6 by agreeing that if the firm offered subsequent employment to the temporary attorney, the firm would pay a placement fee to the agency?

Discussion

Rule 5.6 prohibits a lawyer from entering into a contract that restricts a lawyer's right to practice. The rule states, in pertinent part:

> A lawyer shall not participate in offering or making:
> (a) a partnership or employment agreement that restricts the rights of a lawyer to practice after termination of the relationship, except an agreement concerning benefits upon retirement.

The comment following the rule explains that "An agreement restricting the right of partners or associates[3] to practice after leaving a firm not only limits their professional autonomy but also limits the freedom of clients to choose a lawyer."

---

[1] One agency contract with temporary lawyers notes that its contracts with client employers: restrict our clients from directly or indirectly employing or retaining a practitioner whom we procure other than through [the agency], unless and until either an agreed-upon fee is paid . . . or a period of time of up to 30 months has passed since such practitioner last worked for the client.

Another agency contract provides that:

Clients of [the agency] may offer [agency] employees permanent jobs only in accordance with the terms of the clients' agreements with [the agency], providing [the agency] with a payment in certain situations to compensate [the agency] for recruiting and developing temporary lawyers . . . . [The temporary lawyer] agrees not to accept direct employment or additional assignments from any client of [the agency] to whom [the lawyer] is assigned both during any assignment and for a period of 180 days after [the lawyer's] last day of work on behalf of that client without first notifying [the agency].

[2] The term "subsequent employment" is used here to refer to any full-time, part-time or other employment that follows the fulfillment of an assignment from a placement agency.

[3] The reference in the comment following rule 5.6 to "partners or associates" raises a question whether the rule applies to a lawyer employed in a law firm neither as an associate nor as a partner. We find that the rule is intended to apply to lawyers generally. The language of the comment was taken from the comment to DR-2-108(A), the predecessor of Rule 5.6, which was drafted when lawyers in firms generally had only two statuses. Different statuses for lawyers in law firms (temporary lawyers, contract associates, non-equity partners, staff attorneys, etc.) have proliferated since the 1980s. See Vincent R. Johnson and Virginia Coyle, On the Transformation of the Legal Profession: The Advent of Temporary Lawyering, 66 NOTRE DAME L. REV. 359, 370, notes 36 and 37 and accompanying text (1990), quoting Gilson and Mnookin, Coming of Age in a Corporate Law Firm: The Economics of Associate Career Patterns, 41 STAN. L. REV. 567 (1989).

The DC Court of Appeals recently explained the purpose of Rule 5.6, quoting a leading treatise:

> Rule 5.6(a) is designed, in part, to protect lawyers, particularly young lawyers, from bargaining away their right to open their own offices after they end an association with a firm or other legal employer. It also protects future clients against having only a restricted pool of attorneys from which to choose.[4]

Prohibition from Accepting Subsequent Employment

The purposes of Rule 5.6(a) are thwarted by a clause in the contract between the placement agency and the temporary lawyer restricting the lawyer's subsequent employment. If a contract between a placement agency prohibited the temporary lawyer from accepting employment with a firm where the lawyer had been placed or with a client of that firm for a specified period, the clause would violate rule 5.6. In D.C. Bar Op. 181, this Committee held that: "A law firm may not require a lawyer employed by it to sign an agreement that unduly restricts the lawyer's right to practice law after he or she disassociates from the firm." In that matter, a confidentiality agreement, less restrictive than a flat ban on certain subsequent employment, was found to violate DR 2-108(A)(predecessor of Rule 5.6).

The policy against contracts restricting a lawyer's right to practice is reflected very strongly in court decisions, which find most such provisions in partnership agreements and other legal employment contracts to be unenforceable as against public policy. See, e.g., Cohen v. Graham, 722 P. 2d 1388, 44 Wash. App. 712 (1986) (arbitrator did not err in finding a contract for the sale of a law practice that prohibited the seller from agreeing to continue to represent firm clients to violate DR 2-108(B) and to be unenforceable on public policy grounds); Dwyer v. Jung, 336 A. 2d 498 (N.J. Super. Ct. Ch. Div. 1975) (declaring unenforceable a partnership agreement that designated particular clients with whom each partner could do business in the event of termination; provision found to violate public policy because it would restrict lawyer's autonomy and client's choice of counsel). Cf. Newman v. Akman, supra n. 4 (finding permissible a restriction of benefits payable on retirement).

The interpretations of Model Rule 5.6 by the American Bar Association's Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility also reflect the view that contractual provisions that restrict a lawyer's autonomy or a client's choice of counsel are unethical. E.g., ABA Formal Op. 94-381 (May 9, 1994) (finding a contract prohibiting lawyers employed by a corporation from subsequent representation of any client against the corporation to violate Model Rule 5.6); ABA Informal Op. 1417 (1978) (law partnership agreement found to violate DR 2-108(A) because it prohibited departing partners from hiring or associating with any associates of the firm for a specified period following departure from the firm); ABA Formal Op. 300 (1961) (unethical for an employing lawyer to propose or for an employed lawyer to agree to a contractual covenant restricting the employed lawyer, after leaving employment, from practice in a specified geographic area for a period of time); see ABA Formal Op. 88-356 (1988)(contracts between temporary lawyers and their agencies should avoid any interference or control by the agency in "the exercise of professional judgment by the lawyer, including limiting or extending the amount of time the lawyer spends on work for the clients of the employing firms.")

A lawyer who signed a contract prohibiting a temporary lawyer from accepting employment at a firm where the lawyer had been temporarily assigned would violate Rule 5.6(a). Similarly, it would not be proper for a temporary lawyer to agree to decline an offer of permanent employment absent the employer's payment of a placement fee to a temporary agency. While it is permissible for a temporary agency to charge a reasonable fee to a client organization that hires a temporary lawyer, the lawyer should not be asked to decline employment to facilitate enforcement of the contract between the temporary agency and the client organization. The temporary agency may seek legal recourse against an organization that breaches its contractual obligation with the agency, but the agency may not use lawyers as bargaining chips to secure enforcement of these agreements.

Notice of Subsequent Employment

A contract between a lawyer placement agency and a temporary lawyer may require the lawyer to give the agency notice of an offer of employment from a firm to which the lawyer was temporarily assigned. If the purpose of such a clause is to allow the placement agency to collect a fee from the firm that has offered a non-temporary position to the lawyer, the clause would not restrict the lawyer's right to practice or the client's right to choose counsel. A temporary lawyer may sign such a contract without violating Rule 5.6.

Restriction of Employment of the Temporary Lawyer by Third Parties

Where a temporary lawyer is employed by a law firm, a corporate client of the firm might decide to offer the temporary lawyer a permanent position in the corporation. The corporate client of the law firm has undertaken no contractual obligations toward the placement agency. The corporation may not even be aware that the law firm is employing the lawyer on a temporary basis.[5] The first of the two contract provisions presented by the inquirer would restrict the temporary lawyer from seeking or accepting a position with a client of the firm where he was placed. This contract would hamper the lawyer's

In D.C. Bar Op. 284 (Advising and Billing Clients for Temporary Lawyers), this committee concluded that "a temporary lawyer has the same ethical obligations as any other lawyer to be competent to handle the matter tendered, to exercise independent professional judgment, to devote undivided loyalty to the client, and to preserve the client's confidences and secrets." It is but a small step to conclude that Rule 5.6 should be interpreted to apply to temporary lawyers despite the somewhat narrow language of the comment.

[4] GEOFFREY C. HAZARD, JR. & W. WILLIAM HODES, THE LAW OF LAWYERING, § 5.6:201 at 824 (2d ed. Supp. 1997), quoted in Neuman v. Akman, 715 A.2d 127, 130-131 (DC 1998) (partnership agreement allowing departing partner to recover his capital account and his share of the profits for a pro rata portion of his departing year but denying a partner who joins another firm an "additional amount" that would be paid over the remaining lifetime of a retiring partner found not to violate Rule 5.6 because the clause is a permissible restriction of payment of benefits upon retirement).

[5] In D.C. Bar Op. No. 284, this committee recently noted that some clients prefer to employ lawyers who will be available to them for an indefinite period of time. In such cases, a lawyer must "advise and obtain consent from the client whenever the proposed use of a temporary lawyer to perform work on the client's matter appears reasonably likely to be material to the representation or to affect the client's reasonable expectations." A client should be informed of the temporary status of a lawyer to be assigned to a client's matter if the client has "stated or manifested a desire that it have available to it a regular cadre of lawyers who will develop expertise and be available to work on a series of expected matters." Under Op. No. 284, then, there are some situations in which a firm must inform its clients of the use of temporary lawyers, and some situations in which a firm need not do so.

autonomy and interfere with the client's freedom in choice of counsel. A lawyer would violate Rule 5.6 by signing an agreement that barred the temporary lawyer's employment by a third party.[6]

Restriction on Communication by Former Temporary Lawyer

While a temporary lawyer may agree to give notice of an offer of subsequent employment, a temporary lawyer would violate Rule 5.6 by signing a contract that prohibited him or her from seeking subsequent employment with the firm to which he was assigned or with a client of the firm. Likewise, the lawyer would violate Rule 5.6 by agreeing not to respond to inquiries about the possibility of representation by a former or prospective client.

In D.C. Bar Op. No. 221, the Committee found that Rule 5.6 would be violated by an agreement that prohibited a lawyer from sending an announcement notifying clients of his intended departure from the firm, or from responding to inquiries initiated by clients about his impending departure from the firm. Contractual restrictions on direct (in-person or telephonic) solicitation of firm clients by departing lawyers have been found not to violate Rule 5.6 (or its predecessor, 2-108) as long as the lawyer, without financial disincentive, can inform potential clients of his availability to represent them, and as long as clients' right to choose counsel freely is fully protected. Ops. 221 and 97.

Payment of a Placement Fee

A lawyer employing a temporary lawyer may agree to pay a placement fee to a temporary agency if his firm offers permanent employment to a temporary lawyer.[7] A lawyer who agreed to pay a reasonable placement fee charged by the agency would no more violate Rule 5.6 than would a lawyer who agreed to pay a similar fee to a lawyer placement agency that identifies candidates for permanent positions as lawyers.

Conclusion

Lawyers seeking the assistance of temporary lawyers and lawyers seeking temporary assignment must read their contracts carefully and decline to agree to contractual provisions that would violate Rule 5.6. A temporary lawyer may agree to provide notice to an agency if the lawyer accepts permanent employment with a client of the agency where the lawyer had been placed as a temporary employee. A temporary lawyer may not agree to a contract with a temporary lawyer placement agency that imposes other geographic or temporal restrictions on his subsequent employment or that restricts his former clients' opportunity to communicate with him.

Inquiry No. 28-2-5
Adopted: June 15, 1999

Opinion No.292

Conflict of Interest: "Thrust Upon" Conflict

- Where a law firm is providing ongoing representation of a client with respect to an identifiable set of legal issues involving common parties, facts, theories and claims, that representation should be viewed as a single representation for purpose of applying the "thrust upon" conflict provision of Rule 1.7(d) even though multiple legal proceedings may be involved. Thus, if a new proceeding that meets these criteria arises in which the interests of another law firm client are directly adverse to the interests of the client that is the subject of the ongoing representation, the law firm may rely upon Rule 1.7(d) to continue its representation even in the absence of client consent.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
- Rule 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation)

Inquiry

A law firm whose attorneys are subject to the Rules of the District of Columbia Bar and a current client of that firm ("Client A") jointly have requested an opinion from this Committee as to whether the law firm may, consistent with DC Rule of Professional Conduct 1.7, continue to represent other clients of the firm whose interests have become adverse to Client A. Since 1993, the law firm has represented Client A as a defendant in a class action ERISA lawsuit filed in federal district court. Discovery in the ERISA lawsuit has been concluded, and if the lawsuit is not resolved through pending motions for summary judgment, the case is ready for trial.

In 1996, Client B retained the law firm to represent it on a regulatory issue involving access to certain facilities in its industry ("Competitive Access issue"). The law firm has represented Client B on this issue in seven distinct proceedings, including a federal district court lawsuit and a subsequent appeal, an FCC complaint proceeding, an FCC declaratory ruling proceeding, and several different FCC application proceedings. Some of these representations are still ongoing. In 1997, Client C retained the law firm to provide advice and legal services on another related but different access issue ("Direct Access issue"),[1] and the law firm has represented Client C in three FCC proceedings involving this issue, including an ongoing FCC Notice of Proposed Rulemaking.

The law firm and Client A agree that there is no substantial relationship between the ERISA litigation in which the law firm represents Client A and the Competitive Access or Direct Access proceedings in which the law firm represents Client B or Client C. In 1998, Client A announced its intent to acquire a company that had been and continues to be adverse to Client B in the Competitive Access issue proceedings and to Client C in the Direct Access issue proceedings. Client A's merger is still pending and is subject to various regulatory approvals, including FCC approval.

Upon learning of the merger, the law firm sought to obtain conflict of interest waivers so that it could continue to represent Clients B and C in matters involving Competitive Access and Direct Access issues where, following the merger, Client A would be directly adverse to Clients B and C.[2] The law firm also sought a waiv-

REV. 359, 389 (1990) (noting that "an employer who is impressed with the quality of a temporary's work may extend an offer of permanent employment to that attorney. In such instances, the agreement between the employer and the agency may provide for the agency to receive a placement fee from the employer.")

[1] No conflict of interest is presented by the law firm's simultaneous representation of Client B and Client C since these clients' interests are not in any way adverse on the Competitive Access and Direct Access issues.

[2] Even though there would be no potential for Client A's confidential information obtained in connection with the ERISA litigation to be useful in er to represent Clients B and C in the FCC proceeding reviewing Client A's acquisition. Client B and Client C each agreed to provide the necessary conflict of interest waiver, but Client A refused to do so, consenting only to the law firm's continuing general representation of Clients B and C on matters in which there was no direct adversity.

Disagreeing with Client A's position, the law firm filed comments on behalf of Clients B and C in the FCC proceeding reviewing Client A's acquisition. While neither Client B nor Client C opposed FCC approval of Client A's merger, they both requested that the merger be conditioned in a manner that would effectively produce the relief they had been seeking in the various Competitive Access and Direct Access proceedings. Client A viewed these comments as adverse to its interests because in its view the relief requested would substantially impair the value of the company that it sought to acquire.

Client A believes that the law firm should withdraw from its representation of Clients B and C in connection with the FCC proceeding reviewing Client A's merger. It asserts that it would be inappropriate under DC Rule 1.16(b) for the law firm to withdraw from its representation of Client A in the ERISA litigation. The law firm asserts that its continued representation of Clients A, B and C is permissible under the "thrust upon" provision of Rule 1.7(d) because there is no substantial relationship between the ERISA litigation in which it represents Client A and the FCC proceedings regarding Client A's acquisition in which it represents Clients B and C. Alternatively, the law firm suggests that if withdrawal is necessary, the law firm should withdraw from the ERISA litigation because Client A created the conflict by its proposed merger and Clients B and C have attempted to resolve the situation by giving their consent to the multiple representation.

The law firm in fact offered to withdraw from representing Client A in the ERISA litigation and to compensate Client A for possible costs associated with retention of new counsel in that matter. When Client A rejected this proposal, asserting that withdrawal given the advanced stage of the ERISA litigation would be prejudicial, the law firm and Client A jointly filed this inquiry.

connection with the law firm's representation of Client B or Client C on the Competitive Access or Direct Access issues, the law firm also agreed to implement appropriate ethical screens to prevent any confidential information flow within the law firm.

Discussion

This inquiry involves interpreting the scope of the "thrust upon" exception provided by DC Rule 1.7(d) to the general prohibition against simultaneously representing two clients whose interests are directly adverse. This provision is a relatively new addition to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct and consequently has been the subject of only limited interpretation by this Committee. Nor does it appear that this issue has been addressed by other jurisdictions.

As a starting point, it is useful to identify the specific conflicts of interests presented here. Assuming Client A's pending merger is successfully concluded, Client A will step into the shoes of the acquired firm and become directly adverse to Clients B and C in the Direct Access and Competitive Access proceedings. This will trigger a conflict of interest under DC Rule 1.7(b)(1), which prohibits representation of a client with respect to a matter that:

> [I]nvolves a specific party or parties, and the position to be taken by that client in that matter is adverse to a position taken or to be taken by another client in the same matter, even though that client is unrepresented or represented by a different law firm.

Similarly, the law firm's representation of Clients B and C in the FCC proceeding reviewing Client A's pending merger also raises a conflict under Rule 1.7(b)(1) since the conditions to merger approval sought on behalf of Clients B and C are directly adverse to interests of Client A in unconditional approval of its merger.

Rule 1.7(d) provides an exception to the general prohibition of Rule 1.7 by addressing the situation in which a law firm is already representing two clients in unrelated matters and some direct adversity between the clients develops or becomes apparent for the first time. Rule 1.7(d) provides:

> If a conflict not reasonably foreseeable at the outset of a representation arises under paragraph (b)(1) after the representation commences, and is not waived under paragraph (c), a lawyer need not withdraw from any representation unless the conflict also arises under paragraphs (b)(2), (b)(3), or (b)(4).

As noted, two separate conflicts involving the application of Rule 1.7(d) are presented by the inquiry here — (1) the representation of Clients B and C with respect to ongoing proceedings involving the Competitive Access and Direct Access issues in which Client A, following its acquisition, will be adverse to Clients B and C and (2) the representation of Clients B and C in the FCC proceeding reviewing Client A's proposed merger, where Clients B and C wish to raise arguments and seek relief similar to that sought in other proceedings involving the Competitive Access and Direct Access issues but adverse to Client A's interest.[3]

The application of Rule 1.7(d) to the first situation — adversity arising from Client A's merger, which gives it for the first time an interest in ongoing proceedings in which the law firm has been representing Clients B and C — is straightforward. The law firm's representation of Clients B and C in ongoing proceedings involving Competitive Access or Direct Access issues is precisely the situation that Rule 1.7(d) sought to address. There is no question that the law firm had been representing Clients B and C in the particular matter in which the conflict has arisen. The conflict was not reasonably foreseeable.[4] At the time the law firm initiated its representations of Clients B and C in these proceedings, the other firm client, Client A, had no interest in the Direct Access or Competitive Access issues. Client A's interest arose only after the representations of Clients B and C commenced, and although a waiver was sought, the conflict was not waived under Rule 1.7(c) by all clients.

In such a situation, Rule 1.7(d) provides that a law firm need not withdraw from any representation unless the conflict also arises under Rules 1.7(b)(2), (b)(3), or (b)(4), which does not appear to be the case here. Thus, after seeking, but failing to obtain Client A's consent, the law firm is permitted under Rule 1.7(d) to continue representing Client A in the ERISA litigation and to continue representing Clients B and C in the ongoing Competitive Access and Direct Access proceedings, subject, of course, to the right of any client to terminate the firm's representation.

[3] Although the inquiring parties' specific focus is on the conflict issues presented by the FCC merger proceeding, an analysis of Rule 1.7(d)'s application to the conflict presented by the Competitive Access and Direct Access proceedings provides insight into how this rule was intended to operate.

[4] Comment [22] to Rule 1.7 emphasizes that in determining whether a conflict is reasonably forseeable, "the test is an objective one," focusing on such factors as whether the lawyer has an adequate conflict-checking system in place.

A more difficult issue is posed by the law firm's representation of Clients B and C in the FCC proceeding reviewing Client A's proposed merger. The law firm asserts that its ongoing representations of Client B and Client C in various proceedings relating to the Competitive Access and Direct Access issues constitute, for each client, a single and continuing representation in pursuit of a sole objective — success for that client with respect to a specific access right. According to the law firm, the FCC proceeding reviewing Client A's merger is part of this continuing representation because it permits a federal regulatory agency to consider the Competitive Access and Direct Access issues and offers an additional opportunity to obtain the relief Clients B and C seek. The law firm therefore urges that its efforts on behalf of Clients B and C respectively constitute a single ongoing "representation," comprised of a series of efforts to pursue a single objective in multiple forums, that should be viewed as a single and identifiable "matter."[5] Thus, for purposes of Rule 1.7(d), it views the "outset of a representation" here as the first action taken on behalf of Client B or Client C with respect to their particular access issue, and the subsequent initiation of additional discrete proceedings involving that access issue does not give rise to a new representation.

Client A urges a narrower view of the phrase "outset of a representation" as used in Rule 1.7(d). It views the FCC merger proceeding as a new representation on which the law firm's ability to represent Clients B and C was precluded by their adversity with Client A. According to Client A, the fact that the Competitive Access and Direct Access arguments that the law firm may have advanced on behalf of Clients B and C in prior FCC or federal court proceedings also could be raised in the FCC merger proceeding does not make the FCC merger proceeding part of an ongoing representation that falls within Rule 1.7(d)'s narrow exception.

In determining the scope of Rule 1.7(d), the meaning of the phrase "outset of a representation" is critical. Unlike "matter," the term "representation" is not defined anywhere in the DC Rules of Professional Conduct. The phrase "outset of a representation" was considered previously by this Committee in D.C. Bar Op. 272, dealing with so-called "hot potato" conflicts, where we concluded:

> While it would not be unreasonable to interpret the phrase "outset of a representation" to mean the client's initial retention of the lawyer on any matter, it is clear from the context of Rule 1.7(d) that the drafters had in mind the outset of representation in a discrete matter in which the unforeseen conflict arises. The narrow exception to Rule 1.7(b) carved out by the new subsection (d) addresses the situation in which one client potentially has the power to disable the law firm from its ongoing representation of another client in a particular matter already in progress, simply by intervening in the proceeding with separate counsel . . . . It would be a considerable step beyond this narrow class of "thrust upon" conflicts to extend Rule 1.7(d) to situations where . . . there is a current general "representation" of a client but the matter in which adversity develops has not yet begun.

The factual situation considered in Opinion 272 was distinct from the inquiry here. A law firm had represented Client X for a considerable period of time with respect to matters regulated by a specific regulatory agency ("Agency A"). The law firm had successfully represented Client X in a concluded, non-adversarial matter before Agency A and thereafter matters regulated by Agency A. The firm also was representing Client Y on unrelated contract matters when Client Y (represented by separate counsel) initiated an adversarial action against Client X before Agency A. Client Y refused to consent to the law firm's representation of Client X in that action.

The Committee refused to apply Rule 1.7(d) to the situation presented in Opinion 272, concluding that "there was not a discrete matter in existence prior to the time Client [Y] initiated the proceeding against Client [X]" and that the adversarial proceeding before Agency A constituted a new matter.[6] While Opinion 272 makes clear that the "thrust upon" exception of Rule 1.7(d) does not extend to situations where there is a general representation of a client "but the matter in which adversity develops has not yet begun," it does not shed further light on the key phrases on which it relies, including "discrete matter" and "particular matter already in progress."

In the factual situation considered in Opinion 272, there was no ongoing representation in a particular matter, no existing adversity, nor even any identifiable opposing party. It is therefore necessary to consider how Rule 1.7(d) should be applied in the more complicated situation presented here, where there is an ongoing representation on a discrete legal issue with identiable opposing parties that may be raised in multiple proceedings (possibly in more than one forum) and that, depending on one's perspective, can be characterized as one representation or multiple representations.

It is a reality of modern legal practice that the same issues involving the same parties, common facts, similar arguments and legal theories, opposition from the same interests, and seeking identical relief may be asserted (simultaneously or serially) in multiple proceedings. In litigation matters, there may be multiple iterations of the same claim brought in multiple proceedings; in regulatory practice, it is common to have multiple appeals from a single regulatory decision. When a successful removal petition results in the transfer of a lawsuit from

[5] As defined in the terminology section of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, "matter" is "any litigation, administrative proceeding, lobbying activity, application, claim, investigation, arrest, charge or accusation, the drafting of a contract, a negotiation, estate or family relations practice issue, or any other representation, except as expressly limited in a particular Rule." D.C. Rules, "Terminology."

[6] DC Bar Op. 272 (May 21, 1997). The Committee went on to find, however, that the concerns underlying the enactment of Rule 1.7(d) were implicated because Client Y's initiation of an action against Client X in a forum in which Client X would reasonably have expected to be able to avail itself of the services of its long-standing law firm would produce the same "substaintial prejudice" toward Client X that the "thrust upon" rule sought to address. Opinion 272 thus allowed the law firm to continue to represent Client X by withdrawing from its representation of Client Y pursuant to Rule 1.9. While noting that "[e]ach situation must analyzed on its facts," the opinion emphasized that "the more the potential conflict was caused by the actions of the attorney for the benefit of the attorney and/or a prospective or other client, the less justifiable will be the firm's effort to withdraw and to treat the conflict under the principles applying to former clients." Op. 272.

state to federal court, there have been two discrete proceedings with different case numbers and before different judges, but is hard to view this as giving rise to two separate representations.

If "representation" were defined simply by the existence of multiple proceedings with each new proceeding viewed as a separate "discrete matter," Rule 1.7(d) would have a relatively narrow application and, in the absence of conflict waivers, there might be numerous situations in which a client would be precluded from representation by counsel of its choice. Treating each proceeding as a separate matter (and thus new representation) could allow an opponent to disrupt a law firm's ongoing representation of a client for strategic purposes merely by initiating a separate proceeding that continues an existing controversy in a new forum. If existing counsel were unable under Rule 1.7(d) to represent its client in that newly initiated proceeding, the client would face the unenviable choice between retaining multiple counsel (incurring the costs and coordination problems of doing so) or replacing its original counsel due to a conflict associated with a specific aspect of the overall dispute.

Yet a more expansive reading of the term "representation"—one that concludes that so long as some issues, parties, underlying claims or defenses are the same there is a single "representation"—has the potential for turning the narrow exception of Rule 1.7(d) into a broader opportunity for law firms to undertake representation adverse to existing clients. It is easy to conceive of how Rule 1.7(d) might be abused by asserting some tortured linkage to an ongoing representation. Moreover, interpreting Rule 1.7(d) to extend to multiple proceedings makes it inevitable that difficult questions of application will arise. What decree of commonality is required to link various discrete proceedings into a single matter? For example, does the fact that a law firm is the regular counsel for a client with respect to a particular type of lawsuit permit the firm to represent that client if any new lawsuit of that type is brought by another firm client?

It is probably impossible to state a single rule that addresses all situations in which "thrust upon conflicts" claims are raised. However, we believe that for purposes of applying Rule 1.7(d), the concept of "representation" contains enough flexibility to extend beyond a single discrete proceeding to multiple proceedings that raise a particular identifiable issue or issues and involve common facts, legal theories, claims, defenses and parties.[7] For purposes of Rule 1.7(d), the "onset of representation" will be deemed to occur when the law firm first begins to provide legal services that involve the same facts, legal theories, claims, defenses and parties. If the conflict of interest was not reasonably foreseeable at that point, the law firm can continue its representation without client consent even if a conflict with another firm client is triggered by a subsequent legal proceeding.

We believe this approach is consistent with our prior holding in Opinion 272. There, the primary (and, indeed, the sole) linkage between the discrete proceedings was that they involved the same administrative agency before which the law firm had long represented the client. There was no adversity until the firm's other client initiated the proceeding that was the source of the conflict. Thus, it was not possible to find a single representation for purposes of Rule 1.7(d). There were no common facts, issues, or adverse interests.

Applying this analysis to the inquiry here, we find that the law firm's representation of Clients B and C on Competitive Access and Direct Access issues encompasses all proceedings — existing and future — in which these issues are legitimately raised and in which the same parties, legal theories, claims and defenses are present. It includes the FCC proceeding reviewing Client A's proposed acquisition, where the FCC can condition the merger approval in a way that would achieve Client B's and Client C's Competitive Access and Direct Access relief.[8] Thus, even in the absence of consent from Client A, the law firm can continue to represent Client A in the ERISA litigation and Clients B and C in the Competitive Access and Direct Access proceedings.[9]

We caution that the underlying commonality of facts, issues and parties required to find a single "representation" must be objectively verifiable. Efforts to abuse Rule 1.7(d) by artificially interjecting specious issues or claims into a proceeding in order to claim a preexisting representation will not be sufficient to overcome general client conflict principles contained in our Rules.

Conclusion

For the reasons discussed above, we believe that the "thrust upon" conflict provision of Rule 1.7(d) extends to the representation of a client with respect to an identifiable set of legal issues involving common facts, legal theories, claims, defenses and parties. Notwithstanding the fact that additional discrete proceedings raising those issues are subsequently initiated by another client of the law firm, the law firm may rely on Rule 1.7(d) to continue to represent both clients even in the absence of client consent.

Inquiry No. 99-1-2
Adopted: June 15, 1999

Opinion No. 293

Disposition of Property of Clients and Others Where Ownership is in Dispute

• In certain situations, a lawyer is obligated to safeguard funds that come into the lawyers possession where ownership interests are claimed by both the lawyer's client and a third party or parties. If the third party has a "just claim" to the property that the lawyer has a duty under applicable law to protect against wrongful interference by the lawyers client, the lawyer must hold any disputed portion of the property until the dispute has been resolved.

Applicable Rule

Inquiry

The Ethics Committee has received numerous inquiries from lawyers concern-

[7] Our analysis conforms to the approach taken by the Alabama Supreme Court in AmSouth Bank v. Drummond Company, Inc., 589 So.2d 715 (Ala. 1991), where the court recognized that the Rules of Professional Conduct are "rules of reason" and require employing a "common sense" approach to questions of lawyer conduct. Requiring that each new proceeding be viewed as a discrete "representation" seems contrary to this common sense approach.

[8] The "same parties" requirement is satisfied in the FCC merger proceeding because the company Client A seeks to acquire is the party adverse to Clients B and C in the Direct Access and Competitive Access proceedings.

[9] Client A, of course, remains free to discharge the law firm and seek new counsel for the ERISA litigation.

ing the proper disposition of settlement funds that a lawyer receives on behalf of a client when persons other than the client assert ownership interests in the funds. The purpose of this opinion is to provide guidance for the lawyer who is unsure how to respond to a third partys claim or her clients dispute with that claim.

Discussion

When a lawyer receives property belonging to others, two duties on the part of the lawyer arise: (1) the duty to notify promptly those who have ownership interests in the property of its receipt by the lawyer; and (2) the duty to promptly deliver the property and an accounting, if requested, to its owner. Rule 1.15(b) reads:

> Upon receiving funds or other property in which a client or third person has an interest, a lawyer shall promptly notify the client or third person. Except as stated in this rule or otherwise permitted by law or by agreement with the client, a lawyer shall promptly deliver to the client or third person any funds or other property that the client or third person is entitled to receive and, upon request by the client or third person, shall promptly render a full accounting regarding such property, subject to Rule 1.6.

Rule 1.15(c) outlines a lawyers duties with respect to the distribution of property where disputes arise as to its ownership:

> When in the course of representation a lawyer is in possession of property in which interests are claimed by the lawyer and another person, or by two or more persons to each of whom the lawyer may have an obligation, the property shall be kept separate by the lawyer until there is an accounting and severance of interests in the property. If a dispute arises concerning the respective interests among persons claiming an interest in such property, the undisputed portion shall be distributed and the portion in dispute shall be kept separate by the lawyer until the dispute is resolved. Any funds in dispute shall be deposited in a separate account meeting the requirements of Paragraph (a).

If the text of the rule were all that lawyers had to guide them, the rule would be difficult to interpret. The quoted portions of the rule speak of "interests" in property and "interests" claimed by competing parties. The rules, taken by themselves, do not define what is an interest sufficient to give rise to the safekeeping obligations of the lawyer and what sort of "claim" is sufficient to trigger the lawyers obligation to safeguard the property until the dispute is resolved.

Comment [4] to Rule 1.15, however, provides further guidance:

> Third parties, such as a clients creditors, may have just claims against funds or other property in a lawyers custody. A lawyer may have a duty under applicable law to protect such third-party claims against wrongful interference by the client, and accordingly may refuse to surrender the property to the client. However, a lawyer shall not unilaterally assume to arbitrate a dispute between a client and the third party.

D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.15, comment [4] (emphasis added).

The rules and comments have been further elucidated in decided cases, ethics opinions from this and other jurisdictions, and in the secondary literature. Taken together, these materials offer guidance as to how to handle these matters.

1. Client Claims.

One set of considerations applies when a dispute arises between a lawyer and the client concerning the property held by the lawyer. Because of the lawyers duty of loyalty to the client, the clients mere assertion of a claim is enough to prevent the lawyer from withdrawing any disputed property: There is no requirement that the dispute be genuine, serious, or bona fide, . . . The lawyer may not take possession of property the ownership of which is disputed by the client until it is absolutely clear that the dispute with the client has been finally resolved." In re Haar, 667 A.2d 1350, 1353 (D.C. 1995).[1]

The lawyers obligation is to safeguard the funds in a segregated account until the dispute is resolved. Moreover, the lawyer should take steps to promote a resolution. The lawyer should reason with the client, suggest mediation, and suggest other alternative dispute resolution mechanisms where those steps fail.[2] If no other device is effective, the lawyer may ultimately be forced to seek a judicial resolution of the clients claim.

2. Third Party Claims.

The claims of third parties to property coming into a lawyers possession stand on a quite different footing. For one thing, the mere assertion of a claim by a third party is not enough by itself to freeze property in the lawyers possession until the dispute is resolved. Indeed, the imposition of such a requirement by the Rules of Professional Conduct, which are prescribed by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals and hence have the force of law, could raise significant due process issues as constituting, in effect, a prejudgment attachment. See Conn. Informal Op. 95-20 (May 1, 1995) (citing Conn. v. Doehr, 500 U.S. 1, 11 (1991) (attachment by private party under state aegis constitutes state action); Sniadach v. Family Finance Corp., 395 U.S. 337 (1969) (holding prejudgment garnishment of wages unconstitutional); Fuentes v. Shevin, 407 U.S. 67 (1972) (holding prejudgment seizure of goods unconstitutional where application ruled upon by clerk rather than judge, no requirement for detailed affidavit, and no requirement to show exigent circumstances); North Georgia Finishing, Inc. v. Di-Chem, Inc., 419 U.S. 601 (1975) (holding prejudgment seizure of bank account unconstitutional notwithstanding requirements of bond and showing of exigency). Unlike the claims of a client, which need not be justified even superficially in order to bar the lawyer from making distribution, In re Haar, 667 A.2d at 1353, the claims of the third party must rise to a higher level. The third party must have a "just claim" as to which "applicable law" imposes a duty on the lawyer to distribute the funds to the third party or withhold distribution. D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.15, Comment [4].

The focus of this opinion is the precise level to which such a third-party claim must rise to trigger a duty of preservation by the lawyer in the face of a demand that

[1] In Haar, the client offered $4,000 -- less than half the fee the lawyer was claiming -- to settle the lawyer's claim. The lawyer rejected the client's offer but withdrew $4,000 on the ground that it was no longer disputed because the client had offered it in settlement. The court found that the lawyer's conduct violated Rule 1.15. Haar was decided under DR 9-103(A)(2) of the former D.C. Code of Professional Responsibility but the Court indicated that Rule 1.15 of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct is "similar" to the Code provision. In re Haar, 667 A.2d at 1352 n. 1.

[2] Of course, if the client demands arbitration of a fee dispute, District of Columbia law requires the lawyer to consent to arbitration. Rule XIII of Rules Governing the Bar of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

she make disbursement to the client.[3] To begin with, the rule does not apply to claims of which the lawyer lacks knowledge. Shapiro v. McNeill, 92 N.Y.2d 91, 96, 699 N.E.2d 407, 409 (1998) (interpreting N.Y. DR 9-102); Conn. Informal Op. 95-20, at n. 3 (May 1, 1995). Similarly, if there is no legitimate dispute about who is entitled to part or all of the funds, the lawyer must disburse the undisputed portion accordingly. N.Y. State Op. 717 (Apr. 15, 1999); Ariz. Op. 88-06. Further, the lawyer is not required to make ultimate decisions about who is correct in a dispute between the lawyers client and a competing third party for property in the lawyers possession. D.C. R. Prof. Conduct 1.15, Comment [4]. In other words, a lawyer is not called on to decide the merits of the dispute at the lawyers peril, thereby exposing the lawyer to suit from the disappointed party. See Heffelfinger v. Gibson, 290 A.2d 390 (D.C. 1972) (lawyer who had contracted to respect medical provider's lien personally liable for funds disbursed to client in knowing disregard of that lien); Kaiser Foundation Health Plan, Inc. v. Aquiluz, 47 Cal. App. 4th 302, 54 Cal. Rptr. 2d 665 (Ct. App. 1996) (same). As comment [4] makes clear, the "lawyer should not unilaterally assume to arbitrate a dispute between the client and the third party."

In general, a "just claim" that the lawyer must honor pursuant to Rule 1.15 is one that relates to the particular funds in the lawyer's possession, as opposed to merely being (or alleged to be) a general unsecured obligation of the client. The problems addressed by this opinion most commonly arise in the context of the disbursement of settlement funds or proceeds of a transaction, such as the sale of real estate. In those cases, several types of claims that frequently are received by lawyers are illustrative of "just claims" that would require the lawyer to give notice, make disbursement promptly where there is no dispute, and safeguard the funds in the event of a dispute until the dispute is resolved. These are:

(1) an attachment or garnishment arising out of a money judgment against the client (or ordered judicially prior to judgment) and duly served upon the lawyer, regardless of whether the attachment or garnishment is related to the matter being handled by the lawyer, see Phila. Op. 94-9 (June 1994); Conn. Informal Op. 95-20 (May 1, 1995) ("valid judgment concerning disposition of the property"); Cleveland Op. 87-3 (1988);

(2) a statutory lien that applies to the proceeds of the suit being handled by the lawyer, e.g. D.C. Bar Op. 251 (lawyer must disregard clients direction to disburse settlement proceeds to client in face of statutory Medicaid lien); see Aetna Casualty Co. v. Gilreath, 625 S.W.2d 269 (Tenn. 1981) (lawyer under duty to recognize statutory lien of clients employer on workers compensation recovery proceeds); Conn. Informal Op. 95-20 (May 1, 1995); R.I. Op. 95-29 (July 13, 1995); Colo. Formal Op. 94 (Nov. 20, 1993);

(3) a court order relating to the specific funds in the lawyer's possession, e.g., S.C. Op. 89-13; Colo. Formal Op. 94 (Nov. 20, 1993); and

(4) a contractual agreement made by the client and joined in or ratified by the lawyer[4] to pay certain funds in the possession of the lawyer (e.g., client expenses in consideration of the suppliers agreement to forebear collection action during the pendency of the lawsuit) to a third party, regardless of whether such an agreement arises from the matter being handled by the lawyer, Heffelfinger v. Gibson, 290 A.2d 390 (D.C. 1972); Florida Bar v. Neely, 587 So. 2d 465 (Fla. 1991); Romero v. Earl, 111 N.M. 789, 810 P.2d 808 (1991); American State Bank v. Enabnit, 471 N.W.2d 829 (Iowa 1991); Calif. Formal Op. 1988-101.[5]

The last type of agreement, which is commonly known as an "Authorization and Assignment" in this jurisdiction, is frequently utilized in contingent fee personal injury matters. It may be known by other names in other jurisdictions.[6] The District of Columbia Court of Appeals has held that a lawyer who signs such an agreement remains liable where successor counsel ends up handling the case, at least where the original lawyer retains an interest in the matter and receives a referral fee from successor

Because comment [4] to Rule 1.15 incorporates by reference the "applicable law" on attorney liability, though, some reference to civil liability standards is unavoidable. The law in the District of Columbia appears to be that where a lawyer disburses to her client funds claimed by another, the lawyer is liable civilly if she has agreed to protect the third party's interest. Heffelfinger v. Gibson, 290 A.2d 390 (D.C. 1972). The D.C. Office of Bar Counsel has taken the position that the same standard obtains under Rule 1.15. Letter from Leonard H. Becker, Bar Counsel, to Irvin B. Nathan, Chair, D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Comm., at 2 (Aug. 23, 1999). The Court of Appeals also has ruled that a lawyer is not liable where she is aware of the client's liability to the third party but has made no independent undertaking to protect the third party. Travelers Ins. Co. v. Haden, 418 A.2d 1078 (D.C. 1980). Liability in the former circumstance may continue even after the lawyer has transferred the case to another lawyer unless the creditor has absolved the first lawyer of responsibility. Heffelfinger, 290 A.2d at 393 & n. 2. Further, and as noted above, there may be constitutional limitations upon requiring a lawyer to turn client funds over to a third party -- or even to withhold them from the client -- absent a matured claim to the particular funds in question. The District of Columbia statutes permit prejudgment attachment only in exigent circumstances, D.C. [4] Some jurisdictions other than the District of Columbia require the lawyer to withhold funds from a client who has agreed to pay them to a third party, even if the lawyer has not joined in or agreed to adhere to that arrangement. E.g., Advance Finance Co., Inc. v. Clients Security Trust Fund, 337 Md. 195, 652 A.2d 660 (1995); Kaiser Foundation Health Plan, Inc. v. Aguiluz, 47 Cal. App. 4th 302, 54 Cal. Rptr. 2d 665 (Ct. App. 1996); Herzog v. Irace, 594 A.2d 1106 (Me. 1991); Berkowitz v. Haigood, 256 N.J. Super. 342, 606 A.2d 1157 (1992); Leon v. Martinez, 84 N.Y.2d 83, 638 N.E.2d 511 (1994) (lawyer had not executed or acknowledged, but had drafted, assignment agreement); Formal Op. 98-06, Ariz. Comm. on Rules of Prof. Conduct (June 3, 1998); Informal Op. 95-20, Conn. Comm. on Prof. Ethics (May 1, 1995) (requiring withholding but not payment to third party claimant); Op. 93-14, S.C. Bar Ethics Adv. Comm.; Op. 93-31, S.C. Bar Ethics Adv. Comm. (insurer's subrogation claim); Op. 94-20, S.C. Bar Ethics Adv. Comm. This jurisdiction and others appear to disagree. See Travelers Ins. Co. v. Haden, 418 A.2d 1078 (D.C. 1980) (mere knowledge of insurer's claim insufficient to create liability on part of lawyer); Farmers Ins. Exchange v. Zerin, 53 Cal. App. 4th 445, 61 Cal. Rptr. 2d 707 (1997) (attorney not liable where he made no promise to protect subrogee's rights or property); Op. 95-12, Ohio Bd. of Comm'rs on Grievances and Discipline (Oct. 6, 1995); Op. 94-24, Phila. Bar Ass'n Prof. Guidance Comm. (Nov. 1994) (permissible to pay client where lawyer had made no promise to protect third party's interest); Inquiry 86-134, Phila. Bar Ass'n (no duty to pay medical service provider, or even to withhold funds, where no agreement by client to pay provider from settlement funds).

[5] A valid escrow agreement covering funds in the lawyer's possession conceivably also could be viewed as a "just claim" but such an arrangement involves a fiduciary duty on the part of the lawyer to all the parties to the agreement, not just to her own client. See Janson v. Cozen and O'Connor, 450 Pa. Super. 415, 676 A.2d 242 (1996) (no lawyer liability for third party claim where valid escrow agreement did not exist).

[6] See the discussion of "letters of protection" in Ohio Op. 95-12, 11 Law Man. Prof. Conduct 366 (1995); Conn. Informal Op. 95-20 (May 1, 1995).

counsel when the matter is settled. Heffelfinger, 290 A.2d at 393 & n. 2. The Court of Appeals apparently has not addressed the liability of successor counsel in such a situation. We think that from the standpoint of Rule 1.15, however, successor counsel who is aware of the contractual commitment of her client and of predecessor counsel is prohibited ethically from disbursing the funds to the client.

In a recent decision, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals affirmed disciplinary action against a lawyer who, among other things, failed to retain funds as to which a third party, an insurance carrier, had a statutory lien. In re Thomas, 740 A.2d 538 (D.C. 1999). In the Thomas case, the insurance carrier paid the medical expenses of the attorney's client and informed the defendant and the lawyer, who represented the plaintiff, that it was asserting its statutory lien for the amount of its medical payments. Upon settlement, the defendant sent a check to the plaintiff's attorney, made payable to the client, the attorney and the insurance company as the "lienholder." The attorney prepared and sent to his client a settlement statement apportioning funds to the insurance company, which was not disputed by the client. Thereafter, the client and the attorney endorsed the check from the defendant and the attorney deposited the payment in the attorney's client escrow fund, without advising the insurance company that he had received the check or that he had deposited it without the insurance company's endorsement. Ultimately, the attorney wrote checks to himself from that account that effectively depleted the account, paying none of the funds either to the client or to the insurance company.

The Board on Professional Responsibility concluded that the insurance carrier had a statutory lien on some of the funds that came into the lawyer's possession but that the exact amount was unknown. The Board found that the attorney was liable for, among other things, commingling funds in violation of Rule 1.15(a), misappropriation in violation of Rule 1.15(b) and failing to notify a third party promptly of funds in which the third party had an interest in violation of Rule 1.15(b). The District of Columbia Court of Appeals upheld the Board's determination that the insurance carrier had a lien in some amount, leaving unresolved the amount of the lien and whether the lien had been waived. Under these circumstances, the court held that the lawyer should not have withdrawn funds from the account while the insurance company's right to those funds was in legitimate dispute.

We believe that the facts and holding of this case come within standards (2) and (4) above. The insurance carrier was found by clear and convincing evidence to have a statutory lien, although whether it was fully perfected and whether it had been waived were disputed. Further, the lawyer and the client appeared to have had an agreement to recognize the propriety of the third party's claim and a commitment to pay it. While there is very broad language in the opinion suggesting that any third party claim may be sufficient to freeze client funds in the lawyer's possession, we believe that the decision should be limited to its facts, namely that (1) the claim related to particular funds that were made payable to the attorney and third party and (2) the third party had a lien that was recognized both by the lawyer and the client. As noted above, a broader reading that would let a third party freeze a client's funds indefinitely simply by lodging a claim with the client's attorney would raise significant due process questions. We do not believe that such a reading was intended by the Court.

Where a "just claim" exists, the lawyer is ethically obliged to disregard her clients demand for the property. See D.C. Op. 251 (1994); S.C. Op. 95-29; Ohio Op. 95-12 (Oct.6, 1995); S.C. Op. 93-14. Thus, this rule concerning "just claims" is an exception to the general principle of client loyalty.

On the other hand, a lawyer is not required to pay the general unsecured creditors of her client, including judgment creditors who have not attached or garnished the funds in the lawyer's possession, where there is not a "just claim" of the type described above. Scharf v. Statewide Grievance Comm., No. Civ. 94-0536033, 1995 Conn. Super. LEXIS 1471, 1996 WL 317090 (Conn. Super. Ct. May 11, 1995) (general unsecured creditor of client does not have interest sufficient to impose duty on lawyer to surrender funds); Conn. Informal Op. 95-20 (1995) (mere assertion of claim insufficient to create duty); Phila. Op. 94-24 (1994) (on lawyers representation that clients had personal injury claim, clients mortgagee stayed foreclosure sale of clients property; lawyers representation notwithstanding, no duty on lawyer to pay claim proceeds to mortgagee); Cleveland Op. 87-3 (1988) (mere judgment, without court order directed to attorney, insufficient to require attorney to pay funds to third party). In the words of the California Court of Appeals, > as a general matter, an attorney receiving payment of a judgment or settlement on behalf of his or her client has no obligation to satisfy the clients debts out of that fund. The attorney is not obligated to pay, for example, the clients dry cleaning bill or credit card debts even if on notice thereof. It is only when the creditor has some property interest in the fund or a trust relationship exists that such an obligation might arise.

Farmers Ins. Exch. v. Zerin, 53 Cal. App. 4th 445, 459, 61 Cal. Rptr. 2d 767 (Ct. App. 1997).

Commentators have also suggested that comment [4] to Rule 1.15 uses the phrases "just claims" and "duty under applicable law" to suggest that the third party must have a "matured legal or equitable claim in order to qualify for special protection." 1 GEOFFREY C. HAZARD, JR. AND W. WILLIAM HODES, THE LAW OF LAWYERING, § 1.15:302, at 460 (2d ed. 1990). Hazard and Hodes suggest that garnishment of the client's funds in the lawyer's possession is a potential means of protecting the third party's interest, but that the creditor must rely upon a court, rather than the client's lawyer, for such assistance. Id. § 1.15:303. Further, a comment to the draft Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers states:

> If a lawyer holds property belonging to one person and a second person has a contractual or similar claim against that person but does not claim to own the property or have a security interest on it, the lawyer is free to deliver the property to the person to whom it belongs.

RESTATEMENT OF THE LAW GOVERNING LAWYERS § 57 comment d. (Prop. Final Draft No. 1, 1996) (emphasis added).

Even more difficult problems arise when the proceeds of the recovery (whether by settlement or judgment) are insufficient to satisfy the "just claims" of various service providers. For example, where the litigation results in a recovery in which, after deduction of the lawyers contingent fee,[7]

[7] The D.C. Office of Bar Counsel has "taken the position that the attorney's right to claim a priority for his or her own fees and expenses presents a legal question . . . beyond the scope of [Rule 1.15] to address as an ethical question." Letter of Leonard H. Becker, Bar Counsel, to Irvin B. Nathan, Chair, D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Comm., at 2 (Aug. 23, 1999) (copy in the files of this Committee.

the remainder is insufficient to satisfy all the assignments the client has made to his medical providers, the lawyer is faced with difficult questions of how to disburse the funds. An obvious solution would be to pro rate the funds among the various providers but the disbursing lawyer presumably would be obliged to secure the consent of all the providers before doing so. Otherwise, the question may become one of priority of claims, which is a subject beyond the purview of this Committee. In such a case, a lawyer holding disputed funds would have to permit the competing claimants to resolve the matter among themselves. If the competing claimants were unable to resolve the disputed issues among themselves, filing an interpleader action might be the only avenue open to the lawyer.

Opinion No. 294

Sale of Law Practice By Retiring Lawyer

- It is not unethical for a retiring lawyer (i.e., a lawyer withdrawing from the private practice of law in the locale in which the lawyer had been practicing) to sell his law practice to another lawyer, provided that he is able to terminate the representation of his clients in a manner consistent with Rule 1.16(d), that clients are suitably informed of the sale transaction and agree to the new representation, and that client confidences and secrets are preserved while negotiating the sale of the practice. Additionally, the purchasing lawyer may not charge a discriminatory fee to the retiring lawyer's clients.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.5(a) (Reasonableness of fee)
- Rule 1.5(e) (Division of fees)
- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflicts of Interest)
- Rule 1.16 (Declining or Terminating representation)

Inquiry

We have been asked to advise on the propriety, under the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, of the sale of a law practice incident to the retirement of a lawyer. The only specific facts we have been given are that the inquirer, a solo practitioner, is planning to retire and is contemplating the sale of his law practice to another lawyer. We are assuming that the sale price does not include any physical assets, and that it is predicated essentially on the so-called "goodwill" value of the retiring lawyer's practice.[1] For the purpose of this Opinion, we are also assuming that the retiring lawyer is selling his entire practice and that payment for the sale will be made in a lump sum or in installments.

This Opinion is limited to the sale of an entire law practice to another lawyer upon the retirement of a lawyer. By "retirement," we mean the withdrawal of a lawyer from the private practice of law in the locale in which the lawyer had been practicing. Such retirement could occur when the lawyer decides to stop working because of age, disability, family responsibilities or other reasons; when the lawyer continues to practice law, but in a capacity in which he/she does not serve private clients (such as government service or as in-house counsel to a corporation); or when the lawyer relocates to another geographic locale. Nothing we say here should be taken as having any relevance whatever to attempted transfers of clients or a law practice under any other circumstances. We also do not address the ethics of the sale of a law firm name, the use of which is governed by Rule 7.5. See also D.C. Bar Op. 277 (Nov. 19, 1997).

Discussion

The retirement of a member of a law firm usually does not produce any discontinuity in client representation. In all likelihood, the firm's partnership or shareholder agreement or other formal or informal understandings will address transfer of responsibility for the client's matters to another lawyer in the firm. Fee-sharing concerns under Rule 1.5, confidentiality concerns under Rule 1.6 and conflict of interest concerns under Rule 1.7 do not exist when a lawyer transfers work to another lawyer in the same firm.

But for a solo practitioner, the situation is different. There is no law firm to continue representation of the lawyer's clients after his retirement, and there is no person or entity to pay the lawyer for his investment (in capital and in years of effort) in the law practice or for any goodwill associated with his practice. Thus, a solo practitioner does not have the means available to a lawyer practicing in a law firm to realize some value from a law practice which, handled by another lawyer, could continue after the lawyer's retirement.

1. Sale of a Law Practice Under the Code of Professional Responsibility

While there is no mention in the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct of the ethical implications of the sale of a law practice, the subject is not novel. Under the predecessor Code of Professional Responsibility, a non-binding Ethical Consideration (EC 4-6) stated that "a lawyer should not attempt to sell a law practice as a going business because, among other reasons, to do so would involve the disclosure of confidences and secrets."[2] Under the Code, however, no specific disciplinary rule prohibited the sale of a law practice.

There is authority in other jurisdictions that, under the Code of Professional Responsibility, the sale of a law practice was unethical. In Raphael v. Shapiro, 587 N.Y.S.2d 68, 72 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1992), for example, the court held that such a transaction was "void and unenforceable under Code of Professional Responsibility EC 4-6 . . . ." See also Geffen v. Moss, 125 Cal. Rptr. 687, 693 (1975).

Decisions in other contexts reached similar results. For example, in Dugan v. Dugan, 457 A.2d 1 (N.J. 1983), the court was asked to place a value on the goodwill of a sole practitioner's law practice for the purpose of an equitable distribution of property pursuant to a divorce. Citing the Code of Professional Responsibility, a state ethics opinion and various treatises and case law, the court explained that a sole practitioner was prohibited from selling his practice, and concluded that this prohibition had "an adverse effect" on the value of the practice's goodwill. Id. at 8-9.

[1] Goodwill has been described as "the value assigned to Detroit Bank & Trust Co. v Cooper, 287 N.W.2d 266, the expectation of future business." 268 (Mich. Ct. App. 1979), or "the probability that old customers of a concern will continue their custom and recommend it to others." O'Hara v. Ahlgren, Blumenfeld and Kempster, 537 N.E.2d 730 (Ill. 1989) (internal quotations and citations omitted).

[2] The Code of Professional Responsibility was in effect in the District of Columbia between 1972 and 1990.

2. Sale of a Law Practice in the Era of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct

While the American Bar Association's original 1983 Model Rules of Professional Conduct did not address the sale of a law practice, a 1990 amendment, Model Rule 1.17, did so.[3] The Model Rule, which has not been adopted in the District of Columbia or considered by the Court of Appeals, would permit a retiring lawyer to sell his law practice if the practice is sold in its entirety to another lawyer or law firm, notification and certain disclosures are made to the affected clients, and the transferee lawyer does not increase fees to be paid by the affected clients.[4]

At least twenty-one jurisdictions have adopted Model Rule 1.17 (or a variation of it) and thus permit the sale of a law practice when accomplished according to its conditions and requirements.[5] Two other jurisdictions (Kansas and Washington) that have not adopted Model Rule 1.17 have nevertheless approved the sale of a law practice, subject to the satisfaction of conditions imposed under the general ethical rules in effect in those jurisdictions. See Wash. Ethics Op. 192 (May 3, 1996); Kan. Ethics Op. 93-14 (Dec. 8, 1993).

At least one jurisdiction appears to adhere to the more traditional view that a sale of a law practice, under any circumstances, is unethical. See Arizona Ethics Op. 92-8 (June 22, 1992) (concluding that a sole practitioner cannot sell or lease the goodwill of his law practice). Maryland is also in this category (Prahanski v. Prahanski, 582 A.2d 784, 790-91 (Md. 1990)), but its law will change in January, 2000 when it adopts a version of ABA Model Rule 1.17.

We are aware of no decisions in the District of Columbia on this subject.

3. Sale of a Law Practice in the District of Columbia

In addressing the sale of a law practice under the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct, we act against a background of mixed opinions and conclusions elsewhere. We begin our analysis with the observation that our Rules do not directly address the sale of a law practice. Since no Rule directly addresses the subject, its ethical status depends on an analysis under the Rules of Professional Conduct of the conduct of which it is comprised. This conduct includes:

a. termination of the representation of clients by the retiring lawyer;

b. communication with clients by the retiring and transferee lawyers;

c. transfer of responsibility for client matters to another lawyer;

d. transfer of client information and files to another lawyer; and

e. receipt of funds by the retiring lawyer from the purchasing lawyer.

These types of activities are addressed in the Rules, and we discuss them below in the context of the sale of a law practice.

a. Termination of the Representation of a Client

A lawyer, even a retiring lawyer, may not terminate a representation without proper regard for his client's interests. Absent "cause" for termination (such as a physical or mental condition that impairs the lawyer's ability to represent the client, see Rule 1.16(a)(2), or certain client misconduct, see Rule 1.16(b)), a lawyer may terminate a client representation only "if withdrawal can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the interests of the client . . . ." Id. The termination must be accomplished in a manner that does not prejudice the client's interests. See Rule 1.16(d).

The retiring lawyer who plans to sell his law practice will be making a wholesale termination of all of his client representations. That there may be another lawyer (the proposed transferee of the practice) available to continue the retiring lawyer's work does not diminish the retiring lawyer's responsibilities under Rule 1.16(b), because his clients are not obliged to accept representation by the transferee lawyer. Thus, merely making another lawyer available to a client does not satisfy the lawyer's responsibilities under Rule 1.16. Cf. D.C. Bar Op. 273 (Sept. 17, 1997); D.C. Bar Op. 270 (March 19, 1997); D.C. Bar Op. 266 (June 19, 1996). If the retiring lawyer's clients do not specifically agree to representation by the proposed transferee lawyer, the retiring lawyer will have to seek other ways of satisfying his continuing obligations to his current clients, such as by completing the representations himself, identifying another lawyer acceptable to these clients, or giving the client sufficient advance notice of his retirement to allow the client to himself obtain successor counsel. See Rule 1.16(d).[6]

[3] The text of ABA Model Rule 1.17 reads as follows:

A lawyer or a law firm may sell or purchase a law practice, including goodwill, if the following conditions are satisfied:

(a) The seller ceases to engage in the private practice of law [in the geographic area] [in the jurisdiction] (a jurisdiction may elect either version) in which the practice has been conducted.

(b) The practice is sold as an entirety to another lawyer or law firm;

(c) Actual written notice is given to each of the seller's clients regarding:

(1) the proposed sale;

(2) the terms of any proposed change in the fee arrangement authorized by paragraph (d);

(3) the client's right to retain other counsel or to take possession of the file; and

(4) the fact that the client's consent to the sale will be presumed if the client does not take any action or does not otherwise object within ninety (90) days of receipt of the notice.

If a client cannot be given notice, the representation of that client may be transferred to the purchaser only upon entry of an order so authorizing by a court having jurisdiction. The seller may disclose to the court in camera information relating to the representation only to the extent necessary to obtain an order authorizing the transfer of a file.

(d) The fees charged clients shall not be increased by reason of the sale. The purchaser may, however, refuse to undertake the representation unless the client consents to pay the purchaser fees at a rate not exceeding the fees charged by the purchaser for rendering substantially similar services prior to the initiation of the purchase negotiations.

[4] We have been advised that ABA Model Rule 1.17 has been before the District of Columbia Bar's Rules Revision Committee, but has not received substantive evaluation by the Committee.

[5] These jurisdictions are: Alaska, Colorado, Florida, Hawaii, Indiana, Iowa, Maryland (effective January, 2000), Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, Virginia (effective January, 2000), West Virginia, and Wisconsin.

[6] There may be some circumstances, perhaps not unique in retirement, in which a lawyer seeking to withdraw from a representation, through no fault of the lawyer, is unable to communicate with his client or receives no communication from his client in response to a notification of withdrawal. Where, for whatever reason, the withdrawal is ethically correct and must occur notwithstanding such inability to communicate, it may be proper for the retiring lawyer to transfer responsibility for the representation to another lawyer for the limited purpose of preventing the occurrence of an event (such as the passage of a limitations period or the date of a mandatory governmental filing) which might

b. Client Communications

An obvious premise of any sale of a law practice is the transferee lawyer's access to the retiring lawyer's practice, i.e., his client relationships. But those relationships (unlike many ordinary commercial contract relationships) cannot be sold or assigned by the retiring lawyer, because they are personal and terminable at will by the client. (See, e.g., Rule 1.16 cmt. [4]). So, to facilitate a transfer of the retiring lawyer's practice, the transferee lawyer might require as part of the transaction that the retiring lawyer make a suitable introduction of his clients to the transferee lawyer. Such a referral might take the form of a personalized or general mailing or other communication by the retiring lawyer to his clients announcing his intention to retire and introducing the transferee lawyer to the addressee clients.

That conduct by the retiring lawyer, which is really an effort by that lawyer to persuade his clients to agree to terminate their relationship with him and to retain another lawyer, is fraught with ethical concerns. For one, the effort presents a significant conflict of interest on the part of the retiring lawyer. In communicating with current clients, asking them to transfer their legal work from him to another lawyer, the retiring lawyer is promoting his personal financial and other interests, in addition to his clients' interests in an orderly and competent continuation of their legal representation. The conflict is one described in Rule 1.7(b)(4), where "the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by . . . the lawyer's own financial, business, property or personal interests."

Such a communication does not appear to be anywhere prohibited in the Rules, but it must be accompanied by a disclosure (preferably in writing; see Comment [20] to Rule 1.7) that meets the requirements of Rule 1.7(c), so the client is aware of the lawyer's financial interest in seeking the client's agreement to terminate the representation and to be represented by another lawyer, so that the client can give an informed consent to such action, and so that the client understands that he is not obliged to accept representation by the proposed transferee lawyer and may select his own lawyer. Such a disclosure would, at a minimum, have to include the following:

- notification that the proposed transfer is pursuant to the lawyer's decision to retire;
- a description of the business arrangement between the retiring and transferee lawyers sufficient to inform the client of the retiring lawyer's financial interest in the requested transfer of the matter to the new lawyer;
- a description of the proposed transferee lawyer's experience and ability to represent the client, including any reasons why the client might be less favorably represented by the new lawyer; and a notification that the client is not obliged to accept the proposed transfer and that, if he does not, the retiring lawyer may withdraw from the representation (if that can be ethically accomplished under Rule 1.16).

The retiring lawyer, while still representing his clients, is obliged under Rule 1.1 to provide competent representation to them. In the context of a recommendation of another lawyer to his clients, Rule 1.1 would require the retiring lawyer to act competently in selecting a transferee lawyer.

The proposed transferee lawyer may also wish to communicate with the clients proposed for transfer. Before providing client identifying information (e.g., names and addresses) to the transferee lawyer, the retiring lawyer should determine whether it is ethical to disclose such information to the transferee lawyer. (See discussion below concerning the confidentiality of client identities.) Such a communication by the transferee lawyer is not unethical in the District of Columbia so long as it is not false or misleading and does not violate any other general regulation of contacts with prospective clients under Rule 7.1(b). See D.C. Bar Op. 249 (July 19, 1994).

c. Transfer of Responsibility for the Representation

If the client agrees to the new representation by the proposed transferee lawyer, the retiring lawyer will have all of the responsibilities of a lawyer terminating a representation.[7] That lawyer will need to return to the client any property he holds (including any advances of fees and/or expenses) (Rules 1.15(b), 1.16(d)), and will need to transfer files to the transferee lawyer and take such other steps as will facilitate an orderly transfer of responsibility to the transferee lawyer.[8]

The transferee lawyer should treat the transferred client as he would any new client, by investigating whether any conflict of interest might affect the new representation and taking steps to disclose the conflict and seek the client's consent to the representation, all as provided under Rule 1.7. The fee communication required under Rule 1.5(b) is also necessary.

d. The Transfer of Client Information and Files to Another Lawyer

During the course of the retiring lawyer's discussions/negotiations with the prospective purchaser of his practice, questions about the nature of the retiring lawyer's practice, clientele and perhaps individual client matters will surely be asked, or such information may be volunteered by the retiring lawyer. Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality) provides guidance on what client-related information the retiring lawyer can use or reveal under these circumstances.

Rule 1.6(a) defines the information to be protected by a lawyer as client confidences and secrets. "Confidences" are that information protected under the common law attorney-client privilege, and "secrets" include all information gained in the course of the representation, whether from the client or from another source, "that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing or would be likely to be detrimental to the client." Rule 1.6, cmt. [6]. Under Rule 1.6 (b), such information may only be used by the lawyer for the benefit of the client. Since the retiring lawyer's efforts to sell his law practice are primarily for the lawyer's benefit, and not the client's, no information protected by Rule 1.6(a) may be dis-prejudice the client. Exactly how the retiring lawyer should proceed under these circumstances would depend on the facts, including the nature of the anticipated prejudice to the client and the confidential or secret information that would have to be disclosed to the transferee lawyer to allow that lawyer to protect the client's interest.

[7] There is no requirement in the Rules that the termination and transfer agreement be in writing, but the interests of both the retiring lawyer and the client would be better served by a written agreement.

[8] Rule 1.15(a) also requires a lawyer to preserve records of client funds and property for five years after termination of the representation. As regard the disposition of files of a former representation, see D.C. Bar Op. 283 (July 15, 1998).

closed by the retiring lawyer in this activity without the affected clients' informed consent.

Nevertheless, some information about the retiring lawyer's practice can be discussed with the prospective purchaser without the consent of the affected clients. Some of such information is clearly not confidential and some may not be secret, depending on the circumstances. The number of clients proposed for transfer, the retiring lawyer's aggregate billing, receivables and income history, and general descriptions of the nature of the retiring lawyer's cases usually can be disclosed without risk of violating Rule 1.6. No confidential or secret information would likely be contained in this information. If it does not reveal information about specific clients, the retiring lawyer also may be able to provide some information about specific cases, such as the claims or areas of advice or consultation involved and the billing history of the matter.

Disclosure of specific client and adverse party identities is more problematic. It may be that, in some settings, the identity of a client and an adverse party will not be confidential or secret, as when these names are mentioned in a public document, such as a complaint or answer. But even if included in a public document, the names could be a secret. As we noted in D.C. Bar Op. 124 (March 22, 1983), "even if the fact of representation were known by someone other than the attorney or the client, thereby destroying the confidentiality necessary to the attorney-client privilege, the fact of the representation could still constitute a 'secret' if the avoidance of additional disclosure was, nevertheless, desirable." (See also D.C. Bar Op. 246 (Revised) (Oct. 18, 1994) for a further discussion of the application of Rule 1.6 to information that has appeared in publicly filed documents.) In many settings, particularly in a counseling (as distinct from a litigation) practice, the fact that a person has sought legal advice by a lawyer may be confidential. See. e.g., D.C. Bar Op. 124 (opining that the identities of clients who sought tax advice, including several members of Congress, should be protected under Rule 1.6).

Substantive information about a specific representation is most likely to be confidential, and so not disclosable by the retiring lawyer without client consent.

e. Fees to be Paid to the Retiring Lawyer

There are many different methods by which the transferee lawyer could pay the retiring lawyer for the transfer of the latter's law practice. These would include a lump sum payment at the time of sale, installment payments not tied to the fees earned from the clients transferred to the purchasing lawyer, and periodic payments related in some way to the fees earned from such clients.

Where the payment (lump sum or installment) to the retiring lawyer is unrelated to the fees to be earned by the purchasing lawyer, we see no ethical concern for the retiring lawyer. For the transferee lawyer, Model Rule 1.17(d) requires that "[t]he fees charged clients shall not be increased by reason of the sale," although it would permit the transferee lawyer to charge higher fees "at a rate not exceeding the fees charged by the purchaser for rendering substantially similar services prior to the initiation of the purchase negotiations." We observe only that, under Rule 1.5(a), the fees charged by the transferee lawyer to transferred clients must be "reasonable."[9]

Where the payment to the retiring lawyer is tied to the receipt of fees by the purchasing lawyer, Rule 1.5 (e) is implicated. That Rule prohibits the sharing of legal fees with a lawyer not practicing in the same firm as the lawyer receiving the fees unless the division is in proportion to the services rendered by each lawyer or the lawyers assume joint responsibility for the representation; the client is informed of, and consents to, the division of fees; and the total fee is reasonable. In D.C. Bar Op. 286 (Nov. 17, 1998), we held that a payment of something of value to someone which is tied to the receipt of legal fees is a form of fee-sharing subject to Rule 1.5(e). In the situation before us, the payments to the retiring lawyer, if tied to the receipt of fees from the transferred clients, would be a form of fee-sharing. Unless the arrangement met the conditions of Rule 1.5 (e), this form of payment for the transfer of a retiring lawyer's practice would be unethical.

Inquiry No. 98-7-20
Approved: December 21, 1999

[9] Rule 1.5(a) lists the following as factors to be considered in evaluating the reasonableness of a lawyer's fee:

(1) The time and labor required, the novelty and difficulty of the questions involved, and the skill requisite to perform the legal service properly;

(2) The likelihood, if apparent to the client, that the acceptance of the particular employment will preclude other employment by the lawyer;

(3) The fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services;

(4) The amount involved and the results obtained;

(5) The time limitations imposed by the client or by the circumstances;

(6) The nature and length of the professional relationship with the client;

(7) The experience, reputation, and ability of the lawyer or lawyers performing the services; and

(8) Whether the fee is fixed or contingent.

Opinion No. 295

Restriction on Communications with a Represented Parent by a Lawyer Acting as Guardian Ad Litem in a Child Abuse and Neglect Proceeding

• A lawyer appointed to act as a guardian ad litem in a child abuse and neglect proceeding in the District of Columbia represents the child and the best interests of the child. In the absence of a conflict between the two interests, the guardian ad litem is the child's lawyer. Each of the child's parents may be represented by separate counsel. Under Rule 4.2, the guardian ad litem may not communicate about the subject of the representation with either of the child's represented parents without notification of and consent from the parent's lawyer. The guardian ad litem may communicate directly with a represented parent if the sole purpose of the communication is to obtain information about how to contact the child or to schedule a meeting with the child. Such communication would be administrative in nature and would not be "about the subject of the representation."

Applicable Rules

• Rule 3.5 (Impartiality and Decorum of the Tribunal)
• Rule 4.2 (Communication Between Lawyer and Opposing Parties)
• Rule 8.4(a) (Misconduct)

Inquiry

The inquirer seeks advice about whether a lawyer appointed to act as guardian ad litem in a child abuse and neglect proceeding may communicate with a parent of the child she represents, who is represented by counsel, without permission from the parent's lawyer. The inquiry posits that "Because of the nature of the work, it is sometimes very difficult to avoid all communications without prior attorney permission. . . . The attorneys who are appointed as Guardian Ad Litem are required to talk to the respondent and, . . . because of the respondent's age or mental capacity, the GAL may have no alternative but to inquire of the parent or caretaker about the welfare of the respondent."

The inquiry poses several hypotheticals for discussion, which are summarized below.

1. The GAL and the parent who is the alleged abuser have arrived early for the initial hearing. Counsel for that parent has not yet arrived. That parent is the only person present who knows the whereabouts of the child. The GAL wants to talk to the child before the initial hearing and wants to ask the parent for the child's address and telephone number. May the GAL do so without waiting for parent's counsel to arrive?

2. The social worker/probation officer/education advocate and opposing counsel, including the GAL, are in a meeting. During the meeting, is it permissible for the social worker to call the allegedly abusive parent and ask questions posed by the GAL without the knowledge or permission of the parent's lawyer?

3. The respondent is a child under the age of six or is mentally incapacitated. The GAL wants to talk to the parent about the child's progress or condition. The parent might give information to the GAL that would be detrimental to the parent. May the GAL talk to the parent to obtain information about the welfare of the child without the permission of the parent's counsel?

4. The parent's counsel wants to talk to the child with only the parent present. May the GAL insist on being present when the parent s lawyer interviews the child?

Discussion

In the District of Columbia, allegations of child neglect are adjudicated in the Superior Court. The D.C. Code provides:

> Superior Court shall in every case involving a neglected child which results in a judicial proceeding, . . . appoint a guardian ad litem who is an attorney to represent the child in the proceedings. The guardian ad litem shall in general be charged with the representation of the child's best interest. D.C. Code section 16-2304(b)(3) (1999).

The parent(s) or guardian of the child also may be represented by counsel. The D.C. Court of Appeals explained that the child's guardian ad litem occupies a dual role, as "neutral fact-finder" for the judge and as "zealous advocate" on behalf of the child's best interests. S.S. v. D.M., 597A. 2d 870, 875 (1991). Both the statute and the case law make clear that, additional responsibilities notwithstanding, the GAL in neglect proceedings is the child's lawyer.[1] As such, there is no question but that a lawyer acting as a guardian ad litem is bound to comply with the Rules of Professional Conduct.[2]

DC Rule 4.2(a) draws a relatively bright line on communications between lawyers and persons who are represented by counsel. The rule states:

> During the course of representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party known to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the prior consent of the lawyer representing such other party or is authorized by law to do so.

This committee has interpreted Rule 4.2 to impose a clear prohibition on communication by a lawyer with a represented party absent consent of that party's counsel. The committee read the rule to apply to a lawyer representing himself in a proceeding in which the other party was represented by counsel. Opinion No. 258 (1995). We also found the rule to require consent of counsel before a lawyer contacted a represented opposing party about a part of a proceeding in which the opposing counsel was not representing his client. D.C. Bar Op. 263 (1996)

1. Communication with Represented Persons without Notice and Consent of Opposing Counsel

Once the role of the GAL (as lawyer for the child) is clarified, the answer to the main question posed in the first and third hypotheticals above is relatively straightforward. The parent who is alleged to have engaged in abuse or neglect is a party to the proceeding and is represented by counsel. Therefore, the GAL may not communicate with that parent about the substance of the matter without the consent of the parent's lawyer.

The GAL has a dual role as advocate and as fact-finder, but the authorizing legislation gives no indication that a GAL is "authorized by law" to collect information from the child's parent without the consent of the parent's lawyer.[3]

In interpreting Model Rule 4.2, the ABA Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility said that the purpose of the rule is to:

> provide protection of the represented person against overreaching by adverse counsel, safeguard the client-lawyer relationship from interference by adverse counsel, and reduce the likelihood that clients will disclose privileged or other information that might harm their interests. ABA Formal Op. 95-396 (1995).

[1] The one exception to the assertion that the GAL is the child's lawyer is if there is a conflict between the child's preferences and the child's best interests. In the absence of a conflict, the GAL can represent both the child and her best interests. If there is a conflict, then the GAL should represent the child's best interests and should ask the court to appoint another lawyer for the child. In re L.H., 634 A.2d 1230 (1993). In this opinion, we address the obligations of a GAL whose responsibilities include acting as a child's lawyer.

[2] See S.S. v. D.M., 597 A.2d 870, 877 (1991) (discussing the application of Rule 3.7 to a GAL); Opinion No. 252 (1995) (addressing the obligations of a lawyer appointed as a guardian ad litem in a child abuse and neglect proceeding with respect to potential tort claims of the child).

[3] The appointment of lawyer GALs for children in neglect proceedings is authorized by D.C. Code section 16-2304(a) (1999) and by D.C. SCR-Neglect Rule 27 (1999). Neither lays out specific powers or duties of the guardian at litem. The duties are spelled out in a set of informal guidelines issued by the Superior Court called "Practice Standards for Attorneys in Neglect Cases in the District of Columbia Superior Court". These standards describe the GAL's duties as counsel for the child, explain what the GAL should do in the case of a conflict between the child's wishes and the GAL's view of the child's best interests, and describes the GAL's fact-finding duties. These include obligations to interview the client and "all significant persons who have information about the family" including the child's parents. In the absence of an explicit statement that the GAL may conduct these interviews without the consent of the other parties' counsel, the guidelines cannot be found to exempt GALs from compliance with Rule. 4.2.

The fact that the client is a child does not excuse a GAL from respecting the rights of other parties as required by the rule. The child's parent may be at risk of termination of parental rights because of child abuse and neglect. That parent is entitled to the protection afforded by legal representation. The boundary set by the rule may be inconvenient or cumbersome, but it is a boundary nevertheless.

The parent not charged with abuse or neglect also may be represented by counsel. That parent may not be a party to the proceeding, but Rule 4.2 still applies. Although Rule 4.2(a) is worded to refer to a "party" represented by counsel, Comment [4] states: "This Rule also covers any person, whether or not a party to a formal proceeding, who is represented by counsel concerning the matter in question." Under Rule 4.2, the GAL may not communicate with any parent or guardian who is represented by counsel about anything relating to the child abuse and neglect proceeding without the consent of that person's lawyer.

2. Communication about Scheduling or Administrative Matters

The first hypothetical posed in the inquiry posits a situation in which the GAL wishes to speak to the child's parent merely to obtain information about how to contact the child. While Rule 4.2 states no exception for contact limited to purely administrative or ministerial questions, such contact would not thwart the purpose of the rule, because the parent is not being asked for information about which advice of counsel might be sought. As counsel for the child, the GAL must be entitled to information about the whereabouts of the child.

The comments to Rule 4.2 do not address this "ministerial information" question directly, but they do interpret the rule to allow direct contact to obtain non-substantive information from an organization. Comment [5] states:

> This Rule does not apply to the situation in which a lawyer contacts employees of an organization for the purpose of obtaining information generally available to the public, or obtainable under the Freedom of Information Act, even if the information in question is related to the representation. For example, a lawyer for a plaintiff who has filed suit against an organization represented by a lawyer may telephone the organization to request a copy of a press release regarding the representation, without disclosing the lawyer's identity, obtaining the consent of the organization's lawyer, or otherwise acting as paragraphs (a) and (b) of this Rule require.

The comments to Rule 4.2 also provide that a lawyer may communicate with another party about matters outside the representation. While a request for information about the location of the child is not unrelated to the representation, neither is it a request for information relating to the substance of the representation.

The rules prohibiting ex parte communication with judges offer useful guidance here. The 1990 Model Code of Judicial Conduct, Canon 3B(7)(a) permits ex parte communications for "scheduling, administrative purposes or emergencies that do not deal with substantive matters or issues on the merits . . . "[4] DC Rule 3.5(b), like the Model Rule, says "A lawyer shall not . . . communicate ex parte with a [judge] except as permitted by law." This rule does not articulate the "administrative matters" exception explicitly, but is widely understood not to prohibit communication relating to administrative or scheduling matters." The rule against ex parte communications, like Rule 4.2, is intended to ensure that both lawyers in a case have the opportunity to participate in discussion of matters of substance relating to the case. But a lawyer who contacts a judge's chambers to get an address or to find out a filing deadline does not violate the rule.

We conclude that a GAL may contact a child's parent to get contact information, to schedule a meeting with the child, or for other administrative purposes. To read the rule otherwise would add needless burdens to the already difficult task of representing a child in an abuse and neglect proceeding.

3. Communication Through a Third Party

If the GAL may not talk to the parents on any matters of substance without permission from their lawyers, may the GAL relay questions to a parent through a social worker without permission? Again, the answer is clearly "no". Rule 4.2 states: "During the course of representation of a client, a lawyer shall not communicate or cause another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party known to be represented by counsel" absent consent of the lawyer for the other party or other legal authority. Rule 8.4 states: "It is professional misconduct for a lawyer to: (a) violate or attempt to violate the Rules of Professional Conduct, knowingly assist or induce another to do so, or do so through the acts of another." A GAL may not use a social worker or any other third party as a go-between to circumvent Rule 4.2.

If a social worker called a parent to ask questions that the social worker needed to get answered and then shared the answers to those questions with the GAL, Rule 4.2(a) would not apply. In such circumstances, the lawyer might learn information that she would not be entitled to seek directly from the parent without the consent of the parent's counsel. Child neglect proceedings are intended to be less adversarial and to involve more sharing of information than most proceedings that involve only adults. Rule 4.2 does not prohibit a lawyer from learning information through that process, only from "communicat[ing] or caus[ing] another to communicate about the subject of the representation with a party known to be represented by another lawyer" without the consent of the other lawyer. A GAL must not initiate such an inquiry or direct another person to do so.

If during a meeting between a GAL and a social worker, the GAL poses questions and the social worker calls one of the child's parents to ask the questions, the GAL has violated Rule 4.2 by doing through the acts of another something that the GAL is prohibited from doing. It is no solution to this problem for the lawyer and the social worker to agree that the lawyer's questions are really the social worker's questions. In fact if the social worker calls a parent during the meeting to ask a question raised by the lawyer at the meeting and reports the conversation to the GAL, Rule 4.2 has been evaded. See ABA Comm. on Ethics and Professional Responsibility, Formal Op. 95-396 (1995) (stating that a lawyer would be responsible for ex parte contacts made by an investigator under her supervision if she had not made reasonable efforts to prevent the contacts, if she had directed the investigator to make them, or if she knew that the investigator was going to make the contacts and failed to instruct him not to do so.)

[4] The ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct has not been adopted by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, but is referred to as guidance in the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 3.5, comment [1].

4. Communication with Parents about Very Young or Mentally Disabled Children

The inquiry asks whether the barrier to direct contact with a parent is lower if the client is very young or is mentally incapacitated. Again the answer is no, except for contact for administrative or scheduling purposes. The GAL may not be able to communicate directly with a young or mentally disabled child, and might need to get information through the parent. It may be frustrating that another barrier is added to this one—that the GAL may not contact the parent but must first contact the parent's lawyer. Still, the parent is represented by counsel and is entitled to have the GAL contact the parent's lawyer before contacting the parent.

5. Communication with the Child by Opposing Counsel

Another question is whether the parent's lawyer may interview the child without the GAL being present. The answer is still no, unless the parent's lawyer contacts the GAL to ask permission to interview the child without the GAL being present, and the GAL allows this interview to take place. If the GAL declines, the parent's lawyer must not communicate with the child except in the presence of or through the GAL. Rule 4.2 applies equally to protect child clients and adult clients. See South Carolina Advisory Op. 97-15 (Dec. 1997) (concluding that under Rule 4.2, the parent's lawyer must notify the guardian ad litem and her or his counsel and gain consent prior to communicating with a child in a child abuse proceeding); North Carolina Ethics Op. RPC 249 (April 3, 1997) (concluding that a lawyer representing a parent in a child abuse proceeding may not communicate with a child who is represented by a GAL and an attorney advocate unless the lawyer obtains the consent of the attorney advocate.); New York Ethics Op. 656 (1993) (concluding that a parent's attorney in a child custody proceeding may not communicate with a child for whom the court has appointed a law guardian without the law guardian's consent).

Child abuse and neglect proceedings involve multiple parties, often multiple lawyers, and some non-lawyer participants. Each parent may have a separate lawyer. Another lawyer represents the government. There may be a social worker, a probation officer, or an education advocate. In addition to the multiplicity of parties, child abuse and neglect matters involve both formal hearings and informal meetings. The barrier imposed by Rule 4.2 may produce a cost in terms of loss of informality and sometimes loss of access to direct communication.

A more worrisome problem is that a GAL might ask a parent's lawyer for permission to talk to the parent, and consent might be denied, or the parent's lawyer might not respond to the request. This committee addressed this problem as it relates to a lawyer representing a client in a civil protection order proceeding in D.C. Bar Op. No. 263 (1996). The committee stated that a lawyer may not:

> use 4.2(a) . . . to prevent any . . . communications between the petitioner's lawyer and the respondent. The petitioner's lawyer needs to be able to communicate in some way with the respondent . . . be it directly or through counsel. . . . If the respondent's lawyer refuses to allow such communication with the respondent directly, then the lawyer must accept communication from the petitioner's lawyer and take appropriate steps in response, such as transmitting the information to his client and acting on his client's wishes. . . . To fail to do so would, in our opinion, constitute a violation of Rule 1.4 (requiring a lawyer to keep his client informed about the status of a matter).

The same point might be made here; that while Rule 4.2 imposes a barrier on one lawyer, Rule 1.4 imposes a duty on the other lawyer to communicate promptly with his client a request for contact by the child's lawyer. Also Rule 4.4 says that "a lawyer shall not use means that have no substantial purpose other than to embarrass, delay, or burden a third person . . ." The comment to rule 4.4 states that although the interests of others are subordinate to those of the client, the responsibility to a client "does not imply that a lawyer may disregard the rights of third persons." This point is particularly critical in neglect proceedings, where in some cases (e.g., if the client is very young) the GAL cannot get any information about her client except from a represented party. In every case, the GAL has an affirmative duty to talk to all of those who have information relevant to the determination of the child's best interests. The parents' lawyers' diligence in responding to requests for consent is essential to the functioning of the process. Lawyers for parents in neglect proceedings should be conscientious in responding to requests from GALs to communicate with the parents of the children they represent.

Adopted: February 15, 2000

Opinion No. 296

Joint Representation: Confidentiality of Information

- A lawyer who undertakes representation of two clients in the same matter should address in advance and, where possible in writing, the impact of joint representation on the lawyer's duty to maintain client confidences and to keep each client reasonably informed, and obtain each client's informed consent to the arrangement. The mere fact of joint representation, without more, does not provide a basis for implied authorization to disclose one client's confidences to another.

- Where express consent to share client confidences has not been obtained and one client shares in confidence relevant information that the lawyer should report to the non-disclosing client in order to keep that client reasonably informed, to satisfy his duty to the non-disclosing client the lawyer should seek consent of the disclosing client to share the information or ask the client to disclose the information directly to the other client. If the lawyer cannot achieve disclosure, a conflict of interest is created that requires withdrawal.

- Where the disclosed confidence involves fraud or criminal activity that may detrimentally affect others involved in the representation in the future, in withdrawing, the lawyer may retract or disaffirm documents that were premised on the fraud.

Inquiry

The inquirer, a private law firm ("Firm"), has asked whether it is allowed or obligated to advise an employer, who paid the law firm to obtain a work trainee visa from the Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS") for its alien employee, of its subsequent discovery that the employee had fabricated the credentials that qualified her for the visa.

The Firm was originally contacted by an alien who had been referred by a law firm ("Employer") who wanted to employ her with the objective of becoming work authorized. At the outset it was clear that the Employer would be responsible for the Firm's legal fees. The Firm drafted a retainer agreement, addressed only to the Employer, stating that the Firm would jointly represent the alien and the Employer. The retainer agreement did not address the impact of joint representation on client confidences or seek consent for the Firm to share confidences of one party to the joint representation with the other. Nor did the retainer agreement address the potential that a conflict of interest between the Employer and the alien employee could arise in the future or the consequences of such a conflict. The agreement provided signature lines for both the alien and the Employer but it was never signed or returned to the Firm. Neither the alien nor the Employer disputed the terms of the retainer and the subsequent representation was consistent with the terms of the unsigned retainer agreement.

The Firm prepared an INS filing in reliance on interviews with the alien and the Employer and entered an appearance with the INS on behalf of both the alien and the Employer. However, the petition for the visa was signed only by the Firm and by the Employer as petitioner, under penalty of perjury. The petition was granted.

Subsequently, the alien communicated with the Firm to request advice regarding obtaining an extension of her alien-trainee visa. A memo was provided to the alien containing brief instructions and fee terms. The Employer issued a check for that fee and signed the extension petition under penalty of perjury.

After the work was completed and approvals and extensions issued, the alien spontaneously disclosed to the Firm that she had falsified the credentials that were submitted by the Firm in support of the filings. Absent the falsified credentials, she would not have qualified for the visa. Promptly upon learning of the falsification, the Firm sent the alien a letter confirming that neither it nor to the best of the Firm's knowledge, the Employer, knew of the falsification when the petitions were filed. The Firm also notified the alien that due to the falsification the firm was withdrawing from further representation of the alien. The Firm did not ask the alien to correct the record with the INS or to inform the Employer of the false application. Nor did the Firm ask the employee to consent to the Firm informing the Employer. The Firm did not contact the Employer to withdraw from representation.

The Firm desires to advise fully at least the petitioning Employer of the alien employee's falsification. However, it does not wish to violate any duty under Rule 1.6 to protect client confidences or secrets that may exist between the alien and the Firm. The Firm emphasizes that the alien did not predicate her revelation to the Firm with any questions regarding confidentiality nor were there any assurances that the conversation would be confidential. The Firm suggests that the retention may have ended once the visa and extension were obtained.

Discussion

1. Is the admission a protected confidence or secret under Rule 1.6?

At the outset, we must evaluate who enjoys the benefit of the attorney-client relationship on the facts presented. The mere fact that the Employer agreed to pay the legal fees incurred in obtaining a visa for the alien does not establish client status for the Employer. Conversely, it would be possible that the Firm represented only the Employer and thus owed no duty to maintain the confidences of the alien employee. In this case, however, the retainer agreement confirming representation of both the Employer and the alien coupled with the entry of appearance at the INS on behalf of both parties reflects the law firm's intent to undertake a joint representation of the Employer and the alien seeking the visa. Thus, the alien and the Employer are each entitled to the protection of Rule 1.6.

Rule 1.6 prohibits in relevant part 1) disclosure of client confidences and secrets and 2) the use of a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client to the disadvantage of the client. A threshold question is whether the alien's spontaneous statement that she had lied is a "confidence or secret" within the meaning of the Rule. Rule 1.6(b) defines the terms as follows:

"Confidence" refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law, and "secret" refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client.

Based on the facts provided by the Firm, there is some question as to whether the alien employee's disclosure would qualify as information protected by the attorney-client privilege in that the communication may not have been made in order to obtain legal advice. This is a legal question beyond the Committee's purview because questions of privilege arise under the law of evidence, not the Rules of Professional Conduct.

It does appear, however, that the information is a "secret" for purposes of Rule 1.6 in that the information was obtained in the course of the professional relationship and disclosure, at a minimum, would be embarrassing and would likely be detrimental to the client. There is some suggestion by the inquiring law firm that, because the legal assignment had been completed, the representation of the alien had terminated. It is noteworthy in this regard, that upon learning of the falsification, the Firm wrote to the alien advising her that the firm was withdrawing from representation. Thus, it would appear that the law firm believed that an attorney-client relationship still existed at the time it learned of the falsification. Thus the strictures of Rule 1.6 obtain unless an exception applies.

2. The effect of joint representation on the lawyer's duties under Rule 1.6.

A necessary predicate to a decision to undertake joint representation is an initial determination that the interests of the joint clients can be pursued without conflict. No matter how consistent the apparent interests of clients in a joint representation may appear at the onset, however, such a relationship poses inherent risks of future conflicts of interest. Such conflicts arise under Rule 1.7(b)(2) and (b)(3), where the representation of one client would be, or is likely to be, adversely affected by the representation of another client.

By way of analogy, Rule 2.2, which addresses the lawyer's role as intermediary, provides guidance. In summary, Rule 2.2 permits a lawyer to act as intermediary between two clients only where (1) there is consultation "with each client concerning the implications of the common representation and [the lawyer] obtains each client's consent"; (2) the lawyer reasonably believes each client's best interests will be served and each will be able to make "reasonably informed" decisions; and (3) the lawyer reasonably believes the joint representation can be accomplished impartially and without improper affect on the other ethical responsibilities to the clients. Rule 2.2(a). The Rule provides that except in unusual circumstances, disclosure of risks involved in "common representation" must be in writing, as well as the client's consent to the representation with those risks disclosed.

While the joint representation posed here does not involve the attorney as "intermediary", the provisions of Rule 2.2 nonetheless provide an analogous framework to evaluate the ethical concerns of representing more than one client in the same matter. In a joint representation, a lawyer owes ethical duties of loyalty and confidentiality, as well as the duty to inform, to each client. A joint representation in and of itself does not alter the lawyer's ethical duties to each client, including the duty to protect each client's confidences. Other state bar associations have reached results consistent with the analysis. New York State Bar Op. No. 555 ("mere joint employment" not sufficient to imply consent to disclosure); Florida Formal Op. 92-5 (in joint representation of husband and wife in estate planning where husband reveals confidence to attorney, duty of confidentiality prevails); Association of the Bar of the City of New York Op. 1999-07; New York State Bar Op. No. 1994-10.

Comment [8] to Rule 2.2 underscores the difficulty of balancing ethical duties to two clients in the same manner:

> In a common representation, the lawyer is still required both to keep each client adequately informed and to maintain confidentiality of information relating to the representation. See Rules 1.4 and 1.6. Complying with both requirements while acting as intermediary requires a delicate balance. If the balance cannot be maintained, the common representation is improper.

Because of this "delicate" ethical balance, Rule 2.2. generally requires the lawyer to provide "both clients with an explanation in writing of the risks involved in the common representation and of the circumstances that may cause separate representation later to be necessary or desirable. The consent of the clients shall also be in writing." Rule 2.2(b). Comment [2] to Rule 2.2 underscores that the explanation of risks and consent must be in writing because "the potential for confusion is so great." A written explanation requires the lawyer to "focus specifically on those risks" and educates the client to "risks that many clients may not otherwise comprehend."

While Rule 2.2 is addressed to the lawyer as intermediary, its requirements suggests the difficult ethical issues under Rule 1.7(b)(2) and (b)(3) posed by joint representations of any kind. The best practice is clearly to advise clients at the outset of a representation of the potential for ethical conflicts ahead. Written disclosure of potential effects of joint representation and written consent can substantially mitigate, if not eliminate, the ethical tensions inherent in common representation.

3. Express Consent

Rule 1.6 allows disclosure of client confidences "with the consent of the client affected, but only after full disclosure to the client." The prudent course for a lawyer undertaking a joint representation is to address the issue of disclosure at the outset of the retention and to obtain written consent from both clients that the lawyer may divulge to each client all confidences received during the course of the retention that relate to the representation. See Rule 2.2.

Where consent is sought at the outset of a joint representation, the lawyer must assure that the client has been advised of the potential adverse consequences of any such consent.

As noted above, in the case presented, the Firm did not seek advance consent to share all information regarding the representation with both clients. Nor did the law firm seek the client's consent to advise the employer of the apparent fraudulent filings after the fraud was revealed. At the same time that the law firm owed a duty to maintain the employee client's confidences and secrets, it owed the Employer client a duty under Rule 1.4 to keep it "reasonably informed" about the status of the representation. Rule 1.4(a). Comment [3] to Rule 1.4 explains that: "The guiding principle is that the lawyer should fulfill reasonable client expectations for information consistent with (1) the duty to act in the client's best interests, and (2) the client's overall requirements and objectives as to the character of representation."

Where duties to the two clients conflict, and no advance consent has been obtained, the law firm should make an effort to fulfill its duties to the employer by seeking the employee's informed consent to divulge the information. In the alternative, the Firm should encourage the employee client to divulge the facts to the Employer client. The Firm's fiduciary duty to the Employer requires an affirmative effort to achieve disclosure within the bounds of Rule 1.6 before withdrawing from the representation.

4. Implied Authorization

Absent express consent, disclosure of client secrets is permissible "when the lawyer has reasonable grounds for believing that a client has impliedly authorized disclosure . . . in order to carry out the representation." Rule 1.6(d)(4). In this case, the Firm understood that it had been retained to represent jointly the alien and the Employer for the limited purpose of obtaining a valid visa for the alien so that the Employer could legally employ her. The Employer needed to rely on the alien for the facts necessary to file the INS petition, which the Employer signed. As discussed above, the mere fact that the Firm was jointly representing the alien employee and the Employer does not provide a basis to infer consent to disclosure of confidences. D.C. Bar Op. 290 (1999). See also N.Y. State Bar Op. No. 555, supra. Without clear authorization, a lawyer may not divulge the secrets of one client to another, even where the discussion involves the subject matter of the joint representation. This is particularly true where disclosure would likely be detrimental to the disclosing client.

None of the other exceptions set forth in Rule 1.6 applies. Thus, absent client consent, the Firm may not divulge the secret. This result may seem unpalatable to the extent that the Employer who is also a client is left employing a dishonest worker whose visa has been fraudulently obtained pursuant to a petition signed by the Employer under penalty of perjury. Striking the balance in favor of protecting client confidences and secrets is nonetheless required by our Rules. The guarantee of confidentiality of communication between client and attorney is a cornerstone of legal ethics.

A fundamental principle in the client-lawyer relationship is that the lawyer holds inviolate the client's secrets and confidences. The client is thereby encouraged to communicate fully and frankly with the lawyer even as to embarrassing or legally damaging subject matter. Comment [4] to Rule 1.6.

Rule 1.7(b) prohibits a lawyer from representing a client with respect to a matter if the representation of another client "will be or is likely to be adversely affected by such representation." Because a conflict of interest arises between the interest of the alien employee in protecting the confidence that she lied in connection with the INS filing and the interest of the Employer in knowing that the work visa was fraudulently obtained, the lawyer must withdraw from representing both clients unless the retainer agreement permits the firm to continue representing one of the parties. Rule 1.16(a)(1).

5. Notice of Withdrawal

Rule 1.6 does not prohibit giving notice of the fact of withdrawal to parties other than the client "without elaboration." Comment [19] to Rule 1.6 confirms that such notice is "not proscribed by this Rule or by Rule 1.16(d)." In terminating the relationship with the Employer, the Firm can advise the Employer that the relationship with the employee client was terminated. While the Rules do not address what can be said to a client as to the basis for terminating the relationship, the Employer client is entitled to know at least what ethical provision led to the termination.

The question arises whether in notifying the Employer, the Firm may engage in a so-called "noisy" withdrawal. Comment [19] to Rule 1.6 provides that after withdrawal under Rule 1.16(a)(1), the lawyer "may retract or disaffirm any opinion, document, affirmation or the like that contains a material misrepresentation by the lawyer that the lawyer reasonably believes will be relied upon by others to their detriment." (emphasis added) Thus, a lawyer may signal that a problem exists by disaffirming earlier written statements but only if there is a reasonable basis to expect that future harm may occur without such disavowal. It is unclear from the facts presented whether future detriment may result to the Employer from the previous issuance of a visa based on false representations of which it was unaware. If there is reasonable basis to believe that the employer or the INS could rely on the petition to their detriment, the firm could disaffirm the INS petition in giving notice of its withdrawal. It may not, however, go beyond notice of disaffirmation to explain the basis for its disavowal.[1]

Opinion No. 297

Representation of Client in Negotiated Rulemaking Proceeding for Which Lawyer Was Responsible While In Government

• Absent a statutory bar, a former government attorney is not automatically prohibited from representing a private client in a negotiated rulemaking in which he participated while employed by the government, provided that he uses or divulges no confidences or secrets of his former agency. In determining whether to accept the proposed representation, the attorney must assess whether his professional judgment on behalf of the prospective client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by his responsibilities to his former agency and, if so, must seek the prospective client's consent to the representation.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.11 (Successive Government and Private Employment)
• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
• Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest)

Inquiry

The Committee has received an inquiry from an attorney regarding his proposed representation of an Indian tribe in a negotiated rulemaking in which he was previously involved on behalf of the U.S. Department of the Interior as an attorney. In his capacity as a government attorney, the inquirer's responsibilities included providing legal advice on implementing a federal statute. Pursuant to that statute, a formal negotiated rulemaking committee was established to negotiate and promulgate a general rule of applicability for implementing the statute.[1] This negotiated rulemaking committee was established pursuant to the Negotiated Rulemaking Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 561 et seq. (1994). The inquirer provided legal advice and assisted in the negotiations regarding language that preceded the proposed regulations that were published for public comment. The inquirer then prepared written comments and rendered advice on the proposed regulations. The negotiated rulemaking committee is now reviewing the public comment and conducting ongoing negotiations with interested parties apropos of developing its recommendations on final regulations. Various Indian tribes have participated in this rulemaking.

The inquirer, now in private practice, has asked whether he can now represent an Indian tribe in the negotiated rulemaking regarding the proposed regulations. The inquirer has represented that some of the positions that he advocated as a government employee may be adverse to the positions taken by either the prospective client tribe or the caucus of negotiating tribes as a whole.

Discussion

Restrictions on Post-Government Employment

As a threshold matter, we address the federal conflict of interest statute that, at first blush, would appear to apply to the proposed representation. We do so only to explain that a novel exception, set forth in another statute, limits its application.

[1] As it is beyond the purview of this Committee, which opines exclusively on the interpretation of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, we have not researched or analyzed whether any provision of federal law that may be applicable to INS petitions purports to override attorney-client confidentiality rules to require disclosure to INS under the circumstances described in this opinion.

[1] A negotiated rulemaking involves rulemaking through the use of a negotiated rulemaking committee, which is essentially an advisory committee established by an agency to consider and discuss issues for the purpose of reaching a consensus in the development of the proposed rule. This may involve the agency's submission of draft regulations to groups that are likely to be significantly affected by the regulations, in advance of a notice and comment rulemaking proceeding, and to negotiate with them over the form and substance of the regulations. See, e.g., USA Group Loan Servs., Inc. v. Riley, 82 F.3d 708, 715 (7th Cir. 1996) ("negotiated rulemaking . . . does not envisage that the negotiations will end in a binding contract. The [Negotiated Rulemaking] Act simply creates a consultative process in advance of the more formal arms' length procedure of notice and comment rulemaking.").

The general restrictions on postemployment conduct for former government employees are set forth in 18 U.S.C. § 207 (1994 & Supp. IV 1998). The inquirer informs the committee that he is subject to the prohibitions found at 18 U.S.C. § 207(a), which provides in pertinent part:

> (a)(1) Any person who . . . ., after the termination of his or her service or employment with the United States . . ., knowingly makes, with the intent to influence, any communication to or appearance before any officer or employee of any department, agency, court, or courtmartial of the United States . . . . on behalf of any other person (except the United States . . .) in connection with a particular matter –
> > (A) in which the United States . . . is a party or has a direct and substantial interest,
> > (B) in which the person participated personally and substantially as such officer or employee, and
> > (C) which involved a specific party or specific parties at the time of such participation,
> shall be punished as provided in section 216 of this title.
> (2) Any person subject to the restrictions contained in paragraph (1) who, within 2 years after the termination of his or her service or employment with the United States .... knowingly makes, with the intent to influence, any communication to or appearance before any officer or employee of any department, agency, court, or courtmartial of the United States .... on behalf of any other person (except the United States ...), in connection with a particular matter –
> > (A) in which the United States . . . is a party or has a direct and substantial interest,
> > (B) which such person knows or reasonably should know was actually pending under his or her official responsibility as such officer or employee within a period of 1 year before the termination of his or her service or employment with the United States . . . and
> > (C) which involved a specific party or specific parties at the time it was so pending, > shall be punished as provided in section 216 of this title.

* * * * * *

Id. The statute also contains a definition of "particular matter":

> (i) For purposes of this section
> (3) the term "particular matter" includes any investigation, application, request for a ruling or determination, rulemaking, contract, controversy, claim, charge, accusation, arrest, or judicial or other proceeding.

18 U.S.C. § 207(i)(3). Subsection (a)(1) prohibits a former Government employee covered by the statute from representing another entity before the Government on a case, contract, or other similar matter, if the employee participated "personally and substantially" on the matter. Also, a prohibited matter is one that involves specific parties and is the same matter in which the former employee now attempts to represent another party before the United States. Subsection (a)(2) prohibits a former Government employee from representing another entity before the Government on a "particular matter" which was actually pending under the former employee's official responsibility during the last year of service. Rulemaking is specifically included within the definition of "particular matter" under subsection (i).[2] As the inquirer provided advice and comment regarding the proposed regulations, we assume for purposes of this Opinion that the inquirer's involvement was "personal and substantial."[3]

Under most circumstances the statutory consideration would end with § 207. There is, however, an exception to the prohibitions set forth in § 207. The Indian SelfDetermination Act, Title I of Pub. L. No. 93638, 88 Stat. 2203, provides in pertinent part:

> Anything in sections 205 and 207 of Title 18 to the contrary notwithstanding, ... former officers and employees of the United States employed by Indian tribes may act as agents or attorneys for or appear on behalf of such tribes in connection [with] any matter pending before any department, agency, court, or commission including any matter in which the United States is a party or has a direct and substantial interest: Provided, That each such officer or employee or former officer or employee must advise in writing the head of the department, agency, court, or commission with which he is dealing or appearing on behalf of the tribe of any personal and substantial involvement he may have had as an officer or employee of the United States in connection with the matter involved.

25 U.S.C. § 450i(j) (1994).[4]

Under this statute, a former government employee employed or retained by an Indian tribe is not subject to the restrictions set forth in 18 U.S.C. § 207 while representing the tribe, so long as the former employee provides written notice to the head of the department, agency, court or commission before which the representation is made of any personal and substantial involvement the former employee may have had in connection with the underlying matter. The inquirer has informed the Committee that he has submitted this statutory notification.

With this statutory framework in mind, we now consider whether the Rules of Professional Conduct permit the proposed representation.

[2] The Office of Government Ethics ("OGE") issued its post-employment conflict of interest regulations, found at 5 C.F.R. § 2637, in 1980. The continued vitality of these regulations is unclear, however, in light of changes to § 207. In 1989, Congress amended 18 U.S.C. § 207 and added the definition of "particular matter," which specifically includes rulemaking. OGE, however, has yet to promulgate new or revised regulations implementing 18 U.S.C. § 207(a). The 1980 regulations provide that generally, rulemaking is not a "particular matter." See 5 C.F.R. § 2637.201(c)(1) ("[A] matter typically involves a specific proceeding affecting the legal rights of the parties or an isolatable transaction or related set of transactions between identifiable parties. Rulemaking, legislation, the formulation of general policy, standards or objectives, or other action of general application is not such a matter. Therefore, a former Government employee may represent another person in connection with a particular matter involving a specific party even if rules or policies which he or she had a role in establishing are involved in the proceeding.").

[3] The regulations implementing section 207(a) note that "personal and substantial participation" is:

> exercised "through decision, approval, disapproval, recommendation, the rendering of advice, investigation or otherwise." To participate "personally" means directly . . . . "Substantially," means that the employee's involvement must be of significance to the matter, or form a basis for a reasonable appearance of such significance.

Id. § 2637.201(d)(1) (1994).

[4] The legislative history of the Indian Self-Determination Act reveals the genesis of this exemption to stem from concerns regarding the rigidity of various laws that applied to tribal contracts with the federal government. Congress determined that more flexibility than the federal statutes provided was needed "to give substance and credibility to the concept of Indian self-determination." See H.R. Rep. No. 93-1600, at 20, reprinted in U.S.C.C.A.N. 7775, 7782.

Rule 1.11 of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct expressly addresses successive government and private employment. Rule 1.11(a) prohibits an attorney from accepting "other employment in connection with a matter which is the same as, or substantially related to, a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee."[5] The Court of Appeals has explained that "[t]he inquiry is a practical one asking whether the two matters substantially overlap." In re Sofaer, 728 A.2d 625, 628 (D.C. 1999) (footnote omitted). That determination is a function of whether the "matters" are the same or substantially related.

The Rules, in their Terminology section, broadly define the term "matter" as "any litigation, administrative proceeding, lobbying activity, application, claim, investigation, arrest, charge or accusation, the drafting of a contract, a negotiation, estate or family relations practice issue, or any other representation, except as expressly limited in a particular Rule." Rule 1.11 is such a "particular Rule," containing as it does a limiting provision. The limitation on the definition of matter for purposes of Rule 1.11 is found in Rule 1.11(g), which provides that Rule 1.11 "applies to any matter involving a specific party or parties." Comment [3] reinforces this concept, providing in pertinent part that Rule 1.11(g) defines matter "so as to encompass only matters that are particular to a specific party or parties." Id. Cmt. [3]. The Comment then sharpens the focus of this boundary in stating that "[t]he making of rules of general applicability and the establishment of general policy will ordinarily not be a 'matter' within the meaning of Rule 1.11."[6]

The rationale for this position appears to be that a rule is considered as applying broadly to a generic class of persons. See Kenneth Culp Davis & Richard J. Pierce, Jr., Administrative Law Treatise § 6.1, at 226 (3d ed. 1994). While a rulemaking may be addressed to named persons, agencies rarely use rulemaking to address named persons. Id. § 6.1. Generally, all potentially affected members of the public are given an opportunity to participate in a rulemaking proceeding. This enables interested persons to participate in the process of formulating the rules that affect them and to which they must conform.

As such, a rulemaking of general application is not "particular to a specific party or parties." The view that rulemaking is not particular to specific parties is supported by the Administrative Procedures Act ("APA") and its distinction between rulemaking and adjudication. The APA, in § 551(5), defines "'rule making'" as "agency process for formulating, amending, or repealing a rule." 5 U.S.C. § 551(5) (1994). A "rule" is defined in the APA as "an agency statement of general or particular applicability and future effect designed to implement, interpret, or prescribe law or policy or describing the organization, procedure, or practice requirements of an agency and includes [various substantive agency functions] . . . or practices bearing on any of the foregoing." 5 U.S.C. § 551(4) (1994). [7]

In contrast to a rulemaking, agencies conduct adjudication proceedings. APA § 551(7) defines "'adjudication'" as "agency process for the formulation of an order." 5 U.S.C. § 551(7) (1994). Section 551(6) defines "'order'" as "the whole or part of a final disposition, whether affirmative, negative, injunctive, or declaratory in form, of an agency in a matter other than rulemaking but including licensing . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 551(6) (1994). An order issued in an "adjudication" is regarded as being directed to the particular parties to the adjudication. Davis, supra, § 6.1, at 226.

While this committee has not previously addressed the application of Rule 1.11(a) to a rulemaking proceeding, several prior opinions did focus on the issue under the former ethics rules. Opinion 106 addressed the applicability of the District of Columbia Code of Professional Responsibility to a former government attorney's representation of a private client in challenging the validity of a rule for which the attorney had substantial responsibility in its promulgation. The Opinion concluded that DR 9-101(B) would not prohibit the attorney's representation in subsequent employment.[8]

Consulting a frequently quoted ABA Opinion and a prior Committee opinion, the Committee concluded that rulemaking was excluded from the scope of "matter" encompassed by DR 9-101(B).

> Although a precise definition of "matter" as used in the Disciplinary Rule is difficult to formulate, the term seems to contemplate a discrete and isolatable transaction or set of transactions between identifiable parties. Perhaps the scope of the term "matter" may be indicated by examples. The same lawsuit or litigation is the same matter. The same issue of fact involving the same parties and the same situation or conduct is the same matter. By contrast, work as a government employee in drafting, enforcing or interpreting government or agency procedures, regulations, or laws, or in briefing abstract principles of law, does not disqualify the lawyer under DR 9-101(B) from subsequent private employment involving the same regulations, procedures, or points of law; the same "matter" is not involved because there is lacking the discrete, identifiable transactions or conduct involving a particular situation and specific parties.

D.C. Bar Op. 106, at 6 (Sept. 22, 1981) quoting ABA Formal Op. 342. (alteration in original)

At the same time, Opinion 106 cautioned the attorney that he "would run a serious risk" of violating DR 5-105 and DR 4-101 by undertaking the representation. The Opinion observed that a former government attorney who personally and substantially participated in drafting agency rules was likely to [5] D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct Rule 1.11(a). Comment [3] to Rule 1.11 emphasizes its rigidity, explaining that Rule 1.11(a) "flatly forbids a lawyer to accept other employment in a matter in which the lawyer participated personally and substantially as a public officer or employee . . . . There is no provision for waiver of the individual lawyer's disqualification." Id., Cmt.[3].

[6] Id. See Laker Airways, Ltd. v. Pan Am. World Airways, 103 F.R.D., 22 (D.D.C. 1984). That case involved the interpretation of the predecessor to Rule 1.11, DR 9-101(B) of the Code. In Laker, the court stated that "rulemaking and policy-making activities do not constitute a 'matter' within the meaning of the Disciplinary Rule for the purposes of disqualifying counsel from a subsequent private lawsuit, and they do not become so unless the activity is narrow in scope and is confined to specified issues and identifiable parties such that it may properly be characterized as 'quasi-judicial' in nature." 103 F.R.D. at 34 (footnote omitted). The court's holding was qualified by its admonition: "To be sure, the Disciplinary Rule would bar counsel from representing a private party in a regulatory or rulemaking proceeding when he previously participated as a government attorney in the same proceeding. Such a practice of 'switching sides' is the primary target of the Rule." Id. at 34 n. 40.

[7] For a discussion of the many forms that "rules" can take, see Kenneth Culp Davis & Richard J. Pierce, Jr., Administrative Law Treatise § 17.3, at 108 (3d ed. 1994); Peter L. Strauss, Comment, The Rulemaking Continuum, 41 Duke L.J. 1463 (1992).

[8] DR 9-101(B) provided at the time: "A lawyer shall not accept private employment in a matter in which he has substantial responsibility while he was a public employee." The term "matter" was not then defined in the Code.

have gained the client confidences and secrets that were protected from disclosure by DR 4-101(B). Moreover, an attorney who drafted agency rules that are challenged by a subsequent employer would have to carefully assess whether his previous involvement with the rules would affect the exercise of his professional judgment on behalf of his employer. DR 5-101(A) provided that a lawyer must decline employment if the exercise of his independent professional judgment his representation of a client "will be or is likely to be adversely affected" by his personal interest.

This Committee visited this issue again in D.C. Bar Op. 187 (1987). There, we concluded that a former government employee was not automatically prohibited from representing a private client in challenging an agency's regulations for which he had been responsible while employed by the government, provided that he divulge no confidences or secrets of his former agency. The definition of "matter" under the Code in effect at that time was not as broad as the current definition in the Rules and did not include administrative proceedings. Again, however, we cautioned that the attorney would need to assess whether his previous responsibility for the rule would affect the exercise of his independent professional judgment consistent with DR 5-101(A):

> [A]n attorney who finds himself in this position must either seek the agency's consent to reveal the confidences and secrets he previously learned or determine that he can zealously represent his current employer while at the same time protecting the agency's confidences and secrets. The latter course may well prove impossible.

D.C. Bar Op. 187, at 6.

We reach a similar conclusion under Rule 1.11. A particular matter may be a discrete and isolatable transaction or set of transactions. See Brown v. District of Columbia Bd. of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37, 42 (D.C. 1984) (en banc). While a matter may be a single particular lawsuit, it also may encompass an "administrative proceeding" involving a specific party or parties according to the definition provided in Rule 1.11(g). Indeed, representation involving a rulemaking is specifically contemplated in the Rules as one type of representation comprising a "matter," as long as it involves a specific party or parties, as required by Rule 1.11(g). The issue, then, is whether the negotiated rulemaking here is particular to a specific party or parties.

To be sure, the members of the rulemaking committee are identifiable parties. Presumably, the committee members participate because they possess an interest in whatever regulations are ultimately promulgated. We do not think, however, that the participation of interested parties makes the rulemaking proceeding particular to them. Whatever regulations that are issued may, but not necessarily will, apply to committee members; they will also apply generally to any persons or entities subject to their terms. Put another way, the rulemaking here is not addressed to named parties but applies broadly to a generic class of potentially affected persons. The overall process includes a notice and comment component addressed to the general public and is designed to generate a rule of general applicability. This process, although involving a rulemaking committee comprised of specific parties, is far more rulemaking than adjudication. These characteristics disqualify the negotiated rulemaking from "matter" status as that term is used in Rule 1.11. As such, successive representation is not per se prohibited by Rule 1.11(a) and (g) where the initial representation is in connection with a rulemaking of general applicability.[9]

Our analysis does not conclude with that determination, however. There remains the issue of confidentiality. The point of departure for that analysis is Rule 1.6, which states in part:

> (a) [A] lawyer shall not knowingly . . . (1) reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client; (2) use a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client to the disadvantage of the client; (3) use a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client for the advantage of the lawyer or of a third person.
> (b) "Confidence" refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law, and "secret" refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client.

Comment [6] to Rule 1.6 further states that the rule of attorney-client confidentiality applies not merely to matters communicated in confidence by the client, but also to all information gained in the course of the professional relationship that the client requests be held inviolate. "This ethical precept . . . exists without regard to the nature or source of the information or the fact that others share the knowledge." Id.

Consistent with our prior opinions decided under the Code of Professional Responsibility, we conclude that successive representation is allowable in the unique circumstances here if the attorney can honor the strictures of the confidentiality obligations and the conflict rules. While the circumstances here do not, as explained above, involve the same matter or substantially related matters under Rule 1.11, Rule 1.6 still applies but does not necessarily bar successive representation. That is, where counsel received information in representing the government that is subject to Rule 1.6, the requirement that the attorney hold such information inviolate does not, without more, preclude successive representation in a negotiated rulemaking. That conclusion does not end the analysis, however.

We believe that the inquirer must honor his confidentiality obligations to the government not only as a general matter, but must do so with enhanced vigilance in undertaking any proposed representation relating to the very same rulemaking in which he counseled the government. Serious consideration should be given by the attorney to seeking consent from his former client, the Interior Department.[10] If consent is obtained, then the limitations of Rule 1.6 are not implicated. See Rule 1.6(d)(1). Absent consent, the confidences and secrets that the inquirer received in his capacity as a government attorney are protected by Rule 1.6 from disclosure and cannot be used by the inquirer or revealed to the prospective client. This restriction may well preclude the inquirer from undertaking the proposed representation. Concomitantly, [9] Our judgment here is also informed by the Congressional policy reflected in 25 U.S.C. § 450 (1994), which manifestly permits a former government attorney to switch sides to undertake the representation of an Indian tribe.

[10] Rule 1.6(j) provides that "[t]he client of the government lawyer is the agency that employs the lawyer unless expressly provided to the contrary by appropriate law, regulation, or order.

observing this limitation could conceivably violate the inquirer's duties of zeal and loyalty to the prospective client. Toward that end, in determining whether to accept the proposed representation, the attorney must adhere to the dictates of Rule 1.7. Specifically, the attorney must assess whether his professional judgment on behalf of the prospective client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by his responsibilities to his former client, the Department of the Interior. If that examination yields an affirmative conclusion, the attorney must then seek the prospective client's consent to the representation "after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation." Rule 1.7(c). As with the proposed representation that we examined in Opinion 187, these considerations may prevent undertaking the representation contemplated here.

Opinion No. 298

Sale or Assignment of Accounts Receivable to a Collection Agency

• Lawyers may utilize collection agencies to recover unpaid fees for legal services rendered only to the extent that debt collection efforts by such agencies are consistent with the lawyer's ethical obligations. Because the outright sale of client accounts receivable to a collection agency would prevent a lawyer from fully complying with the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct and District of Columbia Bar Rules, such sales are not permitted. Assignments of accounts receivable must be carefully reviewed on a case-by-case basis and are permitted only when the assignment conforms to a lawyer's ethical obligations. In utilizing the services of a collection agency, disclosure of specific details relating to the representation should be limited to the minimal information necessary to collect the debt unless client consent is obtained. Even in such situations, the lawyer must ensure that the collection agency treats such information confidentially.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.5 (Fees)
• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
• Rule 5.3 (Responsibilities Regarding Non-Lawyer Assistants)
• Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)

Inquiry

The inquirer, a private law firm, has been approached by a collection agency which has proposed that the inquirer sell and assign its receivables (including open accounts, closed accounts, promissory notes per contracts, and judgments) to the agency for collection purposes. According to the inquirer, the collection agency operates by purchasing receivables from creditor companies and then collecting the receivable in its own name, not in the name of the creditor firm.

The collection agency's brochure, provided by the inquirer, states that part of the agency's operating philosophy is to "[r]emove our client [i.e., the lawyer or law firm] completely from the debt collection practice by purchasing the debt C [the collection agency] is now the creditor, not the client." The brochure also states that the agency will "[r]esolve cases rapidly," has the "[a]bility to litigate," and will "use litigation if necessary" with the agency as the plaintiff. The brochure implies that the decision whether to bring litigation will be solely in the discretion of the collection agency.

The inquirer asks whether it may sell its client account receivables to the collection agency under these conditions. The inquirer further asks whether it may provide the following types of information to the collection agency as evidence of the receivable: (a) billing files, (b) signed retainer agreements/contracts, (c) signed fee schedules, and (d) signed promissory notes.

Discussion

1. Sale of debts for legal services to a collection agency is not permitted under the D.C. Rules; assignment of debts may be permissible if the lawyer retains control over the collection process.

This Committee previously addressed the use of collection agencies to recover unpaid fees for legal services in Opinion 60 (undated), rendered under our prior rules. While DR 3-102(a) declared that "a lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer," the Committee found that this rule did not prohibit agreements with collection agencies to share a percentage of a legal fee as compensation for the agency's services in attempting to collect that fee. The Committee based its conclusion on D.C. Bar Op. 23 (1976) and ABA Formal Op. 338, which "represent an implicit acknowledgment of the propriety of lawyers referring fee collection matters to an agency, part of whose practices may involve fee collection."

DR 3-102(a) has been superseded by D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct (Rule) 5.4, which, like DR 3-102(a), states "[A] lawyer or law firm shall not share legal fees with a nonlawyer." Nothing in the language of Rule 5.4 or its accompanying comments are contrary to the conclusions of Opinion 60, and we see no reason to reach a different result here. In affirming the conclusion of Opinion 60, we note that the use of collection agencies by lawyers has been deemed consistent with ethical requirements in the vast majority of jurisdictions to consider the question. The sale or assignment of legal debts to a collection agency raises more difficult questions. Because a lawyer cannot transfer more than he owns, sale or assignment of a debt owed to a lawyer for legal services rendered is encumbered by ethical requirements that would apply to the lawyer's own collection efforts. Thus, a debt owed to a lawyer may be collected by third parties only in a fashion consistent with ethical principles applicable to members of the Bar.

Our Rules require in the first instance that disputes over fees should be avoided to the extent possible. In Opinion 60, this Committee observed that "[Fee] litigation should only be a last resort to collect a delinquent fee where an lawyer has made every effort to settle amicably with his client any differences concerning either the amount or the timing of collection of fees." See also Ohio Bd. of Comm'rs on Grievance & Disc. Op. 91-16 (June 14, 1991) (lawyer may use collection agency only if he first determines that the fee is reasonable and not illegal, makes personal and amicable attempts to collect the legal fee owed, and reveals only confidences and secrets necessary to establish or collect the fee). Thus, all appropriate efforts to resolve the matter should be pursued by the lawyer before referral to a collection agency. See, e.g., New York State Bar Ass'n Comm. Prof. Ethics Op. 608 (May 10, 1990) (only if all other reasonable efforts short of litigation have been undertaken and have been unsuccessful may a lawyer employ the services of a collection agency).

In particular, District of Columbia Court of Appeals Rule XIII requires that, when requested by the client, lawyers arbitrate fee disputes with present or former clients.[1] See also Comment [15] to Rule 1.5 ("If a procedure has been established for resolution of fee disputes, such as an arbitration or mediation procedure established by the Bar, the lawyer should conscientiously consider submitting to it."). This arbitration procedure binds both the lawyer and any collection agency acting on the lawyer's behalf in connection with a debt for legal services.

Further, Rule 1.6(d)(5) addresses fee litigation, and specifies that a lawyer may disclose client confidences or secrets only "to the minimum extent necessary in an action instituted by the lawyer to establish or collect the lawyer's fee." This obligation continues after the termination of the lawyer's employment. Rule 1.6(f). A lawyer may not avoid his duties under this Rule by selling or assigning a debt to a collection agency and allowing it to institute litigation in the agency's name against a former client. Comment [24] to Rule 1.6 imposes upon a lawyer engaged in fee litigation a continuing duty to "evaluate the necessity for disclosure of information at each stage of the action." Comment [25] to the same Rule provides that the "lawyer should continue, throughout the action, to make every effort to avoid unnecessary disclosure of the client's confidences and secrets and to limit the disclosure to those having a need to know it." These comments suggest several possible methods (use of John Doe pleadings, entry of protective orders and in camera proceedings) to avoid disclosure of confidential information during fee litigation.

To the extent that a collection agency is acting in the lawyers name for the lawyer's benefit pursuant to an assignment, any services provided by the agency must be consistent with the ethical rules that directly bind the lawyer. Rule 1.6 and D.C. Bar Rule XIII are inconsistent with sale or assignment of a debt by which a lawyer steps entirely out of the collection process and the collection agency controls the debt collection process.[2] A lawyer ethically may not remain indifferent to the means utilized to collect his or her debts.

The Committee therefore has little difficulty concluding that the proposed sale to the collection agency described in the inquiry would run afoul of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.[3] As indicated in the collection agency's brochure, the proposed arrangement removes the lawyer-creditor "completely" from the debt collection process. In such circumstances, the lawyer-creditor apparently has no say whether a lawsuit is to be brought, whether the suit is to be compromised or settled, whether a client's demand to arbitrate should be honored, and whether and how confidences and secrets may be disclosed during the course of arbitration or litigation. This type of arrangement is not permissible under our Rules.

The Committee does not believe our Rules impose insuperable ethical barriers to the use by lawyers of collection agencies to assist in recovery of accounts receivable. Thus, there may be types of assignments of accounts receivable that can be made consistent with a lawyer's ethical obligations. The key consideration is whether the lawyer retains sufficient control over the collection process (including any fee litigation that may arise) to satisfy his or her ethical responsibilities. See, e.g., Bar Ass'n of City of New York Comm. Prof. Jud. Ethics Op. No. 1993-1 (Nov. 5, 1993) ("A lawyer who assigns his accounts receivable . . . remains responsible to the former clients to ensure that all relevant ethical rules are followed in the collection process"). Sufficient control would require, at a minimum, that the lawyer remain informed about efforts to collect the debt, and be able to veto activities that are inconsistent with the lawyer's legal or ethical requirements. In addition, disclosure of the assignment should be made to the client to avoid confusion. Id. These issues must be addressed in each case of assignment of accounts receivable.[4]

2. Disclosure of protected client information to a collection agency without the client's consent is permitted only if the information is reasonably necessary to recover the debt and the lawyer can assure confidentiality.

A related but equally important issue that arises with respect to the use of collection agencies or the assignment of accounts receivable is the need to preserve client confidences and secrets. Rule 1.6, which prohibits a lawyer from knowingly revealing a client confidence or secret, using a confidence or secret to the client's disadvantage, or using a confidence or secret for the advantage of the lawyer or a third person, applies to questions of client fee disputes. We reiterate the broad scope of Rule 1.6 which protects both "confidences" - information protected by the lawyer-client privilege - and "secrets" - other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate, or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental, to the client."

The inquirer has asked the Committee to opine on the propriety of disclosing billing files, signed retainer agreements, fee schedules, and signed promissory notes to a third party to aid in the collection of a client debt. A preliminary question, however, must be addressed - whether it would be permissible even to disclose the client's identity, contact information, and debt to the collection agency. The existence of a client debt as well as client contact information arguably is a "secret," assuming it was obtained in the course of the professional relationship, and its disclosure

[1] Rule XIII (a) provides: "A lawyer subject to the disciplinary jurisdiction of this Court shall be deemed to have agreed to arbitrate disputes over fees for legal services and disbursements related thereto when such arbitration is requested by a present or former client, if such client was a resident of the District of Columbia when the services of the lawyer were engaged, or if a substantial portion of the services were performed by the lawyer in the District of Columbia, or if the services included representation before a District of Columbia court or a District of Columbia government agency."

[2] The Committee also notes that debt collection practices are heavily regulated at the federal and state levels by statutes such as the Federal Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1692. While interpreting such statutes is beyond the role of this Committee, lawyers should ensure that their actions, and the actions of anyone providing services on their behalf, comply fully with these statutes and regulations.

[3] The small number of states that have permitted sales of client accounts receivables have required that the client expressly consent to the sale. See, e.g., Iowa Sup. Ct. Bd. of Prof. Ethics & Conduct Op. No. 81-37 (Nov. 24, 1981); Tex. Prof. Ethics Comm. Op. 464 (Nov. 1989). We do not consider in this Opinion whether there is some form of client consent that would completely address the ethical concerns described above.

[4] Somewhat different issues are raised when a client debt to lawyer has been pursued through litigation or arbitration and reflected in an enforceable judgment against the client entered by a tribunal with appropriate jurisdiction. Because the ethical issues discussed above are unlikely to be presented by such judgments, an lawyer who chooses not to enforce the judgment may, consistent with our Rules, sell or otherwise monetize the judgment by transferring it to a third party.

arguably would be detrimental to the client's interest. Indeed, under some circumstances, the client's identity could constitute a "secret." For the reasons discussed below, however, the Committee believes that disclosure of the client's name, address, and debt amount to a collection agency does not violate Rule 1.6, provided the lawyer complies with the requirements of Rule 5.3 and ensures that the collection agency and its personnel maintain the confidentiality of that information.

Comment [11] to Rule 1.6 explains that "it is not improper for a lawyer to give limited information from client files to an outside agency necessary for statistical, bookkeeping, accounting, data processing, banking, printing, or other legitimate purposes, provided the lawyer exercises due care in the selection of the agency and warns the agency that the information must be kept confidential." A collection agency acting on the lawyer's behalf is performing a service akin to a bookkeeping or accounting function by attempting to recover delinquent debts on the lawyer's books. It would be within the scope of the duties of an accountant or bookkeeper employee to collect a debt; the lawyer simply has made a business decision to delegate this duty to a collection agency. See Fla. State Bar Ass'n Op. 81-3 (Apr. 15, 1981) (collection agency should be viewed as "nonlawyer personnel" under the Florida counterpart to D.C. Rule 5.3). Moreover, a contrary conclusion would preclude the use of collection agencies or similar third party entities because a client simply could refuse consent to sending any information about the debt to a collection agency. Assuming the lawyer takes steps to ensure that the agency keeps the client's name, contact information, and debt amount confidential, the mere transmission of this limited information to a collection agency does not require the client's prior consent. Signed retainer agreements, fee schedules, and signed promissory notes reflecting the client's debt may be disclosed to the collection agency under these same principles.

Revealing further information concerning the representation - including detailed billing information and other details concerning the representation - involves different considerations identified in Comments [24] and [25] to Rule 1.6, discussed above. In our recent Opinion 290, we concluded that disclosure of detailed client billing statements and other confidential information to an insurer (and to the insurer's auditor) that was funding the client's litigation could not be made absent client consent. The Committee found Comment [11] to Rule 1.6 inapplicable to that situation because "the information sought is substantive and the lawyer neither selects the auditor nor controls its use of the information." We also were concerned that such disclosure during the course of a representation might allow discovery of such information to the client's detriment.

These same considerations apply to some extent in the instant situation, although the lawyer has selected the collection agency and, for reasons explored above, must ensure that the collection agency not disclose the information beyond what is necessary to carry out its debt collection practices. Detailed billing records reflecting descriptions of legal work undertaken are "substantive" in nature, and therefore, their non-consensual disclosure generally does not fit within the bounds of Comment [11]. Moreover, detailed billing information normally is not reasonably necessary to the collection agency's efforts to recover the debt. See Ohio Bd. of Comm'rs on Grievances & Disc. Op. 91-16 ("information regarding the nature of the legal services would not always be necessary to establish or collect the fee, [so] it should not be revealed to the collection agency unless necessary").

Where the former client has contested the debt by claiming that the lawyer has engaged in professional misconduct, we conclude the lawyer may disclose details of the representation to the collection agency sufficient to respond to that claim on the lawyer's behalf, provided the lawyer ensures that the agency maintains the information confidentially.[5] Moreover, Rule 1.6(d)(5) allows limited disclosure of such information in fee litigation instituted by the lawyer.[6] Rule 5.3 again requires that such disclosure be accompanied by the collection agency's agreement to maintain the confidentiality of the information revealed and steps must be taken to ensure that any form of public disclosure be kept to a strict minimum. See also Comment [23] to Rule 1.6 (such disclosure "should be made in a manner that limits access to the information to the tribunal or other persons having a need to know it, and appropriate protective orders or other arrangements should be sought by the lawyer to the fullest extent practicable"); Florida State Bar Ass'n Comm. on Prof. Ethics Op. 81-3 (Apr. 15, 1981) (lawyer must be "careful to divulge to the collection agency no details regarding the representation of the client that are not relevant to the debt owed").

But where the client has disputed all or portions of the debt on more general grounds, see Comment [23] to Rule 1.6, or the lawyer reasonably believes that only such a general objection to the fee will arise, this exception to Rule 1.6 does not apply. In such circumstances, the limited disclosure to accountants, bookkeepers and the like authorized by Comment [11] to Rule 1.6 does not extend to information in excess of that necessary to establish the fact of a debt. Nor can Rule 1.6(d)(3)'s specific authorization of limited disclosure in response to certain claims of misconduct be extended to permit disclosure. Disclosure of confidential information, even to a collection agency under orders to maintain such information confidential, may raise questions of waiver of privileges and open the door to subsequent disclosure of such information to the client's detriment.[7] Informed client

[5] A lawyer also could disclose such information if the client formally instituted a civil, criminal or disciplinary claim against the lawyer (which would include a demand for arbitration under D.C. Bar Rule XIII) under the exception for revelation of client secrets "to the extent reasonably necessary to respond to specific allegations by the client concerning the lawyer's representation of the client" contained in Rule 1.6(d)(3).

[6] However, unlike Rule 1.6(d)(5), which applies to fee litigation instituted by the lawyer, Rule 1.6(d)(3) is not limited to formal debt collection actions instituted by the lawyer or someone acting on her behalf. Moreover, Comment [23] to Rule 1.6 states that "[i]f a lawyer's client, or former client, has made specific allegations against the lawyer, the lawyer may disclose the client's confidences and secrets in establishing a defense, without waiting for formal proceedings to be commenced." (emphasis supplied).

[7] This Committee normally does not interpret substantive law and thus is not in a position to opine upon the applicability of the lawyer-client or other privileges in situations such as this. Nonetheless, we note that broad disclosure of information to a collection agency creates the risk of waiver of an applicable privilege, and that such disclosure may be substantively detrimental to the client independent of the mere fact of debt collection.

consent to such disclosure therefore is required under Rule 1.6 before this information can be shared with the collection agency.[8]

Duty of Confidentiality to aCorporate Client That Has Ceased Operations

• The duty of confidentiality under Rule 1.6 encompasses the attorney-client privilege and continues after the termination of the client-lawyer relationship. Therefore, unless one of the exceptions to Rule 1.6 applies, an attorney must preserve the client's confidences even though the corporate client has ceased operations.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)

Inquiry

The inquirer provided legal advice concerning federal government contracts to a non-profit corporation organized under the laws of the jurisdiction in which the corporation operated (not the District of Columbia). Approximately four years ago, the inquirer terminated the representation of the corporation due to nonpayment of fees. Since then, the corporation has ceased operating, and its current legal status is unknown. Former officers of the corporation have been indicted for offenses that may relate to or concern matters within the scope of the inquirer's former representation. Counsel representing an indicted former officer has contacted the inquirer and requested information relating to the inquirer's representation, including matters that the inquirer believes are covered by the attorney-client privilege. The inquirer requests our advice regarding his duty of confidentiality to the former corporate client that has ceased operations.

Discussion

The inquirer has informed us that counsel for a former officer of a corporate client seeks information covered by the attorney-client privilege — one of the oldest recognized privileges for confidential communications. Swidler & Berlin v. United States, 118 S. Ct. 2081, 2084 (1998), citing Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383, 389 (1981); Hunt v. Blackburn, 128 U.S. 464, 470 (1888). The privilege is intended to encourage full and frank communication between attorneys and their clients regarding embarrassing or legally damaging information because clients can expect that such information will be protected from disclosure. See Upjohn, 449 U.S. at 389. The privilege also applies when the client is a corporate entity. Id., at 391.

The principles underlying the attorney-client privilege are incorporated into Rule 1.6, which provides that "a lawyer shall not knowingly reveal a confidence or secret of the lawyer's client" except in certain circumstances delineated under paragraphs (c) and (d) of the rule. "Confidence" refers to information protected by the attorney-client privilege under applicable law. Rule 1.6(b). "Secret" refers to other information gained in the professional relationship that the client has requested be held inviolate or the disclosure of which would be embarrassing, or would be likely to be detrimental to the client." Rule 1.6(b). The inquirer's duty to preserve the client's confidences and secrets survives the termination of the inquirer's representation of that client.[1] See Rule 1.6(f); Comment [28] to Rule 1.6 ("The duty of confidentiality continues after the client-lawyer relationship has terminated); D.C. Bar Op.180 (same). Accordingly, unless one of the exceptions to the duty of confidentiality provided in paragraphs (c) or (d) of Rule 1.6 is applicable, the inquirer may not disclose the requested information. Cf. Swidler & Berlin, 118 S. Ct. at 2081 (generally the attorney-client privilege survives the death of the client). Paragraph (c) of Rule 1.6 allows a lawyer to reveal a client's confidences or secrets, "to the extent reasonably necessary to prevent a criminal act that the lawyer reasonably believes is likely to result in death or substantial bodily harm" or "to prevent the bribery or intimidation" of persons "involved in proceedings before a tribunal." The inquirer has not provided us with any facts suggesting that either circumstance is presented here.

Paragraph (d) of Rule 1.6, on the other hand, allows a lawyer to reveal client confidences or secrets: "(1) with the consent of the client affected, but only after full disclosure to the client," or (2) when permitted by another Rule or required by law or court order.[2] The inquirer informed us that the corporation (the former client) has ceased operations but its legal status is unknown. The Committee cannot determine on the basis of the limited facts presented in the inquiry whether the corporate client still exists or whether another entity has succeeded to its management. However, we infer from the inquiry that the former officer, whose counsel contacted the inquirer, cannot consent to the disclosure of the client's confidences on behalf of the corporation because, even if he had such authority when the corporation was in operation, he no longer has any management authority as a former officer. If some entity has assumed managerial control of the corporation, the inquirer may reveal the requested information if the successor management consents. To obtain permission to disclose information, the inquirer must fully disclose all relevant facts to the successor management to allow it to make an informed decision on whether to allow the lawyer to reveal confidential information. See, e.g., Maleski v. Corporate Life Ins. Co., 641 A.2d 1, 3 (Pa. Commw. 1994), and cases cited therein (authority of successor management to act on corporation's behalf).[3]

Even if the corporate client no longer exists and no one is authorized to consent to the disclosure of the corporation's confidences,[4] the former officer still may [8] In D.C. Bar Op. 289 (1999), we set forth the general standard applicable for prospective waivers. The permissibility of advance waivers of disclosure of confidential information to collection agencies, e.g., in an initial engagement letter, is beyond the scope of this opinion. We note that in cases where disclosure of the fact of representation could be independently detrimental to the client, informed consent also would be required under our Rules.

[1] Accordingly, our analysis would be no different if the inquiry involved the client's "secrets" instead of of "confidences."

[2] No other Rule apparently applies to the facts of this case. Likewise, the other exceptions in Rule 1.6(d) -- (1) disclosure when the lawyer is responding to a criminal charge, disciplinary charge, or civil claim; (2) disclosure when the lawyer believes that the client has given implicit authorization to carry out the representation; or (3) disclosure necessary to establish or collect a fee -- are not applicable.

[3] Such a result is consistent with Rule 1.13 which "makes clear that, when a lawyer is retained to represent a corporation, the lawyer's client is the corporation only, acting through its duly authorized constituents (such as officers and employees)." D.C. Bar Op. 269 (italics in original and footnote omitted).

[4] See Maleski, 641 A.2d at 1; see also FDIC v. Amundson, 682 F. Supp. 981 (D. Minn. 1988)(dissolved corporation ceases to exist and no entity retains management authority to act on its behalf); FDIC v. McAtee, 124 F.R.D. 662 (D. Kan. 1988)(same).

have recourse to the corporation's confidences if he or she seeks and obtains a court order compelling disclosure of the information sought. See Rule 1.6(d)(2)(A). When such an order is received, the inquirer's duty of confidentiality to the client would be overridden by the order, and the inquirer may comply with the order. See Comment [26] to Rule 1.6 ("The lawyer may comply with the final orders of a court or other tribunal of competent jurisdiction requiring the lawyer to give information about the client. But a lawyer ordered by a court to disclose client confidences or secrets should not comply with the order until the lawyer has personally made every reasonable effort to appeal the order or has notified the client of the order and given the client the opportunity to challenge it"). Likewise, the former officer also may be able to petition a court to appoint a receiver or trustee for the corporation to decide whether to exercise the corporation's right to consent to the disclosure. See discussion above on Rule 1.6 (d)(1).

Opinion No. 300

Acceptance of Ownership Interest In Lieu of Legal Fees

• It is not unethical for a lawyer to receive an ownership interest in a corporate client as compensation for legal services, so long as the fee arrangement is a reasonable one, is objectively fair to the client, and has been agreed to by the client after being informed of its implications and given an opportunity to seek independent counsel on the fee arrangement. A lawyer's current or expected ownership interest in a client may create a conflict of interest that may prevent the lawyer from undertaking the representation unless informed client consent is received.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.5(a) (Fees)
• Rule 1.7(b), (c) (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
• Rule 1.8(a) (Conflict of Interest: Prohibited Transactions)

Inquiry

Inquirer is a lawyer who has represented a limited liability company in a traditional fee-for-service relationship. The client has asked the inquirer to serve, on a part-time basis, as the client's general counsel. In lieu of fees for this work, the client has proposed to give inquirer an approximately 20 percent ownership interest in the limited liability company and a percentage of the company's profits, if any. If the inquirer accepted this position, he would continue his private practice representing other clients. Inquirer asks about the ethics of this fee arrangement.

Discussion

1. Reasonableness of the Fee Arrangement

This inquiry is one of only a few in which this Committee has opined on the ethics of particular fee agreements between lawyers and clients. The ethical principles derive primarily from the six-word first sentence of District of Columbia Rule of Professional Conduct 1.5(a): "A lawyer's fee shall be reasonable." Rule 1.5(a) then continues with a list of factors to be considered in determining the "reasonableness" of a fee, including the time involved, the amount involved in the representation, and the lawyer's experience. Relevant to this particular inquiry is Comment [4] to Rule 1.5 which states that:

> A lawyer may accept property in payment for services, such as an ownership interest in an enterprise. However, a fee paid in property instead of money may be subject to special scrutiny because it involves questions concerning both the value of the services and the lawyer's special knowledge of the value of the property.

As reflected in Comment [4], there is nothing in the "reasonableness" standard of Rule 1.5(a) that would prohibit a lawyer's receipt of an ownership interest in the lawyer's client (e.g., shares of stock in a corporation) as a fee.[1] Thus, the pertinent question is not whether such a fee arrangement is ethical in principle; it clearly is. Rather, the question is whether a particular ownership-in-lieu-of-fees arrangement is "reasonable" which calls for an analysis of reasonableness factors similar to that we have described in prior opinions. See, e.g., D.C. Bar Op. 42 (1977) (decided under Code of Professional Responsibility). Such an analysis would be the means of determining whether a specific fee arrangement was reasonable under the circumstances of the particular representation. Not to be ignored in evaluating the reasonableness of the fee is factor (8) under Rule 1.5(a) ("whether the fee is fixed or contingent"), since there is a risk that stock of a non-public start-up company received as a fee may be worthless if the client's business does not succeed.

Also relevant to the reasonableness analysis would be the disclosures and explanations made by the lawyer to the client concerning the proposed stock-for-fees arrangement. The listing of reasonableness factors in Rule 1.5(a) does not mention such conduct, but that list is not exhaustive and we have no doubt that reasonableness would be measured, at least in part, by the extent to which the client's acceptance of the fee arrangement was informed by its understanding of its financial implications. Managers and owners of start-up companies may be unsophisticated consumers of legal services or may not appreciate the financial implications of paying for legal services in stock instead of cash. It may be necessary under such circumstances for the lawyer to explain how the use of stock to pay for legal fees may provide significant near-term benefits to the client but may result in a cost for legal services greatly in excess of what would have been paid under more traditional means.[2]

[1] The Committee has once before addressed the ethics of stock-in-lieu-of-fees. In D.C. Bar Op. 179 (1987), decided under former Code of Professional Responsibility, we were asked to opine on an arrangement wherein a lawyer was to be compensated with stock of a client for representing it in a Federal Communications Commission license proceeding. The client's only potential asset was the hoped-for license, such that the stock received by the lawyer would have value only if the license were granted to the client.

The Committee examined this arrangement under DR 5-103(A), which prohibited a lawyer from acquiring "a proprietary interest in the cause of action or subject matter of litigation he is conducting for a client," except for a reasonable contingent fee in a civil case. The Committee concluded that, while receiving stock under the circumstances of the inquiry was the acquisition of an interest in the subject matter of the litigation, it was tantamount to a contingent fee and so was excepted from the general prohibition of the rule. The Committee's opinion noted that compensating lawyers with the stock of cash-poor start-up companies was a way of providing access to legal services for clients that might otherwise be unable to afford a lawyer.

[2] D.C. Bar Op. 115 (1982) adverted to this concern in connection with a proposed fee arrangement in which a lawyer would receive a portion of revenue to be earned by athletes, artists and performers just beginning in their professions in return for current legal services to them. It urged explanation of the fee arrangement because "a person just embarking on his or her career, because of youthfulness or other factors, may be quite naive about contingent fee matters."

We have been given no information about the magnitude or difficulty of the legal work that will be expected of the inquirer under the proposed compensation arrangement or about the value of the 20 percent interest in the client and the profit distributions.[3] Even if we had such information, we would be judging it under the standard of "reasonableness," an amorphous concept under which, in the context of our ex parte proceedings in which we make no searching factual inquiries, we could likely condone or reject only those arrangements falling well inside or outside its indistinct boundaries. The "reasonableness" factors listed in Rule 1.5(a) should assist inquirer in applying the law to the details of his proposed fee arrangement.[4]

2. Stock in Lieu of Fees as Conduct Under Rule 1.8(a)

We agree with the commentators who have written on the subject (see Hazard & Hodes, Law of Lawyering (2d ed. 1998) at §1.8:202 et seq.; C. Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics (1986), §8.11.2) that a stock-as-fees arrangement is subject to Rule of Professional Conduct 1.8(a), which governs certain transactions with or related to clients. The Rule provides as follows:

> (a) A lawyer shall not enter into a business transaction with a client or knowingly acquire an ownership, possessory, security, or other pecuniary interest adverse to a client unless:
> (1) The transaction and terms on which the lawyer acquires the interest are fair and reasonable to the client and are fully disclosed and transmitted in writing to the client in a manner which can be reasonably understood by the client;
> (2) The client is given a reasonable opportunity to seek the advice of independent counsel in the transaction; and
> (3) The client consents in writing thereto.

In many respects, Rule 1.8(a) codifies the well-established common law principle that a lawyer occupies a fiduciary position vis-à-vis his client which means that all transactions between lawyer and client are suspect and must be fair to the client. See Connelly v. Swick & Shapiro, 749 A. 2d 1264 (D.C. 2000); Curtis v. Fabianich, 200 A. 2d 382 (D.C. 1964).

There is some overlap of the ethical requirements of Rules 1.8(a) and 1.5(a). Adequate disclosure of the terms and implications of the fee arrangement and the reasonableness of the arrangement are common. But Rule 1.8(a) adds to the lawyer's ethical obligations to his client the requirements that the fee arrangement be "fair" to the client, that the fee arrangement and the disclosure be in writing, that the client be given an opportunity to seek the advice of independent counsel concerning the proposed fee arrangement, and that the client's consent to it be in writing.[5]

3. Conflict of Interest

A conflict of interest question is also presented when a lawyer receives an ownership interest in a client or the client's business venture as compensation, in full or in part, for legal services to be provided to the client. The relevant ethics principle is found in Rule 1.7(b)(4), which prohibits a lawyer from > represent[ing] a client with respect to a matter if . . . the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's . . . own financial, business, property, or personal interests.[6]

Depending on a number of factors, including the extent and value of the ownership interest acquired by the lawyer, its relationship to the total fees to be earned from the engagement, its relationship to the lawyer's total income and total assets, and the type of legal services being provided, an ownership-in-lieu-of-fees arrangement might affect a lawyer's exercise of professional judgment on behalf of the lawyer's client. For example, in a situation in which a lawyer is offering advice concerning the legality of a proposed transaction which, if consummated, will have a significant positive effect on the client's business and the value of its shares, under some circumstances the lawyer's judgment in the matter could (wittingly or unwittingly) be influenced by his ownership of the shares.

Opinions from this and other jurisdictions have long identified the conflict of interest implications of the relationship between a lawyer's personal financial interests and the interests of the lawyer's clients. For example, our Opinion 144 commented on the ethical conflict created when a lawyer was assigned a Criminal Justice Act representation before a judge who had a practice of inadequately compensating appointed counsel. We wrote as follows concerning the application of DR 5-101(A) (the predecessor to Rule 1.7(b)(4)):

> This provision clearly prevents an attorney from accepting employment, without the client's consent, where the attorney's financial interests will impair, or "reasonably" may impair, his professional judgment. Thus, before he accepts a CJA case, inquirer must determine whether the assignment of Judge X, a circumstance that "reasonably" might occur, would affect his judgment. (Emphasis in original.)

While we can readily identify the theoretical potential conflict of interest in an ownership-in lieu-of-fees arrangement, determining when it exists and rises to the level of an ethical bar to a representation is difficult. The ethical prohibition is invoked only when the lawyer's professional judgment "will be or reasonably may be adversely affect-

[3] Where the stock received by the lawyer is not publicly traded, its value at the time it is transferred to the lawyer may be difficult to determine - a factor that may further complicate the Rule 1.5(a) analysis.

[4] We are not aware that our Committee has ever opined whether a specific fee arrangement was reasonable or, under Code of Professional Responsibility DR 2-106, "clearly excessive."

[5] Rule 1.8(a) and the commentary thereto are silent on how fairness is to be determined and whether it is to be determined only by reference to facts and circumstances existing at the time the arrangement is accepted by the parties, or by reference to subsequent developments (for example, a huge appreciation in the value of the shares received as fees such that the lawyer is effectively compensated at 100-fold the reasonable value of his services). For ethics purposes (and not for purposes of assessing common law fiduciary duties), we believe that the "fairness" of the fee arrangement should be judged at the time of the engagement. In other words, if the fee arrangement is "fair and reasonable to the client" at the time of the engagement, no ethical violation could occur if subsequent events beyond the control of the lawyer caused the fee to appear unfair or unreasonable. See Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers (Preliminary Final Draft No. 1, 1996) § 207, comment e ("Fairness is determined based on facts that reasonably could be known at the time of the transaction, not as the facts later develop.").

[6] This prohibition is waivable by the affected client following disclosure by the lawyer of the circumstances of the conflict. See Rule 1.7(c). As reflected in Comment [7] to Rule 1.7 and as we have previously noted (see, e.g., D.C. Bar Op. 257 (Sept. 20, 1995)), if an objective observer would find any reason to question the lawyer's ability to provide competent and zealous representation uninfluenced by the lawyer's financial, business or property interests, the lawyer should seek and obtain the client's informed consent to the representation.

ed" by the lawyer's personal financial interests. Unlike the bright lines created in Rules 1.7(a) and 1.7(b)(1) (prohibiting adversities with a lawyer's own client), the prohibition of Rule 1.7(b)(4) (like the simultaneous representation prohibitions of Rules 1.7(b)(2) and (b)(3)), is one which is highly dependent on the circumstances of the representation and the lawyer's own circumstances. In this Opinion, we can do no more than identify the conflict of interest considerations, and leave it to the inquirer to determine whether the particular circumstances of his representation of his client are such that his judgment "will be or reasonably may be adversely affected" by the fee arrangement. The test to be applied is an objective one, that is, whether a lawyer's judgment "will be or reasonably may be adversely affected" by certain circumstances is determined by the position of a reasonable lawyer under the circumstances. See note 6. The conflict is waivable by the client based on full disclosure by the lawyer. Id. [7]

Conflict of Interest: Simultaneous Representation of Two Plaintiffs Against a Common Defendant in Separate but Related Lawsuits

• A lawyer representing plaintiffs in a class action lawsuit is not precluded from representing a member of the class who wishes to bring a tort action involving related subject matter against the same defendant. The test is whether representation of one client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by representation of the other. If not, dual representation is permissible without client consent. If so, dual representation is permissible only after informed consent of all affected clients is obtained. The situation must be reassessed if adversity arises in the course of the representations.

Applicable Rule

• Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)

Inquiry

An inquiring law firm represents plaintiffs in a class action suit against the District of Columbia that is currently pending in the United States District Court. The class is composed of approximately 3,000 special education students in the District of Columbia who complain that the District is not meeting its obligations under the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (20 U.S.C. §1400, et seq.) to provide a free, appropriate education (and related services) that meet each individual student's unique special education needs. Among other things, the court has ordered the District of Columbia Public Schools to pay tuition bills in a timely manner and to provide appropriate transportation services.

During the pendency of the suit, an individual class member was abducted and assaulted allegedly as a result of the failure to provide adequate transportation services. Once the law firm learned of these events, it filed in the class action a Motion for Injunctive Relief on behalf of the individual class member. The class member and his mother have now asked the law firm to represent them in a tort action against the District of Columbia. The law firm has requested our opinion as to whether potential conflicts of interest preclude it from accepting the proffered representation.

Discussion

Rule 1.7 of the District of Columbia Rules of Professional Conduct states general rules governing conflicts of interest as between current clients. It is important to note at the outset that the District of Columbia Court of Appeals "adopted a version of Rule 1.7 which substantially differs from the American Bar Association's Model Rule 1.7." Griva v. Davison, 637 A.2d 830, 842 (D.C. 1994). Thus, while interpretations of the ABA Model Rule may be helpful, they must be applied with caution.

"The legislative history of our Rule 1.7 reflects an intention to divide potential conflict of interest situations into three categories: (1) cases in which representation is absolutely forbidden, (2) cases in which dual representation is permissible after informed consent of all affected clients is obtained, and (3) cases in which dual representation is permitted without client consent." Griva v. Davison, 637 A.2d at 842. This is not a situation (prohibited by Rule 1.7(a)) where a lawyer is being asked to advance adverse positions on behalf of different clients in the same matter.[1] Rather, the law firm has been asked to represent two clients whose interests seem to be similar in separate law suits with an overlapping subject matter. We must look to Rule 1.7(b) for guidance.

Rule 1.7(b) states, in pertinent part, that "a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if:

> (2) such representation will be or is likely to be adversely affected by representation of another client; [or]
> (3) representation of another client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by such representation[.]"

These are not absolute prohibitions, however.

> A lawyer may represent a client with respect to a matter in the circumstances described in paragraph (b) above if each potentially affected client provides consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation.

Rule 1.7(c). Thus, representation of both clients is permitted if each gives informed consent. The more difficult question is whether the law firm even needs to seek such consent. The answer to that question depends, in turn, on whether the representation of one client "will be or is likely to be adversely affected" by representation of the other.

This test has objective as well as subjective elements. "Although the lawyer must be satisfied that the representation can be wholeheartedly and zealously undertaken, if an objective observer would have any reasonable doubt on that issue, the client has a right to disclosure of all relevant considerations and the opportunity to be the judge of its own interests." Rule 1.7, Comment [7]. However, the conflict must be likely not merely hypothetical. In Opinion 265 we explained that "[t]he rule focuses on those conflicts that would be apparent to a reasonably conscientious lawyer." D.C. Bar Op. 265 (1996). "[I]n a wide variety

[7] The conclusions reached in this Opinion are similar to those reached in other jurisdictions and by the ABA on the subjects addressed. See, e.g., Assoc. of the Bar of the City of New York Formal Op. 2000-3 (2000), Utah Ethics Op. 98-13 (1998) and ABA Formal Op. 00-418 (2000).

[1] Rule 1.7(a) provides that "[a] lawyer shall not advance two or more adverse positions in the same matter."

of routine cases where no concrete adverse effect by one representation on another is foreseeable, the inquirer is not obliged to make disclosure or to seek consent." Id. In other words, "[t]he mere possibility that a result in one representation will affect the outcome of another is not enough to trigger a conflict as to which waiver must be sought." Id.

Nevertheless, "if an objective observer can identify and describe concrete ways in which one representation may reasonably be anticipated to interfere with the other, then a cognizable conflict arises under our rules, and disclosure must be made and a waiver sought." Id. "If the lawyer determines or can foresee that an issue with respect to the application of paragraph (b) exists, the only prudent course is for the lawyer to make disclosure, pursuant to paragraph (c), to each affected client and enable each to determine whether in its judgment the representation at issue is likely to affect its interests adversely." Rule 1.7, Comment [9]. "It is much to be preferred that a representation that is likely to lead to a conflict be avoided before the representation begins, and a lawyer should bear this fact in mind in considering whether disclosure should be made and consent obtained at the outset." Id., Comment [22].[2]

"Central to deciding whether adverse effect, and therefore a conflict, exists will be issues such as: (1) the relationship between the two forums in which the two representations will occur; (2) the centrality in each matter of the legal issue as to which the lawyer will be asked to advocate; (3) the directness of the adversity between the positions on the legal issue of the two clients; (4) the extent to which the clients may be in a race to obtain the first ruling on a question of law that is not well settled; and (5) whether a reasonable observer would conclude that the lawyer would be likely to hesitate in either of her representations or to be less aggressive on one client's behalf because of the other representation. . . . [T]he focus of the analysis ought not to be on formalities but should be on the actual harm that may befall one or both clients." D.C. Bar Op. 265.

Given the facts presented in the inquiry, it seems unlikely that representation of either client "will be or is likely to be adversely affected" by representation of the other. Most importantly, there is no present adversity of positions, and it seems unlikely that direct adversity will arise in the future. In both law suits the plaintiffs are, or will be, asserting the obligation of the District of Columbia to provide adequate transportation services. Thus, they are on the same side of the issue. See Rodick v. Schenectady, 1 F.3d 1341, 1350 (2d Cir. 1993) (not improper for single lawyer to represent police officers and city in malicious prosecution action even though city's only liability arose under doctrine of respondent superior; although city might have defended by claiming that officers were not acting within the scope of their official duties, in this case both city and officers argued that officers were acting in their official capacities and lawyer advanced all possible defenses available to officers); Molitoris v. Woods, 618 A.2d 985 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1992) (no conflict of interest when law firm represented plaintiff in personal injury suit and employee benefit plan in its subrogation claim arising from payment of medical benefits to plaintiff; subrogation interest of plan identical to interest of plaintiff in recovery against defendants).

Moreover, the potential for conflict is lessened because the plaintiffs seek different relief. In the class action, plaintiffs seek injunctive relief and from time to time submit claims for attorneys' fees. There is no claim for money damages. The tort action, by contrast, will present solely a claim for money damages. Success by one client should not interfere with the other client's chances of winning its suit. Cf. Fiandaca v. Cunningham, 827 F.2d 825 (1st Cir. 1987) (counsel for class of female inmates seeking improved facilities should have been disqualified when defendants offered to settle suit on advantageous terms which were contrary to the interests of a class of plaintiffs which counsel represented in a separate action); North Carolina State Bar v. Whitted, 347 S.E.2d 60 (N.C. Ct. App. 1986) (improper to undertake representation of two wrongful death claimants in obtaining settlement from limited fund; any apportionment would benefit one client to other's detriment).[3] Similarly, a ruling against one client should not preclude relief for the other.

It has been suggested that a conflict may arise in the course of defining the District's obligation to provide adequate transportation services for special education students. The tort plaintiff likely will assert that the District breached its obligations because the bus driver did not wait long enough for the plaintiff to arrive for pick-up or did not take additional steps to determine whether the plaintiff was planning to go to school that day. However, extending the time required to pick up one student will necessarily lengthen the ride and extend the waiting time of other students. This possibility does not seem to create a conflict that is any more concrete than the fact that the law firm is representing a class of approximately 3,000 students. Inevitably, increased attention to the transportation needs of one class member may divert resources from the others. These facts without more do not create a conflict but the law firm should remain sensitive to the possibility that a conflict may arise.

The prospect of a conflict developing is lessened by the fact that claims for equitable damages and attorneys' fees are decided by the court. A claim for money damages is ordinarily decided by a jury. A conflict will be even less likely if the tort action is filed in the Superior Court or is assigned to a different federal judge.[4] Moreover, it is unlikely that any actual conflict will escape notice because the representations are public in nature and will be monitored by the judges presiding over the litigation.

Because there is no present or likely conflict, the law firm may accept the second representation without obtaining the consent of both clients. However, it must reassess the situation as both lawsuits progress. If a conflict as defined by Rule

[2] In a recent opinion this committee discussed the impact of joint representation on the lawyer's duty to maintain client confidences and to keep each client reasonably informed. D.C. Bar Op. 296 (2000).

[3] A conflict may arise is it appears that the cost of complying with a judgment in favor of one client will render the defendant financially unable to satisfy the claims of another client. There is no suggestion that such a risk has arisen here.

[4] This situation is unlike that discussed in ABA Formal Op. 93-377 (1993). Interpreting Model Rule 1.7(b), the ABA Committee opined that if "two matters are being litigated in the same jurisdiction, and there is a substantial risk that the law firm's representation of one client will create a legal precedent, even if not binding, which is likely materially to undercut the legal position being urged on behalf of the other client, the lawyer should either refuse to accept the second representation or (if otherwise permissible) withdraw from the first, unless both clients consent after full disclosure of the potential ramifications of the lawyer continuing to handle both matters." (emphasis added). This conclusion was based on the premise that the lawyer was being asked to advocate "directly contrary" positions with respect to a substantive legal issue presented in the two matters. Here, by contrast, it does not seem likely that the law firm will face the prospect of arguing "directly contrary" legal positions.

1.7 develops and the lawyer nevertheless is "satisfied that [both representations] can be wholeheartedly and zealously undertaken," Rule 1.7, Comment [7], the firm must seek consent of both clients or withdraw if that is possible in compliance with Rule 1.16.

Conclusion

Based on the facts presented, Rule 1.7 does not preclude the law firm from undertaking the second representation. The most cautious approach would be to seek the informed consent of both clients as the second representation begins. However, the District of Columbia's version of Rule 1.7 recognizes that there are cases where dual representation is permitted without client consent. Because it does not appear that representation of one client "will be or is likely to be adversely affected by" representation of the other, we conclude that the law firm may undertake the second representation without seeking client consent, subject to reassessment if at a later time adversity between the interests of the client in the second representation and those of the class in the first representation should arise.

Opinion No. 302

Soliciting Plaintiffs for Class Action Lawsuits or Obtaining Legal Work Through Internet-based Web Pages

• It is permissible for lawyers to use Internet-based web pages to seek plaintiffs for class action lawsuits, provided they comply with all applicable D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. It also is permissible for lawyers to obtain legal work through Internet-based web pages on which potential clients post requests for bids on legal projects.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Communications)
• Rule 3.6 (Trial Publicity)
• Rule 4.3 (Dealing with Unrepresented Person)
• Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)
• Rule 7.1 (Communications Concerning a Lawyer's Services)

Inquiry

The Legal Ethics Committee has received numerous inquiries concerning lawyers' use of Internet-based web pages as a means of obtaining clients. One such inquiry asks whether the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct prohibit an attorney from using the Internet in seeking plaintiffs for a class action lawsuit. Another asks whether it is permissible to obtain legal work through Internet services that offer web pages on which potential clients post requests for bids on legal projects. We address these inquiries together because each raises the general issue of Internet communications regarding lawyers' services.

With respect to the issue of using web pages to obtain plaintiffs in class action lawsuits, we have not been asked to evaluate any particular web site for its conformity to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. As background to preparing this opinion, however, we visited a variety of web sites found through use of Internet search engines in order to see how lawyers are making use of new cyberspace technologies to communicate with potential clients. We came across hundreds of such web sites, ranging from extremely professional presentations to ones of marginal quality. Some described class action lawsuits that had already been filed; others contained information on class action lawsuits lawyers or sponsoring organizations were hoping to file, and urged visitors to contact the plaintiffs' attorneys to sign up for the suit. With respect to this latter group of web sites, it was often impossible to tell whether a lawyer was involved in the contemplated litigation. We discuss additional features of the web sites we examined in more detail below.

With respect to lawyers' use of web sites providing bulletin boards on which prospective clients post requests for bids to provide legal services, we found a handful of such web sites. Information at most of these sites was not available without registering to use the service, but one web site, which describes itself as the "premier business-to-business exchange for legal services," provided what appeared to be clear and comprehensive information to visitors from the general public. We therefore use this site as a template for our general discussion of web-based bulletin board services, without intending to pass judgment on the specifics of this particular service.

The site invites attorneys to register to bid on legal projects by submitting information about themselves, including their practice areas, firm size, location, years in business, technological capacities, and (at the option of the firm) its "diversity profile." Corporations are invited to post requests for proposals ("RFPs") on the web site. They may identify themselves or may, in "special circumstances" not further explained, post RFPs anonymously. Corporations may block other corporations from seeing their RFPs and may also select which registered law firms may view them. Law firms respond to RFPs by filling out a summary of their bid and fee structure, which they must submit to the corporation through the web site. The prospective parties may then correspond with each other, either through encrypted communications over the web site or off-line, at their own option. At the end of this process, corporations make their decisions about which law firm to hire for a particular posted project.

The web site sponsor states that it does not participate in any discussion corporations or law firms have during the selection process. It does offer, however, to assist corporations in preparing RFPs and to assist law firms in preparing their responding bids in appropriate formats as required by the corporations. It also states that it will assist corporations by seeking to register new law firms, by researching and recommending law firms not yet registered at the site, and by verifying bar admissions and good standing of counsel responding to RFPs. The web site sponsor charges a percentage fee (2%) of the amount paid by the corporation to the law firm selected for work, which the corporation pays directly to the web site sponsor at the same time that it pays its legal bills. The web site further discloses the principals in this venture, including its directors, managers, outside counsel, and advisory board, all of whom are described in depth; the user agreement; and mock sample RFPs and firm registrations.

Discussion

We start our analysis by noting that, consistent with the approach of ethics committees in many other jurisdictions, we see nothing untoward in lawyers communicating about their services through web sites, provided that such communications comply with our general rules governing lawyer communications with clients.[1] Indeed, questions regarding how a lawyer may use a web site in seeking to obtain clients are at bottom no different than any other question about lawyer communications about legal services. Such questions are governed by D.C. Rule 7.1.[2] Unlike many other jurisdictions, D.C. does not have special rules or restrictions that apply to client solicitation; D.C. Rule 7.1 applies to all forms of lawyer communications about legal services. The touchstone of Rule 7.1 is whether lawyers' communications about themselves or their services are "false or misleading." 7.1(a). Thus, regardless of whether using web sites to obtain clients is viewed as advertising or solicitation, the same fundamental restriction prohibiting "false or misleading" communications will govern the analysis.

We note at the outset that many sources of law in addition to the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct may apply to lawyer communications with potential class action plaintiffs. These sources of law include Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 and its state law counterparts, the orders of the court supervising the class action lawsuit once it has been filed, constitutional restrictions on regulating attorney communications with potential class action members as discussed in Gulf Oil v. Bernard, 452 U.S. 89 (1981), and so forth. As always, we assert no opinion on these other sources of law potentially relevant to the question of legal restrictions on a lawyer's ability to communicate with potential class action clients, but confine our discussion to the requirements of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

Another area of law we do not address concerns the applicability of other jurisdictions' rules of professional conduct and related choice of law issues under Rule 8.5. We note, however, that the distinctive nature of the communications medium under discussion deeply implicates these issues. The very name, "World Wide Web," highlights the reach of such communications far beyond the bounds of any particular legal jurisdiction. Not surprisingly, our search for web sites concerning class action lawsuits turned up English language sites from all over the world. We thus wish to emphasize at the outset that this opinion, limited to the application of the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct to web sites seeking class action clients, in no way resolves questions of utmost importance to practitioners—namely, the potential applicability of other jurisdictions' rules of professional conduct.

With these caveats in mind, we turn back to the requirement of D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct 7.1 that lawyers' communications about their services not be false or misleading. There are a number of ways communication about a class action lawsuit could run afoul of this requirement. Most obviously, the communication must accurately state the nature of the lawsuit. In addition, a communication may be false or misleading if it uses words such as "Notice" or otherwise suggests that it is required or authorized by a court when that is not in fact the case. Cf. In re McKesson HBOC, Inc. Securities Litigation, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5828 (N.D. Cal. May 1, 2000) (deciding issue under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23). As we noted in Opinion 249, Rule 7.1 allows truthful claims about lawyer specialization, provided that the basis for making the claim is capable of substantiation. Comparative claims about the superiority of the lawyer's services that cannot be substantiated are prohibited, as discussed under Rule 7.1(a)(2), Comment [1]. Similarly, as we further noted in Opinion 249, lawyers may not make claims that they "can help you" since "there is no way such a claim can be accurate in the abstract and the practitioner cannot know whether or not he can help any client until some facts are known about the client's case."

Unlike other jurisdictions, D.C. does not prohibit the use of for-profit agencies to provide advertising or referral services to lawyers. Thus, lawyers may pay outside services or agents for posting information about pending or contemplated class action litigation from which the law firm stands to gain clients. This situation may in some circumstances be analogous to purchasing space in the yellow pages or newspaper to run a paid advertisement, which is permissible under Rule 7.1 as long as it is clear that the communication is a paid advertisement.

In other situations, however, the relationship between the lawyer and the web site host may be less obvious. Here, as Rule 7.1(b)(5) and accompanying Comment [6] explain, a lawyer who employs a paid intermediary in seeking legal business must take all reasonable steps to ensure that the potential client is informed of the consideration paid by the lawyer to the intermediary and the effect of such payment on the fee charged.[3] Thus, attorneys must disclose their financial relationship to third-party intermediaries hosting web sites through which the lawyer may gain legal business. In our search of web sites advertising for plaintiffs for class action lawsuits, we came across many sites in which the affiliation between a lawyer and the group or individual sponsoring the web site was unclear. This may well have been because no lawyer was affiliated with the contemplated litigation. In cases in which a lawyer is financially affiliated with an organization or individual who is advertising for potential plaintiffs for contemplated class action litigation, however, this relationship must be made clear to potential clients.

[1] Other opinions that have concluded that lawyers may advertise legal services on a web page or through other electronic means include N.Y. State Legal Ethics Op. 709 (1998) ("advertising via the Internet...is permissible as long as the advertising is not false, deceptive or misleading, and otherwise adheres to the requirements set forth in the Code"); Conn. Legal Ethics Op. 97-29 (1997) ("In our opinion the same rules apply to Internet advertising that apply in other media"); Ill. Legal Ethics Op. 96-10 (1997) ("The Committee believes that the existing Rules of Professional Conduct governing advertising, solicitation and communication concerning a lawyer's services provide adequate and appropriate guidance to a lawyer using the Internet."); Utah Legal Ethics Op. 97-10 (1997) (attorneys may advertise their legal services through Internet provided they comply with states' ethics rules governing advertising); N.C. Legal Ethics Op. RPC 239 (1996) ("All communications by a lawyer concerning the lawyer or the lawyer's services including communications via computer, are subject to the prohibition...against false or misleading communications."); Pa. Legal Ethics Op. 96-17 (1996) ("Any content that would be permissible under [our rules] should also be permissible on a web page," with the fundamental restriction being against "false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services").

[2] D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct Rule 7.1(a) provides:

> A lawyer shall not make a false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services. A communication is false or misleading if it:
> (1) Contains a material misrepresentation of fact or law, or omits a fact necessary to make the statement considered as a whole not materially misleading; or
> (2) Contains an assertion about the lawyer or the lawyer's services that cannot be substantiated.

[3] Rule 7.1(b)(5) provides that a lawyer should not solicit employment if "the solicitation involves the uses of an intermediary and the lawyer has not taken all reasonable steps to ensure that the potential client is informed of (a) the consideration paid by the lawyer to the intermediary, and (b) the effect, if any, of the payment to the intermediary on the total fee to be charged."

Lawyers' financial interests in class action litigation raise still another concern under D.C. Rule 4.3. As Rule 4.3 provides, a lawyer who represents a client in a matter may not state or imply to unrepresented persons that the lawyer is disinterested when the unrepresented person might assume the lawyer is providing disinterested advice with regard to the matter. Lawyers sponsoring web sites describing contemplated or pending class action lawsuits in which they are involved obviously are not disinterested, both because they are representing clients with interests in the litigation and because the size of their fees may depend in part on the number of class action members they are able to obtain. Thus, lawyers engaged in Internet communications about class action lawsuits must disclose their interests in the legal issues or cases under discussion. Lawyers may not pretend that information provided on a web page or in another cyberspace format is from a disinterested perspective, motivated merely by a desire to inform the public about legal matters.

Finally, we note in passing that lawyers' web site communications about a class action lawsuit could potentially raise issues under Rule 3.6, which concerns lawyer statements about a case being tried to a judge or jury. Rule 3.6 applies to lawyer statements that "a reasonable person would expect to be disseminated by means of mass public communication." Since web sites with unrestricted public access provide such a means of mass public communications, lawyers should ensure that web site communications to the general public do not create "a serious and imminent threat to the impartiality of the judge or jury."

In sum, use of web sites as a means of obtaining plaintiffs for class action lawsuits in many ways resembles the use of other forms of mass media, such as newspaper advertisements, and can be analyzed in much the same way. In other respects, however, cyberspace communications raise new issues by virtue of the distinctive nature of the technology. For example, because web pages allow multilayered communications, questions may arise about whether a visitor to a web page may be misled because relevant disclosures are hidden many clicks away from the main pages. Indeed, on some of the web sites we examined, relevant disclosures, such as the relationship between a group of lawyers and the class action litigation being discussed, were buried in links several clicks removed from the main pages. The information needed to prevent a web site communication from being false and misleading should be readily available to visitors. Here a helpful analogy might be fine print in a newspaper ad; the relevant question would be whether the public to which the communication is being directed would be likely to be misled or deceived by the web site's design and layout.

Practitioners may be guided in designing web sites by the advice of e-commerce experts. One such e-commerce expert suggests that key disclaimers be provided on "click through" boxes or pages, which require visitors to verify they have read important information by clicking on a specified area of the screen before proceeding. See Walter A. Effross, "A Web Site Checklist," Legal Times, Mar. 1, 1999. Prof. Effross further emphasizes the need to take care in designing web sites that allow visitors to send e-mail to a site owner. Indeed, in our survey, we found quite a few sites that invited potential class action members to submit detailed profiles about themselves to the web site sponsor. Lawyers may want to use "click through" pages with disclaimers to ensure that visitors are not misled about the nature of the relationship established through such communications. Lawyers should also take steps to ensure that they are receiving the e-mail sent to them via their web pages. Lawyers may want to state that they will send a reply message confirming that e-mail communications have been received, and caution visitors not to assume that their message has been received until they have received such confirmation. This confirmatory message might also present an opportunity to clarify the nature of the relationship formed by such communications.

Following yet other suggestions of Prof. Effross, lawyers may want to take steps to standardize the responses visitors can make to web pages so that visitors cannot communicate online about matters other than those about which the lawyers are seeking information. Effross further notes that web sites can include disclaimers stating that they are not intending to solicit clients outside particular jurisdictions, or may take even stronger measures such as accepting communications only from persons with zip codes within appropriate jurisdictions. These suggestions do not, of course, serve as a definitive guide concerning the safeguards lawyers should institute in using web sites to obtain legal business; given the rapid pace of technological development in this area, additional protections may be warranted in the future.

Lawyer contacts with potential class action members through Internet communications are potentially less intrusive than in-person contacts, but lawyers must nevertheless take care that, in communicating with potential clients over the Internet as in any other form of communication, they conform to the restriction in Rule 7.1(b)(3) against seeking employment by a person who has not sought the lawyer's advice where "the potential client is apparently in a physical or mental condition which would make it unlikely that the potential client could exercise reasonable, considered judgment as to the selection of a lawyer." Likewise, Rule 7.1(c) provides that lawyers may not assist organizations in promoting the use of their services or those of other affiliated lawyers if the promotion activity involves the use of "coercion, duress . . . or vexatious or harassing conduct." Thus lawyers may not use Internet communications in a vexatious or harassing manner.

Practitioners must also, of course, ensure that they have in place workable means of conducting conflicts checks and otherwise assessing the suitability of any potential client before agreeing to the representation. The fact that communications about the lawyer's services are occurring over the Internet does not in any way minimize the attorney's obligations to avoid conflicts of interest.

Finally, our topic raises the question of preserving confidentiality in communicating with clients over the Internet. As we have already discussed in Opinion 281 (1998), the transmission of information from a lawyer to a client by unencrypted electronic mail will not violate Rule 1.6 unless special circumstances require greater means of security. All of the same considerations we discussed in Opinion 281 would apply in analyzing the need to encrypt e-mail communications in the context at issue here.

We now turn to inquiries we have received on the subject of attorneys' use of web sites on which clients post requests for bids of legal projects. Our response to such inquiries is motivated in part by the Association of the Bar of the City of New York's ("ABCNY") recent release of an opinion approving this practice with certain restrictions. New York City Ethics Op. 2000-1 (2000).

Yet another of the many ways in which the cyberspace communications revolution has affected law practice is in the birth of web sites offering a service, perhaps best analogized to a bulletin board, on which potential clients may post legal projects and invite attorneys to bid on them. This practice, as the ABCNY noted, is similar to the Requests for Proposals procedure already used by the government and increasing numbers of other clients to select counsel for particular legal projects. The ABCNY, applying the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility, approved the use of an Internet-based legal services bidding system in its Opinion 2000-1, provided that four conditions obtain: (1) the client's invitation is not initiated by the lawyer; (2) the fee charged is paid only by the client; (3) no legal fees are shared with the service provider, and (4) the responding lawyer is not prescreened, approved, or otherwise regulated by the web site sponsor. Although we concur with the ABCNY's basic views about the type of Internet-based bidding system described above, the differences between our legal ethics rules and those of New York lead us to different conclusions about the restrictions to be imposed on this practice.

At the outset, we note that we see no ethical evils lurking in the practice; on the contrary, we view it as a potentially positive development in more efficiently matching attorneys and clients seeking legal services. As we noted in Opinion 225 (1992), where we discussed law firms participation in prepaid legal services programs, this "committee encourages the development of new approaches to the provision of legal services, so long as those approaches conform to the general and accepted norms of ethical conduct designed to protect the public and the profession" (quoting D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 91 (1980)).

Again, the touchstone for analyzing such communications is the Rule 7.1(a) standard barring lawyer communications about their services that are "false or misleading." Accordingly, lawyers participating in Internet-based bidding systems must satisfy themselves that their responses to requests for bids on legal projects are not false or misleading in the ways discussed above or in other ways. Claims lawyers make about their services must be evaluated in light of their likelihood to mislead or deceive their intended recipient.

An inquirer has asked whether the restriction articulated by the ABCNY against lawyers paying a fee to access web sites containing postings of legal projects applies under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. We conclude that it does not. The ABCNY's views are based on the New York State ethical prohibition against participation in for-profit referral plans. D.C. Rule 7.1, on the other hand, as we have already noted, explicitly permits the payment of consideration to a non-lawyer intermediary to assist a lawyer seeking employment. Comment [6] to Rule 7.1 explains that this rule "permits a lawyer to pay another person for channeling professional work to the lawyer. . . . Likewise, a lawyer may participate in lawyer referral programs and pay the usual fees charged by such programs." Thus, it is permissible under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct for lawyers to pay a fee or other consideration in order to access a web site containing postings of legal projects. Rule 7.1(b)(5) provides that lawyers must take "all reasonable steps to ensure that the potential client is informed of (a) the consideration, if any, paid or to be paid by the lawyer to the intermediary, and (b) the effect, if any, of the payment to the intermediary on the total fee to be charged." Thus, lawyers paying fees to participate in a web-based bidding service must inform potential clients in their bids on a legal project of the consideration paid in order to access the web site and the effect, if any, of this payment on the proposed fee to be charged the client.

Our rules lead us to a different approach than that of the ABCNY with respect to another consideration in the use of Internet-based bidding services as well. In its Opinion 2000-1, the ABCNY analyzed whether the Internet-based bidding procedure violated restrictions on solicitation contained in the New York Lawyer's Code of Professional Responsibility that do not exist in the D.C. Rules. The ABCNY concluded that the described bidding procedure did not violate New York's anti-solicitation rules because all communications between potential clients and lawyers were initiated by the potential clients. The ABCNY reasoned that it was "the clients who, in effect, have 'solicited' those attorneys who are interested to submit a bid on the project" and thus concluded that the Internet-based bidding system was permissible, provided that clients initiated all communications with lawyers. he same analysis does not apply under the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, because application of the D.C. Rules does not turn on the sometimes fine distinction between advertising and solicitation. Instead, Rule 7.1, as most relevant here, prohibits a lawyer from soliciting employment through an intermediary only if the solicitation involves use of a statement that is false or misleading. Rule 7.1(b)(1).

The ABCNY opinion further notes that the arrangement it reviewed did not permit the Internet service to screen, approve, or otherwise direct or regulate attorneys' professional presentations in their RFP responses. The sample site we examined for purposes of preparing this opinion similarly focuses its offers of support services on corporations seeking law firms rather than on law firms responding to RFPs. Unlike the arrangement reviewed by the ABCNY, however, the sample site we reviewed does offer to assist law firms in responding to RFPs in order to ensure compliance "in appropriate formats as required by the corporations." We view such limited involvement in law firms' formulation of RFP responses as permissible under Rule 5.4, since it appears intended merely to ensure that potential clients' informational needs are met. It does not, in other words, appear that the Internet service intends to "direct or regulate the lawyer's professional judgment in rendering such legal services," which would be prohibited under Rule 5.4(c).

The ABCNY opinion states that any fee a law firm pays to a service provider cannot be linked to or contingent on the amount of legal fees the lawyers obtain from a posted project. We agree with this aspect of the ABCNY's opinion, since such an arrangement would violate D.C. Rule 5.4's prohibition against lawyers sharing legal fees with non-lawyers. See Opinion 286 (payment to non-lawyer of referral fee contingent on or tied to a lawyer's receipt of legal fees constitutes an impermissible sharing of fees). The web site we examined in preparing this opinion appears to avoid such problems because it is the client who pays all charges for using the Internet service. These charges are calculated as a portion of the legal bills the client incurs in using a lawyer obtained through the Internet service, but since it is the client who pays the Internet service these bills, there is no impermissible fee sharing under Rule 5.4.

We also agree with the ABCNY that potential confidentiality and conflicts problems may arise under the contemplated arrangement. The inquirer in the ABCNY case proposed to assist responding attorneys in avoiding potential conflicts troubles by giving attorneys the name of the potential client on whose project they intended to bid, along with the name of the adverse party, if any. We agree with the ABCNY's observation that such a procedure, though well meaning, poses potential problems where providing this information could result in disclosure of secret client information, such as an intent to file a future lawsuit or concern about a potential source of liability exposure. The web site we examined attempts to mitigate these problems in several ways, including by blocking corporations from seeing each other's RFPs, allowing RFP access to only those law firms a corporation authorizes, and permitting anonymous RFP postings in some (undefined) circumstances. These procedures help protect against conflicts and confidentiality problems, but do not fully solve them. In particular, we are troubled by the possibility that an unsophisticated client could disclose in an RFP information that could be potentially damaging to it if viewed by lawyers having a conflict of interest. Lawyers should thus assure themselves that any Internet bidding service in which they participate has adequate procedures in place to avoid such problems.

Law firms must also conduct their own internal conflicts reviews in the course of the procedure contemplated for making matches between law firms and clients. Because the procedures we reviewed allow for direct communications between a lawyer and potential client after the first contact, to which the web site sponsor would not have access, it would appear that law firms could rely on their usual protections for confidential information and procedures for undertaking conflicts checks.

To summarize, our approach differs from the ABCNY's in that the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct allow lawyers to initiate communications with potential clients and to pay a fee to access web sites containing postings of legal projects. On the other hand, we agree with the ABCNY that, when lawyers pay a fee to use such services, the lawyers' charge should not be linked to the size of the legal bills they generate through the service. We also agree with the ABCNY that such services are permissible to the extent that web site sponsors are not involved in directing or regulating attorneys in such a way as to interfere with lawyers' professional judgment in how they would render legal services. Finally, we agree that lawyers must ensure that web sites they use to bid on legal projects have taken adequate steps to protect against confidentiality and conflict of interest problems.

In closing, we reiterate that this opinion discusses the rules that apply to attorneys making use of web sites providing legal project bidding services only to the extent that our rules provide the applicable rules of decision. Questions that arise about substantive law, unauthorized practice of law, and the applicability of other states' rules of professional conduct by virtue of the accessibility of Internet sites to lawyers outside this jurisdiction, are beyond the scope of this committee's mandate.

Opinion No. 303

Sharing Office Space And Services By Unaffiliated Lawyers

- Unaffiliated lawyers may share office space and related services so long as the arrangements for such sharing do not compromise the confidentiality of each attorney's client information, the independence of each attorney, and the separate obligations of each attorney to comply with the Rules of Professional Conduct. In addition, the sharing arrangements must be structured in a way that does not suggest to the public that the lawyers are affiliated when they are not.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
- Rule 1.7 (Conflicts of Interest)
- Rule 1.10 (Imputed Disqualification)
- Rule 7.1 (Communications Concerning Lawyer's Services)
- Rule 7.5 (Firm Names and Letterheads)

Inquiry

This Committee has been asked to address the ethical issues that arise when two or more attorneys agree to share office space and/or office services without forming a law firm or otherwise associating their practices. Similar issues arise when a sole practitioner rents office space and/or services from a law firm. Like the other jurisdictions that have considered this issue, we conclude that unaffiliated lawyers may share office space and/or office services subject to the continuing obligations of the individual attorneys to comply with rules of professional conduct.

Discussion

It has become increasingly common, especially in high cost metropolitan areas like the District of Columbia, for attorneys to practice law in shared office suites, often utilizing shared office staff and facilities. Through such sharing arrangements, an individual attorney's overhead expenses for receptionists, support staff, meeting rooms, libraries, copy and fax machines, and the like can be proportionately reduced by the financial contributions of the other attorneys participating in the arrangement. These economic benefits, in turn, help attorneys to deliver cost-effective legal services to their clients.

As other jurisdictions have recognized,[1] and we confirm, nothing in the rules of professional conduct prohibits attorneys from sharing office space, personnel, equipment, or expenses. However, while such sharing arrangements may provide undeniable economic benefits, they also have the potential to create ethical problems that must be recognized and avoided by all attorneys participating in the arrangement.

[1] At least eight other state bar organizations (California, Colorado, Connecticut, Maryland, Michigan, Ohio, Rhode Island, and Virginia) have addressed office and/or service sharing arrangements between unaffiliated attorneys. All have approved such arrangements subject to varying qualifications designed to ensure compliance with the ethical rules addressed herein. See, e.g., California Ethics Opin. 1997-150 (1997); Colorado Ethics Opin. 89 (1991); Connecticut Ethics Opin. 90-27 (1990); Maryland Ethics Opin. 88-10 (1987); Michigan Informal Ethics Opin. CI-1045 (1984); Ohio Ethics Opin. 89-36 (1989); Rhode Island Ethics Opin. 88-5 (1988); Virginia Ethics Opin. 874 (1987).

Public Confusion

Office-sharing arrangements by unaffiliated attorneys create a risk of public confusion that the attorneys involved in such an arrangement are in fact affiliated with each other when no such professional relationship exists. D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct 7.1 provides that "a lawyer shall not make a false or misleading communication about the lawyer or the lawyer's services." This proscription applies to both material misrepresentations and material omissions about the lawyer's services, including the professional affiliations of the lawyer.

Messages conveyed to the public, explicitly or implicitly, about the nature of an office- and/or service-sharing arrangement between attorneys are fully subject to Rule 7.1 and must comply with its terms. For example, if attorneys A, B and C are in an office-sharing arrangement that is identified on common letterhead as "The Law Offices of A, B and C," then the public would quite naturally assume that A, B and C were affiliated with each other in the joint practice of law. See D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct 7.5(d), Comment [2] ("lawyers sharing office facilities, but who are not in fact partners, may not denominate themselves as, for example, Smith and Jones, for that title suggests partnership in the practice of law"). If there were no such affiliation, the public would be misled as to the true nature of the relationship among these attorneys.[2]

Similarly, if solo attorney A is renting space and services from law firm B, C & D and the only sign in the vicinity of the office identifies the facilities as "The Law Firm of B, C & D," then the public would quite naturally assume that attorney A is affiliated with the law firm of B, C & D. Once again, the public would be misled as to the true nature of the relationship among these attorneys. To avoid this potential for confusion, all attorneys in office-sharing arrangements should prominently display signage at the entryway to the office space that accurately describes the nature of the separate legal practices operating within that space. See Virginia Commw. Bar Cmte. on Ethics & Prof. Op. 874 (1987) (sole practitioner sharing office with law firm should ensure signage and directory indicate lawyer's solo practice and lack of affiliation with law firm).

Another source of public confusion about office-sharing arrangements is the manner in which shared office telephones are answered. A receptionist answering a shared office telephone with the greeting "Good morning, Law Offices of A, B and C" disseminates the same misleading message to the public as the letterhead example discussed above. It would be preferable, of course, for the sharing attorneys to have separate telephone lines that could be answered individually in the name of each attorney by the shared receptionist, but this may not always be practical. When it is not, the shared receptionist must be circumspect in implying an association of the unaffiliated attorneys by the manner in which the office telephone is answered or by any other acts suggesting relationships between the attorneys when none exist. To avoid any implication of affiliation between the individual attorneys, the proper greeting in answering the common telephone line is simply "Law Offices." See, e.g., Ohio Ethics Op. 95-1 (1995); Connecticut Ethics Op. 89-3 (1989); Rhode Island Ethics Op. 88-5 (1988).

Attorneys involved in an office-sharing arrangement must ensure that in all communications made about the nature of their practice, the public is not confused, deceived or misled that there is any firm, partnership, corporate, "of counsel" or other relationship between the attorneys when no such relationship exists.[3] At a minimum, this includes avoiding the use of any written communications – such as letterhead, business cards, office signs, or advertisements – that combine or link the practices of the sharing attorneys in a manner suggestive of an actual affiliation. See ABA Formal Op. 310 (1963). If a potential client appears confused about the relationship among the attorneys in such an arrangement, the attorney should take steps to resolve this confusion, including making an affirmative disclaimer of any affiliation with the other attorneys in the shared office space.

Client Confidentiality

Another concern in office- and/or service-sharing arrangements between unaffiliated attorneys is preserving the confidences and secrets of each attorney's clients as required by D.C. Rule 1.6. The attorneys involved in the office-sharing relationship must ensure that their own actions and those of the professional and support staff they are responsible for supervising fully comply with this obligation and protect client confidences and secrets.

There are myriad logistical possibilities in office-sharing arrangements that could conceivably threaten client confidentiality. Individual attorney files and storage space in common or shared office areas must be treated in a way that preserves client confidentiality. An attorney in an office-sharing arrangement should not leave confidential client files in any unlocked file cabinets or storage areas within shared office space where they might be accessed and confidentiality compromised by unauthorized individuals.

The same confidentiality concerns apply equally to computerized records and work files. It would be impermissible for unaffiliated attorneys to have unrestricted access to each other's electronic files (including e-mails and word processing documents) and other client records. If separate computer systems are not utilized, each attorney's confidential client information should be protected in a way that guards against unauthorized access and preserves client confidences and secrets.[4] Similarly, attorneys sharing office space should consider the ethical implications of sharing a single fax line, which might permit confidential client information to come into the hands of unauthorized parties, including the unaffiliated attorneys who share office space. See Rhode Island Ethics Op. 93-99 (1994); see also Colorado Ethics Op. 89 (1991).[5]

[2] The same potential for confusion can arise from the manner in which the sharing attorneys' relationship is denoted on directory listings, office signs, and advertisements and the manner in which the sharing attorneys introduce each other to clients and other members of the public.

[3] It is generally considered inappropriate to use the term "of counsel" to refer to a lawyer who merely shares office space. Kansas Ethics Opins. 83-84 (1983), 83-34A (1984); Michigan Informal Ethics Opin. CI-1081 (1984); Oregon Ethics Opin. 1991-12 (1991).

[4] To the extent a shared computer system is used, it is likely that the same employees or third-party contractors would provide technical support and otherwise service the system. In such cases, the individuals providing technical support, like all shared employees or contractors, must be instructed regarding their obligations to maintain client confidences and secrets, and the lawyers involved must ensure that this occurs.

[5] Where use of private fax lines is not possible, it may be necessary to make clear to potential uses, particularly clients, that the faxed communications are not private. See Michigan Informal Ethics Opin. RI-249 (1996).

Regardless of the specific measures taken in the context of particular office-sharing arrangements, the bottom line is that attorneys participating in such arrangements must take all steps reasonably necessary to protect the confidentiality of their individual client information. This includes the appropriate exercise of caution by individual attorneys to refrain from divulging, without client consent, confidential client information in discussions they might have within the shared office space about their respective cases and the appropriate oversight of employees to ensure that they similarly protect client confidences and secrets. In circumstances where the office-sharing relationship involves shared employees, the lawyers participating in the arrangement should take affirmative steps to instruct these employees on their obligations to preserve client confidences and undertake the continuing oversight necessary to ensure that this is done.

Professional Independence

Attorneys sharing office space and/or services with other unaffiliated attorneys also must diligently protect the independence of their respective practices. It is only natural that attorneys involved in an office-sharing arrangement might rely on each other as a source of business referrals, back-up coverage when absent from the office, or simply as a sounding board for advice on difficult legal issues. But, in so doing, attorneys must take be careful to protect the attorney-client relationship that exists between them and each of their clients. No matter how convenient the intra-office relationships may become over time, attorneys in office-sharing relationships are not partners in the practice of law together and cannot treat each other as such.

Conflicts of Interest

The issue of professional independence is more than a mere aspirational concern, since it directly affects the treatment of potential conflicts of interest among clients represented by office-sharing attorneys. The requirements of D.C. Rule 1.7, dealing with general conflicts of interest, and the other conflict of interest rules are imputed to other lawyers "associated with a firm" under D.C. Rule 1.10. Comment [1] to Rule 1.10 provides that "[T]wo practitioners who share office space and occasionally consult or assist each other ordinarily would not be regarded as constituting a firm. However, if they present themselves to the public in a way suggesting that they are a firm or conduct themselves as a firm, they should be regarded as a firm for purposes of the Rules." The commentary goes on to recognize that in making this determination, it is important to take into account not only the terms of any formal agreement between the lawyers but also whether "they have mutual access to confidential information concerning the clients they serve." Id.; see also D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 247 (1994) (imputed disqualification under Rule 1.10 appropriately found where office-sharer was listed as "of counsel" to disqualified attorney).

This is an inherently factual inquiry turning upon the unique facts and circumstances of particular office-sharing relationship. But it is important to recognize that office-sharing arrangements can, in certain circumstances, create conflict issues potentially disqualifying the attorneys participating in those arrangements. See, e.g., ABA Informal Ethics Op. 1486 (Feb. 8, 1982) (lawyer may rent space from a law firm even though the lawyer and the law firm represent potentially adverse interests provided that appropriate care is taken to protect client confidences and clients consent to representation after disclosure); ABA Informal Ethics Op. 1474 (Jan. 18, 1982) (military lawyers working in same office and sharing common secretaries and filing facilities should avoid representing conflicting interests); Virginia Ethics Opin. 677 (Apr. 2, 1985) (lawyer sharing office space and expenses with another lawyer may not represent husband in divorce if office-sharer previously represented husband and wife in property settlement that is at issue in divorce action); In re Sexson, 613 N.E.2d 841 (Ind. 1993) (where lawyers shared office space, secretary, letterhead, phone lines, and apparent access to confidential information, it was reasonable for client to assume that lawyers were members of same firm; lawyer could not represent wife in divorce action when another office-sharer represented husband in personal injury claim). Attorneys who wish to share office space must ensure that these arrangements do not create the appearance of an impermissible conflict of interest or otherwise adversely affect their ability to zealously represent their clients.

Opinion No. 304

Management of a Law Firm's Human Resources Functions by an Employee Management Company

- A law firm may contract out its human resources functions (even to the extent that the firm's employees are considered, for certain purposes, employees of an unrelated company), but only if the arrangement does not prevent or inhibit any lawyer from abiding by the applicable Rules of Professional Conduct and does not attempt to insulate any lawyer from liability for her own malpractice.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 1.8(g)(1) (Conflict of Interest; Malpractice Liability)
- Rule 5.1 (Responsibilities of a Partner or Supervisory Lawyer)
- Rule 5.3 (Responsibilities Regarding Nonlawyer Assistants)
- Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)
- Rule 5.5(b) (Unauthorized Practice of Law)

Inquiry

The Legal Ethics Committee has been asked whether the Rules of Professional Conduct permit a law firm to have all its workers—lawyers as well as nonlawyers—employed by an unrelated employment management company. The inquirer's firm includes two lawyers, one of whom is the owner of the firm. Both would become employed by the employee management company along with the approximately sixteen nonlawyer employees. The employee management company would be responsible for payroll services, employee benefits, withholding and similar tax payments, compliance with employment laws (e.g., Fair Labor Standards Act, immigration, Family and Medical Leave Act, Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985 (COBRA)), personnel recordkeeping, unemployment compensation, workers' compensation, and the like.

The inquirer advises that regardless of whether the law firm's workers are considered employees of the law firm, of the employee management company, or of both for purposes of the laws governing labor and employment, the law firm (in the person of its single owner) would retain, full management and supervisory authority (e.g., hiring, firing, promotion, setting of compensation, assignment and supervision of work). Moreover, the law firm would have custody and control of all client files, firm accounting information (other than employment-related information) information, and the like.

Put differently, the management company would not be an owner of the firm in lay terms, would not share in the profits of the law firm, would have no authority to make employment decisions, and would have no say in directing lawyers or legal assistants what duties to perform or how to carry out those duties. The management company would perform functions unrelated to the provision of legal services in much the same way that a cleaning service, messenger service, or photocopying company may assist a law firm.

The employee management company might provide similar services to other companies, including other law firms. Although the employee management company might in some cases be considered the employer or co-employer of the employees of all these firms from the standpoint of human resources law, these individuals would work at their separate law firms just as if they were employees of those firms. Indeed, the individual law firms will not necessarily even know the identities of the other firms doing business with the employee management company, and there would be no contact between the firms by virtue of their use of the same employee management company.

Discussion

In recent years, an increasing number of businesses have engaged unrelated companies to perform one or more human resources functions. In some cases the employee management company acts as a co-employer (as opposed to merely performing human resources functions). The principal advantage of such contracting out is that the business does not have to handle the administrative functions. Additional benefits of a co-employment arrangement include the creation of larger employee groups for purposes of purchasing health and other benefits and the coverage of the employee management company by the workers' compensation laws.

The relationship between a business—in this instance, a law firm—and an employee management company can take many forms. Two of these are the "professional employer organization," or PEO, and the administrative service organization, or ASO. A PEO is "a company which contractually assumes and manages . . . human resource and personnel responsibilities . . . for . . . small to mid-sized businesses." National Ass'n of Professional Employer Organizations, Common Questions About PEOs Answered, at 1 (downloaded from http://www.napeo.org/ind-questions.htm, Aug. 28, 2000). In some forms, a PEO can assume the role of the employer or co-employer of the work force of its client business (in this case, the law firm). Seventeen states currently require registration or licensing of PEOs, id., though the District of Columbia is not one of them. A typical PEO client is a small business with about sixteen employees. Id. at 2. For the reasons discussed below, at least some PEOs appear to have policies and practices that are impermissible under the Rules of Professional Conduct.

Another form of employee management arrangement, called the ASO, administers a "client's" (in this case, the law firm's) human resource functions, payroll, employee benefits, workers' compensation, and government compliance, but does not "rely upon or assume an employment relationship with the employees, leaving the [law firm] as the sole employer." Rufus E. Wolff, "Client Service Agreements for ASO Clients," PEO Insider, Oct. 2000, at 6. The ASO provides its services as an administrative agent and advisor rather than as a co-employer, and hence ordinarily exercises no legal authority over the employees themselves. Id. at 6-7. Thus wages and employment taxes are paid under the Employer Identification Number of the client business, the client business remains the sponsor of employee benefit programs, and any workers' compensation claims are made under a policy issued to the client business. Id. at 6. Unlike a PEO, an ASO ordinarily is not liable for payment of employee wages or taxes. Id. at 7. Finally, an ASO is not subject to the state licensing requirements that apply to PEOs. Id. at 6.

A lawyer in this jurisdiction may practice alone, be a partner, associate or of-counsel in a private firm, work "in house" as a corporate or labor union counsel, toil in an accounting firm, labor in a public interest position, serve as a government lawyer, teach the law, or engage in any of a host of other activities. Whatever the nature of a lawyer's employment, however, she must abide by the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct. Put differently, the Rules forbid employment arrangements that may impair such responsibilities of a lawyer as the duties to exercise independent professional judgment on behalf of her client, D.C. Rule 2.1; see Rule 1.8(e)(2), to maintain the confidentiality of information gained during the course of a representation, Rule 1.6, 1.8(e)(1), to act zealously on behalf of her client's interests, Rule 1.3(a), to avoid situations in which her client's interests conflict with those of another client or of the lawyer herself, Rule 1.7, and to supervise adequately the conduct of her organization's other lawyers, Rule 5.1, and nonlawyers, Rule 5.3.

Note that the supervisory responsibilities imposed by Rule 5.1 are not limited to employees of the supervising lawyer but extend to all lawyers over whom the lawyer has "direct supervisory authority." D.C. Rule 5.1(b). In the case of nonlawyers, the responsibility covers those "employed or retained by or associated with" the lawyer, Rule 5.3 (emphasis added), "whether employees or independent contractors," Rule 5.3 comment [1]. "The key is supervision, and that supervision must occur regardless of whether the [nonlawyer] is employed by the attorney or retained by the attorney." In re Opinion No. 24, 128 N.J. 114, 127, 607 A.2d 962 (1992). Thus even if a lawyer or nonlawyer at the firm technically is the employee of the management company, the lawyers retain their full supervisory responsibilities under the Rules of Professional Conduct.[1]

The only practical difference between the proposed arrangement and the situation in a typical private law firm is that the mechanical aspects of employment will be handled by an entity other than the law firm. The employee management company will have no supervisory authority over any lawyer or nonlawyer in the firm, will play no role in employment decisions, will have no access to client confidences, and will occasion no conflicts by virtue of its presence. The supervisory lawyers in the firm will retain their responsibilities under Rules

[1] This is consistent with our prior ruling permitting the employment of temporary lawyers - a ruling that made no distinction based on whether the temporary lawyer is an employee of the employment agency or the law firm. See D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 284 (1998).

5.1 and 5.3 to oversee the work of the other lawyers, and the nonlawyers, in the firm. Cf. Florida Bar v. Flowers, 672 So.2d 526 (Fla. 1996) (disciplining lawyer who allowed independent consultant to hold himself out as being employed by lawyer).

The involvement of the employee management company will not result in the sharing of any individual employees working on client matters—lawyers or nonlawyers—among firms that use the services of the employee management company. Because there will be no sharing of employees between law firms, and the various firms using the employee management company will not thereby have access to one another's files or offices, we see no client confidentiality or conflict of interest problems.[2]

We said in permitting the use of temporary lawyers that such individuals "and their employing lawyers each have an obligation to ensure that the appropriate standards and requirements are met." D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 284 (1998). These include the ethical obligations of competence, independent professional judgment, undivided loyalty, and preservation of a client's confidences and secrets. Id. The same holds here: The management company may not exercise any control—formal or informal, direct or indirect—that would affect these or any other ethical obligations attendant upon the provision of legal services. This extends to decisions about the hiring, firing, promotion, compensation, and work assignments of lawyers and legal assistants (though such control may be permissible where only clerical or secretarial employees are involved and the control exercised is unrelated to the provision of legal services). Moreover, the management company may not take over, wholly or partly, any of the lawyer's responsibilities outlined above.

The inquiry does not indicate the basis on which the management company will be compensated for its work. So long as the employee management company's compensation is not a function of the fees earned by the law firm, however, the arrangement will not implicate the fee-splitting prohibition of Rule 5.4. D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 284 (1998) (payment of fee to agency providing temporary lawyers not fee splitting); ABA Formal Op. 88-356 (1988) (payment of fee to agency providing temporary lawyers not fee splitting, even where cost passed on to client); Ill. Op. 90-23 (1991); Mich. Informal Op. RI-310 (1998) (permitting fee based upon hours worked by leased lawyer but not upon fees collected for such work); Va. Legal Ethics Op. 1712 (1998); N.C. Op. RPC 104 (1991); N.J. Op. 631 (1989); cf. Nat'l Treasury Employees Union v. U.S. Dep't of the Treasury, 656 F.2d 848 (D.C. Cir. 1981) (prohibiting union that employed—and had supervisory control over—lawyers from receiving attorney fees above union's actual costs). Unlike the consulting firm whose "loans" of its lawyer-employees were disapproved in our Opinion 182 (1987), the employee management firm here will not—and may not—exercise supervisory authority over the lawyers or legal assistants. That the employee management firm presumably will realize a profit from its services to the law firm does not alter our position. See D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 284 (1998) (permitting, by implication, agencies to profit from making lawyers employed by them available to law firms on a temporary basis); ABA Formal Op. 88-356 (1988) (expressly permitting same).

Moreover, we do not believe that the employee management agency would be engaged in the unauthorized practice of law because the agency would not be holding the lawyers out to clients (and indeed would not be dealing with clients at all), would have no control over the selection of lawyers to work for the firm, and would not supervise the practice of law by such lawyers. See D.C. Unauth. Prac. of Law Op. 6-99 (1999) (holding that activities of temporary lawyer placement agencies do not constitute unauthorized practice); ABA Formal Op. 88-356 n. 12 (1988) (furnishing temporary lawyers directly to clients would constitute unauthorized practice of law); Ill. Op. 90-23 (1991). As with the engagement of a temporary lawyer, the arrangement should be disclosed to clients if it is "material to the representation." See D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 284 (1998) (establishing materiality threshold); ABA Formal Op. 88-356 (1988) (disclosure that lawyer is employed on temporary basis not required where she is working under direct supervision of regular firm lawyer). Because the hiring, firing, and conditions of employment are to be under the control of the lawyer-owner of the firm, we have little concern that the employee management arrangement will be used (and stress that it may not be used) to avoid the prohibition against invidious discrimination by lawyers in conditions of employment. See D.C. Rule 9.1.

A lawyer may not limit prospectively her liability for her own malpractice, D.C. Rule 1.8(g)(1); D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 235 (1993), and a lawyer who did so using the device of an employee management company would violate Rule 1.8(g)(1). We note, though, that lawyers may in some instances avoid liability for the malpractice of their partners by practicing in a limited liability partnership or limited liability company, D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 235 (1993); see D.C. Code §§ 29-1314 (1996) (professional limited liability corporations), 41-153.6(c) (1998) (limited liability partnerships). We normally do not address issues of law outside the Rules of Professional Conduct, and accordingly offer no view on whether the proposed arrangement would affect the malpractice liability of the lawyer-owner for errors and omissions of the other lawyers and nonlawyers working at the firm. "Whether a lawyer may be civilly or criminally liable for another lawyer's conduct is a question of law beyond the scope of [the Rules of Professional Conduct]." D.C. Rule 5.1, Comment [7]. We do observe, however, that from a professional responsibility standpoint, the supervisory responsibilities of an owner-lawyer are personal to her, extend to everyone acting under her direction regardless of whether such individuals are her "employees," and would not be altered by the fact that the firm's employees were co-employed by another entity. Rules 5.1, 5.3. Thus we do not see how the arrangement would—or could, consistently with the requirements of Rule 1.8(g)(1)—avoid liability for the owner's own errors and omissions, including whatever liability may result from inadequate supervision of others in the firm, and we offer no view on whether the arrangement would affect the liability of the owner under the respondeat superior doctrine.

We note that a number of other jurisdictions have approved similar arrangements, subject to the limitation that the lawyer-owner(s) of the firm, rather than the employee management agency, maintain exclusive control over hiring, firing, and other aspects of the lawyer's employment. E.g., Ill. Op. 90-23 (1991); Mich. Informal Op. RI-310 (1998); Mo. Informal Op. 990019 (disapproving employee management where lawyer would not have unilateral right to discipline or terminate leased nonlawyer employee); N.C. Op. RPC 104 (1991); N.J. Op. 631 (1989).

[2] In particular, the special concerns about disqualification that may arise in respect of a temporary lawyer who works for more than one firm at a time, see ABA Formal Op. 88-356 (1988); D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 284 (1998), do not obtain here. Of course the normal conflicts requirements for lateral lawyers, see D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 279 (1988), and nonlawyers, see id. § 4; D.C. Bar Ethics Op. 227 (1992), will apply even where an individual moves between two law firms that use the same employee management company.

Finally, some PEOs adhere to published standards of a trade organization known as the Employer Services Assurance Corporation ("ESAC"). ESAC requires that a PEO share with the "client" (i.e., the law firm), and in some instances exercise exclusively, the power to hire and fire employees (who here would include lawyers and legal assistants as well as clerical and secretarial staff), that the PEO have at least a shared right to direct and control the work of the employees, and that ESAC have access to client (i.e., law firm) work sites and records. A lawyer owner who permitted the removal of these rights and responsibilities wholly or partly from the management of the law firm would violate the Rules of Professional Conduct. Hence the use of a PEO by law firms in this jurisdiction is prohibited if the arrangement gives the PEO actual (as opposed to merely legal) authority over the hiring or firing of lawyers or legal assistants, or authorizes the PEO to direct or control the provision of legal services by any employee of the law firm. The responsibilities in question include the duties to exercise independent judgment on behalf of clients, (see D.C. Rules 1.8(e)(2), 2.1), maintain client confidences and secrets (see Rules 1.6, 1.8(e)(1)), act zealously on behalf of the client's interests (see Rule.1.3(a)), avoid conflicts (see Rule 1.7), and supervise the conduct of the others working for the firm (see Rules 5.1, 5.3). By contrast, the ASO form, or the PEO form without such objectionable attributes, does not appear to raise any of these concerns.

Thus we answer the inquiry in the affirmative, subject to the limitations and concerns noted above. Use of an employee management company by a law firm is permissible only if it does not affect the firm's provision of legal services and does not limit or infringe any of the duties and responsibilities of lawyers set out in the D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct.

Opinion No. 305

Ethical Considerations Arising From Representation Of Trade Association

• Representation of a trade association does not, without more, create an attorney-client relationship with each member of the association; particular circumstances of a representation, however, may create an attorney-client relationship with one or more of the members.

When counsel for a trade association is asked to represent a client in a matter adverse to a member of that trade association, the lawyer must consider whether a de facto attorney-client relationship exists with the member, as well as whether the prospective representation would be impaired by the lawyer's existing representation of the trade association.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
• Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest)
• Rule 1.13 (Organization as Client)
• Rule 1.16 (Declining or Terminating Representation)

Inquiry

The proliferation of trade associations, particularly in Washington, D.C., has led to inquiries regarding a lawyer's ethical responsibilities to the trade associations she represents and, also, to the association's members.[1] The primary concern is the circumstances under which a lawyer representing a trade association may undertake a representation adverse to a member of the trade association.

Discussion

Rule 1.13(a) states that "A lawyer employed or retained by an organization represents the organization acting through its duly authorized constituents." The Comment to Rule 1.13 further states that "The duties defined in this Comment apply equally to unincorporated associations." Comment [13] to Rule 1.7 adds, "[T]he lawyer who represents a . . . trade association or other organization-type client is deemed to represent that specific entity, and not its . . . members or 'other constituents.'" A lawyer representing a trade association then, does not, simply by or through that representation, establish an attorney-client relationship with each member.[2]

This view has found considered acceptance elsewhere. See ABA Ethics Op. No. 92-365 (July 6, 1992) (interpreting the comparable provision of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct (1983, amended 1991); Oregon Bar Ethics Op. No. 1991-27 (a lawyer who represents a trade association may represent one member of the association against another member with respect to a matter unrelated to the work performed for the association without disclosure to or consent from the association).[3] This approach, however, does not conclude the analysis. There remains for consideration the penumbra where an attorney is asked to undertake a representation adverse to one or more members of the trade association that she represents.

1. Representation Adverse to Member

In general, the lawyer for a trade association is not prohibited from representing the association in a manner adverse to a member or members. Comment [13] to Rule 1.7; D.C. Bar Ethics Op. No. 216. In the situation where the trade association becomes adverse to the interests of one of the members, Comment [8] to Rule 1.13 provides guidance to the trade association's lawyer:

> There are times when the organization's interest may be or become adverse to [1] A trade association is "an association of business organizations having similar problems and engaged in similar fields formed for mutual protection, interchange of ideas and statistics and for maintenance of standards within their industry." BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 1493 (6th ed. 1990). See also Nat'l Muffler Dealers Assoc., Inc. v United States, 440 U.S. 472, 483 n.15 (1979) (noting that the Department of Commerce has defined a trade association as "'a nonprofit, cooperative, voluntarily-joined, organization of business competitors designed to assist its members and its industry in dealing with mutual business problems.'") (citation omitted).

[2] While this Opinion concerns trade associations, the principles addressed here may apply to other types of organizations. See Rule 1.13.

[3] Information obtained from a member while the lawyer is acting for the trade association is protected by the attorney-client privilege and subject to the confidentiality requirements of Rule 1.6; however, it is the trade association that holds the privilege, not the member. Comment [3] to Rule 1.13; D.C. Bar Ethics Op. No. 269. As described below, however, a situation may arise where the member, through the lawyer's "act or omission," has a reasonable belief that it was being represented individually by the lawyer, in which case the confidentiality requirements of Rule 1.6 protect the member's communications as well as the trade association's. See D.C. Bar Ethics Op. No. 279 n.6.

> those of one or more of its constituents. In such circumstances the lawyer should advise any constituent, whose interest the lawyer finds adverse to that of the organization, of the conflict or potential conflict of interest, that the lawyer cannot represent such constituent, and that such person may wish to obtain independent representation. . . .

See also Shadow Isle, Inc. v. American Angus Assoc., No. 84-6126-CV-SJ-6, 1987 WL 17337, at *4 (W.D. Mo. Sept. 22, 1987) (law firm not barred from continuing to represent trade association in suit brought by member where the association was the only client recognized by the firm). In addition, since the member is not a client of the association's lawyer, the lawyer is usually free to represent an unrelated party with interests adverse to the member. Comment [13] to Rule 1.7.

Under certain circumstances, however, the lawyer may be deemed to represent an individual member, notwithstanding the absence of a formal attorney-client relationship. Comment [14] to Rule 1.7. See also Association of the Bar for the City of New York ("ABCNY") Ethics Op. No. 1999-01. "In general, representation may be implied where on the facts there is a reasonable belief by the constituent that there is individual as well as collective representation." Comment [14] to Rule 1.7, citing ABA Ethics Op. No. 92-365. The threshold query, then, is whether the member should reasonably be regarded a de facto client of the lawyer.

2. Attorney-Client Relationship with Member of Association

"[D]etermining whether and to what extent the individual member has become a client requires careful examination of all of the circumstances of the firm's relationship to and representation of the trade association." ABA Ethics Op. No. 92-365. An attorney-client relationship may be formed in the absence of an express agreement, and is "not dependent on the payment of fees [or] . . . upon the execution of a formal contract.". Westinghouse Elec. Corp. v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 580 F.2d 1311,1317 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 955 (1978). What is most important is whether the member of the trade association disclosed confidential information to the association's lawyer, and the surrounding circumstances and expectations. ABA Ethics Op. No. 92-365. See also Westinghouse, 580 F.2d at 1319-1320; Glueck v. Jonathan Logan, Inc., 653 F.2d 746, 749 (2d Cir. 1981).

In Westinghouse, the leading case on this issue, the law firm for a trade association also represented a party in litigation adverse to some of the association's members. The affected members moved to disqualify the firm. These members had previously submitted information to the firm in connection with legislative efforts on behalf of the association, with the understanding that all material would be kept confidential and in the belief that the firm was acting on the members' behalf. Although the court expressly declined to create a per se rule that a lawyer for a trade association represents every member of the association, it disqualified the law firm because the association members reasonably believed they were submitting confidential information to a firm acting in their individual behalf.

In its opinion regarding the representation of trade associations, the American Bar Association Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility drew upon Westinghouse as well as its previous conflict analysis with respect to the representation of corporations and partnerships. ABA Ethics Op. No. 92-365; see also ABCNY Ethics Op. 1999-01, citing ABA Ethics Op. 95-390. The factors considered by the ABA Committee included whether the lawyer involved had affirmatively assumed a duty of representation to the member of a trade association; whether the member had separate representation; whether the lawyer represented the member before commencing its representation of the association; and whether the member relied upon the lawyer's representation of its individual interests. In addition, the Committee commented that the size of the trade association may bear on the reasonableness of any member's expectation of representation; for example, it is more likely to be unreasonable for a member of a large association to expect that the association's attorney represents its individual interests.

If, under the analysis described above, a lawyer concludes that an individual association member should be treated as a client of the law firm, the lawyer must consider whether it faces a conflict of interest.[4] If the new representation would require the lawyer to advance two adverse positions in a single matter, then Rule 1.7(a) prohibits the representation. In other circumstances, the applicable rule is Rule 1.7(b), which provides that a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if:

> (1) that matter involves a specific party or parties and a position to be taken by that client in that matter is adverse to a position taken or to be taken by another client in the same matter even though that client is unrepresented or represented by a different lawyer;
> (2) such representation will be or is likely to be adversely affected by representation of another client;
>
> (3) representation of another client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by such representation; or
> (4) the lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests.

Rules 1.6 (confidentiality of information) and 1.10 (imputed disqualification) may also be implicated. Cf. Westinghouse, 580 F.2d at 1321 (referencing comparable rules under Code of Professional Responsibility). To overcome the conflict and continue the adverse representation, the lawyer must disclose the issue and obtain the consent of the member as well as of the prospective client, pursuant to Rule 1.7(c).[5]

[4] If the firm's representation of the trade association has concluded when the hypothetical new matter is presented, such that the association is a former client, Rule 1.9 would control:

> A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that person's interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client consents after consultation.

[5] Rule 1.7(c) permits representation to go forward despite a conflict "if each potentially affected client provides consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation." Comment [19] to Rule 1.7 sets forth the requirements for disclosure:

> "Adequate disclosure requires such disclosure of the parties and their interests and positions as to enable each potential client to make a fully informed decision as to whether to proceed with the contemplated representation. . . . Full disclosure also requires that clients be made aware of the possible extra expense, inconvenience, and other disadvantages that may arise if an actual conflict of position should later arise and the lawyer be required to terminate the representation."

The Terminology section of the Rules defines "consent" as "a client's uncoerced assent to a proposed course of action, following consultation with the lawyer regarding the matter in question."

3. Impairment of Representation

Even if no attorney-client relationship exists with the member, the lawyer must determine whether the representation would be materially impaired by her representation of the trade association. Pursuant to Comment [14] to Rule 1.7, representation (absent informed consent) would be improper if:

> (a) the adverse matter is the same as, or substantially related to, the matter on which the lawyer represents the organization client. [sic]
> (b) during the course of representation of the organization client the lawyer has in fact acquired confidences or secrets (as defined in Rule 1.6(b)) of the organization client or an affiliate or constituent that could be used to the disadvantage of any of the organization client or its affiliate or constituents, or
> (c) such representation seeks a result that is likely to have a material adverse effect on the financial condition of the organization client.

See also Glueck, 653 F.2d at 750; ABCNY Ethics Op. No. 1999-01. In Glueck, the Second Circuit adopted the following test:

> Disqualification will ordinarily be required whenever the subject matter of a suit is sufficiently related to the scope of the matters on which a firm represents an association as to create a realistic risk either that the plaintiff will not be represented with vigor or that unfair advantage will be taken of the defendant.

Glueck, 653 F.2d at 750. This test involves a careful analysis of the attorney's relationship and dealings with the member and the member's relationship and dealings with the association. For example, a member's disclosure of confidential information relevant to the association's matter undertaken by the attorney may be a basis for disqualification. Id.[6] The Glueck court affirmed the disqualification of a law firm that represented a trade association in collective bargaining negotiations. The firm also represented a former executive of one of the association's members in a breach of employment contract dispute. Applying the "substantial relationship" test, the court concluded that, while preparing for collective bargaining, the law firm might well learn of the member's policies or practices bearing on the executive's termination, and thus the trial court did not abuse its discretion in disqualifying the law firm. Glueck, 653 F.2d at 750.[7] Cf. Shadow Isle, 1987 WL 17337, at *4 (law firm not barred from continuing to represent trade association in suit brought by member where no danger of divided loyalty to two clients existed since the association was the only client recognized by the firm).

Alternatively, the matter may not be undertaken if the result sought by the prospective client is likely to have a material adverse impact on the trade association's finances. See Comment 16 to Rule 1.7. Disqualification on the grounds of financial adversity was appropriate in North Star Hotels Corp. v. Mid-City Hotel Assocs., 118 F.R.D. 109 (D. Minn. 1987), where a firm represented a hotel manager in a suit against the partnership that owned the hotel. The firm already represented two development partnerships whose general partner was also the general partner of the hotel partnership. Because any judgment against the hotel partnership would have a financial impact on the two development partnerships represented by the firm, the court disqualified the firm for a conflict arising from "financial adversity". 118 F.R.D. at 112-13; see also ABA Ethics Op. No. 92-365, discussing North Star Hotels Corp..

If the analysis demonstrates that the lawyer's representation of the trade association will materially limit its representation of the prospective client, then the lawyer may only accept or continue the representation by obtaining the consent of the trade association and the prospective client, pursuant to Rule 1.7(c). See Comment 1 to Rule 1.16 ("A lawyer should not accept representation in a matter unless it can be performed competently, promptly, without improper conflict of interest, and to completion.").

Conclusion

A lawyer who represents a trade association does not, without more, represent the members of the association. When asked to represent a client in a matter where the lawyer would be adverse to an association member, however, the lawyer must consider the relevant facts and circumstances to determine if the member has a reasonable belief that an attorney-client relationship exists between the member and the lawyer. If so, the lawyer may accept the new representation only with the consent of both the prospective client and the member. If no attorney-client relationship exists with the member but the lawyer's representation would be impaired because of a substantial relationship between the subject of the new representation and its representation of the trade association, or if the new matter is likely to be financially adverse to the association, then the representation may proceed only with the consent of the client and the trade association.

Opinion No. 306

Practicing Law While Simultaneously Selling Insurance

• A lawyer who also is a licensed insurance broker may sell insurance products to the general public, provided that the lawyer fully complies with the Rules of Professional Conduct applicable to lawyers acting in non-lawyer capacities. When a lawyer is selling insurance products to her clients, she must ensure: (1) her own professional judgment on behalf of the client will not be adversely affected by the transaction; (2) the terms of the transaction are fair and reasonable to the client; (3) the client is advised of the right to seek independent counsel; (4) the client has an opportunity to seek independent counsel; (5) the client is advised of the lawyer's possible conflict of interests and attendant possible adverse consequences; and (6) the client provides written consent to the transaction.

Applicable Rules

• Rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information)
• Rule 1.7 (Conflict of Interest: General Rule)
• Rule 1.8 (Conflict of Interest: Prohibited Transactions)
• Rule 8.4 (Misconduct)

Inquiry

The inquirer is a lawyer who also holds a license as an insurance broker.

[6] Glueck and other cases refer to the trade association member in such a situation as a "vicarious" or derivative" client. As the ABCNY Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics observed, such names are not helpful to the analysis. ABCNY Ethics Op. 1999-01.

[7] For a discussion of the "substantially related" test in this jurisdiction, see Rule 1.9 and Brown v. District of Columbia Bd. of Zoning Adjustment, 486 A.2d 37 (D.C. 1984) (en banc).

Recently, the inquirer, a member of the District of Columbia Bar, left government service and announced her intention to engage in the private practice of law. The inquirer plans to practice law and sell insurance products to both clients and the general public. The inquirer requested our advice concerning whether the Rules of Professional Conduct allow a lawyer to practice law and sell insurance simultaneously from the same office. The inquirer also asked whether it was ethical for her to offer to sell insurance to clients who had retained her for legal services.

Discussion

This Committee previously has opined that "[t]he Rules of Professional Conduct erect no bar to a lawyer engaging in another business, separate from his or her law practice, so long as the lawyer's engagement in that business does not result in violations of applicable provisions of the Rules." D.C. Bar Op. No. 226 (1992) (citing e.g., Rules 1.3 (duty of zealous representation); 1.7(b)(4)(professional judgment adversely affected by lawyer's responsibility to third party or lawyer's own financial interests); 1.8(a)(transactions with client)). We also have noted that a lawyer performing multiple professional roles (i.e., lawyer and broker) with respect to a single transaction should comply with applicable provisions of the Rules of Professional Conduct regardless of which "hat" she is wearing in particular aspects of that transaction. See D.C. Bar Op. No. 226.

When the inquirer is selling insurance to non-clients, she is not functioning as a lawyer or dealing with individuals whom she has represented as a lawyer. Accordingly, the inquirer must ensure the client understands that she is acting exclusively as an insurance broker and not as a lawyer in the insurance transaction. As a member of the Bar, however, the inquirer must still comply with certain Rules of Professional Conduct even though she is selling insurance instead of practicing law. The relevant Rules of Professional Conduct would be those that apply to lawyers acting in non-lawyer capacities. See, e.g., Rule 8.4 (lawyer may not "[e]ngage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation").

Further, when selling insurance products to non-clients, the inquirer should ensure that an attorney-client relationship is not inadvertently created. The prospective purchaser of insurance products may know that the inquirer is a lawyer, in part, because insurance will be sold from a law office. The prospective purchaser also may have or may indicate an expectation that the inquirer will bring her legal judgment to bear in recommending insurance products. Under either circumstance, the inquirer should inform the prospective purchaser that she is not functioning as a lawyer and will not be exercising professional judgment as a lawyer on behalf of the purchaser.

If the inquirer sells insurance products to her client, she is entering into a business transaction with the client. Rule 1.8(a) provides:

> (a) A lawyer shall not enter into a business transaction with a client or knowingly acquire an ownership, possessory, security, or other pecuniary interest adverse to a client unless:
> (1)The transaction and terms on which the lawyer acquires the interest are fair and reasonable to the client and are fully disclosed and transmitted in writing to the client in a manner which can be reasonably understood by the client;
> (2)The client is given a reasonable opportunity to seek the advice of independent counsel in the transaction; and
> (3)The client consents in writing thereto.

Accordingly, in selling insurance products to her client, the inquirer must ensure that the terms of the transaction are fair and reasonable to the client and fully disclosed and transmitted to the client in writing. The inquirer also should advise the client of the client's right to seek independent counsel. Next, the inquirer must give the client an opportunity to seek the advice of an independent attorney concerning the terms of the insurance transaction. The matter in which the client is given an opportunity to seek the advice of independent counsel may vary depending on such factors as the sophistication of the client, the magnitude of the transaction, and the client's certitude with respect to the need to consult with independent counsel. Cf. Comments [19] & [20] to Rule 1.7. The inquirer then must get the client's written consent to the transaction.

In addition to complying with Rule 1.8(a), the inquirer also must comply with Rule 1.7(b)(4) when selling insurance products to her clients. Rule 1.7(b) provides that "a lawyer shall not represent a client with respect to a matter if: . . . (4) [t]he lawyer's professional judgment on behalf of the client will be or reasonably may be adversely affected by the lawyer's responsibilities to or interests in a third party or the lawyer's own financial, business, property, or personal interests." However, Rule 1.7(c) allows a lawyer to represent a client despite a conflicting financial or business interest "if each potentially affected client provides consent to such representation after full disclosure of the existence and nature of the possible conflict and the possible adverse consequences of such representation."

In order to comply with Rule 1.7(b), the inquirer should not recommend or enter into a business transaction with a client unless she concludes that her professional judgment on behalf of the client will not be adversely affected by the transaction. See Comment [25] to Rule 1.7. The inquirer must be careful that her ability to make a profit on the sale of insurance does not cloud her professional judgment as to whether insurance is really needed by the client. See N.H. Bar Op. No. 1998-99/14 (2000). In this regard, the New York State Bar concluded that a lawyer engaged in estate planning may not recommend or sell life insurance products to the lawyer's estate planning clients if the lawyer has a financial interest in the sale of the particular products. The New York State Bar reasoned that under such circumstances the lawyer's financial interest would be reasonably likely to interfere with the lawyer's independent professional judgment in advising the client how best to satisfy his or her financial needs regarding trust and estate planning. See N.Y. State Bar Op. No. 619 (1991).

Even when the inquirer concludes that her professional judgment on behalf of the client will not be adversely affected by the transaction, the inquirer should not recommend or enter into the business agreement without full disclosure to the client of the inquirer's own interest in the transaction so that the client can make a fully informed choice. Such disclosure should include the nature and substance of the inquirer's interest in the insurance product offered (including the fact that the lawyer will be earning commissions, discounts, or other benefits from the insurance underwriter or any other third party), alternative sources for insurance services, possible adverse consequences of the inquirer's representation, and sufficient information so that the client understands that the provision of insurance services is not a legal service. See Comment [25] to Rule 1.7. This disclosure does not have to be in writing or take any particular form. See Comment [20] to Rule 1.7. However, "the form of disclosure sufficient for more sophisticated business clients may not be sufficient to permit less sophisticated clients to provide fully informed consent." Id.

In the event that the inquirer's obligation to the insurance underwriter or another party precludes full disclosure to her client, the inquirer cannot proceed with the insurance transaction. See Comment [19] to Rule 1.7. The inquirer also must obtain the client's consent to proceed with the transaction notwithstanding the inquirer's conflicting interests.

In selling insurance to her client, the inquirer also must be mindful that she still is bound by all of her obligations to the client as a result of the existing attorney-client relationship in matters other than the insurance transaction. Thus, the inquirer has, among other obligations, a duty to preserve the client's secrets and confidences. See Rule 1.6. To the extent that the inquirer knows about the client's secrets or confidences that are inconsistent with the provision of insurance services, the inquirer cannot reveal that information without the client's consent unless otherwise authorized by law. However, the inquirer cannot "engage in conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation." See Rule 8.4. There may well be situations in which the inquirer is obligated to disclose certain information to the insurance company that underwrites the policies she sells. In such circumstances, it may not be possible for the inquirer to sell insurance to the client.

The views we express in this Opinion are supported by recent ethics opinions in other jurisdictions. The New Hampshire Ethics Committee advised that a lawyer who also is a licensed insurance broker may offer insurance products to her estate planning clients, so long as the clients consent in writing after full disclosure and an opportunity to consult with an independent attorney, the transaction is fair, and the lawyer satisfies herself that her professional judgment will not be clouded by her interest in selling the insurance. See N.H. Bar Op. 1998-99/14. Similarly, the New York State Bar Association Committee on Professional Ethics allowed a lawyer licensed as an insurance broker to sell insurance products to clients, provided that the lawyer's professional judgment as a lawyer would not be impaired and the lawyer makes clear that, in selling insurance, the lawyer is not exercising professional judgment on the client's behalf. See N.Y. State Bar Op. No. 687 (1997). The lawyer also must obtain the client's consent, after full disclosure of the lawyer's conflicting interest, to proceed with the transaction. Id. But see N.Y. State Bar Op. No. 619 (estate planning lawyer could not sell insurance products to client because his financial interest interfered with independent professional judgment in advising client on trust and estate matters). The New York State Bar allowed the lawyer to sell insurance products to non-clients subject to the obligation to avoid deceitful conduct and subject to solicitation rules. New York State Bar Op. No. 687, see also S.C. Adv. Op. No. 98-29 (1998)(practicing attorney with insurance license not prohibited from selling life insurance in S.C.); Utah Eth. Op. No. 146A (1995)(lawyer may sell insurance products to existing legal clients after fulfilling the disclosure and consent requirements); Mich. Eth. Op. No. RI-135 (1992)(lawyer/insurance agent may sell insurance to law clients provided that ethics rules regarding business transactions with clients, confidentiality, and conflicts of interest are observed); Ill. Adv. Op. No. 90-32 (1991)(lawyer may sell insurance products to legal clients with disclosure and consent). Therefore, the weight of authority supports our conclusion that a lawyer may sell insurance products to the general public and her client, provided that the lawyer follows certain Rules of Professional Conduct.

Opinion No. 307

Participation in Government Program Requiring Payment of Percentage of Fee

- It is permissible for a lawyer to participate in a federal government referral service that negotiates contracts to provide legal services to federal agencies where that program requires the lawyer to submit one percent of the legal fees received through the service to the government office in order to fund the program.

Applicable Rules

- Rule 5.4 (Professional Independence of a Lawyer)
- Rule 7.1 (Communications Regarding a Lawyer's Services)

Inquiry

We have been asked to address the permissibility of a lawyer's participation in a General Services Administration (GSA) program designed to provide federal agencies with a schedule of pre-negotiated contracts for goods and services, including legal services for financial asset management. The program is funded by charging participating contractors a fee of one percent of the business they receive through the program, raising the question of whether, in the case of a lawyer's participation, this funding scheme would violate our rules prohibiting the sharing of legal fees with non-lawyers.

Our understanding of the background and working of the program is as follows: Federal law grants an office of GSA, the Federal Supply Service (FSS), authority to issue solicitations and award contracts for the provision of commercial products and services to federal agencies. The FSS carries out this task by negotiating contracts for space, goods and services with providers. It then places these contracts on a "schedule," from which customer agencies may select a contractor based on their determination of where they can obtain the best value. Agencies are not required to use the FSS-negotiated schedules; they may contract for services independently. The advantage of FSS schedules is that they often offer better deals to government agencies by offering lower prices gained through large volume contracts and sparing agencies the time and expense of independent procurement.

In 1994-95, Congress ceased funding FSS through the appropriations process and instead directed the agency to establish an "industrial funding" system through which customers would fund FSS's services. FSS accordingly established a system under which participating contractors are required to remit to FSS an "industrial funding fee" (IFF) of one percent of the contract amount. See 48 C.F.R. 552-238-77.[1]

In January 2000, in response to requests from customer agencies, FSS

[1] 48 C.F.R. 552-238-77(a) states that "The IFF reimburses the GSA Federal Supply Service for the costs of operating the Federal Supply Schedules Program and recoups its operating costs from ordering activities."

added a line item for legal services to an already existing schedule for financial asset services. This schedule provides services to help agencies manage and dispose of financial assets such as loans and real and personal property—to provide, for example, the kind of short-term, concentrated financial and legal services the Small Business Administration might need in order to conduct an asset sale to dispose of ten thousand loans at one time. This introduction of legal services on a FSS schedule did not require government agencies to use legal services contracted for through FSS. Agencies remain free to negotiate independently for legal services, but can gain significant efficiency advantages by taking advantage of FSS schedule contracts.

Under the FSS's standard procedures, a law firm that bids to participate on a schedule contract to provide legal services to a government agency in connection with financial asset management would be obligated to pay the one percent IFF for all legal work thereby obtained. A law firm has asked whether participation in a FSS service contract would violate D.C. Rule of Professional Conduct 5.4 (a), which prohibits lawyers from "sharing" legal fees with non-lawyers.

Discussion

The D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct allow lawyers to "participate in lawyer referral programs and pay the usual fees charged by such programs." Rule 7.1, Comment [6]. Rule 7.1(b)(5) further provides that a lawyer who uses an intermediary to obtain legal work must take reasonable steps "to ensure that the potential client is informed of (a) the consideration, if any, paid or to be paid by the lawyer to the intermediary, and (b) the effect, if any, of the payment to the intermediary on the total fee to be charged." It is thus clear that a lawyer can participate in a government-run schedule program for legal services, and pay "the usual fee" charged by this program, provided that the lawyer takes reasonable steps to inform government clients obtained through such a program of the existence of the fee and the effect, if any, of that fee on the government clients' legal fees.
